'I found out his name. But thereafter, I suspect I've been too busy following a false trail.'

He gave a sigh and cocked his ear. 'Listen,' he said. 'Kuomintang anthems. They play them to tease me. Wherever they take me, it's like this. Happens too often to be a coincidence.' Then when I said nothing, he rose to his feet and wandered into the shadows towards the heavy curtains.

'Your mother,' he said eventually, 'was devoted to our campaign. To stop the opium trade into China. Many European companies, including your father's, were making vast profits importing Indian opium into China and turning millions of Chinese into helpless addicts. In those days, I was one of those central to the campaign. For a long time, our strategy was rather naive. We thought we could shame these companies into giving up their opium profits. We wrote letters, presented them with evidence showing the damage opium was causing to the Chinese people. Yes, you may laugh, we were very naive. But you see, we thought we were dealing with fellow-Christians. Well, eventually we saw we were getting nowhere. We discovered that these people, they not only liked the profits very much, they actually wanted the Chinese to be useless. They liked them to be in chaos, drug-addicted, unable to govern themselves properly. That way, the country could be run virtually like a colony, but with none of the usual obligations. So we changed our tactics. We grew more sophisticated. In those days, just as they do still, the opium shipments came along the Yangtze. Boats had to bring them upriver through bandit country. Without adequate protection, the shipments wouldn't get much beyond the Yangtze gorges without being marauded. So all these companies, Morganbrook and Byatt, Jardine Matheson, all of them, they used to make deals with the local warlords through whose territories the shipments passed. These warlords were just glorified bandits really, but they had armies, they had the power to see the shipments through. So here was our new strategy. No longer did we plead with the trading companies. We pleaded with the warlords. Appealed to their racial pride. We pointed out it was in their hands to end the profitability of the opium trade, to reverse the one major obstacle to the Chinese taking command of their own fate, their own land. Of course, some were too keen on the payments they received. But we had some converts. Wang Ku was at that time one of the more powerful of these bandit lords. His territory covered several hundred square miles in the north of Hunan. A pretty brutal chap, but sufficiently feared and respected to make him valuable indeed to the trading companies. Now Wang Ku became very sympathetic to our cause. He often came to Shanghai, liked the high life here, and we were able to prevail on him during these visits. Puffin, are you well?'

'Yes, I'm fine. I'm listening.'

'Perhaps you should go now, Puffin. You don't have to hear what I'm about to tell you.'

'Tell me. I'm listening.'

'Very well. My feeling is that you should hear it, if you can bear to. Because ... well, because you must find her. There's still a chance you can find her.'

'So my mother is alive?'

'I've no reason to suppose otherwise.'

'Then tell me. Go on with what you're saying.'

He came back to the desk and sat down once more in front of me. 'That day Wang Ku came to your house,' he said.

'It's fitting you should remember that day. You're quite right to suspect it was important. It was the day your mother discovered that Wang Ku's motives were far from pure. Put simply, he planned to seize the opium shipments himself. Of course, he'd made complicated arrangements, so that it went through three or four other parties, very Chinese that, but in the end, yes, that's what it amounted to. Most of us already knew this, but your mother didn't. We'd kept her in the dark, perhaps foolishly, because we sensed she'd not accept it. The rest of us, naturally we had qualms, but we decided to work with Wang nevertheless. Yes, he'd sell the opium to the same people the trading companies did. But the important thing was to stop the imports. To make the trade unprofitable. Unfortunately, that day Wang Ku came to your house he said something that for the first time made clear to your mother the reality of his relationship with us. My guess is she felt foolish. Perhaps she'd suspected it all along, but hadn't wished to look at it, and was as angry with herself and with me as she was with Wang. In any case, she quite lost her temper, actually struck him. Only lightly, you understand, but her hand did touch his cheek. And of course, she said everything she had to say to his face. I knew then some terrible price would have to be paid. I tried to sort the thing out then and there. I explained to him how your father had just left, that your mother was really upset, I tried to convey all this to him as he left. He smiled and said not to worry, but I worried, oh yes, I worried all right. I knew that what your mother had done couldn't be undone so easily. I'd have been relieved, I tell you, if all Wang had done in response was stop participating in our plan. But he wanted the opium, he'd already made plenty of arrangements. Besides, he'd been insulted by a foreign woman, and he wanted to put things right.'

As I leant towards him into the glare of the lamp, an odd feeling came over me that behind my back the darkness had grown and grown, so that now a vast black space had opened up there. Uncle Philip had paused to wipe some sweat from his forehead with the heel of a hand. But now he looked at me intently and continued:

'I went to see Wang Ku later that day at the Metropole. I did what I could to try and stop the calamity I knew would come. But it was no use. What he told me that afternoon was that far from being angered by your mother, he'd found her spirit - that's what he called it, her "spirit" - highly attractive. So much so that he wished to take her back with him as a concubine, back to Hunan. He proposed to "tame" your mother, as he would a wild mare. Now you must understand, Puffin, the way things were then, in Shanghai, in China, if a man like Wang Ku decided on a course like that, there was little anyone could do to stop him. That's what you must understand. Nothing at all would have been achieved by asking the police or whoever to guard your mother. That might have slowed things down a little, but that's all. There was no one who could protect your mother from the intentions of a man like that. But you see, Puffin, my great fear was for you. I wasn't sure what he intended to do with you, and that's what I was really pleading for. In the end, we came to an agreement. I would arrange things so that your mother was alone, unguarded, if at that same time I could take you right away from the scene. That's all I wanted to do. I didn't want him to take you too. Your mother, that was an inevitability. But for you, there was something to plead for. And that's what I did.'

There was a substantial pause. Then I said:

'After this convenient arrangement, do I take it Wang Ku continued to co-operate with your scheme?'

'Don't be cynical, Puffin.'

'But did he?'

'As it happened, he did. Taking your mother satisfied him. He did as we wished him to do, and I dare say, his contribution was a factor in the companies' eventual decision to end the trade.'

'So my mother was, you might say, sacrificed for a greater cause.'

'Look, Puffin, it wasn't anything any of us had a choice about. You must understand that.'

'Did you ever see my mother again? After she was abducted by this man?'

I saw him hesitate. But then he said:

'Yes. As a matter of fact, I did. Once, seven years later. I happened to be travelling through Hunan and accepted Wang's invitation to be his guest. And there, in his fortress, yes, I did see your mother one last time.'

His voice was now almost a whisper. The phonograph downstairs was no longer playing, so that a stillness hung between us.

'And ... and what had become of her?'

‘She was in good health. She was, of course, one of several concubines. Under the circumstances, I’d say she’d adapted well to her new life.’

‘How had she been treated?’

Uncle Philip looked away. Then he said quietly: ‘When I saw her, she asked about you, naturally. I told her what news I had. She was pleased. You see, until I saw her that time, she’d been utterly cut off from the outside world. For seven years, she’d only heard what Wang chose to have her hear. What I mean is, she didn’t know for certain that the financial arrangement was working. So when I saw her, that’s what she wanted to know, and I was able to reassure her that it was. After seven years of torturous doubt, her mind was put at rest. I can’t tell you how relieved she was. “That’s all I wanted to know,” she kept saying. “That’s all I wanted to know.”’

He was watching me now very carefully. After another moment, I gave him the question for which he was waiting.

‘Uncle Philip, what financial arrangement?’

He looked down at the back of his hands and studied them for a time. ‘Had it not been for you, her love for you, Puffin, your mother, I know, would have taken her own life without a moment’s hesitation before allowing that scoundrel to lay a finger on her. She would have found a way, and she would have done it. But there was you to consider. So in the end, when she saw the situation for what it was, she made an arrangement. You would be financially provided for in return for ... for her compliance. I saw too much of it myself, arranged it through the company. There was a man there at Byatt’s, didn’t have a clue what it was all about. Thought he was securing safe passage for his opium. Ha ha! He was a fool, that man!’ Uncle Philip shook his head and smiled. Then his face darkened again, as though he were now resigned to the course our conversation would take.

‘My allowance,’ I said quietly. ‘My inheritance ...’

‘Your aunt in England. She was never wealthy. Your real benefactor, all these years, has been Wang Ku.’

‘So all this time, I’ve been living ... I’ve been living off ...’ I could not go on and simply stopped.

Uncle Philip nodded. ‘Your schooling. Your place in London society. The fact that you made of yourself what you have. You owe it to Wang Ku. Or rather, to your mother’s sacrifice.’

He stood up again, and when he looked at me I saw something new in his face, something almost like hatred. But then he turned and moved away into the shadows, and I could see it no more.

‘That time I last saw your mother,’ he said. ‘In that fortress. She’d lost all concern for the opium campaign. She only lived for you, worried for you. By that time, the trade had been made illegal. But even that news meant nothing to her any more. Of course I was bitter about it, as were the others of us who’d given years to the campaign. We’d finally achieved our goal, we thought. Opium trade abolished. It only took a year or two to see what abolition really meant. The trade had simply changed hands, that was all. It was now run by Chiang’s government. More addicts than ever, but now it was being peddled to pay for Chiang Kai-shek’s army, to pay for his power. That’s when I joined the Reds, Puffin. Your mother, I thought she’d be devastated to know what our campaign had amounted to, but she no longer cared. All she wanted was for you to be looked after. She only wanted news of you. Do you know, Puffin’ - his voice suddenly took on a strange edge - ‘when I saw her that time, she seemed well enough. But while I was there, I asked others in the household, people who would know. I wanted to find out the truth, find out how she’d really been treated, because ... because I knew that one day this moment, this meeting we’re having now, was bound to come. And I found out. Oh yes, I found out. Everything. ’

‘Are you deliberately trying to torment me?’

‘It wasn’t just ... just a matter of surrendering to him in bed. He regularly whipped her in front of his dinner guests. Taming the white woman, he called it. And that wasn’t all. Do you know ...’

I had already covered my ears, but now shouted out: ‘Enough! Why torture me like this?’

‘Why?’ His voice was now angry. ‘Why? Because I want you to know the truth! All these years, you’ve thought of me as a despicable creature. Perhaps I am, but it’s what this world does to you. I never meant to be like this. I meant to do good in this world. In my way, I once made courageous decisions. And look at me now. You despise me. You’ve despised me all these years, Puffin, the closest thing I ever had to a son, and you despise me still. But now do you see how the world really is? You see what made possible your comfortable life in England? How you were able to become a celebrated detective? A detective! What good is that to anyone? Stolen jewels, aristocrats murdered for their inheritance. Do you suppose that’s all there is to contend with? Your mother, she wanted you to live in your enchanted world for ever. But it’s impossible. In the end it has to shatter. It’s a miracle it survived so long for you. Now, Puffin, here. I’ll give you this chance. Here.’

He had taken out his pistol again. He came from the shadows towards me, and when I looked up, he was looming above me, much as he had done in my childhood. He flung back his jacket and pressed the pistol into his waistcoat near his heart.

‘Here,’ he said, bending down and whispering so I could smell his stale breath. ‘Here, boy. You can kill me. As you’ve always wanted to. That’s why I’ve stayed alive so long. No one else should have that privilege. I've saved myself, you see, for you. Pull the trigger. Here, look. We'll make it appear as if I attacked you. I'll be holding the gun, I'll fall over you. When they come in, they'll see my body collapsed over you, it'll look like self-defence. See, here, I'm holding it. You pull the trigger, Puffin.'

His waistcoat was pushing against my face, moving up and down with his heaving chest. I felt a revulsion, and tried to move away, but his free hand - the skin felt indescribably parched - had grasped my arm in an effort to draw me to him. It occurred to me he would pull the trigger himself if my hand so much as touched the pistol. I pulled back violently, unbalancing my chair, and staggered away from him.

For a second we both glanced guiltily towards the door to see if the commotion would bring in the guards. But nothing happened, and eventually Uncle Philip laughed, and picking up the chair, positioned it carefully in front of the desk. Then he sat on it himself, put the pistol down on the desk, and spent some time recovering his breath. I took a few more steps away from the desk, but there was nothing else in that cavernous room, and I simply came to a stop, my back still turned to him. Then I heard him say:

'All right. Very well.' He took a few more gulps of air. 'Then I'll tell you. I'll make to you my darkest confession.'

But for the next minute, all I could hear behind me was his heaving breath. Then finally he said:

'Very well. I'll confess to you the truth. About why I allowed Wang Ku to kidnap your mother that day. What I said before, yes, it's true enough. I had to safeguard you. Yes, yes, everything I said earlier more or less stands. But if I'd really wanted to, if I'd really wanted to save your mother, I know I'd have found a way to do so. I'll tell you something now, Puffin. Something I wasn't able to confess even to myself for many years. I helped Wang take your mother because a part of me wanted her to become his slave. To be used like that, night after night. Because you see, I always lusted after her, right from the days when I came to be a lodger in your house. Oh yes, I desired her, and when your father went off like that, I believed it was my chance, that I was his natural successor. But ... but your mother, she'd never looked at me like that, I realised it after your father went away. She respected me as someone decent ... No, no, it was impossible. Not in a thousand years could I put myself forward to her, not in that sort of way. And I was angry. I was so angry. And when it all happened, with Wang Ku, it excited me. Do you hear me, Puffin? It excited me! After he took her away, in the darkest hours of the night, it excited me. All those years, I lived vicariously through Wang. It was almost as though I'd conquered her too. I gave myself pleasure, many many times, imagining for myself what was happening to her. Now, now, kill me! Why spare me? You've heard it! Here, shoot me like a rat! '

For a long time, I went on standing in the darkened part of the room, my back to him, listening to his breathing. Then I turned to him again and said, quite quietly:

'You said earlier you believed my mother was still alive. Is she still with Wang Ku? '

'Wang died four years ago. His army, in any case, was disbanded by Chiang. I don't know where she is now, Puffin. I honestly don't. '

'Well. I shall find her. I shan't give up. '

'It won't be easy, my boy. There's war raging through the country. It'll soon engulf the whole of it. '

'Yes,' I said. 'I dare say it will soon engulf the whole world. But that's not my fault. In fact, it's no longer my concern. I mean to start again, and this time to find her. Is there anything else you can tell me to help with my search? '

‘I’m afraid not, Puffin. I’ve told you everything.’

‘Then goodbye, Uncle Philip. I’m sorry I’m not able to oblige you.’

‘Don’t worry. No shortage of people willing to oblige the Yellow Snake.’ He gave a quick laugh. Then he said in a weary voice: ‘Goodbye, Puffin. I hope you find her.’

PART SEVEN

London, 14th November 1958

Chapter Twenty-three

It was my first long trip in many years, and for two days after our arrival in Hong Kong I remained quite fatigued. Air travel is impressively fast, but the conditions are cramped and disorientating. My hip pains returned with a vengeance and a headache lingered for much of my stay, which no doubt jaundiced my view of that colony. I know of those who have made the trip out there and returned full of praise. 'A forward-looking place,' they always say. 'And astonishingly beautiful.' Yet for much of that week, the skies were overcast, the streets oppressively crowded. I suppose I did appreciate here and there - in the Chinese signs outside the shops, or just in the sight of the Chinese going about their business in the markets - some vague echo of Shanghai. But then again, such echoes were more often than not discomfiting. It was as though I had come upon, at one of those dullish supper parties I attend in Kensington or Bayswater, a distant cousin of a woman I once loved; whose gestures, facial expressions, little shrugs nudge the memory, but who remains, overall, an awkward, even grotesque parody of a much-cherished image.

I was in the end glad of Jennifer's company. When she had first hinted she should come with me, I had deliberately ignored her. For even by that late stage - I am speaking of only five years ago - she was still tending to regard me as some sort of invalid, especially whenever the past, or else the Far East, re-emerged in my life. I suppose a part of me had long resented this oversolicitousness, and it was only when it occurred to me she genuinely wished to get away from things for a while - that she had her own worries, and that such a trip might do her good - that I agreed we should travel together.

It had been Jennifer's suggestion that we try and extend our journey to Shanghai, and I suppose this would not have been impossible. I could have spoken to a few old acquaintances, men who still have influence at the Foreign Office, and I am sure we could have gained entry into mainland China without undue difficulty. I know of others who have done just that. But then by all accounts, Shanghai today is a ghostly shadow of the city it once was. The communists have refrained from physically tearing the place down, so that much of what was once the International Settlement remains intact. The streets, though renamed, are perfectly recognisable, and it is said that anyone familiar with the Shanghai of old would know his way about there. But the foreigners, of course, have all been banished, and what were once lavish hotels and night-clubs are now the bureaucratic offices of Chairman Mao's government. In other words, the Shanghai of today is likely to prove no less painful a parody of the old city than did Hong Kong.

I have heard, incidentally, that much of the poverty - and also the opium addiction against which my mother once battled so hard - has receded significantly under the communists. How deeply these evils have been eradicated remains to be seen, but it would certainly appear that communism has been able to achieve in a handful of years what philanthropy and ardent campaigning could not in decades. I remember wondering to myself what my mother would have made of such a reflection that first night we spent in Hong Kong, as I paced around my room at the Excelsior Hotel, nursing my hip and trying in general to regain my equilibrium.

I did not go to Rosedale Manor until our third day. It had long been understood that I would make the trip alone, and Jennifer, though she watched my every move throughout the morning, saw me off after lunch with no undue fuss.

That afternoon the sun had actually broken through, and as I climbed the hill-slopes in my taxi, the well-manicured lawns on each side were being watered and mown by teams of gardeners stripped to their vests. Eventually the ground levelled off and the taxi pulled up in front of a large white house built in a British colonial style with long rows of shuttered windows and an additional wing sprawling from its side. It must once have been a splendid residence, overlooking as it did the water and much of the west side of the island. When I stood in the breeze and looked across the harbour, I could see right into the distance to where a cable-car was climbing a faraway hill. Turning to the house itself, however, I saw it had been allowed to grow shabby; the paint on the window ledges and door frames in particular had cracked and peeled.

Inside, in the hallway, there was a faint smell of boiled fish, but the place looked spotlessly clean. A Chinese nun led me down an echoing corridor to the office of Sister Belinda Heaney, a woman in her mid-forties with a serious, slightly dour expression. And it was there, in that cramped little office, that I was told of how the woman they knew as 'Diana Roberts' had come to them through a liaison organisation working with foreigners stranded in communist China. All the Chinese authorities had known of her when handing her over was that she had been living in an institution for the mentally ill in Chunking since the end of the war.

'It's possible she'd spent most of the war there too,' Sister Belinda said. 'It hardly bears thinking about, Mr Banks, what sort of place that was. A person, once incarcerated in such a place, could easily never be heard of again. It was only because she was a white woman she was singled out at all. The Chinese didn't know what to do with her. After all, they want all foreigners out of China. So eventually she was referred here, and she's been with us now for nearly two years. When she first came to us, she was very agitated. But within a month or two, all the usual benefits of Rosedale Manor, the peace, the order, the prayers, began to do their work. You wouldn't recognise her now as the poor creature who arrived here. She's so much calmer. You're a relative, did you say?'

'Yes, it's certainly possible,' I said. 'And since I was in Hong Kong, I thought it only right I paid a visit. It's the least I could do.'

'Well, any news of kin, close friends, any link with England, we'd be very glad to hear about. Meanwhile, a visitor is always welcome.'

'Does she have many?'

'She has visitors regularly. We run a scheme with the pupils of St Joseph's College.'

'I see. And does she get on well with the other residents?'

'Oh yes. And she's no trouble to us at all. If only we could say the same about some of the others!'

Sister Belinda led me down another corridor to a large sunny room - it had perhaps once been the dining room - where twenty or so females all dressed in beige smocks were sitting or shuffling about. French doors were open to the grounds outside, and the sunlight was falling through the windows across the parquet flooring. Had it not been for the large number of vases filled with fresh flowers, I might have mistaken the room for a children's nursery; there were bright watercolours pinned all over the walls, and at various points, little tables with draughts, playing cards, paper and crayons. Sister Belinda left me standing by the entrance while she went over to another nun sitting at an upright piano, and a number of the women stopped what they were doing to stare at me. Others appeared to become self-conscious and tried to hide themselves. Almost all were Westerners, though I could see one or two Eurasians. Then someone started to wail loudly somewhere in the building behind me, and curiously, this had the effect of putting the women at their ease. One wiry-headed lady nearby grinned at me and said:

‘Don’t you worry, love, it’s only Martha. She’s bloomin’ well off again!’

I could hear Yorkshire in her accent and was wondering what tides of fate had brought her to this place, when Sister Belinda returned.

‘Diana should be outside,’ she said. ‘If you’d follow me, Mr Banks.’

We went out through the French doors into well-tended grounds which climbed and dipped in all directions, reminding us we were near the crest of a hill. As I followed Sister Belinda past flower beds abloom with geraniums and tulips, I glimpsed panoramic views over the neatly cut hedges. Here and there, old ladies in beige smocks were sitting in the sunshine, knitting, chatting together or muttering harmlessly to themselves. At one point, Sister Belinda paused to look about her, then led me down a sloping lawn through a white gate into a little walled garden.

The only figure to be seen here was an elderly lady sitting in the sun on the far side of the thinning grass, playing cards at a wrought-iron table. She was absorbed in her game and did not look up as we approached. Sister Belinda touched her shoulder gently and said:

‘Diana. Here’s a gentleman come to visit you. He’s from England.’

My mother smiled up at us both, then returned to her playing cards.

‘Diana doesn’t always understand what’s said to her,’ Sister Belinda said. ‘If you need her to do something, you just have to keep repeating it over and over.’

‘I wonder if I may speak with her alone.’

Sister Belinda was not keen on this idea and for a moment seemed to be trying to think of a reason why this was not possible. But in the end, she said: ‘If you’d prefer it, Mr

Banks, I'm sure that's all right. I shall be in the dayroom. '

Once Sister Belinda had gone, I looked carefully at my mother as she dealt out her cards. She was much smaller than I had expected and her shoulders had a severe hunch. Her hair was silver and had been tied tightly in a bun. Occasionally, as I continued to watch her, she would glance up and smile, but I could see a trace of fear that had not been there in Sister Belinda's presence. Her face was not so greatly lined, but there were two thick folds beneath her eyes that were so deep they looked almost like incisions. Her neck, perhaps owing to some injury or condition, had receded deep into her body so that when she gazed from side to side at her cards, she was obliged also to move her shoulders. There was a droplet clinging to the tip of her nose, and I had taken out my handkerchief to remove it before realising that by doing so I might unduly alarm her. Finally I said quietly:

'I'm sorry I couldn't give you any sort of warning. I realise this might be something of a shock for you.' I stopped, since it was clear she was not listening. Then I said: 'Mother, it's me. Christopher.'

She looked up, smiled much as before, then turned back to her cards. I had assumed she was playing solitaire, but as I watched, saw she was following some odd system of her own. At one point the breeze lifted a few cards off the table, but she appeared not to care. When I collected the cards from the grass and brought them back to her, she smiled, saying:

'Thank you so much. But there's no need to do that, you know. Myself, I like to leave it until many more cards have accumulated on the lawn. Only then do I go to gather them, all in one go, you see. After all, they can't fly away off the hill altogether, can they?'

For the next few moments I continued to watch her. Then my mother began to sing. She sang quietly to herself, almost under her breath, as her hands went on picking up and placing down the cards. The voice was faint - I could not make out the song she was singing - but it was effortlessly melodious. And as I went on watching and listening, a fragment of memory came back to me: of a windy summer's day in our garden, my mother on the swing, laughing and singing at the top of her voice, and me jumping up and down before her, telling her to stop.

I reached forward and gently touched her hand. Instantly she pulled it away and stared at me furiously.

'Keep your hands to yourself, sir!' she said in a shocked whisper. 'Keep them right to yourself!'

'I'm sorry.' I moved back a little to reassure her. She returned to her cards and when she next glanced up, she gave a smile as though nothing had happened.

'Mother,' I said slowly, 'it's me. I've come from England. I'm really very sorry it's taken so long. I realise I've let you down badly. Very badly. I tried my utmost, but you see, in the end, it proved beyond me. I realise this is hopelessly late.'

I must have started to cry, because my mother looked up and stared at me. Then she said:

'Do you have toothache, my man? If so, you'd better talk to Sister Agnes.'

'No, I'm fine. But I wonder if you've understood what I'm saying? It's me. Christopher.'

She nodded and said: 'No use delaying it, my man. Sister Agnes will fill in your form.'

Then an idea came to me. 'Mother,' I said, 'it's Puffin. Puffin.'

'Puffin.' She suddenly became very still. 'Puffin.'

For a long time my mother said nothing, but the expression on her face had now changed entirely. She was looking up again, but her eyes were focused on something over my shoulder, and a gentle smile was creasing her face.

‘Puffin,’ she repeated quietly to herself, and for a moment seemed lost in happiness. Then she shook her head and said: ‘That boy. He’s such a worry to me.’

‘Excuse me,’ I said. ‘Excuse me. Supposing this boy of yours, this Puffin. Supposing you discovered he’d tried his best, tried with everything he had to find you, even if in the end he couldn’t. If you knew that, do you suppose ... do you suppose you’d be able to forgive him?’

My mother continued to gaze past my shoulder, but now a puzzled look came into her face.

‘Forgive Puffin? Did you say forgive Puffin? Whatever for?’ Then she beamed again happily. ‘That boy. They say he’s doing well. But you can never be sure with that one. Oh, he’s such a worry to me. You’ve no idea.’

‘It might seem foolish to you,’ I said to Jennifer when we were discussing the trip again last month, ‘but it was only when she said that, it was only then I realised. What I mean is, I realised she’d never ceased to love me, not through any of it. All she’d ever wanted was for me to have a good life. And all the rest of it, all my trying to find her, trying to save the world from ruin, that wouldn’t have made any difference either way. Her feelings for me, they were always just there, they didn’t depend on anything. I suppose that might not seem so very surprising. But it took me all that time to realise it.’

‘Do you really suppose,’ Jennifer asked, ‘she had no inkling at all who you were?’

‘I’m sure she didn’t. But she meant what she said, and she knew what she was saying. She said there was nothing to forgive, and she was genuinely puzzled at the suggestion there might be. If you’d seen her face, when I first said that name, you'd have no doubt about it either. She'd never ceased to love me, not for a single moment.'

'Uncle Christopher, why do you suppose you never told the nuns who you really were?'

'I'm not sure. It seems odd, I know, but in the end I just didn't. Besides, I saw no reason to take her away from there. She did seem, somehow, contented. Not happy exactly. But as though the pain had passed. She'd have been no better off in a home in England. I suppose it was much like this question of where she should lie. After she died, I thought about having her reburied here. But there again, when I thought it over, I decided against it. She'd lived all her life in the East. I think she'd prefer to rest out there.'

It was a frosty October morning, and Jennifer and I were walking down a winding lane in Gloucestershire. I had stayed the night at an inn not far from the boarding house where she is currently living, and I had called on her shortly after breakfast. Perhaps I did not conceal well enough my sadness on seeing the shabbiness of her latest lodgings, for she had quickly insisted, despite the chill, on showing me the view from a nearby churchyard over the Windrush valley. As we came further down the lane, I could see at the bottom the gates of a farm; but before we reached them, she led me off the path through a gap in the hedge.

'Uncle Christopher, come and look.'

We picked our way through a thick patch of nettles until we were standing by some railings. I could then see the fields sweeping down the valley side.

'It's a wonderful view,' I said.

'From the churchyard, you can see even further. Don't you ever think of moving out here too? London's much too crowded now.'

'It's not like it used to be, that's true.'

We stood there for a moment, side by side, gazing down at the view.

‘I’m sorry,’ I said to her, ‘I’ve not been up here much recently. I suppose it’s been a good few months now. Can’t think what I’ve been up to.’

‘Oh, you shouldn’t worry so much about me.’

‘But I do worry. Of course, I worry.’

‘It’s all behind me now.’ she said, ‘all of that last year. I won’t try anything foolish like that ever again. I’ve already promised you that. It was just an especially bad time, that’s all. Besides, I never really meant to do it. I made sure that window was left open.’

‘But you’re still a young woman, Jenny. With so much ahead of you. It depresses me that you should even have contemplated such a thing.’

‘A young woman? Thirty-one, no children, no marriage. I suppose there is time still. But I’ll have to find the will, you know, to go through all of that again. I’m so tired now, I sometimes think I’ll gladly settle for a quiet life on my own. I could work in a shop somewhere, go to the cinema once a week and not do anyone any harm. Nothing wrong with a life like that.’

‘But you won’t settle for that. Doesn’t sound like the Jennifer I know.’

She gave a small laugh. ‘But you’ve no idea what it’s like. A woman of my age, trying to find romance in a place like this. Landladies and lodgers whispering about you every time you step outside your room. What am I actually supposed to do? Advertise? Now that would set them all talking, not that I care at all about them.’

‘But you’re a very attractive woman, Jenny. What I mean is, when people look at you, they can see your spirit, your kindness, your gentleness. I'm sure something will happen for you. '

'You think people see my spirit? Uncle Christopher, that's only because you look at me and still see the little girl you once knew. '

I turned and looked carefully at her. 'Oh, but it's still there,' I said. 'I can see it. It's still there, underneath, waiting. The world hasn't changed you as much as you think, my dear. It just gave you something of a shock, that's all. And by the way, there are a few decent men in this world, I'll have you know. You just have to stop doing your utmost to avoid them. '

'All right, Uncle Christopher. I'll try and do better next time. If there is a next time. '

For a moment we went on gazing at the view, a light wind blowing across our faces. Eventually I said:

'I should have done more for you, Jenny. I'm sorry. '

'But what could you have done? If I take it into my silly head to ...'

'No, I meant ... I meant earlier on. When you were growing up. I should have been there with you more. But I was too busy, trying to solve the world's problems. I should have done a lot more for you than I did. I'm sorry. There. Always meant to say it. '

'How can you apologise, Uncle Christopher? Where would I be now without you? I was an orphan, with no one. You mustn't ever apologise. I owe you everything. '

I reached forward and touched the wet cobweb suspended across the railings. It broke and dangled from my fingers.

'Oh, I hate that feeling!' she exclaimed. 'Can't bear it! '

‘I’ve always rather liked it. When I was a boy, I used to take off my gloves just to do it.’

‘Oh, how could you?’ She laughed loudly, and I could see suddenly the Jennifer of old. ‘And what about you, Uncle Christopher? How about you getting married? Don’t you ever think about it?’

‘Definitely too late for that.’

‘Oh, I don’t know. You manage well enough living on your own. But it doesn’t suit you much either. Not really. It makes you morose. You should think about it. You’re always mentioning your lady-friends. Won’t one of them have you?’

‘They’ll have me for lunch. But not for much more, I fear.’ Then I added: ‘There was someone once. Back then. But that went the way of everything else.’ I gave a quick laugh. ‘My great vocation got in the way of quite a lot, all in all.’

I must have turned away from her. I felt her touch my shoulder, and when I looked around, she was peering gently into my face.

‘You shouldn’t always talk so bitterly about your career, Uncle Christopher. I’ve always so admired you for what you tried to do.’

‘Tried is right. It all amounted to very little in the end. Anyway, that’s all behind me now. My major ambition in life these days is to keep this rheumatism at bay.’

Jennifer suddenly smiled and slipped her arm through mine. ‘I know what we’ll do,’ she said. ‘I have a plan. I’ve decided. I’ll find a fine decent man whom I’ll marry, and I’ll have three, no, four children. And we’ll live somewhere near here, where we can always come and look over this valley. And you can leave your stuffy little flat in London and come and live with us. Since your lady-friends won't have you, you can accept the post of uncle to all my future children. '

I smiled back at her. 'That sounds a fine plan. Though I don't know if your husband would so appreciate having me around his house the whole time. '

'Oh, then we'll rig up an old shed or something for you. '

'Now, that does sound tempting. Keep your end of the bargain and I'll think about it. '

'If that's a promise, then you'd better watch out. Because I'll make sure it happens. Then you'll have to come and live in your shed. '

Over this last month, as I have drifted through these grey days in London, wandering about Kensington Gardens in the company of autumn tourists and office workers out for their lunch breaks, occasionally running into an old acquaintance and perhaps going off with him for lunch or tea, I have often found myself thinking again of my conversation with Jennifer that morning. There is no denying it has cheered me. There is every reason to believe that she has now come through the dark tunnel of her life and emerged at the other end. What awaits her there remains to be seen, but she is not by nature someone who easily accepts defeat. Indeed, it is more than possible she will go on to fulfil the programme she outlined to me - only half-jokingly - as we looked out over the valley that morning. And if in a few years' time things have indeed gone according to her wishes, then it is not out of the question I will take up her suggestion to go and live with her in the country. Of course, I would not much fancy her shed, but I could always take a cottage not far away. I am grateful for Jennifer. We understand each other's concerns instinctively, and it is exchanges like the one that frosty morning which have proved such a source of consolation for me over the years.

But then again, life in the countryside might prove too quiet, and I have become rather attached to London of late. Besides, from time to time, I am still approached by persons who remember my name from before the war and wish my advice on some matter. Only last week, in fact, when I went to dinner with the Osbournes, I was introduced to a lady who immediately seized my hand, exclaiming: 'You mean you're the Christopher Banks? The detective?'

It turned out she had spent much of her life in Singapore, where she had been 'a very great friend' of Sarah's. 'She used to talk of you all the time,' she told me. 'I really do feel I know you already.'

The Osbournes had invited several other people, but once we sat down to eat, I found myself placed beside this same lady, and inevitably our conversation drifted back to Sarah.

'You were a good friend of hers, were you not?' she asked at one point. 'She always talked so admiringly of you.'

'We were good friends, certainly. Of course, we rather lost touch once she went out to the East.'

'She often talked of you. She had so many stories about the famous detective, kept us quite amused when we grew tired of playing bridge. She always spoke most highly of you.'

'I'm moved to think she remembered me so well. As I say, we rather lost touch, though I did receive a letter from her once, around two years after the war. I wasn't aware until then how she'd spent the war. She made light of the internment, but I'm sure it was no joke.'

'Oh, I'm sure it was no joke at all. My husband and I, we could so easily have suffered the same fate. We managed to get ourselves to Australia just in time. But Sarah and M. de Ville-fort, they always trusted so much to fate. They were the sort of couple who went out in the evening with no plan, quite happy to see who they bumped into. A charming attitude most of the time, but not when the Japanese are on your doorstep. Did you know him also?'

'I never had the pleasure of meeting the count. I understand he returned to Europe after Sarah's death, but our paths have never crossed.'

'Oh, I thought from the way she talked of you, you were good friends with them both.'

'No. You see, I really only knew Sarah during an earlier part of her life. I beg your pardon, there's perhaps no way for you to answer this. But did they strike you as a happy couple, Sarah and this French chap?'

'A happy couple?' My companion thought for a moment.

'Of course, one can never know for sure, but quite honestly, it would be hard to believe otherwise. They did seem utterly devoted to one another. They never had much money, so that meant they could never be quite as carefree as they might have wished. But the count always seemed so, well, so romantic. You laugh, Mr Banks, but that's just the word for it. He was so devastated by her death. It was the internment that did it, you know. Like so many others, she never fully recovered her health. I do miss her. Such a charming companion.'

Since this encounter last week, I have brought out and read again several times Sarah's letter - the only one I ever received since our parting in Shanghai all those years ago. It is dated 18th May 1947, and has been written from a hill station in Malaya. Perhaps it was my hope that after my conversation with her friend, I would discover in those rather formal, almost blandly pleasant lines, some hitherto hidden dimension. But in fact the letter continues to yield up little more than the bare bones of her life since her departure from Shanghai. She talks of Macao, Hong Kong, Singapore as being 'delightful', 'colourful', 'fascinating'. Her French companion is mentioned several times, but always in passing as though I already knew all there was to know about him. There is a breezy mention of the internment under the Japanese, and she pronounces her health problems 'a bit of a bore'. She asks after me in a polite way and calls her own life in liberated Singapore 'a pretty decent thing to be getting on with'. It is the sort of letter one might write, in a foreign land, on an impulse one afternoon to a vaguely remembered friend. Only once, towards the end, does its tone imply the intimacy we once shared.

'I don't mind telling you, dearest Christopher,' she writes, 'that at the time, I was disappointed, to say the least, at the way things transpired between us. But don't worry, I have long ceased to be cross with you. How could I remain cross when Fate in the end chose to smile so kindly on me? Besides, it is now my belief that for you, it was the correct decision not to come with me that day. You always felt you had a mission to complete, and I dare say you would never have been able to give your heart to anyone or anything until you had done so. I can only hope that by now your tasks are behind you, and that you too have been able to find the sort of happiness and companionship which I have come lately almost to take for granted.'

There is something about these sections of her letter - and those last lines in particular - that never quite ring true. Some subtle note that runs throughout the letter - indeed, her very act of writing to me at that moment - feels at odds with her report of days filled with 'happiness and companionship'. Was her life with her French count really what she set off to find that day she stepped out on to the jetty in Shanghai? I somehow doubt it. My feeling is that she is thinking of herself as much as of me when she talks of a sense of mission, and the futility of attempting to evade it. Perhaps there are those who are able to go about their lives unfettered by such concerns. But for those like us, our fate is to face the world as orphans, chasing through long years the shadows of vanished parents. There is nothing for it but to try and see through our missions to the end, as best we can, for until we do so, we will be permitted no calm.

I do not wish to appear smug; but drifting through my days here in London, I believe I can indeed own up to a certain contentment. I enjoy my walks in the parks, I visit the galleries; and increasingly of late, I have come to take a foolish pride in sifting through old newspaper reports of my cases in the Reading Room at the British Museum. This city, in other words, has come to be my home, and I should not mind if I had to live out the rest of my days here. Nevertheless, there are those times when a sort of emptiness fills my hours, and I shall continue to give Jennifer's invitation serious thought.

双语版石黑一雄作品

无可慰藉

The Unconsoled

二〇一七年诺贝尔文学奖获奖作家

Kazuo Ishiguro

〔英〕石黑一雄

—— 著

郭国良 李杨

—— 译

上海译文出版社

版权信息

书名：无可慰藉（汉、英双语版）

作者：【英】石黑一雄

译者：郭国良；李杨

责任编辑：宋金

关注微博：@数字译文

微信公众号：数字译文

我们的产品：译文的书

联系我们：hi@shtph.com

问题反馈：complain@shtph.com

合作电话：021-53594508

Digital Lab是上海译文出版社数字业务的实验部门，成立于2014年3月。我们致力于将优质的资源送到读者手中。我们会不断努力，做体验更好、设计更好的电子书，加油！

上海译文出版社| Digital Lab

目 录

无可慰藉

献词

第一部

第一章

第二章

第三章

第四章

第五章

第六章

第七章

第八章

第九章

第十章

第二部

第十一章

第十二章

第十三章

第十四章

第十五章

第十六章

第十七章

第十八章

第十九章

第二十章

第三部

第二十一章

第二十二章

第二十三章

第二十四章

第二十五章

第二十六章

第二十七章

第四部

第二十八章

第二十九章

第三十章

第三十一章

第三十二章

第三十三章

第三十四章

第三十五章

第三十六章

第三十七章

第三十八章

译后记

The Unconsoled

Dedication

I

1

2

3

4

5

6

7

8

9

10

II

11

12

13

14

15

16

17

18

19

20

III

21

22

23

24

25

26

27

IV

28

29

30

31

32

33

34

35

36

37

38

无可慰藉

献给洛娜和内奥米<sup>\(1\)</sup>

---

<sup>\(1\)</sup> 洛娜和内奥米是作者的妻女。

第一部

第一章

发现没有任何人——甚至服务台后也没有一个职员——在迎候我，出租车司机似乎有些尴尬。他穿过空无一人的大厅，或许是以以为能在高大的植物或扶手椅后面找到一位员工。最后，他只得把我的行李箱放在电梯门口，咕哝着找了个借口，转身离开。

大厅着实宽敞，几张咖啡桌散置摆放，并不显拥挤。天花板很低，还有点凹陷，感觉有些幽闭恐怖。外面虽然阳光明媚，里面却阴沉得很。只有一缕阳光照射在服务台桌子附近的墙壁上，照亮了一块深色木质壁板及一摞德文、法文和英文杂志。我看到服务台上有个小银铃，正想过去摇一下，就在这时，身后的门开了，一个身穿制服的男人走了进来。

“下午好，先生。”他说，一副很累的样子，走到服务台桌子后面，开始登记手续。他小声道了歉，但态度显然仍甚为简慢。然而，一听到我的名字，他大吃一惊，马上挺直了身子。

“瑞德先生，抱歉没认出是您。霍夫曼经理本想亲自来迎接您，但很不凑巧，他得去参加一个很重要的会议。”

“没关系，我期待日后与他见面。”

这位接待员一边快速填好登记表，一边轻声嘀咕经理没能来迎接我会多么懊恼。他两次提到准备“周四之夜”让经理倍感压力，使得他没法儿抽更多时间处理酒店事宜。我只是点头，无力多问“周四之夜”究竟是什么。

“哦，布罗茨基先生今天表现得相当不错。”接待员来了精神，说道。“真的很好，今早他和交响乐队排练了整整四个小时，一刻都没停过。听！他现在自个儿还在用功练呢。”

他指了指大厅的后面，这时，我才听到一阵钢琴演奏声在整幢楼里回荡，刚好盖过外面嘈杂的车流声。我仰起头仔细听，有人在反复弹奏一小段乐句——那是穆勒里《垂直》第二乐章里的片段——悠缓而专注。

“当然，若经理在，”他说，“很可能就会带布罗茨基先生出来见您，但我不确定……”他笑了笑，“我不知道该不该打断他，毕竟

他正全神贯注……”

“当然，当然，还是另找时间吧。”

“如果经理在就好了……”他声音渐渐低下去，又笑了笑，然后身体前倾，压低声音说：“您知道吗，先生？我们每到布罗茨基要求钢琴独奏的时候就像这样关闭休息室，而有些客人竟敢投诉！某些人的想法还真是匪夷所思！昨天还有两个人分别向经理投诉呢。不用说，很快就有人叫他们识相点。”

“我想他们会有的。你说的那个布罗茨基，”我想着这个名字，脑中却一片空白。我瞥见接待员诧异地盯着我，就很快说道：“嗯，嗯，我非常期待不日能与布罗茨基先生见面。”

“若经理在就好了，先生。”

“请别担心。如果没别的事，我会非常感谢……”

“当然，先生。长途跋涉，您一定累了。这是房门钥匙。那边的古斯塔夫会带您到房间去。”

我扭头一瞧，看到一位上了年纪的迎宾员在大厅一侧等候着。他站在敞开的电梯门口，专注地看着电梯里面。我走向他时，他吓了一跳，然后拎起我的行李，紧跟我进了电梯。

电梯起升，年迈的迎宾员仍旧提着两只行李箱，看得出，他因为用力脸涨得通红。两只行李箱非常重，我担心他会在我面前晕倒，便说道：

“您真该把行李放下。”

“感谢您的提醒，先生。”他说，声音出奇的平静，丝毫没有透出他的体力不支。“多年前，我刚开始干这行的时候，我会把行李放在地上，只是绝对必要的时候才拎起来。说白了，就是走路的时候。其实，在这里干的头十五年，我得说我就一直那样。如今，这座城市里的很多年轻迎宾员仍然这样做，但我却不了。再说，先生，我们很快就到了。”

我们沉默，电梯继续上行。突然，我问道：

“这么说，您在这酒店工作很长时间了。”

“已经二十七年了，先生。这二十七年中，我在这儿算是见得多了。当然啰，这酒店在我来之前早就有了。据说，十八世纪的时候，

腓特烈大帝曾在这里住了一夜。那时人们就说这是个久负盛名的酒店了。哦，对了，这些年来，这儿发生了许多历史性的事件。等您不太累的时候，先生，我很乐意为您介绍几件。”

“可是您还没跟我讲，”我说，“为什么您觉得把行李放在地上的行为不妥呢。”

“哦，是的，”迎宾员说，“这个说来就有趣了。您看，先生，您可以想见，像这种城镇有很多酒店，所以城里有很多人都曾干过迎宾员这活儿。这儿很多人似乎觉得只要穿上制服就行，就能胜任了。这种臆想在我们市镇尤其流行。姑且就叫地方传说吧。坦白说，从前我自己也曾盲目地相信这种说法。直到有一次——那是很多年前的事了——我和妻子一起休了几天假。我们去了瑞士，到了卢塞恩。如今，我妻子已经过世了，先生，但只要一想到她，我就会想到那次短暂的休假。那里临湖，景色优美。您肯定知道那儿。我们一吃完早饭就划船散心。哦，言归正传。在那次度假中，我发现那个地方的人们对迎宾员的看法和我们这儿完全不同。我怎么说呢，先生？他们非常尊重迎宾员。大酒店还为了争抢小有名气的顶尖迎宾员而大打出手呢。我得说，我真是大开眼界。但在我们这里，人们却对迎宾行业有根深蒂固的误解。实际上，有时候我真怀疑这种误解能不能消除呢。我不是说这里的人们对我们行李员都很粗鲁无礼。恰恰相反，这里的人对我都很礼貌，很体贴。但是，先生，这里的人都认为，只要你愿意，只要你想，谁都可以做这份工作。我猜是因为这儿的人多少都有拿着行李走来走去经历。有了这个经验，他们就觉得酒店迎宾员的工作不过就是类似这样的一种延伸而已。这些年，就在这部电梯里，不断有人对我说：‘哪天等我辞了现在的工作，也去当迎宾员。’哦，是的。呃，先生，有一天，就在我们从卢塞恩度假回来后不久，一位颇有名望的市议员也对我讲过类似的话。‘哪天我也想干干这个，’他指着行李对我说，‘这才是我想要的生活，两耳不闻窗外事。’我猜想他是善意的，想暗示多么羡慕我。先生，我那时还年轻，还没有手提行李的习惯，只是把行李放地上，就在这架电梯里，回想那时还真是像那位绅士所说的，无忧无虑啊。但是，跟您说吧，先生，那绅士的话对我真是当头棒喝。并不是说我很气他那么说，可是，他的话确实令我幡然醒悟，令我想起一直藏于心底、耿耿于怀的那个念头。我刚才讲过，先生，我那时刚刚从卢塞恩度假回来，那次度假确实对我启发不小。我自己就在想，嗨，本地的迎宾员们是不是该行动起来改变一下人们的错误观念了。您看，先生，我在卢塞恩看到了新事物，我觉得，唉，这里的人做得真的不够好。于是，我就拼

命想出一些身体力行的方法。当然，那时我就知道‘改变’是件多么艰难的事，而且，在许多年前我就意识到，从我这代才做出改变，恐怕已经太晚了。观念已经深入人心了啦。但是我想，唉，哪怕我只能尽绵薄之力做出小小改变也好，至少可以方便后来人嘛。于是，自那日市议员对我说了那番话之后，我就用自己的方法坚持了下去。而且，令我感到很自豪的是，本市有其他几个迎宾员也开始效仿我的做法了，倒不是说他们完全照搬了我的方法，但是他们自己的法子，呃，也还算可行吧。”

“我明白了。您其中一个办法就是一直提着行李不放下。”

“正是，先生。您已经非常明白我的意思了。当然，我必须承认，我刚开始实施这些新办法的时候年轻力壮，真没料想到年纪越大身体越差。很可笑，先生，但真的没料想到。其他的迎宾员也都这样说过。不管怎样，我们都决定履行我们的誓言。这么多年下来，我们已经结成了一个相当牢固的团体，一共12个人，这些年来一直坚持下来的，就我们这些人了。如果我现在反悔的话，先生，我会觉得辜负了他人。如果他们任何一人偏要走回头路，我同样会觉得失望。论其原因，毫无疑问，是多年的努力才有了小小的成绩。但路还很长，没错。我们时常交流——每周日下午，在老城区的匈牙利咖啡馆聚会，您可以来参加，您一定是最受欢迎的客人，先生——呃，我们经常讨论这些事情，大家一致认为，这城里的人对待我们的态度，无疑已经有了极大的改观。当然，年轻一辈自然都觉得本该如此，理所当然，但是我们这帮在匈牙利咖啡馆聚会的人，都觉得自己做出了成绩，即便不是很显著。非常欢迎您来加入我们，先生。希望我能荣幸地把您介绍给他们。现在已经不似以前那么正式了，我们都明白，在特殊情况下，允许介绍新人加入我们，这也有段日子了。每年这个时节，沐浴在午后的阳光下令人心旷神怡。我们坐在露天凉篷下，看着对面的老广场。非常美，先生。您肯定会喜欢的。呃，刚才我说到哪儿了？我们在咖啡馆一直讨论的都是这个问题，讨论我们这些年来所做的决定。您看，我们从没想过老了之后会怎么样，大概是因为我们过于专注于工作，考虑问题都是过一天是一天吧。也有可能我们低估了改变这些根深蒂固的看法需要花费的时间。您知道，先生，我现在这个年纪，要坚持下去是一年比一年难了。”

迎宾员停顿了一下，虽然身体负担很重，但他仍然陷入了沉思，然后继续说道：

“老实说，先生，只有这样才公平。那时年轻，起先给自己定下规矩，不管多大多沉，都要拎着一件行李。如果客人有第四件行李，才放地上。但是三件是一定能保证的。呃，但事实上，四年前我病了一段时间，发现体力不支了，我们就在匈牙利咖啡馆商量怎么解决。呃，最后呢，同事们一致认为我没必要对自己那么严格。他们说，毕竟呐，我们原意是要给顾客留下好印象，让他们了解我们工作真实的一面。两件行李也好，三件行李也罢，效果都是一样的。我应该把我的能力范围缩减到两件行李，这没什么大碍。我同意他们的说法，先生，但我知道实际情况并非如此。我知道那会给顾客留下不同的印象。必须得承认，哪怕在最不老练的人看来，拿着两件行李和拿着三件行李效果也是大大不同的。这我都知道。先生，不怕告诉您，要我接受这个事实真是痛苦啊。接着刚才的说，我意思就是，希望您能明白我为什么不下您的行李。您只有两件，至少未来几年，两件都是我力所能及的。”

“这样啊，真是值得称许，”我说。“您绝对给我留下了您所期望的印象。”

“我想让您了解，先生，我不是唯一一个非改变不可的人。我们总在匈牙利咖啡馆讨论这事。我们每个人都得做出某些改变，可我不想让您觉得，我们允许彼此改变的标准有所降低。一旦降低，我们这些年所付出的努力就全部付诸东流了。我们很快就会成为笑柄。路人看见我们每周日下午聚在咖啡馆就都会嘲笑我们。哦，不，先生，我们历来对自己要求非常严格，希尔德小姐肯定可以为我们作证，整个社区对我们的周日聚会都很尊重。先生，刚才我也说了，您来参加，肯定最受欢迎。不管是咖啡馆还是广场，周日下午都热闹非常。咖啡馆老板有时还会安排吉卜赛小提琴手在广场演奏。先生，老板本人最尊重我们啦。咖啡馆不大，但他总有办法保证我们一桌人舒舒服服地坐下。哪怕店里异常繁忙，老板也能确保我们不觉拥挤或被打扰。即使在最忙的下午，我们一桌人坐齐，同时伸直胳膊旋转，也不会相互碰到。您看店老板多么尊重我们，先生。我肯定希尔德小姐能证明我说的一切。”

“不好意思，”我说，“请问您一直说的那位希尔德小姐是谁？”

刚说到这儿，我发现迎宾员的视线正越过我肩膀，看向我身后。我转过身，吃惊地发现原来电梯里还有人。一位个头矮小、身着整洁

职业装的女子正站在我身后靠近角落的地方。知道我终于看到了她，她笑了笑，上前一步。

“很抱歉，”她说，“希望您别误会我在偷听，可你们说的话不停地钻进我耳朵里。我听到了古斯塔夫的话，但我必须指出，他这么说我们市镇上的人可一点都不公平。他说我们不尊重酒店的迎宾员，事实上，我们很尊重他们，尤其最尊重古斯塔夫。人人都爱他。您也看得出他说的话其实前后矛盾。如果我们不尊重他们，那他怎么解释他们在匈牙利咖啡馆受到的礼待？真的，古斯塔夫，你让瑞德先生误解我们可不好。”

她说这话的时候，语气明显和善温柔，但古斯塔夫看起来却很懊悔。他摆正了姿势，稍稍挪步远离我们，沉重的行李箱撞到他腿上，他窘迫地移开了自己的目光。

“看看，不好意思了。”这位年轻女子笑着说。“他可是最棒的，我们都爱他。他特别谦虚，所以不会告诉别人，市里的其他迎宾员都以他为榜样呢。其实，说他们敬畏他都不为过。有时候可以看到，他们周日下午围坐一桌，只要是古斯塔夫还没来，他们就不肯开口说话。您瞧，他们感觉如果不等他就开始商谈甚是无礼。经常看到他们，十个或者十一个人，静静地坐在那喝咖啡，等着他。最多小声耳语几句，就像在教堂那样。只有等古斯塔夫来了，他们才会放松，才会开始大声交谈。亲自前去匈牙利咖啡馆，但只是看看古斯塔夫到来的盛况也是非常值得的。我得说，他到来前后的情景对比，真的令人印象深刻。前一刻大家还满脸沉闷，无声地喝着咖啡，古斯塔夫一出现，马上就开始欢呼大笑。高兴地拳来拳往，互拍后背。有时甚至还跳舞，是的，站在桌子上！他们还会跳一种别具一格的‘迎宾员舞’，是不是，古斯塔夫？哦，真的，他们真的很开心。但只有古斯塔夫来了才会这样。当然，他本人可不会告诉您这些，他很谦虚。这里每个人都爱他。”

年轻女子说话的时候，古斯塔夫肯定已扭转身体背对我们，因为下一刻我再看他时，他正面对着电梯另一侧角落，背对着我们。沉重的行李让他不堪重负，双腿弯曲，双肩微颤。他埋首颈间，有意躲着站在后面的我们，但至于是因为羞怯还是因为体力不支就很难说了。

“很抱歉，瑞德先生，”年轻女子说。“还没自我介绍呢，我叫希尔德·斯达特曼。我负责您逗留期间的一切活动事宜，还要保证一切顺利，万无一失。很高兴您终于成行，如约莅临。我们之前都有点担心会事出有变。今早本来大家都在悉心等待，但很多人因为有重要

约会，不得不一个个都走了。所以才轮到我这个市艺术馆的低级职员来告诉您，您的到来令我们倍感荣幸。”

“我很乐意来，不过提起今早，您刚才说……”

“哦，别担心，瑞德先生，没人感到一丝不快，重要的是您来了。瑞德先生，我同意古斯塔夫说的一点，就是老城区。真的是很迷人，我一向建议游客们去那儿看看。环境优美，到处都是露天咖啡馆、工艺品商店和饭店。从这步行一小段就到，如果行程安排允许，您应该抽空去看看。”

“我非常想去看。正好，斯达特曼小姐，说到行程表……”我故意停顿了一下，期望这位年轻小姐惊呼一声，说她怎么就忘了呢，或者随手伸到她携带的公文包里，拿出一张纸或者一个文件夹。可是，虽然她的确很快插了嘴，但脱口而出的却是：

“行程确实是很紧，没错。但我衷心希望这样安排没有不妥之处。我们尽量严格围绕主要活动做出安排。无可避免的是，很多社团，本地媒体，几乎人人都联系我们做安排。这里您的琴迷可真多啊，瑞德先生。很多人都认为，您不仅是在世的国际最顶尖的钢琴家，而且是本世纪最伟大的钢琴家。我们最后成功缩减到了只安排主要活动，相信您应该不会对我们的安排有什么特别不满意的地方。”

此时，电梯门开了。年迈的迎宾员走出电梯，进了走廊。行李很重，他不得不拖着脚在地毯上走。我和斯达特曼小姐紧随其后，小心踱着步子，生怕超过他。

“我希望不会冒犯到谁。”我边走边说。“我意思是，按照行程表，有些人我可能没法见了。”

“哦，不，您不用担心。我们都了解您此行的目的，没人会想担上干扰您行程的罪责。事实上，瑞德先生，除了两个相当重要的社会活动，其他一切活动都或多或少与‘周四之夜’有关。当然，您事先已经熟悉过行程表了吧。”

她说最后这句话的语气让我很难如实相告。我只能说：“是的。”

“行程的确很满，我们的安排都以尽量满足您的要求为先。可以说是相当体贴用心的安排。”

迎宾员已经在我们前头站在了房门前。他终于放下行李箱，打开了门锁。我们刚走上前，古斯塔夫又重新拿起行李，步履蹒跚地走进房间，说道：“请跟我来，先生。”我正要进门，斯达特曼小姐轻轻拉住了我。

“我不会打扰您太久，”她说。“但是我目前想了解您对行程表是否有不满意的地方。”

门径自关上了。我们仍站在走廊里。

“呃，斯达特曼小姐，”我说，“总体来讲，我感觉……行程安排非常周到。”

“正是按照您的要求，我们才安排了您与市民互助组的会面。互助组成员都是来自各行各业的普通人，当前危机的困扰让他们走到了一起。您会得到他们对各种生活困境描述的第一手资料。”

“哦，好的。肯定会非常有用。”

“您一定也留意到，我们同样尊重您想见克里斯托弗先生本人的愿望。鉴于目前的情况，我们非常理解您要求这次会面的原因。您肯定想象得到，克里斯托弗先生也很高兴。他自然也有充分的理由想与您见面。我是说，他和他的朋友会尽全力解答您想了解的问题。自然，他们都是胡说八道，但是我肯定这对您了解我们这里的大致情况会很有帮助。瑞德先生，您看起来很累，我就不打扰您了。这是我的名片。有任何问题或要求，请尽管直接打电话给我。”

一番感谢之后，我看着她转身离开，消失在走廊尽头。我进了门，仍在消化这段谈话中涉及的信息，过了一会才注意到古斯塔夫正站在床头。

“哦，到了，先生。”

看惯了这幢楼里清一色的深色木质壁板，我很惊奇地发现：这个房间的装饰如此“微现代”。我对面的那面墙从天花板到地板几乎都是玻璃，阳光从垂直悬挂的百叶窗暖暖地照射进来。我的行李箱齐齐地放在壁橱边。

“现在，先生，请给我一点时间，”古斯塔夫说，“我带您参观一下房间各处。这样，能确保您的入住无比舒适。”

我跟着古斯塔夫在房间里转悠，看着他将开关电器一一指示给我。过了一会儿，他领我进了卫生间，继续讲解着。我很想打断他，

以前其他引领员介绍酒店房间的时候，我常做这事。但或许是他对自己工作勤奋的态度，或许是他为了让每天重复的工作更富个性所做的努力，使我被他感动了，便没有打断他。于是，他继续介绍着，挥手指着房间各处。我突然发觉，尽管他非常专业，尽管他真诚地希望我住得舒适，但一整天来困扰他的那件事还是不由自主地又浮现在了他脑中。也就是说，他又一次担心起了他的女儿和小外孙。

几个月前，得知如此安排，古斯塔夫认为这不过是件简单快乐的任务，不会带来什么困扰。每周抽出一个下午，和小外孙一起在老城区散步一两个小时，这样女儿索菲就可以出去享受美好的私人时光。而且，这安排相当成功。几周来，外公和外孙已经摸索出一条两人都惬意无比的路线。晴朗午后，他们就从秋千公园开始走，鲍里斯在那儿可以展示他新学的锻炼胆量的技艺。雨日午后，他们就从船舶博物馆开始走。一路漫步，走过老城区的条条小路，逛逛礼品店，或许到老广场停停，看看哑剧表演或者杂技表演。这位年迈的迎宾员在本区很有名，走不了多远就会有人打招呼，古斯塔夫能听到无数对外孙的赞美之辞。然后，他们走上老桥，看看船只从桥下驶过。最后，他们前往最中意的咖啡馆，点个蛋糕或冰淇淋，等着索菲回来。

起初，这小小的户外游给古斯塔夫带来了极大的满足感。但越是频繁地与女儿和外孙接触，他就越发注意到过去不曾留心的问题，再也不能装作一切安好了。首先是女儿索菲的整体情绪问题。早几个星期，她会高高兴兴地跟他们道别，然后匆忙赶往市中心购物或者约见朋友。但最近她老是无精打采，好像无所事事。更有甚者，先不论索菲遇到的是何等麻烦，这些麻烦已明显开始影响到了鲍里斯。诚然，外孙大多时候仍兴致勃勃，自娱自乐。可是，古斯塔夫留意到，时不时地，尤其是提到其家庭生活时，小孩子的脸上会掠过一丝愁云。而两周前发生的事在年迈的迎宾员脑袋里着实挥之不去。

他和鲍里斯路过老城区众多咖啡馆中的一间，突然看到女儿坐在里面。门口的凉篷遮挡了玻璃的反光，从外面可以清楚地一直看到室内后排座位，看到索菲孤单地坐在那儿，身前的桌上摆着杯咖啡，一脸沮丧。她无意离开老城区，更遑论她脸上落寞的表情，这个事实让古斯塔夫着实吃惊——老半天，他才反应过来想要引开鲍里斯的注意力。可是太晚了：鲍里斯顺着他的目光真真切切地瞧见了她母亲。孩子立即挪开眼，两人继续散步，谁也没提起这事。没多久，鲍里斯就恢复了兴致。但这一幕还是令迎宾员大为困扰，此后他多次在脑中盘算。其实，正是回忆起这件事才让古斯塔夫刚才在大厅里现出一副专

注的神情。而此刻，他领我参观房间，这事儿又再次勾起了他的惶惑。

我很是喜欢这老人，又有些同情他。显然，他忧虑这件事已经有一段时日了，现在这忧虑又有失控的危险。我想就此话题与他好好谈谈，但此时古斯塔夫已例行完公事，而且，自下飞机之后断断续续的疲惫感再次向我袭来。我决定，还是以后找机会和他谈吧，于是便给了他不少小费，让他离开了。

看到他将身后的门带上后，我和衣瘫倒在床上，直望着天花板发呆。起初，我脑袋里一直想着古斯塔夫和他遇到的各种烦恼。后来又想到和斯达特曼小姐的对话。很明显，这座城市对我的预期要求不仅仅限于一场演奏会。我试图回忆有关这次行程安排的细节，但什么也没想起来。我意识到自己没有和斯达特曼小姐坦白是多么愚蠢。假如我没收到过行程表的副本，那是她的责任，而不是我的过错，否则我的自辩就会显得非常不合情理。

我又想起了布罗茨基这名字，这次，我肯定自己听说过或者读到过这个名字，而且就在不久前。然后我又突然想起这次长途飞行。我坐在黑暗的客舱里，周围的乘客都已入睡，我借着昏暗的灯光浏览这次的行程表。旁边的男人曾一度醒过来，几分钟后说了句戏谑的话。事实上，我记得他曾倾身问了我一个测试题，好像是关于足球世界杯的。我不想中断研读我的行程表，就冷冷地打发了他。现在我清晰地记得当时的情景。没错，我能想起印有行程安排的厚厚灰色纸张的质地，头灯映射在纸上暗黄色的光斑，飞机引擎的嗡鸣声——但是无论我怎么努力，就是想不起纸上写了什么。

过了一会儿，我觉得疲劳吞噬了我，便决定与其无意义地再想下去，不如先小睡片刻。况且，经验告诉我，休息过后，一切都会清晰得多。然后，我就可去找斯达特曼小姐，向她解释中间的误会，再拿一张行程表，请她对行程安排做必要的解释。

刚要睡着，我突然想起了一件事情。我睁开眼睛，盯着天花板，细细地打量着，然后坐起身，环顾四周。熟悉感越来越强，我意识到，现在的这个房间正是当时家人和我借宿姨妈家时的卧室。姨妈家住在英格兰与威尔士边境，我们曾借住了两年。我再一次环顾房间，重新躺下，又一次盯着天花板。墙壁最近新刷过漆，空间扩大了，房檐移动过，灯具周围的装饰全部变了。但天花板还是当年那个我常在咯吱作响的小床上盯着看的天花板。

翻身侧躺，俯视着床边的地板。酒店在下床落脚的地方放了块深色地毯。我仍记得这个地方曾放了块破旧的绿色垫子。我曾一周数次在这垫子上玩行兵布阵的游戏，都是些塑料玩具士兵——一共有一百个呢——都保存在两个饼干桶里。我伸手摸了摸酒店铺的垫子，这当儿，我又忆起了某日下午的情景：当时，我正沉浸在塑料玩具士兵的世界中，激烈的争吵声突然从楼下传来。那愤怒的声音，即便是一个六七岁的小孩子，也知道这不是场普通的争吵。我安慰自己说这没什么，把脸埋在绿垫子上，继续玩打仗游戏。绿垫子靠中心的地方有块破损，时常引起我的怏怏不快。可是，那天下午，听到楼下愤怒的争吵声，我突然第一次想到：这块破损可以作为丛林障碍地形让士兵们越过。这一发现——一直威胁着要破坏我幻想世界的这块瑕疵，其实是可以融入其中的——令我兴奋不已，而这一“丛林障碍”则随之成为我之后所策划的众多战斗中的一大要素。

我继续盯着天花板回忆着。我当然非常清楚房间整个动过或者说翻新过，尽管如此，久别之后，重返儿时的记忆圣堂，还是给我一种深邃的宁静感。我闭上眼，不一会仿佛又置身于那些旧家具中。右手边远远的角落里，是那个门把手已坏掉的高高的白色壁橱。我姨妈画的那幅索尔兹伯里教堂挂在我床头墙上。床边橱柜的两个小抽屉里塞满我的宝贝和小秘密。一天下来的全部紧张——长途飞行的疲惫，行程安排的困惑，古斯塔夫的问题——仿佛都抛在了脑后。我感觉筋疲力尽，渐渐沉沉地睡着了。

第二章

我被床边的电话铃吵醒，感觉响了很久。我拿起听筒，对方说道：

“喂？瑞德先生吗？”

“是的，您好。”

“您好，瑞德先生。我是霍夫曼。酒店经理。”

“哦，您好。”

“瑞德先生，很高兴您终于到了。非常欢迎您的到来。”

“谢谢。”

“真的欢迎您，先生。飞机晚点的事请别介意。斯达特曼小姐应该都告诉您了吧，我们现场的所有人都完全理解。毕竟，您要赶赴世界各地的预约，还要跋山涉水地飞到这儿，哈哈，这种事情很难避免。”

“但是……”

“真的没关系，先生。您不需要做任何解释。我刚也说了，所有人都很理解。这事就算过去了，重要的是您来了。单单这一点，瑞德先生，我们就无比感激。”

“哦，谢谢，霍夫曼先生。”

“呃，先生，您现在要是不忙的话，我很想跟您见个面，当面表达我的敬意，对您到本市下榻我们的酒店表示个人感谢。”

“您真是太客气了，”我说，“但我刚刚小憩了一下……”

“小憩？”声音里瞬间闪过一丝恼怒，但马上恢复了和蔼亲切，听不出丝毫差别。“是吗，当然，当然，您一定很累了，路途遥远。那这样吧，不管什么时候，我随时恭候。”

“我非常期待与您见面，霍夫曼先生。我马上就下来。”

“一定等您方便了再下来。我呢，我就一直在这儿等着，就在楼下大厅里，不管多久。请您一定不要着急。”

我思量了一阵，然后说道：“但是，霍夫曼先生，您一定还有许多其他的事情要忙乎吧。”

“没错，这会儿是一天里最忙的时候，但为了您，瑞德先生，要我等多久都行，毫无怨言。”

“霍夫曼先生，请别因为我浪费您宝贵的时间。我马上下来找您。”

“瑞德先生，一点都不麻烦。其实，能在这儿等您，我很荣幸。按我说的，一定慢慢来。我保证，我会一直在这儿等您来。”

我再次谢了他，放下电话，起身环顾一周，看看光景，猜测大概快傍晚了。先前的疲惫感有增无减，但好像没得选，只有下楼去大厅。我起身，走到行李箱边拿出一件不太皱的外套，至少比我身上这件平整。换衣服的时候，我突然特别想喝咖啡。穿好衣服后，我疾步离开房间。

从电梯出来，我发现大厅里比先前热闹了许多。四周的客人们或懒懒地倚坐在椅子上，或翻着报纸，或点杯咖啡闲聊。接待柜台边，几位日本客人正愉快地相互寒暄。我对这种变化感到些许困惑，并没有注意到酒店经理已经走了过来。

他大概五十多岁，形象比我从电话里听声音想象的要高大威猛许多。他伸出手，笑容可掬，这时我发现他上气不接下气，额头微微冒汗。

我们握了握手，他不停地重复我的到来多么令这个城镇生辉，尤其是下榻他们酒店。然后他倚近我，推心置腹地说：“我向您保证，先生，‘周四之夜’所有安排都已就绪，真没什么好担心的。”

我等他接着说，但他只是笑了笑。于是我说：“嗯，那很好。”

“不，先生，真的没什么好担心的。”

一阵尴尬无语。过了一会儿，霍夫曼好像想要说些别的什么，却又突然打住，大笑一声，轻轻拍了拍我的肩膀——这一举动让我感觉过于冒失。终于，他说道：“瑞德先生，为了您此行舒适愉快，有什么需要我效劳的地方，请您即刻告诉我。”

“您太客气了。”

又是一阵无语。之后他又大笑一声，轻轻摇头，再一次拍了拍我肩膀。

“霍夫曼先生，”我说，“您是不是有什么特别的事要对我说？”

“哦，没什么特别的，瑞德先生。我只是想跟您打个招呼，看您对一切安排是否满意。”然后他忽然一声感叹。“当然，既然您提起，是的，我是有事要对您说，不过只是件小事。”然后，他又摇了摇头，大笑起来。接着他说：“这跟我妻子制作的剪报册有关。”

“您妻子的剪报册？”

“瑞德先生，我妻子是个非常有文化的女性。她自然也是您的琴迷。其实，她一直饶有兴致地追随您的钢琴生涯，这些年四处收集您的剪报。”

“真的吗？她可真是太好了。”

“实际上，她编了两本剪报册，全都是关于您的。条目都按照时间顺序编排，而且可以追溯到很多年前。言归正传，我妻子非常期望有一天您能亲自翻读这些剪报册。您到来的消息无疑重新燃起了她的期望。然而，她知道您此行必定无暇，所以坚持不应因为她而打搅到您。但我看得出她在偷偷地期盼着，所以答应她至少跟您提及此事。您如果能抽出即便一分钟瞧瞧这两本册子，您都想象不到这对她有多么重要。”

“请您一定转达我对您妻子的感谢。霍夫曼先生，我非常乐意看看她的剪报册。”

“瑞德先生，您真是太好了！真是个大好人！事实上，我把剪报册带来酒店了，随时准备供您翻阅。但我能猜到您一定非常忙。”

“我行程的确很满。但是，我肯定能抽出时间看看您妻子的剪报册。”

“您真是太好了，瑞德先生！但我还是要说，我最不愿给你增添额外的负担。我提个建议吧，您什么时间有空翻看剪报册就告知我一下，我等着您。在此之前，我不会打扰您。不管什么时候，白天还是晚上，只要您觉得时间合适，请来找我。一般很容易就能找到我，我很晚才会离开酒店。我会立即停下手边的事情，去取剪报册。这样安

排我是再乐意不过了。真的，一想到给您的行程增添额外的负担，我简直受不了啊。”

“您真是太体贴了，霍夫曼先生。”

“瑞德先生，我刚想到，过几天我可能会异常忙碌，但我想跟您说，做这件事我永远不会没空，所以即便我看起来很忙，请您也一定不要推延。”

“好的，我会记着的。”

“或许我们该定个暗号什么的。我这样说是因为您来找我的时候，可能会看到我正在拥挤房间的另一头，您要穿过闹哄哄的人群过来恐怕很困难。而且，还有可能就是，等您到达第一眼看到我的地方时，我自己又走到别处去了。所以有个暗号就很明智。一个简单易辨、高过人群头顶就能看到的暗号。”

“确实，这个主意倒不错。”

“很好。瑞德先生，您这么友好和善真是让我很感激。我们这儿接待过不少名人，像您这么平易近人的可真没几个。那么，就只要定个暗号就行了。我先说一个……呃，比如像这样。”

他举起手，手掌向外，五指分开，比划了个像是擦玻璃的动作。

“就打个比方，”他说，把手快速放到背后。“当然，也许您更喜欢其他的暗号。”

“不，这个暗号就不错。等我准备好看您夫人的剪报册的时候，我会给您暗号的。她能费力做这些东西真是太客气了。”

“我知道做这个给了她极大的满足感。当然，如果日后您想出其他您中意的暗号，请用房间电话打给我，或者让其他员工转告我。”

“您真是太客气了，您提议的这个暗号非常巧妙。但现在，霍夫曼先生，请问您能否告诉我，哪里可以喝到香醇的咖啡？我感觉现在能喝下好几杯呢。”

经理夸张地大笑。“我非常了解这感觉。我带您去中庭。请跟我来。”

他带我走到大厅一角，穿过几道厚重的旋转门，走进一条昏暗的长廊，两边墙上都是深色木质壁板。走廊里自然光很少，甚至在白天这个时间，一排幽暗的壁灯还亮着。霍夫曼继续在我前头轻快地走

着，走几步就转头对我笑笑。大概走了一半，我们路过了一扇巨大的房门，霍夫曼一定是留意到我在看，就说：

“啊，是的。休息室一般都供应咖啡。那休息室非常棒，瑞德先生，非常舒适，最近又配上了手工打的桌子，是我最近一次到意大利佛罗伦萨旅行时发现并购置的。我相信您一定会赞不绝口。不过，您应该也知道，我们刚刚关闭了休息室给布罗茨基用。”

“哦，是的。我到之前他就已经在那儿了。”

“他现在还在，先生。我本应带您进去，相互介绍您二位，但是，呃，我觉得现在时机不太合适。布罗茨基先生可能……呃，这样说吧，现在还没到时候。哈哈！但别担心，您二位先生见面了解的机会多着呢。”

“布罗茨基先生现在在里面？”

我回头望了一眼门口，可能走得稍慢了些。不知怎地，经理抓着我的胳膊，坚持带我离开。

“他确实在，先生。没错，他此时静静地坐在那儿，但我肯定，他随时可能开始。今天早上，您知道，他跟乐团排练了整整四个小时。大家都说，一切都进行得非常顺利。所以，请别担心，没什么好担心的。”

终于到了走廊拐弯处，然后光线就亮了许多。其实，这部分建筑的一侧全是窗户，所以才有大片阳光倾洒满地。又沿着这边走了一会儿，霍夫曼才放开了我。我们放慢脚步，悠闲地走着，经理大笑了一声，以掩盖刚才的尴尬。

“中庭到了，先生。实际上这是个酒吧，但这里很舒服，您可以点咖啡或者其他想要的饮品。请这边走。”

我们从长廊拐出来，到了一个拱门下面。

“这座别馆，”霍夫曼边说着边领我进去，“是三年前竣工的，我们管它叫中庭，我们对这里相当自豪满意，它是由安东尼奥·查那多为我们设计的。”

我们走进了一间宽敞明亮的大厅，由于头顶上的玻璃天花板，感觉像进了庭院。地面用许多大块白色瓷砖铺成。中间最突出的是一座喷泉——几个纠缠在一起的仙女大理石雕喷出水来。让我吃惊的是，喷泉的水压极大，不透过空中弥漫的水雾，几乎就看不到中庭的

其他部分。即便如此，我还是很快就搞清楚了中庭的每个角都有个酒吧，周围是散开放置的高脚椅、安乐椅和桌子。身穿白色制服的服务生来来往往，不少客人散坐四周——虽说这里的空间感让人很难察觉到他们的存在。

我看到经理得意地看着我，等我赞美这里的环境。可是那会儿，对咖啡的渴望占据了上风，我转身走进最近的酒吧。

我刚坐上一只高脚椅，将胳膊放在吧台上，经理便赶了过来。他冲酒吧间招待打了个响指示意，其实即使不这样，酒吧间招待本来也是要过来招呼我的。他说道：“瑞德先生想点壶咖啡，肯尼亚！”然后转身对我说，“我本想在这儿陪您，没有比这更开心的了，瑞德先生。和您一起闲聊音乐艺术。不巧的是，很多事情必须等我处理，不能再拖了。我想，先生，您不介意我离开吧？”

虽然我坚持他用不着这么客气，他仍逗留了几分钟跟我道别。最后，他看了眼手表，惊呼一声，匆匆离去。

剩下我一人，很快便意识游离，陷入沉思，连酒吧间招待回来过我都没意识到。然而，他必定是回来过的，因为很快，我便喝上了咖啡，盯着吧台后的镜壁——我不仅看到了自己的影子，还看到了我身后房间的大部分。过了一会儿，不知什么原因，我发现自己脑海中在重放我早年看过的一场足球赛的几个关键时刻——当时是德国队与荷兰队对决。高脚椅上，我调整了坐姿——看到了自己使劲弓着身子——试着回忆当时荷兰队球员的名字。瑞普、库罗、哈恩、尼斯坚斯。几分钟之后，除了两人，其他所有人的名字都记起来了，但最后这两个名字就是想不起来，就差一点点。在我刻意回忆的时候，身后喷泉的潺潺之声——起初我觉得挺舒服悦人的——开始令我心烦意乱。好像只要那声音停下，我的记忆之锁就能解开，我就能最终想起他们的名字。

我仍在努力回忆，这时身后一个声音响起：

“打扰了，是瑞德先生，对吗？”

我转过身，看到一个稚气未脱的年轻人，大概二十来岁。我打了声招呼，他急切地走到了吧台。

“希望没有打扰到您，”他说，“但我刚才看到您，就只想过来跟您说，在这看到您让我倍感激动。您看，我也是个钢琴演奏者。我

的意思是，就仅仅是业余水平而已。还有，呃，我一直以来都特别仰慕您。父亲告诉我您要来的时候，我真是兴奋极了。”

“父亲？”

“抱歉。我叫斯蒂芬·霍夫曼。经理的儿子。”

“哦，这样啊，我知道了。你好。”

“您不介意我坐几分钟吧？”年轻人坐上了我旁边的高脚椅。

“您知道，先生，父亲就算没有比我更兴奋，至少也跟我一样。我知道父亲一定不会告诉您他有多兴奋。但请相信我，这对他的意义非同一般。”

“真的吗？”

“是的，真的，我一点没有夸张。我记得那时父亲还在等待您的回复，一提到您的名字，父亲就会异常宁静一阵。后来，压力真的太大时，他就开始成天低声咕哝：‘还要等多久？还得多久他才回复？他要回绝我们了。我能感觉到。’然后我就得想办法让他开心起来。不管怎么说，先生，您应该能想象到您的到来对他意味着什么。他就是个完美主义者！他组织安排‘周四之夜’这样的活动，一切，一切的一切，必须万无一失。他在脑袋里思考过每个细节，一遍又一遍地想。他这股一根筋的专注劲儿，有时候会有点太过了。但我又想，要是没这股劲儿的话，那就不是父亲了，他也不会有今天一半的成就了。”

“没错。他看起来像是个令人钦佩的人。”

“说实话，瑞德先生，”年轻人说，“我确实有些事情想跟您讲，实际上是个请求。如果没可能的话，请您直接告诉我，我不会生气的。”

斯蒂芬·霍夫曼停顿了一下，好像在给自己鼓劲儿。我又喝了点咖啡，看着我们两个并肩而坐的身影。

“其实，也是关于‘周四之夜’的事，”他接着说，“您看，父亲要我在这次活动上演奏钢琴。我一直在练习，已经做好准备，倒不是说我担心这个或别的什么……”说到这儿，他那自信的语气霎时顿了一下，我瞧见了一位心神不安的少年。但是他立即恢复了自信，若无其事地耸了耸肩。“只是‘周四之夜’太重要了，我不想让他失望。开门见山地说吧，我在想，您能否抽出几分钟时间听听我弹整首

曲子。我决定弹奏让·路易斯·拉罗什的《大丽花》。我只是业余水平，您一定得多多包涵。但我想弹一遍，请您给我些建议，润色改进一下。”

我想了一会儿。“这么说，”我停了一会儿说，“你准备在‘周四之夜’演出。”

“当然了，跟那晚其他活动相比，呃，”他笑了笑。“这只是个很小的部分。尽管如此，我仍希望我弹奏的部分尽可能完美。”

“好的。我很理解。呃，我非常乐意帮忙。”

年轻人的脸顿时亮了起来。“瑞德先生，我真不知道该说什么了！这正是我需要的……”

“但现在确有一个问题。你应该能猜到，我在这儿的时间非常有限，我必须找时间看看能不能抽出几分钟。”

“当然，您方便的时候，随时都行，瑞德先生。天哪，我太受宠若惊了。老实讲，我原以为您会断然拒绝我呢。”

传呼机的声音在年轻人身上的衣服里响起，斯蒂芬愣了一下，把手伸进夹克口袋。

“很抱歉，”他说，“这是个急呼。我本应老早就到一个地方的，但是我看见您坐在这儿，就忍不住走过来。希望不久之后能继续我们的谈话。但现在，不好意思我得失陪一下。”

他下了高脚椅，然后有一秒钟，像是要重开话题。然后传呼机又响了，他尴尬地微笑了一下，匆匆离开。

我转过身，继续看着吧台后自己的倒影，又开始轻呷了一口咖啡。然而，我已无法重新捕捉那位年轻人来之前的轻松享受的思绪。恰恰相反，想起这里的人对我的满心期待，而目前的情况却远非令人满意，困扰的感觉就再次袭上心头。实际上，除了找到斯达特曼小姐，彻底澄清某些疑点，好像再没其他方法，我决定喝完这杯咖啡就去找她。见面也没必要觉得尴尬，只要解释清楚上次的事情就好了。

“斯达特曼小姐，”我或许会说，“我之前很累，所以您问我关于行程安排的时候，我有点误会了。我以为您在问我，假如您当场提供给我一份行程表复印件，我是否有时间马上看看。”或者我可以冒犯一点，甚至以责备的口吻说：“斯达特曼小姐，我得说我有担心，是

的，甚至有些失望。考虑到您和您的市民朋友想要施加在我肩上的责任，我认为我有权利要求一定标准的后勤支持。”

我听到身边有动静，抬头看到了古斯塔夫，那个年长的迎宾员站在我的高脚椅旁边。我转身朝向他，他微微一笑，说道：

“您好，先生。正好在这儿碰见您。我真心希望您此行愉快。”

“哦，我挺愉快的。不过遗憾的是，我还没机会参观您推荐的老城区。”

“那真可惜，先生。那是我们市里非常美的一个地方，而且很近。现在的天儿也不错。空气中有些许凉意，但阳光明媚。温度刚好适合户外活动，不过我得说您得穿个夹克或薄外套。这种天气最适合逛逛老城区。”

“您知道，”我说，“我也许正需要点新鲜空气呢。”

“我真的推荐您去，先生。要是到您离开之时，还没哪怕粗略地逛一逛老城区，那就太可惜了。”

“好的，我想我会的。我现在就去。”

“您要是有时间到老广场的匈牙利咖啡馆坐坐，我保证您肯定不会后悔。我建议您点壶咖啡，点个苹果馅酥饼。顺便问您一句，我刚刚在想……”迎宾员停顿了一下，然后继续道，“我刚刚在想您能否帮我个小忙。我一般不向客人要求帮忙，但是您的话，我觉得我们已经非常熟了。”

“如果可能的话，我非常乐意帮您的忙。”我说。

过了一阵，老迎宾员仍然静静地站在那儿。

“是件小事情，”他终于说道，“您看，我知道我女儿这会儿在匈牙利咖啡馆。她会带小鲍里斯一起去。她是个非常友善的女人，先生。你们俩肯定合得来，很多人都跟她合得来。她算不上漂亮，但外表却很吸引人。她心地非常善良。但我觉得她一直以来都有一个小弱点。或许她从小接受的教育即是如此，谁知道呢？她可一直是这样的。也就是说，她有时候会因有些事而不知所措，即便这些事情都在她能力范围内。小问题出现了，她不会采取一些必要而简单的方法加以解决，而是自己憋在心里考虑。这样的话，您知道的，先生，小问题就会酿成大问题。用不了多久，她就会心思重重，陷入绝望。真的没必要这样。我不知道眼下到底是什么事情在困扰她，但我肯定，并

不是什么跨不过的坎。我之前很多次都看到她这样。但现在，您看，鲍里斯已经开始注意到她的情绪了。事实上，先生，索菲如果不能很快把持事态，恐怕孩子会非常焦虑的。他现在还很开心，心胸开阔，信心满满。我知道他不可能一生都保持这样，而且这样甚至都不一定对他好，但现在这个年纪，我想他应该再多过几年相信世界充满阳光和欢笑的日子。”他又沉默了，好像陷入了一阵沉思，然后抬头接着说：“只要索菲能看清楚发生了什么，我相信她是能掌控局势的。她有一颗非常负责任的心，非常渴望为她最关心的人付出最大的努力。可是，索菲呢，呃，一旦她陷入这样的状态，她的确需要一些帮助以恢复她的洞察力。倾诉交谈，这是她真正需要的。需要有人坐下来和她聊上一会儿，让她看清楚事情，帮她找出真正的问题，告诉她应该采取什么方法克服。这就是她所需要的，先生，好好谈谈，让她的洞察力恢复起来。剩下的她自己就能解决。只要她想，她就可以非常理智。这就要说到我的重点了，先生。您要是正巧现在去老城区，不知您是否介意和索菲谈几句。当然，我知道这可能给您带来不便，但既然您反正都要去，我想我还是得来问问您。您不用和她谈很久，短短地聊几句就行，找出什么问题在困扰她，帮她恢复理性。”

老迎宾员停下来，哀求地看着我。过了一会儿，我叹了口气，说：

“我挺想帮您的，真的挺想。但是听您所说，我觉得索菲的担忧，不管是什么，很可能事关家庭问题。你知道，这种问题好像都纠结很深。像我这种外人，可能经过一番恳谈，追根究底挖掘一个问题的原委之后，发现又牵扯到另一个问题上去，然后又一个问题，循环不断。坦白讲，我的意见是，要谈清楚整个家庭复杂纠缠的各种问题，我认为您才是最适合的人选。毕竟，您是索菲的父亲，孩子的外祖父，您有我不具备的与生俱来的权威。”

老迎宾员好似立刻感受到了我这话的分量，我差点后悔说了这些话。显然我说到了他的痛处。他稍稍转身，目光空洞，越过中庭久久地看向喷泉。最后说：

“很感激您告诉我，先生。从权利上讲，是的，确实应该我去跟她谈，我知道。但是，老实说——我真不知道该怎么跟您讲——跟您说实话吧，真实的情况是，我和索菲已经好几年未曾讲话了。从她还是孩子起，就不怎么讲了。所以您能理解，对我来说，完成所讲的这件事有点困难。”

老迎宾员低下头看自己的脚，等着我的回应，好似在等宣判一样。

“很抱歉，”我随后说，“我不太明白您的意思。您是说这段时间您一直没见过您女儿？”

“不，不。您知道，每次去带鲍里斯的时候，我经常看到她。我的意思是，我们不说话。我给您举个例子，也许您就能理解了。比如我和鲍里斯在老城区散完步之后等她，比如说我们坐在克兰科尔先生的咖啡店里。鲍里斯兴致昂扬，大声说话，什么事情都笑呵呵的。但一看到母亲进门，他马上就安静了。这倒不是说他看到母亲有什么不开心的，他只是会控制自己。他尊重这规矩，您明白吗？然后索菲会走到我们桌边直接问他：我们过得愉快吗？我们去了哪儿？外祖父会不会太冷？哦，是的，她总是询问我的健康状况，担心我在这地方四处闲逛会生病。但就像我说的，我们，我和索菲，不直接说话。‘和外公说再见。’她在道别时会这样对鲍里斯说，然后他们就径直离开了。这就是我们之间多年以来相处的方式，似乎暂时真的无须改变呢。可是，您看，遇到这种情况，我就发觉自己有些迷茫了，我确实认为有必要好好谈谈，觉得像您这样的人是理想的人选。就几句，先生，就帮她确定问题到底在哪里就行。如果您能这样做，接下来就全靠她自己了，我向您保证。”

“好吧，”我考虑了一下说。“好吧，我看看我能做些什么。但我必须强调我之前讲过的话。这些事情对外人来说往往是很复杂的。但我会看看我能做些什么。”

“我欠您个人情，先生。她这个时候会在匈牙利咖啡馆。您很容易就能认出她。她长着一头长长的黑发，模样挺像我的。您要是拿不准，尽管问老板，或叫店员指给您。”

“好吧，我现在就去。”

“真是太感谢您了，先生。即便出于某些原因您没法跟她谈，我知道在那地方散散步您也会很开心的。”

我弯腰下了高脚椅。“那么，好吧，”我说，“我会告知您进展如何的。”

“非常感谢您，先生。”

第三章

从酒店走到老城区——大概十五分钟的路程——简直无聊至极。此时正值傍晚，街道嘈杂，交通繁忙，一路上玻璃办公大楼笼罩头顶。但走到河边，开始穿过通向老城区的拱桥时，我就感觉到将要进入一个迥然不同的世界。河对岸彩色的凉篷和咖啡馆的太阳伞清晰可见，我瞧见来回穿梭的服务员，还有绕着圈跑动的孩童。一只小狗大概是发现了我的到来，在码头边兴奋地吠着。

几分钟后，我走进了老城区。窄窄的鹅卵石街道上到处是人，都在闲庭信步。我漫无目的地走了一会儿，经过了多家纪念品店、糖果店、面包店，还有几家咖啡店。我还在想，不知道老迎宾员说的那家咖啡馆是否难寻。但是一走到这区中心的一个大广场，匈牙利咖啡馆就近在眼前了。散乱摆放的桌子占领了广场远角的整块地方，桌子一路延伸，通向一个条纹凉篷下的小门。

我稍稍停顿，喘了口气，观察了一下周围环境。广场上空太阳西沉。正如古斯塔夫之前提醒过的，凉风阵阵，咖啡馆四周的太阳伞不时随风颤动。尽管如此，大部分的桌子后都有人在座。很多顾客看起来像是游客，但看得出来，还是有相当一部分像是本地人，早早下班后，到这儿喝杯咖啡，读会儿报纸偷闲。确实，我穿过广场的时候，走过了很多办公室职员身边，他们站在一起，都拎着公文包，相谈甚欢。

我走近散置的桌台，花了会儿工夫在中间逛了一圈，找着哪个可能是老迎宾员的女儿。两个学生在争论一部电影；一位游客正在读《新闻周刊》；一位老太太边撒着面包屑边喂着脚边围聚过来的鸽子。但我没看到有深色长发、带着个小男孩的年轻女人。我走进咖啡馆，发现这里又小又暗，只有五六张桌子。我明白了，老迎宾员提到的过度拥挤的问题，在天冷的时候倒是确有其事。但这会儿，只有一个头戴贝雷帽的老人，坐在靠近后排的位置。我决定放弃，回到外面，准备找个服务员点杯咖啡，这时，我忽然听到有人叫我的名字。

我转过身，看到一个女人和一个小男孩坐在附近的桌子边，正向我挥手。两人明显符合老迎宾员描述的特征，我不明白刚刚怎么就没

有注意到他们。而且更让我惊讶的是，他们竟然是在等我。迟疑了几秒钟后，我才向他们挥了挥手，朝他们走了过去。

虽说老迎宾员称她是“年轻女子”，然而索菲已近中年，估摸四十岁上下吧。尽管如此，不知怎么，她还是比我想象中迷人些。她个子高挑，身材苗条，长长的黑头发让她看起来有几分吉卜赛女郎的韵味。她身边的男孩个头小小，矮矮胖胖，这会儿正气呼呼地注视着母亲。

“怎么？”索菲抬头微笑着对我说，“您不打算坐下吗？”

“当然，当然。”我说，才意识到自己一直犹豫地站在那儿，“那个，如果你们不介意的话。”我冲男孩笑了笑，但是他回绝地瞪着我。

“我们当然不介意。是吗，鲍里斯？鲍里斯，跟瑞德先生问声好。”

“你好，鲍里斯。”我边坐下边说。

男孩继续不以为然地瞪着我，然后对妈妈说：“你干吗让他坐下？我正在跟你说事情呢。”

“这是瑞德先生，鲍里斯。”索菲说，“他是个特殊的朋友。只要他愿意，当然就可以和我们坐在一起。”

“但我正跟你解释旅行者号是怎么飞行的。我就知道你刚才没在听，你应该学学怎么集中注意力。”

“很抱歉，鲍里斯，”索菲说，她和我迅速交换了个笑容。“我刚刚非常努力地听，但科学这东西我理解不了。跟瑞德先生问个好吧？”

鲍里斯看了我一会儿，生气地说：“你好。”边说着，目光边从我身上移开。

“可别因为我闹得你们不愉快。”我说。“鲍里斯，继续你刚才说的吧。事实上，我本人非常有兴趣听听这架飞机的事儿。”

“不是飞机，”鲍里斯厌烦地说。“是穿越星系的载人飞船。你也不比我母亲懂多少。”

“哦？你怎么知道我不懂？我可能很有科学头脑呢。你不应该这么快对一个人下结论，鲍里斯。”

他重重地叹了口气，目光继续背着我。“你就像我母亲一样，”他说。“缺乏注意力。”

“喂，鲍里斯，”索菲说，“你应该随和一点。瑞德先生是个非常特殊的朋友。”

“不只那样，”我说，“我还是你外公的朋友呢。”

一听这话，鲍里斯才头一次兴致勃勃地看着我。

“哦，是的，”我说，“我们是好朋友，我和你外公。我住在他工作的酒店。”

鲍里斯继续仔细地看着我。

“鲍里斯，”索菲说，“为什么不友好地跟瑞德先生问好呢？你还没有对他表现你的礼貌呢。你不想让他走了之后觉得你是个没礼貌的年轻人吧，对吗？”

鲍里斯继续盯着我好一会儿。然后突然扑到桌子上，双臂抱着头。与此同时，双脚在桌子下来回摇晃，我能听到他的鞋撞击金属桌腿的声音。

“很抱歉，”索菲说，“他今天心情很不好。”

“实际上，”我悄悄地对她说，“我想和您谈点事。但是，呃……”我双眼示意了一下鲍里斯，索菲看了看我，扭头对小男孩说：“鲍里斯，我要和瑞德先生聊会儿。你去瞧瞧天鹅吧，就一会儿。”

鲍里斯继续埋着头，好像睡着了，但双脚还是有节奏地叩击着。索菲轻轻摇了摇他的肩膀。

“喂，别这样，”她说，“那边还有只黑天鹅呢。去站在扶手边上，就是那些修女站的地方。你肯定能看见的，过会儿你回来告诉我们你都看到了什么。”

有那么几秒钟，鲍里斯还是没反应。然后他起身，疲惫地叹息一声，滑下椅子。不知何故（也许只有他自己最清楚），他假装一副喝得烂醉的模样，摇摇晃晃地离开了。

等男孩儿走得足够远了，我扭头面对索菲。心中闪过一丝不确定感，不知如何开口，坐在那儿犹豫了一阵。然而，索菲笑了笑，先开口说道：

“好消息。迈尔先生之前打过电话，提到一幢房子。今天刚刚挂牌的，听起来真的非常不错。我一整天都在想这事，感觉可能就是这个了，一直以来我们找寻的。我告诉他明天一早就去那儿好好看看。真的，听上去好得不得了。离村子大概半小时的路程，独自坐落在山脊上，有三层。迈尔先生说从那儿看出去，整片森林的景色是他这些年看过最好的。我知道你现在很忙，假如真的像他说的那么好的话，我打电话给你，你或许能去看看。鲍里斯也去。这可能正是我们一直寻找的房子，我知道已经花了不少时间，但最后可能还是找到了。”

“哦，是的。好啊。”

“我会坐明早第一班车去。我们动作得快点，房子不会在市场上留很久的。”

她开始给我介绍更多房子的详细情况。我一直沉默无语，部分原因是我不知道该怎么回答她。然而，事实是，我们一直坐在一起，索菲的脸好像感觉越来越熟悉，直到这会儿，我才模糊地想起，早先什么时候讨论过在树林里买房子的事。这时，我的表情可能看起来越来越忧虑，最后她停下来，口气与先前不同，更犹疑地说道：

“上次电话，我很抱歉。希望你没在生气了。”

“生气？哦，没有。”

“我一直在想，我不该那样说。希望你别往心里去。毕竟，这时候怎么能期望你呆在家里？那算个什么家？厨房还那个样子！我找了这么长时间，为我们找个合适的地方。我现在对明天看的房子充满希望。”

她又开始说房子。这当儿，我试图回忆她刚才提到的关于电话里的对话。过了一会儿，我感觉好像有些隐隐的记忆重回脑海，仿佛听到了就在不远的过去，同样的声音——或者说是这个声音的生气强硬版——在电话的那头。最后我想起自己对着电话筒喊：“你生活的世界太狭窄！”她继续辩驳，我就一直轻蔑地重复：“狭窄的世界！你生活的世界太狭窄！”然而，令人沮丧的是，不管如何努力，就是想不起这句话以外的事。

可能是盯着她试图召回回忆之故，她非常局促不安地问我：

“你是不是觉得我胖了？”

“不，不。”我扭过头笑道。“你看上去好得很呐。”

我意识到还没提起她父亲交代的事，又试着找个合适的方法说及那个话题。这时，什么东西从背后敲了一下我的椅子，我意识到鲍里斯回来了。

其实，小男孩一直在不远处绕圈跑，像踢足球一样踢着一个废弃的纸盒。发现我正盯着他看，他便杂耍般把纸盒从一只脚传到另一只，然后从我椅子下面狠狠地踢过去。

“九号！”他喊着，高举双臂。“九号，超级好球。”

“鲍里斯，”我说。“你不能把那纸盒扔进垃圾桶吗？”

“我们什么时候走？”他扭头问我。“我们要迟到了。天很快就黑了。”

我看向他身后，发现太阳确实开始西下，没入广场上方。很多桌子已经空了。

“很抱歉，鲍里斯。你想干什么去？”

“快点！”小男孩用力拉了拉我的胳膊。“要不就到不了了！”

“鲍里斯想去哪儿？”我悄悄地问他母亲。

“当然是秋千公园了。”索菲叹了口气，起身。“他想给你看看他最近的进步。”

我好像没有选择，只能也起身，然后我们三个就动身穿过广场。

“那，”我对鲍里斯说，我们并排走着。“你是想给我展示点什么喽。”

“我们之前去的时候，”他说，一边拉着我的胳膊。“有个男孩，比我个头大，还不会玩鱼雷式单杠翻筋斗！妈妈说他至少比我大两岁。我示范了五次给他看，但他太害怕了。他只是不停地爬到高处，就是不敢做。”

“是吗？当然了，你不害怕做这个鱼雷式单杠翻筋斗。”

“我当然不怕！太简单了！非常简单！”

“很好。”

“他太害怕了！真好笑！”

我们离开广场，穿过本街区里的狭窄鹅卵石街道。鲍里斯好像非常熟悉路线，总是不耐烦地跑在我们前面几步，然后又停下来，跟我并肩走，问：

“你认识外公？”

“是的，我已经告诉你了。我们是好朋友。”

“外公很厉害，他是我们这儿最厉害的人之一。”

“是吗？”

“他是个好战士，曾经当过兵。现在虽然老了，但还是比大多数人都勇猛。有时候，街上的流氓不知道他的厉害，结果就得到了个狠狠的教训。”鲍里斯走着，突然做了个前刺的动作。“还没反应过来，外公就把他们打倒在地了。”

“真的吗？太有意思了，鲍里斯。”

我们继续走在鹅卵石小路上。就在那时候，我想起了和索菲争吵的更多内容。大概是一周之前吧，我在某个地方的酒店房间，听到电话那头她在大喊：

“他们还希望你这样继续多久？我们两个已经不再年轻了！你已经做了应该做的！现在应该让别人去做了！”

“听着，”我对她说，声音依然很冷静，“事实上，人们需要我。我一到某个地方，就会发现很多严重的问题，根深蒂固的、看似很难对付的问题。人们非常感激我的到来。”

“你要这样为人们继续做多久？想想我们，我，你，还有鲍里斯，时光如流水啊。不知不觉，鲍里斯就长大了。没人有权期望你继续这样。这些人，为什么他们不能自己解决自己的问题？这样也许对他们自己有好处！”

“你不懂！”我生气地打断她。“你都不知道自己再说些什么！我到过的这些地方，人们很无知。他们对现代音乐一问三不知。如果放任不管，很明显，他们的问题会越来越严重。你怎么就不明白？他们需要我！他们那里需要我！你都不知道自己再说什么！”这回是我对她大叫：“狭窄的世界！你生活的世界太狭窄！”

我们走到了一个栏杆围成的小游乐场。里面空无一人，我感觉这里的气氛有点忧伤。但鲍里斯兴奋地领着我们穿过小门。

“瞧，很简单！”他说，朝着攀爬架跑开去。

好一阵子，我和索菲站在愈渐昏暗的光线下，看着那小小的身影越爬越高。然后，她轻轻说：

“你知道，可笑的是，我在听迈尔先生讲那所房子的客厅的时候，脑海中一直浮现出小时候住过的公寓的画面。他说了多久，我就想了多久。我们以前的客厅。母亲，爸爸，他们那时候的样子。也许毫无相似之处，我倒也不是真的希望有。明天一看就知道完全不同了。但它让我充满希望，你知道的，就像一种预兆。”她小声笑了笑，然后碰了碰我的肩膀。“你看起来闷闷不乐。”

“是吗？很抱歉，可能是因为旅途劳顿吧。”

鲍里斯已经爬到了攀爬架的顶端，但是光线太暗，只能看到他映衬在空中的轮廓。他冲我们大喊，然后抓住最高的一根梯蹬，翻起了筋斗。

“能做那个，他很自豪，”索菲说。然后她大叫：“鲍里斯，天太黑了，快下来。”

“很简单。天黑更简单。”

“现在就下来。”

“都是旅行之故，”我说。“一间酒店又一间酒店，见不到认识的人，太累人了。甚至现在，就在这座城市，我也感到了很多压力。这儿的人们，他们显然对我的期望很高。我的意思是，很明显……”

“听着，”索菲轻轻打断我，一只手放在我的胳膊上。“我们何不暂时忘记一切？以后还有很多时间可以好好谈谈。我们都累了。跟我们一起回公寓吧。离这儿就几分钟的路，过了那个中世纪小教堂就是。我们可以吃顿丰盛的晚餐，也有机会歇歇脚。”

她温柔地说着，嘴巴靠近我的耳边，我甚至能感觉到她的呼吸。先前的疲惫感再次袭来，能在她暖和的房间里休息——或者跟鲍里斯一起躺在地毯上，索菲去帮我们准备晚餐——这主意忽然变得极其诱人，我甚至一度闭上了双眼，站在那儿微笑地做起梦来。然而，鲍里斯一回来，我的美梦就醒了。

“晚上做这个很简单。”他说。

鲍里斯看起来很冷，还有些发抖。之前的活力消失殆尽。我想可能是刚刚的表演耗费了他不少体力。

“我们现在都回公寓，”我说。“回去吃点好东西。”

“走吧，”索菲说着，开始动身。“时间不早了。”

天空开始下起了毛毛细雨，太阳已经完全落下，空气更清冷了。鲍里斯又牵起我的手，我们跟着索菲走出秋千公园，走进了一条人烟稀少的后街。

第四章

显然，我们已经离开了老城区。路两边高高垒起的砖墙一片污浊，没有窗户，看起来像是仓库的后面。我们沿街前行，索菲刻意保持一定速度，不一会儿，我看出鲍里斯行走吃力，很难跟上。可是当我问他：“我们是不是走得太快了？”他却怒气冲冲地看着我。

“我可以走得更快！”他大喊，拽着我的手，一路小跑。但速度不一会就又慢了下来，脸上一副受伤的表情。过了一会，我故意缓步前进，然而仍能听到他不停地喘着粗气。然后就开始自言自语。起初，我并没在意，以为他只是给自己鼓劲儿。后来就听到他小声嘟囔：

“九号……就是九号……”

我好奇地看了他一眼。他浑身湿漉漉的，而且全身发抖。我觉得应该继续和他说话。

“这个九号，”我说，“是足球运动员吗？”

“是世界上最棒的球员。”

“九号。是的，当然了。”

我们前头，索菲的身影在拐角处消失了，鲍里斯紧紧地抓着我的手。我这会儿才意识到让他母亲走得太快太远了，然而，尽管我们加快脚步，要走到拐角处却仍好像遥遥无期。好不容易到了转弯处，讨厌的是，索菲已经走得更远了。

我们走过更多污黑的砖墙，有些还有大块的霉斑。脚下的路面并不平坦，能看见前面的水坑在路灯下闪闪烁烁。

“别担心，”我对鲍里斯说，“我们已经快到了。”

鲍里斯继续自言自语，上气不接下气地重复着：“九号……九号……”

鲍里斯头一次提到“九号”时，我遥远的记忆之钟就敲响了。现在听到他小声嘀咕，我想起“九号”其实并不是真人球员，而是他桌面足球游戏的一个微型模型球员。这些球员由雪花膏石做成，重心位

于底部，轻弹指尖就可以控制他们带球、过球或者射门，而足球是个很小的塑料球。这游戏原本设计由两人各控制一个球队，但鲍里斯都是自己一个人玩。他能花上好几个小时沉浸在自己精心设计的比赛阵线当中，比赛里充满了激动人心的反击溃败和束手无策的卷土重来。他拥有整整六支球队，有迷你的球门和真正的球网，还有块绿色毛毡布，铺开来就是球场。生产商觉得假装那些是真实球队，比如阿贾克斯·阿姆斯特丹队或是AC米兰队会更好玩，对此，鲍里斯嗤之以鼻，所以他自己命名了这些球队。而每个球队队员——尽管私下里他非常清楚他们的优缺点——他从不起名，更愿意按照球衣的编号称呼他们。可能因为他还不清楚球衣号在球队的意义——或者可能是他想象力中又一任性的怪癖——球员号跟其在鲍里斯设计的球队阵形的场上位置毫无关系。因此，一队的十号可能是著名的中后卫，二号可能是前途无限的年轻边锋。

“九号”隶属鲍里斯最喜爱的球队，而且是目前为止最有天赋的球员。然而，尽管球技非凡，九号却是个极度情绪化的人物。他在球队的位置是中场，但他常常会长时间在赛场某处自怨自艾，显然忘记了自己球队正面临惨败的事实。有时候，九号这种没精打采的样子能持续一个多小时，球队因此落后四个、五个、六个球，解说员——确实有个解说员——就会困惑地说：“九号还没进入状态，我真不知道他怎么了。”而后，可能只剩下二十分钟的时候，九号终于发挥出了自己的真实水平，以高超的球技为自己队扳回一球。“这才像话嘛！”解说员惊呼，“他终于出手了！”此后，九号就一路高歌，不一会儿，进了一球又一球，对方只能倾尽全力不惜一切防守，谨防九号接到球。然而，不管他和球门之间有多少对手，他都有办法进球，赢是迟早的事。对结局如此笃定，他一拿到球，解说员就会大喊：

“进球！”一副顺应天命和无限崇拜的腔调，这并不是发生在球真真切切落入球网的那一刻，而是在九号掌握主动权的那一刻——尽管他还远远地驰骋在自己球队的那个半场。观众——确实有观众——也开始雀跃欢呼，他们一看到九号拿球，欢呼声就一波盖过一波，直到九号优雅地绕过对手，避开守门员射门进球，转身接受感激涕零的队员的奉承。

想起这些，一道模糊的记忆在脑中闪现，好像这个九号最近出了点问题，我打断鲍里斯的喃喃自语，问他：

“最近九号怎么样？状态还好吗？”

鲍里斯默不作声地走了几步，说：“我们忘记拿盒子了。”

“盒子？”

“九号底座坏了，分家了，还有几个也是。原本很容易就能修好。我把九号放在一个特别的盒子里，等母亲弄到合适的胶水，就把他修好。我把他放在盒子里，一个特别的盒子，这样我就不会忘记他在哪儿了。但我们还是把他给忘了。”

“我明白了。你是说，你们把他忘在你们原来住的地方了。”

“母亲打包的时候忘了带上他。但她说她很快就会回去拿。去旧公寓那里，他在那里。我能修好他，我们已经搞到合适的胶水了，我存了一点儿。”

“明白了。”

“母亲说没关系，她会处理好一切。保证新搬来的人不会无意中把他给扔了。她说我们会尽快回去拿。”

我清楚地感觉到鲍里斯在暗示什么。等他说完了，我说：

“鲍里斯，如果你愿意，我可以带你回去拿。是的，我们可以一起去拿回来，我们两个。回到旧公寓，拿回九号。我们很快就可以，我要是能抽出时间，要不就明天吧。还有呢，你说的，你已搞到了胶水。他很快就会恢复以往的雄风。别担心。我们很快就去拿。”

索菲的身影再次从我们视线中消失了，这次有些突然，我以为她定是走进大门了。鲍里斯拖着我的手，我们急急忙忙向她消失的地方赶去。

我们很快发现索菲实际上是拐进了一条小巷，入口处不比墙上的裂缝大多少。小巷陡然下坡，而且非常窄，双臂想不蹭到两边粗糙的墙壁都不可能。黑暗中只有两盏路灯，一盏在半中间，一盏在远远的尽头。

鲍里斯紧紧抓着我的手，我们开始下坡，他的呼吸很快又急促起来。一会儿，我发现索菲已经走到了小巷尽头。她好像终于明白我们的窘境，站在较矮的路灯下面，回头仰望着我们，脸上隐隐挂着关切的神情。我们最后赶上了她，我生气地说：

“瞧瞧，你看不见我们跟你跟得很吃力吗？都累了一天了，我和鲍里斯都是。”

索菲幽幽地一笑。然后，她圈上鲍里斯的肩膀，把小男孩拉近自己。“别担心，”她轻柔地对他说，“我知道这地方让人有点不舒

服，又冷，还下雨。但没关系，我们很快就到公寓了。会暖和起来的，都会好的，到时候，只要你想，只穿T恤都行。还有几张又新又大的扶手椅，你可以蜷在里面，就是那种，你这么大的孩子坐上去都会陷在里面的。而且，你可以看书，或看录像。你要是喜欢，我们还可以拿出柜子里的棋盘游戏玩；我可以为你把它们通通都拿出来，你和瑞德先生想玩哪个就可以玩哪个。你们可以把红靠垫放在地毯上，把游戏棋盘铺在地上。而我呢，就去准备晚餐，在角落的餐桌上摆好餐具。其实我在想，与其准备大餐，不如来点小食。小肉丸，小芝士馅饼，几块小蛋糕。别担心，我记得你爱吃的，我会都摆在桌上。然后我们可以坐下享用。之后，我们三个一起玩棋盘游戏。当然，你要是不想玩了，我们就不玩。也许你想跟瑞德先生聊聊足球。然后，等你真的疲累了，就可以上床睡觉了。我知道你的新房间很小，但你自己也说了，房间非常舒适。今晚保证你会一夜好觉，到时你就会把这段又冷又难受的路程忘个精光。说实在的，一踏进屋门，感受到美好温暖的气息，你就会把这一切全忘了。所以别泄气，就剩一点路了。”

她边抱着鲍里斯边说着。但这会儿，她又忽然放开他，转过身，继续赶路。这忽变令我感到无比诧异——我自己也被她刚才的话语一点点地蛊惑了，还一度闭上了双眼。鲍里斯看起来也一脸困惑，等我再牵起他的手时，他母亲已经再次先我们几步走了。

我有意不想让她再走得太远，但就在那时，我注意到身后走近的脚步声，不由地停留了片刻，回头凝望小巷。与此同时，那人走进了较矮的街灯所投下的光线中，我看清了此人，是个我认识的人。他叫杰弗里·桑德斯，是我在英格兰上学时的同学。离开学校后我就没再见过他，现在看到他这么苍老，我不禁为之一惊。就算考虑到灯光和冷雨的效果，他看起来还是极度穷困潦倒。他穿着件雨衣，不过好像系不上扣了，他边走边紧抓着前胸。我不确定想不想认他，随后，鲍里斯和我再次迈开步子时，杰弗里·桑德斯已经和我们并肩齐行了。

“你好，老朋友，”他说，“想着就是你。今晚天气太糟糕了。”

“是的，可糟透了，”我说，“之前还晴朗怡人呢。”

走出小巷，我们拐进了一条又黑又荒凉的小路。强风阵阵，城市好像离我们已经很远了。

“你的孩子？”杰弗里·桑德斯问，朝鲍里斯点点头。我还没回答，他就继续说：“乖孩子。你真行。看起来挺聪明的。我自己没结

婚。总以为会结的，但时光飞逝啊，现在看来应该是不可能了。老实说，这根本不算什么，但我不想说这些年的倒霉事来烦你。我也有些好事呢。不过，你真行。孩子不错。”

杰弗里·桑德斯身体前倾，向鲍里斯敬了个礼。鲍里斯呢，不知是太焦虑还是太专注，没有任何反应。

走着走着，开始下坡。我们在一片漆黑中走着，我想起杰弗里·桑德斯小时候在学校是个天之骄子，不管是学业上还是运动场上都是那么耀眼。人们总是以他为榜样，指责我们其余这些小孩不用功，大家一致认为他不久就会当选校队队长。但我记得，由于某些危机变故，他五年级的时候不得不突然辍学，队长也就没当成。

“我在报纸上看到你要来，”他对我说。“就一直期待听到你的消息。你知道的，期待你告诉我什么时候过来坐坐。我去蛋糕店买了糕点，等你来的时候好配着茶一起招待你。毕竟，因为一直单身，我家有点乱糟糟的，我仍希望有人偶尔能来看看我，而且我觉得自己也能招待好客人。所以听说你要来，我立刻冲出去买了些茶点。那是前天的事了。昨天，我觉得那东西还算拿得出手，但糖皮已经有点硬了。而今天呢，你也没来电话，我就全给扔了。因为自尊吧，我想。我是说，你那么成功，我不想让你离开时觉得我现在过得这么凄惨，住在一间出租房里，只能拿出点变味儿的糕点招待客人。于是，我又去了蛋糕店，买了新鲜糕点。我还整理了下房间。但你没来电话。呃，我想，这也不能怪你。”他又前倾身体，看着鲍里斯。“你还好吧？你听起来像快要背过气儿去了。”

鲍里斯好像什么也没听见，他这会儿确实又喘不上气来了。

“还是慢慢走，迁就迁就这个小慢人吧。”杰弗里·桑德斯说，“我只是一度情事不太顺罢了。只因为我一个人住在出租小屋里，这儿很多人就觉得我是同性恋。我起初很介意，但后来不了。好吧，他们误当我是同性恋，那又怎样？有时候，我找女人发泄欲望。你知道的，付钱的那种。对我来说足够了，我得说有几个人还挺不错的。尽管如此，过不了多久，你就会开始鄙视她们，她们也开始鄙视你。没办法啊。这儿的大部分妓女我都认识。我不是说我和她们都睡过。绝对不是！但她们知道我，我也知道她们。大部分都是点头之交。你可能认为我过得很惨。其实不是的，这只是一个你怎样看待事情的问题。朋友偶尔来看看我，招呼他们一杯茶，这个我很在行。我这方面做得相当不错，之后他们总说来拜访我多么愉快。”

下了一阵陡坡，我们现在走在平路上，走到了一处废弃的农家宅院。月光下，我们在四周的黑暗中隐约能看到仓房和外屋的影子。索菲继续在前面带路，她现在离我们有一段距离了，我每每刚能瞥见她的身影，她就消失在了某栋破败建筑物的边缘后面。

还好杰弗里·桑德斯好像路很熟，不假思索地在黑暗中引路。我紧紧地跟着他，儿时学校的记忆浮现在脑海中：英格兰干冷的冬日清晨，天空多云，地面凝霜。那时候我只有十四五岁，和杰弗里·桑德斯站在伍斯特郡乡下某地的酒吧外面，一起搭档为越野跑标记，我们的任务就是给那些冲出晨雾的参赛者指路，告诉他们穿越附近乡野的正确方向。我那天早上特别烦，和他一起在那儿站了大概十五分钟，静静地凝望着大雾，不管我如何努力控制，突然开始大哭起来。我那时还不很了解杰弗里·桑德斯，然而，像其他人一样，我非常想给他留个好印象。我羞愧难当，等我终于控制好了情绪，第一感觉就是他肯定极度轻鄙我的存在。但没过多久，杰弗里·桑德斯开始说话，起初没看着我，最后转向我。我现在想不起那个雾蒙蒙的早晨他都说了什么，但我清楚记得他的话对我的影响。一则，我虽正自顾自怜，但仍能感受到他对我格外的宽容，因而对他很是感激。也就是那个时候，我才第一次认识到，这个学校的天之骄子还有其另一面——极度脆弱的一面，也正是这一面决定了他没法儿完成大家的期望，这个认识还让我打了个冷战。我们继续在黑暗里走着，我再次尝试回忆他那天早晨说了些什么，但还是没想起来。

地面变得平坦起来，鲍里斯好像恢复了些气力，又开始喃喃自语。这会儿，可能感觉到快到目的地了，他精神大振，竟然有力气踢起路上的石子，边踢边大声喊：“九号！”石子蹦跳着，落进黑暗中某处水坑里。

“这样才对嘛，”杰弗里·桑德斯对鲍里斯说，“是你的位置吗？九号？”

鲍里斯还没回答，我很快接上：“哦，不，是他最喜欢的球员。”

“哦，是吗？我看过不少球赛。在电视里。”他前倾身体对着鲍里斯说，“九号是谁？”

“哦，就是他最喜欢的球员。”我又说。

“就目前的中锋来讲，”杰弗里·桑德斯继续道，“我比较喜欢那个荷兰人，效力米兰队的。他踢得不错。”

我打算继续解释九号，但那会儿，我们停了下来。我发现我们站在一片广阔草地的边缘。我没法确定这片草地到底有多广阔，但我猜它远远延伸过月光能照亮的地方。我们站在那儿，一阵疾风扫过草地，没入黑暗。

“我们好像迷路了。”我对杰弗里·桑德斯说，“你认识这儿的
路吗？”

“哦，是的，我住的离这儿不远。不巧的是，我现在不能邀请你去，我很累，想睡觉了。但明天我会准备好，欢迎你来。九点以后都行。”

我看向草地，只瞧见一望无际的黑暗。

“坦白讲，我们现在有点麻烦，”我说，“你看，我们之前一路跟着那个女人到她公寓去，但现在迷路了，我不知道她的地址。她说过住在中世纪小教堂附近。”

“中世纪小教堂？在市中心啊。”

“哈。我们穿过这儿能到吗？”我指着这片草地。

“哦，不行，那边什么都没有，什么都没。住在那边的人只有那个叫布罗茨基的家伙。”

“布罗茨基，”我说，“嗯，我今天在酒店听到他排练。这儿的人好像都知道这个布罗茨基。”

杰弗里·桑德斯瞥了我一眼，不禁令我怀疑我是不是说了什么愚蠢的话。

“他已经在这儿住了很多很多年了，我们认识他不是很正常吗？”

“是的，是的，当然。”

“很难相信那个疯老头竟然会指挥交响乐队。我准备等着瞧。再坏也坏不到哪儿去了吧。假如你非要说布罗茨基了不起，那么，我算哪根葱跟人家辩驳呢？”

这话我不知道该怎么接下去。这时，杰弗里·桑德斯突然从草地方向转过身来，说：

“不，不，市中心在那个方向。如果你们愿意的话，我可以给你们指指路。”

“太感谢你了。”我说。一阵寒风吹来。

“那么现在，”杰弗里·桑德斯沉思了一会儿，说道，“老实讲，你们最好搭巴士过去。从这儿走到那儿起码要半个小时左右。可能那个女人叫你相信她就住在附近，她们常这么干。这是她们的一个小伎俩，永远不要相信她们。不过，搭巴士的话就没问题了。我带你过去看看，哪里可以乘车。”

“太感谢你了。”我重复道，“鲍里斯很冷，希望公交站不远。”

“哦，很近。跟我来吧，老伙计。”

杰弗里·桑德斯转身，领着我们又朝着废弃农庄的方向走回去。可是，我感觉我们并没有沿着来时的路返回；果然，没过多久，我们走上一条狭窄的街道，周围看起来像是不太富足的郊区。一座座小排屋矗立在街道两旁。时不时可以看到窗户里亮光点点，但大多数住户好像都已经关灯睡觉了。

“没事的，”我悄悄对鲍里斯说，感到他几近精疲力竭。“我们很快就会回到公寓了。等我们到了，你母亲就什么都准备好了。”

我们走了一会儿，过了更多排房子。然后鲍里斯又开始低语：

“九号……是九号……”

“那个，你说的这个九号是哪个？”杰弗里·桑德斯转身对他说，“你是说那个荷兰人，对吗？”

“九号是目前史上最优秀的球员。”鲍里斯说。

“是的，但你说的是哪个九号？”杰弗里·桑德斯的声音开始显得有些不耐烦了。“他叫什么？哪个队的？”

“鲍里斯就是喜欢叫他……”

“有一次他在最后十分钟进了十七个球！”鲍里斯说。

“嗨，胡说。”杰弗里·桑德斯似乎真的发火了。“我还以为你是认真的呢，你在胡说八道。”

“他就是进了！”鲍里斯大喊。“是世界纪录！”

“就是嘛！”我也加入进来。“世界纪录！”然后，我恢复了点冷静，大笑一声。“也就是说，定会是世界纪录，是吧。”我恳切地

微笑着看着杰弗里·桑德斯，但他连看都没看我。

“但你们在说谁？是那个荷兰人吗？无论如何，年轻人，你得明白，进球得分不是一切。后卫也很重要。真正好的球员常常是后卫。”

“九号是目前史上最优秀的球员！”鲍里斯重复道，“他状态好的时候，没人能拦住他！”

“没错，”我说，“九号无疑是世上最棒的。中场，前锋，什么都行。他什么都行。真的。”

“你在胡说，老伙计。你们两个都不知道自己在说什么。”

“我们清楚得很。”这会儿，我对杰弗里·桑德斯已经有些气恼了。“实际上，我们在说的是世界公认的事情。九号状态好的时候，真好的时候，他一拿到球，评论员就会大喊‘进球’，不管他在球场的哪个位置……”

“哦，老天。”杰弗里·桑德斯厌恶地背过脸去。“这就是你给你的孩子灌输的垃圾，老天可怜可怜他吧。”

“听着……”我凑近他耳朵，愤怒地小声说道。“听着，难道你不明白……”

“垃圾，老伙计。你这是在给小孩子灌输垃圾……”

“他还小，还是个小孩子。你难道不明白……”

“小也不是你给他灌输这些垃圾的借口。而且他看起来可不像你说的那么小。依我看，他这个年纪的小男孩，是时候干点正经事了。开始要出点力了。比如说，他应该学习贴墙纸，或者贴瓷砖，而不是胡思乱想这些荒谬的足球运动员……”

“听着，你个笨蛋！小点声！小点声！”

“他这个年纪，正是出力的时候……”

“他是我的孩子，由我决定他什么时候……”

“贴墙纸，贴瓷砖，这样的活计。我认为，这样的事情才……”

“得了，你知道什么？你个可怜、孤独的单身汉，你懂什么呀？你知道什么？”

我粗暴地推搡他的肩膀。杰弗里·桑德斯突然间垂头丧气起来，拖着步子走在了我们前面，微微垂首，手仍然紧紧抓着身前的雨衣。

“没事的，”我轻轻对鲍里斯说。“我们马上就到了。”

鲍里斯没回答，我看到他盯着前面杰弗里·桑德斯恍惚的身影发呆。

我们继续走着，我对这个老同学的愤怒渐渐退去。况且，我没忘记还要指望他带我们到公交站呢。过了一会儿，我靠近他，想看他是否愿意跟我说话。令我吃惊的是，我听到杰弗里·桑德斯在轻轻地自言自语：

“没错，没错，等你来喝茶的时候我们再谈。谈谈所有事情，花上一两个小时怀念我们在学校的日子，还有那些老同学。我会打扫好房间，我们可以坐在扶手椅上，坐在壁炉两边。没错，的确很像英国人常租的那种房间。至少早几年前是这样。这就是我租下这里的原因，可以让我想起家乡。总之，我们可以坐在壁炉两边，好好聊聊。老师们，同学们，交流一下我们仍在联络的朋友的近况。啊，我们到了。”

我们走进了一个貌似小村广场的地方。有几间小小的商店——可能是这区居民购买杂货的地方——已入夜，全部关门上锁了。广场中心是一片绿地，不比交通转盘大多少。杰弗里·桑德斯指着商店前面一盏孤寂的路灯。

“你跟孩子在那里等就行了。我知道没有标记，但是别担心，这里是公认的公交站。现在，不好意思我得走了。”

我和鲍里斯瞪着对面他指的地方。雨已经停了，但是薄雾还在灯柱底座缭绕。我们周遭悄无声息。

“你确定公交车会来？”我问。

“哦，是的。晚上这个时候自然要多等一会儿，但最后肯定会来的。你们耐心点就行了。你们站那儿可能会有点冷，但相信我，值得的。黑夜中它的到来会点亮一切。等你一上车，就知道会很暖和舒适。车上总有一群最开心快活的乘客。他们打诨插科，分发热饮和点心。他们会非常欢迎你跟孩子。告诉司机你们在中世纪小教堂站下车。乘公交的话，路程很短。”

杰弗里·桑德斯向我们道了声晚安，转身离去。我和鲍里斯看着他消失在两幢房子中间的小巷中，然后朝着公交站的方向走去。

第五章

我们站在路灯下等了几分钟，周围寂静一片。后来我搂着鲍里斯说：“你一定很冷了吧。”

他紧紧地靠着我，什么也没说，我低头看他，发现他若有所思地盯着漆黑的街道。很远的地方，有只狗在叫，然后没声了。我们就一直那样站着，等了一会儿，我说：

“鲍里斯，很抱歉。我本该安排得好一些。很抱歉。”

小男孩沉默了一阵。然后说：“没事，公交车很快就来了。”

我能看到雨后薄雾仍萦绕在小广场对面那一小排商店门前。

“我不知道车会不会来，鲍里斯。”我终于说了出来。

“没事，你得耐心点。”

我们继续等了一会儿。我接着又说道：

“鲍里斯，我一点儿也不确定车会来。”

小男孩扭头看着我，疲惫地叹了口气。“别担心，”他说，“你没听到那个人说的吗？我们等着就行了。”

“鲍里斯。有时候事情不总是按照你想的那样。即便有人告诉你会那样。”

鲍里斯又叹了口气。“听着，那人说了，是不是？无论如何，母亲会等我们的。”

我正努力想着接下来该说什么，突然间的咳嗽声吓了我们一跳。我转过身，看到路灯光影外，有个人从一辆停着的车里探出身来。

“晚上好，瑞德先生。很抱歉，我路过正好看见您。一切还好吧？”

我上前几步走到车前，认出是斯蒂芬，酒店经理的儿子。

“哦，是的，”我说，“一切都好，谢谢。我们……呃，我们在等公交车。”

“我或许能载你们一程。我正要去个地方。父亲信任我，交代我一件相当棘手的任务。我说啊，外面很冷。要不你们上车来吧？”

年轻人下车，打开前后车门。我道过谢，安置鲍里斯坐上后座，自己坐在副驾驶座。然后，车开动了。

“这个是您的孩子吧，”斯蒂芬说着，车子疾驰在荒凉的街道上。“非常高兴见到他，不过他现在看起来有点累啊。哦，让他休息一下吧。下次再跟他握手。”

我向后瞥了一眼，看见鲍里斯头靠在扶手的垫子上，正打瞌睡。

“瑞德先生，”斯蒂芬继续说道，“我猜你们是想回酒店吧。”

“实际上，我和鲍里斯正要去某人的公寓。在市中心，中世纪小教堂附近。”

“中世纪小教堂？嗯。”

“有问题吗？”

“哦，没有。没问题。”斯蒂芬转了个急弯，驶进另一条狭小黑暗的街道。“只是，那个，我之前说过，我正要去个地方，赴约，让我想想……”

“约会很紧急吗？”

“是的，瑞德先生，相当紧急。是关于布罗茨基先生的，您知道吧。实际上，是很重要的一个会面。嗯，我在想，您和鲍里斯能否宽容一下，等我几分钟，等我处理好之后，就送你们到任何你们想去的地方。”

“你当然应该先处理好自己的事情。但是希望你不要太迟，我会非常感激的。你也看到了，鲍里斯还没吃晚饭呢。”

“我尽量快点，瑞德先生。我真希望能立刻送你们过去，但您看，我不敢迟到。我说过的，这个任务相当棘手……”

“当然，你应该先处理这个。我们非常乐意等你。”

“我尽量快点吧。但坦白说，我感觉自己也走不了多少捷径。其实，这种事本由父亲亲自处理的，或者其他什么先生来处理，只是柯林斯小姐总是对我温柔以待……”年轻人话音一顿，突然尴尬起来。接着他说道：“我会尽量快点。”

我们现在行驶在一个环境更宜人的街区，我猜这里离市中心该更近些。路灯光线亮了许多，我看到有轨电车轨道与我们并列伸延。偶尔看到有咖啡馆，餐馆都已关门打烊，但这区最多的还是富丽堂皇的公寓建筑。一扇扇窗户笼罩在沉沉的漆黑中，方圆数英里，似乎只有我们这辆车在打破这一片静谧。斯蒂芬·霍夫曼默默地开了一会儿。然后仿佛内心挣扎了很久似的突然说道：

“您瞧，这样说可能很无礼，但您确定您不想回宾馆吗？我是说，有很多记者在那儿等着您什么的。”

“记者？”我望着窗外的黑夜。“啊，是的。记者。”

“天哪，希望您别觉得我很放肆。只是我离开的时候恰巧看到他们。都坐在大厅，膝盖上放着文件夹、公文包，想到能见到您，看起来都很激动。不过我刚才也说了，这都不关我的事，您肯定都处理好了。”

“是啊，是啊。”我小声地说，继续看着窗外。

斯蒂芬沉默了。不用说，他决定不再继续这个让人倍感压力的话题，而我自己却在想记者的事。过了一会儿，我觉得自己好像想起了有这么个预约。无疑，年轻人提到的这一图景——人们坐着，膝上放着文件夹和公文包——提醒了我。然而，我最终还是无法明确忆起行程表上有这么一项，便决定忽略此事。

“啊，我们到了。”坐在旁边的斯蒂芬说，“不好意思我离开一会儿。请您自便，舒服就好。我会尽快回来。”

我们停在一幢伟岸的白色公寓楼前，楼有几层高，每层上的黑色锻铁管露台给其平添了几分西班牙风味。

斯蒂芬下了车，我看着他走向大门入口。他站在一排公寓门铃按钮前，按下一个，等着，从他的站姿看得出，他很紧张。过了一会儿，入口大厅亮起一道光线。

一个上了年纪、满头银发的老太太打开门，她看起来又瘦又弱，但举止间却有种优雅，她微笑着引斯蒂芬进门。他进门后，门关上了。我坐在座位上向后靠，发现仍能清楚地看见他们俩的身影映照在前门窄小的窗格玻璃上。斯蒂芬双脚蹭着门垫，说：

“很抱歉这次仓促来访。”

“我告诉过你多少次了，斯蒂芬，”老太太说道，“你什么时候需要聊聊，我都会在这儿的。”

“嗯，实际上，柯林斯小姐，并不是……呃，这次跟平时不一样。我想和您谈谈别的事情，一件很重要的事情。父亲本应自己前来，但是，呃，他太忙……”

“啊，”老太太微笑着打断，“是你父亲吩咐的事，苦差他还是留给你啊。”

她的言语间有些调侃，但斯蒂芬好像并没有留意。

“不是的，”他认真地反驳道，“相反，这项任务特别棘手难办。父亲信任我，我也乐意接受……”

“那么我现在成了任务！还是一个棘手难办的任务！”

“呃，不是的。我是说……”斯蒂芬困惑地住了口。

可能觉得已经调侃够了斯蒂芬，老太太说道：“好吧，”她说，“我们最好进去，喝杯雪利酒，好好谈谈这件事。”

“您太好了，柯林斯小姐。但其实，我不能呆太久。有人在车里等我。”他指了指我们的方向，但老太太已经打开了自己公寓的大门。

我看到她领着斯蒂芬穿过一间小小的整洁的前厅，走过第二道房门，沿着一条幽暗的过道走下去，过道两侧挂满了裱好的水彩画。过道尽头是柯林斯小姐的起居室——后面是一个巨大的L形附室。这儿的光线柔和舒适，第一眼看，似奢华精致，而且很复古。但仔细审视一番，我却发现很多家具都已经极度破旧，第一眼认为是古董的东西其实比垃圾没好多少。曾经奢华的沙发和椅子已年久失修，散落在房间各处，长及地面的天鹅绒窗帘斑斑点点，破破烂烂。斯蒂芬随意地坐下，说明他很熟悉周围的摆设，但看起来仍然很紧张，而柯林斯小姐正在茶水间忙活。过了一会，她递给他一杯饮料，就近坐在他旁边，这时候，年轻人突然大声说：“是关于布罗茨基先生的。”

“噢，”柯林斯小姐说，“和我猜的差不多。”

“柯林斯小姐，其实，我们想问问您能否考虑帮帮我们。或者说，帮帮他……”斯蒂芬突然大笑一声，看向一旁。

柯林斯小姐若有所思地斜了斜头。然后她问：“你们让我帮里奥？”

“哦，我们不是要您做您觉得恶心的事……呃，或者说痛苦的事。父亲完全理解您的感受。”他又大笑了一小会儿。“只是您的帮助在这个阶段至关重要，对布罗茨基先生的……恢复。”

“啊。”柯林斯小姐点头，好像在思考这件事，然后说：“我不能这样理解，斯蒂芬，你父亲在里奥身上只取得了有限的成功？”

她语气里的调侃在我看来比之先前更甚，但斯蒂芬还是没能留意到。

“不是的！”他生气道，“相反，父亲简直是化腐朽为神奇，取得了巨大的进步！这并不容易，但父亲的坚持让人惊叹非凡，甚至对我们这些习惯父亲处事方法的人来说也是。”

“或许他还是坚持得不够。”

“您不知道啊，柯林斯小姐！您不知道！有时他结束酒店紧张繁忙的一天，疲惫地回到家，累得直接就上楼睡觉了。母亲下楼来抱怨，我自己也上楼去他们房间看过，看到父亲平躺在那儿，横瘫在床上，鼾声如雷。您知道，多年来，他们之间有个很重要的约定，就是他一直侧身睡觉，从不平躺，否则，他会鼾声如雷。所以您能想象母亲发现他这个样子有多厌恶。通常，在我看来，叫醒他是上帝的职责，但这时，我却不得不叫他，否则的话，我之前也说过，否则的话，母亲拒绝回房睡觉。她会一直在走廊里走来走去，怒气冲冲，直到我叫醒他，帮他宽衣，帮他换上睡衣，领他去洗漱间，她才会进房。但我想说的是，唉，即使那么疲惫，但有时电话一响，某个员工对他说布罗茨基先生快崩溃了，一个劲地非要喝一杯，然后，您知道吗，父亲就会不知又从哪儿来了气力，重新振作，眼神犀利，整装出发，没入夜色，一去就是好几个小时。他说他会帮布罗茨基先生重拾健康，他会付出一切，毫无保留地帮他，以完成他许诺要达到的目标。”

“他的行为非常令人钦佩，但到底他进行得怎么样了？”

“我向您保证，柯林斯小姐，他的进展令人震惊。最近见到布罗茨基先生的所有人都这么说。那些眼睛的背后是许多不为人知的付出。还有他的话，一天比一天有意义。但最重要的是，他的才华，布罗茨基先生伟大的才华，毫无疑问正在渐渐恢复。大家都说，排练非常乐观。整个交响乐团都完全被他折服了。他不在演奏大厅排练的时候，就忙着自己练习。现在在酒店里，经常能碰巧听到一两段他演奏

的钢琴。父亲一听到他弹琴，就振奋非常，你就能明白他已经准备好牺牲一切睡眠。”

年轻人停下来，看着柯林斯小姐。好一阵儿，她的思绪好似飘向远方，头靠着一边，好像也能捕捉到远方钢琴弹奏的丝丝音符。然后，脸上漾了一抹轻柔的微笑，又看向斯蒂芬。

“可我听到的是，”她说，“你父亲让他端坐在酒店休息室里，像模型一样端坐在钢琴前，而里奥呆在那儿几个小时，只是在凳子上轻摇，碰都不碰一下琴键。”

“柯林斯小姐，这样说太不公平了！可能早些天有时候会这样，但现在已经完全不同了。不管怎样，即便他有时确实只是安静地坐在那儿，您一定知道，那并不意味着什么进展都没有。沉默很可能意味着最深远思想的形成，最深处能量的召唤。实际上，不久前，一阵特别长的沉默之后，父亲确实进了休息室，而布罗茨基先生正低头盯着琴键。过了一会，他抬头看着父亲说：‘小提琴声应该强烈点。声音应该强烈点。’这是他说。他可能沉默，但在他脑袋里，一直有一个音乐的世界。想想他‘周四之夜’将展示给我们的是多么令人激动啊。只要他现在不崩溃。”

“但斯蒂芬，你刚才说想让我帮帮他。”

这个年轻人，刚刚还愈发喜形于色，这会儿回过神来了。

“呃，是的，”他说，“我今晚来就是跟您商量这个的。我说过，布罗茨基先生正神速般恢复他昔日的力量。而且，呃，随着他伟大才华的恢复，其他各种特征也在重现。对我们这些之前不太了解他的人来说，算是一种爆料。最近几日，他常常口齿清晰，彬彬有礼。总之，我的意思是，除了这些之外，他开始回忆起过去。呃，坦白讲，他提起了您。一直不停地想念您，谈到您。给您举个例子吧，昨晚——有点尴尬，但我要告诉您——昨晚他开始恸哭流涕，而且欲罢不能。他不停地哭，把对您的感情全部宣泄出来。他已经是第三还是第四次这样了，然而，昨晚是最厉害的一次。大概快午夜了，布罗茨基先生还没从休息室出来，父亲就趴在门上听了听，听到他在抽泣。然后父亲进去，发现室内一片漆黑，布罗茨基先生俯在钢琴上恸哭。呃，楼上有间空的套房，父亲就扶他上楼，还让厨房送来布罗茨基先生最爱的汤——他一般只喝汤——还拿了些橙汁和饮料给他，但老实说，昨晚真是情势危急，一触即发啊。很显然，几加仑果汁，他三下五除二就灌下去了。要不是父亲在的话，他很可能当场就崩溃了，就 算已经到了这最后的阶段。而且这期间他一直在念叨您。呃，我想说——哦，天哪，我不应该呆这么久，还有人在车上等我呢——我的意思是，考虑到整个城市的未来都系在他身上，我们必须竭尽所能保证他闯过这最后一关。考夫曼医生和父亲意见一致，认为我们现在接近最后一栏了。但您知道，结果如何，仍然成败难辨，悬而未定。”

柯林斯小姐继续看着斯蒂芬，仍恍惚地似笑非笑着，还是什么都没说。过了一会儿，年轻人说道：

“柯林斯小姐，我知道我说的事情可能揭开了您过去的伤疤。我也理解您和布罗茨基先生已经多年未讲话……”

“哦，这样说可不太准确。今年早些时候，我在人民公园散步的时候，他还冲我喊过脏话呢。”

斯蒂芬尴尬地笑了笑，不知道怎样捕捉柯林斯小姐话里的意思。然后，他继续恳切地说道：“柯林斯小姐，我们并没说要您和他有过多的联系。天哪，不。您想放下过去。父亲，每个人，他们都理解。我们请您做的，就一件小事，可能会对他会有所不同，可能会鼓励到他，对他来讲意义重大。希望您至少不要介意我们直言相告。”

“我已经同意参加宴会了。”

“是的，是的，当然。父亲告诉我了，我们非常感激……”

“当然前提是绝对不会有直接接触……”

“当然，我们完全理解。是的，宴会。但其实，柯林斯小姐，我们还有件事想请您帮忙，您能不能考虑考虑。您看，一群先生——冯·温特斯坦先生也在其中——明天要带布罗茨基先生去动物园。他显然已经多年未去过了。他的狗自然是不允许入内的，但布罗茨基先生最后还是同意找个可靠的人帮他照顾几个小时。大家都觉得这种出门散心活动能帮助他平静下来。尤其是长颈鹿，我们认为能让他放松。呃，我还是说重点吧。诸位先生想问您有没有可能愿意参加这次动物园之行。哪怕只对他说一两句话就好。您不需要和大家一起出发，您可以在那儿跟他们会合，几分钟就够，跟他愉快地寒暄几句，或许说几句鼓励的话，一切就会完全不同。求您了，柯林斯小姐，请您考虑一下。事关重大啊。”

斯蒂芬在说着，柯林斯小姐起身，慢慢移步至壁炉边。她静静地站立了几秒钟，一只手搭在壁炉台上，好似在让自己站稳。然而终究，她还是回身对着斯蒂芬，我看到她双眼已经湿润。

“你知道我的难处，斯蒂芬，”她说，“我以前是嫁过他一次，但那都是很久以前的事了，这么多次见到他，他都是不停地冲我辱骂大叫。所以你看，很难猜到他到底想聊什么。”

“柯林斯小姐，我向您发誓他现在已经完全不同了。这些天他都彬彬有礼，温文尔雅……您肯定还记得。请您至少考虑一下。这事关系重大。”

柯林斯小姐抿了口雪利酒，若有所思。她正想回答，就在这时，我听到鲍里斯在车后面挪到了我身后。我扭头看去，觉得小男孩肯定已经醒了好一会儿了。他正望着窗外静谧空荡的街道发呆，我能感觉到他的忧伤。我正要说话，他应该是意识到我在注意他，没动身就悄悄地问我：

“你会贴卫生间的瓷砖吗？”

“我会贴卫生间的瓷砖吗？”

鲍里斯重重地叹了口气，继续盯着窗外的黑夜。然后他说：“我以前一片也没贴过。所以老是做错。如果有人教我，我就会了。”

“是的，我肯定你会的。是你们新公寓的卫生间吗？”

“如果有人教我，我就会做得很好。那母亲就会对卫生间很满意。她就会很喜欢卫生间的。”

“啊，那她现在不满意喽？”

鲍里斯看着我，好像我说了什么非常愚蠢的话。然后他狠狠地对我嘲讽道：“她要是喜欢卫生间的话为什么哭呢？”

“真的，为什么呢？这么说她因为卫生间而哭，我也好奇她为什么这样。”

鲍里斯转身对着他那面窗，借着透过车窗混合的光线，我能看到他强忍着眼泪。最后，他打了个哈欠伪装，握拳揉了揉脸。

“我们会办好这些事的。”我说，“你看着吧。”

“如果有人教我，我就会做得很好，这样母亲就不会哭了。”

“是的，我肯定你会干得非常好。我们很快就会办好的。”

我在座位上直了直身，透过挡风玻璃向外望。街上几乎看不到亮着的窗户。过了一会儿，我说：“鲍里斯，我们现在得好好想想，你

在听吗？”

车后座一片沉默。

“鲍里斯，”我继续，“我们得做个决定。我知道我们原本是要跟你母亲汇合的。但现在已经很晚了。鲍里斯，你在听吗？”

我侧过肩膀看了他一眼，发现他仍然眼神空洞地望着窗外的黑夜。我们继续默默地坐着，过了好一阵，然后我说：

“事实是，现在很晚了。如果我们回酒店，就能见到你外公。他见到你会很开心的。你可以自己一间房，或者，你愿意的话，我们可以叫他们在我房间给你多加张床。我们可以叫他们送些好吃的，然后你就可以睡觉了。明早我们起床一起吃早点，然后决定接下来做什么。” 身后仍然是沉默。

“我应该安排得更好的，”我说，“我很抱歉。我……我只是今晚没有考虑清楚。之前太忙了。但，听着，我保证明天补偿你。我们明天可以做想做的所有事情。你喜欢的话，我们回旧公寓，取回九号。怎么样？”

鲍里斯还是什么都没说。

“我们这几天都很累。鲍里斯，你觉得呢？”

“我们还是去酒店吧。”

“我觉得这主意再好不过了。那就这么定了。等那位先生回来，我们就告诉他我们的新决定。”

第六章

正在这时，那边的动静吸引了我的注意。我朝公寓楼回望过去，看到前门开了，柯林斯小姐正引着斯蒂芬出来，尽管他们彼此友好地道别，但从双方的仪态上能看出，他们的会面并未有愉快的结果。过会儿，门关上了，斯蒂芬急忙回到车里。

“很抱歉耽误了这么久，”他说着，爬上座位。“鲍里斯还好吧。”他双手放在方向盘上，发出一声不安的叹息，然后挤出点微笑，说：“那么，我们走吧。”

“其实，”我说，“我和鲍里斯在你离开的时候好好谈了谈。我们觉得还是回酒店吧。”

“瑞德先生，请允许我这样说，这个决定颇好。那么是回酒店了。太好了。”他看了一眼手表。“我们很快就到。记者们就不会有理由抱怨了。一点理由都没。”

斯蒂芬发动引擎，我们再次出发。我们开过荒凉的街道时，雨又开始下了，斯蒂芬打开了雨刷。过了一会儿，他说：

“瑞德先生，我想问问您是否还记得我们之前谈过的事，希望您不要介意我的无礼。您知道的，就是今天下午在中庭跟您谈的事情。”

“啊，是的，”我说，“是的，我们讨论了你‘周四之夜’的独奏。”

“您真好，说可能会抽时间听听。听我弹奏拉罗什的曲子。当然，也许这完全不可能，但，呃，我想您不会介意我问问的。那个，今天晚上，等我们回到酒店，我会练习一会儿。我在想，等您和这些记者见完面，我知道很是叨扰，但请问您能否来听听我弹奏，哪怕就几分钟，告诉我您的意见……”他的声音越来越小，最后笑了一声。

我明白这事对这个年轻人意义重大，有意想随了他的请求。但是，经过一番思量后，我说：

“抱歉，今晚我太累了，迫切需要尽快上床睡觉。但别担心，以后一定有机会。听着，要不这样吧，我不确定我什么时候能抽出时

间，但只要我有几分钟可以忙里偷闲，我就打电话到前台，让他们去找你。你要是不在酒店，我就等有时间的时候再试试，如此往复。这样，用不了多久我们肯定能找到彼此都方便的时间。但今晚，真的，你要不介意的话，我真的必须好好地睡上一觉。”

“当然，瑞德先生，我非常理解。我们一定按照您的办法做。您真是太好了。那我就等着您的消息了。”

斯蒂芬说得很客气，但看起来却十分失望，甚至可能误会我的回答是婉言拒绝。显然他对即将到来的演出很是焦虑，一点点挫折，不管多小，可能都会引起他一身的惊慌冷颤。我觉得有些同情他，又安慰他说：

“别担心，我们定会很快找到机会的。”

我们行驶在夜间的街道上，雨继续下着，没有停的意思。年轻人好久都没说话，我怀疑他是不是生我气了。但在变幻的灯光下，我瞧见了他的侧面，意识到他脑子里正思索着几年前的一次特别事件。那个小插曲他已经反复思量过多次了——经常是醒着躺在床上或独自开车的时候——这会儿因为怕我拒绝帮他，他再次想起了这件事。

那天是他母亲的生日。那晚，他把车停在熟悉的车道——那会儿他还在德国上大学——他刚刚撑过痛苦的几个小时。父亲开门迎接他时，兴奋地低语：“她心情很好，非常好。”然后转身，朝屋里大喊：“斯蒂芬回来了，亲爱的。有点迟，但还是回来了。”然后又是低语：“心情很好。很久都没这么好了。”

年轻人走进客厅，发现他母亲斜靠在沙发上，手里拿着一只鸡尾酒杯，身着一一条新裙。斯蒂芬眼前一亮，再一次感觉到母亲是个多么优雅的女性。她没起身迎接他，所以他只能弯腰亲吻她的脸颊，然而，母亲热情地邀请他坐在对面，让他颇为吃惊。身后，他父亲看到此夜开局良好，不觉轻声低笑，然后指指身上的围裙，急忙赶回厨房。

只剩下母亲和他两人，斯蒂芬第一感觉纯粹是惧怕——怕他的言行兴许会破坏母亲的好心情，因而毁了几个小时以来，或者几天来，父亲煞费苦心的努力。于是，他就开始简短又生硬地回答她关于他大学生活的询问，但发现她的态度依然和蔼，就开始答得越来越长。还曾一度形容他的一位大学教授像“我们外交部长的正常心智版”——他对这个比方颇为得意，已经在同学面前使用了无数次，而且相当成功。如若不是早先与母亲的交谈极为顺利，他也不敢冒险在她面前再

重复一次。但他如此做了，而且看到此番逗乐后，母亲的脸上瞬间绽放出笑容，他的心怦怦直跳。尽管如此，父亲回来宣布开饭还是让他着实松了口气。

他们走进餐厅，酒店经理已经摆上了第一道菜。静静地开饭，然后，让斯蒂芬有点意外的是，他父亲开始讲述一群意大利客人在酒店的搞笑趣事。讲完之后，酒店经理敦促斯蒂芬也讲述一个自己经历的故事，斯蒂芬有些迟疑地开讲，他父亲继续夸张地大笑着配合他。如此循环往复，斯蒂芬和父亲轮流讲搞笑的故事，并全心全意地相互配合回应。这招似乎很管用，因为最后，他母亲也开始大笑了很长一段时间，这简直让斯蒂芬觉得难以置信。还有，这顿晚餐，这顿令人刮目、赞不绝口的美味佳肴，可是酒店经理费尽心思准备的，照顾到了每个细节，这倒也符合他的风格。酒显然也很特别，他们主菜吃到一半时——一道鹅肉与野草莓酱美妙绝伦的搭配——当晚的气氛已经真的非常愉快。然后，酒店经理，因为酒的缘故，加上笑声不断，面色微红，侧着身子说道：

“斯蒂芬，再跟我们说说你住过的那个青年旅馆。你知道的，在勃艮第树林的那个。”

一时间，斯蒂芬被吓到了。他父亲怎么能——目前为止一切都处理得毫无差错——做出这么明显错误的判断？他所说的那个故事要频频涉及旅馆厕所的安排，显然不适合在母亲面前提起啊。但他犹疑的时候，父亲冲他眨了眨眼，好像在说：“是的，是的，相信我，没问题的。她会喜欢这个故事的，肯定会成功的。”尽管极度怀疑，但因为信任父亲，斯蒂芬开始讲这件趣闻。然而，还没讲多少，他脑海中便闪过一个念头：到目前为止都奇迹般成功的夜晚，将会被打碎成一片一片。但是，在父亲狂笑的怂恿下，他继续讲了下去，令他吃惊的是，他听到了母亲的开怀大笑。抬眼看过桌子的另一边，他看到她不停地摇头大笑。然后，故事快到结尾的时候，在阵阵大笑当中，斯蒂芬无意中瞧见母亲爱慕地看了父亲一眼。只是短短的一眼，但不会错。酒店经理，尽管笑得双眼流泪，也将这一眼尽收眼底，转头又冲儿子眨了眨眼，这次，带了几分胜利的喜悦之情。那时候，年轻人觉得一股强大的力量自胸中油然而生。但还没等他确定那是什么感觉，他父亲就说：

“现在，斯蒂芬，上甜品之前我们必须休息一下。要不你趁母亲生日弹奏点什么吧？”酒店经理边说着，边挥手指着墙边立着的钢琴。

那个动作——竖起手指朝餐厅随意挥摆的动作——斯蒂芬这些年来不止一次地回忆起。每次想起，当时那种冷飕飕的恶心感觉就会再度袭来。起初，他难以置信地看着父亲，但后者只是继续满足地微笑着，伸出手指着钢琴。

“来吧，斯蒂芬。弹点你母亲喜欢的。要不弹点巴赫的曲子，或者当代的。比如卡赞，或者穆莱利的。”

年轻人强迫自己环顾一周，同时看看母亲，看见她的脸大笑着，随着一道道不常见的皱纹柔和下来，她微笑着看着他。然后，她又转向酒店经理，说：“是的，亲爱的，我觉得穆莱利不错，应该会很棒。”

“来吧，斯蒂芬，”酒店经理开心地说道，“毕竟今天是你母亲生日，别让她失望。”

一个念头闪过斯蒂芬的脑海——但下一刻就否决了——他觉得父母在合伙整他。当然，从他们看他的眼光中——充满骄傲的期望——好像他们完全不记得围绕着他钢琴弹奏的痛苦过去。不知怎地，他开始酝酿的抗议也没说出口。他起身，就好像站起来的是别人一样。

钢琴靠着墙摆放着，斯蒂芬坐下的时候，能透过眼角的余光看到父母的身影。他们双肘都放在桌上，彼此稍稍靠近。过了一会，他转身直直地望向他们，意识到他这样做是想最后一次看看他们这样——坐在一起，仿佛被一种单纯的幸福绑在一起。然后，他回身对着钢琴，肯定今夜就要这样被毁掉了，这感觉让他窒息。但奇怪的是，他意识到，自己不再因事情的最新变化而感到一点的惊奇，其实他一直以来都在等着这一刻，这想法让他顿觉轻松。

有那么几秒钟，斯蒂芬就这样坐在那儿，没有弹琴，拼命想摆脱酒精的影响，在脑中过一遍他要弹的曲子。在那令人眩晕的一瞬间，他看到了一种可能性——这毕竟是个不平凡之夜——他也许不知怎么可以超常发挥，演奏结束能看到父母微笑，鼓掌，彼此的目光交换着深深的爱意。但一开始演奏穆莱利《外摆线》第一小节时，他就意识到想象的情景根本不可能发生。

然而，他还是继续弹着。有相当长的一段时间——持续整个第一乐章——眼角的余光看到父母二人都静静不动。然后他看到母亲轻轻地靠在椅背上，一只手托着下巴。几小节之后，他父亲的眼光从斯蒂芬身上挪开，双手放在膝盖上，向前垂首，看起来像是在端详面前桌上的一个点。

与此同时，他继续不停地弹奏着。年轻人好几次都想放弃了，但不知怎地，完全放弃好像是最令人惧怕的选择。所以他继续弹奏，最后曲子终了，斯蒂芬坐在那儿，盯着琴键好一会儿才鼓起勇气面对等待他的场景。

父母两人都没看他。父亲低着头，前额已经快贴着桌面了。母亲则看着房间另一侧，脸上冷若冰霜，这副表情斯蒂芬再熟悉不过了。但令他惊讶的是，那晚直至那一刻，她脸上才挂上了这副神情。

斯蒂芬只需一秒钟就能估想到这场景意味着什么。他起身，快速回到餐桌旁，仿佛这样做的话，他离开后的那几分钟就能被抹杀掉。有那么一会儿，他们三个就这样静静地坐着。最后他母亲起身，说：

“今晚非常愉快。谢谢你们两个。但我现在感觉非常累，我该上床休息了。”

起先，酒店经理好像没有听见。但当斯蒂芬母亲向门口走去时，他抬起头，轻声地说：“蛋糕，亲爱的。蛋糕。是……是非常特别的蛋糕。”

“你太好了，但真的，我已经吃很多了，现在得睡会了。”

“当然，当然。”酒店经理目光重新落在桌子上面，一副无可奈何的样子。但之后，当斯蒂芬母亲正要穿过房门的时候，酒店经理突然直起身子，大声说道：“亲爱的，至少过来看看吧，就看看。我说过的，这个蛋糕非常特别。”

他母亲犹豫了，然后说：“好吧，快点给我看看。然后我得睡觉了。可能是喝了酒的缘故，现在感觉特别累。”

闻此，酒店经理站起身，随即便引着妻子走出餐厅。

年轻人听到父母的脚步声走向厨房，然后，不到一分钟，沿着走廊返回，上了楼。之后，斯蒂芬仍然在桌边坐了很久。各种细小的杂声从楼上传来，但听不见他们讲话的声音。最后，他突然想到最好的办法就是连夜开车回寓所。毫无疑问，就算他在早餐时出现，对父亲完成帮母亲重拾好心情这项缓慢而艰巨的任务也于事无补。

他离开餐厅，意欲悄悄离开家。但一走到过道，正撞见父亲下楼。酒店经理手指放在嘴唇上，说：

“我们得小声说话。你母亲刚刚睡下。”

斯蒂芬告诉父亲，他想回海德堡。父亲听完就说：“太可惜了。我和你母亲以为你会呆得久一点。但你说你早上还有课。我会跟你母亲解释的。她肯定会理解。”

“还有，”斯蒂芬说，“希望母亲今晚过得非常愉快。”

父亲笑了笑，但在笑之前短短的一瞬间，斯蒂芬看到他脸上掠过一道深深的惨淡表情。

“哦，是的。我知道她很愉快。哦，是的。你学习那么忙，还能抽空回来，她挺开心的。我知道她希望你能多呆几天，但别担心。我会跟她解释的。”

那晚，行驶在荒寂的高速路上，斯蒂芬把当晚所有的事情、每个细节都前思后想了几遍——正如他之后这几年反反复复做的一样。每次回忆起那日那时的情景，所带来的伤痛，本已随着时间渐渐消逝，但如今“周四之夜”日日临近，昔日的惊惧再次浮上心头。此刻雨夜疾驶，仿佛重新带他回到了几年前那痛苦的夜晚。

我为这个年轻人感到难过，便打破沉静，说道：

“我知道这不关我的事，希望这样说不会太无礼，但我确实认为在你弹钢琴这件事上，你父母这样对待你很不公平。我的建议是，尽量享受弹钢琴的乐趣吧，只要你能从中得到满足和真谛，就不必管他们嘛。”

年轻人沉思片刻。然后说道：

“非常感谢您，瑞德先生，能站在我的角度考虑。但其实——呃，坦率地讲——我觉得您其实还是不明白。我理解，对一个外人来讲，我母亲那晚的行为可能有些，呃，有些不顾及他人的感受。但这样说对她就有失公正了，我真的非常不愿看着您带着这样的印象离开。您看，您得了解这背后的整件事才行啊。首先，您看，我四岁时，我的钢琴老师是提科夫斯基夫人。我料想您肯定不觉得这有什么，但是，瑞德先生，您得明白，提科夫斯基夫人在城里是个非常受人崇敬的人，可不是个普普通通的钢琴教师。她的劳务不是以常规的方式出售的——当然，像其他人一样，她也收取学费。也就是说，对自己做的事情，她非常严肃认真，只接收城里有艺术和知识修养的精英的孩子。比如，保罗·罗泽瑞尔，超现实主义画家，在这儿住过一段时间，提科夫斯基夫人教过他的两个女儿。迪盖尔曼教授的孩子，还有伯爵夫人的侄女们。她会非常谨慎地选择学生，所以能当她

的学生，我是很幸运的，特别是那时候父亲还没有今日的社会地位。但我猜父母那时对艺术的热衷不亚于今日。整个童年时光，我记得他们都在谈论艺术家和音乐家，还有得到大家的支持对这些人来讲多么重要。母亲现在大多时候都呆在家里，但那时候却很喜欢外出。比如说，有个音乐家，或者一个交响乐团来到城里，她都坚持给予支持。她不仅去看演出，而且总要在演出后到化妆间亲自送上她的嘉言。即便某位表演者表现很差，她仍然会去化妆间给他小小鼓励和一些善意的提示。事实上，她还经常邀请音乐家到我们家来，或者提议带他们去市区周边游览。一般来说，他们行程很满，无法接受她的邀请，但毫无疑问，这样的邀请对任何表演者来说都是令人振奋的，您自己肯定也深有体会。至于我父亲，他非常忙，但我记得他也经常努力做得尽善尽美。当然，为了向某位来访的名流表示敬意，只要有招待会，不管多忙，他都坚持陪母亲参加，这样他就能亲自对来访者表示欢迎。所以您看，瑞德先生，从我记事起，父母就是非常有修养的人，而且非常理解艺术在我们这个社会的重要性，我肯定这就是提科夫斯基夫人最后选上我做她学生的原因。我现在明白父母那时一定真的非常欣喜，尤其是我母亲，因为这事儿全是她安排的。我呢，就跟着罗泽瑞尔先生还有迪盖尔曼教授的孩子们一起上提科夫斯基夫人的课！他们一定很骄傲。开头几年，我练得还真不错，真的，非常好，所以提科夫斯基夫人曾称我是她教过的最有前途的学生之一。一切都非常顺利，直到……呃，直到我十岁的时候。”

年轻人突然沉默了，可能是后悔这么畅所欲言。但我清楚，他心中另外一面迫切想继续倾诉，所以我问道：

“十岁的时候发生了什么？”

“呃，瑞德先生，偏偏向您承认这点，我真是羞愧难当。但我十岁时，呃，我就停止不练了。我去提科夫斯基夫人那里，但根本就不练习曲子。她问我为什么不练，我就不说话。真是太尴尬了，就像在说另一个人一样，我真希望有奇迹发生能变成另一个人。但是真的，就是这样，当初我就是这样干的。这样几周之后，提科夫斯基夫人别无选择，只好告诉我父母，我要是没有改观，她就不再教我了。我后来发现母亲发了点脾气，冲提科夫斯基夫人大喊大叫。总之，结局非常糟糕。”

“之后你又跟了另一个老师？”

“是的，一个叫亨齐的老师，她其实一点也不差。但还是远远不及提科夫斯基夫人。我仍旧不练习，但亨齐小姐没那么严格。然后我

十二岁的时候，一切都改变了。很难解释到底发生了什么，听起来也许有点奇怪。一天下午，天气晴朗，我坐在家中的客厅里；我记得我正读着足球杂志，父亲踱步进了房间。我记得他穿了件灰色西装背心，衬衣袖子卷起，站在房间中心，盯着窗外的花园。我知道母亲在外面，坐在过去我们家那棵果树下的长椅上，我等着父亲出去，和她坐在一起。但他只是一味地站在那儿。他背对着我，我看不见他的脸，但我每次抬头，都能看到 he 正紧盯着窗外花园母亲坐着的地方。呃，当我第三或第四次抬头时，父亲还是没有出去，我突然意识到了什么。我是说，我突然意识到母亲和父亲已经好几个月没说过什么话了。很奇怪，我那会儿才意识到他们根本就没怎么说过话。很奇怪我先前怎么没有留意到，但直到那一刻，我是真没有。但我看得非常清楚。仓皇间，我想起了一大堆例子——先前，父母彼此会说些什么，但其实却什么也没说的时候。我不是说他们完全沉默。但，您知道，他们之间变得冷漠，我直到那一刻才注意到。跟您说吧，瑞德先生，突然意识到这一点，那种感觉非常奇怪。几乎同时，我想起了另外一件可怕的事情——这变化是从我失去提科夫斯基夫人那时开始的。我不敢肯定，毕竟已过去这么久了，但仔细一回想，我肯定就是那时开始的。我现在不记得父亲是否去了花园。我什么都没说，只是装作在读足球杂志，然后过了一会儿，我起身回房，躺在床上，仔细反复地想了想。从那之后，我又开始努力练琴。我真的开始非常勤奋地练习，我一定有了很大的进步，因为几个月之后，母亲去找提科夫斯基夫人，问她是否考虑重新接收我。现在我明白了，回去求人家对母亲来说，肯定是个不小的羞辱，尤其是她上次对人家那么大喊大叫，而且她一定在提科夫斯基夫人身上下了不少工夫。总之，结果是，提科夫斯基夫人同意重新接收我，这次我就一直刻苦练习，练习，再练习。但您看，我浪费了关键的两年。十岁到十二岁这两年有多么关键，您肯定再清楚不过了。相信我，瑞德先生，我试图弥补浪费的那两年，能做的我都做了，但真的是太晚了。甚至现在，我经常停下来问自己：‘我到底在想什么？’哦，只要能补回那两年，叫我做什么都行！但您看，我觉得我父母并没有真的理解失去的那两年造成了多大的损失。我觉得他们认为只要提科夫斯基夫人重新接收我，只要我勤奋练习，这两年就没什么关系。我知道提科夫斯基夫人曾不止一次想向他们解释，但我想他们对我充满了爱和骄傲，根本不接受现实。好几年，他们一直觉得我有了不错的进步，觉得我确实有天赋。就在我十七岁那年，现实给了他们沉重一击。那时有个钢琴比赛，尤尔根·弗莱明大奖，是由市艺术馆组织筹办的，旨在发掘城里有潜力的年轻人。那时候这个奖项颇有名气，但现在因为缺少资金已经停办

了。我十七岁时，父母有了让我参赛的想法，而我母亲真的四处奔走，筹备所有的报名、初赛事宜。就在那个时候，他们第一次认识到我有多么差劲。他们认真地听我演奏——可能是第一次真正听我演奏——他们意识到，我参加比赛简直是在羞辱自己，羞辱整个家族。其实无论如何，我本还想试试，但父母认为这会严重打击我的自信。我说过的，那是他们第一次注意到我演奏得多么差劲。那以前，他们对我过高的期望，而且估计还有他们对我的爱，妨碍了他们客观地倾听。那是他们第一次承认那浪费了的两年对我造成了难以弥补的损失。呃，之后呢，自然啰，父母对我相当失望。尤其是我母亲，好像一副听天由命的样子，觉得一切都是徒劳，她所做的所有努力，这些年在提科夫斯基夫人身上下的全部工夫，还有那时去哀求她重新接收我，这一切的一切，她似乎觉得这一切辛劳统统付诸东流了。于是，她变得非常泄气，不大再出门，也不去参加音乐会和社交活动。不过，父亲呢，他总是对我抱有些许希望，他这人就是这样，总是会坚持抱着希望直到最后一刻。时不时地，每隔一两年，他就要听我弹奏，每次他这样做，我都明白他对我充满希望。我明白他在想：‘这次，这次一定不同。’然而，到目前为止，每次弹奏完抬头，我都能看到他再一次垂头丧气。当然，他想竭力隐藏，但我看得清清楚楚。可他从未放弃希望，那对我意义重大啊。”

我们疾速行驶在一条宽敞的大街上，街道两旁矗立着高高的办公大楼。虽然不时地经过一排排整齐停泊的车辆，但数英里之内好像就只有我们这一辆车在动。

“你得在‘周四之夜’表演，”我问，“这是你父亲的主意吗？”

“是的。千真万确！他第一次提出，是在六个月以前。他几乎已经两年没听我弹奏了，但他真的非常信任我。当然他给了我机会拒绝，但我非常感动，觉得经过这么多次失望之后，他还对我信任有加。所以我说好的，我会表演的。”

“你真有勇气。我真希望这个决定最后证明是正确的。”

“其实，瑞德先生，我之所以答应，是因为，呃，虽然我是对自己这样说，我觉得自己最近有了些突破。或许您会明白我说的意思，真的很难解释。就好像有东西在我脑袋里，有东西一直阻碍我前进，像个水坝或者什么东西，好像一下子爆裂开来，一股全新的灵魂流淌出来。我也解释不清楚，但事实是，我觉得比起上次父亲听我弹奏，我现在有了重大进步。所以您看，当他问我是否想在‘周四之夜’表

演，尽管很紧张，我还是答应了。如果我不答应，对他就不公平，毕竟他多年来对我施以信任。但这并不是说我不担心‘周四之夜’。我一直刻苦练习曲子，我得承认，我确实有点担心。但我知道这是给我父母惊喜的好机会。不管怎样，您看，我一直都有这么个幻想。即便是在我的演奏极度令人沮丧之时。我总是幻想着花几个月时间，把自己锁在什么地方，练习，练习，再练习。我父母几个月几个月地看不见我。然后，有一天我突然回家。可能是个周日下午。反正是父亲也在家的某个时间。我进门，一句话不说，直接走到钢琴边，掀开盖子，开始弹奏。我甚至外套都不脱，只是不停地弹呀弹。巴赫、肖邦、贝多芬。然后是现代乐曲，格雷贝尔、卡赞、穆莱利。只是不停地弹。我父母跟着我走进餐厅，吃惊地看着我。他们做梦都想不到这种场景。但之后，让他们震惊的是，他们意识到就在我弹奏的过程中，我的水平越来越高超。壮丽的、细腻的慢板。惊人的、强烈的华美乐段。演奏技艺越来越高。他们就站在屋子中间，父亲依然一脸茫然地拿着正在看的报纸，两个人都完全惊呆了。我会以出色的终曲结束，最后转身对着他们……呃，我也不确定之后会发生什么。但从我十三四岁开始就一直有这样的幻想。‘周四之夜’可能不会出现这样的结果，但可能会很接近。我说过，情况改变了，我肯定现在差不多达到那个水平了。啊，瑞德先生，我们到了。我肯定，对您的那些记者来说时间刚刚好。”

市中心是如此的静谧。没有繁忙交通的干扰。我很难认出这就是市中心。但是，果不其然，我们正驶向酒店大门入口。

“如果您不介意，”斯蒂芬继续道，“我在这里放下您和鲍里斯。我得绕到后面去停车。”

后座上，鲍里斯看起来很累了，但还醒着。我们下车，我让小男孩道了谢之后，领着他走进酒店。

第七章

大厅里光线昏暗，整座酒店仿佛都陷入了沉寂。我刚到时见到的那位接待员又当班了，他这会儿在接待台后面的座位上，看上去睡得正香。我们走近时，他抬起头，认出了我，努力让自己清醒过来。

“晚上好，先生。”他开心地说，但紧接着疲倦似乎再次袭来。

“晚上好。我需要再开一间房。给鲍里斯。”我手放在小男孩肩膀上。“离我尽量近些。”

“我帮您看看，瑞德先生。”

“其实，您的迎宾员古斯塔夫，他正好是鲍里斯的外公。我在想他是否碰巧还在酒店。”

“哦，是的。古斯塔夫住在这儿。他在阁楼上有个小房间。但这会儿，我想他睡了吧。”

“或许他不介意被叫醒呢，我知道他会立刻想见到鲍里斯的。”

接待员不安地看了眼手表。“呃，只要您吩咐的，先生，”他迟疑地说道，拿起电话。停了一小会儿，我听到他接通了。

“古斯塔夫？古斯塔夫，很抱歉。我是瓦特。是的，是的，很抱歉叫醒你。是的，我知道，非常抱歉。但请听着，瑞德先生刚刚回来，他带着你的外孙。”

随后，接待员听着，点了几次头。然后他放下听筒，微笑地看着我。

“他马上就来。他说他会安排好一切的。”

“太好了。”

“瑞德先生，您现在一定很累了。”

“是的，很累。今天真是筋疲力尽。但我还有一个约会，应该有些记者在这儿等我吧。”

“啊，后来，大概一个小时前他们走了。他们说会另行安排时间。当时我提议他们直接联系斯达特曼小姐，这样您就不会被他们打

扰了。真的，先生，您看起来很累。您别担心这种事情了，上床休息吧。”

“好的。我也这么想。嗯。这么说他们走了。他们先是早到，现在又走了。”

“是的，先生，很烦人呐。但我得说，瑞德先生，您现在得上床睡会儿。您真的别担心。我肯定一切都会处理好的。”

我很感激年轻的接待员说了这番安慰的话，几个小时以来第一次感到一阵轻松。我把胳膊肘放在接待台上，没多大会儿，就站着开始打起瞌睡来了。不过，我并没有真的睡着，一直都清醒着，感觉到鲍里斯把头重重地靠在我身上，还能听到我面前接待员的声音，继续安慰地说着。

“古斯塔夫不会太久的，”他说道，“他会把您的小孩照顾得很舒服的。真的，先生，没什么好担心的。还有斯达特曼小姐，我们酒店的人认识她很久了。她做事可麻利啦。她以前处理过很多重要访客的事情，对她的印象百分之百的好。她从不出错。所以您那些记者就交给她去操心吧，不会有问题的。至于鲍里斯，我们会在您对面给他安排一间房。早上的风景很好，他一定会喜欢。所以，瑞德先生，我真的觉得您应该上床休息了。可以想象，今天也干不了什么事了。事实上，请允许我大胆建议，您一上楼就把鲍里斯交给他外公。古斯塔夫马上就到，他这会儿正在穿制服，会耽误他一会儿。他会很快下来，穿戴整齐，这就是古斯塔夫，整洁无瑕的制服，没有一点不得体的地方。他一来，您就把所有事情交给他处理。他随时都有可能下来。这会儿，他正坐在床边，绑系鞋带呢。马上就会准备好，会一跳而起，但他得注意，不要撞到屋椽上。迅速梳下头，然后出门走上过道。是的，他随时都可能过来，您可以直接上楼回房，放松一下，然后睡个好觉。我建议您来一杯睡前酒，您的小冰柜里有一种已经调好的特别的鸡尾酒，非常不错。或者您更中意送点热饮上来？您可以听点收音机里舒缓的音乐。广播里有个频道，晚上这个时间正在播放斯德哥尔摩之声，安静的午夜爵士乐，非常舒缓，我经常听它来放松。或者若您需要真正放松的话，我可以建议您去看场电影？我们很多客人这会儿都在看电影呢。”

他最后的话——说起电影——让我睡意全无。我直起身，说道：

“抱歉，你刚刚说什么？很多客人都去看电影了？”

“是的，街角有家电影院在放夜场电影。很多客人觉得辛苦一天之后，去那里看场电影能帮他们放松。您可以不喝鸡尾酒或者热饮，完全可以换一种方式嘛。”

接待员手边的电话响起，他说了声不好意思，拿起话筒。我注意到他一边听一边尴尬地朝我看了好几次。然后他说：“他在这儿，女士。”然后把听筒给了我。

“您好。”我说。

对方好一阵沉默。然后一个声音响起：“是我。”

过了好一会儿，我才听出是索菲。但我一听出是她，一种对她强烈的愤怒感就向我袭来，只是碍于鲍里斯在场，我才没对着电话狂怒大叫。最后我冷冷地说道：“是你啊。”

又一阵短暂的沉默，她说：“我在外面给你打电话。在街上。我看到你和鲍里斯进去了。他现在看不到我可能更好些。现在已经远远过了他的就寝时间。千万不要让他知道你在和我说话。”

我低头看了眼鲍里斯，他正靠着我站着打瞌睡。

“那你到底想干什么？”我问。

我听到她重重地叹了口气，然后她说：

“你生我气也是应该的。我……我不知道怎么回事。我明白自己现在有多愚蠢……”

“听着，”我打断她，担心自己可能没法压住火气，“你到底在哪儿？”

“在街的另一头。拱门下面，一排古董店门前。”

“我马上过来。呆在那儿别动。”

我把话筒递回给接待员，看到鲍里斯整个通话过程都睡着，我松了一口气。而这时，电梯门开了，古斯塔夫走了出来，踏上地毯。

他的制服看起来确实整洁无瑕。他稀疏的白发湿漉漉的，而且梳理整齐。双眼红肿，步伐有点僵硬，这可以说是唯一证明他几分钟前还在熟睡的迹象了。

“啊，晚上好，先生。”他边说边走近。

“晚上好。”

“您带着鲍里斯呢，这样麻烦您真过意不去。您真太好了。”古斯塔夫走近了几步，轻柔地微笑着看着他的外孙。“天哪，先生，看看他。睡得这么沉。”

“是的，他很累了。”我说。

“他这样睡着，看起来仍很小。”迎宾员继续温柔地看着他好一会儿。然后他抬头看着我，说：“我在想，先生，不知您有没有跟索菲谈过。我下午一直在想你们谈得怎么样。”

“呃，我确实跟她说话了，是的。”

“啊，您有没有发现什么端倪？”

“端倪？”

“什么困扰着她？”

“啊。呃，她倒是说了一些事情……老实讲，我之前跟你说过的，像我这样的外人很难明辨就里。自然啰，对于可能困扰她的事情我倒也略知一二，但真的，我真觉得你亲自跟她谈谈最好。”

“但您看，先生，我相信我之前跟您解释过……”

“是的，是的，你和索菲不直接交谈，我记得。”我突然不耐烦地说道，“但是，可以肯定的是，如果这对你重要的话……”

“这事对我来说至关重要。哦，是的，先生，至关重要。您知道的，是为了鲍里斯。如果我们不快点把这件事弄清楚，他心里会很焦虑的，我知道他现在已经这样了。已经有明显的迹象了。您只要看看他，他现在的样子，先生，就知道他真的还很小。我们欠他的，应让他的世界远离这些烦恼，哪怕只能短短地再维持一段时间，您不这样想吗，先生？其实，说这件事对我来说至关重要算是轻描淡写了。最近，我日日夜夜都在担心啊。但您看……”他停了下来，眼神空洞地望着面前的地板，然后轻轻摇了摇头，叹了口气。“您说我该自己和索菲谈谈。不是那么简单的，先生。您得了解这背后的故事。您看，我们有这个……这个默契多年了。从她小时候起。当然，她非常非常小的时候，事情不是现在这样的。大概到了她八九岁时，哦，我和索菲，我们经常聊天。我给她讲故事，我们绕着老城区散步，手牵手，就我们两个，不停地讲，不停地说。您千万别误会，先生。我那时非常爱索菲，到现在还是。哦，是的，先生。她小的时候，我们很亲近。这默契是从她八岁起开始的。是的，那时她八岁。顺便说一句，

先生，我们之间的这一默契，我原本以为不会持续太长时间。我当时觉得也就是个几天的事。就是这样，先生，我就是这样想的。第一天，我记得我下班，想给我妻子在厨房搭个搁板。索菲一直跟着我转，问问这，主动要求取这取那，一心想帮我。我一直沉默着，先生，我完全沉默。当然，她很快就惶惑不宁了，我看得出的。但我决心已定，必须坚守。对我来说，这可不容易啊，先生。哦，天哪，一点不容易。我爱我的小姑娘胜过世上的一切，但我告诉自己非坚强不可。三天，我对自己说，三天就够了，三天就结束了。就三天，然后我就能下班进门，再抱起她，紧紧搂着她，告诉彼此一切。也就是说，把这几天没说的话全补上。那时候，我在阿尔巴酒店工作，到第三天快结束的时候，您能想象，我渴望着当班结束，再回到家，看看我的小索菲。所以您也就能理解那天我回到公寓，叫索菲，她却拒绝来迎接我的时候，我有多失望。而且我过去找她时，她故意撇开我，一句话都没说就离开了屋子。您能想象，我很受伤，而且还有点生气——我刚刚也说过，我度过了艰难的一天，特别希望见到她。我对自己说，她要想这样，我就要看看结果会怎样。于是，我和妻子吃完晚饭，没对索菲说一句话就上床睡觉了。我猜就是那时候开始的。一天天过去了，不知不觉地，这就成了我们两人之间的默契了。我不想您误会我，先生，我们不经常吵架，我们之间很快就没有敌意了。实际上，不管是那时候还是现在，我和索菲彼此一直都互相体谅。我们只是不说话。我承认，先生，我那时可没料到事情会持续这么久。我想，我的本意应该是在某个适当的时间——一个特殊的日子，比如她生日——我们摒弃前嫌，回到往日的时光。但之后她生日来临，然后圣诞节过去，一来一去，先生，我们就是再也回不到从前去了。然后，她十一岁的时候，发生了一件难过的小事。那时候，索菲养了一只白色小仓鼠，起名叫乌利希，她非常喜欢它。她能连续几个小时不停地跟它讲话，放在手心里带着它在公寓里转悠。然后有一天这小东西不见了。索菲把所有地方都找遍了。她母亲和我也找遍了整个公寓，我们还问了邻居，但都没有结果。我妻子尽力安慰索菲说乌利希很安全——它只过去度个小假，用不了多久就会回来。然后，一天晚上，我妻子出去了，剩下我和索菲在家。我在卧室听收音机，声音开得很大——正在广播一场演奏会——这时，我听到索菲在客厅里难以自抑地哭泣。我马上就猜到她已经找到了乌利希，或者说它的尸体——它已经失踪了几周了。唉，卧室和客厅之间的门关着，而且，我说过，收音机声音很大，所以完全能想到我可能听不到她的声音。所以我一直呆在卧室，耳朵贴着门，身后继续放着音乐。我当然好几次想过出去看看她，但我站在门边时间越长，突然冲出去就会显得越发

奇怪。因为，先生，她其实没有大声抽泣。过了一会儿，我甚至又坐下了，想要假装从没听见。但是，当然了，听到她那样哭泣我感觉自己心都快被撕裂了；我很快发现自己又站在了门边，趴在门上，想透过音乐听听索菲的声音。我告诉自己，如果她叫我，如果她敲门或者叫我，那我就出去。我当初是这样决定的。如果她喊：‘爸爸！’我就冲进去。我会解释说因为音乐声太大了，刚才没听到她哭。我等啊等，但她没有叫我也没有敲门。心神狂乱地哭了一阵后，她做的唯一一件事——先生，跟您说，那哭声可是直达心底啊——她仿佛自言自语地大叫道——我强调一下，先生，自言自语——她大叫：‘我把乌利希忘在盒子里了！是我的错！我忘记了！是我的错！’我后来知道，原来索菲把乌利希放在一个小礼品盒里了。她本想带它去什么地方，她总是带它出去，给它看各种各样的东西。她把它放在这个小礼品盒里，正准备出去，但发生了点事情，她就分神了，根本就没出去，同时忘了乌利希还在小礼品盒里。我刚刚说的那天晚上是几周后了。她在公寓里做什么事情，然后突然想起来了。您能想象那一刻对我的小女儿来说多么可怕吗！突然想起这样的事，或许抱有一线希望，希望自己记错了，冲到盒子那里。当然，乌利希还在那里，静静地躺在里面。侧耳倾听，我那时当然不确定发生了什么，但她大叫的那一刻，我差不多猜得出来了。‘我把乌利希忘在盒子里了！是我的错！’但我想让您明白，先生，她似乎是在自言自语。如果她说：‘爸爸！求你出来……’但没有。即便这样，我其实想着：‘如果她再那样大叫，我就出去。’但她没有。她只是继续哭泣。我能想象出她双手捧着乌利希的样子，或许希望它还有救……哦，这对我不容易啊，先生，我一直呆在卧室，身后的音乐继续响着。好一会儿之后，我听到我妻子进门，两人在说话，索菲又哭了。然后，我妻子走进卧室，告诉我发生了什么。‘你什么都没听见吗？’她问，而我说：‘哦，天哪，没有听见呀，我在听音乐会。’第二天早上，早餐的时候，索菲什么都没对我说，我也什么都没对她说。换句话说，我们只是坚守着我们的默契。但我意识到，毫无疑问索菲知道我听到了。而且，她没有因此而记恨我。像平常一样，她递给我奶罐、黄油，她甚至帮我收拾了盘子——一点额外的小服务。我说的是，先生，索菲明白我们的约定，而且尊重这一约定。之后，您能想象，整个事情就这样了。您看，我们既然没有因为乌利希的事情而结束这一默契，如果没有什么，至少说意义同等重大的事情发生的话，结束这一默契仿佛就不合时宜了。真的，先生，如果没有特殊原因，某天突然就打破了这个默契，这不仅怪怪的，而且还贬低了整个乌利希事件给我女儿带来的悲剧。我真的希望您能明白，先生。不管怎样，我说

过，这之后，我们的默契变得，呃，十分牢固，而即便在现在的情况下，我突然打破这长久以来的约定好像也不合适。我敢说，索菲也深有同感。这就是我请您帮我这个特殊小忙的原因，尤其是因为今天下午您碰巧走那条路……”

“是的，是的，是的，”我打断他，又感到一阵不耐烦。然后我更加柔声地说：“我理解您和女儿之间的立场。但我在想，难道没有可能，这件事——你们的默契——难道这件事本身就不可能在她心底困扰她吗？您上次看到她沮丧地坐在咖啡馆，难道就没有可能是她在想你们的默契这个事情呢？”

这一问好似吓了古斯塔夫一跳。许久，他都保持沉默。最后他说：“我从没这样想过，先生，您刚跟我说的，我得好好想想。我得说，我之前从没想过。”他又沉默了一会儿，脸上一副迷惑的表情。然后他抬头，说道：“但为什么她现在这么关心默契的问题？都过了这么久了？”他慢慢摇了摇头。“我能问问您吗，先生，您是在和她谈过之后想到这个问题的吗？”

我突然感觉很累，希望了断整件事。“我不知道，我不知道，”我说，“我说过很多次了，这种家庭事务……我只是个外人。我怎么能判断？我只是说有这种可能性。”

“这事我肯定得好好考虑考虑。为了鲍里斯好，我得考察每一个可能性。是的，我要好好想想。”他又沉默了，脸上的表情越来越困惑。“我在想，先生，”他最后说，“我想再请您帮个忙。下次见到索菲，或许您不妨特别注意一下这个可能性。我知道您会很巧妙地处理此事。我一般不会提这样的要求，但是，您看，我是在为鲍里斯着想。我会非常感谢您的。”

他哀求地看着我。最后我叹了口气，说：“好吧。我会尽力帮助鲍里斯的。但我只能在此声明，像我这么个外人……”

可能是提到了他的名字的缘故，鲍里斯那时醒了过来。

“外公！”他惊呼一声，松开我，兴奋地奔向古斯塔夫，显然意欲拥抱他。但最后一刻，小男孩好似想起了什么，只是伸出了手。

“晚上好，外公。”他平静而持重地说。

“晚上好，鲍里斯。”古斯塔夫轻轻地拍了拍他的头。“很高兴再见到你。今天过得怎么样？”

鲍里斯随意地耸了耸肩。“有点累。很平常的一天。”

“等一下，”古斯塔夫说，“我会处理好一切。”

迎宾员走向接待台，搂着外孙的双肩。接下来一会儿，他和接待员低声用酒店行话交流了几句。然后两人点头，表示一致同意什么事情，接待员递过一把钥匙。

“请跟我来，先生。”古斯塔夫说，“我带您到鲍里斯的房间。”

“实际上，我还有个约会。”

“这个时辰？您真是太忙碌啦，先生。呃，那样的话，能允许我自己带鲍里斯上楼安顿好他吗？”

“能那样太好了，太感谢了。”

我和他们一起走到电梯前，临关门最后一次挥手道别。然后，顷刻间，之前的沮丧和愤怒再也控制不住汹涌而出。我没对接待员再说一句话，径直穿过大厅，再次投入茫茫夜色。

第八章

街道荒凉又寂静。过了好一阵子，我才找到——就在街对面不远处——索菲电话里提到的石头拱门。我向石拱门走去的时候，有那么一刹那，我猜想她是不是惊慌失措逃掉了。可是，过了会，看到她的身形从阴影中冒出，我分明感到愤怒再次升腾。

她的表情并没有我想象中的那么温顺。她仔细地瞧着我，我走上前，她几近镇定地对我说道：

“你完全有权利生气。我也不知道我是怎么了，大概是糊涂了。你完全有权利生气，我知道。”

我无动于衷地看着她。“生气？哦，我明白了。你是在说今晚早些时候的事。嗯，是的，我得说，我真替鲍里斯失望。显然，他很烦乱。但就我自己来说，坦白讲，我可没花多大工夫想这事，我忙着呢。”

“我不知道为什么会这样。我知道你多依赖我……”

“我从没依赖过你。我觉得你应该冷静点。”我不在意地笑了笑，开始慢慢走起来。“就我而言，这不过是个小问题。不管有没有你的支持，我都能处理我的工作。我只是替鲍里斯失望，仅此而已。”

“我是很愚蠢，我现在明白了。”索菲和我并肩走着。“我不知道，我是以为你和鲍里斯——你得从我的角度看——你和鲍里斯慢吞吞地跟在后面，我以为也许你并不热衷于我计划的夜晚，我猜想可能你无论如何都会抽身离去……听着，如果你愿意，我会告诉你一切。你想知道的一切。每个细节……”

我停下脚步，转身面对她。“显然，我没表达清楚。对你说的，我一点也不感兴趣。我来这儿，只是想呼吸下新鲜空气，放松放松。今天很辛苦，实际上，我来这儿只是想在睡前看场电影。”

“电影？哪部电影？”

“我怎么知道哪部电影？午夜场电影吧。这儿下去有个电影院。我想去那儿随便看场电影。今天真的很累。”

我又开始走，这次更是故意为之。过了一会儿，令我心满意足的是，我听到她的脚步追上来。

“你真的不生气？”她赶上来问。

“我当然不生气。干吗要生气？”

“我能去吗？跟你一起看电影？”

我耸了耸肩，继续平稳地走着。“随便。非常欢迎。”

索菲抓着我的胳膊。“你想的话，我会和盘托出一切。我会告诉你一切。你想知道的所有事情……”

“听着，还要我说多少次？我一点也不感兴趣。我现在就是想放松放松。未来几天会压力重重啊。”

她继续抓着我胳膊，我们一起默默地走了一会儿。然后她悄悄地说：“你可真好，这么善解人意。”

我没搭话。过了一会儿，我们渐渐远离人行道，继续走在荒凉的街道中间。

“只要我找到合适我们的家，”她最后终于说，“一切就会好起来。一定会的。早上我要看的地方，我真的很期待。听起来是我们一直梦想的。”

“是的，希望如此。”

“你就不能更兴奋点吗？这可能是我们的转折点哟。”

我耸了耸肩，继续走着。电影院还有点距离，但作为照耀黑暗街道的唯一一点亮光，我们双眼一直紧盯着它。然后，我们走近时，索菲叹了口气，我们停了下来。

“或许，我还是不进去的好。”她说，松开了她的手。“我明天要花很多时间看房。得早起。我还是回去为好。”

不知何故，她的话让我颇为吃惊，一时间我无法决断如何回应。我朝电影院那边望了一眼，然后转头对着索菲。

“你刚才不是说你想……”我开始说，然后停下来，比较平和地说：“听着，这部电影不错。我肯定你会喜欢。”

“但你还不知道是哪部电影呀。”

我脑中闪过一个念头，觉得她是在玩什么花样。即便如此，一阵奇怪的惊慌感还是席卷而来，我禁不住开口求她：

“你知道我的意思。是那个接待员，他建议我来看。我知道他人很可靠。再说呢，这酒店也得考虑其名声吧。总不至于会推荐……”我的声音越来越小，索菲开始离我而去，这让我愈加惊惶恐慌。“听着，”我提高嗓门说，不再在意谁听见，“我知道这部电影不错。况且我们很久没一起看电影了。这是事实，对吗？我们上次一起看电影是什么时候的事了？”

索菲好像在思考这个问题，然后终于笑了笑，回身朝我走来。

“好吧，”她说，轻轻拉着我的胳膊。“好吧。很晚了，但我还是会和你一起看的。你说过的，我们已经好久好久没一起这样子了。我们真该好好玩玩。”

我重重地舒了一口气，进电影院的时候，我所能做的就是尽量不要紧紧地拉着她靠近我。索菲好像感觉到了什么，把头靠在我肩上。

“你真好，”她温柔地说，“不生我的气。”

“有什么可生气的？”我低声说，一边四下张望着大厅。

我们前面不远处，最后一队人拥挤着进入剧场。我四处查看什么地方买票，但售票处已经关闭了，我突然想到电影院和酒店之间可能存在什么特别的约定。不管怎样，我和索菲走到队尾，一个穿绿色套装的男人站在门口，冲我们笑了笑，引着我们和其他人一起进去了。

当真是座无虚席。灯光还没有暗下来，很多人四处走动寻找座位。我还在找寻，看看我们能坐哪儿，这时，索菲兴奋地使劲掐我胳膊。

“哦，我们买点什么吧，”她说，“冰激凌，或者爆米花，或者别的什么。”

她指着远处，剧场前方。一个穿制服、拿着一托盘小吃的女人面前排起了小队。

“当然，”我说，“但我们得快点，不然就没位子了。这儿很挤。”

我们一路挤到前方，排着队。过了一会儿，我站在那儿，心中怒气又开始升腾，直到最后，被迫转身背对着索菲。然后我听到她在背后说：

“我得坦白。其实我今晚到酒店不是来找你的。我甚至不知道你们两个会出现在那儿。”

“哦？”我身体前倾，望着那一托盘小吃。

“经历了这些事之后，”索菲继续说，“我意思是，我一想到自己多傻，呃，我就不知道该怎么办了。然后我突然想起爸爸的冬大衣，想起我还没给他。”

我听到一阵窸窸窣窣的杂音，转过身，才头一次发现索菲一只胳膊下夹着一个软不拉几的棕色纸包。她把它举到半空，又很快放了下来，显然那东西很重。

“太傻了，”她说，“没必要惊慌。但你看，我突然感觉到空气中冬天的味道。我想起这件大衣，想立刻拿给他。所以我包起来，就出门了。然后，我来到酒店，夜晚却很温暖。我明白自己在为无谓的事情惊慌，就不确定该不该进去，今晚就给他。所以我站在那儿，越来越晚，最后我意识到爸爸可能上床休息了。我想过把东西放在接待处，但又想亲自给他。我在想，呃，也可以几周后给他嘛，天气还很暖和呢。这时候，一辆车停下来，你和鲍里斯下车了。事情就是这样。”

“我知道了。”

“否则，我都不知道还有没有勇气面对你。但我就在那儿，就在你对面的街上，所以我深吸了口气，打了电话。”

“呃，很开心你这样做了。”我示意周围。“毕竟，我们很久没像这样，一起来看电影了。”

她没回答，我看她的时候，她正深情地盯着胳膊下的包裹，另一只手拍了拍它。

“还要好一阵儿才换季呢，”她低语，与其说是对着我，还不如说是对着大衣。“所以没必要这么着急。我可以几周后再给他。”

我们现在已经排到了队伍前方，索菲走到我前头，急切地瞄着穿制服的女人端着的托盘。

“您要点什么？”她问。“我想要一杯冰激凌。不，巧克力雪糕。一个这个。”

越过她肩膀，我看到托盘里有普通冰激凌和巧克力块。但奇怪的是，这些都被凌乱地推到托盘边上，而中间留了很大地方给一大本破

烂书。我倾身翻看了一下。

“这是本很有用的手册，先生。”制服女人急切地说，“我诚心推荐。我知道我不该在这儿兜售这个。但经理不介意我们卖零散的个人物品，只要我们不经常那样就行了。”

封面上是一张照片，一个男人穿着工装裤微笑着，站在步梯的半中间，一只手拿着漆刷，胳膊下夹着一卷墙纸。我拿起它，感觉装订要散架了。

“实际上，这是我大儿子的，”制服女人继续说道，“但现在他长大了，去了瑞典，我上个星期终于开始整理他的物品。觉得有点意义的都留下来了，剩下的都扔了。但有一两样东西不好归类。这本旧手册，先生，我不能说它多有意义，但很有用，告诉你怎么整房子，装修，贴瓷砖，什么都有，一步一步的，还配有很清晰的示意图。我记得，我儿子在成长的过程中觉得这些很有用。我知道它有点破旧了，但它真的是最有用的书了。我不会要太多的，先生。”

“说不定鲍里斯会喜欢。”我对索菲说，随手翻着。

“哦，先生，您家要是有小男孩的话，真的就太好了。从我们自己的经验来说，我敢担保。我儿子那么大的时候，从这书里学到了不少。刷漆，贴瓷砖，什么都有。”

灯光开始暗下来了，我想起我们还没找到位子呢。

“很好，谢谢。”我说。

我付了钱，女人很感谢我。我们拿着书和冰激凌走开了。

“你能这样想着鲍里斯，真是太好了。”我们走在过道上时，索菲说。然后，她又举起包裹，抱在胸前，一阵沙沙作响。

“想到爸爸去年一冬天没有件像样的外套，感觉很奇怪。”她说，“但他就是自尊心太强，不肯穿那件旧的。去年很暖和，所以没什么关系。但他不能那样再过一冬了。”

“嗯，他当然不该。”

“我真是没眼力见儿。我知道爸爸年事渐高了，一直在考虑这些事。比如说，退休的事。他越来越老，迟早要面对。”然后她悄悄地补充说：“我过几周再给他，应该没什么问题。”

灯光又暗了，观众安静了下来，殷切地期盼着。我意识到剧场比先前更拥挤了，在想是不是座位找得太晚了。我们眼前全黑时，引座员走下了过道，手里拿着手电筒，示意了一下近前方的两个座位。我和索菲沿这排慢慢走进去，低声道着歉，坐下，广告正好开始。

大部分广告都是宣传当地企业，似乎没完没了。最后主片终于开始时，我们已经坐了至少半个小时了，看到是部科幻经典，我松了口气，名字叫《2001：太空漫游》——我最中意的一部，百看不厌。那引人注目的史前世界的开头一出现在大银幕上，我就感到自己放松了，很快舒服地欣赏起电影。电影叙述快到一半——克林特·伊斯特伍德和尤·伯连纳登上太空飞船，驶往木星的时候——我听到索菲在我旁边说：

“但天气会变。就像那样。”

我以为她是指电影，小声回应她，表示同意。但几分钟后，她说：

“去年，秋天阳光明媚，跟今年一样，持续了很久。人们坐在户外喝着咖啡，一直到十一月。然后突然，几乎一夜间，变得很冷。今年很可能又是那样。这些事都说不准的，是不是？”

“是的，没错。”这时，我当然已经意识到她又在说外套的事了。

“但倒也没那么着急。”她小声说。

下一刻我再看她的时候，她好像又看起了电影。我也回头看着大银幕，但不一会儿，记忆的碎片蜂拥而至，在漆黑一片的电影院里，我的注意力再次从电影上转移开去。

我想起一个场面，非常生动。我坐在一张不舒服的、好像还脏兮兮的椅子上。可能是早上，阴天，灰沉沉的，我面前举着张报纸。鲍里斯趴在近旁的地毯上，用蜡笔在素描本上画着。从小男孩的年纪来看——他还很小——我猜这是六七年前的事了，但哪间屋、哪幢房，我记不起来了。隔壁房间的门半开着，能听到几个女人在聊天。

我坐在一张很不舒服的扶手椅上，继续读着报纸，好一会儿，直到鲍里斯的举止或者说姿势发生了点细微的变化，我才低头看了一眼。然后，我立即明白了眼前的状况。鲍里斯在本子上成功地画出了清晰可辨的“超人”形象。他已经试了几个星期了，但不论我们如何鼓励，他都画不出一个哪怕有一点点相似的形象。然而这会儿，可能

是侥幸，再加上儿童时期常有的真正突破，他突然成功了。草稿还没画完——嘴巴和眼睛有待完善——但尽管如此，我立刻就能看出这幅画对他来说意味着巨大成功。其实，假如那一刻我没有注意到他正紧张地探着身子，蜡笔仍停留在纸的上方，我倒是要对他说点什么的。我意识到，他在犹豫是不是要再改进一下，但又怕会毁掉这幅杰作。我能强烈地感觉到他的两难处境，经不起心中的诱惑，差点就要脱口而出：“鲍里斯，住手吧。行了。停下来吧，给大家看看你的杰作。给我看看，给你母亲看看，还有在隔壁屋聊天的所有人。就算没完成又怎么样？人人都会吃惊，为你骄傲的。停下来，不然就全毁了。”但我什么都没说，而是继续透过报纸的缝隙看着他。最后鲍里斯下定决心，开始小心翼翼地添上几笔，然后，他弓着身子，信心大增，开始还有些鲁莽地用起蜡笔。过了一会儿，他突然停下，静静地看着那张纸。然后——甚至现在我还能想起他当时心中翻涌的凄楚——我眼睁睁地看着他试图抢救他的画作，添了一笔又一笔。最后，他脸沉了下来，把蜡笔往纸上一扔，起身，一声没出就离开了房间。

整个事件对我影响之深，我自己都感到不可思议，我还在调整自己的情绪，这时候索菲的声音在身边骤然响起：

“你就是不明白，是吧？”

我惊异于她语气中的怨恨，便放下报纸，发现她站在房间里，瞪着我。然后她说：

“你都不知道，看着发生的一切，我心里什么感觉，而对你来说却永远不会有那种感觉。你看看你，就只会看报纸。”然后她压低声音，声音反而更有力量了。“这就是差别！他不是你生的。不管你怎么说，就是不同。你永远不会觉得自己是他亲生父亲。看看你！你根本不了解我刚刚的感受。”

说罢，她转身离开房间，消失了。

我想过跟着她进隔壁房间，不管有没有客人，都把她带出来好好谈谈。但最后，我决定最好坐在那儿等她自己回来。果然，几分钟后，索菲又回来了，但她的态度让我说不出口，然后她又出去了。实际上，在随后的半个小时中，虽然索菲又多次出入房间，虽说我决计要让她明白我的感受，但我愣是一直没说话。终于，过了某一时点，我意识到，要提起这个话题而不显得可笑的机会已一去不返了。带着强烈的受伤感和挫败感，我继续读我的报纸。

“抱歉。”我听到身后有个声音，有只手碰了碰我肩膀。我扭过头，看到后排的一个男人前倾着身子，仔细地打量着我。

“是瑞德先生，对吧？天哪，还真是。请原谅，我一直在这儿坐着，光线太暗，没认出您。我叫卡尔·佩德森。原本非常期待在今早的招待会上见到您。但当然，因意外的情况您没能出席。在这儿见到您多么凑巧啊。”

那男人头发花白，戴着眼镜，面相和善。我稍稍调整了下姿势。

“啊，是的，佩德森先生。很高兴认识您。如您所说，今早太可惜了。我本人也非常期待，呃，见到大家。”

“碰巧，瑞德先生，还有几位议员现在也在电影院，他们都很遗憾今早没见到您。”他在黑暗中环顾了一下。“如果能确定他们坐在哪儿，我想带您去见见他们，至少其中的一两位吧。”他转过身，伸长脖子搜寻着身后几排。“不巧的是，现在一个也看不到……”

“我当然很高兴能见见您的同仁们。但现在太晚了，而且他们正在欣赏电影，要不再另找个时间吧。想必还有很多机会的。”

“我现在一个也看不到，”那人扭头对着我，说道，“太可惜了，我知道他们在电影院的某个地方。不管怎样，先生，作为市会议员，请允许我对您的来访表示无限的欢迎和无上的荣幸！”

“您太客气了。”

“大家都说，布罗茨基先生今天下午在音乐厅表现得非常好，三四个小时不间断地排练。”

“是的，我听说了。很不错。”

“我想知道，先生，您今天是否去了音乐厅？”

“音乐厅？呃，没有。很不巧，我今天还没有机会……”

“当然。您长途跋涉来到这儿。呃，还有很多时间。我肯定您会对我们的音乐厅印象深刻的，瑞德先生。那真的是座美丽的古建筑，无论我们如何败坏这座城市，可没人敢说我们忽视了音乐大厅。很美的老建筑，而且坐落在景色怡人的地方。我是说，在利布曼公园。瑞德先生，您到时候就明白我什么意思了。步行穿过树林（这可是段愉快的路程），然后就会来到一小片空地，就是那儿！音乐厅！到时候，您自己看看就知道了，先生。那是个公众聚会的理想场所，远离街道的喧嚣。我记得小时候，这里还有个城市交响乐队，每月的第一

个周日人们都会聚集在音乐厅门口的空地上。我还记得，每家都来，每个人穿得都很整齐漂亮，越来越多的人穿过树林来到这里，相互问候。我们这些小孩到处奔跑撒欢。秋天的时候，我们会做游戏，特别的游戏。我们东奔西跑，收集满目的落叶，送至园丁的屋棚，堆在一旁。在屋棚的墙上，有块特别的木板，大概这么高，上面有个污点。我们彼此相传，说我们得尽量收集树叶，堆积起来，达到那个污点的高度的时候，大人们就开始鱼贯而入进入音乐厅。如果没达到，整个城市就会炸成碎片，诸如此类的。于是我们就在那儿，来回奔跑，满怀抱的都是湿答答的树叶！我这个年纪的人很容易怀旧，瑞德先生，但曾几何时，这儿的人无疑都很开心，好似一家人，还有真正长久的友谊。人们互相温暖，温柔以待。这儿曾经是个美好的社区。好多好多年都是这样啊。我马上就76岁了，所以我以人格担保我所说的。”

佩德森沉默了一会儿。他仍前倾着，胳膊放在我座位的靠背上，我看他的时候，发现他的眼睛没盯着银幕，而是看向远方。同时，电影快演到了宇航员们第一次怀疑计算机哈尔的动机，这台计算机对太空飞船上生活的方方面面都至关重要。克林特·伊斯特伍德正潜行在幽闭恐怖的过道上，神情机警，手握长管枪。我正准备开始全神贯注看电影，佩德森又开始说话了：

“跟您说实话吧，我忍不住为他感到些许可惜。我是说，克里斯托弗先生。是的，您可能会觉得奇怪，但我真的为他感到可惜。我也这样对一些同仁讲过，他们只是觉得，哦，这老家伙心软了，谁会为那样一个骗子感到一丁点可惜？但您看，比起大多数人，我记得的事情多一点。我还记得克里斯托弗先生第一次到这座城市的情形。当然，我也和其他同仁一样愤怒。但是，您看，我非常清楚，一开始，刚刚开始的时候，不是克里斯托弗先生本人要极力表现的。不，不，是……呃，是我们。也就是说，像我这样的人，我不否认，我还是有点影响力的。是我们鼓励他的，我们赞颂他，奉承他，很明显，我们指望他给我们以启发和动力。至少，对发生的事情，有部分责任在我们。我年轻些的同仁们，早几年他们可能还没有参与太多。他们只知道克里斯托弗先生是个大人物，全世界都围着他转。他们忘了，他本人从没要求被放在这么一个位置上。哦，是的，我记得非常清楚，克里斯托弗先生刚到这座城市的情景，他那时相当年轻，自己一个人，没一点儿架子，甚至很谦虚。如果没人鼓励他，我肯定他会很愉快地融入环境，在某个私人聚会上表演他那怪异的独奏，别的就没什么了。但这都是时机问题，瑞德先生，时机不凑巧啊。克里斯托弗先生出现在我们城市那会儿，我们正经历着，呃，一个空档期。画家伯恩

德先生，还有沃尔莫乐先生，一个非常出色的作曲家，长久以来两人都是我们这里文化生活的领军人物，他们在一个月内相继去世，于是这儿弥漫着某种情绪……呃，一种惴惴不安的情绪。两位如此出色的人物过世了，我们都很悲伤，但是我猜想，大家也都觉得现在终于有了变革的机会，一个接受新鲜事物的机会。虽说我们过去一直都很快乐，但是，在这两位先生坐镇中心把持一切这么多年后，人们的某些沮丧情绪有所积累也是难免的。所以您能想象，当人们相传那个寄居在罗斯夫人家的陌生人是个提琴演奏家，曾经和哥德堡交响乐队一起表演过，而且还有几次是在卡齐米日·杜绍基的指挥下，呃，人们的激动可不是一点半点啊。我记得亲自参加过克里斯托弗先生的欢迎会。您看，我记得当时的情形，还记得他起初多么不拿架子。现在，事后想想，甚至可以说他是缺乏自信。很可能是来这儿之前遇到了一些挫折。但我们事事都围着他转，非要他纵论一切，是的，这就是一切的开始。我记得亲自出马劝他举办那首场独奏会。他真的是不愿意。不管怎样，那首场独奏会原本只是个小型活动，就在伯爵夫人家里举办。可就在约定日子的前两天，确定参加人数后，伯爵夫人不得不将地点换到了霍特曼美术馆。自那之后，克里斯托弗先生的独奏会——我们要求至少六个月一次——就在音乐厅举行，而这些独奏会年复一年地便成了我们的谈论热点。但他起初并不愿意，并不光是那第一次。开头几年，还得我们劝他。然后，很自然地，喝彩声、掌声和拍马声起作用了，很快克里斯托弗先生就忘乎所以了。‘我在这儿成功了，’那时候很多人听到他这样说。‘我一到这儿就成功了。’您看，先生，我的意思是说，是我们逼迫他的。我现在的确为他感到可惜——虽说我敢说，我也许是这城里唯一为他感到可惜的人。您也注意到了吧，现在很多人都挺生他气的。我是很现实的，瑞德先生。你得心狠手辣才行啊。我们的城市危在旦夕，凄惨一片。反正总得从某个地方开始拨乱反正，从中心开始也未尝不可。我们必须心狠手辣，尽管我为他感到可惜，但我明白舍此别无他途。他以及他所代表的一切，现在必须被抛入我们历史的某个黑暗角落。”

我仍稍侧着身子面对他而坐，这样就清楚表明我仍旧在听，但我的注意力已被电影引了回去。此刻，克林特·伊斯特伍德正对着微型电话与他在地球的妻子通话，眼泪顺着脸颊流淌下来。我知道快到最著名的场景了：尤·伯连纳进屋，在克林特·伊斯特伍德面前拍了拍手，测试他出手拔枪的速度。

“抱歉，”我说，“但克里斯托弗先生是多久前来到这城里的？”

我没多想就问出口，但至少一半的注意力还停留在大银幕上。事实上，我又继续盯着大银幕两三分钟后，才留意到身后的佩德森耷拉着脑袋，陷入深深的羞愧当中。感到我的目光重新停留在他身上后，他抬起头，说：

“您问得好极了，瑞德先生。对我们正好是个训诫。十七年又七个月。时间不短啊。这种错误估计也会发生在别的地方，但这么长时间都没有去纠正，这种情况估计就不多了。我明白我们必须得指望一个外人，一个像您这样的人，先生，请允许我这样说，我感到羞愧难当。我不会找借口的。光是承认错误，就要花很多时间。更别提，我敢说，真正明白错在哪里。但要承认它，甚至只是对自己，都很难，而且要花很久。您也知道，我们和克里斯托弗先生牵涉颇深。几乎每个议员都曾经邀请过他去家里。在每年的市宴会上，每次都安排他坐在冯·温特斯坦先生旁边。他的照片都登上了我们市年鉴的封面。他还为罗根坎普展览会项目作序。还有其他的牵涉，渊源太深了。比如，不幸的利伯里希先生的例子。啊，抱歉，我想我刚刚看到在那边的葛尔曼先生了”——他又伸长脖子，向电影院的后排望去——“是的，是葛尔曼先生，如果没错的话，这样的灯光下很难看清，和他在一起的是沙佛先生。这两位先生都参加了今早的欢迎招待会，我知道他们二位见到您会很高兴的。另外，我们刚刚谈论的这件事，我肯定这两位先生会有很多要说的。不知您是否介意去那边见见他们。”

“非常荣幸。但您刚刚正要告诉我……”

“啊，是的，当然。不幸的利伯里希先生的例子。您看，先生，在克里斯托弗先生到来之前的很多年中，利伯里希先生一直是我们这儿最受人敬重的小提琴教师之一。他教授来自最好家境的小孩，非常受人崇敬。话说克里斯托弗先生在第一次独奏后不久，被问及对利伯里希先生的看法，他告诉大家他根本没把利伯里希先生放在眼里，不管是他的演奏还是他的教授方法。几年前，利伯里希先生弥留之际，他几乎失去了一切。学生、朋友、社会地位。这仅仅是我脑袋里蹦出的一个例子。要承认一直以来我们都错看了克里斯托弗先生——您能想象是多么残酷吗，先生？是的，我们曾经很软弱，我承认。不过话又说回来，我们当时也不知道事情会变成现在这样，会变成一种危机。总的来说，人们看起来仍然很开心。一年年过去了，就算有人有所质疑，也会守口如瓶。但我不是在为我们的疏忽而辩解，先生，一点都不是。以我那时在议会的地位，我知道，跟其他人一样，我也应该受到谴责。最后——承认这点，让我感到羞愧难当——最后是这城里的居民，是普普通通的老百姓，才迫使我们直面我们的责任。这些

普普通通的老百姓，至少领先了我们一大步，那时候他们的生活已日渐凄惨。我还记得我头一次意识到这个事实的那一刻。那是三年前了，听完克里斯托弗先生最近一次独奏后，我走回家——我记得，当时他演奏的是卡赞的《大提琴和三支笛的怪诞》。我在漆黑的利布曼公园中急匆匆往家走，那天还挺冷的，我看见药师科勒先生走在我前面一点。我知道他也去了音乐会，于是我赶上他，我们开始聊天。起初，我还刻意将想法闷在心里，但后来，我终于问他是否喜欢克里斯托弗先生的独奏。是的，很喜欢，科勒先生说。但他说这话的样子肯定有点不对劲。我记得片刻之后我就再次问起他是否喜欢这场音乐会。这次，科勒先生说 he 很喜欢，但克里斯托弗先生的表演有点功利。是的，他用的是‘功利’这个词。您能想象吧。我在接下来开口之前仔细斟酌了一番。最后，我决定豁出去了，说道：‘科勒先生，我同意您的看法。有点单调无力。’科勒先生回答说他脑袋里蹦出的单词是‘冷漠’。那时，我们已到了公园大门口。我们互道晚安，就分开了。我记得那晚我几乎一夜未眠，瑞德先生。像科勒先生这样普普通通的老百姓、正派的市民都持这样的看法了。很明显，不能再继续装下去了。是时候该我们——我们这些有影响力的人——坦白我们的错误了，不管牵涉多深，影响多远。啊，请原谅，坐在葛尔曼先生旁边的确确实实是沙佛先生。我知道他们两位对发生的一切有些有趣的见解。他们比我小一辈，看问题肯定会稍稍不同。此外，我知道他们今早多么渴望见到您。我们过去吧，请。”

佩德森站起身，我看着他弯腰靠边穿过他那排座位，小声咕哝着抱歉。走到过道，他才直起身，向我示意。尽管很累，但没办法，只能随他去了，我也站起身，开始向过道挪去。这当儿，我发现电影院里几乎洋溢着喜庆的气氛。这里那里人们都在边看电影边相互逗乐，小声交谈，似乎根本没人介意我从中挤过。相反，人们都把双腿折向一边，或者急切地跳起身来。有几位甚至蜷缩靠在座位上，双脚腾空，一边开心地尖叫。

我一走到过道，佩德森就领着我走上铺着地毯的斜坡，走到后排座位的什么地方。他停下来，做了一个请的动作，说：

“您先请，瑞德先生。”

第九章

我再一次从一排人前面挤过去，这次，佩德森紧跟在我后面，代我小声道歉。不一会儿，我们看到有群人凑在一起，我花了好一会儿时间才确定他们在打牌，后排的向前倾着身体，前排的向后扭着身体。我们走近，他们抬头。佩德森向他们介绍了我，他们全部起身成半站立姿势。等我舒服地坐在他们中间之后，他们才又重新坐下。我发现自己握了无数只从黑暗中伸出的手。

离我最近的男人穿着一身商务西装，领扣大开，领带松散，满身威士忌的味道，而且我还发现他没办法集中注意力看我。从他肩头望过去，他的同伴瘦瘦的，长着一张古怪的满是雀斑的脸，看起来较清醒，但领带也是松散着。我还没来得及看清楚其他人，那个醉汉再次握了握我的手，说：

“希望你喜欢这部电影，先生。”

“很喜欢，其实，这碰巧是我一直以来都很喜欢的一部。”

“哦，幸好今晚放的是这部。是的。我也喜欢这部电影。经典之作啊。瑞德先生，您要不要接我这手牌？”他把手里的牌举到我面前。

“不，谢谢。请别因为我打断你们。”

“我刚刚告诉瑞德先生，”佩德森在我后面说，“这儿的生活大不如前，甚至对你们这些比我年轻的绅士来说也是，我肯定你们能证实……”

“啊，是的，过去的美好时光，”那醉汉迷迷糊糊地说，“啊，是的，过去美好的日子，一切都很美好。”

“西奥在想罗莎·卡莱纳了。”他身后的雀斑男人说，引起周围一阵哄笑。

“胡说，”醉汉抗议道，“别在我们尊贵的客人面前让我难堪了。”

“哦，好的，好的。”他朋友继续道，“西奥过去曾深深地爱上了罗莎·卡莱纳，就是现在的克里斯托弗夫人。”

“我从没爱过她。再说，我那个时候已经结婚了。”

“那就更可惜了，西奥。实在太可惜了。”

“胡说八道。”

“我记得，西奥，”后排传来一个陌生声音，“你过去没完没了，老是谈论罗莎·卡莱纳，简直烦死我们了。”

“我那时候不知道她的本性。”

“吸引你的正是她的真本性吧，”那个声音继续道，“你老是覬觐那些不肯多看你三秒的女人。”

“这话没错。”雀斑男人说。

“什么没错……”

“不，让我来解释给瑞德先生听。”雀斑男人把手放在他醉汉朋友肩上，斜着身子对我说，“现在的克里斯托弗夫人——我们还是愿意叫她罗莎·卡莱纳——她是本地姑娘，和我们一样，跟我们一起长大。她依旧是个美人胚，而那时候，呃，她迷住了我们所有人。她很美，也很难接近。她曾经在时力高画廊工作，现在已经关门了。她过去常常坐在桌子后面，其实不过就是个服务员。她经常周二和周四在那儿……”

“周二和周五。”醉汉打断他。

“周二和周五。抱歉。当然了，西奥记得。总之，他常去那画廊——就是间白色小屋子——他总是去，假装看展览。”

“胡说……”

“不只你一个，是不是，西奥？你还有很多情敌。尤尔根·哈泽。艾里奇·布鲁尔。甚至还有海因茨·沃达克。他们都是常客。”

“还有奥托·罗舍尔。”西奥怀念地说，“他常去。”

“真的吗？是的，罗莎有很多倾慕者。”

“我从没跟她说过话，”西奥说，“除了一次，我问她要本目录。”

“对罗莎来说，事情再明显不过了，”雀斑男人继续道，“自从十几岁开始，她就认为所有本地男子都配不上她。渐渐地，她因以几近无情的方式拒绝他人的追求而闻名。所以，像西奥这样的可怜虫，

没怎么跟她说过话，还真是明智啊。但只要有什么名人、艺术家、音乐家、作家这样的人来往这里，她就会不顾廉耻追随他们。她总是加入这样那样的委员会，也就是说能接近几乎所有造访这里的名流。她会去赶所有的招待会，活动开始后的半个小时内，就把客人弄到一个角落，聊啊聊，聊啊聊，而且直勾勾地盯着他的双眼。当然，这引起了很多的揣测——我是说，关于她的性行为——但没人能证明什么。她总是很聪明。但你看看她那讨好来访名流的样子，不禁怀疑她至少和其中一些人有什么瓜葛。她非常迷人，肯定迷倒一大片。但对本地男人，她连看都不看一眼。”

“汉斯·荣鲍德老是声称和她有过一腿。”叫西奥的男子插话道，引起了很多笑声。不远处几个声音嘲讽地重复道：“汉斯·荣鲍德！”然而，佩德森不安地激动起来。

“先生们，”他开始说，“我和瑞德先生刚刚在讨论……”

“我从没跟她说过话。除了那一次问她要目录。”

“啊，西奥，没关系。”雀斑男人拍了拍朋友的后背，后者向前趴了趴。“没关系，瞧瞧她现在的窘境。”

西奥仿佛陷入了沉思。“她对待一切都是那样，”他说，“不仅仅是爱情。只有对艺术圈的人，只有对真正的名流，她才有时间。否则从她那儿得不到一点尊重。这儿人人都不喜欢她。她嫁给克里斯托弗很久之前，就没人喜欢她了。”

“要不是长得漂亮，”雀斑男人对我说，“人人都会厌恶她。但结果却是，总有像西奥这样的男人甘愿堕入她的魔咒。总之，后来克里斯托弗来到这里，他是个职业提琴演奏家，而且有着非凡的经历！罗莎死命追求他，一点也不害臊，好像根本不在乎我们任何人的想法。她知道自己想要什么，并毫不留情地追求得到。这倒也让人钦佩，不过就是有些骇人罢了。克里斯托弗被她迷住了，他到这儿之后的第一年，他们就结婚了。克里斯托弗正是她梦寐以求的人。呃，希望她的钱投资得有价值。做他老婆做了十六年，本来也没那么糟糕。但现在怎么样？他完蛋了。她现在该怎么办？”

“她现在甚至在画廊里也谋不到一份差事。”西奥说，“过去那么多年，她深深伤害了我们，伤害了我们的自尊。跟克里斯托弗一样，她跟这座城市已经彻底决裂了。”

“有一派人认为，”雀斑男人说，“罗莎会跟克里斯托弗离开这里，直到在其他什么地方安顿好了之后就甩了他。但德雷姆勒先生——”他示意了一下前排就座的某个人，“却坚信她会继续呆在这儿。”

刚提到他名字，前排的男人就扭过头来。显然，他一直都在听我们的谈话，现在开始权威式地发言：“要知道罗莎·卡莱纳还有胆怯的一面。我和她是同学，同一年级。她一直都有这一面，对她可是诅咒。对她来说，这座城市不够好，可是她太胆怯了，不敢离开。你们注意到了吗，尽管野心很大，她却从来没有想要离开。许多人没有注意到，但她这胆怯的一面，确实存在。所以我赌她留下。她会留下再碰碰运气。她可能会期望再钓一个过路的名流。毕竟，她这个年纪，风韵犹存啊。”

附近传来一个细尖的高嗓门：“她或许会追求布罗茨基。”

这话引起了一阵前所未有的哄笑。

“完全有可能。”那嗓音继续道，带了一种假装受伤的语气。“没错，他是老了，但她也不年轻了呀。这儿还有谁能入她的眼？”笑声更大，鼓励着他继续。“其实，布罗茨基对她来说是最合适的对象。我得向她推荐推荐。全城现在对克里斯托弗的憎恨还有其他一切都会祸及到她。但如果她成了布罗茨基的情妇，或者甚至是布罗茨基太太，啊，这可是撇清和克里斯托弗一切关系的最好办法了。而且这意味着她还可以继续保持她……她目前的地位。”

这会儿，周围已经是笑声一片了，甚至前面三排的人都扭过头来，开心大笑。而我身边，佩德森清了清嗓子。

“先生们，拜托，”他说，“我太失望了。瑞德先生现在对这一切会怎么想呢？你们还是把布罗茨基先生——布罗茨基先生，请这样称呼——你们还是拿老眼光看他。你们这样显得自己很蠢。布罗茨基先生已不再是说笑的对象了。不管人们怎么想施密特先生针对克里斯托弗太太的提议，布罗茨基先生无论如何绝不是逗乐的对象……”

“真高兴您能来到这儿，瑞德先生。”西奥插话进来，“但现在太晚了。事已至此，太晚了……”

“胡说八道，西奥。”佩德森说，“我们正处在转折点，一个很重要的转折点。瑞德先生就是来告诉我们这一点的，是不是，先生？”

“是的……”

“太晚了。我们已经失去它了。为什么我们不听天由命，就随它变成另一个冰冷的、孤独的城市呢？其他城市已经是这样了。至少我们还会顺应潮流。这座城市的灵魂，不是病了，瑞德先生，而是死了。现在太迟了。十年前，或许有可能。那时候还有机会。但现在不行了。佩德森先生，”醉汉无精打采地指着我的同伴，“你，先生。你，汤姆森先生，还有斯蒂卡先生。你们这些善良的先生。你们一个个都推诿搪塞……”

“又来了，西奥。”雀斑男人插嘴道，“佩德森先生说得对。现在还不到这样自暴自弃的时候呢。我们已经有了布罗茨基——布罗茨基先生——而且，说不定他或许……”

“布罗茨基，布罗茨基。太迟了。我们现在已经完蛋了。就让它成为一个冷漠的现代城市吧，就这样了结算了。”

我感觉佩德森把手放在我胳膊上。“瑞德先生，很抱歉……”

“你推诿搪塞，先生！十七年了。十七年了，就任凭克里斯托弗为所欲为，没有受到任何挑战。现在你们又要给我们什么？布罗茨基！瑞德先生，太迟了。”

“我真的很抱歉，”佩德森对我说，“让您听到这些言论。”

我们身后有个人说：“西奥，你喝醉了，而且情绪消沉。明天一早你就得去找瑞德先生，向他道歉。”

“呃，”我说，“我很有兴趣听听各方面的意见……”

“但这根本不代表任何一方！”佩德森抗议道，“我向您保证，瑞德先生，西奥的观点根本不代表这儿人们的普遍想法。无论在哪儿，大街上还是电车里，我都有一种强烈的感觉，一种乐观向上的感觉。”

这一席话引来了一片赞同的低语声。

“别信他说的，瑞德先生，”西奥说，抓着我的衣袖。“您来这儿干的是傻子的差事。我们做个快速民意测试吧，就在这儿，电影院里。我们问问这里的一些人……”

“瑞德先生，”佩德森连忙说道，“我要回家睡觉了，电影是不错，但我已经看了很多次了。而您，先生，您一定很累了。”

“说实在的，我真的很累了。可以的话，我就跟您一起走吧。”然后，我转身对其他人说：“抱歉，先生们，我想我现在该回酒店了。”

“但瑞德先生，”雀斑男人说，声音里透着担心，“请先别走。您得留下，最起码等宇航员拆除掉哈尔。”

“瑞德先生，”这排远处传来一个声音，“要不您接我的牌吧，今天晚上这游戏玩太多了。这光线，老是看不清楚牌。我视力大不如前了。”

“您太客气了，但我真的要走了。”

我正要跟他们互道晚安，佩德森已经起身，开始往外挪了。我在后面跟着，边走边向后面的那群人挥了挥手。

佩德森对刚刚发生的事显然很焦虑，我们挪到过道时，他仍默默地走着，头低低的。离开放映厅的时候，我最后扫了一眼大银幕，看见克林特·伊斯特伍德准备拆除哈尔，正在仔细检查他那把巨大的螺丝刀。

外面的夜——一片死寂，寒风瑟瑟，迷雾重重——与温暖嘈杂的电影院构成如此强烈的对比，我们在人行道边停下，好似在重新找回各自的方向。

“瑞德先生，我不知道说什么，”佩德森说，“西奥一直是个很不错的人，但有时候，大餐之后……”他沮丧地摇了摇头。

“别担心。劳碌辛苦的人需要放松放松。今晚过得非常愉快。”

“我感到非常羞愧……”

“请不要这样。我们都忘了吧。真的，我很愉快。”

我们开始步行，脚步声在空荡荡的街道回响。好一会儿，佩德森继续缄默着。然后，他说：

“您得相信我，先生。我们从未低估向这儿的人推销这一主意的困难。我是说，关于布罗茨基先生的主意。我向您保证一切都处理得相当谨慎。”

“是的，我相信是的。”

“起初，我们非常小心选择向谁提起这个主意。在早期阶段，只有那些最可能有同情心的人才能听，这点至关重要。然后，通过这些入，我们才允许慢慢地向全部公众透露实情。那样，我们才能确保整个想法是以正面的形象呈现。同时，我们还采取了其他办法。比如，我们以布罗茨基先生的名义举办了一系列晚宴，从上层名流中间邀请了一些千挑万选的宾客。起先，宴会都是小型的，而且几乎是秘密进行的，但渐渐地，我们将挑选网络越扩越大，我们的情况也得到越来越多的支持。还有，所有重要的公众活动，我们都保证布罗茨基先生一定出现在显贵当中。比如说，北京芭蕾舞团来访的时候，我们安排他坐在魏斯夫妇的包厢。当然，在私人层面上，我们都强调提起他的时候，要用最崇敬的语气。到现在，我们已经努力了两年了，总体而言，我们都非常满意。他的总体形象有了明显的改观。所以我们判断是时候走出这关键的一步了。所以刚才才会那么令人扫兴。我是说里面的那些先生，本来他们应该树立榜样的。如果每次稍稍放松放松之后，连他们都老调重弹，我们又如何期望所有的人……”他声音越来越轻，又摇了摇头。“我太失望了。代表我自己，还有您，瑞德先生。”

他又陷入沉默。我们二人都没说话，过了一会儿，我叹了口气，说：

“公众观念难改变啊。”

佩德森走了几步，继续沉默，然后说：“您得想想我们的起点。您得这么想，考虑到我们的起点，您就会明白我们已经有了很大的进步。您得理解，先生，布罗茨基先生跟我们一起住在这里很长时间了，而这些年来，从未有人听他谈起，更不要说弹奏任何音乐了。是的，我们都隐约知道他在自己的祖国曾担任过乐队指挥。可是您看，由于我们从未见到他的那一面，我们也就从未认为他是那样的了。其实，坦率而言，直到最近，布罗茨基先生只有在喝得酩酊大醉，在城里踉踉跄跄，大喊大叫的时候才真正被大家留意。其余的时间，他就和他的狗住在北边的公路边上，过着隐居的生活。呃，也不完全正确，大家经常看到他出入图书馆。一个星期有两三个上午，他会去图书馆，坐在常坐的窗边位置，把狗拴在桌脚边。按规定是不许带狗进去的。但很早以前，管理员就认定了最简单的解决之道，莫过于让他带狗进去，这可远比跟布罗茨基先生大干上一架简单哩。所以，有时候能看到他在那儿，狗拴在脚边，翻阅着一摞摞的书——不外乎就是那一卷卷臃肿冗长的历史书。而且，只要有人在室内开始发出些许声响，哪怕是最简短的相互低语，甚至只是打个招呼，他就会忽地起

身，冲那‘罪犯’大声咆哮。理论上，当然，他是对的。但我们从未严格坚持图书馆保持安静的规定。大家相遇的时候，都喜欢聊上一阵，毕竟，在其他公共场合都是这样的。而且，再想想，布罗茨基先生自己带狗进去也是违反规定的，这也难怪大家都会认为他不可理喻。但时不时地，某几日上午，一种莫名的情绪会笼罩着他。他会坐在桌边阅读，脸上一副凄惨无助的表情。你会发现他坐在那儿，神游太虚，泪眼汪汪。每当这个时候，人们就知道是时候可以说话了。通常会有人先试探一下。如果布罗茨基先生没反应的话，很快地，满屋子的人就会开始讲话了。有时候——人们故意对着干！——整个图书馆会比布罗茨基先生不在的任何时候都吵。我记得有天早晨我去还书，整个地方听起来就像个火车站。我几乎得扯开嗓门大喊，还书处才能听清我讲的是什么。而布罗茨基先生呢，置身其中却无动于衷，完全沉迷于自己的世界。我得说，他那样子还真是令人伤感。清晨的光线让他看起来那样虚弱无力。鼻尖上有一滴泪，眼神飘渺，他已经忘记自己翻到了哪一页。我突然意识到整个气氛有点残酷！好似他们在占他便宜，但也说不上来到底怎么占他便宜了。但您看，不日清晨，他就又能立刻让他们安静。唉，无论如何，瑞德先生，我想说的是，多年来，这就是布罗茨基先生给我们的印象。我想，在相对来说如此短的时间内，期望大家完全改变对他的看法是有点过了。我们已经取得相当大的进步了，但您刚刚看到了……”恼怒的情绪再一次占据了上风。“但他们应该更清楚的，”他自言自语道。

我们在十字路口停了下来。雾更浓了，我都找不到方向了。佩德森环视四周，然后又继续走，领着我沿着一条狭窄的街道前行，人行道上泊满了一排排的汽车。

“我会送您到酒店，瑞德先生。我走这条路也能回家。我相信酒店您还满意吧？”

“哦，是的，挺好的。”

“霍夫曼先生打理得很好。他是位出色的经理，也是个大好人。当然，如您所知，布罗茨基先生能恢复，全都得仰仗霍夫曼先生啊。”

“哦，是的，当然。”

有好一阵，人行道上的车辆迫使我们一前一后行走。之后，我们慢慢走出人行道，走到大街中间，我赶上佩德森和他并排走，发现他的心情轻松起来。他微笑着对我说：

“我知道您明天要去伯爵夫人家里听唱片。我们市长，冯·温特斯坦先生，我知道他也打算去。他非常想邀您到一边，和您谈些事情。当然，主要还是唱片的事。棒极了！”

“是的。我非常期待。”

“伯爵夫人是位非凡的女士。她一次又一次地证明了她的思维让我们其他人汗颜。我曾经不止一次问她，究竟是什么让她第一次有这样的想法。‘直觉。’她总是说，‘某一天，我醒来，就有了这直觉。’这是怎样的一位女士啊！弄到那么多留声机唱片可不是件容易的事，但她动用了一位在柏林的行家采购商，把这事儿办成了。当然我们其他人那时对此都一无所知，而且我敢说就算我们知道了，我们也只会笑话这整个想法。然后，一天晚上，她把我们召到她住处。就在两年前的上个月，一个非常愉快、晴朗的夜晚。我们全都到了，十一个人，在她的起居室集合，没人知道是什么事情。她招待我们用茶点，然后几乎立刻就开始对我们讲话。我们怨天尤人已经够久了，她说，是时候采取行动了。是时候承认我们曾经多么地误入歧途，是时候采取积极的措施，尽最大的努力弥补损失了。否则，我们的孙子，我们的曾孙，就永远不会原谅我们了。哎，这可不是什么新鲜事了，我们几个月来一直都在不停地彼此重复着如斯的态度想法，直至今刻，我们所有人只是点头附和，跟平时一样，制造点噪音。但接着伯爵夫人继续道，就克里斯托弗先生而言，她说，已经没必要跟他再耗下去了，他现在已被整个城市各行各业的人所唾弃。但此事本身不足以扭转整个社会中心的痛苦似螺旋上升愈渐愈猛的势头，我们得设法营造一种新的情绪，一个新的时代。对她说的这些，我们均点头称是，但瑞德先生，这些想法，我们之前已经相互交流过很多次了。我相信冯·温特斯坦先生甚至也这样说过，只不过他是用了最为谦恭有礼的方式罢了。这时候，伯爵夫人开始吐露她心中的想法。解决办法，她宣布，很可能一直都存在于我们中间。她继续解释道，但，呃，乍一听，自然地，我们都不能相信自己的耳朵。布罗茨基先生？那个图书馆的怪老头，醉醺醺步态蹒跚的老头？她真的是在说布罗茨基先生吗？要是换了其他任何人，我们肯定会放声大笑的。但伯爵夫人，我记得，依然自信满满。她建议我们大家放松自己，她要给我们放点音乐听听。要仔细听。然后她开始播放那些唱片，一张又一张。我们就坐在那儿听着，屋外，太阳渐渐西沉。音质很差，伯爵夫人的立体声音响设备，您明天就能看见，也有些陈旧了，但这一切都没关系。没几分钟，那音乐就开始对我们大施魔力，悠悠地将我们送入宁静清幽之中。有些人还眼含热泪。我们意识到，我们听到的正是这些

年大家殷殷所盼的。我们居然赞颂像克里斯托弗这样的人，突然间，这显得更加不可理解了。此时此刻，我们又在聆听真正的音乐。这位指挥家不仅才华横溢，而且认同我们的价值观。然后，音乐停止了，我们起身，伸了伸腿——我们已经足足听了三个小时——然而，呃，想到布罗茨基先生——布罗茨基先生！——还是荒唐透顶。我们指出这些唱片很老了。而布罗茨基先生——只有他自己知道何故——已经在很久前就放弃音乐了。而且呢，他还有自己的……自己的问题。他已经跟从前判若两人了。我们很快纷纷摇起头来。可是，然后呢，伯爵夫人又说道，我们已到了危机边缘，我们要解放思想，我们必须找到布罗茨基先生，和他谈谈，确定他目前的能力。毫无疑问，不用提醒，我们也知道目前情况的紧迫性。我们每人都能详述十来个悲伤的案例：孤独寂寞的生活；好多家庭对曾经视为理所当然的幸福深感绝望。就在这时，霍夫曼先生，即您所在酒店的经理，突然间清了清喉咙，宣布他愿意负责布罗茨基先生的事。他会义无反顾——他一脸庄重地说着这话，而且他当时还站起来了呢——他会义无反顾地评估情势，而且，如果还有一点希望令布罗茨基先生重振雄风，那么，他，霍夫曼先生，就会亲自负责处理。如果我们信任他承担这项任务，他发誓绝不会让整个社会失望。我说过的，那是两年前的事了。自那以后，我们吃惊地看到霍夫曼先生为了实践他的诺言而付出的努力。虽说进展不总是那么顺利，但总体说来，已经非常显著了。现在布罗茨基先生，呃，已经恢复到目前的状况了。进步如此之大，让我们感到过不了多久就可以迈出关键性的一步了。毕竟，我们能走到现在，不过是把布罗茨基先生好好包装推销了一番而已。总有一天，城里的人得用自己的眼睛看，用自己的耳朵听，才能做出判断。呃，到目前为止，种种迹象表明，我们没有过于雄心勃勃。布罗茨基先生一直都按常规排练。而且据大家说，已经完全赢得了整个乐团的尊重。虽说可能距他上次公演已有好多个年头了，但他貌似宝刀不老。那热情，那晚在伯爵夫人起居室意外经历的那美好的幻境，都在他心灵深处伺机候着，现在正在逐步苏醒过来呢。是的，我们非常有信心，在即将到来的‘周四之夜’他会让所有人为之骄傲。同时，对我们来说，我们已经尽我们所能确保那晚成功。斯图加特·内格尔基金交响乐团，您知道，即便算不上最为顶级的交响乐团，也算非常受人尊敬的乐团啦。他们的演出费用可不便宜呢。尽管如此，对于我们雇佣他们参与这次最为重要的活动，人们几乎没有任何质疑之声，对排练时间也没什么异议。起初，我们拟定的是两周的排练时间，但最后，由于财政委员会的全力支持，我们延长到了三个星期。对于短暂来访的交响乐团，三个星期的盛情款待，再加上各种费用，您能想到，先

生，是个不小的负担啊。但鲜有异议之声。每位议员现在都明白‘周四之夜’的重要性。大家都明白应该给布罗茨基先生机会。尽管如此——”佩德森突然重重地叹了口气，“尽管如此，您今晚看到了，陈旧的根深蒂固的观念难改啊。这也正是您对我们的帮助，瑞德先生，您同意到鄙市，对我们来说至关重要。人们听您的话不会像听我们的话那样。实际上，先生，跟您说吧，一听说您要来，这座城市的情绪就完全改变了。人们对于您在‘周四之夜’要说的话充满最高的期待。电车上，咖啡馆里，人们几乎不谈别的。当然，我一点也不知道您为我们准备了什么。或许您会刻意不将未来刻画得太瑰丽美好，或许您会告诫我们每一个人，若想重拾以往的欢乐就必须付出辛苦努力。您这样的告诫是顺理成章的。但我也了解，在呼吁调动听众的积极性和公益心这方面，你的技巧是多么纯熟。不管怎样，有一点是肯定的。那就是等您发完言，这城市里没人会再像以前那样看待布罗茨基先生，继续把他当成衣衫褴褛的老酒鬼了。啊，看得出您很担心，瑞德先生。请别担心。我们这里也许看起来很闭塞，但在某些场合的表现还是很卓越的。特别是霍夫曼先生，一直在努力营造一个真正美好华丽的夜晚。请放心吧，先生，各个阶层的市民都会参加。至于布罗茨基先生本人，我说过，我肯定他不会让我们失望。我肯定他会大大出乎每个人的意料。”

其实，佩德森提到的我脸上的表情和“担心”没有一点关系，我是对自己感到越来越懊恼。真实的情况是，我不仅远远没有准备好即将到来的、针对这个城市的演讲，甚至连背景研究都没做好。回顾所有的经历，我不明白自己怎么会任事态发展到现在这种情势。我记得就在那天下午，在酒店精致的中庭，我一口口呷着浓烈的苦咖啡，反复提醒自己，精心筹划当日剩下的时光，充分利用有限的时间，这事是何等重要。我坐在那儿看着身后雾气腾腾的喷泉在镜中的倒影时，甚至想象着自己会遇到的情况，跟今天在电影院碰到的差不多，但我对本地一系列问题应对自如，给同伴留下深刻印象，轻轻松松，权威自然来，同时自然而然利用克里斯托弗至少制造一个笑料，简单易记，第二天就能传遍整个城市，随口道来。但我却让自己被其他事情左右，结果，在电影院的整个期间，我没能做出哪怕是一个卓尔不凡的评价，甚至有可能给人留下了不够彬彬有礼的印象。突然我又对索菲引起的混乱感到一阵强烈的不满，还因为她，我不得不彻底牺牲自己的行事标准。

我们又停了下来。我意识到我们正站在酒店门口。

“呃，今晚很开心，”佩德森说，他与我握手告别。“非常期待未来几日能再见到您。但现在您必须得休息了。”

我谢过他，道了晚安，走进大厅，他的脚步声也渐渐消失在夜色当中。

年轻的接待员还在当班。“希望您电影看得愉快，先生。”他边说着，边递给我钥匙。

“是的，非常愉快。谢谢你的建议。让我轻松不少。”

“是的，很多客人都觉得这是个圆满结束一天的好方法。哦，古斯塔夫说鲍里斯对他的房间很满意，很快就睡着了。”

“啊，很好。”

我向他道了晚安，急匆匆地穿过大厅走进电梯。

到房间以后，我感觉长长的一天下来，自己浑身脏兮兮的，便换上浴袍，准备洗澡。但就在我正研究浴室摆设的时候，一阵强烈的疲惫感袭来，所以我能做的就真的只是摇摇晃晃地走回床边，瘫倒在床上，立刻沉沉入睡了。

第十章

我还没睡多久，电话铃就在耳边响起。我由着它响了一会儿，然后终于坐起身，接起电话。

“哦，瑞德先生。是我，霍夫曼。”

我等着他解释为何扰我清梦，但酒店经理没有继续说下去。一阵尴尬的沉默之后，他又说道：

“是我，先生。霍夫曼。” 又一阵停顿，然后他说：“我在下面大厅。”

“哦，是吗。”

“很抱歉，瑞德先生，或许您在忙乎什么吧。”

“事实上，我正在睡觉。”

这话好像让霍夫曼吃了一惊，因为之后又是一阵沉默。我很快笑了笑，说：

“我的意思是，刚刚躺下，可以说。自然不会睡得很沉，直到……直到今天的工作全部结束之前。”

“没错，没错。” 霍夫曼听起来松了口气。“就是喘口气，这样而已。非常理解。呃，无论如何，我会在楼下大厅等您，先生。”

放下电话，我坐在床上想怎么办。我仍旧疲惫——才睡了那么几分钟——非常想忘记刚才这一切，继续睡觉。但最后我知道这是不可能的，就起了身。

我发现自己穿着浴袍就睡着了，正欲脱下更衣，突然觉得干脆就穿着它下楼去见霍夫曼吧。毕竟，晚上这个时候，除了霍夫曼和接待员，不可能再遇见别的人了，而且穿着这身装束下楼可以婉转而又明确地告诉他：时辰已太晚了，他在妨碍我睡觉。我出门进了走廊，向电梯走去，心里特别恼怒。

至少起初，浴袍好似发挥了预期的作用，因为我一进大厅，就听到了霍夫曼的开场白：“很抱歉打扰您休息了，瑞德先生。这一路奔波，您一定很累了。”

我丝毫不想隐藏我的疲惫，一只手捋过头发，说道：“没关系，霍夫曼先生。但我相信这不会太久吧。其实我现在挺累的。”

“哦，不会太久，绝不会。”

“好。”

我留意到霍夫曼穿着一件雨衣，雨衣下，一身晚装，系着宽腰带，打着蝴蝶领结。

“当然，您应该听说了，那个坏消息。”他说。

“坏消息？”

“是坏消息，不过请允许我这样说，先生，我有信心，非常有信心，这坏消息不会引起严重后果。我相信，到天亮之前，您同样会如此确信的，瑞德先生。”

“我肯定会有的。”我说，安慰地点了点头。过了一会儿，我断定此番情形严重且无望，所以直截了当地问道：“很抱歉，霍夫曼先生，您说的坏消息是指什么？最近有这么多坏消息。”

他警觉地看着我。“这么多坏消息？”

我大笑了一声。“我是说非洲的动乱，等等。到处都有坏消息。”我又大笑。

“哦，我明白了。我说的坏消息当然是指布罗茨基先生的那条狗。”

“啊，是吗。布罗茨基先生的狗。”

“您一定会赞同，先生，这可真是不幸。时机不好啊。我处处小心谨慎，却出了这么一档子事儿！”他恼怒地叹了口气。

“是的，太糟糕了。太糟糕了。”

“但我说过，我很有信心。是的，有信心这事不会引起任何重大挫折。但这会儿，要不我们立刻出发？其实，我现在想，您是非常正确的，瑞德先生。这会儿出发时机最好不过了。意味着我们不会到得太早或者太晚。非常正确，应该冷静地处理这些事。千万不要惊慌。先生，那么我们出发吧。”

“呃……霍夫曼先生。我好像判断失误了，这种场合我却穿了这身衣裳。您不介意给我几分钟上楼换件衣服吧。”

“哦。”霍夫曼飞快地扫了我一眼。“您看上去好极了，瑞德先生。请别担心。呃，”他焦急地看了看手表，“我们还是出发吧。是的，这会儿时机刚好。请。”

外面漆黑一片，雨水连绵。我跟着霍夫曼绕过酒店大楼，沿着一条小径，走进了室外的一个小停车场，那里停着五六辆汽车。一盏孤寂的路灯紧紧地固定在一个栅栏柱上面，借着灯光，我能分辨出路前面地面上的一个个大水坑。

霍夫曼朝着一辆黑色的大轿车跑过去，打开了客门。我一路走过去的时候，能感觉到雨水不停地渗进拖鞋。我正要上车，一只脚却踩进了一个深深的水坑，完全湿透了。我惊呼了一声，但霍夫曼已经急急忙忙绕到驾驶座一侧了。

霍夫曼载着我开出停车场，我则使劲地在柔软的车地板上弄干双脚。我抬起头，发现车已经开出了停车场，行驶在主干道上，我吃惊地看到交通变得异常繁忙。此外，许多商店和饭店现在都苏醒过来，成群的顾客在亮闪闪的窗户里面转悠。我们继续开着，交通逐渐拥挤起来，直到市中心附近某处，我们夹在三车道的车辆中间，完全停滞了下来。霍夫曼看了看手表，绝望地猛捶方向盘。

“太倒霉了。”我同情地说道，“不久前我刚出来的时候，整座城市好像睡着了一样。”

他正出神，心不在焉地说道：“这座城市的交通越来越糟糕了。我不知道有什么解决办法。”他又猛捶了一下方向盘。

接下来几分钟，车慢慢往前挪动，我们默默地坐在车里。然后霍夫曼轻轻地说道：

“瑞德先生一直在奔波。”

我以为我听错了，但他接着又说了一遍——这次有礼貌地轻轻地挥了挥手——我意识到，他是在排练，到目的地之后如何解释我们迟到的原因。

“瑞德先生一直在奔波。瑞德先生——一直在奔波。”

我们继续行驶，穿梭在夜间繁忙的交通中，霍夫曼继续时不时地低声嘟囔着什么，大部分我都没听清。他已然进入自己的世界，看起来越来越紧张。中间有一次，我们没能及时赶上绿灯，我听到他嘟囔道：“不，不，布罗茨基先生！他是个极好的、极好的一个人！”

最后转了个弯，我们驶出了城市。不久，高楼大厦消失了，我们行驶在一条长长的小路上，周围是一片漆黑的开阔地——可能是农场——两边都是。交通稀疏，可以让这辆大马力汽车加速行驶。我看到霍夫曼明显地放松下来，接下来他对我说话时，已基本恢复了以往的彬彬有礼。

“告诉我，瑞德先生。您对酒店的一切还满意吗？”

“哦，是的。一切都很好。谢谢。”

“您还满意您的房间？”

“哦，是的，是的。”

“床，舒服吗？”

“非常舒服。”

“我之所以这样问，是因为我们确以我们酒店的床而自豪。我们定期更换新床垫。这城里其他酒店没有一家像我们这样频繁地更换床垫。这一点我是了解的。据我们许多所谓的竞争对手说，我们淘汰掉的床垫，还能再多用上几年。您知道吗，瑞德先生，假如我们把五个财政年度中淘汰掉的所有旧床垫一个个立起来，头对头地纵向排列，我们就能沿着主干道，从市议会开始，顺着喷泉一路下去，绕过斯泰恩盖斯街街角，直达韦格尔先生药房，构成一条长线呢。”

“真的吗？真是了不起。”

“瑞德先生，请允许我直言相告。对您房间的安排我考虑了很多。在等您来的那些日子，自然地，我花了很长时间考虑为您安排哪个房间。大部分酒店会很简单地回答这个问题：‘店里哪个房间最好？’但在我的酒店却不是这样，瑞德先生。这些年来，这么多房间我都给予了足够的关注。有些时候我变得——哈哈！——像人们说的，着迷了，是的，对这个或者那个房间着迷了。一旦我看到某个房间的潜质，就会花几天时间深思熟虑，然后，我会细致地加以翻新，使之尽量符合我的想象。也不是每次都能成功，但很多情况下，经过一番努力之后，结果会很接近我脑中的想象；当然，这样是非常令人满足的。可是——或许是我性格上的某种缺陷使然吧——我一旦完成了一个房间的翻新，令我心满意足之后，我就会被另一个房间的潜质所吸引。不知不觉地，我发现自己把大量的时间和心思花费在了新的工程上。是的，有人称之为强迫症，但我觉得这没什么不妥。没什么比酒店按照一成不变的理念装饰一个个房间更沉闷不堪了。就我而

言，每个房间都应按照其各自的特点加以考虑。总之，瑞德先生，我的意思是酒店里没有哪间房是我最喜欢的。所以考虑再三之后，我断定现在您使用的这个房间一定最令您满意。但见到您之后，我就不那么确定了。”

“哦，不，霍夫曼先生，”我插嘴道，“现在这房间很好。”

“但自从见到您之后，从早到晚我一直断断续续在考虑这个问题，先生。我觉得，在我脑海中，您在气质上更适合另一间房。要不明早我带您去看看吧。您肯定会更喜欢的。”

“不用了，霍夫曼先生，真的。现在的房间……”

“请允许我坦白相告，瑞德先生。您的莅临，可是让您现在的这个房间首次面临真正的考验。您看，自四年前对它进行概念重建后，这个房间第一次迎来了真正尊贵的客人入住。当然，我先前无法预计到有一天您会驾临我们这里。但事实是，设计那个房间的时候，我脑海中想象的是一个与您很相似的形象。我想说的是，您看，只有现在，只有您的到来，才正好让其发挥了其本身的意义。而且，呃，我能清晰地看出四年前做了几个关键性的错误判断。太难了，以我的经验判断。不，毋庸置疑，我非常不满意。您跟这房间不合。我有个提议，先生，我们想让您搬到343，我感觉那里更适合您。在那儿，您会感到更宁静，睡得更香甜。至于您现在的房间嘛，呃，我从早到晚时断时续地在考虑，按目前的情形看，我觉得把它拆掉得了。”

“霍夫曼先生，真的，不！”

我喊出这话的时候，霍夫曼眼睛从路上挪开，诧异地盯着我。我大笑，很快地又恢复原状，说道：

“我的意思是，不用因为我这么麻烦破费。”

“我是为了自己心安啊，我向您保证，瑞德先生。酒店是我毕生的心血。但在那个房间上，却犯了一个糟糕的错误。我觉得没有其他方法，只得把它拆了。”

“霍夫曼先生，那个房间……实际上，对它，我非常有感情。我真的很满意。”

“我不明白，先生。”他看起来真的很疑惑。“那房间明显不适合您。现在我见到您本人了，就更确定了。您不用这么客气。发现您特别迷恋它，我很吃惊。”

我突然大声笑了笑，可能是夸张地大声了点。“根本没有的事。特别迷恋？”我又大笑，“只是个房间而已，仅此而已。如果需要拆掉，那就得拆掉吧！我会开开心心地搬到另一个房间的。”

“啊。很高兴您这样看。对我来说，瑞德先生，不只是在接下来您逗留的期间，而且在未来的几年里，只要一想起您曾在我酒店下榻，却要被迫忍受如此不适的房间，我就会懊丧无比。我真的不知道四年前，当时脑子里是怎么想的。完全估计错误！”

我们在黑暗里已经疾驰了一段时间了，却没有遇到其他车辆。远处，我隐约看到几间房子，可能是农舍吧，但除此之外，没什么东西穿透道路两侧空旷的漆黑。我们继续默默开了一会儿，然后霍夫曼说道：

“真是背啊，瑞德先生。那只狗，呃，虽说不小了，但再活个两三年还是容易的。准备工作一直都很顺利。”他摇了摇头。“时机太糟糕了。”然后，他扭头对我微微一笑，继续说道：“但我有信心。是的。我有信心。他现在不会受影响的，甚至这样的事情也不会影响到他。”

“或许应该再送给布罗茨基先生一只狗，权当一件礼物呗。或许给他只小狗仔。”

说这话的时候，我没多加思索，但霍夫曼却做出一副慎重考虑的样子。

“这个不好说，瑞德先生。您一定注意到了，他特别喜欢布鲁诺，几乎就这么一个伴儿，他应该仍在哀悼。但也许您是对的，既然布鲁诺走了，我们必须缓解他的孤寂。或许可以养其他的动物，能慰藉人的。比方说，一只笼中小鸟。然后，到时候，等他准备好了，再给他引荐一只狗。我也说不准。”

随后他沉默了几分钟，我猜他在想其他的事情。但突然，他盯着在我们面前延展的黑漆漆的小路时，大声嘟囔道：

“一头公牛！是的，一头公牛，一头公牛，一头公牛！”

但此时，我对布罗茨基先生的狗这整件事已心生厌烦，于是我一言未发，在座位上往后一靠，决定在行程剩下的时间里好好放松一下。过了一会儿，为了了解我们这次前去处理的一些事情，我对他说：“希望我们不会太晚。”

“不，不，正好。”霍夫曼回答，但他好像心不在焉。过了几分钟后，我听到他再次尖声嘟囔道：“一头公牛！一头公牛！”

过了一会儿，我们驶离了宽阔的马路，进入了一个舒适的住宅区。黑暗中我能看到一幢幢有独立庭院的大房子，四周往往围着高墙或者篱笆。霍夫曼小心翼翼地在林荫道上绕行着，我听到他又一次小声排练着他的台词。

我们穿过几道高高的铁门，驶入一个大公馆的庭院。已有很多车停在了庭院周围，酒店经理花了好一会儿才找到车位。然后他下车，急急忙忙地朝前门入口处奔去。

我又在座位上了待了一会儿，打量着这栋大房子，想找出一些我们将要出席的场合的线索。房子正面是长长一排几乎落地的大窗户。大部分拉着窗帘，都亮着灯，我看到屋子里的情况。

霍夫曼按响了门铃，示意我过去。我下车，大雨已经变成了毛毛细雨。我紧紧地裹着浴衣，向大房子走去，小心躲开水坑。

一位女仆打开大门，引导我们走进宽阔的门廊。门廊两边装饰着巨幅肖像。女仆似乎认识霍夫曼，她接过他的雨衣，他们快速交谈了几句。霍夫曼驻足片刻，对着镜子拉直领带，然后才带路向房子深处走去。

我们来到一个大房间，里面灯光熠熠，招待酒会正在如火如荼地进行。现场至少有一百人，个个身着时髦晚礼服，站着，举杯，相互交谈。我们站在门口，霍夫曼在我面前举起胳膊，好像要保护我，目光凝视，扫寻了一遍屋子。

“他还没到。”他终于低声道，然后扭头对我微微一笑，说：“布罗茨基先生还没到呢。但我坚信，坚信他马上就到。”

霍夫曼转身背对着房间，一时间好似不知所措。然后他说：“请您在这儿等一会儿，瑞德先生，我去找伯爵夫人过来。哦，如果您不介意，请靠后站一点——哈哈！——让别人看不到您。您还记得吧，您应是我们的大惊喜啊。请，我不会离开太久的。”

他走进房间，好一会儿，我看着他的身影在宾客中穿梭，他焦急的步态和周围欢乐的人群形成鲜明对比。我看到有几个人想跟他攀谈，但每次霍夫曼都是心不在焉地微笑一下，然后继续急忙前行。最后，他离开了我的视线，或许是想再次找到他，我向前移了几步。这

时候我定是引起了人们的注意，因为我听到身边一个声音对我说：“啊，瑞德先生，您到了。您终于来了，我们多么开心啊。”

一位约莫六十岁的胖女人把手放在我胳膊上。我笑了笑，低声客套着，她回答道：“这儿每个人都急切地想见到您。”说着，她开始坚定地领着我往人群的中心走去。

我跟着她，挤过一个个宾客，胖女人开始问我问题。起先，是些有关我健康和行程的常规问题。但之后，我们绕着房间继续前行时，她极其详细地盘问起酒店的情况。没错，她问到如斯细节——我是否对肥皂满意？我对大厅里的地毯有什么看法？——我甚至开始怀疑她是不是霍夫曼的职业竞争对手，非常恼火我住在霍夫曼的酒店里。然而，她经过人群时频频点头微笑，当中表现出的态度和礼仪让人毫不怀疑她就是主持这些活动的女主人，我断定她就是伯爵夫人。

我以为她要么会带我去屋里某个特别的地方，要么是见某个特别的人，但不一会儿，我明白了我们正在慢慢绕圈。事实上有好几次，屋里某个地方，我肯定之前我们已经走过至少两次了。让我很好奇的另一件事是，尽管很多人扭头向女主人打招呼，但她却根本无意介绍我。此外，虽然一些人不时礼貌地冲我微笑，却似乎没人对我特别感兴趣。可以确定的是，没人因我从旁经过而中止交谈。这让我有点困惑，我本来都已经下决心好好应付那些寻常却又憋闷的问题和恭维了。

又过了一会儿，我发现这整个屋里的气氛有些怪——整个欢乐的气氛有一种被迫，甚至是戏剧性的感觉——虽然我也说不上来到底是什么。之后，我们终于停了下来——伯爵夫人与两个珠光宝气的女人攀谈了起来——而我也终于有机会环顾四周，了解情况。那时，我才意识到这场合根本不是鸡尾酒会，其实这些人正在等着入席；晚宴本该至少两小时前就开始的，但伯爵夫人和她的同仁们却不得不推迟开席时间，因为不只布罗茨基先生还没到场——他是官方贵宾——还有我亦未到——晚宴上的大惊喜。我继续环顾四周，渐渐明白了我们到之前发生了什么。

眼前是迄今为止为了向布罗茨基先生表达敬意而举办的规模最大的一次晚宴，亦是至关重要的‘周四之夜’前的最后一次，这本来就不可能是件轻松的事，而布罗茨基的姗姗来迟更是让紧张气氛步步升级。不过，起初，宾客们——自诩社会精英，自视甚高——都还保持镇定，每个人都小心翼翼地避免发表一些会被理解为怀疑布罗茨基诚

信度的言论。事实上，大部分人都根本不提布罗茨基，只是没完没了地猜测着何时开席，以缓解焦虑。

接着传来了有关布罗茨基先生那只狗的消息。这消息是怎样以偶然的方式散布的并不清楚。也许是一通电话打来，某位市里的官员不明智地想缓和一下气氛，所以将此事对某些客人脱口而出。不管怎样，因焦虑和饥饿，气氛本来就够紧张的了，此消息在宾客中口口相传，结果可想而知。很快，各种流言开始在整个房间传播。布罗茨基被人发现，喝得酩酊大醉，怀抱狗的尸体。布罗茨基被人发现正躺在外面街上的水坑里，满嘴胡言乱语。布罗茨基不敌悲痛，喝煤油想要自杀。最后一条有据可循，起因是几年前的一场事故，那次布罗茨基狂饮一通后，确实因喝下过量煤油被住在附近的一位农民发现，被急匆匆地送往医院——但他是自杀未遂，还是因酒醉不醒而无意为之的，从未定论。没多久，紧随谣言而来，泄气的言语四处而起。

“对他来说，那狗就是一切。他再也不会振作了。我们得面对现实，我们现在又回到原点了。”

“我们得取消‘周四之夜’。立即取消。现在，那只会是一场灾难。如果我们继续放任下去，这城里的民众就再也不会给我们机会了。”

“那家伙一直以来都不靠谱。我们就不该让事情发展到如此地步。可我们现在该怎么办？我们输了，输了个精光，毫无希望。”

此时，正当伯爵夫人和她的同僚们企图重新掌控场面的时候，屋子中心附近的地方爆发出一阵喊叫声。

许多人冲过去看，也有一些人惊慌地躲避。原来是一位年轻的议员把一个矮胖的秃顶压倒在地，过了一会儿，大家认出，被按在地上的是兽医凯勒。人们将年轻的议员拉起身，但他仍死死地抓着凯勒的衣领不放，所以兽医也顺带着被拉了起来。

“我尽力了！”凯勒大喊，面红耳赤：“我尽力了！我还能做什么？那畜生两天前还好好的。”

“骗子！”年轻议员咆哮着，想再次发起攻击。他又一次被人拉开，但这当儿，另外一帮人发现兽医刚好是个替罪羊，便也开始向他大声嚷嚷起来。一时间，各方指责纷至沓来，指责兽医的疏忽失职，危及到了整个社会的未来。这时，一声呼喊顺势而起：“那布鲁尔的

小猫呢？你时间都花在玩桥牌上了，是你眼睁睁地让那些小猫一只只死去……”

“我每周只玩一次桥牌，即便如此……”兽医开始嘶吼着抗议，但顷刻间又被更多的声音淹没。突然间，房子里的每个人似乎都将长期忍受着的，有关他们至爱动物或其他什么委屈牢骚向凯勒发泄。之后有个人喊凯勒欠他钱，另一个说凯勒六年前借的园艺叉一直都没还。很快，这种集体声讨兽医的情绪达到了顶点，自然而然地，拉着年轻议员的那些人松开了手。之后，他即刻又一次冲身上前，但这次似是代表在场的大多数人。场面濒临失控，这时，房间另一头传来一个声音，最终将众人拉回理智。

整个房间迅速安静，似是更惊讶于说话者的身份，而非其自身的权威。众人回身注目，看到台子上那人，俯瞰一众，正是雅各布·克奈茨，他可是城里出了名的胆小鬼。雅各布·克奈茨已经四十七八岁了，在人们的记忆中，他一直在市政大厅做着呆板枯燥的文职工作。他鲜有冒险提出某种观点的做法，更别提反驳或者争辩了。他没有亲密的朋友，几年前就搬出了与其妻子和三个孩子合住的小房子，在同一条街稍远的地方租了一间阁楼。不论何时何人提起这话题，他都表示很快就会和家人团聚，但是几年过去了，情况还是没什么变化。同时，他常常自愿为一些文化活动做很多单调的组织工作，他已是城里艺术圈的一员，虽说这多多少少有点给他面子、可怜他的意思。

众人还没来得及从惊讶中反应过来，雅各布·克奈茨——也许意识到自己的勇气只能坚持这么久——就开始讲话了。

“其他城市！我指的不只是巴黎！或者斯图加特！我说的是小一点的城市，不比我们大多少的其他城市。把他们的精英公民聚集在一起，面对这样的危机，他们会怎么办？我保证他们会很冷静，他们知道做什么，怎么做。我想说的是，在座的都是我们这个城市的精英，事情还没到我们解决不了的地步。只要我们团结一心，就一定能度过这个危机。在斯图加特他们会互相争斗吗？！现在还不必惊慌失措呢。没必要放弃，或者内讧。没错，那只狗是个问题，但这并不意味着完蛋了，这还不能代表什么。不管布罗茨基先生此刻处于怎样的状况，我们都能再次将他拉回正道。只要今晚我们都扮演好自己的角色，我们就能做到。我肯定我们一定行，我们必须行。必须将他拉回正道。因为如果我们不行，如果我们不团结，今晚不能纠正一切，我告诉你们，除了痛苦我们别无所得。没错，深深的、孤独的痛苦。除了布罗茨基先生，我们没有其他人能指望，现如今舍他其谁？也许这

会儿他正在前来的路上呢。我们得保持镇静。而我们现在在干什么，起内讧？在斯图加特他们会你争我斗吗？我们得想想清楚。如果我们是他，会是何感受？我们必须表现出与他共悲伤，整个城市与他共悲痛。除此之外，朋友们，好好想想，我们必须让他振作。哦，是的！我们不能整晚都沉浸在忧愁中，不能让他走的时候觉得什么都没了，他可能又回到……不，不！要权衡得恰到好处！我们也得振作高兴起来，让他明白生活大有希望，我们还要指望他，依靠他。是的，接下来这几个小时里，我们得拨乱反正。他现在可能在路上，上帝才知道他什么状况。这接下来几个小时，非常关键，关键。我们得好好把握。否则就只剩下痛苦了。我们必须……我们必须……”

这时，雅各布·克奈茨陷入一片迷茫中。他仍站在台上，又过了几秒，他一直沉默着，无比的尴尬渐渐将他吞噬。先前情绪的余威让他最后一次对人群怒目而视，而后羞答答地走下了台。

但这番蹩脚拙劣的吁求立刻有了效果。雅各布·克奈茨话还没说完，就开始有了一些低声的赞同之音，不止一人，略带责难似的推了推那年轻议员的肩膀——这会儿，他面带愧色，站立难安。紧随雅各布·克奈茨的离台而来的是一阵尴尬的沉默。之后，渐渐地，议论声陆续在屋子里传开，人们严肃而冷静地讨论着布罗茨基先生到了该怎么办。没过多久，大家达成了共识，大概是说，雅各布·克奈茨讲的或多或少有点道理。他们的任务就是在悲伤和快乐之间求得正确的平衡。在场的每一个人都要小心地密切关注现场氛围。一种坚定意志的情绪在房间里弥漫开来，然后，适时地，人们渐渐开始放松，直到最后开始微笑，聊天，亲切地、彬彬有礼地相互问安，仿佛半个小时前那不合时宜的一幕并未发生。大约就在这时候——就在雅各布·克奈茨讲完话不到二十分钟——我和霍夫曼到了。难怪那会儿我感觉这文雅的欢声笑语下藏着一丝怪异。

我还在辗转思量来之前到底发生了什么的时，看到了屋子另一边的斯蒂芬，他正与一位年长的女士交谈。身边，伯爵夫人似乎仍专注地与两位珠光宝气的女士对话，所以，我轻声说了声失陪，就慢慢离开了。我朝他那边走的时候，斯蒂芬看到了我，朝我微微一笑。

“啊，瑞德先生。您已经到了。我在想能否把您介绍给柯林斯小姐呢。”

我随后认出了那个瘦瘦的年长女士，我们晚上早些时候还开车去过她公寓呢。她穿着朴素而高雅的黑色长裙。她微笑着伸出手，我们

互相问好。我正打算继续与她礼貌地交谈，斯蒂芬倾身过来，轻轻地说：

“我真是个笨蛋，瑞德先生。坦白说，我不知道怎么做才好。柯林斯小姐还一如往常地和蔼，但我想听听您是怎么想的。”

“你是指……布罗茨基先生的狗？”

“哦，不，不，我知道，这事儿是挺糟的。但我们一直在讨论一些别的事。我真的会很感激您的建议。事实上，柯林斯小姐刚刚还建议我问问您呢，对吧，柯林斯小姐？您瞧，我真不想拿这事儿烦您，但情况有点节外生枝。我是指我‘周四之夜’的表演。天呐，我真是个笨蛋！我说过，瑞德先生，我一直在准备让·路易斯·拉罗什的《大丽花》，但没告诉父亲。当然，现在他知道了。我一直不想告诉他，就想给他个惊喜，因为他非常喜欢拉罗什。况且，父亲做梦也想不到我能驾驭这么难的曲子，所以，我以为，从这两方面讲，对他一定会是莫大的惊喜。然而，就在最近，随着这盛大日子日益临近，我在想，再保密下去已不再现实。一方面，正式的节目单上会全部印出来，每条餐巾旁都会搁一张节目单。父亲一直在纠结节目单的设计，还要决定浮雕花样以及背面的插图等。几天前，我觉得必须得告诉他，但仍想给他个惊喜，所以一直等着合适的时机。呃，早些时候，就在我送您和鲍里斯下车后，我去了他办公室还车钥匙，他正趴在地板上看一堆文件。他跪在地上，周围地毯上都是文件，这没什么大惊小怪的，父亲常常这么工作。他的办公室很小，单是书桌就占了很大的空间，所以我得踮脚绕过去归还钥匙。他问我一切进展如何，可还没等我回答，又开始全神贯注于他的文件了。呃，不知怎的，我要离开的时候，看了一眼跪在地毯上的他，突然觉得这是个告诉他的好时机。就是一时冲动而已。于是，我很随意地告诉他：‘顺便说一下，父亲，我打算在‘周四之夜’弹奏拉罗什的《大丽花》，我想您可能想知道吧。’我并没用什么特别的口气，只是那么一说，然后等着看他的反应。嗯，他把正在阅读的文件往边上一放，但眼睛却一直盯着面前的地毯，然后一丝微笑在脸上荡漾开来，说了类似于‘啊，是啊，《大丽花》’这样的话。一时间，他看起来非常开心。他没抬头，手膝着地，但看起来非常开心。然后他闭上眼，开始哼唱这慢板的开篇，就那样在地板上开始哼唱，随着音乐摆动。他看上去是那么快乐，那么平静，瑞德先生，那当儿，我都开始恭喜自己了。然后他睁开眼睛，做梦似的抬头朝我微笑着说：‘是啊，真美。我真是不明白你母亲怎么那么讨厌它。’我刚刚还跟柯林斯小姐说呢，一开始我以为自己听错了。但之后他又重复了一遍。‘你母亲特别讨厌它。是

啊，你知道的，最近她强烈蔑视拉罗什后期的作品。她都不让我在家里放他的唱片，就算戴着耳机也不行。’这时，他一定是察觉到了我的惊愕与不安。因为——父亲历来如此！——他马上开始想让我好受些。‘我早该问你的，’他接着说道。‘全是我的错。’然后他突然拍了下脑门，好像记起了别的什么事，说：‘真的，斯蒂芬，我让你们两个都失望了。那时候我以为不干涉是对的，但现在我明白了，让你们两个都失望了。’我问他是什么意思，他解释道，母亲一直以来多么渴望听我弹奏卡赞的《玻璃激情》。很明显，她早前就向父亲透露过她想听这个，还有，呃，母亲以为父亲会全部安排妥当。但是您瞧，父亲明白我的立场。他对这些事很敏感。他明白对于一位音乐家——甚至是像我这样业余的——也想自己决定该在如此重要演出中演奏什么。所以他什么都没对我说，完完全全打算等有机会再向母亲解释一切。然而，当然——呃，我最好解释一下，瑞德先生。您瞧，我刚才说，母亲让父亲知道她想听卡赞时，我并不是说她真的亲口告诉他了。向外人解释有点困难。事情是这样的，母亲会以某种方式，您知道，以某种方式，不用直接提及，而让父亲自然而然地知道。她会暗示他，但对父亲来说却显而易见。我不确定她这次用了什么方法。也许他回到家时发现她正在听立体声音响里播放的《玻璃激情》。呃，因为她很少使用立体声音响，那么这个暗示就十分明显了。也可能是父亲洗完澡上床睡觉时，发现她正躺在床上读着一本有关卡赞的书。我不清楚，他们之间总是这样。呃，您应该也明白，父亲不会突然说：‘不，斯蒂芬应该有自己的选择。’他在等待，想找一个合适的方法回应。他当然不知道，那么多选段，我偏偏选择准备拉罗什的《大丽花》。天啊，我真是愚蠢！我之前竟然不知道母亲那么讨厌它！嗯，父亲告诉我事情原委后，我问他该怎么办，他考虑了一下说，我应该继续练习我准备的曲子，现在换已经太迟了。‘母亲不会怪你的，’他一个劲地说，‘她一点也不会怪你的。她会怪我，怪得对啊。’可怜的父亲啊，他那么努力地安慰我，但我看得出他对此是多么难过。过了一会，他盯着地毯上的一个污点——他还在地上，不过这会儿是蜷伏着，好像在做俯卧撑——他盯着地毯，我能听到他自言自语。‘我受得住，受得住。比这更糟的我都经历过。我受得住的。’他似乎已经忘了我在场，所以最后我就离开了，轻轻地关上门。自那以后——呃，瑞德先生，我整个晚上都没想什么其他事了。坦白讲，我有点困惑。没剩多少时间了。况且《玻璃激情》那么难，我怎么可能准备好？说实在的，我得说就算花一整年的时间去准备，这首曲子还是有些超出我的能力范围啊。”

年轻人停下嘴，烦恼地叹了口气。他和柯林斯小姐都没说话，过了一会儿，我料想他可能是在等我的意见。于是我说：

“当然，这不关我的事，你必须自己决定。但依我之见，目前阶段已经太迟了，你应该坚持自己准备的……”

“是啊，我猜您就会这么说，瑞德先生。”

倒是柯林斯小姐插了进来。她的语气中带了一种出乎意料的讥诮，让我不得不住口，不得不转向她。这位年长的女士正以一种了然于心、略带优越感的神情看着我。“毫无疑问，”她说，“您会把这叫做——什么来着？——啊，对了，‘艺术的完整性’。”

“也不尽然，柯林斯小姐，”我说，“只不过从实际角度出发，我倒觉得目前阶段已经太晚了……”

“但您怎么知道太晚了呢，瑞德先生？”她再一次打断我。“您对斯蒂芬的能力知之甚少，更别说了了解他目前困境的更深层的意义了。您为什么这样贸然断言，就好像您得天独厚，拥有我们其他人所欠缺的第六感呢？”

从柯林斯小姐最初打断我开始，我就觉得越来越不舒服。她说这番话的时候，我发现自己转过身去，试图逃避她的目光。我想不出任何反驳她的话，过了一会儿，我觉得还是走为上策。于是我微微一笑，慢慢离开，走进人群中。

接下来的几分钟，我漫无目的地在屋子里转悠。跟之前一样，我经过的时候，人们有时会扭头，但好像没人认出我。突然间，我看到了佩德森，就是我在电影院见过的那个人，他正与其他客人谈笑着，于是我打算上前找他。正当我准备上前时，感到什么东西碰了下我的手肘，我一扭头，发现霍夫曼站在旁边。

“很抱歉，刚才我不得不离开了一会。他们没怠慢您吧。瞧瞧这都什么事儿啊！”

酒店经理气喘吁吁，满脸是汗。

“啊，当然，我很愉快。”

“真是抱歉，刚才不得不离开去接个电话。不过他们已经在路上了，一点没错，他们已经在路上了。布罗茨基先生随时会到。谢天谢地！”他四下看了看，向我靠近了一些，压低了嗓门。“这份宾客名

单考虑不周，有欠妥当，我告诫过他们。这儿的某些人不该到场！”他摇摇头。“瞧瞧这都什么事儿啊！”

“不过，至少布罗茨基先生已经在路上了……”

“噢，是的，是的。我得说，瑞德先生，您今晚能在这儿，真是让我如释重负。正是我们需要您的时候。总体上，鉴于，呃，目前的事态，我觉得您没必要更改发言内容。可能简单提一两句这悲剧也不会出什么岔子，不过我们会安排其他人来说说这条狗的，所以呢，真的，您没必要偏离原先准备的内容。只是——哈哈——你的致辞不要太长。但是，当然啰，您是最后一位……”他笑了笑，然后没了声音。他又四下看了看屋子。“这里的某些人，”他又说道。“考虑不周，有欠妥当。我告诫过他们的。”

霍夫曼继续在屋里四下张望，而我刚好能暂时将思绪转到酒店经理提到的发言上。过了一会儿，我说道：

“霍夫曼先生，考虑到我们目前的处境，我不太确定到底该在什么时候站起来并……”

“啊，的确，的确。您太善解人意啦。一如您说的，如果在一个平常的时刻起身，人们无法知道会是什么……是啊，是啊，多么有远见啊。我会坐在布罗茨基先生旁边，所以要不您就让我来判断什么时候是最好的时机，等我的暗号。哎呀，瑞德先生，在这样的时刻，有您这样的人在我们身边真是令人欣慰啊。”

“能帮上忙我真的很高兴。”

房间另一头突然传来一阵噪声，霍夫曼转过脸去。他伸长脖子看向房间那头，但显然并没什么大不了的事。我轻轻地咳嗽了一声，以唤回他的注意力。

“霍夫曼先生，还有另一个小问题。我刚刚在想，”我指了指身上穿着的浴袍，“我想换身稍正式些的衣服。不知道能不能借一套，普普通通就行。”

霍夫曼心烦意乱地瞥了眼我的衣服，又立即转开眼神，心不在焉地说：“噢，不要担心，瑞德先生。我们这儿的人没那么呆板。”

他又一次伸长脖子看向屋子那端，我很清楚他根本没有把我的问题放在心上，正打算再次说起这个问题时，入口处附近一阵骚动。霍

夫曼跳起身，转过来，脸色苍白，冲我微笑了一下。“他来了！”他悄声说道，拍了拍我肩膀，就匆匆离开了。

房间里一下子安静了下来，有那么几秒钟，每个人都看向门口。我也想看看究竟发生了什么，但我的视线完全被挡住了。突然间，好似记起了刚刚的约定，四周的人重新继续交谈，声音带着欢乐，却也透着压抑。

我挤出人群，终于看到了布罗茨基被人引着穿过房间。伯爵夫人扶着他的一条胳膊，霍夫曼扶着另一边，还有四五个人焦急地在附近走来走去。布罗茨基显然没注意到他的随行人员，阴沉地抬头盯着华丽的屋顶。他比我想象的要高，身形要更笔直，但这会儿他动作却异常僵硬——且以一个奇怪的角度倾斜着——远远看去，他的随行人员就像转着小脚轮推着他向前。他胡子拉碴，没有刮理，但也没那么离谱，而且他的晚礼服有点歪歪扭扭，像是别人给他穿上的。他的相貌，虽粗糙而老迈，却仍残留着一丝温文尔雅的痕迹。

有那么一刻，我以为他们正把他领向我，但接着就意识到他们正走向隔壁的餐厅。一个服务员站在门边，引领他和他的随行人员进门，他们消失在视线中时，屋里一下子又安静了下来。没多久，宾客们又继续交谈，但我能感到空气中弥散着一丝新的紧张感。

这时，我注意到靠着墙，有一张椅子孤零零地立在那里。我突然觉得那是个不错的视角，或许能帮我更好地判断目前的整体气氛，然后决定晚餐时何种讲演最为合适。因而我走了过去，欣然落座，观察着这屋子。

宾客们依然在谈笑风生，但毫无疑问，潜在的紧张感继续升温。鉴于此，同时考虑到另外有人会具体讲述那条狗，我的发言保持轻快似乎是明智的，只要不轻快得离谱就行了。最终，我决定最好是讲一些妙趣横生的幕后奇闻，讲一讲我上次意大利之行中的一系列不幸插曲。这些故事我在公众场合已经讲过很多次了，我深信它们能消除紧张气氛，同时，我也肯定在眼下这样的情形中必定会博得大家赞赏。

我还在试验几句可能的开场白呢，突然注意到人已经变得稀少。这时，我这才意识到大家正鱼贯走进餐厅，于是我也站起身来。

我加入到走进餐厅的队伍时，依稀有人对我一笑，但没人跟我说话。我对此其实并不介意，因为这当儿我仍在绞尽脑汁思索一个真正引人入胜的开场白。走近餐厅门口时，我在两种开场白之间犹疑不定。第一种是：“这些年来，我的名字往往同某些品格联系在了一

起：孜孜关注细节，对表演精益求精，严格控制力度。”这一近乎自负的开头也许迅即就会被在罗马真实发生的让人哭笑不得的闹剧抢了风头。另一种选择是，一开始就抛出更为荒诞不经的话：“幕帘滑轨坍塌。老鼠被下毒。乐谱被印错。我相信，你们几乎没人会将我的大名与这些现象挂钩。”这两种开场白各有利弊，最后我决定先好好地感受一下晚宴的气氛，然后再做最终选择。

我走进餐厅，周围的人们都在兴高采烈地交谈。我立刻就被餐厅的巨大震撼了。即便现在有这么多人——有一百多号人呢——我也能明白为什么只需点亮屋中一角。众多的圆桌上铺着白色桌布，摆着餐具，但好像还有很多桌子并没有摆设，也没有配座椅，一排排地隐没在远处的黑暗里。许多宾客已经入座，整个场景——女士们珠光宝气，侍应生的夹克白白净净，清清爽爽，黑色晚礼服映衬的背景，远处的漆黑——可谓富丽堂皇。我在门口观察着这一景象，趁机平整了一下我的浴袍，就在这时，伯爵夫人出现在了我身边。她拉着我的手臂引领我，就像她之前那样，边走边说道：

“瑞德先生，我们将您安排在了这桌，这样您就不会太引人注目。我们不想让人们发现您，毁了惊喜！不过别担心，一旦我们宣布您大驾光临，而您应声起立，大家就都能真真切切地看到您，听到您。”

虽然她领我去的桌子是在一个角落里，但我就是不明白，那一桌为何比别的席位尤为不惹眼招风。她安排我坐下，然后，又笑着说了些什么——在吵闹声中我听不清——然后就匆匆走开了。

我发现同桌的还有四人——一对中年夫妇，另一对略微年轻点——他们都循例冲我笑了笑，又继续交谈。年长一对的丈夫在解释他们的儿子为什么要继续呆在美国，然后话题逐渐转移到这对夫妻的其他孩子上。时不时地，他们中的一对会象征性地记得把我纳入其中——朝我这儿看看，或者，要是讲了个笑话，就冲我微笑。但没人直接对我讲话，而我呢，也就很快放弃了跟随他们的谈话。

然后，就在侍者开始上汤时，我注意到他们话头少了起来，而且有些漫不经心。最后，在上主菜的什么时候，他们好像放下所有伪装，开始讨论真正关注的问题。他们毫不掩饰地瞥向布罗茨基就座的方向，压低声音，就这位老人的现状各抒己见。这时候，较为年轻的那个女人说道：

“当然，该有人过去告诉他我们感到多么遗憾。我们大家都该过去。好像还没有人跟他讲过一句话呢。瞧，他身边的人，几乎不和他说话。或许我们该过去，我们该来开这个头。然后其他人就会跟着去了。或许大家都像我们一样在等待呢。”

其他人忙不迭地安慰她，说主办人一切尽在掌握，说不管怎样，布罗茨基看起来很不错，但下一刻他们也忐忑不安地看向屋子那头。

我自然也趁机仔细地观察着布罗茨基。他那桌比其他桌子稍大。霍夫曼坐在他的一侧，伯爵夫人坐在另一侧。围坐着的一桌人都头发灰白，神情庄重。这帮人似乎一个劲地屏息商谈的样子，让一整桌都弥漫着一股阴谋的气息，对整体的气氛几乎毫无助益。至于布罗茨基，他并没有显露出酒醉迹象，而是不紧不慢地——还算没到狼吞虎咽的地步——吃着东西。然而，他好像是缩进了自己的世界中。在用主菜的大部分时间里，霍夫曼都把手搭在布罗茨基的背后，似乎时不时在他耳边嘀咕着什么，但老人依然阴郁地盯着空气，没有回应。伯爵夫人碰了碰他的胳膊，跟他说了一些什么，他还是没有回应。

甜点快吃完时——食物虽算不上有多美味，但也还算令人满意——我看到霍夫曼走了过来，穿过忙碌的侍者，我意识到他正朝我而来。他走到我身边，弯下腰，对着我的耳朵说：

“布罗茨基先生似乎想说几句，不过坦率讲——哈哈！——我们在劝他不要这么做。我们觉得今晚不该再让他承受额外压力了。所以，瑞德先生，可能得劳烦您仔细观察我的暗号，我一给出暗号您就马上站起来。然后，您一结束讲话，伯爵夫人立即就会结束晚宴的正式部分。是的，真的，我们觉得最好不要再让布罗茨基先生承受额外的压力了。可怜的人，哈哈！这个宾客名单，真是——”他摇了摇头，叹了口气，“谢天谢地，亏您在这儿，瑞德先生。”

我还没能开口，他就又一路躲闪着侍者们，匆匆忙忙地赶回他那桌去了。

接下来的几分钟，我观察着整个房间，思量着那两个可能的开场白哪个更合适。我还在支吾其辞，这时房间里的嘈杂声突然平息下来。我这才留意到，坐在伯爵夫人身边一个表情严肃的男人站起身来。

这位先生年事垂老，满头银发。他隐隐透出一股威严，房间里顿时鸦雀无声。好一会儿，这位一脸严峻的老者只是谴责般地 looking 这群宾客。接着他用既压抑又洪亮的声音说道：

“先生，这样一个美好、高尚的同伴离我们而去，任何，任何言语都会显得苍白。然而，我们不可能让今夜就此过去，而不代表这屋里的每个人正式对布罗茨基先生您说些什么，表达我们最深切的慰问。”房间里响起一阵低沉的附和之声，他停顿了一会儿，然后继续说道：“您的布鲁诺，先生，不仅仅被那些目睹它在我们城里兢兢业业完成自己职责的人所深爱。它所获得的地位在人类中都属罕有，更不用说在四足动物之中了。也就是说，它成了一种象征。是的，先生，它向我们垂范了某些至关重要的美德：忠心耿耿；对生活热情有加，无惧无畏；绝不被人睨视；坚持以自己特有的方式行事，哪管在高高在上的旁观者眼中这是多么怪异偏颇。也就是说，这么多年来，构筑我们这个独具一格而又引以为豪的社会的，正是这些美德。这些美德，先生，恕我冒昧地说，”他意味深长地放缓语速，“我们希望很快能在各行各业重放光彩。”

他打住话头，又朝四周看了看，继续冷冰冰地盯了观众半晌，最后终于说道：

“现在，让我们一起默哀一分钟，以悼念我们已逝的朋友。”

他垂下双眼，人们纷纷低头，沉默又一次莅临。刹那间，我抬起头，发现布罗茨基那桌的几位市里的官员——大概是急于做出表率——摆出了一种十分滑稽夸张的致哀姿态。譬如，其中有一位用双手扣住了额头。至于布罗茨基——整个演讲过程中他都一动不动，没有抬头看一眼演讲者或者整个房间——依然一动不动地坐着，而且跟之前一样，他整个姿势角度看起来都很别扭。他甚至有可能坐在椅子上睡着了，而霍夫曼放在他背后的手臂主要起着物理上的支撑作用。

一分钟结束的时候，那个满脸严肃的先生没再说什么就坐下了，导致活动安排的进程出现了尴尬的脱节。一些人又开始小心翼翼地攀谈起来，然而，另一桌有了动静，我看到一个皮肤上有斑的大个子光头男人站了起来。

“女士们，先生们，”他铿锵有力地说道。然后，他转向布罗茨基，微微弯下身轻声道：“先生。”他低头盯着自己的手看了一会儿，然后环视房间。“很多人也知道了，是我在今晚的早些时候发现了我们亲爱的朋友的尸体。因而我希望你们能给我几分钟时间说……说说事情的来龙去脉。您看，先生，”他又看了一眼布罗茨基，“事实是，我必须请求您的原谅。请让我解释一下。”大个子男人停下来，咽了口唾沫。“今晚，一如往常，我在投递。那时我几乎快送完了，还剩两三家没送，我抄近道从铁轨和斯尔德斯特斯街之间

的蜿蜒小巷走下去。我平时是不抄近道的，特别是天黑后，但今天比往日要早一些，而且您知道，还有美丽的日落，所以我就抄了近道。就在那儿，差不多走到巷子一半的地方，我看到了它。我们亲爱的朋友。它躲在一个不怎么显眼的地方，几乎隐藏在路灯柱和木篱笆之间。我在它身边跪下，确定它是真的去世了。这当儿，我脑中闪过许许多多念头。我当然想到了您，先生。想到了它对您来说是多么好的一个朋友，它的去世是个多么沉痛的损失。我也想到了我们整个城市将多么想念布鲁诺，这个城市将和您一起共悲伤。请允许我这样说，先生，我感觉，在这令人悲伤的时刻，命运交给了我一项特权。是的，先生，一项特权。命中注定是我将我们亲爱朋友的尸体送到了兽医诊所。接着，先生，接下来发生的事，我……我没有任何借口。就在刚才冯·温特斯坦先生讲话的时候，我坐在这儿，内心在纠结该不该站起来说点什么？最终，您也看到了，我下定了决心说点什么。布罗茨基先生从我口中听到总比明早听到谣言要好得多。先生，我对接下来发生的事感到极其羞愧。我只能说我不是有意的，即使再过百年也绝不会……我现在只能祈求您的原谅。过去几小时里，我脑中思索过千百遍，现在我明白了我当时应该怎么做。我应该放下我的包裹。您知道的，我还拿着两个呢，最后两个。我应该放下它们啊。它们拢在篱笆边上，在小巷里应该很安全。而且，就算有人顺手牵羊，那又怎样？但是，出于某些愚蠢的原因，或许是由于某种白痴的职业本能，我没有这么做。我当时想都没想。也就是说，我抬起布鲁诺的尸体时，依然紧紧拿着包裹。我不知道我在期待什么。但事实是——您明天就会得知，因此我现在亲口告诉您——事实是，您的布鲁诺在那儿一定是有些时辰了，因为它的身体，虽然死了却仍不失俊伟，这时已变得冰冷冰冷，而且，呃，已经僵硬了。是的，先生，僵硬了。原谅我，我现在这么说可能会让您痛苦，但是……但是请让我继续。为了能拿住我的包裹——我是多么后悔，我已经为此后悔上千次了——为了能继续拿着我的包裹，我把布鲁诺高高地扛在肩上，完全没有考虑到它已经僵硬这一状况。直到我这样快走到小巷尽头时，我才听到不知从哪里传来了小孩的呼喊声，于是便停了下来。当然，这时我才发现自己犯了个多大的错误。女士们，先生们，布罗茨基先生，我是不是需要向您全盘托出？但我非说不可。事实就是这样的。由于我们的朋友身体僵硬，由于我愚蠢地选择将它扛在肩上走，也就是说，差不多是以直立的姿势……嗯，关键是，先生，从斯尔德斯特斯街上的任意一所房子里都能透过篱笆顶端看到它的上半身。事实上，更残忍的是，那会儿正是大部分人家聚在后屋里一起吃晚饭的时候。他们可能会一边吃饭一边盯着自家的花园，也许看到我们尊贵的朋友

悄然而过，其双爪直插胸前——啊，对它来说真是羞辱啊！一户又一户人家！先生，这个场景一直在我脑中萦绕，想象着那是怎样的一幅情景。原谅我，先生，原谅我，不卸除这一……这一证明我这愚笨天性的包袱，我一刻也没法继续坐在这里啊。这样令人悲伤的特权降临到如我这种笨蛋身上是多么的不幸啊！布罗茨基先生，我为您那尊贵的伙伴在离世后不久即遭受侮辱而致歉。求您啦，求您接受我徒劳无望、不足挂齿的歉意。还有斯尔德斯特斯善良的人们，或许他们中有些人现在就在这儿，他们像其他人一样深深地喜爱布鲁诺。他们最后一次见布鲁诺，竟然是以这样一种方式……我请求您，先生，在座的每一个人，我请求您，请求您的原谅。”

大块头坐了下来，哀伤地摇着头。接着他旁边那桌的一位女士站了起来，用手帕擦拭着眼睛。

“毫无疑问，”她说。“它是这个时代最伟大的狗，毫无疑问。”

房间里响起了一片赞同之声。布罗茨基那一桌的市官员起劲地点头，但布罗茨基仍然没有抬头。

我们等着这位女士继续说下去，但她虽然还站着，却什么都没说，只是继续抽泣，轻轻地擦着眼睛。过了一会儿，她旁边一个穿着天鹅绒晚礼服的男士站起来，轻轻地把她扶回座位，而他自己则继续站着，用指责的眼神扫视了一下房间，然后说道：

“一尊塑像，一尊铜塑像。我提议为布鲁诺竖一尊铜塑像以永远纪念它。一尊巨大而庄重的塑像。要不就立在沃赛尔特拉斯吧。冯·温特斯坦先生。”他对那个一脸严肃的先生说，“我们现在就下定决心，就在今晚，为布鲁诺建造一尊塑像吧！”

有人在大叫“说得好极了，说得好极了”，喧哗声四下而起，表示赞同。不仅仅是那位一脸严峻的先生，还有坐在布罗茨基那一桌的所有市官员，都顿时显出困惑的神情。交换了几个慌乱的眼神后，满脸严肃的男人坐着说道：

“当然了，哈勒先生，这件事我们会慎重考虑的，当然还会考虑其他主意，看看怎样最好地纪念……”

“这实在太离谱了！”一个男人的声音突然从房间的另一头插了进来。“多么荒唐的主意。为那条狗建一座塑像？要是那畜生配立一座铜塑像，那我们的乌龟，佩特拉，她就配建一个五倍之大的塑像。

她死得那么惨。这太荒唐了。而且那只狗今年早些时候还攻击过拉恩夫人……”

他其余的话被房间里四下响起的嚷嚷声淹没了。一时间，好像所有人都在同时大声喊叫。刚才说话的那个男人，还站在那儿，现在转过身对着自己桌上的某人，开始激烈地争论。在这不断升级的混乱中，我意识到霍夫曼正在朝我挥手。或者更确切地说，他正用手比划着一个奇怪的画圈动作——就好像在擦一块隐形玻璃——我隐约想起这是他喜欢的某种打信号的方式。我站了起来，用力清了清嗓子。

房间几乎立刻安静了下来，所有眼睛都盯视着我。刚才反对立塑像的那个男人停止争吵，匆匆坐下。我重新清了嗓子，正准备开讲，就在这时，我突然注意到我的浴袍大开，我裸露的前身一览无遗。我脑袋一片混乱，略一犹豫就又坐了回去。几乎同时，屋子另一边的一位女士站起身来，尖声说道：

“如果建个塑像不现实的话，那何不以它的名字来命名一条街呢？我们经常改街名来纪念逝者。毫无疑问，冯·温特斯坦先生，这要求并不过分。或许可以改改迈因哈德斯特拉斯街，或者甚至雅恩斯特拉斯街也行。”

赞同声骤然响起，顿时人们异口同声叫喊起其他可以改名的街道。诸位市官员又一次面露难色。

我邻桌一个身材高大、满脸胡须的男人站了起来，用他雷鸣般的声音说道：“我同意霍兰德先生的意见。这太离谱了。我们大家当然为布罗茨基感到难过。但老实说吧，那只狗是个祸害，殃及其他狗，同样也威胁人类。不过，要是布罗茨基先生当初想到经常给它梳理毛发，为它治疗它显然已患了多年的皮肤感染……”

这人的话被暴风般袭来的愤怒抗议之声吞没了。“可耻！”“羞辱！”此等叫喊声此起彼伏；有几位离开了座位，要来教训这个冒犯者。霍夫曼又在对我打信号了，他狂怒地在空中比划着，脸上带着可怖的狞笑。我听到胡子男人的声音在一片混乱中隆隆响起：“我说的是事实。这畜生招事生非，可恶极了。”

我检查了一下我的浴袍，确定它牢牢系紧了，正准备再次站起来，这时看到布罗茨基突然动了动，然后站了起来。

他站起来的时候桌子发出了一声响，所有人都扭头转向了他。顷刻间，已离座的人们纷纷坐了回去。沉默又一次驾临。

刹那间我以为布罗茨基会摔倒在桌上。但他保持住了平衡，四下观察了一阵。他开口时嗓音有点嘶哑。

“瞧瞧，这算怎么回事？”他说。“你们以为那条狗对我这么重要？它死了就死了嘛。我想要个女人，有时候会觉得孤单。我想要个女人。”他打住话头，有那么一会儿他好像沉醉在自己的思绪中。接着他梦呓般地说道：“我们的水手们。我们醉醺醺的水手们。他们现在怎么样了？她那时候还年轻，那么年轻，那么漂亮。”他随即又飘回到了自己的思绪中，抬起双眼盯着高高的天花板上垂悬的电灯，我又一次觉得他要向前摔倒在桌子上。霍夫曼一定也在担心同样的事，他站了起来，轻轻地把手放在布罗茨基背后，在他耳边轻声说了些什么。布罗茨基没有马上回应。接着他低声喃喃道：“她曾经爱过我。爱我胜过一切。我们醉醺醺的水手们。他们现在何方？”

霍夫曼开怀大笑，仿佛布罗茨基说了什么睿语妙言。他朝房间咧嘴一笑，然后又对布罗茨基耳语了一番。布罗茨基好像终于想起自己现在置身何处，恍惚中转向酒店经理，任由他连哄带骗着坐回了座位。

接下来是一阵安静，没人动弹。伯爵夫人笑容可掬地站了起来。

“女士们，先生们，今晚此时此刻，我们有一个美好的惊喜！他今天下午才到，想必很累了，然而他还是答应了做我们的特别嘉宾！是的，大家欢迎！瑞德先生就在我们之中！”

房间里爆发出阵阵激动的喝彩声，此时伯爵夫人一个盛情邀请的手势指向了我。我还没来得及反应，我这桌的人已迅速地将我团团包围，都想和我握手。霎时，我意识到了周围全都是人，兴奋地喘息着，伸出双手和我打招呼。对这些亲密表示，我尽可能礼貌地回应，可是扭头一望——我还没机会从椅子上站起来呢——我看到身后聚集了一大群人，踮脚站着，推搡着。我明白必须控制这场面，以免它崩溃混乱。既然已经有那么多人站立着，我觉得最好的办法就是站在某个台座上面，以占领制高点。很快地确认了下我的衣服已牢牢系紧，我爬上了椅子。

喧闹声立刻平息下来，人们僵在那儿定睛看着我。从这一新的有利视角望去，我看到此刻过半宾客已离开桌子，于是我决定毫不迟疑立刻开讲。

“幕帘滑轨坍塌！老鼠被下毒！乐谱被印错！”

我注意到一个人穿过静止簇拥的人群向我走来。走到我身边时，柯林斯小姐从邻桌拉过一把椅子，坐了下来，盯着我。她这副样子足以让我分神，一时间，我竟想不出接下来该说什么。瞧着我犹豫的样子，她将一条腿跷在另一条上，关切地问道：

“瑞德先生，您感觉不舒服吗？”

“我挺好的，谢谢，柯林斯小姐。”

“我衷心希望，”她继续说，“您不要将我之前说的话太放在心上。我是想来找您道歉的，但到处都找不到您。我可能说了什么伤人感情的话。我真心希望您能原谅我。只是就算过去这么多年了，每次遇到您这个职业的人，往事就突然涌上心头，自己不知不觉就那种腔调了。”

“没关系，柯林斯小姐，”我轻声道，居高临下冲她微微一笑。“请别担心。说实在的，刚才我根本没在意。如果我离开得很唐突，那只是因为，我想您或许想和斯蒂芬单独说说话。”

“您这样善解人意真是太好了，”柯林斯小姐说道，“真的抱歉我先前有些生气了。但您得相信我，瑞德先生，对我来说，并不只是生气。我确实真心希望能帮您什么。看到您一次又一次地犯同样的错误我会很难过的。现在既然看见您了，我想对您说很欢迎您哪天下午来我家喝下午茶。我会非常乐意和您聊聊，随便什么问题都可以。我会洗耳恭听的，我向您保证。”

“您太客气了，柯林斯小姐。我相信您是好意。但请允许我这样说，好像您过去的经历使得您——正如您自己所言——对于我这种职业的人并未留下什么好印象。我不知道您对我的造访是否会感到开心。”

闻此，柯林斯小姐似乎若有所思。然后她说道：“我能理解您的担忧。但是我觉得我们完全能够客客气气地相处。您要是不想呆太长时间，短短的一次来访也成。如果您觉得会面不错，以后您可以随时过来嘛。或许我们甚至还可以一起散散步呢。斯登堡花园离我公寓很近。瑞德先生，多年来我不断回忆过去，现在真的已经准备好将其抛至身后了。我多么想向您这样的人再次伸出援手。当然了，我不能保证能回答您所有问题。但我会洗耳恭听。而且您可放心，我绝不会像某些缺乏经验的人那一样将您理想化或使您感伤连连。”

“我会慎重考虑您的邀请的，柯林斯小姐，”我对她说，“不过我不由地想，您显然已把我误认为别的什么人了。我之所以这么说，是因为，这个世界上似乎有太多自称为这样或那样天才的人，可其实呢，这些人只不过以生活毫无条理而引人瞩目。但不知何故，总有一批像您这样的人，柯林斯小姐——非常善意的人——乐于挺身而出救助这些人。这么说可能有点大言不惭，但我可以告诉您，我并不是那样的人。事实上，我可以自信地说，此时此刻我不需要任何救助。”

柯林斯小姐不住地摇头。闻此，她说：“瑞德先生，如果您屡屡犯错，我真的会非常难过。而且，想到我一直在这儿，只是眼睁睁地看着您却毫无作为，我难过啊。我真的认为以您目前的处境，我能给您一些帮助。当然了，我和里奥在一起时，”她隐隐地向布罗茨基挥了挥手，“我还太年轻，知道得并不多，我真的看不透当时发生了什么。但如今，许多年过去了，我可以思量一切了。听说您要来我们这儿时，我就告诉自己，这正是我学会容忍苦楚的时机。我已经老了，但我的生命还远没有结束。人生中的是是非非，我已经有了透彻的了解，十分透彻的了解，而这并不太晚，我应当尽我所能将其付诸所用。正是本着这样的精神，我才邀请您来访的，瑞德先生。我为我们之前见面时的粗暴无礼再次向您道歉。我保证，这样的事不会再发生了。拜托，答应我您会来的。”

在她说话的当儿，她家中起居室的景象——温馨柔和的灯光，破旧的天鹅绒窗帘，破破烂烂的家具——在我面前晃动，刹那间，我多么想斜倚在她的沙发上，远离生活的种种压力，这一念头仿佛特别诱人。我深呼吸，叹了口气。

“我会记得您善意的邀请，柯林斯小姐，”我说道，“但此时，我得先上床休息一会儿。您得理解，几个月来，我一直在旅行。到了这儿后，几乎没有片刻停顿。我实在太累了。”

我说这些时，所有疲惫感都回来了。我眼下的皮肤感到很痒，我用手掌揉了揉脸。我还在揉脸时，突然感觉有人碰了下我的手肘，一个声音轻声说道：

“我和您一起走回去，瑞德先生。”

斯蒂芬伸出手来帮我从椅子上下来。我一只手斜倚在他肩上，爬了下来。

“我现在也很累，”斯蒂芬说，“我和您一起走回去。”

“走回去？”

“是的，我打算在这儿睡一晚。我要值早班的时候常这么做。”

一时间，他的话让我百思不得其解。然而，当我的视线穿过那一簇簇或站或坐的晚宴宾客，掠过一个个侍者和一张张桌子，看向这巨室的隐藏黑暗之处时，我突然意识到我们正在酒店的中庭。我早前之所以没认出来，是因为白天早些时候我是从另一头进来观察这地方的。远处黑暗中的某个地方，应该是我先前喝咖啡并且筹划这一天安排的吧台。

然而，我没来得及细想我的发现，斯蒂芬便领着我离开，出奇地坚持己见。

“我们回去吧，瑞德先生。而且，我有些事想跟您说。”

“晚安，瑞德先生。”柯林斯小姐在我们走过她身旁时说道。

我回头向她道晚安，若非斯蒂芬继续领着我离开，也不至如此仓促无礼。确实，我们走过时，我听到各个方向都有人跟我道晚安，我虽尽力向他们含笑挥手，但知道自己并没有优雅得体地退场。而斯蒂芬呢，显然忧心忡忡，我还在回头跟大家道晚安，他拽着我的胳膊，说：

“瑞德先生，我一直在想。或许现在我自视过高了，但我真的认为我该尝试一下卡赞。我记得您之前给我的建议，坚持自己已经准备好的。但真的，我一直在想，我觉得我或许能征服《玻璃激情》。我真的相信，现如今，这是我力所能及的。真正的问题是时间。但是如果我真的着手去做，努力去做，夜以继日地练，我想我是可以做好的。”

我们走进了中庭的暗处。斯蒂芬的鞋跟嗒嗒作响，在一片空旷中回荡，与我拖鞋的“啪嗒啪嗒”声对应相和。在昏暗中，我能分辨出，我们右边某处，是灰白的大理石大喷泉，此刻它一片沉寂。

“我知道这跟我无关，”我说，“但是，如果我是你，我会继续坚持原先准备的曲目。这是你自己选择的啊，不至于差到哪里去。无论如何，在我看来，在最后一刻改变曲目总是不大好的……”

“但是瑞德先生，您不完全明白。是我母亲。她……”

“我了解你以前跟我说的一切。就像我说的，我不想干涉。但是，恕我冒昧，我认为人的一生中总会有某个时刻，需要坚守自己的

决定。一个说‘这就是我，这就是我的选择’的时刻。”

“瑞德先生，我很感激您所说的。但是我认为也许您只是这样说而已——我知道您对我的建议是出于好意——但我认为您只是这样说说罢了，因为您不相信像我这样的业余人士能很好地演绎卡赞，尤其是现在时间这么赶。可是，您看，我整顿晚饭都在苦苦思量，我真的相信……”

“真的，你误解我了。”我说，对他感到一丝不耐烦。“你真的误解我的意思了。我刚才说的是你应该有自己的主张。”

但是年轻人似乎并没有在听。“瑞德先生，”他继续说，“我知道现在已非常晚了，您也很累了。但是我在想，您是否能给我几分钟时间，比如，哪怕十五分钟。我们现在可去休息室，我来给您演奏一段卡赞，不是全部，只是一段。然后您就可以给我提提建议，看看我有没有一点可能赶在‘周四之夜’前准备好。哦，不好意思。”

我们走到了中庭远处的尽头，在黑暗中停了下来，斯蒂芬打开了通往走廊的门。我回头一看，发现我们晚宴的地方看起来不过是黑暗中的一泓闪闪点点的小水池。宾客们好像又坐了下来，我看见侍者们端着托盘来回穿梭的身影。

走廊的光线十分昏暗，斯蒂芬锁上我们背后通往中庭的门，我们并肩走着，默默无语。过了一会儿，年轻人望了我几次之后，我突然想到他是在等我的决定。我叹了口气，说：

“我当然愿意帮你，很同情你目前的处境。只是现在太晚了，而且……”

“瑞德先生，我知道您很累了。我能提个建议吗？不如我自己进休息室而您站在门外听着。而后您听够了，足以给出意见，您就可以悄悄地去睡了。当然，我不会知道您是否还站在那里，所以我会鼓足干劲，尽力演奏，直至结束——这正是我需要的。您可以在明天清晨告诉我，我在‘周四之夜’是否有一点儿机会。”

我想了想。“好吧，”我终于说道，“我觉得你的提议非常合情合理。很方便地满足了我们双方的需要。非常好，我们就按照你说的做。”

“瑞德先生，您太好了。您都不知道这对我是何等的帮助。我可是因为这个一直饱受煎熬啊。”

年轻人很激动，加快了步伐。走廊转角变得很幽暗，我们匆匆前行，我不止一次伸出手去，生怕自己一头撞向两边的墙。走廊尽头有一丝光线，从通向酒店大堂的玻璃门透过来，除此之外，好像没有丝毫光亮。我正盘算着下次见到霍夫曼要向他提提这个问题，这时，斯蒂芬说：“哈，我们到了。”我停了下来，这时才觉察到我们正站在休息室门口。

斯蒂芬拿出更多的钥匙拨弄了一阵，门终于开了；门那头，一片漆黑，伸手不见五指。而年轻人却急切地走进房间，然后探出头来。

“您不介意给我一小会时间找乐谱吧，”他说，“应该在钢琴凳附近，不过这里太乱了。”

“别担心，没构思好清晰的意见之前，我是不会走的。”

“瑞德先生，您太好了。呃，我会很快。”

门嘎嘎地关上了，沉寂了几分钟。我仍站在黑暗中，不时地看看走廊尽头和来自大堂的光线。

终于，斯蒂芬开始弹奏《玻璃激情》的开篇乐章。听完头几个小节之后，我发现自己听得越来越用心。很明显，年轻人对这首曲子的熟悉度远远不够，然而，在迟疑和刻板之下，我能觉察出其融汇独创性与微妙情感的想象力，这让我很是吃惊。即便以目前粗糙的形式，年轻人对卡赞的解读似乎也开启了一些新的方向，这是绝大多数演绎所欠缺的。

我倾身向前，贴近房门，竖起耳朵捕捉他每一个踌躇的细微差别。但随后，接近乐章的尾声，疲惫突然席卷了我，我才记起现在很晚了。我忽然发觉没有必要再听下去了——只要时间充裕，演奏卡赞明显是他力所能及的——我开始慢慢地朝大堂的方向走去。

第二部

第十一章

床头柜上的电话响了，我被铃声吵醒，第一反应就是，我只睡了几分钟就又有人来打扰。但随后，我看到天空已亮，便知道现在已是清晨。我拿起听筒，突然没由来的担心自己是否睡过头了。

“啊，瑞德先生，”霍夫曼的声音传了过来，“希望您睡了个好觉。”

“谢谢您，霍夫曼先生，我睡得很好。当然了，我正要起床。今天会是非常忙碌的一天。”我笑了笑，“是时候开始啦。”

“没错，先生，今天您面对的，将会是非常忙碌的一天啊！我非常理解在今晨此刻，您想要尽量养精蓄锐。非常明智，请允许我这么说。尤其昨晚您是如此卖力。啊，多么美妙诙谐的演讲呀！今早举城上下谈论的全都是您！不管怎么说，瑞德先生，我知道这时候您大约该起床了，觉得还是给您挂个电话，告诉您这个情况为好。我很高兴通知您343号房已经完全准备好了。我建议您立刻入住，好吗？如果您不反对的话，您的物品会在您用早餐时由我们搬送至343号房。我确定343号房间会比您现在的房间更令人满意。我再次郑重地为这次失误道歉。犯下这样的失误，我很痛心啊。但我想我昨晚已做过解释了，有时这些事情是很难拿捏的。”

“是的，是的，我非常理解。”我环视房间，感到一阵绝望的悲伤开始吞噬我。“但霍夫曼先生，”我努力控制着声音，“有一点小麻烦。我孩子，鲍里斯，他现在跟我一起在这酒店，而且……”

“哦，好的，也非常欢迎这小伙子。我已经了解过情况，并且已经把他换到了您隔壁的342号房。事实上，古斯塔夫今晨早些时候给他换过房间了，所以您一点也不用担心。那么，用完早饭后请您回343号房。您会发现所有物品全都在那儿了。就在您现在房间的正上方，我相信那房间会更合您口味。但当然，如果您不满意，请即刻告诉我。”

我谢过他，放下听筒，然后爬下床，再次环顾四周，深吸了一口气。我的房间沐浴在晨光中，并没什么特别之处——不过是个普通的酒店房间而已——我突然意识到我对这里的确表现出了不合时宜的依恋。然而，我洗澡，穿衣，又发现自己情绪渐渐激动起来。突然间，

我想到，下楼吃早饭前，在开始所有事之前，我该先去看看鲍里斯是否一切安好。说不定他此刻正一脸迷茫地坐在新房间里呢。我迅速穿好衣服，最后回身看了一眼，出了房间。

我沿着三楼的走廊搜寻342号房，这时，我听到了一阵声响，看到鲍里斯从远远的一头向我跑来。他奔跑的动作很奇怪，我一看到他就立刻停下了脚步。看到他双手摆出驾驶的动作，我猜他是在扮演飙车的人。他粗暴地向右边的隐形乘客低声咕哝着，“呼”地疾驰而过，根本没有留意到我。走廊的远处有扇门半开着，鲍里斯跑向那儿，喊道：“小心！”然后急转弯进了那间房。从里面传来鲍里斯模仿撞到什么东西上的声音。我走向那扇门，经查验确认是342号房，走了进去。

我发现鲍里斯正仰面躺在床上，双脚跷在空中。

“鲍里斯，”我说，“你不应该那样嚷嚷着到处跑。这里是酒店。大家说不定还在睡觉呢。”

“睡觉！都这时候了！”

我关上身后的门。“你不该制造噪音。会有人投诉的。”

“谁要是投诉，那他就倒大霉了。我让外公去对付他们。”

他双脚仍跷在空中，这时候，他开始懒洋洋地互拍着他的两只鞋。我坐了下来，看了他一会儿。

“鲍里斯，我得跟你聊聊。我的意思是，我们必须得谈谈了，我们两个。这对我们彼此都好。你肯定有不少疑问。关于这一切。为什么我们会在这酒店。”

我打住话头，看看他是否想说些什么。鲍里斯继续互拍着悬在空中的双脚。

“鲍里斯，目前为止你都很有耐心，”我继续道，“但我知道你有各种各样的问题要问。很抱歉我总是太忙，不能坐下来跟你好好谈谈这些问题。昨晚的事很抱歉，对你对我而言都挺让人失望的。鲍里斯，你肯定有非常多的问题，有些问题的答案不会简单，但是我一定尽力回答。”

不知何故，我说这话的时候——也许是与之前的房间有关，也许想到了我如今可能要与它永别了——一股强烈的失落感油然而生，使得我不得不停下来。鲍里斯继续拍打着他的双脚好一会儿。然后他

好像是累了，将双腿“扑通”一声砸落在床上。我清了清嗓子，接着说道：

“那么鲍里斯，我们从哪儿开始呢？”

“太阳战士！”鲍里斯突然尖叫，然后大声唱起某个主题曲的开头几段。他边唱边滚落在地上，消失在床和墙壁间的空隙中。

“鲍里斯，我可是认真的，看在上帝的分上，我们得谈谈这些事。鲍里斯，求你了，从那儿出来吧。”

没有回应。我叹了口气，站起身来。

“鲍里斯，希望你知道，无论何时你想问我任何事，你都可以问。不管我在做什么都会停下来，跟你谈。即便我正和非常重要的人在一起，我想要你明白，他们对我来说都不能与你相提并论。鲍里斯，你听到了吗？鲍里斯，从那里出来吧。”

“不行，我动不了。”

“鲍里斯，求你了。”

“我动不了。我断了三根椎骨。”

“好吧，鲍里斯。要不等你感觉好些了我们再谈。我现在要下楼吃点早饭了。鲍里斯，听着，如果你愿意，吃过早饭后，我们可以回旧公寓。你要想去，我们就去。那样，我们可以去拿那盒子。那个装有九号的盒子。”

仍旧没有回应。我又等了一会儿，然后说：“好吧，考虑考虑，鲍里斯。我现在下楼去吃早饭了。”

说着，我离开了房间，轻轻带上门。

我被带进了大堂隔壁一个阳光满溢的狭长房间。大大的窗户似乎直面街道，与人行道齐平，但为了留些私人空间，下部的窗格上装了磨砂玻璃，窗外的车流之声也只是隐约可闻。高大的棕榈树和天花板上的风扇给这个地方增添了一种淡淡的异国情调。桌子排成了两长排，侍者带我走过中间的过道，我发现大部分桌子都收拾干净了。

侍者安排我坐在靠后的座位，给我倒了些咖啡。他走后，我看到宾客寥寥无几，只有一对坐在门口说着西班牙语的夫妇，以及一位与我几桌之隔、正在读报的老人。我猜想我大概是最后一个下来吃早饭

的客人吧，但继而一想，自己刚刚度过了一个格外费力的夜晚，没有任何理由感到内疚。

恰恰相反，我坐着，看到棕榈树在旋转的电风扇下轻轻摇动，一种满足感涌上心头。毕竟，我有足够的理由感到满足，我来之后，如此短时间内就有如此收获。自然，对于当地的这场危机来说，还有很多不明朗，甚至神秘的地方。可是，我到这里还不到二十四小时呀，问题的答案必将在不久以后显现。比方说，今天晚些时候，我会去拜访伯爵夫人，届时我不止有机会听布罗茨基的留声机唱片，重温他的作品，还要与伯爵夫人以及市长一起详细探讨这场危机。随后就是与市民会面，他们是受目前问题影响最直接的人——其重要性在前一天我就已经跟斯达特曼小姐强调过了——还有就是和克里斯托弗本人的见面。换句话说，有几个很重要的约会还等着我呢，所以，在这一阶段试图得出实质性的结论，或者甚至开始考虑给我的演讲词定稿，都是毫无意义的。眼下，我有权对自己已获取的信息量感到满足，当然可以在吃早餐时纵情享受几分钟的身心舒畅。

侍者端回来一些冷盘肉、奶酪和一篮新鲜的面包卷。我一边不紧不慢地吃着，一边往杯子里倒着浓咖啡，一次只倒一点。斯蒂芬·霍夫曼终于出现的时候，我正沉浸在近乎平静的情绪中。

“早上好，瑞德先生，”年轻人说，微笑着向我走来。“我听说您刚下来。我不想打扰您用早餐，所以不会待太久。”

他在我桌边徘徊，脸上依旧挂着微笑，显然是在等我发话。此时，我才想起我们前一晚的约定。

“哦，是的，”我说，“卡赞，啊，是的。”我放下黄油刀看着他。“当然是钢琴曲中最难的曲目之一。由于你刚刚开始练习，听到些粗糙之处也是意料之中的事。其他没什么问题，就是有些粗糙的地方。那曲子，除了花时间练习也没什么其他办法了。要花很多时间啊。”

我又停下来。斯蒂芬脸上的微笑褪去了。

“但总体上讲，”我继续道，“这话我并不是随便说说的，我认为你昨晚的演奏显示出了非凡的潜力。只要时间充足，即便那么难的曲子，我确信你都可以演绎得很好。当然问题是……”

但是年轻人没再听下去。他向我走近了一步说：

“瑞德先生，说白了吧。您是说只要练习就够了吗？这曲子我能掌控？”突然间，斯蒂芬的脸扭曲了，他弯下腰，一拳捶在抬起的膝盖上。随后他站直，深吸了口气，眉开眼笑。“瑞德先生，您都不知道，不会知道这对我来说意味着什么。我知道这听起来不太谦虚，但跟您说吧，我一直都知道，在内心深处，我一直都觉得我能演奏好。但是听到您这么说，尤其是您，我的上帝，这是无价之言啊！昨晚，瑞德先生，我一遍又一遍地弹。每当疲倦席卷而来时，每当我意欲停下时，内心总有个声音说：‘等等，瑞德先生可能还在外面。他可能还要多听一点才能做出评断。’然后我就会更加投入，投入所有，继续不停。大概两小时前，我弹完时，不瞒你说，我真的走到了门口向外偷看。当然，我发现您已经去睡了——完全可以理解。但您能待那么久，真是太好了。我只希望您不要因我牺牲太多睡眠。”

“哦，没有，没有。我在门口待了……一阵儿。足够做出评断了。”

“您真是太好了，瑞德先生。今早我感觉自己换了个人似的。我生命中的乌云已烟消云散了！”

“听着，你千万不要误会。我是说这曲子在你能力范围内。但是你是否剩有足够的时间来……”

“我一定会确保自己有充足的时间。我一定会抓紧每一个机会练琴。我会废寝忘食。您别担心，瑞德先生。明晚我父母会为我骄傲的。”

“明晚？哦，是的……”

“哦，我一直自顾自地说自己，太自私了，我甚至还没说起您昨晚多么引起轰动。我是说在晚宴时。每个人都在谈论昨晚，全城皆是。真是精彩绝伦的演讲。”

“谢谢你。我很高兴大家喜欢。”

“我敢肯定，这对营造随后的气氛大为有益呀。是的，很显然——这真的是好消息，我本该即刻向您汇报的——正如您所见，柯林斯小姐昨晚露面了。呃，很显然，她在告辞时，他们——她和布罗茨基先生——相视一笑。是的，真的！很多人都看到了。父亲亲眼目睹了。他一直都没有刻意要让他们直接接触，他一直都很谨慎，不想进展太快，尤其是柯林斯小姐还在考虑动物园的事。但恰恰就是她要告辞的时候。显然布罗茨基先生注意到了她要离开，于是站起身

来。他一整晚都坐在桌旁，即便到那会儿大家都像往常一样自在地转悠。但布罗茨基先生站起身来，视线越过房间望向门口，只见柯林斯小姐正和几位客人道晚安。其中有位先生，我想是韦伯先生吧，正护送她出去，但此时可能是某种直觉吧，总之，她回头望了望房间，当然就看到了布罗茨基先生站在那儿注视着她。这一切父亲尽收眼底，其他好几位也都看到了，房间顿时安静了不少；父亲说，他当时着实以为，她会还他一个冷酷、怨恨的眼神，因为她的脸已准备就绪，仿佛即刻就开弓。但最后一刻，她莞尔一笑。是的，她给了布罗茨基先生一个微笑！然后就出去了。布罗茨基先生呢，呃，您可以想象到，这对他来说意味着什么。想象一下吧，都过了这么多年了！我刚刚见过父亲，据他说，布罗茨基先生今早精神抖擞，活力焕发。他已经在钢琴旁演练了一小时啦！正好我弹完了钢琴空了出来！父亲说他今早有些不同，当然不是说有任何迹象显示他要喝一杯。这对父亲以及所有人来说都是一个胜利的消息，但我肯定您的演讲对这一切居功至伟。我们还在等柯林斯小姐的回音，我是说去动物园的事，但是经过昨晚的事，我们没法不乐观。今早是一个多么美好的清晨啊！好吧，瑞德先生，我不再耽误您的时间了，您肯定想用完早餐。我只是想再次跟您道谢，感谢您所做的一切。我相信白天我们还能碰到，我会向您汇报卡赞一曲的进展。”

我祝他好运，目送他坚定地大步离开了房间。

与这位年轻人的碰面让我倍感满足。接下来几分钟，我继续悠闲地吃着早饭，尤其享受当地黄油的新鲜口感。这时，侍者又端着一壶咖啡出现，然后又离开了。过了一会儿，不知为何，我发现自己回想起在飞机上坐我旁边的人曾经问我的一个问题的答案。三对兄弟曾一起踢入世界杯决赛，他说。我能记起他们是谁吗？我编了个借口继续看书，不想被拉入谈话中。但自那以后，每到像现在这样的场合，当我发现自己可以独自呆上少有的几分钟时，我就发觉那人的问题又会在脑中萦绕。恼人的是，这些年来，我有时能清楚地记得那三对兄弟的名字，但有时会发现，自己不是忘了这一对就是那一对的名字。今早也是这样。我记得查尔顿兄弟在1966年的决赛中为英格兰效力，凡·达科考夫兄弟在1978年为荷兰效力。但我无论怎样想，就是记不起第三对的名字。过了一会儿，我开始异常烦躁起来，有那么一刻，我甚至横下心：不记起那第三对兄弟的名字，我就决不离开早餐桌，也决不开始践行今天的诺约。

我从白日梦中清醒过来，发现鲍里斯进了房间，向我走来。他走得很慢，冷漠地挪步走过一张张空桌子，好像靠近我只是偶然而已。

他回避看我，甚至走到我临桌时，还在那里磨蹭，手指拨弄着桌布，背对着我。

“鲍里斯，吃过早饭了吗？”我问。

他继续拨弄着桌布，然后以一种“吃不吃都无所谓”的腔调问我：

“我们要去旧公寓吗？”

“如果你想的话。我保证，只要你想去，我们就去。你想去吗，鲍里斯？”

“你没有工作要做吗？”

“有的，但我可以晚些做呀。如果你想，我们就去老房子。但是如果要去的话，我们就得马上出发。正如你所说，我今天会忙得不可开交。”

鲍里斯好像在考虑。他继续背对我，拨弄着桌布。

“那么，鲍里斯？可以出发了吗？”

“九号会在那里吗？”

“我想应该是的，”想着我该采取主动，我站起身来，把餐巾扔在盘子边。“鲍里斯，我们立刻出发吧。外面好像是个艳阳天。我们都不用上去拿外套了，立刻出发。”

鲍里斯仍然一脸犹豫，我圈起他的肩膀，然后带他离开了早餐室。

我和鲍里斯穿过大堂时，注意到前台接待员在向我招手。

“瑞德先生，”他说，“那些记者之前又来了。我觉得最好暂时先让他们离开，建议他们一小时之后再来试试。别担心，他们非常配合。”

我沉思片刻，然后说：“太不凑巧了，我现在有件很重要的事。或许你可以请那帮先生通过斯达特曼小姐安排一个合适的时间。现在不好意思，我们得走了。”

我们走出酒店，站在阳光明媚的人行道上，这时，我才发现自己不记得去旧公寓的路了。我看了一会儿面前缓慢行驶的车辆，然后鲍

里斯好像感觉到了我的难处，说道：“我们可以坐有轨电车。就在消防站外面。”

“那太好了。好吧，鲍里斯，你来带路。”

车辆轰轰而过，随后的几分钟，我们几乎没有说话。走在狭窄拥挤的人行道上，我们躲闪着，穿过两条繁忙的小街，然后走上一条宽阔的大道，那儿有电车轨道和几条慢车道。这里人行道更为宽阔，我们更自由地穿梭于行人中，走过了一家银行、办公室和餐馆。然后我听到身后跑上来的脚步声，感觉到有只手碰了碰我肩膀。

“瑞德先生！哎呀，终于找到您了！”

我一个转身，发现这人长得颇像一位上了年纪的摇滚歌手。他有着一张饱经风霜的脸，中分杂乱的长头发。他的衬衫和裤子松松垮垮，均呈米色。

“您好，”我小心翼翼地说，注意到鲍里斯满腹狐疑地看着他。

“真是一连串最不幸的误会啊！”那人笑道，“给我们预约了那么多不同的时间。唉，昨晚我们等了很久，两个多小时呢，但是没关系！这样的事也难免。我敢说这些都不是您的错，先生。说实在的，肯定不是。”

“啊，是的。您今早又在等了吧。是的，是的，前台接待员提起过。”

“今早，又有些误会了。”长发男人耸耸肩。“他们说一个小时后再来。所以我们，我和摄影师，就在那家咖啡馆打发时间了。但既然您刚好路过，我在想我们是否可以立刻开始采访拍照。这样的话，我们就不必再次打扰您了。当然，我们明白，像您这样的贵宾，接受我们这种本地小报的访问恐怕不会是您优先考虑的事情……”

“恰恰相反，”我立刻说道，“你们这样的报纸恰恰是我向来最看重的。你们能号准当地人情感的脉搏。像您这样的人，我认为是这城里最珍贵的人脉之一。”

“您如此美言真是太客气了，瑞德先生。请允许我这样说，相当有见地啊。”

“可我要说的是，机缘太不巧了，这会儿，我另有他事。”

“当然，当然。正因如此，我冒昧建议，现在就把整件事给了结了，免得我们以后从早到晚老是打扰您。我们的摄影师，皮德罗，他

现在就在那边的咖啡馆里。我问您两三个问题，他可以拍几张快照。随后，您和这位年轻先生，就可以立马赶往您的目的地。整个过程不过就是四五分钟的光景。目前看来这是最简单的解决之道了。”

“嗯，只几分钟，你说的。”

“哦，有几分钟我们就已经开心不已了。我们完全明白，必定有许多其他重要事情需要您去费心。我说过的，我们就在那边那家咖啡馆。”

他指了指稍远的一个地方，那儿几张桌椅都摆到了人行道上。看起来并不是我理想中接受采访的地方，但我意识到这可能是打发记者最简单的方法了。

“那好吧，”我说，“但我必须强调，今天上午我行程特别紧。”

“瑞德先生，您真是太好了。而且还是我们这种卑微的小报！好吧，我们尽量快些完成。请，这边走。”

长发记者开始带我们沿着人行道往回走，他急切地想赶回咖啡馆，差点撞到另一个行人。眨眼间他就领先了几步，我趁机跟鲍里斯说：

“别担心，这不会太久的。我保证。”

鲍里斯继续挂着一副不满的表情，我补充道：

“听着，等我时，你可以坐下来吃点好吃的。冰淇淋或者芝士蛋糕。然后，我们立即出发。”

我们走到一个满是阳伞的小院子边停下。

“我们到了，”记者说道，示意其中一张桌子。“我们就在那里。”

“如果你不介意的话，”我对他说，“我首先得把鲍里斯安顿在里面。我会很快出来，跟你会合的。”

“太好了。”

虽然外面的院子里很多桌子都有人坐，但里面却一个客人也没有。内室装潢简约现代，房间洒满阳光。一名体态丰满、长得颇像北欧人的年轻女侍者站在玻璃柜后面，柜内陈列着各种蛋糕和点心。鲍里斯在角落里的一张桌子边落座，年轻姑娘微笑着朝我们走来。

“想点些什么？”她问鲍里斯，“今早，我们有全城最新鲜的蛋糕。十分钟前刚运到。全都新鲜出炉。”

鲍里斯开始向她详细地盘问起各种蛋糕，最后选中了杏仁巧克力乳酪蛋糕。

“好吧，我不会很久的，”我对他说，“我只是去见见这些人，然后立刻回来。你要是需要什么，我就在外面。”

鲍里斯耸了耸肩，注意力一直停留在那名女侍者身上，此刻她正从陈列柜里取一份精致的甜点。

第十二章

我回到院子，可哪儿都找不到那位长发记者。我在阳伞中间溜达了一会儿，仔细凝视一张张坐在桌边人的面孔。在院子里转了一圈后，我停下脚步，心想也许那记者改变主意，顾自走了。可这好像太不可思议了，我又四下看了看。形形色色的人边喝着咖啡边读着报纸。一位老人正和围在他脚边的鸽子谈天。突然，我听到有人提到了我的名字，我一转身，看到那记者就坐在我正后方的桌边。他非常投入，正和一个矮胖、黝黑的男人相谈甚欢，我猜此人应该是摄影师吧。我惊呼一声，走上前去，但蹊跷的是，这两人继续交谈，看都不看我一眼。甚至我拉开那张剩余的空椅子坐下时，那记者——刚说了半句——只是匆匆地瞥了我一眼，然后又扭头面对那黝黑的摄影师，继续道：

“所以呢，有关这座建筑的重要意义，千万别给他任何提示。你只要编些附庸风雅的理由，解释他为什么非得一直在它前面。”

“没问题，”摄影师点头称是，“没问题。”

“但也不要逼他太紧。上个月舒尔茨在维也纳就是这样搞砸的。而且，记住，像所有其他这号人一样，他非常自负。所以，你得假装是他的一位狂热粉丝。告诉他报社派你去的时候并不知道，而你碰巧是他的一位狂热粉丝。这样就一定能打动他。但在我们建立起融洽关系之前，千万别提萨特勒纪念碑。”

“好的，好的。”摄影师仍频频点头，“但我还以为这事儿现在已经定下来了呢，我以为你已经征得他同意了。”

“我本想打电话把这事敲定下来，可是后来舒尔茨警告我，说这个家伙他妈的真难搞定哩。”那记者说这话的时候，扭头冲我礼貌地一笑。那位摄影师呢，顺着他同伴注视的目光，心不在焉地朝我点了个头，然后他们二人又继续讨论起来。

“舒尔茨的问题，”记者说道，“在于他马屁拍得还不够。而且他那副态度，好像真的不耐烦似的，即便没有不耐烦，他也这副德性。对付这种人，你只需不停拍马屁就行。所以你在拍照的过程中，只消不停地喊‘太棒了’。不停地赞叹。千万不要停止满足他的虚荣心哦。”

“好的，好的。没问题。”

“那么我就开始……”记者疲倦地叹了口气。“我就开始谈谈他在维也纳的表演，或者诸如此类的事情吧。我这儿搞了些资料，我会一路夸张，虚张声势。但我们别浪费太多时间。几分钟之后，你就假装有了灵感，说要去萨特勒纪念碑拍照。而我会先假装有些生气，但最后承认这是个绝佳的主意。”

“好的，好的。”

“你现在明白了。别出岔子。记住，他是个难搞的混蛋。”

“我明白。”

“一旦有任何不对，就说些恭维的话。”

“好吧，好吧。”

两个人相互点了点头。然后记者深吸了一口气，拍拍双手，转过身来，面对着我，突然眼光灼灼起来。

“啊，瑞德先生，您来啦！您能抽出您宝贵的一点时间给我们，真是太好了。我想那年轻人在里面还开心吧？”

“是的，是的。他点了一大块乳酪蛋糕。”

那两人开心地大笑，矮胖摄影师咧嘴笑道：

“乳酪蛋糕。太好了，我的最爱。我从小就最喜欢乳酪蛋糕。”

“哦，瑞德先生，这是皮德罗。”

摄影师微微一笑，急切地伸出手。“真高兴见到您，先生。告诉您吧，对我来说这真的是天赐良机。我今早才接到这个任务。起床的时候，我还在想今天又得去拍议事厅。我是在洗澡的时候接到电话的。你想做吗？他们问。自打孩提时，他就是我心目中的偶像，我告诉他们。我想不想做？天啊，没有报酬都行，只要让我做，我愿倒贴给你们，我告诉他们。只需告诉我去哪儿就行。我发誓我从未因一个任务如此兴奋过。”

“坦白说，瑞德先生，”记者说，“昨晚跟我一起在酒店的摄影师，呃，等了几个小时后他开始有些不耐烦了。自然，我对他相当生气。‘你似乎还不明白，’我对他说，‘假如瑞德先生因故耽搁了，那肯定是他得去赴最重要的约会。假如他发了善心同意给我们些时间，而需要我们等上一会儿，那么我们就等呗。’先生，跟您说吧，

我对他非常生气。我回去之后，就告诉主编说这可不行啊。‘早上再给我找个摄影师，’我要求道，‘我想要一个理解瑞德先生的立场并对他示以合宜谢意的人。’是的，对这事我挺激动的。总之，我们现在有皮德罗了，他正好和我一样，也是您的琴迷，我们几乎一样狂热。”

“更狂热，更狂热呢，”皮德罗抗议道，“我今早接到电话时，简直不敢相信。我的偶像到了城里，而我要给他拍照去。天哪，我一定要做得尽善尽美，我洗澡的时候对自己这么说。那样一位大人物，必须做得尽善尽美才行呐。我会让他站在萨特勒大楼前拍照。我这样设想着。我洗澡的时候，脑海中构思出了整个作品。”

“现在，皮德罗，”记者说，严肃地看着他，“我非常怀疑瑞德先生是否愿意仅仅为了拍个照跑到萨特勒大楼那边。好吧，开车最多几分钟就到，但是对于一个行程紧张的人来说，几分钟可不是无足轻重的事喔。不，皮德罗，你就在这儿尽你最大努力做好吧，我们坐在这桌边谈话，你拍几张瑞德先生的照片。好吧，人行道露天咖啡馆，是太老套了，瑞德先生全身上下的独特魅力甚至都很难很好地展示出来。但不行也得行了。我承认，你想让瑞德先生站在萨特勒纪念碑前这一主意，确实是神来之想。但他根本没时间啊。能为他拍一张哪怕只是普普通通的照片，我们就该满足了。”

皮德罗一边用拳头捶打手掌，一边摇头。“你说的没错。可是，上帝啊，这太难受了。这是一个为伟大的瑞德先生拍照的机会，这种机会一辈子也就一次啊，而我却只能将就，在一个咖啡馆拍。真是造物弄人啊。”他又悲伤地摇了摇头。一时间，他们两人坐在那儿望着我。

“呃，”我终于说道，“你们说的这座建筑，真的是开车几分钟就到吗？”

皮德罗突然坐直身子，因激动而脸上发光。

“您是认真的吗？您会在萨特勒纪念碑前摆姿势拍照吗？上帝啊，史无前例啊！我就知道您是个大好人！”

“等一下……”

“您确定吗，瑞德先生？”记者抓着我的胳膊说，“您真的确定吗？我知道您的行程很满。哎呀，您真的是太伟大了！真的，打车过

去不过三分钟。其实，您只消在这里等会儿，先生，我现在就去拦一辆过来。皮德罗，反正瑞德先生在这里等，不如你先为他拍几张。”

记者匆匆离开。随即我看到他站在人行道边上，前倾着身体，冲着来往车辆，一只手臂举在半空中。

“瑞德先生，请吧。”

皮德罗单膝跪地，透过相机眯眼看着我。我在椅子上坐好——摆了一个放松但不过于懒散的姿势——一副亲切微笑的面容。

皮德罗按了几下快门。然后他后退几步，再一次单膝蹲下，这次是在一张空桌子边，惊飞了一群正在啄食面包屑的鸽子。我正准备再调整一下姿势，记者跑了回来。

“瑞德先生，我现在拦不到出租车，但正好有一辆有轨电车来了。请快些，我们可以跳上去。皮德罗，快，那辆电车。”

“但那会和出租车一样快吗？”我问道。

“是的，是的。其实，这种交通状况下，电车会更快些。真的，瑞德先生，您不必担心。萨特勒纪念碑非常近。事实上——”他抬起手遮着双眼看向远方，“事实上，您从这儿差不多能看到。要不是那灰色的塔楼挡在那儿，我们这会儿就能看见萨特勒纪念碑了。就是这么近，真的。事实上，一个正常身高的人——不比你我高多少——如果爬到萨特勒大楼的房顶，站直，举着类似杆子的物体——比方说，家用拖把——像今天这样的清晨，我们很容易就能越过那座灰色塔楼看到。所以您看，我们马上就能到。请吧，那辆电车，我们得快点。”

皮德罗已经站在路缘上了。我看到他背着重重的一袋设备，正试图说服电车司机等我们。我跟着记者走出院子上了车。

我们三人刚走上中心过道，电车再次启动了。车厢里很拥挤，我们没办法挨着坐。我挤进车厢靠后的一个座位，坐在一个小个儿老头和一个主妇母亲中间，她膝上还坐着个牙牙学语的小孩。座位出奇的舒服，过了一会儿，我开始有些享受起这次旅程。我对面，坐着三个年长的男人，他们共同读着一张报纸，由中间那人打开举着。电车的颠簸好似给他们阅读造成了困难，不时地，他们会为要求读特别的哪一页而争执。

我们走了好一会儿，我才察觉到四周的活动，看到一位女检票员沿过道走过来。我才想到我同伴一定为我买好了票——我上车时，肯定没有买过。我再次扭头看过去，看到了那检票员。一个娇小女人，丑陋的黑色制服没有完全掩盖她迷人的身材。她已经检查过其他地方，正朝我们这块儿走来。我四周，人们纷纷掏出车票和通行证。我强压住心中的恐慌，酝酿准备说点什么，听起来既有尊严又有说服力。

这时，检票员逼近我们，所有邻座人都拿出了自己的车票。她正给他们打孔时，我定定地说道：

“我没有票，但我有特殊情况，你要是允许的话，我会向你解释。”

检票员看着我，然后她说：“没票是一回事。但你知道，你昨晚真让我失望。”

她一说这话，我立刻认出她是菲奥娜·罗伯茨。她是在伍斯特郡我们村的小学同学，我大约九岁时，和她发展了一段特殊的友谊。当初，她住得离我们很近，沿着小路走不远就到了她家的农舍，跟我家的没多大区别，我常常溜出去和她玩上一下午，特别是在我们离开家乡去曼彻斯特之前那段艰难的日子里。自那以后我再也没见过她，所以着实为她责难的态度吃了一惊。

“啊，是的，”我说，“昨晚。是的。”

菲奥娜·罗伯茨仍看着我。或许和她这会儿摆出的责备的神情有关，我突然间发现自己想起了儿时的一个下午，我们两个正一起坐在她家餐桌下。我们跟往常一样，将五彩缤纷的毛毯、窗帘从餐桌边垂挂下来，筑起了我们的“藏身窝”。那日午后，温暖晴朗，我们硬是坐在“藏身窝”里，里面几近漆黑，闷热难当。我一直对菲奥娜说着些什么，必定是唠唠叨叨，让人心烦意乱。她不止一次想打断我，但我继续唠叨。最后，我说完了，她说道：

“太傻了。那意味着你得靠自己了。你会很孤单的。”

“我不介意，”我说，“我喜欢孤单。”

“你又在犯傻了。没人喜欢孤单。我会有个大家庭，至少五个孩子，每晚给他们做一顿美味的晚餐。”然后，我没有回答，她又说道：“你太傻了。没人喜欢独自一人。”

“我就是。我喜欢。”

“你怎么能喜欢孤单呢？”

“我喜欢，就是喜欢。”

事实上，下这断言，我还是有几分坚定的。到那日下午，我开始我的“训练期”已经有几个月了；其实，那份特殊的迷恋大约是在那会儿达到了顶峰。

我的“训练期”开始得相当意外。一日灰蒙蒙的午后，我独自在小巷里玩耍——沉浸在某种幻想中，在一排杨树和田野中间的干涸沟渠里爬进爬出——我突然感到一阵惊慌，需要父母的陪伴。我们的农舍并不远，越过田间，我能看到农舍的背面。惊恐感迅速蔓延，我几乎被一阵冲动所压倒，只想穿过杂草全速跑回家。然而，不知何故——可能我很快将这感觉同不成熟联系了起来——我强迫自己迟些离开。毫无疑问，我脑子里想的还是很快穿越田间，开始奔跑，只是用意志力推迟那一刻的到来，多坚持了几秒。我呆若木鸡地站在那干涸的沟渠里，经历了恐惧与兴奋交织的奇怪感觉，这感觉我在接下来的几周里渐渐熟悉。不到几天工夫，我的“训练期”变成了我生活中一个惯常且重要的部分。日久天长，就形成了一种固定的仪式，所以，一感到想回家的念头冒出头，我就会沿着小路走到一个特别的地方，一棵巨大的橡树下，我会在那儿站上几分钟，击退内心的情感。时常，我会觉得呆得已经够长了，现在可以出发回家了，结果却是再一次将自己拉回来，强迫自己继续在树下多站上几秒钟。毫无疑问，那伴随着不断增长的恐惧与惊恐的奇特兴奋感，或许就是我保留自己那略带强迫性质的“训练期”的原因吧。

“但你不知道的，是不是？”那日菲奥娜对我说。黑暗中，她的脸挨着我的。“你结婚后不必像你父母那样。根本不会像那样的。丈夫和妻子不会总是吵架。他们只是在……在特殊的事情发生的时候才那样吵架。”

“什么特殊的事情？”

菲奥娜沉默了一会儿。我正准备更咄咄逼人地重复一遍自己的问题，这时，她语重心长地说：

“你父母呀，他们不是因为合不来才那样吵架的。你难道知道吗？难道你不知道他们为什么总是吵架吗？”

突然间，我们的“藏身窝”外面传来一声怒气冲冲的叫喊，菲奥娜就消失了。我继续独自坐在桌下的黑暗里，捕捉到了从厨房传来的菲奥娜和她母亲低声争执的声音。我听到菲奥娜一度用受伤的语气重复道：“可是为什么不行？为什么我不能告诉他？其他人都知道了。”她母亲说，嗓音仍很低：“他比你年纪小。他太小了。你不能告诉他。”

菲奥娜·罗伯茨走近了几步停下，把我的回忆打断了，她对我说：

“我一直等到十点半，然后让大家去吃饭了。大家那时候都饿了。”

“当然，正常。”我无力地一笑，四下看了看车厢。“十点半。到那时候，是的，人们肯定饿了……”

“而到那时候，你显然是不会来了。没人会再相信了。”

“是的，我想，到那时候，不可避免地……”

“刚开始一切都还不错，”菲奥娜·罗伯茨说，“以前，我从未举办过那样的聚会，但一切都还不错。她们都来了，英奇，楚德，她们全都来我公寓了。我有些紧张，但一切顺利，我真的也很兴奋。她们有几位还为那晚作了充分准备，带了好多文件夹，里面好多信息，还有照片。直到大概九点，人们开始心神不定、坐立不安了，那时候，我头一次突然意识到你可能不来了。我不停地进进出出，加咖啡，添点心，一心要让一切顺利进行。她们全都开始窃窃私语，但我仍然想，呃，你可能还是会来的，可能在什么地方塞车了吧。后来，越来越晚了，最后，她们就公开地议论起来。你知道的，甚至毫不顾及我还在房间呢。就在我自家的公寓里！就在那时，我告诉她们开始吃吧。我那会儿只希望早点结束早了事。于是，大家开始吃，我准备了好多的小煎蛋卷，而即便在吃的时候，其中几位，像乌利克那号人，仍旧不停地私语窃笑。但其实吧，某种程度上，我倒觉得那些窃笑的还好。相比楚德之类，我更能接受她们。楚德她们装出一副为我惋惜的模样，自始至终都虚情假意地显示友好，哦，我多么讨厌那个女人！我能看出她在临走时，暗自思量：‘可怜的家伙，生活在幻想的世界里。我们真的早该猜到的。’哦，我恨透了她们这伙人，我真的鄙视自己竟然跟她们搞在一起。可是，你瞧，我在这小区住了四年，没交到一个好朋友，我很孤独啊。长久以来，那些女人，就是昨晚来我公寓的那些人，她们不愿和我有任何关系。你知道的，她们认

为自己是这儿的精英，自称是‘妇女艺术文化基金会’成员。这太愚蠢了，那根本不是什么真正意义上的基金会，但她们觉得那名字听起来很气派。每当城里组织什么活动，她们就忙活起来。比方说，北京芭蕾舞团来访的时候，她们做了所有欢迎招待会的彩带。总之，她们认为自己无比高贵，直到最近，都不想跟我这样的人有来往。那个英奇，在小区附近看到我时，甚至不愿打声招呼。但是，当然，自传言散播开来，一切都变了。我是说我认识你这件事。我不知道这事是怎么传出去的，可我没有到处鼓吹呀。我猜我肯定向某人提起过。但不管怎样，你想象得到，一切都变了。今年早些时候，某一天，英奇叫住了我，我那时正上楼，她邀请我参加她们的一次聚会。我真的不想和她们有牵连，但还是去了，我猜想当时觉得总能交上几个朋友吧，我也不知道。呃，一开始，她们一些人，包括英奇和楚德，她们不知道该不该相信传言，你知道，就是我是你老朋友的事。但她们最后认可了，我想可能这让她们感觉相当不错。照料你父母的整个主意不是我出的，但很明显，我认识你这一事实与其有莫大关系。你要来访的消息传出后，英奇过去告诉冯·布劳恩先生，她说，继北京芭蕾舞团之后，基金会现已准备就绪，准备承办某项真正重要的活动，而且，基金会中有一位还是你的老朋友呢。诸如此类的话。就这样，基金会争取到了这项工作，即在你父母逗留期间照顾他们；当然，大家都很兴奋，虽然其中几位觉得这事责任重大，很是紧张。但英奇一个劲地给大家鼓气，说这不过是我们应得的认可。我们连连开会，为招待好你父母出点子，想办法。英奇告诉我们——我听到了这点很难过——你父母二人现在身体都不大好，所以呢，很多顺理成章的事，如游览城市之类的，就不太合适了。但是，其他主意可多着呢，大家都很兴奋。随后，在最后一次会议上，有人说，呃，我们干吗不请你来，亲自见见我们呢？谈谈你父母会喜欢什么。刹那间，大家鸦雀无声，然后英奇说：‘干吗不呢？毕竟，我们有万中无一的资格邀请他。’然后她们全都盯着我，于是最后我说：‘呃，我想他会很忙，但如果你们愿意，我可以问问他的。’我看得出我说那话的时候她们是多么激动。后来一得到你的答复，嗨，我就一跃成了公主，她们都对我另眼相待，无论什么时候遇见我，都冲我微笑，对我很亲热，给孩子们送礼物，主动为我做这干那。因此，你完全能想象昨晚你没出现的后果了吧。”

她重重地叹了口气，沉默了一会儿，透过窗户茫然地看着窗外掠过的建筑物。终于，她继续道：

“我想我其实不该怪你。毕竟，我们已经很久没见面了。但是，我当时以为你会看在你父母的分上过来的。对于我们能为他们在此逗留期间做些什么，每个人都想法多多。今早，她们一定会七嘴八舌地议论我。她们几乎都不出去上班，丈夫个个能赚大钱，她们一定会互煲电话或相互串门，肯定会异口同声地说：‘可怜的女人，生活在自己的世界里。我们早就该看出来的。我倒愿意尽点力帮助她，不过呢，她实在是太令人厌烦了。’我现在就能听见她们说这话，她们一定个个陶醉其中。就说英奇吧，一方面，她会非常生气。‘这个小贱人骗了我们。’她会这么想。而另一方面，她会很开心，她会如释重负。你瞧，英奇这人呐，她既中意我认识你，可又总觉得这是个威胁。我看得出来。过去的这几周中，自从你答复之后，其他人对待我的方式，可能让她有了什么想法。她真的是痛苦万分，她们全都是。总之，她们今早一定会很开心，我知道她们一定会的。”

听着菲奥娜的话，我不自觉地认为自己该对前一晚发生的事感到无比懊悔。然而，尽管她绘声绘色地描述她公寓中的情景，尽管我为她深感难过，但我发现自己只是模模糊糊地记得日程表上有这样一项活动。此外，她的话让我颇为吃惊地意识到，父母快要来到这座城市了，可到目前为止自己却对这个问题考虑甚少。正如菲奥娜提到的，他们二人身体欠安，生活几乎不能自理。没错，看着外面繁忙的交通，还有窗外掠过的一座座光亮的建筑物，我对年迈的父母，不由生发出一股强烈的保护欲。理想的办法其实就是委托当地的一群妇女照料他们，我真是个大笨蛋，居然没能抓住机会见见她们，和她们谈谈。父母怎么办？想到这，一阵惊慌攫住了我的心——我无法想象，对于这次出访的这方面问题，我居然没怎么考虑。一时间，我的脑海里思潮翻滚。我突然看到了我母亲和父亲，两人身材矮小，头发花白，年老驼背，站在火车站外面，周围都是行李，自己根本没法搬。我能看见他们看着身旁这个陌生的城市，然后，最终，我父亲的自尊战胜了理智，拿起两个，然后三个箱子，而我母亲试图阻拦无果，她用那瘦弱的手拉住他的胳膊，说：“不行，不行，你搬不动的。太多、太多了。”而我父亲，表情坚定决绝，甩开我母亲，说：“我不搬，那由谁来搬？要不我们怎么到酒店？这种地方，自己不帮自己，还有谁会帮我们？”而在这当儿，轿车和卡车从他们身边呼啸而过，上下班的人匆匆路过。我母亲虽然难过，却也只好作罢，无可奈何地看着父亲负着沉重的行李蹒跚而行，走出四五步，最终支撑不住，放下行李箱，肩膀垂下，呼吸沉重。然后，过了一会儿，我母亲，走向他，轻柔地把手放在他胳膊上。“没关系，我们会找到人帮忙吧。”而我父亲，此时已经放弃，但或许已感满足，因为至少他精神可嘉，

他平静地看着眼前的人流，寻找可能是来接他们的人，帮他们搬送行李，寒暄欢迎，坐着舒适的轿车带他们到酒店。

菲奥娜说话的时候，我大脑里充斥着这些景象，因此一时间未能考虑到她不幸的处境。但随后我意识到了她在说：

“她们会议论纷纷，说什么从今以后可得更谨慎了。我现在就能听见她们这么说。‘我们现在声望更高了，一定会遇到形形色色的人，他们千方百计想使诈混进来。我们必须小心为好，尤其是现在我们担负着如此重大的责任。那个小贱人对我们来说是个教训。’诸如此类的话。天知道这下我在那小区日子还怎么过。而我的孩子们，他们可得在那里长大……”

“听着，”我打断她，说道，“对此我真的很抱歉，语言都难以形容。但事实是，昨晚发生了件无可预见的事情，具体什么事就不说出来烦你了。我当然因为让你失望而十分懊恼，但确实甚至连打通电话都不太可能。我希望没有给你带来太多麻烦。”

“麻烦可多呢。对我来说不容易啊，你知道，一个单身母亲带着两个长身体的孩子……”

“你听我说，我真是非常抱歉。要不这样吧，我现在和那边的两个记者有点事，但不会太久的。我会尽快摆脱他们，跳上出租车，直奔你公寓。我会大概，半个小时吧，至多四十五分钟到那儿。然后我们就这么做。我们一起绕着小区走上一圈，那么所有这些人，你的邻居呀、什么英奇、什么楚德呀，她们全部会亲眼见到我们的确是老朋友。然后我们就去拜访一些较具影响力的人，比如这个英奇之类的。你可以介绍我，我呢则对昨晚的事道个歉，解释一下何以在最后不得不耽误行程。我们一个一个地把她们争取过来，弥补昨晚对你造成的伤害。其实呀，顺利的话，你在朋友中的人缘说不定甚至比从前更好呢。你觉得怎么样？”

菲奥娜继续盯着过往的风景看了好一会儿。最后她说：“我的第一直觉会说：‘忘记整件事吧。’声称是你的一个老朋友，对我一点帮助都没有。总之，或许我并不需要成为英奇那个圈子的人。我只是之前在那小区里太孤单了，但是尝过她们的行事风格之后，我觉得，说不定只有我的孩子们做伴我会更开心呢。晚上，我可以读一本好书，或者看电视。然而，我要考虑的不只是我自己，我还得考虑孩子们。他们得在这小区里长大，他们得被他人接纳。看在孩子的分上，我应当接受你的提议。你也说了，假如我们按照你建议的做，我的境

况说不定比聚会成功还好呢。但你得保证，你得以你所珍视的一切发誓，你不能让我再度失望了。因为，你看，如果实施你的计划，那就意味着我一结束这次轮班，就得开始挨家挨户打电话安排我们的拜访。我们可不能随随便便去敲人家的门，这儿可不是那种小区。所以你应该明白，如果我预约了而你没出现会怎样吧。那样的话，我就只能自己再走一圈，再次解释你没来的原因。所以你必须保证你不会再让我失望了。”

“我保证，”我说，“我说过，只要完成这儿的这件小事，我就即刻跳上出租车，与你会合。别担心，菲奥娜，船到桥头自然直。”

正说着，我感觉有人碰了碰我胳膊。我转过身，看见皮德罗站了起来，再次把大包扛在肩膀上。

“瑞德先生，请吧。”他指着通向下车门的过道说。

记者正站在前面准备下车。

“我们到站了，瑞德先生。”他朝我大叫，挥了挥手，“如果你不介意的话，先生。”

我感觉到电车缓缓停下。我站起身，往外一挤，向着车厢的另一头走去。

第十三章

电车轰鸣而去，留下我们三人站在开阔的乡间，四周尽是迎风的田野。我感到微风阵阵，神清气爽。我站着看了一会儿，看着电车渐渐驶出田野，消失在视线外。

“瑞德先生，这边请。”

记者和皮德罗在几步开外等着。我走上前追上他们，开始穿越绿草茵茵的田野。阵阵强风不时扯拽着我们的衣衫，吹得绿草上下起伏。终于，我们到了一个小山脚下，停下脚，喘口气。

“就在这上面不远处。”记者指着山上说。

我们一路徒步穿越茂盛的绿草地，经过这一番奔波后，看到有一条土路直通山上，我心中大喜。

“好吧，”我说，“我时间不多，我们最好现在就过去。”

“当然，瑞德先生。”

记者在前面带路，走上一条陡峭曲折的小径。我勉强跟上，与他仅保持一两步的距离。皮德罗可能是被身上的包所拖累，一下子落在后面。爬山的时候，我发现自己一直在想菲奥娜，想前一晚我如何令她失望。我猛地意识到，尽管迄今为止我对此次来访信心十足，尽管迄今为止我已有所斩获，但在某些事情的处理上——至少以我自己的标准衡量——仍留下了些许遗憾。我父母即将到达这座城市，且不论我给菲奥娜带来的尴尬，令人极其恼火的是，我竟错过了一次机会，一次与托付照料他们的人讨论他们诸多复杂需求的机会。我的呼吸声越来越沉重，一想到索菲给我的事儿造成的混乱，我就对她气恼不已，一股强烈的无名之火再次向我涌来。毋庸置疑，要求她在我人生的这一无比关键时刻，管好自己如麻的纷乱，这要求并不过分呀。突然想要对她说的各种各样的话，一下子充满了我的脑袋，如若不是气喘吁吁的话，我没准就大声自语起来了。

沿着小径转了三四个弯后，我们停下来歇了歇脚。抬头望去，发现此刻周围的乡间风景历历在目。片片田野连绵不绝，蜿蜒至远方。只有在视线的很远处，才能隐隐看到一片农舍之类的东西。

“风景真美。”记者说，边喘着气，边用手将头发别到脸后。
“上这儿来，真是令人心旷神怡。清新的空气定会让我们一整天都精神抖擞。呃，虽说风景确实不错，可我们还是别浪费时间了。”他爽朗一笑，又走了起来。

与之前一样，我继续紧跟着他，皮德罗落在后面。有那么一会儿，正当我们艰难地攀登一个特别陡峭的地方时，皮德罗在下面喊了一声。我以为他是叫我们放慢速度，但记者并没有停下脚步，而是顶着一阵强风扭头喊道：“你说什么？”

我听见皮德罗挣扎着又走了几步。然后听到他喊道：

“我说，貌似我们已经说服了那狗屁家伙。我觉得他会配合的。”

“呃，”记者回喊道，“到目前为止他还算配合，但对这类人可不能想当然。所以继续拍马屁吧。他已经来到这么上面了，看起来还挺开心的。不过我觉得这傻子甚至都不知道这建筑的意义。”

“他问的话，我们怎么跟他说？”皮德罗喊道，“他一定会问的。”

“那就换个话题。叫他换下姿势。只要谈他的演出就一定能转移他的注意力。如果他问个不停，我们最后就得告诉他了，但那时我们已经拍了很多照片，这混球一点办法也没了。”

“这里完事儿了我就开心了。”皮德罗说，这会儿他喘得更厉害了。“老天啊，他老是摩搓双手的样子让我浑身都起鸡皮疙瘩。”

“我们就快到了。一切都挺顺利的，可别在最后一刻搞砸了。”

“很抱歉，”我打断他们，说道，“我需要休息一会儿。”

“当然了，瑞德先生，我真是考虑欠周啊，”记者说道，我们停了下来。“我本人是马拉松运动员，”他继续道，“所以有特别的优势。但我得说，先生，您看起来确实非常健康。以您这个年纪——噢，我是从资料里得知您年龄的，否则我绝猜不出——真的，您把可怜的皮德罗远远地甩在了后面呢。”等皮德罗赶上来的时候，他冲他大喊：“快点儿，你这个慢吞吞的家伙。瑞德先生在笑你呢。”

“这可不公平啊，”皮德罗微笑道，“瑞德先生才华横溢，而且呢，又幸运地拥有运动天赋。我们有些人可没这么幸运呵。”

我们站在那儿俯瞰风景，恢复气力。然后，记者说：

“我们离目的地很近了。继续走吧。毕竟，瑞德先生今天很忙。”

最后一段路最费力。小径越来越陡，还有很多泥泞的水坑。记者继续稳稳地走在我前面，但我看得出他这会儿正费力地向前倾着身子。我摇摇晃晃地跟在后面，脑中又满是想对索菲讲的话。“你知道吗？”我发现自己咬紧牙随着步子喃喃自语。“你知道吗？”不知怎地，这话从未继续下去，但每走一步，要么在我脑中，要么低声念出，我一遍又一遍地重复这句话，直到这话本身都开始让我愤怒了。

小径终于平坦了，我看到山顶处有一幢白色建筑。我和记者跌跌撞撞地走了过去，过了一会儿，我们斜倚着墙壁喘气。稍后，皮德罗也过来了，大口大口地喘着粗气。他靠着墙壁一下瘫倒，身体下垂，只靠双膝支撑，我一度担心他是不是要痉挛了。他仍然“呼哧呼哧”地喘着气，开始拉开包，取出了一架相机还有镜头。这时候，刚才这一系列动作好像让他招架不住了，他一只手撑着墙，头埋到墙沟处，继续大口地呼吸。

终于，我感觉自己恢复了些许，走开几步，想看看这座建筑，结果一阵狂风将我吹了回去，差点紧贴在墙上。最终我走到了一个位置，看到一栋高高的圆柱形白色砖房，没有窗户，独独近顶端的地方有一道垂直的裂缝。好似从一座中世纪城堡上搬下了一个塔楼，移植到了这山顶上。

“瑞德先生，只要您准备好了，我们就可以开始了，先生。”

记者和皮德罗站到了离建筑物十米开外的地方。皮德罗这会儿显然恢复过来了，摆好三脚架，透过取景镜向外看。

“请您靠墙站直，瑞德先生。”记者喊道。

我走回这栋建筑。“先生们，”我说，提高声音，盖过风声，“开始之前，我想问问您能否解释一下我们选这个背景的确切意义？”

“瑞德先生，”皮德罗大喊道，一边挥手，“请向后站，紧挨着墙，或者一只胳膊撑着墙吧。就像这样。”他逆着风伸出了胳膊肘。

我靠墙走近了几步，按照要求做了。皮德罗照了若干张照片，时不时地移动三脚架或更换镜头。这期间，记者一直站在近旁，透过皮德罗的肩头看着，与他商量着。

“先生们，”过了一会儿，我说，“我这么问应该并不冒昧……”

“瑞德先生，”皮德罗说，从相机后面跳将起来。“您的领带！”

我的领带被吹到肩膀上去了。我正了正领带，又趁机重新理了一下头发。

“瑞德先生，”皮德罗喊道，“能不能拍几张您抬起手的，就像这样。是的，是的！好像您引着某人走近房子。对了，非常好，非常好。但是，呃，请自豪地微笑。非常自豪，就好像这房子是您的孩子似的。好的，太完美了。是的，您看起来太棒了！”

我尽力按着他的指示做，但是风力强劲，很难保持一个既合适又亲切的表情。

过了一会儿，我意识到左边站着一个人。印象中，那男人身穿深色外套，紧贴着墙蜷缩着，但我当时得摆个姿势，只能用余光看他。皮德罗继续迎着风，大声喊着指令——让我把下巴向一边侧一点，笑容更灿烂一些——过了好一会儿之后，我才有空转身，打量那人。最后我开始打量他的时候，那男人——高高的，像根竹竿，秃顶，脸上瘦骨嶙峋——立即向我走来。他紧紧夹着雨衣，走近时，他伸出了手。

“瑞德先生，您好。很荣幸见到您。”

“啊，是的，”我答道，打量着他，“很高兴见到您，您是……呃……”

那个竹竿男子显出一脸惊愕的神色。然后说：“克里斯托弗。我是克里斯托弗。”

“啊，克里斯托弗先生。”一阵劲风扑面而来，我们只得奋力支撑片刻，这也给了我一个机会恢复了些。“啊，对，克里斯托弗先生。当然。久仰您大名啊。”

“瑞德先生，”克里斯托弗说着，倾身靠近我，“请允许我直接向您表达我的谢意，感谢您拨冗出席此次午宴。我知道您是个多么有修养的人，所以，您做出肯定回复时，我毫不意外。您看，我知道您是那种至少会给我们一个公平申诉机会的人，是那种会切切实实想要听听我们立场的人。不，我一点儿不意外。但我还是非常感激您。

呃，现在——”他看了看表，“我们有点晚了，但没关系。交通应该不太糟糕。请，这边走。”

我跟着克里斯托弗绕到这白色建筑的后面。这里的风没有那么强劲，砖房外安装的大量管道发出了一阵低沉的嗡鸣声。克里斯托弗继续领路，朝着山缘处一个两根木头柱子标记的地方走去。我脑中想象着柱子那边下坡路应该很陡峭，但到了之后，我向下看去，看到一截长长的不太牢固的石阶，通向山腰处，让人头晕眼花。下面台阶的尽头远远的是一条铺好的路，我隐约辨别出一辆黑色轿车在那里等候着。应该是在等我们吧。

“瑞德先生，您先请。”克里斯托弗说，“请吧，下去时步伐请随意。不必着急。”

然而，我留意到他又焦急地扫了一眼手表。

“很抱歉我们晚了。”我说，“拍照片花的时间比我想象的要长些。”

“请别担心，瑞德先生。我们肯定能及时赶到。请吧，您先走。”

头几步，我感到有些眩晕。两边都没有栏杆，惊惧中，我被迫高度集中注意力，生怕一步踏空，一路滚下山去。但幸而，风没有像先前那么闹事捣鬼，过了一会儿，我发现自己越来越有自信——和其他的台阶没有太大区别嘛——甚至双眼不时地离开双脚，一览眼前的全景。

天仍然阴沉，但太阳已经开始冲破云层。现在能看到，车停着的那条路建在一座高丘上。透过层层叠叠的树顶，高丘那边的山麓继续呈下降之势。再往下，我能看到田野向远处各方延展开去。地平线处，城市的轮廓隐约可见。

克里斯托弗一直紧跟在我身后。开头几分钟，可能是留意到了我下山时的紧张，他没有开口交谈。但我步伐有了节奏之后，他叹了一口气，说：

“那片树林，瑞德先生，您右下方那片，叫沃尔登伯格树林。城里许多较为富裕的人，都喜欢在那儿弄个小木屋。沃尔登伯格树林非常怡人。开车一会就到城里了，但又让人感觉远离一切喧嚣。等我们上车，沿山坡开下去，您就会看到那些小木屋了。有些正好就坐落在峭壁边缘，景观肯定美不胜收。罗莎肯定会喜欢这样的小屋。其实，

我们心里特别中意其中的一间，等我们车子开下去的时候我会指给您看。简朴是简朴点，但一样的夺目。现在的房主几乎不用，一年也不过就用两三个星期。如果我价钱开得好，他肯定会认真考虑的。但现在没必要考虑了。全完了。”

他沉默片刻。然后他的声音又在我身后响起。

“谈不上宏伟壮观。我和罗莎从未看过里面什么样。但是我们开车路过许多次，想都能想象出里面是什么样的。它坐落在一个隆起的小山岬上，有个陡坡，让人感觉悬在半空似的。走过一个个房间时，每个窗户都能看到云层。罗莎肯定会喜欢的。我们从前开车经过，都会减速，有时候甚至停下车来，坐在那儿尽情想象，里面是什么样子，一个房间一个房间地遐想。呃，刚才我也说了，这些现在全都是过眼云烟了，想也没用了。不管怎么说，瑞德先生，您同意让我们占用您宝贵的时间，为的可不是听这些。请原谅。我们说正事吧。您知道，先生，您答应过来和我们谈谈，我们全都无比感激啊。您与这帮人形成多么明显的对照啊，这伙人还自称领导这个社会！前前后后共有三次，我们邀请他们出席午宴，来谈谈这些问题，就像您要做的这样。但他们一口回绝。就连一秒钟也不肯来啊！太傲慢了，一个个全是。冯·温特斯坦，伯爵夫人，冯·布劳恩，全都这德性。您看，他们之所以这样，是因为他们没把握啊。他们心中都明白自己什么都不懂，所以拒绝过来与我们好好商谈。我们邀请了他们三次啊，可他们每次都是断然拒绝。不过，话说回来，即使他们来了也无济于事。我们现在讲的话，他们连一半都听不懂。”

我又一次陷入沉默。我觉得应该讲上几句，但突然意识到我只能扭头大声喊才能让他听见，我可不想冒险视线离开台阶。于是，随后的几分钟，我们继续默默地往下走。我身后，克里斯托弗的呼吸越发沉重。然后我听见他说：

“说句公道话，这倒也不能怪他们。这些现代音乐太复杂了，什么卡赞，穆莱利，吉本直贵。即便像我这样受过训练的乐师，现在都感觉很难，非常难。冯·温特斯坦、伯爵夫人之流，又怎么可能会懂？完全超出他们的层次了嘛。对他们来说，那简直就是噪音，离奇古怪的节奏，一团糟啊。或许这些年自己骗自己说能听出些名堂来，什么情感啊、意义啊。但事实上，他们一无所得。完全超出了他们的层次，他们根本不懂现代音乐的原理。曾几何时，只有莫扎特、巴赫、柴可夫斯基。那种音乐，大街上随便拉个人都能猜个八九不离十。但是，这是现代音乐啊！他们这样的人，一帮乡巴佬，没经过任

何训练，怎么可能——不管他们觉得对社会怀有一种何等强烈的责任感——他们怎么可能理解这些东西呢？无可救药啊，瑞德先生。他们搞不清破碎的节奏与令人震撼的主题间的区别，也不懂断裂的拍号 and 一系列指孔休止之间停顿的不同。而如今还误判了整个形势！想让事情往相反的方向发展！瑞德先生，您要是累了，我们何不休息一会儿？”

事实上，我刚才停步片刻，有一只鸟突然惊慌失措地飞近我面前，差点害我失足踩空。

“不用，不用，我没事。”我大声回答道，又重新开始下台阶。

“这些台阶太脏了没法坐，但如果您愿意的话，我们随时可以停下，站着歇歇脚。”

“不用，真的，谢谢。我很好。”

我们继续走着，接下来几分钟，彼此沉默。然后，克里斯托弗说：

“在我最超然的时候，我其实深为他们遗憾。我不怪他们。虽然他们干了那些事，说我的坏话，我有时仍能客观看待形势。我对自己说，不，真的不是他们的错。音乐变得这么复杂难懂，这不是他们的错。这种小地方的人，期待他们理解现代音乐是不合情理的。然而，这些人，这些市官员们，他们还非得装出一副一切尽在掌握之中的样子。他们不断对自己重复某些事，久而久之，就开始相信自己的权威了。您知道，像这样的地方，是不会有人反驳他们的。瑞德先生，请格外留意下面几级台阶。外沿有点破损了。”

我慢慢地走下了后面的几级台阶，然后抬眼，发现没剩多少路了。

“那也是无济于事的。”克里斯托弗的声音在我身后响起，“即便他们接受了我们的邀请，也无济于事。他们连一半都听不懂。瑞德先生您至少会明白我们的观点。即便我们不能说服您，我确信，您走的时候也一定会尊重我们的立场。不过呢，当然啰，我们希望能说服您。不管我个人的命运如何，都要说服您，必须不惜一切地坚持目前的方向。诚然，您是一位卓越的音乐家，现今全世界仍在工作的、最有天赋的音乐家之一。然而，尽管如此，即便是您这水平的专家也需要将其知识运用于当地一系列的特殊情况。每个社会都有其自己的历史和独特的需求。瑞德先生，我等会儿将要向您介绍的人，可以说是

这城里极少数称得上是知识分子的人。他们不辞劳苦地分析当地现行的特殊状况，而且更重要的是，他们——与冯·温特斯坦之流迥然不同——他们对现代音乐原理确有真知灼见。在他们的帮助下，瑞德先生，我希望能劝服您改变您现在的立场，当然是以最礼貌最恭敬的方式了。当然，他们每个人都对您和您代表的一切怀有至高的崇敬之情。但我们觉得，即便以您非凡的洞察力，这儿的某些情势您恐怕也未能充分了解。我们到了。”

事实上，还有大概二十多步才到小路。克里斯托弗在最后这段下坡路上一直沉默。这让我松了一口气，因为他后来说的话让我很恼怒。他在暗示我或多或少忽略了当地的情况，暗示我是那种懒得考虑这些因素就得出结论的人，这也太侮辱人了吧。我回忆起自从到这个城市之后如何进行——尽管行程很紧，尽管很疲倦——熟悉当地环境的任务。譬如，我记得昨天下午我本可以轻轻松松地在酒店的中庭理所应当地、舒舒服服地休息一阵，我却去了市中心了解情况，加深印象。说实在的，越想克里斯托弗的这番话，我就越是心烦意乱，因此，到最后，我们来到车跟前，克里斯托弗帮我开了车的客门后，我没说一句话就钻进了车里。

“我们也不是太迟，”他说着，走进来坐在驾驶座上。“只要路况不错，我们很快就能到。”

他说这话的时候，我一下子想起了我今天允诺的其他约会。比如说，菲奥娜的事——毋庸置疑，她在公寓里随时等候我的到来。看这情况，我明白自己必须坚定果断一点。

他发动了车子，很快我们便沿着又陡又弯的小路下行。克里斯托弗好像很熟悉路况，每个急弯都很有把握。往下开了一段，路没有那么多弯了，他之前提到的小木屋渐渐出现在我们两边，这些房子大多都矗立在险峻的地方。我终于转向他，说道：

“克里斯托弗先生，我非常期待与您和您的朋友共进午餐。听听你们这边的立场。然而，今早出现了一些意想不到的事情，所以我今天接下来会很忙。事实上，即便在我们说……”

“瑞德先生，您不必解释。我们一开始就知道您会有多忙，在场的每个人，我保证，都会非常理解的。如果您要在一个半小时后离开，甚至一个小时后就走，我向您保证，没人会生一丁点儿气的。他们都是一群好人，这城里唯一一群有能力在这个层次上思考和感觉的人。不管这顿午餐结果如何，瑞德先生，我保证您会很开心认识他们

的。我还记得当中很多人年轻热情时的样子。很好的一群人呐，我可以为他们每个人做担保。我想他们曾经觉得自己是我的追随者，现在他们仍然敬仰我。但这些日子以来，我们都是同事，朋友，或许甚至是更深的关系。最近这几年只是把我们拉得更近了。当然，有些人离开了我，这也是难免的。但是留下来的那些人，噢，他们一直很坚定。我为他们骄傲，我非常爱他们。他们是本城最大的希望，虽然我知道一时半会儿他们还没法儿在这里得势生威。啊，瑞德先生，我们很快就要经过之前跟您说起的那个小屋了。就在下个转角处，会出现在您那侧。”

他沉默了，我看了看他，发现他都快落泪了。我对他动了恻隐之心，于是轻轻地说道：

“谁都不知将来会怎样哩，克里斯托弗先生。或许您和您的太太哪天就能找到一间颇为类似的木屋呢。即便不在这儿，也会在别的某个城市吧。”

克里斯托弗摇了摇头。“我知道您是在安慰我，瑞德先生。但真的没意义了。我和罗莎已经彻底了结了。她就要离开我了。我知道已经有段日子了。其实，全城都知道了，想必您已经听到他们说三道四了吧。”

“呃，我确实是听到了一点……”

“肯定有很多闲言碎语的。我现在已不太在意了。重要的是罗莎很快就要离开我了。她不能容忍和我继续保持婚姻关系了，发生了这些事以后，她无法容忍了。您千万不要误会。这些年来，我们越来越相亲相爱，越来越相亲相爱。但您看，我们之间，从一开始，就有个共识。啊，就是那个，瑞德先生。在您右边。罗莎常坐在您现在的位置上，我们慢慢开过去。有一次慢慢开车经过，我们都特别陶醉，差点跟一辆上山的车撞上。但没错，我们之间有一个共识。我在本地独享其尊之时，她能爱我。哦，是的，她爱我，她真心爱我，对这一点我坚信不疑，瑞德先生。因为您看，对当时的罗莎来说，生命中没有什么比嫁给像我这样地位的人更重要的了。或许，这么说显得她有些肤浅。但您千万不要误会。她用自己的方式，她熟知的方式，深深地爱着我。无论如何，相信人们不管发生什么都会继续相爱，那是胡说八道。只是就罗莎的情况而言，呃，她就是这样的人，她只有在特定的条件下才能爱我，但这并不意味着她对我的爱有丝毫失真。”

克里斯托弗又沉默了片刻，显然陷入了沉思。路慢慢地转了一个弯，这边的景色突然跃入眼帘。我俯望下面的山谷，依稀辨别出看似富足郊区的大宅，每幢都有一英亩左右的面积。

“我刚才还在想，”克里斯托弗说，“我初到这个城市时的情景。他们一个个是多么激动啊。还有罗莎第一次在艺术楼是如何接近我的。”他又沉默了一会儿。然后说道：“您可知道，那时候，我对自己没抱什么幻想。在我人生的那一阶段，我已渐渐接受自己毫无天赋可言，也没半点有天资的迹象。诚然，那时我勉强强算是有了份事业，可是其间发生了很多事，迫使我看清了自己的局限。我初来这座城市的时候，本计划平平静静过日子——拿点微薄的工资，或许可以教教书，诸如此类的。但后来呢，这儿的人们，他们颇为欣赏我那一点点才华。我来到这儿，他们可高兴呢！过了一段时间，我开始觉得，毕竟，我一向勤奋工作，非常勤奋，努力追寻现代音乐方法。我确实也懂得了一些。我环顾四周，想着，呃，是啊，我可以在这儿做点贡献。在这样一个城市，在这样的环境下，我明白自己该怎么做了。我明白自己该怎么做了，说不定能真正做点好事呢。嗯，瑞德先生，过了这么多年，我坚信我确实做了些有价值的事情。我真的相信。不只是我的追随者——我的同事们，我应该说，我的朋友们，您很快就会见到他们——不仅仅是他们让我这么想。不，我也坚信如此，非常肯定。我在这儿做了些有价值的事。但您也知道，像这样的城市，人们的生活迟早要出岔儿。他们渐渐有了不满，还有难耐的寂寞。这里的这些人呐，对音乐几乎一无所知。他们自说自话，唉，我们一定把一切都弄错了，我们完全对着干吧。他们居然这样指责我！他们说我的方法推崇机械呆板，说我是在扼杀自然的情愫。他们懂什么！我们马上就会向您展示，瑞德先生，我只是介绍了一种方法，一种体系，能让这里的人通过某种方式懂点卡赞和穆莱利他们的音乐，某种在作品中发现意义和价值的方法。先生，跟您说吧，我刚到这儿时，他们哭着喊着要这个呢。他们需要某种秩序，某种他们能理解的体系。这儿的人们，他们没达到那个层次，一切都行将崩溃。人们心有余悸，感觉事情在渐渐失控。我带了些文件，您很快就会明白一切。我肯定，您会明白目前的舆论多么误导人。好吧，我是平庸之辈，我不否认。但您会看到我的方向总是对的。我获得的那一点点成功只是个开始，一个有用的贡献。目前需要的是——希望您能明白，瑞德先生，您要能明白该多好啊，那这座城市就不会迷失了——目前需要的是一个人，好吧，一个比我更有才华的人，一个能够继续，能够在我所做的基础上继续建功立业的人。我是做出了贡献的，瑞德先生。我能证明，等我们到了您就能看到了。”

我们开出山路，到了一条主干道上。路又宽又直，广阔的苍穹展现在眼前。远处，我能看到两辆重型卡车行驶在内道上，但除此之外，前方的道路几近空空。

“瑞德先生，希望您不要觉得，”克里斯托弗过了一会儿说道，“觉得我今日带您出席此次午宴是我孤注一掷，谋划着在这儿重获往日的辉煌。我完全明白我的地位不可能恢复以往了。此外，我也没剩什么可以贡献的了。我已贡献了全部，我所有的一切，已经全部都献给这座城市了。我现在只想离开，离得远远的，到一个安静的地方，就我自己，再不和音乐有任何牵扯。自然而然地，我的追随者们在我离开时会一蹶不振。他们还不能接受这个想法。他们要我反戈一击。只要我一句话，他们就立马行动，使出浑身解数，甚至挨家挨户走个遍。我已经跟他们说了现在的情况，我很坦诚地作了解释，但他们仍然不能接受。对他们来说这太难了。他们素来敬仰我，通过我发现自己的人生意义。他们会崩溃的。但这些都没用，现在该结束了。我想让它了结算了。甚至罗莎也是。我们婚姻的分分秒秒对我来说都很珍贵，瑞德先生。但是我知道这段婚姻终究要结束，只是还不知道到底在何时——这太可怕了。我现在就想了断一切。我祝罗莎一切安好。希望她能找到别人，找个地位合适的人。我只希望她将目光投向城外。这座城市可没人能配得上她。这里没人真正懂音乐。啊，瑞德先生，要是我能有您这样的天赋该多好啊！那么我和罗莎，我们就能白头偕老了。”

天色已暗。路上车辆仍然稀少，我们随随便便就稳超长途卡车，然后开始加速。两边是茂密的森林，随后终于被大片平坦的农田所取代。前几天累积的疲劳感开始向我袭来，我看着眼前的公路延展，发现不打瞌睡都难。正在此时，我听到克里斯托弗的声音：“哦，我们到了。”于是我又睁开了眼睛。

第十四章

我们减速慢行，靠近一间小咖啡馆。这是一幢白色的小平房，孤零零地坐落在路旁，就是那种让人以为是货车司机半路停下吃个三明治的地方。当克里斯托弗驾车驶过满是砾石的前院并停好车时，我们并没看到其他车辆。

“我们要在这里用午餐吗？”我问道。

“没错。我们有个小圈子，在这里聚会已经好多年了。一切都很随意。”

我们下车，径直走向咖啡馆。靠近后，我看到几块鲜亮的硬纸板从雨篷上垂挂下来，上面标着各种特价优惠。

“一切都很随意，”克里斯托弗又一边说道，一边为我开门，“就当是在您自己家里一样。”

里面的装潢很简单。满屋尽是巨大的观景窗。到处都是用透明胶带粘贴的海报，上面登着各色饮料与花生的广告。有些因光照已经褪色了，其中有一张已经变成浅蓝色长方形纸片了。即便这会儿，天空多云，却还是有刺眼的日光照进屋里。

屋里已经有八九个人了，全部安坐在房间靠后的桌边。每人面前都有个热气腾腾的碗，盛的好像是土豆泥。他们正用长长的木匙狼吞虎咽地吃着，但这会儿全部都停了下来，盯着我。开始有一两个人站起来，克里斯托弗则开心地跟他们一一打招呼，挥手示意他们继续坐着。接着，克里斯托弗转身对着我，说道：

“您看到了吧，我们还没到，午饭就已经开始了。但因为是我们迟到了，相信您也会理解他们的。至于其他人嘛，呃，我肯定他们不会太久的。总之，我们不该再浪费时间了。请往这边走，瑞德先生，我向您介绍我这儿的好朋友。”

我正要跟上他，突然发现，附近服务台后面，一个身着条纹围裙、体格粗壮的大胡子男人正偷偷地给我们打暗号。

“好吧，格哈德，”克里斯托弗说道，转身朝他耸耸肩。“就从你开始吧。这是瑞德先生。”

大胡子男人和我握了握手，说道：“先生，您的午饭马上就好。您一定很饿了吧。”然后他飞快地低声对克里斯托弗说了些什么，边说边朝咖啡馆后面瞥了一眼。

我与克里斯托弗二人顺着大胡子的目光看去，一名男子独自坐在远处角落，好似一直在等着我们将注意力投向他，这会儿他站起身来。他身材健壮，头发灰白，可能五十多岁，穿着一件亮丽的白色夹克和T恤。他开始朝我们走过来，然后，在屋子近当中的位置停下，冲克里斯托弗微笑。

“亨利。”他说道，伸出双臂致意。

克里斯托弗冷冷地盯着那男子，然后别过脸去。“这儿不欢迎你，”他说道。

白色夹克男子没听见似的。“我刚才一直在观察你呢，亨利，”他继续和蔼地说道，手指着窗外。“看着你下车走了过来。你还是那样弓腰曲背地走路。以前那是装腔作势，但如今看来是成真了。亨利，你没必要这样子。事情也许由不得你，没必要弓肩缩背啊。”

克里斯托弗继续背对着他。

“别这样，亨利。太孩子气了。”

“我跟你说过了，”克里斯托弗说道，“我们之间没什么好说的。”

白色夹克男子耸了耸肩，又朝我们走了几步。

“瑞德先生，”他说，“既然亨利决计不想引见我们，那我就自我介绍咯。我是鲁班斯基医生。您要知道，我和亨利曾经非常亲密。但现在，您看，他甚至不愿与我讲话。”

“这里不欢迎你。”克里斯托弗仍然没看他。“这儿不欢迎你。”

“看到了吧，瑞德先生？亨利一直都有孩子气的这一面。太傻了。我本人呐，老早就认了，我们俩已分道扬镳。以前，我们常坐下谈天，一聊就是好几个小时。是不是，亨利？在斯哥芬霍斯的时候，我们常常边喝啤酒边深聊，条分缕析地探讨这部或者那部作品，从每个角度据理力争。有时候，我甚至希望自己根本没那么好的判断力与他唱反调。我多么希望今晚我们又可以坐下来，再花上几个小时讨论讨论音乐，讲讲你是如何准备这首或那首曲子的。瑞德先生，我自己

一个人生活，您想象得到，”他轻轻一笑，“有时难免会有些孤独，于是就开始怀念过去的那段时光。我暗自思忖，如果能和亨利再次坐下来，一起聊聊他准备的乐谱，那该有多好啊。曾几何时，他做任何事之前都会先来征询我的意见。是不是这样，亨利？好了，亨利，别孩子气了。至少，让我们彼此客气些吧。”

“为什么偏偏选今天呢？”克里斯托弗突然喝道，“没人要你来。他们全都还在生你的气！看看！你自己看看！”

鲁班斯基医生无视他的这一阵暴怒，开始回忆起他和克里斯托弗的其他往事。很快我便没再听了，转动眼珠，越过他看向坐在后排桌边紧张注目的人们。

他们看上去没有一位超过四十岁的。共有三位女士，其中有一位，我特别注意到，正高度紧张地看着我。她三十出头，穿着长长的黑衫，戴着一副镶有小小厚厚镜片的眼镜。我本想更加仔细地打量一下其他几个人，但就在这时，我又想起自己还要应对接下来忙碌的一天，而且，如果我不想在这儿耗太久的话，当下最为迫切的就是和主人坚定表明立场。

鲁班斯基医生打住话头，我碰了碰克里斯托弗的手臂，轻声说道：“我在想其他人还需要多久才到。”

“呃……”克里斯托弗四下看了看，然后说道：“今天可能就这么些人了。”

我感觉他希望有人反驳他。但没人说话，这时，他转过身来，对我咧嘴笑了笑。

“是个小聚会，”他说，“尽管如此，我们……我们镇上的精英都在这儿，我向您保证。现在，瑞德先生，请。”

他开始向我介绍他的朋友。每个人都紧张地微笑着，每当介绍到名字时，他们都会向我问好致意。这当儿，我注意到鲁班斯基医生慢慢地朝房间后面走去，目光始终未从我们的整个活动中挪开。然后，就在克里斯托弗快要结束引见时，鲁班斯基医生发出一阵大笑，打断了克里斯托弗，后者向他投去愤怒的冷冷一瞥。此时，鲁班斯基医生坐在角落的桌边，又大笑了一声，说道：

“好吧，亨利，这些年不管你失去了其他什么东西，你的勇气还是不减当年哪。你要向瑞德先生重复整个奥芬巴赫故事吗？向瑞德先生？”他摇了摇头。

克里斯托弗继续盯着他曾经的朋友，一些伤人的反驳之话似要脱口而出，但是最后关头，他不置一词，别过脸去。

“你要是想，可以把我扔出去啊，”鲁班斯基医生说道，开始吃起土豆泥来。“但看上去好像——”他拿着汤勺在屋子里挥动了一圈，“好像这儿并不是每个人都不想我来。要不我们来投个票吧。如果我真的不受欢迎，那我很乐意离开。举手表决，怎么样？”

“你要是死赖着不走，我才不在乎呢，”克里斯托弗说，“你在不在都没什么区别。我有事实证据，全在这儿。”他不知从哪儿拿出了一个蓝色文件夹，举起来，拍了拍。“我坚信我的立场。你爱做什么做什么。”

鲁班斯基医生转向其他人，耸了耸肩，仿佛在说：“对这样的人，你还能有啥法子呢？”戴着厚厚眼镜的年轻女子立刻移开目光，而她的同伴们看上去一头雾水，其中一两人甚至还回以羞怯的微笑。

“瑞德先生，”克里斯托弗说道，“请坐下，别拘束。等格哈德一回来，他就会端上您的午餐。现在——”他拍了拍双手，腔调仿佛是在大礼堂演讲一般，“女士们，先生们，首先，我谨代表今日在座的各位，对瑞德先生在这几日百忙之中欣然前来和我们一起辩论，深表谢意……”

“你真是有胆量啊，”鲁班斯基医生在后面大叫道，“没有被我吓到，甚至没有被瑞德先生吓到。真是有胆量啊，亨利。”

“我没有被吓到，”克里斯托弗反驳道，“因为我有事实证据！事实就是事实！都在这儿！证据！是的，即便是瑞德先生。是的，先生，”他转向我说，“即使是您这样的名流，即便是您也得尊重事实啊！”

“好吧，好戏要开场了，”鲁班斯基医生对其他人说道，“一个乡巴佬提琴手教训起瑞德先生来了。好吧，我们姑妄听之，我们姑妄听之。”

有那么一两秒钟，克里斯托弗犹豫了。接着，他毅然打开文件，说道：“请允许我从一个案例说起，我认为这案例会让我们了解环形和声争议的核心。”

接下来的几分钟，克里斯托弗概述了这个案例的背景（某个当地商业家族），同时迅速浏览了一下他的文件夹，偶尔读出一些引言和数据。他看似对展示此案例胜任有余，但语调中却带着些什么——不

必要地放慢陈述，反反复复地解释——这点顿时令我心生厌烦。没错，我突然觉得鲁班斯基医生有一点确实说对了，这个落魄潦倒的本地乐者竟自大妄为地教训我，的确有些荒唐可笑。

“就这你也好意思叫它事实？”克里斯托弗正读到市议会会议记录时，鲁班斯基医生突然插话进来，“哈！亨利的‘事实证据’总是那么有趣，是不是啊？”

“让他说！让亨利把案例展示给瑞德先生！”

说话的年轻男子脸圆圆的，穿着一件短皮夹克。克里斯托弗赞许地向他微笑示意。鲁班斯基医生抬起双手，说道：“好吧，好吧。”

“让他说！”圆脸年轻男子又说，“然后我们再看。听听瑞德先生怎么说，然后一切就水落石出了。”

过了许久，克里斯托弗似乎才领会了这最后一句话的含义。起初，他僵在了那里，双臂高举文件夹。然后，他四下看了看周围的面孔，仿佛是第一次见到似的。整个房间的人都直直地向他投去探寻的目光。一下子，克里斯托弗全身颤颤巍巍的。他移开目光，几乎是自言自语地喃喃道：

“这些的确就是事实证据。我这儿收集了证据。你们任何人都可以看，可以细读一下。”他凝视着文件夹。“我只是简短地对这证据做了个总结。仅此而已。”接着，一番努力后，他好似恢复了自信。

“瑞德先生，”他道，“请再给我一点时间。我相信事情很快就会水落石出的。”

克里斯托弗继续他的辩解，语气有些紧张，但除此之外，和之前大同小异。他起劲地说着，我不禁想起了昨晚，为了深入调查本地的情况，我放弃了宝贵的睡眠时间；尽管疲惫不堪，我坐在电影院，和该市的头面人物纵议大事。克里斯托弗一而再、再而三地说我孤陋寡闻——甚至这会儿，他东扯西拉，赘言连连，拼命解释一个我完全明了的问题——令我满腔恼怒，无以复加。

貌似不耐烦的并不止我一个。房间里很多其他人也局促不安起来。我注意到那位戴厚厚眼镜的女士目光来回转动，先是盯着克里斯托弗的脸，而后又盯着我，有好几次差点就要打断他了。但最后，是一位坐在我身后、头发剪得参差不齐的男子插了话。

“先等一下，等一下。我们继续之前，先确定一件事。一次性解决。”

鲁班斯基医生的笑声又一次从咖啡馆后面传了过来。“克劳德和他的混色三和弦！那个问题你还没解决啊？”

“克劳德，”克里斯托弗说道，“现在不是时候……”

“不！既然瑞德先生在这儿，我想一次解决掉！”

“克劳德，现在可不是重提那事的时候。我正展示论据证明……”

“也许这事微不足道。但让我们先解决吧。瑞德先生，瑞德先生，混色三和弦不论在何种背景下都有内在情感价值，是真的吗？您这样认为吗？”

我感觉众人的目光齐刷刷地落在了我身上。克里斯托弗飞快地瞟了我一眼，乞求中夹杂着惊恐。然而，鉴于此询问真挚而热切——暂不提克里斯托弗目前为止的放肆行径——我觉得没理由不给他一个最坦诚的回答。于是我说道：

“混色三和弦没有内在情感属性。其实，它的情感色彩不仅可以根据情景，而且也可以随着其音量显著改变。这是我的一家之言。”

无人开口，但我这一番话的影响明确显见。一道又一道严厉的目光转向克里斯托弗——这会儿他正假装全神贯注于他的文件夹。过了一会，那个叫克劳德的男子轻轻地说道：

“我就知道。我一直都知道。”

“但他却说服你，让你认为自己是错的。”鲁班斯基医生说道，“他威逼你相信自己是错误的。”

“这和其他事情有什么关系？”克里斯托弗叫喊道，“克劳德，你看，你把我们全带跑题了。瑞德先生的时间非常有限。我们得回到奥芬巴赫案例上来。”

但克劳德好似陷入了沉思。最后，他转过身，看向鲁班斯基医生，鲁班斯基医生点了点头，严肃地冲他一笑。

“瑞德先生的时间非常有限，”克里斯托弗又说，“所以，请诸位允许我对自己的论断作一总结。”

克里斯托弗开始概述他所谓的奥芬巴赫家族悲剧的几大关键因素。他摆出一副无所谓的样子，虽说到了这会儿，所有人都清楚他心

中极度不安。总之，这会儿我再也没继续专心听他讲话，他关于我时间有限的话，让我突然记起鲍里斯还坐在那个咖啡馆里等我呢。

我意识到我丢下他已经有段时间了，脑海中浮现出一个画面：一个小男孩，在我离开后不久，坐在角落里，吃着乳酪蛋糕，喝着饮料，依然满心期待地等着即将到来的远足。我能看到他喜气洋洋地盯着窗外阳光明媚的庭院里的其他客人，不时地越过他们，看着街上繁忙的交通，心想着用不了多久他也能出去郊游。他又一次回想起旧公寓，想起客厅角落里的壁橱，他越来越肯定，装有九号的盒子是落在壁橱里了。然后，随着时间一分一秒地过去，他那潜伏心底的疑虑，他至今一直掩藏完好的疑虑，就会渐渐浮上心头。然而，一时半会，鲍里斯仍能保持高昂的兴致。我只是因意外而耽搁了。或者，也许我去了什么地方采购旅行野餐物品了。不管怎么说，时间还早着呢。接着，那个女侍者，那个丰满的斯堪的纳维亚姑娘，会问他是否还需要什么，这当中透出一丝担忧，而鲍里斯肯定也能察觉。鲍里斯则会装出一副一点不担心的样子，或许逞能地再点一杯奶昔。但时间一分一秒过去。鲍里斯会注意到，外面院子里，他之后很久才来的客人都合上了报纸，起身离开。他会看到天空阴云密布，时间已经到了下午。他又会想起他曾深爱的旧公寓，客厅里的橱柜，九号，而且慢慢地，他一边兴致寡然地啃着剩下的乳酪蛋糕，一边听天由命地想，这一次自己又要失望了，这一次我们终究是没法成行。

耳边响起了几声叫嚷。一个身穿绿色西装的年轻男子起身，试图向克里斯托弗解释什么，同时，至少还有三人正挥动着手指，在强调什么。

“但那毫不相干，”克里斯托弗对他们喊道，“而且不管怎么说，那只是瑞德先生的个人观点……”

听了这话，大家对他群起而攻之，房间里几乎所有人都想同声开口回击他。但最后，克里斯托弗大喊着，又一次压住了他们。

“是的！是的！我完完全全清楚瑞德先生是谁！可是，要具体问题具体对待啊，具体问题，那是另外一回事！他还不了解我们的特殊情况！而我……我这儿……”

余下的话被人声淹没了，但克里斯托弗将蓝色文件夹高高举过头顶，奋力挥动。

“有胆啊！有胆啊！”鲁班斯基医生大笑着从后面叫喊道。

“恕我直言，先生，”克里斯托弗这会儿直接对我说道，“恕我直言，看您毫无兴趣倾听我们这里的情况，我无比诧异。事实上，我无比诧异，尽管您有专业知识，但您竟如此妄下结论，我无比诧异……”

众人再次齐声抗议，较之先前更加激烈。

“例如……”克里斯托弗声嘶力竭道，“例如，您竟然同意记者为您在萨特勒纪念碑前拍照，我无比诧异！”

令我错愕的是，这下大家突然沉默了。

“没错！”克里斯托弗显然对自己所营造的效应乐滋滋的。“没错！我亲眼看见了！就在我早先接他的时候，他就站在萨特勒纪念碑的正前面，面带微笑，朝它摆姿势呢！”

惊愕的人们依然沉默着。有几位显得越来越尴尬，而其他人——包括那位戴着厚厚眼镜的女士——则一脸疑惑地看着我。我微微一笑，正准备说些什么，就在这时，鲁班斯基医生的声音——此时既克制又威严——从后面传来：

“假如瑞德先生选择做出如此举动，那只能表明一点。那就是，我们误入歧途的程度甚至远比我们想的更深。”

所有人的目光都转向了他，他起身，向大家走近了几步。鲁班斯基医生停下来，头侧向一边，好像在倾听远处高速公路传来的声音。然后，他继续道：

“他所讲的这个信息，我们每个人都必须仔细审视，铭记于心。萨特勒纪念碑！当然，他是对的！没有对此事夸大其词，一刻也没有！看看你们吧，仍然想死死守着亨利那愚蠢的观念不放！甚至我们这些识破了其真实面目的人，甚至是我们啊，说实在的，我们一直都在自鸣得意。萨特勒纪念碑！是的，没错。这座城市已经危在旦夕了。危在旦夕！”

令人高兴的是，鲁班斯基医生立即强调了克里斯托弗论调的荒诞可笑，同时还强调了我希望传达给整座城市的强烈信息。尽管如此，这会儿，我对克里斯托弗已经相当愤怒，觉得此刻正是告诉他自己几斤几两的时候了。但整个房间再次立刻叫嚣起来。那个叫克劳德的男子一次次地挥拳猛击桌面，对着一个头发斑白、穿着背带裤和一双满是污泥的靴子的男子强调着某个观点。至少有四个人正从房间的不同方位朝着克里斯托弗大喊大叫。场面濒临混乱，我突然想到此刻正是

我抽身离开的好时机。但我刚站起来，戴着厚厚眼镜的年轻女子突地出现在我面前。

“瑞德先生，请告诉我们，”她说道，“让我们弄个水落石出。亨利认为，我们无论如何都不能抛弃卡赞的动态循环，这对吗？”

她说话的声音不大，但嗓音却极具穿透力。整个房间都听到了她的问题，大家立刻安静下来。她的几个同伴向她投去探查的目光，但她满不在乎地盯了回去。

“不，我要问，”她道，“这机会千载难逢，不能浪费了。我要问。瑞德先生，求求您。告诉我们。”

“但我有事实为证，”克里斯托弗可怜地低声道，“这里。全在这儿。”

没人在意他，每个人的目光都再一次集中在我身上。我意识到，接下来我得仔细斟酌自己的措辞。我顿了一顿，然后说道：

“我个人的观点是，卡赞从未获益于形式化的约束，亦未从动态循环或者甚至是双纵线结构中获益。只是，他的作品有太多层面，太多情感，特别是他晚期的作品。”

一股崇敬之情澎湃而至，我几乎能感同身受。圆脸男子近乎敬畏地看着我。一位穿着深红色皮夹克的女子喃喃自语道：“就是这样，就是这样。”仿佛我刚才一举道出了她多年来一直苦苦想表达的心声。那名叫克劳德的先生业已起身，此时朝我走近了几步，一个劲地点着头。鲁班斯基医生也在颌首点头，但速度缓慢，双眼紧闭，仿佛在说：“所言极是，所言极是，终于来了个行家。”不过，那位戴着厚厚眼镜的女子仍一动未动，继续仔细地看着我。

“我能理解，”我继续道，“为什么有人想利用这些策略。生怕这音乐淹没了音乐家的才智，这是可以理解的。但是，回应之道应当是奋起直面这一挑战，而不是去捆人手脚。当然，挑战可能会十分巨大，那样的话，解决之途就是干脆撇开卡赞。不管怎样，我们不应作茧自缚，故步自封。”

听了这一席话，房间里许多人似乎再也无法抑制自己的情感。头发斑白、穿着斑驳污泥靴子的男子突然使劲地鼓起掌来，同时向克里斯托弗投去十分厌烦的目光。其他几个人又开始冲克里斯托弗大声叫嚷，身穿深红色皮夹克的女子又在啧啧重复，这一次声音更为洪亮：

“就是这样，就是这样，就是这样。”我感到一阵莫名的激动，于是提高嗓门，声音盖过愈发兴奋的人声，继续道：

“依我的经验看来，这些勇气上的缺失，通常是和其他令人生厌的特征联系在一起的。对内省音调的敌意，大多表现为过度使用破碎节奏，偏好支离破碎乐段间的毫无意义的匹配。而且，从我个人层面上讲，谦虚友善的态度背后是狂妄自大的伪装……”

这会儿房间里每个人都开始冲克里斯托弗大喊大叫，我只好中断。而他却反过来高举蓝色文件夹，拇指在半空中翻着夹页，哭喊道：“事实证据就在这儿！这儿！”

“当然，”盖过噪音，我大声喊道，“这是另一种很常见的失败。相信把东西放在文件夹里就会变成事实！”

这话惹来一阵雷鸣般的大笑，当中是毫无掩饰的愤怒。接着，那位戴着厚厚眼镜的年轻女子起身，走到克里斯托弗身边。她镇定自若，穿过了至今仍保留在提琴家周围的那一小片空间区域。

“你这个老傻瓜，”她说道，声音又一次清晰地穿透喧闹声。“你把我们全和你一起拖下水了。”接着，带着某种从容淡定，她反手打了克里斯托弗一巴掌。

众人皆愕，一阵沉默。然后，突然间，人们从椅子上起身，互相推搡着，试图靠近克里斯托弗，显然他们迫不及待地想效仿那位年轻女子。我发觉有只手摇了摇我肩膀，但此刻，我正专注于对付眼前要发生的事情，无暇他顾。

“不，别这样，够了！”不知怎的，鲁班斯基医生第一个靠近克里斯托弗身边，高举双手。“不行，放过亨利！你们这是在干吗？够了！”

或许正是鲁班斯基医生的介入才将克里斯托弗从人们的群起攻击中解救出来。我瞥了一眼克里斯托弗迷茫、惊恐的面庞，愤怒之气在他周围升腾，之后就看不见他了。那只手又摇了摇我肩膀，我扭头一看，发现那个穿着围裙的大胡子男人——我想起他的名字叫格哈德——正端着一碗热气腾腾的土豆泥。

“您想不想来点午餐，瑞德先生？”他问道，“我很抱歉，有点晚了。但您看，我们得重新做一桶。”

“您真是太好了，”我说，“但其实，我真的得走了。我的小孩还在等我呢。”然后，我引着他远离嘈杂声，对他说道：“您能不能告诉我如何走到前门。”没错，那一刻，我想起这间咖啡馆与我留下鲍里斯的那间实际上隶属于同一座大楼，这座大楼设有各色房间，通向不同的街道，以迎合不同种类顾客的需要。

我拒绝了享用午餐，大胡子男子显然很失望，但他很快恢复神色，说道：“当然，瑞德先生。这边请。”

我跟着他走到房间的前面，绕过服务台。他打开一扇小门，示意我走进去。我边走边最后朝身后瞥了一眼，只见圆脸男子站在桌子上，在空中挥动克里斯托弗的蓝色文件夹。这会儿，愤怒的叫喊声中夹杂着几声讪笑，同时，能听见鲁班斯基医生饱含感情地恳求道：“别，别，亨利已受够了！拜托，拜托！够了！”

我来到一间宽敞的厨房，里面贴满白色瓷砖。一阵浓烈的醋酸味扑面而来，我看见一个结实粗壮的女人弯腰蹲在滋滋作响的火炉前，而大胡子男子已经穿过房间，打开了厨房远处角落的另一扇门。

“这边请，先生。”他说着，引着我走。

这扇门特别高，又特别窄。确实啊，太窄了，我觉得只能侧身通过。而且，我透过它往里瞧时，只能看到一片漆黑；所有迹象都表明，此时此刻我窥视的应该是扫帚柜。但大胡子男子又做出了引领的动作，说道：

“请小心台阶，瑞德先生。”

这时我才看到有三级台阶——看上去像是用木头箱子头顶头地钉起来的——紧贴着门槛处升起。我缓慢穿过门廊，小心翼翼地踩着每一级台阶。走到最高一阶时，我看到前面有一小股矩形的光亮。再往前走两步，透过玻璃嵌板，我看到一个洒满阳光的房间，看到了桌椅，而后，我认出这正是我先前留下鲍里斯的那个房间。那个丰满的年轻女侍者——我正从她柜台后面观察整个房间——还有，那边角落，鲍里斯正盯着空气发呆，脸上一副不满的表情。乳酪蛋糕已经吃完了，这会儿正心不在焉地把玩着叉子，在桌布上举起落下。除却一对年轻情侣坐在靠窗的位置上外，咖啡馆里其他地方都是空荡荡的。

我感到有东西在身侧顶了顶，发现大胡子男子挤到了我身后，这会儿在黑暗中蹲下身来，一串钥匙叮当作响。过了片刻，身前的整个隔板门打开了，我一脚踏进了咖啡馆。

那位女侍者转身对我莞尔一笑，然后朝另一边的鲍里斯喊道：“看谁来了！”

鲍里斯扭头看我，脸拉得老长。“你干嘛了？”他厌倦地问道。“怎么那么久啊。”

“很抱歉，鲍里斯。”我说道。然后我问女侍者：“他乖吗？”

“哦，他可完全是个迷人精。他一五一十地跟我描述你们过去生活的地方。人工湖旁边的住宅区。”

“啊，是的，”我说，“人工湖。是的，我们正准备去呢。”

“可你一去就呆了那么久！”鲍里斯说，“现在我们要迟到了！”

“真的很抱歉，鲍里斯。但别担心，我们还有很多时间呢。旧公寓在那儿又跑不了，是不是？不过，你说得对，我们得立刻出发了。现在得让我考虑考虑。”我转身面对那女侍者，她正跟大胡子男子说着什么。“抱歉，请问你能否告诉我们怎么最快到达人工湖？”

“人工湖？”女侍者指着窗外，“外面等着的那辆公交车，它可以载你们去那儿。”

我看了看她指的地方，透过庭院里的一顶顶阳伞，可以看到一辆公交车停在繁忙的街道上，差不多就在我们正前方。

“它在那儿已经等了很久了，”女侍者继续说，“所以你们最好赶紧上车。估计应该随时会走。”

我谢过她，然后向鲍里斯示意，带头走出大楼，走进了阳光中。

第十五章

司机发动引擎的时候，我们上了车。我向他买票时，看到车里满满当当，于是焦虑地说：

“我希望能和孩子坐一起。”

“哦，不用担心。”司机说，“车上的这群人都很友好。包在我身上吧。”

说完，司机便扭过头，大声说了些什么。整个车厢本是一派快乐异常的喧嚣景象，此刻顿时安静了下来。接着，整个车厢的乘客都从座位上站了起来，挥手比划着，商量如何最好地安顿我们。一位身材高大的女子侧身至中间过道，大叫道：“这儿！你们可以坐这儿！”但另一个声音从车厢的另一个方向传来：“你带着个小男孩，最好到这儿来，孩子就不会晕车。我可以坐到哈特曼先生旁边。”然后，又开始了一阵关于我们该坐哪儿的讨论。

“你看吧，他们是群好人。”司机开心地说道，“新上车的人总是特别受欢迎。好吧，你们要是坐好了，我就要出发喽。”

我和鲍里斯连忙沿过道疾步走到两名站着的乘客那儿，他们都指着座位让我们坐。我把鲍里斯安置在离窗户最近的位置，刚坐下，汽车就发动了。

紧接着，我感觉有人拍了拍我肩膀，坐在身后的一个人伸手递过来一包糖果。

“小孩或许会喜欢这个吧。”一个男声说道。

“谢谢。”我说。然后，我对着整个车厢大声说道：“谢谢。谢谢大家。你们太客气了。”

“瞧！”鲍里斯兴奋地抓着我的胳膊。“我们快要上北高速了。”

我还没来得及回答，一位中年妇女就来到我身旁的过道。她紧紧抓着我座位的头托保持平衡，拿出了一块蛋糕，用纸巾垫着的。

“后排的一位先生剩下的，”她说，“他想没准儿这个小伙子会喜欢呢。”

我感激地接下了蛋糕，再次向全车人道谢。然后，那女人不见了，我听到一个声音从几个座位开外传来：“看到父子相处得这么好，太好了。瞧瞧他们，一起来个一日游。这年月类似的事几乎不多见了。”

听到这话，一阵强烈的自豪感油然而生，我转头看着鲍里斯。或许他也听见了，所以冲我微微一笑，这一笑可是心照不宣，一切尽在不言中。

“鲍里斯，”我说着把蛋糕递给他，“这辆车是不是棒极了？我们没有白等，你不觉得吗？”

鲍里斯又微笑了一下，但这会儿他正仔细地检查着蛋糕，什么都没说。

“鲍里斯，”我继续道，“我一直想跟你说的。因为有时你可能会纳闷。你看，鲍里斯，我再没什么奢求的了……”我突然间大笑起来。“听起来很傻吧。我的意思是，我很开心。因为你。我们在一起，我很开心。”我又大笑了一阵。“你也很享受这段巴士之旅，是不是？”

鲍里斯点点头，嘴里塞满了蛋糕。“不错。”他说。

“我当然也很享受这段旅程。这些人多么友好！”

车厢后排的几位乘客开始唱歌。我放松心情，深窝在座位上。车外，天空又阴沉沉的了。我们仍然行进在城市林立的高楼中，我仔细看了看，发现路过了两个路标，一个跟着一个，上面写着：“北高速”。

“不好意思，打扰一下，”不知后面何处传来了一位男子的声音，“我刚才听到你对司机说想去人工湖，但愿你们俩在那儿不会觉得太冷。如果你们只是想找个好地方玩上一下午的话，我建议你们提前几站下车，在玛丽亚·克莉丝提娜花园下车。那儿有个泛舟池，这个小伙子可能会喜欢。”

说话的人就坐在我们正后面。我们座椅的靠背很高，即便伸长了脖子转了转，我也看不清楚那男子的样貌。但不管怎样，我还是感谢他的建议——显然他是出于一片好意——并开始解释我们此番去人工

湖的特别含义。我原本不想细说的，但我一打开话匣子，就发现周围欢快的气氛使得我不由自主地滔滔不绝起来。其实，我对自己的口吻甚是满意，那是严肃与诙谐之间完美的平衡。再者，从身后善解人意的低语声中可以判断，那男子听得很是认真，而且感同身受。总之，不一会儿，我就解释起九号以及他为何如此特别的缘由来。我刚要重新细述鲍里斯如何将之落在盒子里时，那位乘客礼貌地咳嗽了一声打断了我。

“抱歉，打断一下，”他说，“不过这种行程，让人感觉有点担心，也是在所难免的。这很正常。但说真的，在我看来，你完全有理由保持乐观。”想必他坐在座位上，正倾身向前，而他的声音，既镇静又抚慰人，从鲍里斯肩膀的正后方传来，鲍里斯的肩紧挨着我的。

“我肯定你们会找到九号的。当然，你们这会儿很担心。你们会觉得世事难料，很多事都可能出岔子。这很正常。但从刚刚你告诉我的来看，我肯定一切都会安好无恙。当然，你们刚开始敲门的时候，新入住的人可能不知道你们是谁，会有些疑虑。但是，你们一解释来意后，他们一定会欢迎你们进去。假如是妻子来应门，她会说：‘哦，终于来了！我们一直在想你们什么时候会来呢。’是的，我肯定她会这么说。她会转身对丈夫喊：‘是原先住这里的小男孩！’随后丈夫会出来，他是个很和善的人，或许他正忙着重新装修公寓呢。他会说：‘啊，终于来了。快进来喝杯茶吧。’他领你们走进主间，而他妻子则会溜进厨房准备茶点。你们会立刻发现那地方自你们离开后改变有多大，丈夫会察觉到，并首先表示歉意。然后，你们一旦说明你们一点不讨厌他们做出的改变，他必定会带你们参观整个公寓，一一指出这变化，那变化，大部分都是他亲自动手改造的，并引以为豪呢。之后，妻子会端上她准备的茶点来到客厅，你们几个坐了下来，喝茶，品尝点心，听着这对夫妇谈论他们如何喜欢这公寓和小区。当然，整个过程中，你们俩会始终挂念着九号，等待合适的时机说明此行来意。但我觉得他们会先提出来。聊天喝茶好一会儿之后，我估计妻子会说：‘你们回来有什么事吗？有什么东西落下了吗？’这时，你们就可以提到九号和那个盒子了。然后，她一定会说：‘哦，对了，我们把那盒子保存在一个特别的地方。看得出来，它很重要。’说这话的时候，她会给丈夫一个小暗号。或者甚至不用暗号，因为夫妻俩开开心心地共同生活了许多年，几乎有心灵感应了。当然，不是说他们不吵架。哦，不，他们甚至可能经常拌嘴，甚至或许在这些年共挨艰辛时，真的闹翻了。可是，你见到这样一对夫妻时，你就会明白这些事情最终将他们磨合，他们终究幸福地生活在一起。呃，那个丈夫，他会从放重要物品的地方去取那个盒子，把它拿进

来，说不定还用棉纸包着呢。当然，你们会立刻打开盒子，而这个九号，他就在里面，还是你们落下他时的样子，仍然等待着你们将他粘回底座。然后你们就可以盖上盒子，友善的夫妻会再给你们续茶。然后，过了一会儿，你们会说，你们得走了，你们不希望给他们添太多麻烦。但那妻子非要你们再吃一块她做的蛋糕，而丈夫想带你们两个最后一次看一看公寓，欣赏一下他装修的杰作。最后，他们站在门阶上向你们挥手道别，说你们无论何时经过，都一定要来坐坐。当然，不一定要像这一模一样，但从你刚才告诉我的看，我肯定，差不离儿，会是这个结果。所以没必要担心，根本没必要……”

巴士在高速路上继续行进，那男子的声音随着巴士轻微的摇摆回响在我耳边，让我感到惬意无比。他刚开始讲话没多久，我就已经闭上了眼睛，而现在这会儿，我更是深深地窝在座椅里，心满意足地打起盹来。

我察觉到鲍里斯正在摇我肩膀。“我们得下车了。”他说道。

完全清醒后，我发现巴士已经靠站，车厢里只剩下我们了。前面，司机已经站起身，耐心等待我们下车。我们走出过道时，司机说：

“多加保重。外面特冷。依我看，那湖早该填了。它简直就是害人精，每年总有几个人淹死在里面。诚然，有几位是自寻短见，而且，我认为即便没有那湖，他们说不定会选择其他更为不堪的方式。但在我看来，真应该把那湖给填了。”

“是的，”我说，“显然，那湖争议很大。我本人是局外人，所以还是想远离这些纷争。”

“非常明智，先生。呃，祝您愉快。”然后，他向鲍里斯道别：“玩得开心点，小伙子！”

我和鲍里斯下了车，车开走时，我们环顾了一下四周。我们正站在一个巨大的混凝土水池的边缘。不远处，人工湖就坐落在盆地中央，呈腰子状，看上去就像好莱坞明星的大泳池的翻版。我对这湖——其实是整个小区——的人造痕迹不胜惊讶：它表现得如此淋漓尽致，却还引以为豪。没有半点绿草的踪迹。甚至混凝土斜坡上点缀的几棵瘦小的树木都被移植在小铁罐里，修剪后恰好插入石砖路。俯瞰整个景观，周围全是千篇一律的高层住宅小区的窗户。我发现每幢楼前都有一条巧妙的弯道相连，因而成了密封的环状，让人想起了体育

馆。尽管四周公寓林立——少说也有四百间——但几乎看不见任何人。我能依稀辨出湖那边有几个人影在轻快地走着——一位男士牵着一只狗，一位女士推着一辆婴儿车——但空气中显然弥漫着什么东西，使得人们闭门不出。当然，正像巴士司机之前提醒的那样，天公可不算作美。就在我和鲍里斯站在那边这么一会儿，湖面便有恶风迎面吹来。

“好了，鲍里斯，”我说，“我们还是出发吧。”

小男孩似乎已经失去了兴致，他眼神空洞地盯着湖面，一动不动。我转身面向身后的建筑群，想上足发条，迈开步子，但马上就意识到自己根本不清楚在这一片广袤中，我们的那所公寓到底在哪儿。

“鲍里斯，要不你来带路呢？来吧，怎么了？”

鲍里斯叹了口气，然后开始走。我跟着他上了几级水泥台阶。我们正要转弯攀爬下一段台阶时，他发出一阵尖叫，身子一僵，摆出一个武术造型。我吓了一跳，但立刻明白他根本没有遇到攻击，只不过是小男孩的想象罢了。我淡然说道：

“很好，鲍里斯。”

此后，他不停尖叫，每每转弯要攀爬新的一段台阶时，都会摆出姿势。之后，就在我渐渐喘不过气时，鲍里斯领着我们下了台阶，走上了人行道，这可算让我松了一口气。从这制高点望去，腰子形状的人工湖更清晰了。天空苍白，尽管人行道被遮挡起来——正上方肯定还有两三个跑风口——但遮挡不足，道道劲风吹着我们。我们左手边是公寓楼，一连串短小的水泥台阶将人行道与主建筑连接起来，好似护城河上的小桥。一些台阶向上延伸至公寓门口，而另一些则向下延伸。我们一边走着，我就一边研究这些门，但几分钟过去了，没有一扇能引发我哪怕最模糊的记忆，于是我便放弃了，瞥开眼看着湖面的景色。

这期间，鲍里斯故意走在我前面几步，显然对我们这趟冒险之旅又有了兴致。他自言自语着，我们走得越远，他的自言自语声就越激烈。之后，他开始边走边跳，凭空耍出几下空手道动作，双脚落地的“咔哒”声回响在四周。但好在他没像刚才在台阶上时那样尖叫，而我们还没在人行道上遇见一个人，所以我也就觉得没道理制止他。

过了一会儿，我恰好向下瞥了一眼人工湖，惊奇地发现自己正从一个完全不同的角度观察。直到这时，我才意识到人行道正好围绕这

块住宅区形成一个渐圆形。很可能我们在无限绕圈。我看着鲍里斯在我前方急匆匆地走着，忙着表演各种滑稽动作，不禁怀疑他是不是跟我一样，也不记得去公寓的路了。的确，我意识到自己根本没有计划妥善。我至少应该事先辛苦一下，去联系一下公寓的新住客。毕竟，细细想想，他们没有理由特别想招待我们。我的心头顿时涌上了对整个行程的悲观情绪。

“鲍里斯，”我叫了他一声，“留意着点，可别走过了都不知道。”

他回头看了看我，嘴里仍然狂怒地念念有词，接着继续向前跑了几步，开始耍起空手道动作。

最后，我突然发觉已经走了相当长的时间，再往下看看那人工湖，看得出，我们至少已经围着它绕了一整圈。鲍里斯仍然在我前头念念有词。

“听着，等一下，”我叫他，“鲍里斯，等等。”

他停了下来，看我走了过去，就朝我摆出一副闷闷不乐的模样。

“鲍里斯，”我轻柔地说，“你确定你记得去旧公寓的路吗？”

他耸了耸肩，瞥开眼睛，漫不经心地说：“我当然知道。”

“但我们刚刚好像走了一整圈。”

鲍里斯又耸了耸肩，一个劲地鼓捣自己的一只鞋子，一会儿摆向这边，一会儿又移到那边。终于，他说：“他们会安全保存九号的，是不是？”

“我想应该是的，鲍里斯。他就在盒子里，一个看起来很重要的盒子里。他们会把那样的东西放在一边。比如说架子的高处，那样的地方。”

鲍里斯继续打量着鞋子好一会儿。然后他说：“我们走过了。我们已经走过两次了。”

“什么？你是说我们一直在这上面，寒风瑟瑟，白白绕了一圈又一圈吗？为什么你不说出来，鲍里斯？我真搞不懂你。”

他继续沉默，一只脚不停地挪向一边，然后另一边。

“好吧，你意思是我们往回走？”我问道，“或是再绕着湖走一圈？”

鲍里斯叹了口气，一时间好像陷入了沉思。接着他抬起头，说：“好吧。在后面，就在那儿。”

我们回头沿着人行道走了一小段距离。没多久，鲍里斯停在一节楼梯边，飞快地抬头，瞥了一眼公寓大门。然后他几乎立即转过身，再一次研究起鞋子来了。

“啊，对啦。”我说，仔细地打量着这扇门。事实上，这门——漆成了蓝色，几乎与其他门难以分辨——根本没有唤醒我的任何记忆。

鲍里斯回头看看公寓，然后立刻瞥开眼，脚趾头点着地。我待在楼梯底端好一会儿了，有些不确定接下来该怎么做。最后，我说道：

“鲍里斯，你在这儿等一会儿。我上去看看是否有人。”

小男孩仍旧一只脚点着地。我上去台阶，敲了敲门。没有回应。第二次敲门无果后，我将脸凑上小玻璃嵌板往里看。但因为是毛玻璃，什么也看不见。

“窗户，”鲍里斯在我身后喊道，“从窗户看看。”

我看见左边有一个露台模样的东西——其实不过是建筑物前方延伸的一段平台，十分狭窄，甚至放不下一张竖椅。我伸出一只手扶着栏杆，身体靠着台阶的墙前倾，刚好能从最近的窗户瞧见里面。我看到一个开放式客厅，餐桌顶着一头的墙壁，家具相当陈旧。

“看见了吗？”鲍里斯喊道，“看见那盒子了吗？”

“等一下。”

我尽量靠着墙壁，身体再倾斜点，意识到下面有个张着口的大洞。

“看见了吗？”

“等一下，鲍里斯。”

这会儿房间变得渐渐熟悉起来。墙壁上的三角钟，淡黄色海绵沙发，三层的高保真音响贮存柜；我看到了一件又一件物体，每当我的目光落在上面，心里就不觉泛起酸楚的相识之感。尽管如此，我继续端详房间，脑中产生了一种很深的印象，房间的整个后部——与主体部分连接形成一个“L”形——之前根本没有，是最近新增添的。然而，我继续观察，正是这房间相似的后部仿佛强烈地勾起了我的回

忆，过了一会儿，我才意识到，它像极了我和父母在曼彻斯特住了几个月的房子的客厅后半部。那房子是套城市排屋，又窄又小，终年潮湿，迫切需要重新整修，但我们都忍过来了，因为我们只需要呆到父亲的工作赚钱，能让全家搬到条件更好的地方就可以了。对于我，一个九岁的孩子，房子很快不仅仅代表着一个令人兴奋的改变，而且代表着一个希望，那就是对我们所有人来说，都将翻开一个崭新的、更快乐的篇章。

“那家没人住的。”我身后传来了一个男子的声音。我站直身体，看到他是从隔壁公寓里出来的。他站在房门口，在一段台阶顶上，与我所站之处平行。那男子大约五十上下，样貌沉闷，像条哈巴狗似的，头发蓬乱，T恤胸前湿了一大块。

“啊，”我说，“这么说，这间公寓是空的？”

这男人耸耸肩。“或许他们会回来。我和妻子，我们不喜欢隔壁不住人，但毕竟那麻烦之后，我跟你讲，我们就释然了。我们不是冷漠的人。但那之后，呃，我们就宁愿它像现在这样空着了。”

“啊。这么说它已经空了有段日子了？几周？几个月？”

“哦，至少一个月了吧。他们可能会回来，但如果他们不回，我们也不介意。听着，我有时挺替他们惋惜的。我们不是冷漠的人。我们自己也曾度过艰难时光。但像那样的话，呃，你也会想让他们离开的。我们宁愿它空着。”

“我明白了。很多麻烦。”

“哦，是的。说句公道话，我觉得应该没有身体上的暴力行为。但是，他们深夜大喊大叫，你又不得不听，就比较烦人了。”

“抱歉，但你看……”我向他靠近了一步，眼神示意他鲍里斯听得见我们讲话。

“不，我妻子一点不喜欢这样，”那男子没理会我，继续道，“无论什么时候，她都会将头埋在枕头里。甚至有一次在厨房，我进去一看，她头上围着个枕头在烧菜。太不舒服了。无论何时我们见到他，他都很清醒，非常得体。他走在路上，会飞快地向我们致意。但我妻子确信背后另有隐情。你知道，酗酒……”

“听着，”我愤怒地低语道，斜靠着分隔我二人的水泥墙，“你难道没看见有个孩子跟着我吗？该在他面前讲这种话吗？”

那男子低头看向鲍里斯，露出一副惊讶的表情。接着，他说道：“但他不小了，是不是？你不能保护他不受任何伤害。还有，你要是不喜欢说这个，好吧，我们就说点别的。假如可以，你想个话题吧。我只是告诉你事实是怎样的。但如果你不想谈的话……”

“不，我当然不想！我当然不想听……”

“好吧，这不重要。只是，我倾向支持他，而非她，当然这也很自然。假如他真的施暴，呃，那就是另外一回事了，但从未有证据显示如此。所以我倾向于怪她。好吧，他经常外出，但从我们了解到的，他必须得这样，全是他工作的一部分。我的意思是，对她来说，那并不是理由，那根本不是她如此行径的理由……”

“听着，别说了行吗？你有没有常识？孩子！他能听见……”

“好吧，他可能是在听。那又怎样？小孩子迟早会听到这些事情的。我只是在解释为何我会站在他那边，正因如此我妻子提到酗酒问题。外出是一回事，我妻子会说，酗酒又是另外……”

“听着，假如你继续的话，我现在就不得不即刻中止这谈话。我警告你，我会的！”

“你不能希望永远保护你的孩子，你知道的。他多大了？他看起来可不小了。过分庇护对他们不好。他得适应这个世界、缺点以及所有……”

“他还没到那个时候呢！还没到时候！还有，我不在乎你怎么想。你到底是怎么回事？他是我儿子，我说了算，我不会让这种谈话……”

“真搞不懂你干吗这么生气。我只是在闲聊。我只是告诉你我们对此事的看法。他们不是坏人，不是我们讨厌他们，但有时候太过了。听着，我想，声音穿墙而过，听起来总是更糟糕。听着，试图瞒这么大的男孩是没用的。你在打一场注定失败的仗。而且重点是……”

“我不在乎你怎么想！还要几年呢！我绝不让他，绝不让他听到这种事情……”

“你真蠢。我说的这些事情，就发生在生活当中。即使我和妻子，也有起起伏伏的时候。这就是我同情他的原因。我知道那是什么感觉，那一刻，你突然意识到……”

“我警告你！我会中止此次交谈！我警告你！”

“但话又说回来了，我从未喝醉过。酗酒确实会有影响。外出是一回事，但那样酗酒……”

“这是最后一次警告！你再说，我立即离开！”

“他喝醉的时候很是粗暴，但不是身体上的。好吧，我们能听见很多，他确实很粗暴。我们听不清楚全部的话，但是我们过去常常摸黑坐着，认真仔细地听……”

“够了！够了！我警告过你！我现在要走了！我要走了！”

我转身背对那男子，跑下台阶，到鲍里斯站的地方。我抓起他胳膊，就要急冲冲地离开，但此时，那男子开始在背后喊道：

“你在打一场注定失败的仗！他得清楚事实如何！这才是人生！没错！这才是真正的人生！”

鲍里斯带着些许好奇回头看，我不得不使劲地拽着他胳膊。有好一阵子，我们保持步调一致。但我不止一次地感觉到鲍里斯试图放慢速度，而我却继续前行，急着摆脱那男子可能追上我们的危险。直至我们慢慢停下时，我才发现自己已经严重虚脱了。我蹒跚着走到墙边——墙出奇的矮，刚刚齐腰——抬起手肘，斜倚在上面。我向外眺望看着湖面，看着那边的高层建筑，看着苍白无际的天空，等待胸口的起伏平静下来。

过了一会儿，我才意识到鲍里斯就站在我身边。他背对着我，拨弄着墙头的一块松松的砖石碎片。对刚刚发生的事，我感到些许尴尬，并意识到应该给他个解释。我还在努力思忖着说些什么，这时候鲍里斯仍背对着我，嘟哝道：

“那男人是个疯子，是不是？”

“是的，鲍里斯，十足的疯子。可能是精神错乱了。”

鲍里斯继续拨弄着那砖墙。接着他说：“已经无所谓了。我们不用去取九号了。”

“要不是那个男的，鲍里斯……”

“没关系。已经不重要了。”而后鲍里斯转过身来面对我，微笑道：“迄今为止我过得非常不错。”他轻快地说道。

“你很开心？”

“非常开心。巴士之行，所有一切，好极了。”

我不禁一时冲动想伸出手拥抱他，但我突然想到他可能会不知所措，或许会被这一举动吓到。最后我轻轻拨弄了一下他的头发，然后背过身去看风景。

风不再那么惹人心烦意乱，我们并排静静地站在那儿好一会儿，眺望着那边的住宅区。然后，我说道：

“鲍里斯，我知道你一定很疑惑。我的意思是，为什么我们不能安定下来，平静地生活，我们三个。你一定，我知道你会的，你一定在想为什么我总是得外出，尽管你母亲为此恼怒不安。呃，你得明白，我一直旅行奔波的原因，不是因为我不爱你们而极不想和你们在一起。某种程度上讲，再没有比和你们一起呆在家里让我更乐意的事情了，和你，还有你母亲，住在一个像那边那样的公寓里，或者其他任何地方。但你看，事情没那么简单。我得继续奔波，因为，你看，你永远无法预知它什么时候会到来。我的意思是非常特别的一次，非常重要的一次旅行，非常非常重要的一次旅行，不是为我，而是为所有人，世界上的每一个人。我该怎么向你解释呢，鲍里斯，你还这么小。你看，一不小心就错过了。比方说一次，不，我不去，我休息。而过后，我会发现就是那一次，是非常非常重要的一次。你看，一旦你错过了，就没有转还了，就太迟了。不论我之后如何努力，没用了，太迟了，而我之前的这些年就都白费了。我亲眼见到类似之事在其他人身上海发生过，鲍里斯。他们年复一年地旅行，渐渐开始疲惫了，可能还有些懈怠。在那一次来临的时候，他们却错过了，这种情况经常有。而且，你知道，他们余生会后悔，越来越痛苦、悲伤，到弥留之时，会变得筋疲力尽，衰弱不堪。所以你看，鲍里斯，那就是为什么。那就是我为何得坚持到此刻，一直不停地旅行。我也知道这会让我们境况变得比较艰难，但我得坚强，忍耐，我们三个都是。不会太久了，我肯定。很快就会来的，非常重要的那次，然后就结束了，我之后就可以放松，可以休息，可以如愿地呆在家里，没关系了，我们就可以过得开开心心了，就我们三个。我们可以做所有我们之前没能做的事情。不会太久了呵，我肯定，但我们必须耐心等待。鲍里斯，我希望你能明白我在说什么。”

鲍里斯沉默了许久。然后他突然直起身，厉声说道：“安静离开。你们所有人。”说着，他跑开几步，又开始他的空手道动作了。

接下来几分钟，我继续靠着墙，眺望着风景，听着鲍里斯狂暴的自言自语声。然后，我再看他的时候，发现他正在想象中表演他幻想

剧的一个最新版本，过去几周以来他已经演了一遍又一遍。毫无疑问，现在我们如此接近实际的背景，再演一遍自然也就不可避免了。因为剧本里涉及鲍里斯还有他外祖父，共同击退一帮街头混混，就在这人行道上，旧公寓的外面。

我看着他忙活，这会儿他已经远离我几码开外了，我猜快演到他和外祖父的那部分了，他们肩并肩地站着，全身戒备，准备好迎接再一次猛攻。地上已经有一大片不省人事的暴徒了，但一些最负隅顽抗的此时正重新排列队形，准备再一次攻击。鲍里斯和外公并排，平静地等待着，漆黑一片的人行道上，暴徒们却在耳语交流着攻击策略。这次，跟其他所有剧本一样，鲍里斯不知怎地年长了许多。并非全然成年——那样就太牵强了，而至于外公的年龄也会变得复杂——但却也足以使得必要的身体技能真实可信。

鲍里斯和古斯塔夫自始至终都给了暴徒们足够的时间，让他们组成有利阵形。然后，一旦下一波攻击到来，当行凶者从各方飞身袭来时，祖孙二人，一个合作流畅的团队，就会高效率地，几乎是悲痛地出手解决。最终，攻击结束——但，不，最后一个暴徒会从黑夜中跳出，手操一把凶狠的短刀。古斯塔夫站得最近，会使出一记快拳，直击其颈部，然后，这场打斗终于完结。

沉寂片刻，鲍里斯和外公会表情严肃地审视一番四周横七竖八躺倒的躯体。然后古斯塔夫精明老练的目光最后一次扫了一眼这场景，点了点头，见到此动作，二人会别过脸去，一副摊上了苦差事躲不掉的样子。他们会登上一段短短的台阶，来到旧公寓门前，在进门之前最后看一眼斗败的街头混混，有些这会儿已经开始呻吟或是爬着离开。

“现在好了，”古斯塔夫会站在门口大声宣布道，“他们走了。”

然后，我和索菲会紧张地出现在门廊上。鲍里斯紧随外公进门，会补充道：“但没有真正结束。他们会再来袭击一次，说不定就在明早之前。”

如此评断当时的情景，祖孙二人都清楚得很，甚至根本不用费力商谈，对此我和索菲却是悲痛欲绝。

“不行，我受不了了！”索菲会哀号，继而变为抽泣。我会搂她入怀，试图安抚她，但我本人的表情亦会扭曲成团。面对这番凄惨的景象，鲍里斯和古斯塔夫不会显出丝毫的轻蔑之情。古斯塔夫会安慰

地一只手搭在我肩膀上，说道：“别担心。有我和鲍里斯在呢。最后一次攻袭之后，就全都结束了。”

“没错，”鲍里斯会确认道，“他们最多再打斗一次。”接着面向古斯塔夫，他会说道：“外公，要不下次，我再试着跟他们说说，给他们最后一次退出的机会。”

“他们不会听的，”古斯塔夫会说，严肃地摇摇头。“但你说得对，我们应该给他们最后一次机会。”

我和索菲恐惧得不知所措，会消失在公寓深处，相拥而泣。鲍里斯和古斯塔夫则会四目相对，疲倦地叹了口气，然后，打开前门门，走回到外面。

他们会发觉人行道一片漆黑寂静，空无一人。

“我们也休息会儿。”古斯塔夫会说，“你先睡吧，鲍里斯。我听到他们来，就叫醒你。”

鲍里斯会点点头，坐在楼梯的最高一级台阶上，背靠着前门，很快睡着了。

一段时间之后，有人碰了碰他胳膊，他会双脚一跃，立刻清醒。而他外祖父这会儿早已经盯着前面人行道上聚起来的那帮街头暴徒了。跟以往相比，他们人多势众，他们不得不从城市里每个黑暗幽闭的深处召集成员，以作最后一搏。现在，他们全都在那儿，穿着破旧的皮衣和陆军作战服，系着粗犷的腰带，手持金属棒或是自行车链——他们自身的荣誉感不允许他们带枪。鲍里斯和古斯塔夫会慢慢下楼，接近他们，可能在第二个或者第三个台阶处停下。随后鲍里斯看到外公的暗号，会提高嗓音，开始说话，声音在水泥柱子间回响：

“我们与你们打斗多次了。看得出这次你们人更多了。但你们每个人内心深处一定知道你们不会赢。这次，外公和我不能保证，你们中有人不会受重伤。这场打斗已经毫无意义了。你们所有人曾经一定都有过家庭、父母或者兄弟姐妹。我想让你们明白发生了什么。你们一次次的攻袭，不断恐吓我们公寓的行为，弄得我母亲一直不停地哭泣。她总是紧张焦虑，搞得她经常毫无理由地斥责我。也逼得我爸爸不得不长期外出，有时还得出国，而这让我母亲讨厌。如此种种全是你们恐吓公寓的结果。也许你们这样做仅仅是因为你们精神亢奋，因为你们来自破碎的家庭，根本就不明白幸福家庭是怎样的。而这正是我想让你们了解真正发生了什么的原因，你们不顾后果的行为的真正

影响。结果迟早会是，爸爸再也不回家，说不定我们甚至得完全搬出公寓。这就是为何我得带外公到这儿，耽误他在一家大型酒店的重要工作的原因。我们不能允许你们继续如此行径。而这也是我们一再与你们战斗的原因。既然我跟你们解释清楚了，你们有机会好好考虑考虑退去。假如你们不走，那么外公和我别无选择只能再次与你们战斗。我们会尽全力打晕你们，而不造成持久性的伤害，但在大规模打斗中，即便我们这个级别的技术水平，也不能保证你们当中某些人最后不会鼻青脸肿，甚至伤筋断骨。所以抓住机会，后退吧。”

对这一番话，古斯塔夫会赞赏地微微一笑，然后二人会重新审视面前如野兽般的面孔。相当一部分人会不确定地互相对视，是恐惧而非理智迫使他们重新考虑。但之后，他们的头目——可怖、阴郁的角色们——会发出作战的嚎叫声，渐渐传遍队伍。然后他们会冲向前。很快地，鲍里斯和他外公会各司其职，背对背，灵巧地移动阵形，运用他们自己精心发明的空手道和其他搏斗技巧混合的战术。街头暴徒会从各个方向攻击，结果只会被旋转着、踉跄着打飞，口中发出阵阵恐惧的、惊讶的呜咽声，直至地面再次躺满不省人事的躯体。接下来许久，鲍里斯和古斯塔夫会一起站立等待，仔细观察，直到暴徒们开始混乱，一些人呻吟着，其余的摇着头想看看身在何处。这时候，古斯塔夫会上前一步，喝道：

“现在走吧，结束吧。别再骚扰这公寓了。你们开始恐吓之前，这曾是个开心的家。假如你们再回来，我和外孙别无他法，只能打断你们的骨头。”

这席话几乎没必要。街头暴徒们会明白这次他们是彻底输了，庆幸的是他们没有受更严重的伤。慢慢地，他们会开始手脚并用，一瘸一拐地离开，三三两两互相搀扶，许多人会痛苦地呻吟。

等最后一个暴徒一瘸一拐地离开，鲍里斯和古斯塔夫才会平静地看看对方，一脸心满意足的表情，转身回到公寓。一进门，我和索菲——我们已经从窗口目睹了整个场景——会喜气洋洋地欢迎他们凯旋。“谢天谢地，都结束了，”我会兴奋地说，“谢天谢地。”

“我已经开始准备一顿欢庆宴了。”索菲会大声宣布，开心之至，眉开眼笑，这会儿，脸上已卸下了所有的紧张。“我们太感激你和外公了，鲍里斯。我们今晚何不一起玩棋牌游戏呢？”

“我要走了，”古斯塔夫会说，“我在酒店还有很多事。要是还有什么麻烦，通知我就行了。但我肯定，一切都结束了。”

古斯塔夫下楼时，我们向他挥手道别。接着，关上门后，鲍里斯、索菲和我会坐好，准备安度一夜。索菲会在厨房忙里忙外，准备晚餐，轻声哼唱，而我和鲍里斯则懒散地坐在客厅地板上，全神贯注地玩着棋牌游戏。然后，大概过了一小时，索菲在屋外，我会突然抬头，一脸严肃地看着鲍里斯，悄悄地说：“谢谢你所做的一切，鲍里斯。现在一切都恢复正常了。像从前一样了。”

“瞧！”鲍里斯大喊，我看到他又站在我旁边，指着墙那边。
“瞧！是金姆阿姨！”

千真万确，我们下方的地面上站着一个女人，正疯狂地挥手吸引我们注意。她穿着一件绿色的开襟羊毛衫，却紧紧地拽着，裹着全身，头发被吹得乱糟糟的。发现我们最终看到了她，她大喊了些什么，却被风声淹没了。

“金姆阿姨！”鲍里斯向下叫喊道。

那女人用手比划着，又喊了些什么。

“我们下去吧。”鲍里斯说着，开始带路，一瞬间，又兴致勃勃。

我跟着鲍里斯跑下几级水泥台阶。我们到达地面的时候，劲风的巨大力道立刻打在我们身上，但鲍里斯为了那女人依然能做出蹒跚而行的动作，好似刚刚跳伞着陆。

“金姆阿姨”是个矮壮的女人，年约四十，那有些严厉的面庞确实眼熟。

“你们两个聋了吗？”我们向她走过去，她说道，“我们看到你们下了那辆巴士，我们就大喊、大喊，你们听到了吗？然后我到这儿来找你们，却哪里也寻不见你们。”

“哦，天哪，”我说，“我们什么都没听到，是不是，鲍里斯？一定是因为刮风。那么——”我四处扫了一眼，“你在自己公寓里一直看着我们俩？”

这个矮壮的女人模糊地指着远处，那些俯瞰着我们的无数窗户当中的一个，“我们不停地叫喊、叫喊。”接着，她转向鲍里斯，说：“小伙子，你妈妈就在上面。她特别想见你。”

“我妈妈？”

“你最好直接上去，她特别想见你呢。而且你知道吗？她做了一下午饭，准备了最棒的一顿盛宴，就等着你今晚回家呢。你做梦都想不到，她说她已经准备了一切，所有你最喜欢的，所有你能想到的。刚刚她正跟我说着呢，然后我们看向窗外，就看到你们俩刚下车。听着，我花了半个小时找你们两个家伙，都快冻僵了。我们非得一直站在外面吗？”

她伸出一只手。鲍里斯将其拉住，然后我们三人开始朝着她指的公寓大楼那走去。走近后，鲍里斯带头向前跑去，推开了一扇防火门，消失在里面。我和那矮壮的女人走近，那门忽闪着关上了。她边开着门让我，边说道：“瑞德，难道你不该在其他什么地方吗？索菲刚刚还在跟我说她电话怎么响了一下午。好多人都在找你呢。”

“真的吗？啊。呃，你看到了，我就在这儿。”我大笑了一声。“我带鲍里斯来了啊。”

那女人耸了耸肩。“我想你自己的事你心里应该有数吧。”

我们站在楼梯间底端，这里灯光昏暗。我身边的墙壁上是一堆信箱，还有防火设备。我们开始上第一节楼梯——上面至少还有五节——头顶上传来鲍里斯奔跑时的咔哒声，我听到他大声喊道：“妈妈！”然后传来开心的惊呼声，更多的咔哒声，接着索菲的声音说道：“哦，我亲爱的，我亲爱的！”从她声音的模糊度判断，他们在拥抱。等到矮壮女人和我走到了楼梯的平台，他们却消失在公寓房间里。

“不好意思，屋里有点乱。”那女人说着，领我进屋。

我从一个狭小的门厅进到一个开放式的房间，里面配备的是简约的现代家具。一扇巨大的观景窗是房间的主角，我进去时，看到索菲和鲍里斯一起站在窗子前面，灰色的天空映衬出他们的身形轮廓。索菲飞快地对我微笑了一下，然后继续和鲍里斯聊天。他们好像因某事而异常激动，索菲一直紧拥着鲍里斯的双肩。从他们指着窗外的动作来看，我猜想可能索菲正重新详述她和那矮壮女人早先如何发现我们的。但等我靠近些后，听到索菲说：

“真的。都准备得差不多了。只要把一些菜热一下，比如肉派。”

鲍里斯说了些什么我没听清，但索菲却回答道：

“当然可以了。你想玩哪个我们就玩哪个。等我们一吃完，你就可以考虑玩什么。”

鲍里斯怀疑地看着他母亲，我发觉他的态度有了些许警觉，没能让他或如索菲想的那般兴奋。接着，他跑到房间的另一角，索菲向我走近几步，悲伤地摇着头。

“抱歉，”她静静地说道。“那房子一点都不好。甚至可能比上月看到的那个还糟。景色很美，但刚好建在峭壁沿上，不够结实。迈尔先生最后也同意这看法。他认为如果强风刮过，房顶会掉下来，甚至可能接下来的几年内就会发生。我直接回来了，十一点到的家。很抱歉。你很失望喔，我看得出来。”她朝鲍里斯瞥了一眼，而他正仔细摆弄架子上放着的便携式卡带播放器。

“不要气馁，”我叹了口气说，“我肯定我们很快会找到的。”

“但我一直在想，”索菲说道，“在回来的汽车上。不管有没有房子，我们现在都可以一起做各种各样的事情。我一进门，就开始做饭。我想今晚我们可以吃顿丰富的，就我们三个。我还记得小时候，在母亲重病前，她常常这样。她常常做很多不同的菜，全拿出来，让我们挑选。那是多么美好的夜晚啊，我想，呃，没理由今晚我们不能像那样，就我们三个。我之前从没真正考虑过这件事，觉得厨房那个样子没法做，但我仔细看了一圈，意识到，我一直以来太傻了。好吧，跟理想状况相比确实差距甚远，但大部分都能用。所以我开始做。整整做了一下午。而且差不多所有的我都做了。所有鲍里斯喜欢的。就放在那儿等着我们呢，只需要热一下。我们今晚将会有餐盛宴啊。”

“太好了，我非常期待。”

“我们没理由不能做，即便在那公寓里。而且你一直如此通情达理，对……对所有事情。我仔细回想了一切。在回来的汽车上。我们现在得把过去抛之脑后。我们要一起开始重新做好的事情。”

“是的。你说得很对。”

索菲朝窗外看了一会儿。接着她说道：“哦，我差点忘了。那个女人一直打电话。我做饭的时候一直打，斯达特曼小姐。问我知不知道你在哪里，她找到你了吗？”

“斯达特曼小姐？呃，没有，她找我什么事？”

“她好像觉得你今天的一些约会弄乱了。她非常客气，一直道歉说打扰我了。她说她肯定你一切都游刃有余，只是打来核对一下，没别的，她一点都不担心。但接着十五分钟之后，电话又响了，又是她。”

“呃，没什么好担心的。呃……她原以为我应该在其他地方，你刚刚说？”

“我不确定她想说什么。她很友善，只是不停地打。我还因此烧焦了一盘鸡肉饼。接着，她最后一次打来时，问我是否期待今晚在卡文斯基画廊的招待会。你都没跟我说过，但她说的好像他们都很期待我去。所以我说，是的，我非常期待过去。然后她问鲍里斯是不是一样，我说是的，他也是，你亦如此，你真的非常期待。听到这个，她好像放心了些。她说她不担心，只是随口一提，仅此而已。我放下电话，起初有些失望。以为这招待会会妨碍我们的大餐。但然后，我发现我还有时间先准备好一切，那样的话，我们都可以一起去，然后回来，只要我们不呆太久，我们仍可以一起共度夜晚。接着我就想，呃，真是件不错的事。对我和鲍里斯来说是件好事，去像这样的招待会。”这会儿鲍里斯正朝我们这边走过来，她突然把手伸向他，一把把他拽过来抱了抱。“鲍里斯，你肯定会艳惊四座的，是不是？别在意其他人。随意些，你会很开心的。你会艳惊四座。然后，不知不觉地，就到回家的时间了，接着我们会共度一个真正美好的夜晚，就我们三个。我已经准备好了一切，所有你最喜欢的。”

鲍里斯疲惫地挣脱开母亲的拥抱，又走开了。索菲微笑地看着他，然后转向我说道：

“我们最好立刻出发，不是吗？卡文斯基画廊，从这儿走可能要花一段时间呢。”

“是啊，”我边说边看了眼手表。“是的，你说得有道理。”我转身对着那矮壮的女人，她刚回到屋子。“要不你给点建议，”我对她说道，“我不确定哪辆公交车去画廊。你知不知道那车是不是马上到？”

“到卡文斯基画廊？”那矮壮的女人轻蔑地看了我一眼，也只因鲍里斯在场，她才没有添油加醋地讽刺一番。然后她说道：“从这儿没有到卡文斯基画廊的公交车。你们得先乘车回到市中心。之后，得在图书馆外面等一辆有轨电车。准时到是不可能了。”

“啊。太可惜了。我还指望有公交车直接到呢。”

那矮壮的女人又嘲讽地看了我一眼，接着说道：“开我的车吧，我今晚用不着。”

“你可真是太好了，”我说道，“但你确定我们不会……”

“哦，少废话了，瑞德。你们需要车。否则没有其他办法能让你们准时到达卡文斯基画廊。即使有车，你们也得现在立刻出发。”

“是的，”我说道，“我正是这么想的。但你看，我们不是不想麻烦你嘛。”

“你们正好可以带几箱书。如果我明天得乘公交去的话，我拿不了。”

“好的，当然。乐意效劳。”

“明早把书载到赫尔曼·罗斯的店里，十点前随时可以。”

“别担心，金姆，”我还什么都没说，索菲就说道，“我一定办到。你真是太好了。”

“好吧，你们几个最好现在就出发吧。嗨，年轻人——”那矮壮的女人向鲍里斯打了个手势，“你帮我把这些书装箱吧？”

接下来的几分钟，我自己独自站在窗边看着外面的风景。他们几个已经离开，去了卧室，我能听到他们在我身后谈笑风生。我突然觉得应该进去帮他们，但接着我认为重要的是应趁机整理思绪，想一下接下来的夜晚。我继续盯着下面的人工湖。有些小孩开始对着水潭远处那侧的篱笆踢球，然而，除此之外，周围其他地区仍是荒芜一片。

我终于听到那矮壮的女人叫我，发现他们正等着离开。我走进门厅去找索菲和鲍里斯，发现每人都搬着个纸板箱，已经出去到走廊上了。他们动身下楼的时候开始争执起什么。

那矮壮的女人替我开着前门。“索菲有信心，今晚一切顺利，”她说，低下声音道。“所以别再让她失望，瑞德。”

“别担心，”我说，“我会确保一切顺利的。”

她冷冷地看了看我，接着转身下台阶，钥匙叮当作响。

我跟在她后面。刚下到第二节楼梯，我看到一个女人正迈着疲倦的步伐上楼。那人挤过矮壮的女人身边，咕哝了声“抱歉”，都已经擦肩而过了，我才突然发现那人是菲奥娜·罗伯茨，还穿着检票员的

制服。她好像也没有认出我，直至刚刚——楼梯上光线不好——她疲惫地转身，一只手扶着金属栏杆，说道：

“哦，你来啦。你能准时，真是太好了。很抱歉我来晚了。东环的有轨电车改线了，所以我当班的时间长了点。你没等太久吧。”

“没有，没有。”我慢慢地又往回上了一两级台阶。“根本不久。但很不凑巧，我的日程安排非常紧……”

“没关系，除非必需，我不会占用你太多时间的。事实上，我得告诉你，我给女孩子们打了一圈电话，我之前说过的，我休息时从车站食堂打的。我告诉她们等着我带个朋友来，但没告诉她们其实是你。起先本打算说的，一如我们之前一致商议的那样，但我最先打电话给楚德，一听到她那样说着：‘哦，是啊，是你，亲爱的。’我就能从这口气里听出她是多么的高傲乖戾。我知道她们如何整日谈论我，一个电话接着一个电话，还有英奇，还有其他所有人，讨论昨晚发生的事。所有人都假装为我惋惜，说她们得如何同情地对待我，毕竟，我像是个病人，而她们的责任就是友善助人。但当然，她们不会留下我的，像我这样的人怎么能成为她们基金会的一员？哦，她们今天一定很开心，我全听得出来，就是我一打电话，她说话的那副样子。‘哦，是的，是你，亲爱的。’于是我想，那好吧，我就不给你任何预警了。看看不相信我，你的下场如何。我当时心里就那么想。我真希望看到你开门，看到谁站在我身边，彻底失魂落魄的样子。真希望看到你穿着最糟糕的衣衫，或许是运动服，卸掉所有妆容，鼻子边的疙瘩完全清晰可见，头发就像有时候夹在脑后那样，看起来至少老了十五岁的样子。真希望看到你的公寓一团糟，到处都是那些无聊杂志，下流的黄色小报，家具里乱七八糟地塞满了言情小说，你会大吃一惊，不知道该说什么，什么都让你觉得尴尬，而你又一件接着一件地说些无聊至极的事情，让事情变得更糟。你想上些茶点，却发现家里什么都没，你会觉得之前没信我是多么的愚蠢。我们就那样做吧，我想。所以我没告诉她，也没告诉其他任何人。我只是说我会带一个朋友过来。”她停下来，自己平静了一会儿，接着说道：“很抱歉。希望这听起来不会让你觉得我是恶意报复。但我一直渴望着这一天。这是我继续前行的动力，是让我查完所有那些票、让我继续前行的动力。乘客们一定都会奇怪，我为什么像那样走来走去，你知道的，眼中放光。你要是赶时间，我想我们就得马上出发了。我们可以从楚德家开始。英奇应该和她在一起，通常，每天这个时间都是，那么我们首先马上就能搞定她们两个。我不怎么在意其他人。我就是想看看那两个人脸上的表情。好吧，我们走吧。”

她开始上楼梯，先前所有的疲惫一扫而光。楼梯仿佛走不到尽头，一节跟着一节，直至我拼命喘气。然而，菲奥娜却看上去丝毫没有费力。我们爬楼梯的时候，她继续说着，音量放低，仿佛周围的人会听到似的。

我们终于上完楼梯，我已经上气不接下气——胸腔发出了“呼哧呼哧”的喘气声——使得我没法留心周遭环境如何。我发现自己被领进一个昏暗的过道，经过几排大门，而菲奥娜却未曾发觉我的难处，继续带头向前行进。然后，她突然停下来，敲了敲门。我跟上她，被迫一只手倚在门框上，低着头，努力恢复呼吸。门打开的时候，我肯定一副弓腰驼背的模样，而身边却是得意洋洋的菲奥娜。

“楚德，”菲奥娜说，“我带了个朋友来。”

我费力站直身体，愉快地微笑起来。

第十六章

来开门的女人五十岁上下，身材丰满，一头花白短发。她穿着一件宽松的粉红色无袖套头衫，一条袋状条纹裤。楚德朝我飞快地扫了一眼，并没发现任何异常，于是转身对菲奥娜说道：“哦，你来了，那就进来吧。”

一副傲慢俯就的口吻，但没想结果竟提升了菲奥娜的预期，她鬼鬼祟祟地向我投来一笑，我们跟着楚德进了门。

“英奇和你在一起吗？”我们走进一个狭小的门厅时，菲奥娜问道。

“嗯，我们刚回来，”楚德说，“凑巧了，我们有很多料要爆。既然你刚好来了，那你就近水楼台了。你真是幸运哪。”

最后那句话好似全无讽刺之意。楚德穿过一扇门消失了，丢下我们站在小小的门厅里，我们可以听到她的声音从里面传来：“英奇，是菲奥娜。还有她的一个朋友。我想我们应该告诉她今天下午的事情。”

“菲奥娜？”英奇的声音听起来略带愤怒。接着，她压住情绪说道：“好吧，我看就让她进来吧。”

听到此番对话，菲奥娜再次兴奋地冲我一笑。这时，楚德的脑袋探出房门，示意我们走进客厅。

房间的大小和形状与那矮壮女人的家没什么不同，不过家具却过于花里胡哨，基本以花卉图案为主。或许是这间公寓的朝向不同，或许是屋外的天空明澈了些许——总之，午后的阳光透过大窗户倾洒而入。一踏进光线里，我就满以为这两个女人能认出我呢。很明显，菲奥娜也有此期待，因为我注意到她小心翼翼地站在一旁，生怕她在旁边减弱了气场。然而，无论是楚德或是英奇，看似对我都没有任何印象。她们二人匆匆而又漠然地朝我扫了一眼，接着，楚德冷冷地邀请我们入座。我们并肩坐在一张窄窄的沙发上。尽管菲奥娜起初很茫然，但她心中似乎已有定见：这一系列事件的意外转机，只会在一旦揭示谜底时增强效果，于是又冲我咧嘴微微一笑。

“你说还是我说？”英奇问道。

楚德显然听从于这位较年轻的女子，说道：“不，你说吧，英奇。应该你来讲。但菲奥娜，”她转向我们，“不许你告诉其他人。我们想为今晚的会面保留个惊喜，那才公平。哦，我们有没有告诉你关于今晚的会面？呃，我们这不是刚告诉你嘛。如果有时间，一定要来哟。不过既然你还有朋友和你在一起——”她朝我们点了点头，“如果你来不了，我们也完全理解。那，英奇，你说吧，应该你说的，真的。”

“好吧，菲奥娜，我保证你肯定爱听，我们度过了非常激动人心的一天。你知道的，今天冯·布劳恩先生邀请我们去他办公室，与他亲自商讨我们照顾瑞德先生父母的计划。哦，你不知道呀？我还以为你全知道了呢。好吧，我们今晚详细通报会面的进展，我现在只告诉你，进行得确实非常顺利，虽说被迫缩短了一点时间。哦，冯·布劳恩先生对此深表歉意，真是无比抱歉，是不是，楚德？他对自己得早点离场十分内疚，但我们得知缘由后，呃，我们就完全理解了。你看，他有一项非常重要的行程安排，是去动物园。啊，你可能会笑，亲爱的菲奥娜，但这可不是一次普通的行程，是一个官方团体，当然包括冯·布劳恩先生本人在内，要带布罗茨基先生去那儿。你知道布罗茨基先生从未去过动物园吗？但问题是，他们也劝柯林斯小姐去那儿。是的，去动物园！你能想象吗？都这么多年了！而那不过是布罗茨基先生应得的待遇，我们俩立刻都这样说。是的，他们到达时，柯林斯小姐也会到场，她会在一个约好的地方等待，官方团体会与她见面，她会跟布罗茨基先生交谈。全都安排好了。你能想象吗？过了这么久，他们要见面了，而且要实实在在地交谈呢！我们说，我们完全理解缩短我们会面时间的原因，但冯·布劳恩先生对我们太客气了，他显然很不好意思，对我们说：‘你们二位女士何不也一起去动物园？虽然我无法邀请你们加入官方团体，但或许你们可以从远处观望吧。’我们说我们真的太激动了。就在这时，他对我们说：‘当然，如果你们按我的建议行事，你们不仅可以一睹布罗茨基这么久以来第一次与他妻子会面的情景，还可以——’他顿了一下，是不是，楚德？他停顿片刻，然后酷酷地继续道：‘你们还可以近距离看到瑞德先生，他欣然答应加入官方团体。虽然我不能完全保证，但如果有合适的时机，我就给你们二位女士打暗号，把你们二位引荐给他。’我们绝对惊呆了！可是，当然喽，后来我们在回家的路上回想时——刚才我们还在互相说着呢——再仔细想想，就不会真的那么吃惊了。毕竟，我们过去几年有了长足的进步，为北京来客制作彩旗，还有为亨利·勒杜费尽心思制作午餐三明治……”

“北京芭蕾舞团，那才是真正的转折点。”楚德插嘴道。

“没错，那是转折点。但我觉得我们从未真正停下来思考过这个问题，我们只是兢兢业业，努力做事，可能从未意识到，一直以来我们越来越受到大家的尊重。坦率地讲，现今，我们事实上已经成为这座城市生活非常重要的一部分。我们早该意识到这一点了。事实摆在眼前，这就是为何冯·布劳恩先生亲自邀请我们去他办公室，为何最后他会在今天提出他的建议。‘如果有合适时机，我就把你们二位引荐给他。’那是他亲口说的，是不是，楚德？‘我知道瑞德先生见到你们二位会很开心，尤其是因为你们到时要照顾他的双亲，那是他最关切的一件事。’当然，我们一直这么说，是不是，一旦我们分配到此项任务，我们就有望被引见给瑞德先生了。但我们没料到这一切发生得这么快，所以我们非常激动。菲奥娜，怎么了，亲爱的？”

我身旁的菲奥娜一直不耐烦地扭动身体，想打断英奇连珠炮似的话语。英奇此刻终于停了下来，菲奥娜就用手肘轻轻碰了一下我的胳膊，投来一个眼神，好似在说：“快！此时不说，更待何时！”不幸的是，刚爬完楼梯的我依然上气不接下气，踌躇了片刻。总之，有那么尴尬的一瞬，三个女人都盯着我。然后，看我什么都不说，英奇继续道：

“好了，菲奥娜，你要不介意，我刚才话还没讲完呢。亲爱的，我相信你有许多非常有趣的故事要告诉我们，我们也很想听。毫无疑问，我们在市中心干这干那，做着我现在告诉你的这些事的时候，你在电车上又度过了非常有趣的一天，可是，如果你愿意稍等片刻，有些事儿可能会激起你一时的兴致。毕竟——”讲到这儿，她话音中颇含讥讽，已跨越了文明行为的界线，让我颇为吃惊。“这事关你的老朋友，你的老朋友瑞德先生……”

“英奇，拜托！”楚德插嘴道，但她唇边却挂着一抹微笑，二人彼此飞快交换了一下得意的笑容。

菲奥娜再次用手肘轻轻推了我一下。我瞥了她一眼，看得出她的耐心已消耗殆尽，迫不及待想让摧残她的人得到应有的惩罚，而无片刻延宕。我倾身向前，清了清嗓子，但没等我真的开口，英奇又开始讲了。

“呃，我想说的是，你细细想想，你就明白这种级别的待遇不过是我们理所应得的。显然，冯·布劳恩先生无论如何也是这么认为的。他一直都非常友善，对我们彬彬有礼，是不是？当他不得不离开

去市政厅会合官方团体的时候，他非常抱歉。‘我们会在大概三十分后到达动物园。’他继续道，‘我非常希望你们二位女士会去。’他告诉我们，如果我们能跟他们一行人保持五六米远的距离，就完全没关系。毕竟，我们的身份不仅仅是公众成员！哦，非常抱歉，菲奥娜，我们可没有忘了你，我们本打算向冯·布劳恩先生提起我们小组成员中有一位，也就是你，亲爱的，我们中有一位是瑞德先生的挚友，有多年友谊的、非常亲爱的朋友。我们已经下定决心要提起，但不知何故，我们就是没机会说这个，是不是，楚德？”

这两个女人再一次彼此交换得意的笑容。菲奥娜冷冷地盯着她们，强忍怒火。我意识到，这会儿事情已经太离谱了，于是决定介入。然而，此种做法的两种可行方案立刻呈现在我面前。一个选择就是礼貌优雅地介入英奇碰巧说出的连串话语当中，以吸引其留意我的身份。比如，我会突然间平静地插话道：“呃，既然我们无缘在动物园相见，那么我们欣然地在你自己的家中相见，又有何关系呢？”或者类似的话。另一选择就只是突然起身，或许边起身边甩出两只胳膊，直言不讳地宣布道：“我就是瑞德！”我自然希望选择一种会带来最大打击的方法，但犹豫不决的我再次错过了机会，因为英奇又开始讲话了。

“我们到了动物园，开始等，哦，大概等了二十分钟，是吧，楚德？我们在一个小小路边摊等待，可以在那儿喝杯咖啡，大概二十分钟之后，我们看到这些车辆直接开到大门口，这群尊贵的人下了车。大约有十或者十一个人，全是男士，冯·温特斯坦先生在，还有费希尔先生和霍夫曼先生。当然还有冯·布劳恩先生。布罗茨基先生走在这些人中间，看起来确实非常高贵，是不是，楚德？一点不像过去的样子。我们当然立刻寻找瑞德先生，但他不在当中。我和楚德一张脸一张脸看过去，但都是些老面孔，议员什么的，你知道的。有一瞬间，我们以为莱特梅尔先生就是瑞德先生呢，就在他刚从车里出来的时候。总之，他没有跟他们一起，我们还彼此说着，因为他繁忙的行程，可能稍迟一些会来。所有这些绅士都在，他们走上一条小径，全穿着黑色外套，除了布罗茨基先生，他穿了一件灰色外套，非常高贵的扮相，还有一顶与之相配的帽子。他们走过枫树林，全都迈着不紧不慢的步子，走到了第一个笼子处。冯·温特斯坦先生好像是主事人，不停指着东西跟布罗茨基先生介绍，指着每个笼子里的动物介绍。但看得出来，没人太多注意动物，他们都在为布罗茨基先生与柯林斯小姐的碰面紧张。我们也没法不紧张，是不是，楚德？我们继续走，转过弯走到中央广场，果真，柯林斯小姐在那儿，自己一人，站

在长颈鹿面前，看着它们。还有其他一些人来回踱着步子，但他们当然不知道，当官方团的人转过拐角，人们才意识到有事发生，恭敬地移开了，而柯林斯小姐还站在长颈鹿面前，看上去较先前更孤单了。官方团的人走近了些，她朝他们看了过去。她显得如此平静，你根本不知道她心里在想些什么。而布罗茨基先生，我们能看到他的表情，非常僵硬，偷偷地瞄向柯林斯小姐，虽说当时他们俩之间还隔了老远，中间还有猴子浣熊的笼圈。冯·温特斯坦先生好像在给布罗茨基先生介绍所有动物，好似这些动物全是一场盛宴的官方嘉宾一般，是不是，楚德？我们不知道这些先生为何不直接走到长颈鹿和柯林斯小姐那里，但很显然，他们已经决定采用这种方式了。真是太令人激动了，太感动了，有那么一刻，我们甚至忘记了瑞德先生出现的可能。能看到布罗茨基呼出的气息，薄雾蒙蒙，其他所有绅士也是一样，紧接着，只剩下几个笼子的时候，布罗茨基先生好像对动物失去了兴趣，他摘下了帽子。动作非常老式，却毕恭毕敬，菲奥娜。我们感到非常荣幸有幸目睹这一切。”

“行动胜千言，”楚德插话道，“从他行动的方式能看出许多，然后他就只是将帽子举在胸前，好似同时在宣告爱意和歉意。非常感人。”

“是我在讲故事好吧，谢谢你，楚德。柯林斯小姐，她非常优雅，从远处看根本猜不出她已经这把年纪了。如此青春的身材。她非常冷淡，若无其事地转身面对他，两人之间大约隔了一个笼子的距离。在场的所有公众人员这时候都立刻后退，我和楚德，我们记得冯·布劳恩先生说过的，保持五米远，我们尽量放胆俯身向前，但此刻好像是个私人时刻，我们不敢靠得太近。他们先是互相点了点头，互道了些平常不过的问候。接着，布罗茨基先生，他突然上前几步，伸出手，非常迅速地，好像事先计划好了，楚德认为……”

“没错，好像他私下里已经练习了好些天一样……”

“是的，就是那样。我同意楚德的看法。就像那样。他伸出手，握住她的手，轻轻地礼貌地吻了一下，然后放开。而柯林斯小姐，她只是优雅地鞠了个躬，接着立刻将注意力转向其他男士，和他们打招呼，微笑，我们离得太远，听不清他们说了些什么。而他们所有人都在，有那么一小会儿，好像没人知道接下来做什么。然后，冯·温特斯坦先生采取主动，开始向布罗茨基先生和柯林斯小姐讲解长颈鹿的习性，言语中仿佛他们是一对——是不是，楚德？仿佛他们是一对很好的老夫妻，从一开始就一起来到这里。而他们二人，布罗茨基先生

和柯林斯小姐，这么多年之后，肩并肩地站着，没有触碰，只是肩并肩地站着，两人盯着长颈鹿，听着冯·温特斯坦先生的介绍。如此持续了一段时间，就看见其他男士互相窃窃私语接下来怎么办。跟着，渐渐地，不自觉地，男士们统统往后汇拢去，做得非常好，非常文明，他们全都假装在互相交谈，一次慢慢移开一点，所以最后只剩下布罗茨基先生和柯林斯小姐在长颈鹿前。当然，我们这会儿能非常近距离地观察，而其他每个人亦定是如此，但当然，每个人都假装没有瞧见。我们看到布罗茨基先生优雅地转身面对柯林斯小姐，举起一只手指着长颈鹿的笼子，说着些什么。好像是些发自内心诚挚的话，柯林斯小姐稍稍低下了头，这会儿连她也不能继续无动于衷了，接着，布罗茨基先生继续说着，不时地，能看见他又举起一只手，像这样，非常轻柔地，指着长颈鹿。我们无法确定他是在说长颈鹿还是其他别的事情，但他不断举起手指着笼子。柯林斯小姐看似确实被征服了，但她是如此优雅的女士，她直了直身体，微笑着，然后二人慢慢踱步至其他男士聊天的地方。能看见她和男士们互道了些什么，非常礼貌且愉快，她好像跟费希尔先生谈了颇久，接着轮流和他们每个人道别。她朝布罗茨基先生微微躬身点头，看得出来，布罗茨基先生对此很是开心满意。他站在那儿，恍如游梦，帽子还举在胸前。接着，她走上小径离开，一路径直走向茶点小屋，过了喷泉，绕过北极熊围圈，消失在视线中了。而等她一离开，男士们似是抛弃了先前的伪装，围聚在布罗茨基先生身边，看得出来，每个人都开心异常，兴奋异常，他们好像在恭喜他。哦，我们当时多想知道布罗茨基先生跟柯林斯小姐说了些什么啊！或许我们应该大胆些，再走近几步，可能会捕捉到至少一些零零碎碎的话语。不过，现在我们身份不一样了，得更加谨慎。不管怎么说，一切都太美好了。动物园里的那些树，每年的这个时候都那么美。我确实想知道他们彼此说了些什么。楚德认为他们现在真的又重在一起了。你知道吗，他们从未离婚？是不是很有意思？那么些年了，尽管柯林斯小姐坚持自己被称作柯林斯小姐，他们从未离婚。布罗茨基先生赢回她是理所应当的。哦，非常抱歉，我们被兴奋冲昏头了，甚至还没开始给你讲到重点！关于瑞德先生！你看，既然瑞德先生没有跟官方团的人在一起，我们也就不能真的上前，即便是在柯林斯小姐离开之后。毕竟，冯·布劳恩先生建议过我们上前只是为了见见瑞德先生。总之，尽管我们小心地看着冯·布劳恩先生，尽管有时候与他非常近了，他却从未朝我们看过一眼，可能他过于关注布罗茨基先生了。所以我们没有上前。但之后，他们要离开时，我们看着他们就要穿过大门时，他们全部停了下来，又有一个人加入了他们，一个男人，但他们走得太远了，我们看不清楚。但楚

德肯定与他们会合的人就是瑞德先生——她的远视视力好过我，我还没戴眼镜。她肯定——是不是，楚德？——她肯定那就是他，他非常圆滑机智，置身事外，所以不会添麻烦，这事对布罗茨基先生与柯林斯小姐来说本来就已经够难办的了。他这会儿在大门口会合官方团体的人。起先，我以为那不过是冯·布劳恩先生罢了，但我没有戴眼镜，而楚德非常肯定那就是瑞德先生。事后，我仔细想了想，也觉得可能当时那人就是瑞德先生。所以说我们就错过了被引见给他的机会！这时候，他们走得很远了，你看，已经在大门口了，司机们已经打开了车门。即便我们冲跑过去，也来不及到那儿的。所以从最严格的意义上讲，我们没有见到瑞德先生。但我和楚德刚刚还在讨论，我们说，几乎从所有其他意义上讲，我的意思是从其他任何真正重要的意义上讲，可以公平地说我们今天见到他了。毕竟，假如他一直跟官方团的人在一起的话，那么确定无疑的，在长颈鹿笼子跟前那会儿，就在柯林斯小姐离开之后，冯·布劳恩先生一定会为我们引见的。那不是我们的错，我们没有意识到瑞德先生会那么狡猾，一直呆在大门口。总之，重点是，毫无疑问，将我们引见给他，是合乎时宜的。那就是重点。冯·布劳恩先生显然也是这么认为的，既然我们处在现在这个位置上，那明显就是合乎时宜的。而且你知道吗，楚德，”她扭头对着她的朋友，“现在我再进一步地想想，我同意你的看法。今晚的聚会上我们也可以向她们宣布我们真的见到了他。就像你说的，那比说我们没有见到更为接近真相。而且今晚那么多事，我们真的没时间将一切再重新解释一遍。毕竟，我们没能正式被引见给他，只是造化弄人，就是这样。出于所有的目的和意图，我们已经见过他了。他一定会听说我们所有的事，如果他还没，那他一定会非常详细地询问起我们是如何照料他父母的。所以我们实际上等于见过他了，像你说的，如果别人并非如此认为，那对我们会很不公平。哦，我错了——”英奇突然转向菲奥娜，“我都忘记了，我正在和瑞德先生的一位老朋友谈话。对这样一个老朋友来说，这一切看起来不过是大惊小怪罢了……”

“英奇，”楚德说，“可怜的非奥娜，她已经很糊涂了，别再捉弄她了。”接着，她冲菲奥娜微笑着，说道：“没关系，亲爱的，不必担心。”

英奇说这话的时候，我脑中重现了小时候我和菲奥娜之间那温馨的友谊。我想起了她曾经住过的白色小农庄，就在伍斯特郡泥泞的小路上，只有几步之遥，我们两个人躲在她父母的餐桌下面玩了几个小时。我想起那时候我徘徊着走到她家农庄，心里烦恼不安，而她特别

会安慰我，让我很快忘记了我刚刚经历的场景。我意识到，正是这同样珍贵的友谊在我的眼前被生生嘲弄，一腔怒火才在胸中灼燃而起，而英奇又开始讲话，我觉得不能再不管不顾，任此情形继续下去了。我决心不再重犯我先前支吾其辞的错误，便果断地倾身向前。我的本意是打断英奇，大胆宣布我是何方人士，然后，等其影响尘埃落定，再靠回身子。不幸的是，尽管我对此干预行为施加了诸多力量，发出的仍是一阵像喉咙被轻轻勒住似的咕噜声，然而音量却够大，让英奇停了下来，三个女人都转身盯着我。那一刻很是尴尬，这时候，菲奥娜，无疑是想掩饰我的尴尬——或许她过去的某种对我的保护意识暂时觉醒了——脱口而出：

“你们两个，你们还不知道自己看起来有多蠢吗！知道为什么吗？不，你们不会猜到的，你们两个，你们绝对猜不出刚刚有多蠢，用言语无法形容你们两个此刻看起来多可笑。你们真的不会知道，历来如此，你们两个历来如此！哦，这么久以来，自从我们认识以来，我一直就想告诉你们，好吧，你们自己会明白的，你们现在自己可以判断一下你们是傻子还是什么。看看吧！”

菲奥娜将头猛地转向我。英奇和楚德，两人非常迷惑，又一次盯着我。我又做了一番努力，想公开自己的身份，但令我气馁的是，我只能再次发出一阵咕啾声，比之前的铿锵有力，却不甚连贯。这会儿我感到一阵恐慌，于是深吸了一口气，又尝试了一下，可这次发出了更冗长、走调的声音。

“她究竟在对我们说什么，楚德？”英奇说道，“这个小泼妇凭什么对我们这么说话？她怎么敢？吃了豹子胆了？”

“是我的错，”楚德说道，“是我的失误。邀请她加入我们小组是我的主意。幸好在瑞德先生的父母到来之前，她就暴露了本性。她嫉妒，就是这样。她嫉妒我们今天见到了瑞德先生。而她就只有这些可悲的小故事……”

“你们说今天见到了他是什么意思？”菲奥娜怒喝道，“你们自己刚刚说你们没有……”

“你明明知道那其实相当于见到了他！难道不是吗，楚德？我们现在完全有权说我们见到了。你不想承认也得承认，菲奥娜……”

“好吧，那样的话”——菲奥娜此时近乎在尖叫了——“让我们来看看你们怎么承认这个！”她猛地向我伸出胳膊，好似在宣告最戏剧性的一幕即将上演。我再一次尽力奉陪。这次，在逐渐攀升的怒火

和沮丧的推波助澜下，走调了的声音变本加厉，我感觉到沙发在晃动。

“你这朋友是怎么了？”英奇问，她突然注意到了我。但楚德毫不在意。

“我压根儿就不应该听你的。”她狠狠地对菲奥娜说道，“从一开始你分明就是个小骗子。而我们竟然让我们的孩子与你那些闹蛋玩耍！他们可能也是小骗子了，现在他们可能在教我们的孩子如何撒谎。昨晚你办的聚会多么可笑。还有你那样装饰公寓！多荒唐！我们今早都在笑话这件事情……”

“为什么你不帮我！”菲奥娜第一次突然直接对我这么说话。
“你是怎么了，你不会做点什么吗？”

事实上，自始至终我一直紧绷着神经。这会儿，就在菲奥娜转向我的时候，我从挂在对面墙上的镜子里瞥见了自已。我看见自已满脸通红，五官挤压，现出像猪一样的表情，而我的拳头在胸前握紧，与整个身躯一起颤抖。瞥见自已这样的状态，我就像没了风力的帆船，一下子泄了气，瘫回到沙发一角，重重地喘着气。

“我想，菲奥娜亲爱的，”英奇说道，“是时候你和这个……你的这个朋友离开了。我觉得今晚的聚会你们不用来了。”

“这还用说，”楚德大声吼道，“我们现在肩负重任。我们可担不起纵容像她这样断翼的小鸟。我们已不再仅仅是一个志愿小组了。我们有非常重要的事情要做，任何不符合要求的人都必须离开。”

我看到菲奥娜的眼睛里噙着泪水。她又看了看我，但眼神中却是越来越多的辛酸悲痛，我想再次亮明我的身份，但一想到我望到的自己在镜中的模样，就决定作罢了。相反，我摇摇晃晃地站了起来，寻找出口离开。因为紧张，我仍然气喘吁吁，走到门口时不得不停下来，靠着门框。我能听见身后那两个女人继续说着话，一副兴奋的口气。有那么一刻，我听到英奇说：“看你把多么恶心的人带进公寓来。”经过一番努力，我匆忙走过了小门廊，在大门门锁上疯狂地摸索了一阵，最后终于走出了房间，来到了走廊。几乎顷刻间，我感觉好了许多，便更加镇定地继续向楼梯走去。

第十七章

我连续走下几级楼梯，一边看了看手表，发现此刻启程前往卡文斯基画廊正是时候。自然，我对自己不得不丢下的烂摊子感到无比懊悔，但显然，此时首先要考虑的是确保准时出席今晚的重要活动。不管怎样，我决定，不久之后再适时专心处理菲奥娜的问题。

我终于到达了底层，迎面见到墙上“停车场”的标记，还有一个箭头指示方向。我走过几个储物柜，接着从出口处出去了。

我从公寓大楼的后部走了出去，来到人工湖的另一侧。此刻夕阳西下。我面前是一片广阔的绿地，沿斜坡伸展下去，渐至远方。停车场立刻出现在我眼前，不过是片被篱笆围圈起来的矩形草地，就像美国牧场的牲畜栏一样。地面没用水泥铺砌，来来往往的车辆已将其磨损得几乎泥土外露。这里差不多可以容纳五十辆车，但这会儿只停了七八辆，车与车之间都有些距离。日落的余晖擦过车身。在停车场接近后部的位置，我看到那矮壮女人和鲍里斯正在往一辆旅行客车的后备厢里装行李。我移步过去，发现索菲正坐在前排副驾驶座上，眼神空洞，透过挡风玻璃盯着落日。

我走上前去，那矮壮女人正在关后备厢。

“抱歉，”我对她说，“我不知道你有这么多东西要装车，我本应搭把手的，可是……”

“没关系，有他在这儿帮我就足够了。”矮壮女人揉了揉鲍里斯的头发，然后对他说：“那么，别担心了，好吗？你们几个都会度过一个很棒的夜晚。真的，她做了所有你喜欢吃的。”

她俯下身来，安慰似的紧紧地拥抱了一下鲍里斯，但小男孩好似在梦中一般，直勾勾地盯着远方。矮壮女人伸手递给我车钥匙。

“汽油应该够，小心开车。”

我谢过她，看着她离开，向公寓大楼走去。我转身看着鲍里斯，他仍旧盯着夕阳。我扶着他的肩膀，带他绕过汽车。他一句话没说就爬上了后座。

显然，夕阳有种催眠的功效，因为我坐到方向盘后面时，索菲仍盯着远方。她似乎没有发觉我的到来，但接着，就在我熟悉车辆操纵系统的时候，她静静地说道：

“我们绝不能让这房子的事儿拖累了我们。我们拖不起啊。你下次回来跟我们一起还不知道啥时候呢。不管有房子还是没房子，我们都该开始做点事了，一起做点好事了。我是今早突然意识到的，在回来的公交车上。即便在那样的公寓，那样的厨房里。”

“是的，是的。”我说着，把钥匙插进引擎启动器。“那么，你知道去画廊的路吗？”

这个问题把索菲拉出了恍惚的状态。“哦，”她说道，双手捂着嘴，好似刚刚记起了什么。接着，她说道：“从市中心过去的话，或许能找到路。但从这儿，我不知道。”

我重重地叹了口气，感到事情再次渐渐濒临失控，那种强烈的厌恶感又卷土重来，这感觉在白天早些时候经历过，就是对索菲给我的生活带来混乱的厌恶之情。然而接下来，我听到她在身边欢快地说道：

“我们何不去问问停车场的值班人员？他可能会知道。”

她指着停车场进口处，的确，那儿有座小木屋，里面有一个身着制服的人，能看到他腰部以上的半身。

“好吧，”我说，“我去问问。”

我下了车，走向木屋。一辆汽车停靠在木屋边，正准备驶离这处围圈，我走近时看到那值班人员——一个胖胖的秃顶男人——倾身越过门栏，快活地微笑着，向司机打手势示意。他们说了会儿话，我正准备插将进去，汽车便移动离开了。即便那样，值班人员的目光仍然跟着那辆车，看它顺着住宅区周围的蜿蜒小路驶离。没错，他也似乎被夕阳蛊惑，呆呆地定住了。我在门栏下咳嗽了一声，他仍继续梦游般地凝视着，眼光追随着那辆车，最后我只能大喊一声：“晚上好。”

胖胖的男子开始俯看着我，回答道：“哦，晚上好，先生。”

“很抱歉打扰您，”我说道，“但我们不巧要赶时间。我们要去卡文斯基画廊，但您看，我在贵市初来乍到，完全不清楚从这儿到那儿最快的路。”

“卡文斯基画廊。”那人想了一会儿，接着说道：“呃，老实说，根本没有直达的路，先生。依我看，对您来说最简单的方法就是跟着那位刚刚离开的先生。那辆红色汽车。”他指着远方，“那位先生，碰巧的很，就住在离卡文斯基画廊非常近的地方。我当然也可以尝试给你指路，但我得先坐下来，把所有那些不同的转弯口全部理出来，特别是到你行程快结束的时候。我的意思是，你从高速路上下来，得找那些绕过农场的小路。目前看来最简单的方法，先生，就是跟着那位红车里的先生。假如我没弄错的话，他就住在离卡文斯基画廊只有两三个转弯口那么远的地方。那是块非常宜人的区域，那位先生，他和妻子非常喜欢那儿。那边是郊外，先生。他告诉我他有一间漂亮的农舍，后院养着母鸡，还种着一棵苹果树。尽管有点偏僻，对一个艺术画廊来说，那可是个好地方。非常值得开车去兜兜，先生。那开红车的先生，他说他从未想过搬家，即便每天来这片住宅区对他来说颇有些路程。哦，是的，他在这儿工作，在行政大楼——”那男子突然将身体探出门栏，指着身后的几扇窗户，“就是那幢大楼，先生。哦，不，不管怎么说，这里不全是住宅公寓。要管理这样规模的社区，哦，需要很多日常行政工作。那开红车的先生，从水务公司在这里开始建设的第一天起，就一直在这儿上班。现如今，他监管着这片区域所有的维护工作。那可是个大工程啊，先生，他每天上下班要走好长一段路，但他说他从未想过搬得近些。我完全能理解他，那地方确实非常美。我在这儿一直喋喋不休，您一定着急了吧。非常抱歉，先生。我说过，你就跟着那辆红车，这是目前看来最简单的办法了。我敢肯定，您会非常喜欢卡文斯基画廊的。那是郊区一块非常美的地方，至于画廊本身，我听说里面有些非常美的展品。”

我简单谢过他，走回车子，钻进了驾驶座。索菲和鲍里斯又在盯着落日了。我什么都没说，启动了引擎。驶过木屋时，我朝那停车场值班员飞快地挥了挥手，然后继续颠簸前行，这时索菲才问道：“这么说你找到路了？”

“嗯，我们只要跟着刚刚离开的那辆红色汽车就行了。”

话刚出口，我才意识到自己对她仍然很生气。但我没再说什么，只是开着车，行驶在住宅区外围的小路上。

我们驶过一幢又一幢公寓楼，夕阳的余晖映射在无数块窗玻璃上。紧接着，住宅区消失了，小路变成了高速路，两边都是杉树林。公路上几乎一片空寂，视线清晰，没过多久，我就发现了前面那辆红色汽车，还是远处的一个小点，在不慌不忙匀速行驶。由于车辆稀

疏，我觉得没必要紧跟在他后面，便也放慢车速，不慌不忙地跟着，我们之间仍礼貌地保持一定车距。这期间，索菲和鲍里斯两人仍然继续梦游般地沉默着，终于，我也开始渐渐放松下来，思绪宁静，看着太阳从荒芜人际的高速公路上徐徐下落。

过了一小会儿，我发现自己的脑海中正重放着多年前的世界杯半决赛上荷兰对意大利第二个进球得分时的场景。那是一记令人叹为观止的远射，也是我最喜欢的体坛回忆之一。但现在，我发现自己竟忘记了得分队员是谁，这让我很是恼火。伦森布伦克的名字飘进我的脑海，毫无疑问他踢了那场比赛，但最后，我确定他并不是进球得分的队员。我又看到阳光中飘动的球，越过意大利防守队员（奇怪的是，他们个个呆若木鸡），飘移，再飘移，越过守门员伸长的手。忘记这样一个细节令我倍感沮丧，我正系统地回顾自己所能记起的那个时代所有荷兰队员的名字，这时，鲍里斯突然在我身后说道：

“我们离路中心太近了。我们要撞车啦。”

“胡说，”我说道，“我们很好。”

“不，不是的！”我能感觉到他猛力敲击着我座椅的后背。“我们离路中心太近了。如果从另一边过来个什么，我们就会撞车！”

我什么也没说，只是把车向路边移了移。这似乎让鲍里斯安了心，他又安静下来。接着索菲说道：

“你知道，我得承认，我第一次听说时，一点都不开心。我的意思是，关于这次招待会。我觉得那会毁了我们相聚的夜晚。但我又仔细想了想，特别是当我意识到那并不会妨碍我们今晚共进晚餐的时候，我就想，好吧，这是件好事。从某些方面来说，那正是我们需要的。我知道我可以做得很好，鲍里斯也是。我们两个都会表现得很好，然后我们回去，就会有些东西值得庆祝。整个夜晚对我们来说就会真正有些意义。”

我还没来得及回应，鲍里斯又叫嚷起来：

“我们离路中心太近了！”

“我不会再往那边移了，”我说，“我们现在好得很。”

“他或许是害怕了。”索菲平静地对我说道。

“他本来不害怕的。”

“我害怕了！我们就要有一场重大事故啦！”

“鲍里斯，求你了，安静。我在开车，非常安全。”

此话出口，语气相当严厉，鲍里斯沉默了。但接着，我继续开车，意识到索菲正不安地看着我。不时的，她会回头瞥一眼鲍里斯，然后目光又回到我身上。终于，她静静地说道：

“我们为何不找个地方停下呢？”

“找个地方停下？为什么？”

“我们会提前到画廊的。哪怕耽误几分钟也不算迟到。”

“我觉得我们应该先找到地方。”

接下来几分钟，索菲又陷入了沉默。接着，她又转向我说：“我觉得我们该停下来。我们几个可以喝点东西，吃些点心。这会有助于你冷静下来。”

“你什么意思，冷静？”

“我想要停下！”鲍里斯在后面大叫道。

“你什么意思，冷静？”

“你们两个今晚不能再争吵了，这很重要。”索菲说道，“我看得出你们俩又要开吵了。但今晚不行。我不会让它发生的。我们几个应该去放松一下，调整好心情。”

“你什么意思，调整好心情？我们任何人都没有问题。”

“我想停下！我害怕！我要吐了！”

“看——”一块标示牌从眼前经过，索菲指着它说：“很快就会有个服务站。在那边停下吧，求你了。”

“完全没这必要……”

“你真的动怒了，而今晚又这么重要。今晚不该如此这般的。”

“我要停下！我要上厕所！”

“就在那儿了。停下吧，求你了。在事情变得更糟糕之前，让我们纠正过来吧。”

“纠正什么？”

索菲没有回答，而是透过挡风玻璃，继续焦虑地向外望去。我们正穿过山区。杉树林已经消失，取而代之的是陡峭的山坡，矗立在两旁。服务站在视野中清晰可见，其结构像极了高高建造在悬崖上的宇宙飞船。对索菲的满腔怒气一时间席卷重来，分外强烈，但尽管如此，我还是几乎不由自主地放慢车速，开进了内车道。

“没事了，我们马上就停下了。”索菲对鲍里斯说道，“别担心。”

“他本来就不担心，”我冷冷地说，但索菲像是没听见似的。

“我们来点快餐小吃，”她对小男孩说道，“然后我们都会感觉好些的。”

我按照指示牌下了高速公路，上了一条又陡又窄的小路，爬行着绕过了些许急弯，然后路平坦起来，车开进了一个露天停车场。几辆卡车并排停放着，还有大概十多辆轿车。

我爬出汽车，伸了伸胳膊，然后回头一看，索菲正在扶鲍里斯下车。我看着他在柏油路上走了几步，似乎十分困倦。接着，仿佛是要唤醒自己一般，他抬脸望着天空，边用力拍打着自己的胸脯，边发出了一声泰山似的嚎叫。

“鲍里斯，别那样！”我朝他喊道。

“他又没有打扰到任何人，”索菲说道，“没人会听见。”

没错，我们确实站在高高的悬崖顶端，距离那玻璃似的建筑几步开外，那便是服务站。落日已变成了深红色，统统反射在那建筑物的表面。我一言不发，大步从他们二人身边走过，径直走向入口处。

“我没打扰任何人！”鲍里斯在我身后吼着。接下来是第二声泰山似的嚎叫，这次声音逐渐弱下来，变得像约德尔歌谣一般。我没回头，继续走着，直到入口处才停下来等待，并为他们打开了厚重的玻璃门。

我们穿过设有一排公用电话的前厅，又穿过第二扇玻璃门，进入了咖啡厅。一股烤肉的香味扑面而来。房间十分宽敞，摆着长长的一排椭圆形桌子。两边都是巨大的玻璃窗，透过它们可以一眼望见广阔无垠的天空。从我们下方远处的某地传来了高速公路上的声音。

鲍里斯急忙走到自助柜台前，拿起了一个盘子。我让索菲帮我买瓶矿泉水，然后自己走开去，选了张餐桌。顾客不是很多——只有四

五张餐桌上有人——但我还是沿着长长的一排桌子径直走到了底，背对着层层云雾坐了下来。

几分钟后，鲍里斯和索菲拿着盘子从过道走来。他们在我前面坐下，将点心摊开来摆放，两人出奇的沉默。接着，我发现索菲给鲍里斯使了几下眼色，想必在自助柜台的时候，她一直力劝小男孩对我说些什么，让他说些话以弥补我们之间因刚才的争吵造成的不快。直至此刻我才意识到，我和鲍里斯之间不论以何种方式和解，都是十分必要的，而看到索菲在这种情况下如此笨拙地进行干预，我感到心里恼火。为了缓和情绪，我对四周未来派风格的装饰做了一番幽默的调侃，索菲却心不在焉地回答着，又冲鲍里斯投去一个眼色。这么做实在有失巧妙，她还不如用胳膊肘推他一下呢。鲍里斯仿佛不愿顺从（这倒也可以理解），暴躁地继续将他买的一包坚果缠绕在手指上。最后，他抬起头，咕哝着说：

“我在读一本法文书。”

我耸了耸肩，向外望着夕阳。我发现索菲敦促鲍里斯继续说些什么。最后，他愠怒地说道：

“我读了一整部法文书。”

我转向索菲说道：“我自己从未学好法语。比起学习日语，在学法语上我仍有很多问题。真的。我在东京生存会比在巴黎更好些。”

索菲大概并不满意我的回答，狠狠地盯着我。我被她强制性的目光搞得非常恼火，于是转过脸去，别过肩膀，再次望着夕阳。过了一会儿，我听到索菲说：

“现在鲍里斯在语言学习方面好了很多。”

我和鲍里斯都没回答，这时，她弯下身去，对着小男孩说道：

“鲍里斯，你现在要多努力些。我们很快就会到画廊。那儿会有很多人。其中有些可能看起来十分尊贵，但是你不会害怕的，对吗？妈妈不会怕他们的，你也不会怕。我们会让所有人看到，我们如何应对自如。我们会非常成功的，对吗？”

然而，鲍里斯继续将那小包坚果一圈圈缠在手上。过了好一会儿，他抬起头来，叹了口气。

“别担心，”他说道，“我知道该怎么做。”然后他坐起身来继续说：“你得把一只手放在口袋里，像这样。然后举着饮料，像这

样。”

他保持了这个姿势一小会儿，脸上摆出一副无比傲慢的样子。索菲忍不住放声大笑起来。我也情不自禁地微笑了一下。

“还有，人们朝你走来，”鲍里斯接着说，“你只要一次又一次地说：‘太棒了！太棒了！’假如你愿意，你可以说：‘无价之宝！无价之宝！’还有，服务员端着盛有东西的托盘走来时，你就对他这么做。”鲍里斯摆出一副愁眉苦脸的模样，手指一摆一摆的。

索菲还在大笑。“鲍里斯，你今晚一鸣惊人的。”

鲍里斯面露喜色，得意洋洋起来。然后，突然间，他站起来说道：“我现在要去上厕所。我忘记自己想要去了。一会儿就回来。”

他最后一次又向我们表演了一番轻蔑地摆动手指的动作，然后急急忙忙地离开了。

“他有时很有趣。”我说道。

索菲侧过肩膀，望着鲍里斯走上过道离去。“他长得真快。”她说，然后叹了口气，表情越发若有所思。“他很快就会长大，我们的时间不多了。”

我什么也没说，等着她继续说下去。她侧着肩膀继续端详了一会儿。然后回转身来对着我，静静地说道：“这就是他的童年，正在飞逝而去。他很快便会长大，永远没机会体会更美好的日子了。”

“你这话说得他好像现在生活得很糟糕似的。他的生活相当美好。”

“好吧，我知道，他的人生不算太坏，但这是他的童年，我知道童年本来应该是个什么样。你看，因为我记得它原本应该的样子。我小的时候，母亲生病之前，那时一切都很美好。”她转过来面向我，但她的目光好像集中在我背后的云层上面。“我想给他那样的生活。”

“呃，别担心。我们很快就会把事情解决好。同时，鲍里斯做得相当好。没有必要担心。”

“你和其他人一样。”这会儿，她的声音里流露出一丝怒意，“你继续这样，好像我们时间多得很似的。你就是意识不到，是不是？爸爸可能还有好几年日子，但他已不再年轻了。有一天他会离开，然后只剩下我们。你、我和鲍里斯。这就是我们必须继续前行的

原因。尽快建立起属于我们自己的东西。”她深呼吸了一口气，摇了摇头，眼光落在她面前的那杯咖啡上。“你不明白。你就是不明白要是事情处理不好，这世界会变成一个多么孤独的地方。”

我觉得反驳她没有任何意义。“那么，我们接下来要做的就是这件事。”我说，“我们很快就会找到房子的。”

“你都不明白，时间已经所剩无几了。看看我们，我们几乎还没开始呢。”

她语气里的谴责意味越来越浓。与此同时，她似乎已经全然忘记了她自己在妨碍我们“开始处理事情”上所做的“巨大贡献”。我一阵冲动，极想向她指明所有的一切，但最后还是保持了沉默。我们两个相对无语地过了一会儿，接着我起身道：

“抱歉。我想我还是拿点东西吃吧。”

索菲又开始盯着天空，好像几乎没有留意到我的离开。我走到自助柜台前，拿了个盘子。正当我在研究选哪种点心时，我突然记起：我并不知道去卡文斯基画廊的路，而我们当时完全依赖于那辆红色轿车。我想起那辆红车此刻正行驶在高速公路上，离我们越来越远，我意识到，我们不能在服务站逗留，浪费更多时间了。事实上，我突然想到我们不能再耽误，应该即刻重新上路，我正要还回托盘，急忙赶回我们的餐桌，这时我突然注意到，附近坐着的两人正在谈论我。

我四下一望，看到两位中年妇女，都衣着光鲜。她们相互倾着身子，越过餐桌，低声交谈，直至我听清楚时，都没有意识到我那时站得离她们有多近。她们鲜少提及我的名字，所以我起先并不能肯定她们讨论的对象就是我，但没过多久，对她们正谈论其他什么人的猜想便不攻自破了。

“噢，是的，”其中一个女人说道，“他们已经联系了那个叫斯达特曼的女人许多次。她一直保证他会去视察的，但到目前为止，他没有。迪耶特说他们不太介意，因为他们自己工作还一大堆呢，但他们所有人这会儿都紧张兮兮的，以为他随时会出现。当然，施密特先生时常进来，大声喊叫，让他们把地方打扫干净——如果他现在来了，发现市音乐厅这个样子怎么办？迪耶特说他们都很紧张，甚至那个埃德蒙德也是。而你永远不了解这些个天才，不定就会挑出个什么毛病批评起来。他们都还记得伊戈尔·科比莱恩斯基来视察的时候：他仔细地检查了每一样东西，还四肢匍匐在地，趴着敲打了每块地板，用耳朵贴上去听——他们全都在台子上围着他站了一个圈，

所有人都看着他。过去这两天，迪耶特像是换了个人似的，一上班就烦躁不安。他们所有人都很糟糕。每次他在约定时间没有出现的时候，他们就会等上一个小时左右，然后再打电话给这个叫斯达特曼的女人。她总是很惭愧地表示歉意，她总有借口，和他们另约时间。”

听到这儿，过去几个小时里我脑海中几次冒出的一个想法重新涌现出来，那就是：我应该明智些，与我目前为止做到的相比，我应该更频繁地联系斯达特曼小姐。其实，我甚至可以瞅准时刻，用外面大厅里的公共电话给她打个电话。但还没等我再仔细考虑这个想法，那女人就接着说：

“而这全是因为这个叫斯达特曼的女人几周来一直坚持说，他有多么渴望完成此次视察，他关心的不只是音响效果和所有的常规事务，还有他的父母，他们那晚在大厅是如何被安置的。显然，他们二老身体都不大好，所以他们要求特殊座位，特殊设备，要求训练有素的人员随侍左右，以防哪个突发疾病或者什么的。所需安排相当复杂，而且，据这个斯达特曼说，他非常渴望检查所有东西的每一处细节。嗯，那部分还是相当感人的，对他年迈的双亲表现出如此多的关心。但接着，你知道吗，他没出现！当然，可能和这个斯达特曼有关，而非他的原因。迪耶特是那么想的。据说，他名声极佳，听起来根本不是这种一直像这样给人添麻烦的人。”

听到那女人说的话，我烦恼不安起来，而听完最后这句话，我自然就舒了一口气。但正是她们所说的关于我父母的那段话——满足他们各种特殊要求的需要——使我觉得一刻都不应耽搁，该给斯达特曼小姐打个电话了。我把托盘扔在柜台上，急急忙忙走出了大厅。

我走进一个电话亭，翻遍口袋搜寻斯达特曼小姐的名片。过了一会儿，我找到了，拨通号码。电话立即通了，正是斯达特曼小姐本人。

“瑞德先生，您来电话真是太好了。很开心一切都进行得这么顺利。”

“啊。这么说，你认为一切都进行得很顺利。”

“哦，棒极了！您所到之地，都是那么成功。人们是那么激动。而您昨晚晚宴后的演讲，哦，人人都在谈论，多么机智幽默的演讲啊。我如此荣幸，请允许我这么说，能和像您这样的人一起工作。”

“呃，谢谢你，斯达特曼小姐。你这样说太客气了。很高兴能得到如此好的照料。我刚打电话是因为，呃，因为我想核实有关我行程安排的某些事情。当然，今天有一些无法避免的耽搁，导致了一两个不甚乐观的后果。”

我停下来，期待斯达特曼小姐说些什么，但是电话那头一片沉默。我轻声笑了笑，继续道：“但当然，我们这会儿正在去卡文斯基画廊的路上。我的意思是，我们此刻已经走了一半路程了。自然地，我们想有充足的时间到那儿，而我必须得说，我们全都非常期待前去。我听说卡文斯基画廊周围的乡村景色非常棒。是的，我们很开心，已经在路上了。”

“我很高兴，瑞德先生。”斯达特曼小姐的口气听起来犹疑不定，“我真心希望您会喜欢此次活动。”然后她突然道：“瑞德先生，我真的希望我们没有冒犯到您。”

“冒犯我？”

“我们真的无意暗示什么。我是说，建议您今早去伯爵夫人家的事。我们都知道您非常熟悉布罗茨基先生的作品，没人曾另作它想。只是那些唱片中有些十分珍贵，而伯爵夫人和冯·温特斯坦先生都认为……噢，天啊，我真的希望没有冒犯到您，瑞德先生！我们真的不是有意暗示任何事。”

“我一点没感到被冒犯，斯达特曼小姐。相反，我非常担心自己是否冒犯了伯爵夫人和冯·温特斯坦先生，因为我没能出席……”

“哦，关于这点请您不必担心，瑞德先生。”

“我非常想见他们，和他们谈谈，但是情况不允许我按照原计划行事，我想他们会理解的，特别是，既然，如你所说，让我听布罗茨基先生的唱片没有切实的必要……”

“瑞德先生，我确信伯爵夫人和冯·温特斯坦先生都会非常理解。确实，无论如何，我现在也觉得做这样的安排是一种妄为，特别是您的时间如此有限。我真心希望没有冒犯您。”

“我向你保证，我根本没有感到被冒犯。但其实，斯达特曼小姐，如果可以的话，我这会儿给你打电话是想讨论某些问题，就是，我在这儿的行程安排的某些其他方面的问题。”

“是吗，瑞德先生？”

“比如说，我视察音乐厅的行程。”

“啊，这件事啊。”

我等待着，想听听她是否会多说些什么，但她什么都没说。我继续道：“是的，我只是想确定一下，为我到来所做的一切准备是否都安排就绪了。”

我语气中的不安让斯达特曼小姐终于有所回应。“哦，我明白了，”她道，“我明白您的意思了。我没有为您安排太多时间进行视察。但您看——”她停顿下来，我能听到一片纸张沙沙作响的声音，“您看，此次音乐厅行程的前后，有两个非常重要的约会。所以我想，假如要从什么地方挤出点时间的话，就应该是在音乐厅的安排上。您可以在其他时间随时回到那儿，假如您真的需要的话。然而，您看，我们真的没办法压缩其他两个约会中任何一个的时间。比如说，与市民互助小组的会面，我知道，和受您影响的普通人会面这件事在您心里有多重要……”

“是的，当然，你说得没错。我完全同意。正如你所指出的，我晚一点总还能挤出时间第二次去音乐厅。是的，是的。只是我有些担心这……呃，这些安排。我是说，关于我父母的安排。”

电话那头又是一阵沉默。我清了清喉咙，继续道：

“就是说，你知道的，我父母亲年纪都大了，在音乐厅里为他们准备特殊器材非常有必要。”

“是的，是的，当然。”斯达特曼小姐听起来有些困惑，“还要就近准备医疗救助以防不测发生。是的，一切尽在掌握，您进行视察的时候会看到。”

听到这话，我思忖了一会儿，然后说：“我们现在谈的是我父母的事。我想应该没什么误会吧。”

“当然没有，瑞德先生，请不用担心。”

我谢过她，从电话亭走出来，走向咖啡厅。走进门口时，我停了一会儿。落日的余晖拖着长长的影子洒满房间。那两位中年妇女仍旧热烈地交谈着，但我猜不出她们是否还在谈论我。远处尽头，我看到鲍里斯正向索菲解释着什么，他们两人开心地大笑着。我在那儿站了一会儿，脑中翻来覆去地想着刚刚和斯达特曼小姐的对话。再仔细想想，我发现这想法确实是妄为了一——让伯爵夫人为我播放布罗茨基的

老唱片，还指望我能从中得益呢。毫无疑问，她与冯·温特斯坦先生一直期待通过音乐逐步指引我。这想法让我不安起来，能够“被失约”让我感到庆幸。

然后我看了一眼手表，发现尽管我向斯达特曼小姐再三保证过，但我们仍有赴约迟到的危险。我一路走到我们的餐桌前，没坐下，说道：

“我们现在得走了。在这儿已经待了好一段时间了。”

说这话时，我的语气里透露出某种急迫，但索菲只是抬起头来，说道：

“鲍里斯觉得这些炸面包圈是他吃过最棒的。你是这样说的，不是吗，鲍里斯？”

我看了一眼鲍里斯，看到他对我置之不理。接着我想起我们刚刚的小争吵——我一时全忘记了——意识到最好说些安抚的话。

“那么，你说炸面包圈很好吃喽，是吧？”我对他说道，“能让我尝一块吗？”

鲍里斯仍旧望着另一边。我等了一小会儿，然后耸了耸肩。

“好吧，”我说，“你要是不想说话，也没关系。”

索菲碰碰鲍里斯的肩膀，准备恳求他，但我却转过身道：“来吧，我们得上路了。”

索菲又用手肘推了推鲍里斯。接着她对我说话，声音里带着些许绝望：“我们再待一会儿吧。你几乎根本没和我们一起坐坐呢。鲍里斯非常喜欢这儿，是吧，鲍里斯？”

鲍里斯又一次充耳不闻。

“听着，我们现在得动身了，”我说道，“我们就要迟到了。”

索菲又看了看鲍里斯，然后看了看我，她的表情逐渐愠怒起来。接着，她终于开始起身。我转过身，径直走出了咖啡馆，没有回头看他们一眼。

第十八章

我将车开下陡峭蜿蜒的小路，回到高速公路上，这时太阳已低垂在天边，快要落山。路上的车辆依旧稀少，我开足马力驾驶了一会儿，在视线内搜寻那辆红车的影子。几分钟后，我们离开了山区，穿越无垠的农田。高速路两边的稻田不断延伸至远方。我沿着小路驶过一个长长的平缓转弯，横越一块平坦的田地，这才重新锁定了那辆红色汽车的踪影。它仍然行驶在前方，与我有段距离，但我看得出，驾驶员还是像之前那样悠闲地驾驶着。我减缓车速，开始欣赏起面前展开的一道道风景：傍晚的田野，在远方的树林后闪烁着暮光的低垂斜阳，不时出现的一群群乡间建筑——而与此同时，每次慢慢开过路上的转弯，我们前面的红色汽车都会时隐时现。我听到索菲在旁边说：

“你觉得会有多少人？”

“招待会上？”我耸了耸肩，“这我怎么知道？我说，你好像对这件事过分紧张了吧。不过是又一个招待会而已。”

索菲继续盯着窗外的风景。然后她说道：“今晚会有很多那些人。出席过卢斯科尼宴会的同一群人还会来，所以我才紧张。我以为你明白呢。”

我努力回忆她所说的那场宴会，但那个名字对我来说毫无意义。

“我现在应付那些事情，比以前自如多了。”索菲继续说道，“那些人对我的态度太差了。我还没有真正恢复过来。今晚一定会有很多同样的人。”

我仍旧努力回忆此事，却什么也没想起来。“你的意思是，那些人对你真的到了很粗鲁的程度吗？”我问道。

“粗鲁？好吧，你姑且可以那样说。他们当真让我觉得自己相当渺小，还非常可怜。我真希望他们今晚不会又全部在场！”

“今晚如果有人对你粗鲁，你就过来告诉我。依我看，你可以随你喜欢，同样粗鲁地回敬过去。”

索菲扭头看看坐在后座的鲍里斯。过了一会，我才发现小男孩已经睡着了。索菲继续望着他一小会儿，然后转回头来对着我。

“你怎么又来了？”她问道，语气相当奇怪，“你知道那会让他多么不安。你又来了。这次你打算持续多久？”

“持续什么？”我疲倦地问道，“你在胡说些什么呀？”

索菲瞪了我一会儿，然后别开头。“你不明白，”她几乎是自言自语道，“我们没时间这样了。你就是不明白，是不是？”

我觉得我的忍耐到了极限。一整天来经受的所有混乱卷土重来，于是，我大声说道：

“听着，你凭什么认为你有权利一直这样批评我？或许你还没发现，我刚刚承受了巨大压力。你但不支持我，反而一个劲地数落、批评。而现在，你好像做好了全部准备要在这次招待会上让我失望。至少，看来你已经准备得相当充分了……”

“好吧！那我们就不进去了！我和鲍里斯会在车里等。你自己去参加这招待会吧！”

“没必要那样，我只是说……”

“我是当真的！你自己去吧！那样的话我们就不会让你失望了！”

我们继续行驶了几分钟，没有说话。最终，我开口说：

“听着，对不起。这次招待会你应该没问题的。事实上，我肯定你没问题。”

她没有回答。我们继续行进着，彼此沉默，每次我看她时，都发现她眼神空洞地望着远处的那辆红色汽车。一阵奇怪的恐惧感开始在我心中滋生，最后我说：

“听着，即便今晚事情不顺利，呃，那也没关系。我的意思是，那不会对任何重要的事有什么影响。我们没必要这么傻。”

索菲仍望着那辆红车。然后她说：“说实话，我是不是显得很胖？”

“不，一点都没有。你看上去美极了。”

“但确实胖了，体重重了一点。”

“没关系。不管今晚发生什么，事情都不会改变。听着，没必要担心。我们很快就会准备好一切。一个家，所有的一切。所以没必要

担心。

我说这话的时候，她之前提到的那次宴会，特别是索菲的形象，开始在我脑中浮现。她当时身穿深红色晚礼服，独自尴尬地站在拥挤的屋子中间，在她周围，人们三五成群地站着，大笑着，交谈着。她当时肯定是受到了羞辱，想到这里，我最后轻轻地碰了碰她的胳膊。让我感到欣慰的是，她将头靠在我肩上以示回应。

“你等着瞧吧，”她说道，声音低得几乎听不见。“我会表现给你看的，还有鲍里斯也是。不管今天谁在那儿，我们都会表现给你看的。”

“是的，是的，我确定你们会的。你们两个都会没问题的。”

几分钟后，我发现前面那辆红色汽车打出信号，准备离开高速公路。我缩短了我们之间的距离，很快跟着向导，开上了一条在草地间顺势起伏的宁静小路。我们继续向上爬行，高速公路的噪音渐渐远去，接着，我们便行驶在了泥土小路上，那路根本不适合现代交通工具。一时间，一道厚重的篱笆刮擦着我们汽车的一侧，片刻之后，我们颠簸着穿过了一片泥泞的空地，里面尽是破旧的农田交通工具。接着，我们出来，驶上了路况较好、在田野间交错纵横的乡间小道，加速行驶起来。终于，我听索菲大喊了一声：“哦，在那儿！”然后看到前面的一棵树上挂着块木板，上面写着“卡文斯基画廊”。

我减慢车速，缓缓向下开到大门口。两根锈迹斑斑的门柱还矗立在那儿，但大门已经不见了。那辆红色汽车继续沿小路开下去，最后消失在我们的视野中。我驾车从门柱中间穿过，进入一片广袤却杂草丛生的田野。

田野间有条泥泞的小路蜿蜒而上，我们缓慢移动上行。接近山顶，美好的景色便在我们面前展开。田野向下延伸到一个浅浅的山谷，谷底有一座带着法式城堡风格的庄严房屋巍然耸立。太阳在屋后的树林中落下，即便与之相隔甚远，我仍能看出那建筑充满了颓废的魅力，唤醒了某个梦幻般的地主家庭日渐衰落的记忆。

我换了低速挡，小心下山。我从后视镜中能看到鲍里斯，这会儿他已经完全醒了，正在左右张望着，但杂草实在太高，把侧窗的所有景色完全遮住了。

开近后，我看到房子附近的一大片场地上已经停满了汽车。我们下坡开至尽头，驶向这些车，看到差不多总共有百来辆车，其中许多

汽车为此场合被特地清洗得锃光闪亮。我在周围稍微兜了一圈，试着找一个合适的地点停车，在离剥落的庭院墙壁不远处停了下来。

我下了车，伸展了一下四肢，回头看到索菲和鲍里斯也已经下了车，索菲正在为鲍里斯的表现而担心。

“千万记住，”我能听到她对他说，道，“那屋里没人比你更重要。你就不停地对自己那样说。反正，我们不会呆太久的。”

我正要动身去那房子，这时，我被眼角余光瞥到的东西吸引住了。我转过身，看到一辆报废的旧车，被丢弃在离我很近的草丛中。其他的客人全都绕开它，和它保持一定距离，仿佛生怕它的锈迹和破败会传染到他们自己的车子。

我上前几步，走向那残骸。它已经部分陷进了泥土中，四周杂草丛生，要不是太阳的余晖照射在那顶盖上，我可能根本不会留意到它。没有车轮，左前门已从铰链处被扯掉了。漆面被重新刷过多次，最后一次上漆时油漆工似乎用了建筑油漆，但中途放弃了。两块后挡板被从其他汽车上取下的不配套的替代品换掉了。尽管如此，不消更仔细地审视一番，我便已知道，这正是我父亲开了多年的那辆家用老轿车的残骸。

当然，我上一次看到它已经是很久以前了。再次见到它如此破败的模样，让我想起了我们和它一起度过的最后那段时光，那时它已经很破旧了，而我父母还得开着它到处跑，让我感到极其尴尬。现在想想，到最后，我开始精心编造各种借口花招以躲避乘坐它出行，生怕被学校朋友或者老师发现。但那仅限于最后那段日子。多年来，我一直坚定地认为我们的车——尽管非常便宜——竟然不知怎地大大优于路上几乎其他所有车辆，这也是我父亲选择不换车的原因。我还记得它停放在伍斯特郡我们那座小农舍的车道上的样子，那漆面，那金属光泽，每次我都要盯着它看上很久，感到无比骄傲。许多个午后——特别是周日——我会花上好几个小时，或在里面玩耍，或绕着它玩耍。时不时地，我还会带着玩具——或许甚至是我收集的塑料士兵——在后排座位上摆开。但更多时候，我只是无休无止地在其周围勾画假想的场景——从车窗里朝外开枪，或者飙车上演高速追捕。我母亲经常从房子里出来，告诉我别再摔车门了，那噪音让她发狂，我要再来一次的话，她会“活剥了我”。此刻我又看到了她，那么鲜活生动地站在农舍的后门，冲着车子大喊。那农舍很小，却在乡村深处，坐落在半亩草地之中。一条小路从门前穿过，直达当地农场，一群奶牛从门前经过，一日两次，被农家男孩用泥泞的棍子赶着。父亲总是

把车放在车道上，车尾对着这条小路，而我常常会停下正做着的事情，透过后挡风玻璃看牛群经过。

我们所谓的“车道”，不过就是房子侧边的一片草地，从未用水泥浇筑过，一旦下大雨，车子就会深深地淹在水里——这情况无助于解决其生锈的问题，还可能加速其变成了现在这幅光景。但是作为一个孩子，我却觉得雨天是一件特别的乐事。不仅仅是因为雨天创造了车内尤其舒适的环境，而且它还给我提供了一个挑战，那就是，我每次上下车时都得跳过污泥河道。起初，我父母并不赞成我的行为，声称我会弄坏车内的各处装饰，但随着那辆车越来越旧，他们也就不再担心这点了。然而，在我们拥有那辆车的全部时光里，“砰砰”的关门声持续烦扰着我母亲，而不幸的是，这“砰砰”声对我的场景演出至关重要，总能突出那扣人心弦的紧张而关键的时刻。有时，母亲几周甚至几个月都不会对此抱怨，这让事情变得复杂起来，直到我一并忘记了它可能正是冲突的根源。然后有一天，我正完全沉浸在某出想象剧中的时候，她会突然出现，露出一副特别烦恼的样子，告诉我只消再来一次，她就会“活剥了我”。有时候，这一威胁言论恰好在车门正半开时被抛出，让我左右为难，不知在我玩闹过后是该让它开着——要是那样可能会让它整夜都开着——还是我应该冒险尽可能悄悄地把它关上。这一窘境在与车玩闹的余下时间里一直折磨着我，彻底破坏了我愉悦的心情。

“你在干吗？”索菲在我背后问道，“我们该进去了。”

我意识到她在跟我说话，但我却因发现了我家的旧车而失了神，所以没做认真思考便嘟囔了些什么。然后我听到她说：

“你发什么呆？你好像爱上了那东西。”

这时我才意识到，我实际上正牢牢拥抱着那辆车，脸颊搁在车顶上，而双手则画出平滑的圆圈，拂过锈迹斑斑的表面。我站直身子，咧嘴笑了一下，转身见到索菲和鲍里斯盯着我。

“爱上这个？你在开玩笑吧。”我又笑了笑，“人们把残骸这样遗弃乱放是犯罪啊。”

他们仍盯着我，我便喊道：“多恶心的破车！”然后狠狠地朝它踹了几脚。这个举动似乎让他们心满意足了，两人转身离开。接着我看到索菲，尽管她刚刚还在催促我，现在又全神贯注于鲍里斯的表现，这会儿又为他梳了梳头。

我的注意力又回转到那辆车上，心中不免越发担心起来，刚刚那几脚可能造成了点破坏。我凑近细细查看一番，发现不过是蹭掉了几块锈片，但我心中却已尽是懊悔，后悔表现得如此无情。我穿过草地绕到车的另一侧，透过后侧窗向里望去。不知什么飞行物撞上过窗户，但玻璃却完好无损，我透过蜘蛛网的裂缝处看到车后座，在那儿我度过了许多惬意的时光。我看到后座的大部分布满了霉菌。雨水从车的一角倒灌进来，坐垫浮到了扶手处。我猛拉了下拉门，毫不费力就打开了，但开了一半就卡在了厚厚的草丛中。空隙正好够大，可以让我挤进去，一番小小挣扎后，我成功地爬到了座位上。

进去一看，很明显，座位一头已经陷进了汽车的底板，我发现自己不同寻常的矮。透过离我头顶最近的窗户，我能看到片片草叶和傍晚粉红色的天空。我重新调整了一下姿势，猛拉车门，直至它差不多又关上——有东西卡着，不能完全关严——过了一会儿，我发现自己的姿势相当舒服。

没过多久，宁静的气息笼罩全身，有那么一会儿，我闭上了双眼。这时候，我发现记忆回到了一次快乐无比的家庭驾车远足，那次，我们驾车逛遍了当地乡间，为我找寻一辆二手自行车。那是一个晴朗的周日午后，我们已经走了一个又一个村落，检查了一辆又一辆自行车，父母坐在前面热烈地商议着，而我就坐在他们后面，这个座位上，看着伍斯特郡的风景从眼前掠过。那时候，电话在英格兰还没有成为常规家庭用品，我母亲膝盖上放着一份当地报纸，上面印着出售物品的广告，配有全部地址。没必要预约，像我们这样的家庭可以直接上门，说：“我们来买小男孩的自行车。”而后会被领着到后棚看车。友好些的人家会倒茶——每次我父亲都会用同样幽默的言语拒绝。但有一个老太太——后来我们发现她根本不是售卖一辆“儿童自行车”，而是死去丈夫的自行车——坚持让我们进去。“我总是很高兴，”她对我们说，“迎接像你们这样的人。”接着，我们端着茶杯，坐在她小小的、洒满阳光的客厅时，她又一次把我们称作“像你们这样的人”。我正聆听父亲讲着什么样的自行车最合适我这个年纪的男孩，突然我认识到，对这个老太太来讲，父母还有我代表着理想幸福的家庭。跟随这一认识而来的是巨大的紧张感，并在我们逗留的大约半个小时中持续加剧。并不是我害怕父母不能保持他们一贯的表现——不可思议的是，他们甚至开始了一场争吵，这可能是他们所有争吵里面最文明健康的一个版本了。但我却坚信，只消一个手势，或许甚至是一个味道，就能随时让这位老太太认识到，她犯了个巨大的

错误。我心惊胆战地看着，生怕会出现她在我们面前突然被吓得不能动弹的那一刻。

我坐在这辆旧车的后座上，试着回忆那天下午如何结束，然而，我发现思绪飘到了另一个下午，一个大雨滂沱的下午，我走出房门钻进车里，坐上这庇护所似的后座，而屋内却是问题肆虐不断。那天下午，我躺在后座上，头挤进扶手下面。在这个位置上，我从窗户就只能看到雨水顺着玻璃瓢泼而下。那时候，我殷切希望，我可以只是躺在那儿，不受打扰，就那样过一小时又一小时。但经验告诉我，父亲会在某个时刻从房子里出来，他会走过汽车，走到门口，走到外面的门前小径上，所以我在哪儿躺了很久，透过雨声专注地倾听后门闷的嘎嘎声。终于这声音响起时，我跳起身来，开始玩了起来。我模仿了一场激动人心的、为争夺一把失落的手枪而展开的打斗，这样就清楚表明，我深深地投入到了游戏当中，而没有留意到任何事情。我听到他双脚踩着湿漉漉的地面，径直走到车道尽头，才敢停下。接着，我很快跪坐在座椅上，小心翼翼地适时地从后挡风玻璃向外偷偷望去，看到父亲穿着雨衣的身影，站在大门边，打开雨伞时稍稍弓身。接着，他有意踏着步子走上那条小径，消失在了视野外。

我一定是睡着了，因为一阵晃动将我惊醒，我发现自己坐在破败的汽车后部，伸手不见五指。我稍稍有些惊慌，推了推离我最近的门。起先，车门仍旧被卡住，但接着，它一次移动一点儿，直到我终于能够挤身出去。

我掸了掸衣服，四下看了看。那房子灯火通明——我能看到高高的窗户里面闪闪发光的吊灯——车旁边，索菲仍旧在打理鲍里斯的头发。我站在房内投射出来的一汪灯光之外，索菲和鲍里斯却几乎被灯火照得通亮。在我看着他们的同时，索菲弯下身来，对着后视镜补了补妆。

我走进灯光中，鲍里斯转身对着我。“怎么那么久啊。”他说。

“是的，对不起。我们现在该进去了。”

“等一下。”索菲心烦意乱地嘀咕着，仍旧弯腰对着后视镜。

“我饿了。”鲍里斯对我说道，“我们什么时候回家？”

“别担心，我们不会呆太久的。所有这些人，他们都等着见我们呢，所以我们最好快进去打声招呼。但我们很快就会离开，然后就回家享受一个愉快的夜晚。就我们几个。”

“我们能玩打仗游戏吗？”

“当然了。”我说道，同时觉得很开心，小男孩这会儿好像已经忘记了我们先前的争吵。“或者玩其他你喜欢的游戏。即便我们开始玩了一个，而到一半你想停下，换另一个都行，不管是因为你玩腻了还是输了，都没关系，鲍里斯。今晚我们可以改玩任意一个你想玩的游戏。而如果你统统不想玩，只是聊会儿天，比如说，关于足球，那么我们就聊天。今晚会是一个极棒的夜晚，只有我们三个。但是我们首先得进去，把这件事搞定，没那么糟糕的。”

“好吧，我现在准备好了。”索菲宣布，随后她最后一次弯腰照了照后视镜。

我们穿过一座石拱门走进院子。走向前门入口的时候，索菲说：“我现在非常期待这次招待会了！感觉很不错。”

“好吧，”我说，“放松点，自然些。一切都会好的。”

第十九章

一个胖女佣打开了大门。我们走进宽敞的大厅入口时，她低声说：

“很高兴再次见到您，先生。”

听到她这样说，我才意识到，之前我曾经来过这里——实际上，这正是霍夫曼前一晚带我来的那个地方。

“啊，是的，”我环顾着四周带橡木镶板的墙壁，说道，“很高兴又回到这里。这次，你看，我把全家都带来了。”

可能是出于敬重，那女佣只是绷着脸站在门旁，没有答话，我飞快地瞟了一眼这个女人，不禁感到一丝敌意。这时我才留意到，在雨伞架旁边的圆木桌上，在一堆摊开的杂志和报纸中间隐隐现出我的脸。我走到桌前，抽出一份报纸（我想应该是当地报纸的晚间版），看到整个头版登着一张我的照片——显然是在风吹草低的田间拍摄的。我认出了照片背景上的白色建筑，记起这是今早在山顶上照的。我拿过报纸，对着灯，将照片凑到黄色的灯光下端详。

强劲的风把我的头发向后吹起，我的领带僵直地飞向一只耳朵后，外套也在身后飞扬，看起来我好像穿了一件披风。更匪夷所思的是，我做出了一个凶狠放纵的表情，将拳头迎风举起，好像正发出一声斗士般的咆哮。我无论如何也不能理解，自己怎么会摆出这么个姿势。整个头版除了标题根本没有其他文字，上面赫然写着：“瑞德的集结号”。

我有些紧张，打开了报纸，六七张分开排列的小照片映入眼帘，它们都与头版那张略有不同。在所有这些照片里，我好斗的态度一览无遗，只有两张除外，在那两张照片中，我看起来正在洋洋得意地推介身后的白房子，同时露出了奇怪的微笑，将下排牙齿悉数暴露出来，而丝毫不见上牙。我扫了一眼下面的专栏，看到一个叫马克斯·萨特勒的人被反复提及。

我本想继续仔细翻看这张报纸，但这时候，我怀疑起女佣的敌意可能正是和这些照片有关系，开始明显地感到不舒服起来。于是我放下报纸，离开了桌子，决定以后有机会再仔细研究这篇报道。

“我们该进去了。”我对索菲和鲍里斯说，他们俩正在大厅中间徘徊。我说话的声音很响，足以让那女佣听见。我心里十分期待着她能引我们进入招待会场，但她一动不动，尴尬的几秒钟过后，我朝她微微一笑，说：“当然，我记得昨晚的路。”说完，我带头走进了房子。

实际上，这房子完全不是我记忆中的那样。很快，我们发现自己走在一条很陌生的镶板长廊上。然而，我不久就发现，这其实也无所谓，因为我们刚走进一小段路，就听到了嘈杂的说话声，不久，我们就站在一个狭窄的房间门口，屋里挤满了穿着晚礼服、拿着鸡尾酒杯的人。

乍一看，这屋子的规模比起昨晚宾客云集、巨大华丽的舞厅好像小了许多。但实际上，经过一番仔细审视，我才发现：它原来可能根本就不是间屋子，而是一条长廊，或者说，顶多是间长长的、有道转弯的前厅。那道转弯曲至如斯，让我感觉或许到了半圆的程度，但从门口向里间这么一瞥，我还不能十分确定。我从外面的巨大窗户上可以窥见一斑，这些窗户这会儿都挂上了窗帘，沿着那道转弯依次排列，室内的墙壁上布满了门。地板是大理石的，吊灯从天花板上悬挂下来，房间各处都陈列着艺术品，或装在底座上，或摆在精致的玻璃橱里。

我们停在门口，看着这一场景。我四处张望，希望有人能过来招呼我们进去，甚至大声宣布我们的到来，然而，我们站着观望了一会儿，没人过来。偶尔会有人急匆匆地大步朝我们的方向走来，但直至最后，我们才发现他是为了迎接其他客人。

我看了看索菲。她用一只胳膊搂着鲍里斯，两人都紧张地盯着人群。

“来吧，我们进去吧。”我淡定地说道。我们走了几步，进了房间，但没走几步又停了下来。

我四下观望，想找到霍夫曼或者斯达特曼小姐，或者其他我认识的人，却一个都看不到。接着，我继续站在那儿，搜寻着一张张陌生的脸，突然意识到，这里许多人同样可能参加过那晚的宴会，就是索菲受到无礼对待的那晚。突然间，我可以越发鲜明地看到索菲曾经不得不忍受的遭遇，便感到胸中升腾起一股危险的怒火。确实，我继续环视房间时，至少认出了一帮宾客——他们站在一起，在转弯处，几乎在我们的视线之外——几乎可以肯定，他们就是其中的几个罪魁祸首。

首。我透过人群观察他们：男人们挂着沾沾自喜的微笑，双手在裤子口袋里插入抽出，那种浮夸的样子好像在向所有人昭示，他们在这样的聚会上是多么轻松自如；而女人们则穿着滑稽的服装，在大笑的时候还无助地摇着头。真是难以置信——这种人居然胆敢讥笑蔑视任何人，更别说是像索菲这样的人，这简直太荒谬了。事实上，我找不出任何理由不即刻上前，在众目睽睽之下，狠狠地教训他们一下。我在索菲耳边飞快地悄悄说了些安慰的话，就起步走了过去。

穿过人群的时候，我发现这房间确实是慢慢弯成了一个半圆形。我这会儿又能看到侍者们都贴着内侧墙壁，好像哨兵似的站开，手上端着盛有饮料和甜品的托盘。偶尔有人会撞到我，而后友善地道歉，或者有人试图推搡着前往相反的方向，我会与之相视微笑，但奇怪的是，好像真的没人认出我来。有那么一会儿，我发现自己正从三个中年男子中间挤过去，而他们好像正为什么沮丧地摇着头，我注意到其中一人的腋下夹着一份晚报。我看到自己迎风的脸在他胳膊肘下探出，不觉隐隐猜想，目前我们无端受到忽视，是不是在一定程度上跟那张照片有关。然而，我这会儿差不多已到了意欲接近的那些人的身边，所以没有细想下去。

其中两个人发现我靠过来，往旁边移了移步，好似欢迎我加入他们的圈子。我发现他们正在讨论周围的艺术品，我来到他们中间时，所有人正对刚刚那人说的话频频点头称是。其中一个女人开口道：

“是啊，情况明摆着嘛，你都可以在这屋子中间画条线，就在那尊范·西罗雕像后面。”她指着不远处座台上的白色雕塑，“小奥斯卡的眼力从未好过。公平地讲，这一点他自己也明白，但他感到了一种责任，一种对家庭的责任。”

“抱歉，但我不得不说，我同意安德雷斯说的，”其中一个男人说道，“奥斯卡太骄傲了。他应该委派给其他人。那些更懂的人。”

这时，另一个男人和善地微笑着对我说道：“您对这件艺术品有何高见，先生？关于奥斯卡对此藏品展的贡献？”

我一时被问住了，但我并无心情转移话题。

“各位女士和先生站在这儿讨论奥斯卡的缺陷，非常好，”我开始说，“但更重要的是……”

“称小奥斯卡有缺陷，”一个女人打断我，“就有点太过了。他的品位和他兄弟截然不同，的确，他犯了这个令人费解的错误，但总

的说来，我认为他使这次藏品展受到了大家欢迎。它打破了朴素简约之风。没有那个，呃，这场展览就像是一顿没有甜点的晚餐。那边的连体花瓶——”她透过人群指了指，“确实相当讨人喜欢。”

“那都很好……”我又激动地开始说，但还没等我继续，一个男人坚定地说道：

“也就那么一个连体花瓶而已，那是他所选的展品之中唯一能在这儿有一席之地的。他的问题是，他对整个藏品展毫无概念，对事物间的平衡毫无认识。”

我感到自己的耐心快要消磨殆尽了。

“听着，”我喊道，“你们适可而止吧！停下这……这愚蠢无比的闲聊，哪怕就一会儿！就停一小会儿，让其他人，让外面世界来的其他人说说话，你们在这个封闭的小世界里全都住得太快活了！”

我停下来，瞪着他们。我的坚持还是有用的，因为他们所有人——四男三女——全都吃惊地盯着我。终于赢得了他们的注意之后，我感觉心中的怒气得到了控制，好似某种我能随心所欲操控的武器，这让我感觉很不错。我压低嗓音——刚才喊得比我预想的响了些——继续说：

“在你们这座小城里，你们有这么多问题，或者用你们某些人的话说，有这场‘危机’，这稀奇吗？稀奇吗？你们当中有这么多人如此悲惨，如此沮丧，这稀奇吗？这会不会让任何人，让任何外来的人感到困惑？这会让人吃惊吗？而我们，作为从一个更大更广阔的世界来的旁观者，我们会不会搔首困惑呢？我们会不会对自己说，这样一座小城市怎么会是这么个样子？”我感到有人猛地拉了拉我的胳膊，但我决心要一吐为快。“像这样一座小城，这样一个社会，居然会有这样迫在眉睫的危机？我们会不会感到困惑吃惊呢？不！一点也不！一个人来到这儿，他看看四周，会立刻发现什么？女士们先生们，你们这些人就是这座城市的典范，没错，就是这里，就是你们！你们代表着——如果我有失公允，如果在这座城市的瓦砾与路石下还有比这更恶心、更可怕的例子，那么请见谅——依我所见，你，先生，还有你，女士，是的，我同样遗憾地告诉你们，是的，你们就是这里一切错误的典型代表！”我意识到，猛拉我衣袖的是我正训斥的一个女人，不知何故，她正退向我旁边的男人的身后。我朝她的方向瞥了一眼，接着继续道：“首先，你们缺乏基本礼仪。看看你们对待彼此的方式。看看你们对待我家里人的方式。即便是我——一位名人，你们

请来的贵宾——来到这里，你们却更关心奥斯卡的艺术收藏。换句话说，你们都太过沉迷了，沉迷在你们这个内部混乱的社会中，甚至没能向我们展示哪怕最基本的礼貌。”

那个拉扯我胳膊的女人这会儿绕了个圈，到了我的正后方，我意识到她在向我说着些什么，试图把我拉开。我没有理睬她，继续道：

“那么多地方，偏偏是这儿，多么残酷的讽刺啊！是的，就是这儿，我的父母不得不到这个地方。那么多地方，偏偏是到这儿，来接受你们所谓的好客之道。多么讽刺，多么残酷！那么多地方，过了这么些年，却在这么个地方，和像你们这样的人在一起！还有我可怜的父母，他们大老远地跑来，第一次来听我的演奏！你们以为我不得不把他们留给像你，你，还有你——像你们这样的人照顾，我的任务就会轻松些么？”

“瑞德先生，瑞德先生……”我肘边的女人坚持拉了好一会儿，我才发现此人不是别人，正是柯林斯小姐。这个发现让我一下子泄了气，我还没转过神，她就成功地将我从人群中拉到了后面。

“啊，柯林斯小姐，”我有些困惑地对她说，“晚上好。”

“您知道，瑞德先生，”柯林斯小姐说，她继续带着我离开。“我得说，我真的很吃惊。我的意思是人们对于这件事的着迷程度。刚刚一个朋友告诉我，全市都在议论这事呢。她安慰我说，大家都是尽可能以最友好的方式议论的！但我真的不明白，这都有什么好大惊小怪的。只是因为我今天去了动物园！我真的不懂。我之所以答应，只是因为他们说服了我，说这对每个人都有好处，您知道的，就是为了让里奥能够在明晚表现出色。所以我才答应去那儿，仅此而已。而我想，老实讲，我希望对里奥说些鼓励的话，因为他这么久都没有沾酒了。只有我以某种方式承认了才显公平。我向您保证，瑞德先生，过去二十年来，在其他任何时候，要是他这么长时间都没沾酒的话，我也会同样这么做的。只是碰巧这种情况之前都没发生过。我今天出现在动物园真的没什么值得大惊小怪的。”

她这会儿已经没再拉着我了，但她仍旧挽着我的胳膊，开始带我慢慢穿过人群。

“我相信这确实没什么值得大惊小怪的，柯林斯小姐，”我说道，“我也向您保证，刚刚走到您那里的时候，我一点儿也没有想向您提起布罗茨基先生的意思。和这里的大多数人不同，我无意打探你们的隐私。”

“您真是个正派人，瑞德先生。但无论如何，我说过，我们今天下午的会面不意味着任何事。人们知道了会很失望。所有发生的一切不过是，里奥向我走来，对我说：‘你今天看起来真漂亮。’他过了二十年的酗酒生活，现在说起这番话，叫人想也想得到。差不多也就这样了。当然，我感谢了他，还说比起前段时间见面时，他现在看起来好多了。于是，他低下头，看着鞋，他年轻的时候可没这样过。那时候，他从未做过这么羞怯的事。是的，他的火焰已经燃尽了，这我看得出。但有新东西取而代之，有些许分量的东西。呃，他就在那儿，低头看着鞋，冯·温特斯坦先生和其他先生都在后面一点的地方徘徊，看着另一个方向，假装他们忘记了我们一样。我对里奥说了几句有关天气的话，他抬头，说道，是的，树木看起来那么美。接着，他开始告诉我，在刚刚见过的动物里他喜欢哪些。很明显，他根本没用心，因为他说：‘我喜欢所有这些动物，大象、鳄鱼还有大猩猩。’呃，猴子笼就在附近，他们肯定刚从那边过来，但他们肯定没有经过大象和鳄鱼的笼子，这个我也跟里奥讲了。但里奥却对此置之不理，好像我提起了完全不相干的事情。接着，他好像陷入了轻微的惊慌之中。可能跟那时冯·温特斯坦先生靠得近了些有关。您看，我原本同意的只是跟里奥说几句话，真的就简单的几句而已。冯·温特斯坦先生向我保证，他会大概一分钟之后打断进来。呃，那是我的条件，可是接着，我们一开始讲话，连我自己都感觉时间确实太短了，令人绝望。我自己竟开始害怕看到冯·温特斯坦先生在附近徘徊。总之，里奥知道我们时间无多，接着他直奔正题。他说：‘或许我们可以再试试。一起生活。不算太迟。’您得承认，瑞德先生，都这么些年了，说这个有些太直截了当了，即便是因为考虑到今天下午时间有限。我只是说：‘我们一起又能做什么呢？我们现在几乎没有共同点了。’过了一两秒钟，他迷茫地四下观望了一下，好像我提出了一个他以前从未思考过的问题。接着，他指着我们前方的铁笼子说道：‘我们可以养个动物。我们可以一起爱护它、照顾它。那或许就是我们以前没做过的。’我不知道该如何回答，就只是和他站在那里，我看到冯·温特斯坦先生走了过来，但接着，他一定是觉察到了什么，察觉到我和里奥那样站着不太对劲，于是他改变了想法，又走开去，开始和冯·布劳恩先生聊了起来。接着，里奥在空中举起一只手指，那是他从前的标志性动作，他举起手说道：‘我养了一只狗，但你知道的，他昨天死了。养狗不好。我们可以选一种长寿的动物。能活二十年、二十五年的那种。那样的话，只要我们照顾得很好，我们就会先死去，我们就不必为它悲伤。我们没有孩子，所以我们就这样做吧。’听完他的话，我答道：‘你还是没想明白。我们心爱的动

物可能会比我们两个活得更久，但我们两个不可能同时死去。你可能不必为动物悲伤，但如果，假如说，我比你先死去，你得为我悲伤啊。’他马上答道：‘这总比你死后没有人为你悲伤强啊。’‘这个我倒不担心，’我对他说道。我指明说这些年来，我帮助过这城市里的许多人，我死去时，根本不缺为我悼念的人。他答道：‘这个可不好说。从现在起，对我来说事情可能会一帆风顺。我死去时，可能也有许多悼念者。说不定会有上百号人。’接着他说：‘但如果他们中没有一个人真正关心我，那又有什么用？我宁可把他们全换掉。换成我爱着的，也爱着我的人。’我不得不承认，瑞德先生，这次谈话让我感到有些难过，我再想不出任何其他话要对他说。接着，里奥说道：‘如果当初我们有孩子，他们应该多大了？他们长到现在会很漂亮啦。’好像他们花了很多年变漂亮似的！接着他又说：‘我们没有孩子。那么我们就做这个来代替吧。’他又说起这事的时候，呃，我想我是相当混乱了，我越过他的肩膀，看了看冯·温特斯坦先生，冯·温特斯坦先生马上就朝我们走了过来，说了些玩笑话，就是这样。我们的谈话就结束了。”

我们继续绕着屋子慢慢地走着，她仍旧挽着我的胳膊。我花了些时间消化她的话，然后说：

“我刚刚想起，柯林斯小姐，我们上次见面时，您特别好心，邀请我去您的公寓，讨论一下我的问题。讽刺的是，现在看起来，我们更多的是在讨论生活当中您不得不做的决定。我着实很好奇，您会怎么做。请允许我这样说，您站在了一个十字路口上。”

柯林斯小姐大笑。“哦，天哪，瑞德先生，我太老了，已过了在十字路口做选择的年纪了。里奥这样说也真的太迟了些。如果这一切发生在哪怕七八年前……”她叹了口气，脸上霎那间掠过一丝深深的悲伤，接着又换上了她那轻柔的微笑。“不可能了，现在这时候怀着全新的一系列希望、害怕、梦想去重新开始，不可能了。是的，是的，您会急着告诉我说我还没有那么老，我的生活还远没有结束，我真的十分感激。但事实是，确实太晚了，那会……呃，这么说吧，现在把事情弄复杂，那只会更混乱。啊，马佐斯基！永远都能吸引我的注意力！”她用手指着一只镶嵌在底座上的红色泥塑猫咪，我们刚刚从它旁边经过。“不，里奥给我的生活制造的麻烦已经够多了。我打造属于自己的、不同的生活已经很久了，你问问这城里的人，我想大部分人都会告诉您我表现得相当不错。我帮这儿的许多人度过了一段日益困难的时光。当然，还远未能及您的那种成就，瑞德先生。但那并不意味着，当我回顾过往，看看我都做了些什么时，不能因某种满

足之感而愉悦。是的，总的来说，我对自己离开里奥之后的生活相当满意，也很乐意继续这样维持下去。”

“但毫无疑问，柯林斯小姐，您至少应该认认真真考虑一下现在的情况。我不明白您为什么不能将之看作是个好的回报：做完所有善举之后，能够与那男子——抱歉——假设某种程度上你还爱着那男子，共享生命中的每个夜晚。我这样说是因为，呃，要不这么多年来您为什么还要继续留在这城市？为何您从未想过再婚呢？”

“哦，我的确考虑过再婚，瑞德先生。过去这些年，至少有三个男人，我可以与之轻而易举地确定关系。但他们……他们都不是我要的人。可能你说的确有道理。里奥就在近旁，让我不能对那些产生足够的感觉。好吧，不管怎样，这都是很久以前的事情了。您就是想问我现在何不与里奥一起共度余生，这么问倒也可以理解。好吧，让我们想一下。里奥现在头脑清醒冷静。他是否会这样保持很久呢？可能。我承认，还是有可能的。特别是假如他现在在这里赢得了认同，又成为了一个担有巨大责任的名人。但如果我同意和他重归于好，那么，那就会是另外一回事了。不久后，他便会决心毁掉他所取得的一切，就像他之前做的那样。那会让大家立于何地？那会让这个城市立于何地？实际上，瑞德先生，我宁可认为自己负有一种公众责任，不能接受他的这些提议。”

“原谅我，柯林斯小姐，但我不禁觉得，您并非真如自己所想的那样，被您自己的理由说服。在您内心深处的某个角落里，您还是在等待着，等待着您以前的生活，您与布罗茨基先生一起的生活，重新再续前缘。我并不怀疑，您所做的全部善举，会让这座城市里的人们一直对您心怀感激，然而，在本质上，您把那看作是在等待途中为打发时间而做的事情。”

柯林斯小姐斜歪着头，脸上挂着愉快的笑容，细细思量着我的话。

“或许您说的有些道理，瑞德先生，”她终于开口说道，“或许我还没有意识到时间过得如此之快。直到最近，实际上是去年，我才真的猛然意识到时光飞逝。我们两个人慢慢变老，或许考虑挽回曾经拥有的东西已经太迟了。也许您说得对。我起初离开他，并没有预料到会是这样长久的分离。但情况是否像您刚才断言的那样，是我一直在等待吗？我真的不知道。我考虑问题都是过一天是一天。可如今，我发现时间都已经消逝了。但我现在回顾我的生活，回顾自己是怎么走过来的，看起来也并不是那么糟。我想这样结束，就像我现在这

样。为什么我必须得和里奥还有他的动物纠缠？那一定会非常混乱的。”

她是否真的相信自己所说的这一切呢？我正准备用最温柔的方式继续表达自己的怀疑，这时，我发现鲍里斯站在我的肘边。

“我们得马上回家了，”他说，“妈妈越来越着急了。”

我朝他指的方向看过去。索菲就站在我原本离开她的地方几步开外，非常孤单，没有和任何人说话。她脸上挂着无力的微笑，然而，却无人欣赏。她肩膀耸起，目光定格在离她最近的那帮宾客的鞋子上面。

这情况显然绝望至极。我克制住自己对满屋人的愤怒，对鲍里斯说：“是的，你说得对。我们最好走吧。把你妈带过来。我们想办法趁人们不注意的时候溜出去。反正我们出席过了，就没人能埋怨了。”

我想起前一晚的经历，想到这房子与酒店毗邻。鲍里斯消失在人群中时，我转身看着墙壁上排列的门，试图回忆起哪一扇是我和斯蒂芬·霍夫曼穿过的通向旅馆走廊的门。但就在这时，仍旧挽着我胳膊的柯林斯小姐又开始说：

“如果让我说实话，完全开诚布公地讲，那么我就得承认——是的，在我头脑不大清醒的时候，那确实曾经是我的梦。”

“哦，什么梦，柯林斯小姐？”

“呃，一切。现在发生的这一切。里奥能重新振作，在城里找到一个合适的位置，情况全都会重新好起来，糟糕的日子永远一去不返。是的，我得承认，瑞德先生。一方面，白天的时候，我的头脑很明智很理性，可到了晚上，它就变得不一样了。这些年来，我经常凌晨时分在黑暗中醒来，醒着躺在床上，憧憬着像这样的事情发生。而如今，它真的开始发生了，我却又相当困惑。然而，您看，其实也没有真的开始发生。哦，里奥可能确实可以在这里大功告成，他过去的确才华横溢，不可能全部消失殆尽。还有，我们在一起的时候，他从未有过机会，过去他从未有过真正的机会，这是真的。但对于我们两人来说，太晚了。不管他说什么，现在肯定都太晚了。”

“柯林斯小姐，我非常想和您更详细地讨论这整件事。但遗憾的是，我现在得走了。”

没错，说这话的时候，我看到索菲和鲍里斯正穿过房间朝我走来。摆脱了柯林斯小姐之后，我又思量起该选择哪扇门来，同时往后挪了挪步，查看那些隐藏在转弯处的门。我挨个审视，觉得每扇门看上去都似曾相识，却连一扇都不敢确认。我突然想到可以问问别人，但我害怕引起别人对我们提早离开的关注，又决计不能这样做。

我领着索菲和鲍里斯走向那一扇扇门，心里仍然茫然不知所措。不知怎的，我的脑海中浮现出无数电影里的场景：某个角色在退出房间时想给人留下深刻印象，便推开一扇错误的门，走进一个壁橱里。虽然正是出于相反的原因——我希望我们能在不知不觉中离开，事后大家讨论时，无人确定我们究竟是什么时候离开的——但避免这场灾难显得同样至关重要。

最后，我选定了最中间的那扇门，仅仅因为它看起来最壮丽。珍珠深深地镶嵌在门板上，两边石柱侧立。此时此刻，每根石柱前都站着一位身着制服的服务员，像哨兵一样一动不动。我判断，这么气派的大门即便未必能带我们直接穿到酒店，也肯定会引领我们到某个重要的地方，从那儿我们可以找到路线，摆脱公众的目光。

我示意索菲和鲍里斯跟上，慢慢朝那扇门走过去，还向其中一个服务员简单点了点头，好像在说“不必麻烦，我知道自己在做什么”，然后拉开了门。结果，让我惊恐的是，我最害怕的事情恰恰发生了：我打开的是一个笥帚柜，柜子里装的东西超出了容量。几只家用拖把翻落出来，“哗啦”一声掉在了大理石地板上，蓬松的深色拖把头四处散落。我瞧了瞧壁橱里面，看到一堆凌乱的水桶、油腻的破布和气雾罐。

“抱歉。”我低声向那个离我最近的服务员咕哝道，他正急忙收拾拖把，这会儿向我们投来责怪的一瞥，我匆忙向隔壁的门走过去。

我开始小心地打开第二扇门，决心不再犯同样的错误。我的动作非常缓慢，尽管我能感到背后有很多只眼睛在注视着我，能听到嘈杂的说话声渐渐变大，有声音在附近说道：“我的天哪，那是瑞德先生，是不是？”我还是强忍住惊慌，将房门朝自己一点一点地小心拉动，同时从门缝向里看去，以确保没什么东西掉出来。看到这扇门通向一条长廊，我松了口气，然后快速踏进去，用手势急切地示意索菲和鲍里斯跟上。

第二十章

我关上了他们身后的门，我们三人四下张望。欣喜的是，我发现自己这第二次尝试恰恰选对了门，这会儿我们正站在一条又长又黑的过道中，而这条过道恰好经过酒店休息室通往大厅。起初，我们一动不动，刚经历了画廊里的人声嘈杂，此刻的寂静让我们有些恍惚。后来鲍里斯打了个哈欠，说道：“那宴会真无聊。”

“恶劣至极。”我说。对招待会上的每一个人，我又一次感到愤怒难当。“一群可怜虫，根本不知何谓文明教养。”然后，我补充道：“妈妈是目前为止那里最漂亮的女士。对吗，鲍里斯？”

黑暗中传来索菲“咯咯”的笑声。

“她是，”我说，“目前为止最漂亮的。”

鲍里斯似乎想要说些什么，但就在这时，我们发觉，在周围的黑暗中，不知从何处传来一阵轻微的滑动声。接着，我的双眼适应了黑暗，勉强看清在走廊深处一个有野兽般轮廓的庞然大物正朝我们缓缓走来，每动一步就发出一阵噪音。索菲和鲍里斯也同时发现了它的存在，一时间，我们似乎都呆住了。接着，鲍里斯低声惊呼道：

“是外公！”

接着，我发现那野兽般的身形的确是古斯塔夫，他背部隆起，胳膊下夹着一只旅行箱，手里提着另一只箱子的把手，身后还拖着第三只——那正是滑动声的来源。有那么一刻，他看起来根本是寸步难行，只是和着缓慢的节奏摇晃着身体。

鲍里斯急切地扑向外公，而我和索菲则犹豫着跟了上去。我们靠近时，古斯塔夫终于发现了我们，停了下来，稍稍直了直身体。我们在黑暗中看不见他的表情，但他的声音听起来很开心，他说：

“鲍里斯，这么巧啊！”

“是外公！”鲍里斯再次惊呼道。接着，他问：“您在忙吗？”

“是啊，有很多工作呢。”

“您肯定非常忙，”鲍里斯的声音里有一丝奇怪的紧张，“非常，非常忙。”

“是的，”古斯塔夫喘了口气，说道，“是很忙。”

我走到古斯塔夫面前说：“很抱歉，在工作时间打扰到你。我们刚才在参加一个招待会，但这会儿准备回家了。去吃一顿大餐。”

“啊，”迎宾员看着我们说，“啊，是吗，真是太好了。看到你们几个这样在一起，我真开心。”接着，他问鲍里斯：“你怎么样啊，鲍里斯？你妈妈怎么样啊？”

“妈妈有点累了，”鲍里斯说，“我们都很期待这顿晚饭。吃完饭，我们还要玩打仗游戏。”

“听起来棒极了，你们肯定会玩得很开心的。那么……”他停顿了一下，然后说：“我最好还是继续工作吧。这会儿我们非常忙。”

“好的。”鲍里斯静静地答道。

古斯塔夫揉了揉鲍里斯的头发，然后又弓起背，继续拉着行李。我用一只手拉着鲍里斯，领着他为古斯塔夫让出了路。也许是因为我们看着，也许是因为刚刚的停歇让他恢复了些许力气，迎宾员这次行进的脚步似乎稳当了许多，他从我们身边走过，走进了黑暗中。我开始带路走向大堂，但鲍里斯不愿跟上，仍回视着走廊，那里，他外公佝偻的身影仍依稀可辨。

“来吧，快点。”说着，我伸出一只胳膊搂住他的肩膀，“大家都饿了。”

我又开始走起来，这时，我听到索菲在身后说：“不对，是这边。”我转过身，发现她在一扇小门前弯下了腰。先前我没有留意这扇小门，事实上，就算我留意到了，也会以为那只不过是一道壁橱门，因为它几乎还不到我的肩膀高。尽管如此，索菲这会儿已经打开了门，而鲍里斯呢，他做出一副之前做过无数次的样子，一脚踏了进去。索菲继续扶着敞开的门，我犹豫片刻，也弯下身，跟着鲍里斯钻了进去。

我原以为自己会在一条隧道中，得双膝跪地爬行前进，但事实上，我却站在另一条过道上，它比我们刚刚离开的那条过道可能还宽些，但显然只是员工通道，地板上没有铺地毯，裸露的管道顺墙体延伸。尽管远处有一束灯光照在地板上，但我们周围仍是一片昏暗，近

乎漆黑。我们朝那光束走了一小段，接着，索菲又停下脚步，拉着门把手，推开了一扇消防门。门一开我们就出来了，站在一条安静的小巷里。

这是一个晴朗的夜晚，天空中群星闪烁可见。一眼望去，这条小巷空寂无人，所有商店都关门了。我们出发时，索菲轻轻地说：

“真是个惊喜啊，在那种情况下遇到外公。是不是，鲍里斯？”

鲍里斯没有回答。他大踏步地走在我们前面，自顾自地轻声咕哝着。

“你肯定也饿坏了吧，”索菲对我说，“希望准备的够吃。之前我光顾着做这些点心，忘记准备一道真正的主食了。今天下午，我以为足够吃了，但现在想想……”

“别傻了，没关系的。”我说道，“不管怎样，那正是我想要的。丰盛的点心，一个接着一个。我很清楚鲍里斯为什么喜欢像那样吃。”

“我小时候妈妈常这样做，为了我们那些特别的夜晚。不是生日或者圣诞节——这些节日我们和其他人家一样过——而是一些我们想让它特别的夜晚，就我们三个，妈妈常这样做。丰盛的点心，一样接着一样。但接着，我们搬了家，妈妈身体不好了，那之后我们就再也不常做了。希望准备得够。你们两个肯定都饿坏了。”接着，她突然补充道：“很抱歉。今晚我表现不够出众，对吗？”

我仿佛又看到她孤独无助地站在人群中间，便伸出胳膊，搂住了她。她将身体紧紧地靠着我作为回应。接下来一会儿，我们就那样走着，没有交谈，走过了一条条荒寂无人的小巷。有那么一刻，鲍里斯合着我们的步子走在身边，问道：

“今晚我可以坐在沙发上吃东西吗？”

索菲想了一会儿，然后说道：“嗯，可以。这顿饭可以，没问题。”

鲍里斯又和我们并排多走了几步，接着问：“我能躺在地板上吃吗？”

索菲笑了：“只有今天晚上行哦，鲍里斯。明天早上吃早饭的时候，你就又得坐回餐桌边吃了。”

这似乎让鲍里斯很开心，他激动地向前跑了几步。

终于，我们停在了一扇门面前，两边是理发店和面包店。这条街道很窄，又有许多车停靠在人行道上，显得更加拥挤了。索菲翻找钥匙的时候，我抬头看了看，发现商店上面还有四层。有些窗户还亮着灯，能隐约听到电视的声音。

我跟着他们俩上了两段楼梯。索菲打开前门的时候，我突然想到：他们或许觉得，我应该表现得对这公寓很熟悉，另一方面，他们也同样可能觉得，我应该表现得像个客人。我们走进去后，我决定仔细观察索菲的态度，以便从中得到暗示。结果，索菲一关上我们身后的门就宣布，她得去开烤箱，然后便消失在公寓深处。至于鲍里斯，他匆匆脱掉外套跑开了，嘴里还发着类似警笛的声音。

只剩我一个人站在了门厅里。我抓住机会，好好看了看周围的环境。毫无疑问，索菲和鲍里斯都觉得我应该熟悉这里。我盯着面对自己半开的房门，印有花形图案的褪色的、污浊的黄色墙纸，衣架后顺着地面爬至天花板的裸露管道——可以肯定的是，我在这里站得越久，就越能感到关于这间门厅的点滴回忆渐渐浮出水面。

几分钟后，我走进了客厅。屋内有许多特征我未能认出——在废弃的壁炉两边，有两张椅面凹陷的陈旧扶手椅，它们无疑是新近添置之物——尽管如此，我的印象是，比起门厅，我对这间屋子的记忆更加清晰些：那张顶在墙边的椭圆形大餐桌，通向厨房的第二扇门，不成形的黑色沙发，陈旧的橘色地毯——这一切都无比清晰熟悉。悬在空中的吊灯（它只有一个灯泡，外面覆着一只印花棉布灯罩）在房间各处投下片片阴影，所以我无法确定，墙纸是不是到处都有潮乎乎的渍痕。鲍里斯正躺在房屋中间的地板上，我走近的时候，他翻了翻身，平躺着。

“我决定做一个实验，”他对着我和天花板宣布，“我打算像这样让脖子保持不动。”

我低头一看，发现他缩着脖子，下巴挤进了锁骨里。

“好吧。你打算像那样保持多久？”

“至少二十四个小时。”

“很好，鲍里斯。”

我从他的身边跨过，走进了厨房。厨房长而狭窄，又一次显得分外熟悉。污秽的墙壁，屋檐角附近满是蜘蛛网的痕迹，残破的洗衣设备，一切的一切在我的记忆中拉扯纠缠。索菲已经系了条围裙，正跪

着把一些东西放进烤箱。我进来的时候，她抬起头，说了些关于食物的话，然后指向烤箱里，开心地笑着。我也笑了笑，又环顾了一眼厨房，转身走向客厅。

鲍里斯仍然躺在地板上，我进去的时候，他又立刻缩起脖子。我没有留心他，在沙发上坐下。旁边的地毯上放着份报纸，我拾了起来，以为可能是登着我照片的那份报纸。事实上，这是几天前的旧报纸，但我还是决定无论如何都要细细品读一下。我在头版看到那个叫冯·温特斯坦的男人接受采访，介绍他保护老城区的计划。鲍里斯仍躺在地毯上，一言不发，不时发出一声机器人似的噪音。我不时地偷偷瞟他几眼，发现他始终缩着脖子，于是我决定，除非他停止这幼稚可笑的游戏，否则我就不和他讲一句话。至于他是每次猜到我要看他时就缩着脖子，还是持久不动地保持着那种姿势，我不得而知，而且很快也就懒得管了。“就让他躺在那儿吧。”我这么想着，继续看报。

最后，大概过了二十分钟，索菲端着一个装满食物的大盘子走了进来。我看到有酥皮合子、咸味包和馅饼，全部都是手掌大小，大多做工复杂而精细。索菲把盘子放在了餐桌上。

“你们很安静啊。”她四下看了看屋子说，“来吧，我们现在开始享用吧。鲍里斯，看！还有这样一盘好吃的要端上来。全都是你最爱吃的！现在，你干吗不去选一个棋牌游戏，让我们一起玩，我去拿剩下那些吃的。”

索菲走回了厨房，她刚消失，鲍里斯就一跃而起，跑到桌子跟前，往嘴里塞了块馅饼。我不禁想要指出他的脖子已经恢复正常了，但最后还是继续看报，没说话。鲍里斯又发出了警笛似的噪音，并且快速穿过房间，在远处角落里一个高高的橱柜前停了下来。我记得所有棋牌游戏都放在这里，宽宽扁平的盒子被小心翼翼地堆在其他玩具和家什上面。鲍里斯继续盯着橱柜看了一会儿，然后突然甩开了柜门。

“我们要玩哪一个？”他问道。

我假装没听见，继续读着报纸，只用眼角的余光偷偷地瞥他。他先是转向了我，接着，意识到我不会回答后，他又转回了柜子。有好一阵工夫，他站在那里，思量着那堆棋牌游戏，时不时伸出手，用手指碰碰这个或者那个盒子的边缘。

索菲端着更多点心回来了。她准备布置餐桌的时候，鲍里斯走到她身边，我能听到他们两个在悄悄地争论着。

“你说过我可以躺在地板上吃的。”鲍里斯坚持道。

接着，过了一会，在我面前，他又滑坐在地毯上，把一个满当当的盘子放在身边。

我站起身走向餐桌，拿起一个盘子，考虑吃些什么，索菲则焦虑地在我周围徘徊。

“看起来棒极了！”我边说边把食物放到盘子里。

回到沙发那儿，我发现，把盘子放在身边的坐垫上，我就可以边吃边继续读报纸了。我早先决定要细细审读一遍这份报纸，甚至本地企业的广告也要细读，这会儿，我继续读着，不时地伸手到盘子里拿取食物，双眼一直未离开报纸。

同时，索菲坐在鲍里斯旁边的地板上，时不时地问他个问题——问他觉得某种特别的肉馅饼怎么样，或者某个学校的朋友怎么样。但不管她什么时候想开始这个话题，鲍里斯嘴里总塞满了食物，只能哼哼着作答。接着，索菲问：“好吧，鲍里斯，你决定好想玩哪个游戏了吗？”

我能感到，鲍里斯把目光转向了我，然后他轻轻地说：

“我不介意随便玩哪一个。”

“你不介意？”索菲的声音听起来有些难以置信。长长一段停顿之后，她说道：“那好吧。你要不介意，我就选啦。”我听到她站起身，“我现在要选这个了。”

这策略似乎立即就赢得了鲍里斯的赞同。他激动地站起来，跟着母亲走到橱柜前，我能听到两人在一堆盒子前面商议着，他们压低了嗓音，好像是考虑到我在阅读的缘故。最终，他们回来又坐在了地板上。

“来吧，我们现在开始吧。”索菲说道，“我们可以边吃边玩。”

等我下一刻看他们的时候，棋盘已经打开，鲍里斯正在兴致勃勃地摆放游戏牌和塑料筹码。过了一会儿，我听到索菲开口了，她的话让我有些惊讶：

“怎么了？你说过你想玩这个的。”

“我是说过。”

“那又是怎么了，鲍里斯？”

他顿了一会才说道：“我太累了。像爸爸一样。”

索菲叹了口气。接着，她突然用明快些的语气说道：

“鲍里斯，爸爸给你买了一样东西哦！”

我禁不住越过报纸边缘偷偷看过去，这时候，索菲投给我一记早有预谋似的微笑。

“我能现在就给他吗？”她问道。

我并不知道她说的是什麼，于是回以困惑的表情，但她站起身离开了房间，然后马上就回来了，举着昨天晚上我在电影院买的那本破旧的杂务手册。鲍里斯忘记了应有的疲惫，双脚蹦了起来，但索菲逗弄似的举着书，就是不让他够着。

“昨天晚上，我和爸爸一起出去了，”她说，“那是个特别棒的夜晚，中途他想起了你，给你买了这个。你以前从没有过这样的东西，对不对，鲍里斯？”

“别跟他说这东西多棒。”我在报纸后面说道，“只不过是本旧手册。”

“爸爸很好，是不是？”

我又偷偷看了一眼。索菲这会儿已经让鲍里斯拿到了书，他跪坐在地上，仔细地看。

“太棒了！”他边翻看着边小声嘟囔，“这个真的很棒，”他停在一页上，盯着看。“这上面什么都有。”

他又翻了几页，但是翻书的时候，书发出一声尖锐的“啪啦”声，分成了两半。鲍里斯继续翻着书，跟没事人一样。索菲本已经要坐下，看着鲍里斯的反应，她又站起身来。

“这上面什么都有，”鲍里斯说道，“真不错。”

我明显感觉到他在试图对我讲话。我继续看报，过了一小会儿，我听到索菲温柔地说：“我去取些胶带来。只要一卷胶带就搞定了。”

我听到索菲离开了房间，便继续阅读。从眼角的余光中，我可以瞥见鲍里斯仍在翻着书页。过了一小会儿，他抬头对我说：

“有一种特别的刷子，可以用来贴墙纸。”

我继续看报。终于，索菲溜达着走了回来。

“奇怪了，我哪儿也找不到胶带。”她嘀咕着。

“这本书真好，”鲍里斯对她说，“上面什么都有。”

“奇怪了。也许我们用完了。”索菲又走进了厨房。

我隐约记得，放棋牌游戏的橱柜里同样放有各种黏性胶带，就在右手边的角落中，在靠近橱柜底部的一个小抽屉里。我正想放下报纸，走过去找找，然而，索菲又回到屋里来了。

“没关系，”她说，“明早我去买一卷，然后我们把它补好。现在来吧，鲍里斯，我们开始玩游戏，不然睡觉前就结束不了了。”

鲍里斯没有回答，我听到他坐在了地毯上，仍然翻着书。

“好吧，如果你不玩的话，”索菲说，“那我就一个人玩了。”

接着传来了骰子在杯子里“咯咯”作响的声音。我继续读着报纸，心里不禁为索菲感到些许遗憾——今晚弄成了这个样子。可是话说回来，她也没有想到，自己竟会招来如此程度的混乱，却要我们付出代价。更有甚者，她今晚的厨艺也没有超常发挥。有些东西她从未想到要准备——比如，在小三角吐司上添几条罐装沙丁鱼，或者准备些奶酪和烤香肠串。她没有做任何煎蛋卷、奶酪夹心土豆或者鱼饼，也没有做填瓢辣椒，更别提那些抹有鲱鱼酱的小面包块和纵向切片的黄瓜了，甚至连剥成几瓣、边缘凹凸不平的煮鸡蛋都没有。至于后面的甜点，她没做葡萄干切片蛋糕，没做奶油手指饼干，甚至没有做草莓蛋糕卷。

我渐渐意识到，索菲已经摇骰子摇了很长时间。事实上，从她开始摇骰子起，那“咯咯”的声响就已经变了味道。这会儿，她缓慢无力地摇着骰子，仿佛是和着脑中盘旋的某种旋律。我警觉地放低报纸。

地板上，索菲正倚着一只僵硬的胳膊，那姿势让她的长发向下倾泻，披在肩膀上，完全遮住了她的脸。她看起来完全沉迷在了这场游戏中，全身的重心奇怪地前倾着，正好悬停在棋牌上方。她的整个身

体轻轻地摇摆着。鲍里斯悻悻然地看着她，双手盖在了书的裂缝之上。

索菲一直摇着骰子，三十秒，四十秒，最后终于让它在面前滚了出去。她迷迷糊糊地研究了一下，在棋盘上移动了些纸牌，然后又开始摇骰子。我能察觉出气氛中有种危险的味道，便决定是时候由自己来把控局面了。我把报纸扔到一边，拍拍双手站起身来。

“我得回酒店去了，”我宣布道，“而且我强烈建议你们两个去睡觉。我们度过了漫长的一天。”

我大步朝门厅走去，从眼角瞥到了索菲吃惊的表情。再下一刻，她就出现在我身后了。

“这就要走了吗？你吃饱了吗？”

“很抱歉，我知道你准备这顿饭很辛苦。但现在时间太晚了，我明早会很忙的。”

索菲叹了口气，看起来沮丧至极。“对不起，”她终于说道，“今晚不是非常成功。对不起。”

“别担心。不是你的错。我们几个都太累了。现在，我真得走了。”

索菲闷闷不乐地送我出去，说她明早会打电话给我。

接下来的几分钟，我一直在寂静无人的街道上转悠，努力回想着回酒店的路。终于，我走到了一条认识的路上，开始尽情享受起这个宁静的夜晚，享受起这个仅与思想和脚步声独处的机会。然而没多久，我又为今晚这样的结果感到有点遗憾。事实上，伴着那么多杂事，索菲已经成功地将我精心设计的时间表弄得混乱不堪。现在，我在这座城市里度过的第二天已行将结束，对我要评估考量的危机，我只获得了最表面的认识。我想起自己甚至中途遇阻，没能赶赴今早与伯爵夫人和市长的会面，原本我有机会亲耳听听布罗茨基的音乐。当然，我仍有充分的时间来收复失地，若干重要的会面仍等着我——比如，与公民互助小组——肯定能让我对这里的情况有一个更全面的了解。然而，不可否认的是，我身上压力重重，要是我没能以最轻松的心情结束这一天，索菲亦不能对此有何怨言。

我在一座石桥上徘徊良久，心里思考着这些事。我停下脚步，望着桥下的流水与河边的一排路灯，这时我突然想到，我还有一个选

择：我可以接受柯林斯小姐的邀请，去拜访她。没错，她暗示过自己地位特殊，能帮上忙，而现在，我在这里逗留的时间越发所剩无几，与她好好畅谈一番，极有可能为我提供许多信息，增进我对事态发展的了解。其实，要不是索菲任性胡为，这些信息我自己早搜集到了。我又想起了柯林斯小姐的起居室、天鹅绒窗帘和破旧的家具，突然希望自己此刻就身在那里。我又走了起来，走过石桥，没入黑沉沉的街道，决定明早一有机会便尽快去拜访她。

第三部

第二十一章

我一觉醒来，发现一缕明媚的阳光透过垂直的百叶窗倾泻进来，心中一惊，感觉晨日时光似乎已溜走大半。随后，我忽然记起昨晚的决定，要去拜访柯林斯小姐，于是起床，心中不觉平静了许多。

这个房间更小些，而且明显比之前的那间更闷热，我不禁对霍夫曼强迫我换房再次感到恼火。不过整个换房事件似乎已不再像昨天清早那样重要了，我在洗漱、换装时，发现自己可以毫不费力地将心思牢牢地放在与柯林斯小姐的重要会面上，而我现在是如此仰仗此次会面。我离开房间的时候，已经完全不再担心睡过了头——这一觉，我知道，终究会证明是无比宝贵的——而期待着好好吃顿早餐，其间，我可以整理一下思绪，想想将要和柯林斯小姐聊聊的那些话题。

可是，我来到楼下早餐间时，大吃了一惊：迎接我的却是吸尘器的声音。早餐间的门全关着，我推开一点，看到两个身着工作服的女人正在清洁地毯，桌椅已被推至墙边。不吃早餐就要面对如此重要的会面，这可不爽啊，我闷闷不乐地返回大厅。我从一群美国游客身边走过，来到接待台。接待员正坐在那儿看杂志，但一见到我，他就站起了身。

“早上好，瑞德先生。”

“早上好。早餐停止供应，这让我有些失望啊。”

一时间，那接待员看起来很迷茫。接着，他说道：“一般情况下，先生，即便这个时候，也会有人为您供应早餐的。但当然啰，今天很不巧，我们许多员工都到音乐厅去帮忙准备了。霍夫曼先生一大早就亲自过去了。恐怕我们只剩下一半的人手在工作。不幸的是，中庭也得关闭，直至午饭时间。当然，如果只是咖啡和面包卷的话……”

“没关系，”我冷冷地说道，“我只是没时间等事情全部安排完毕。今天我只好不吃早餐了。”

接待员又开始道歉，但我挥手打断他，转身走开了。

我走出酒店，步入阳光。路上交通拥挤，我随着人流走了一段路，然后才意识到，自己根本不清楚柯林斯小姐所住的公寓到底在哪儿。那天晚上，斯蒂芬载我们去的时候，我没有仔细观察，况且，这时候街道上挤满了行人，车辆川流不息，一切无从辨别。我在人行道上驻足片刻，想找一位路人打听方向。可想而知，柯林斯小姐在这城里十分出名，我不妨如此一问。事实上，我正要拦住一位穿着职业西装、大步向我走来的男子，突然感到有人从后面碰了下我的肩膀。

“早上好，先生。”

我转过身，发现是古斯塔夫，他抱着一只巨大的纸板箱，箱子几乎挡住了上半身。他喘着粗气，我不知道这仅仅是因为他身负重物，还是因为他跟着我一路追赶而来。不管怎样，在我向他打过招呼、询问他去哪里之后，过了好一会儿他才回答：

“哦，我把这个拿到音乐厅去，先生，”他终于说道，“大一些的物件昨晚就由货车运过去了，但还是需要很多很多东西。我一大早就开始往返于酒店和音乐厅之间了。我可以告诉您，先生，那儿的每个人都已激动得不得了了。气氛可热烈了。”

“那太好了，”我说，“我也非常期待此次活动。但不知您能否帮我一下。您看，我今早在柯林斯小姐的公寓有个约会，但我这会儿却有点迷路了。”

“柯林斯小姐？呃，一点也不远。这边，先生。如果可以的话，我陪您过去。哦，不，别担心，先生，我正好顺路。”

他那只箱子可能不像看起来那么重，因为我们动身时，古斯塔夫在我身边步履稳健。

“很高兴我们这样不期而遇，先生，”他继续道，“因为，坦白地讲，我一直想和您说件事。其实，自我们见面后，我就一直想提出来，但不知怎的，事情一件接着一件，没能抽出时间说。而现在，今晚马上就要到了，我还没问您呢。那是在几周前发生的事，在匈牙利咖啡馆的一场周日聚会上，就在我们听说您要到我们这儿来的消息后不久。当然啰，和大家一样，我们也在谈论这件事。有个人，我想是吉安尼吧，他说他从报刊上读到您是个很正派的人，与那些妄自尊大、恃才傲物的人不同，您极为关心普通市民，深得人心，他说着诸如此类的话，先生。我们围坐在桌边，八九个人，约瑟夫那晚不在，我们看着太阳西沉，没入广场那边，我觉得我们每个人立刻有了个共同的想法。起先，我们全都默默地坐在那儿，没人敢大声说出来。最

后，是卡尔，他历来如此，卡尔说出了我们所有人的心思。‘我们何不问问他？’他说，‘问问又会有什么损失呢？我们至少该问问他。他听起来完全不同于那号人。他说不定会同意呢，很难说啊。我们何不问问他，这可能是我们最后的机会了。’然后，突然间，我们大伙儿都讨论起来，自那以后，先生，老实说吧，不管我们坐在一起多久，没有不提起这话题的时候。我们也谈论其他事情，每个人都会大笑，然后，我们会沉默一阵，我们知道，大家又都在想那件事了。这就是我为何开始为自己感到难过的原因，先生。我想，我见过您几次，我有幸和您交谈，但我还没能鼓起勇气问您。现在这会儿，距离这场盛事就几个小时了，我还没有问出口。那么我如何在周日向伙计们交代呢？事实上，我今早起床的时候，先生，我对自己说，我必须找到他，我必须至少跟瑞德先生说说，大伙儿都指望着呢。但一切都这么忙乱，您一定有很多事情要做，于是我想，唉，我很可能失去机会了。所以您瞧，我非常高兴我们这样不期而遇，希望您不要介意我向您提起这事，可是，当然，如果你觉得我们在要求不可能的事，那么自然的，我们不会再提，大伙儿一定会接受的，哦，是的。”

我们已经转弯，拐进了一条繁忙的林荫大道。走过一组红绿灯时，古斯塔夫沉默了，直至我们走到了另一边、路过一排意大利咖啡馆时，他才说：

“我肯定您猜到了我要问什么，先生。我们只要求一个小小的提及。仅此而已，先生。”

“一个小小的提及？”

“只是一个小小的提及，先生。您知道的，我们，我们许多人，这些年辛勤劳作，试图改变这座城市对我们职业的态度。我们可能有了些小小的效果，但总的来说，我们还没能形成全面影响，而且，呃，完全可以理解的是，我们开始有了沮丧情绪。我们谁都不年轻了，大家都有种感觉，也许事情永远都不会真的改变了。但只要您今晚一句话，先生，就可以改变一切。这可能会成为我们这一职业的一个历史转折点。那就是大伙儿的想法。其实，先生，一些人认为这是我们最后的机会了，至少对我们这一代人是如此。我们何时才能又有这样的机会？他们一个劲地在问。所以，我呢，向您提了出来，先生。当然，假如您觉得这不是什么大事，我会非常理解您那样的想法，毕竟您来这儿是为了处理一些非常重要的问题的，我所说的只是件小事。对我们来说却是大事，但从总体上来看，我理解，是件小

事。假如您觉得不可能的话，先生，请您直说，我以后绝不会再提。”

我沉思片刻，同时意识到他正从箱子的边缘处盯视着我。

“您的意思是，”过了一会儿我说道，“让我在……在向本市市民发表演讲的时候稍微提起你们一下。”

“至多几句话就可以了，先生。”

当然，以这种方式帮助年迈的迎宾员和他的同事们，确实颇有吸引力。我想了一会儿，然后说道：“好吧。我非常乐意代表你们说几句。”

这回答字字入耳，起到了效果，我听到古斯塔夫深吸了一口气。接着他相当平静地说道：

“我们对您永远感激不尽，先生。”

他正要接着说些什么，但不知怎的，我一时兴起，想要挫败他向我表达感激之情的企图。

“好吧，让我们想想，我们怎么做呢？”我快速说道，摆出一副专注的神情。“是的，走上演讲台，我可以这样说：‘在我开始之前，有件很小却又相当重要的事情要说明。’诸如此类的话。是的，那容易得很。”

突然间，我看到了一幅生动的画面：当古斯塔夫向他们宣布这一消息的时候，一群健壮的老人围坐在一张咖啡桌边，他们脸上挂着难以置信、无比喜悦的表情。我看到自己静静地来到他们中间，他们的脸顿时转向了我。这当儿，我意识到古斯塔夫走在我身旁，无疑是已经谢了一阵，差不多要结束了，但我还是继续刚才的话。

“是的，是的。‘很小却又相当重要的事情，’我可以对他们这样说。‘有些事我在世界其他城市都见到过，却发现这里的情况有些特异……’或许用‘特异’一词太过强烈。或者我可以用‘奇异’。”

“啊，是的，先生，”古斯塔夫插嘴道，“‘奇异’这个词不错。我们没人想煽动敌对情绪。真是如此，对我们来说，您才是唯一的机会。您看，即便几年后另外一位名人同意来我们城市，而且即便我们成功地说服他为我们说几句，但谁能保证他能有您这样的才智呢？‘奇异’一词非常好，先生。”

“是的，是的，”我继续道，“我或许会停顿一下，用略显责备的表情看着他们，那样，整个大厅里的所有人就会静声屏息，默默等候。接着，终于，我会这样说，呃，让我想想，我会说：‘女士们，先生们，对你们来说，在这里住了这么多年之后，某些事情或许看起来很平常，但在外人眼里，立刻就会显得不同寻常，引人注目……’”

突然，古斯塔夫停住脚步。起先，我以为他这么做或许是因为他急于表达自己的感激之情。然而，我看了看他，这才意识到情况并非如此。他僵在了人行道上，头被箱子挤着，歪到了一边，所以他的脸颊紧贴着箱子一侧。他双眼紧闭，稍稍蹙额，好像是在脑中做一个艰难的计算。接着，我看到他的喉结慢慢地在脖颈上下移动——一下，两下，三下。

“您还好吧？”我问道，用一只胳膊扶在他身后。“天哪，您最好在哪儿坐下。”

我开始动手接过他身上的箱子，但古斯塔夫的双手却牢牢抓住不放。

“不，不，先生，”他说道，双目仍然紧闭。“我没事。”

“真的吗？”

“是的，是的。我没事。”

又过了一会儿，他仍站立不动。接着，他张开双眼，环顾四周，微微一笑，又走了起来。

“您不知道这对我们意味着什么，先生，”我们一起走了几步之后，他说道，“过了这么些年哪。”他微笑着摇了摇头。“我会在第一时间向大伙儿传达这消息。今早还有好多活儿，但只要给约瑟夫打个电话就行了。他会告诉其他人的。您能想象吗，先生，那对他们意味着什么？啊，您得转弯了。我得再往前走一会儿。哦，别担心，我没事儿。柯林斯小姐的公寓，您知道，就在您的右前方。好吧，先生，我无法向您表达我有多么感激您。大伙儿一生中没等待过别的什么，但他们会等待今晚的。我知道的，先生。”

我挥手向他道别，转过他所指的那个弯。走了几步之后，我回头张望，发现古斯塔夫仍站在拐角，从那个箱子的边缘看着我。看到我转身，他用力地点了点头——箱子没法让他挥手——接着继续前行。

我发现自己所在的这个街区主要是一片住宅区。走过几个街区，周围变得越来越安静，头顶上出现了带着西班牙式阳台的公寓住宅，我认出那天晚上我曾坐着斯蒂芬的车经过它们。街区连着街区，绵延伸展，我继续走着，开始担心自己可能认不出我和鲍里斯那晚在门前等待的那所公寓。但接着，我发现自己停在了一个十分熟悉的门口处，过了一会儿，我走上前去，透过玻璃嵌板向门内两侧窥视。

门厅布置得整洁素净，让我几乎无从确定是否来对了地方。接着，我想起了那天晚上的见闻始末：我看到斯蒂芬和柯林斯小姐在前厅里谈了一会儿，然后才走进大楼深处。冒着被错当成闯入者的风险，我用一条腿勾住矮墙，侧过身子，从最近的那扇窗户向里望去。阳光明媚，我很难看清里面的景象，只能依稀辨认出一个矮壮男人的身影，他穿着白衬衫，系着领带，独自坐在一张扶手椅上，几乎正对着窗户。他的目光好像定格在我身上，但表情却很空洞，完全不清楚他究竟是注意到了我，或者只是望着窗外，陷入沉思。这些对我来说都没用，我从墙上抽回腿，再次看了看大门，等确信是这扇门后，便按了按一楼公寓的门铃。

等了一小会儿，透过闪光的玻璃嵌板，我欣喜地看到：柯林斯小姐的身影正向我走来。

“啊，瑞德先生，”她边说边打开大门，“我还在想不知我今早是否会见到您呢。”

“您好，柯林斯小姐。经过思量，我决定采纳您善意的建议，来到这里拜访您。但我知道您今早已经有位客人了。”我指了指她的前厅。“或者您想让我另择时间再来。”

“我可不想让您走，瑞德先生。实际上，尽管您说我很忙，但和平时清晨相比，今天这儿是相当安静了。您看，只有一个人在等。我刚刚和一对年轻夫妇在一起。我已经与他们谈了一个小时，可是他们的问题如此根深蒂固，他们有那么多事情要谈，直到今天才说出来，我无心催促他们呀。请别介意在前厅等会儿，真的不用等太久。”接着，她忽然间压低了嗓音，说道：“这会儿在等的这位先生是个可怜人，他很悲惨，很孤独，只想要几分钟能有人听他倾诉，仅此而已。他不会待太久的，我会很快打发他走。他几乎天天早上都来，不介意偶尔被催促一下，他已经占用了我很多时间。”接着她的嗓音又恢复到了正常音调，继续道：“好吧，请进，瑞德先生，别像那样站在外面了，我看今天天气不错。若您愿意，而假若那时又没人在等，我们

可以去斯腾伯格花园走走。很近，我肯定，我们有很多事情要聊。实际上，我已经为您的处境想了很多了。”

“太好了，柯林斯小姐。其实，我知道您今早或许很忙，如果不是牵涉到一些特别紧急的事情，我不会这样贸然来访。您看，事实上——”我重重地叹了口气，摇了摇头，“事实上，由于各种各样的原因，我没能按照原计划行事，到现在，我们才有缘相见，时间急迫，而……呃，一方面，您知道，我今晚得向这儿的人们演讲，向您完全坦白吧，柯林斯小姐……”我几乎要打住话头，但看到她用一副和蔼的表情看着我，就艰难地继续道：“坦白说，有很多问题，这儿本地的问题，我想请您给我提些建议，然后……然后我才能——”我停下来，试着不让嗓音颤抖，“然后我才能为演讲词定稿。毕竟，所有这些都这么依赖我……”

“瑞德先生，瑞德先生，”柯林斯小姐一只手放在我肩上，“请镇静。请进吧。那会好些，进来吧。现在请不要担心。您现阶段有小小不安是完全可以理解的，那是非常自然的。其实，您如此在意，倒是十分值得赞赏。我们可以谈谈所有这些事，这些本地问题，别担心，我们很快就可以开始。但请允许我现在这么说吧，瑞德先生。我认为您是过分担心了。是的，没错，你今晚重任在肩，可是，你以前多次身处相似境地，而据大家说，您十分圆满地完成了任务。为何这次会有所不同呢？”

“可我要告诉您的是，柯林斯小姐，”我打断了她，“这次的确不同。这次我没能了解事实原委……”我又重重地叹了口气，“事实上，我没有机会按照寻常惯例准备我的讲话……”

“我们马上就谈所有这些问题。不过瑞德先生，我敢肯定您这是杞人忧天了。您何必如此担心呢？您有无与伦比的专长，是一位国际知名的天才大师，真的，您有什么好怕的呢？事实上——”她再次压低嗓音，“像这种小城市里的人，不管什么，只要是您说的，他们都会感激不尽。只管告诉他们您的总体印象就行了，他们是绝不会抱怨的。根本没什么好怕的。”

我点了点头，觉得她说得的确在理，紧张感几乎立刻烟消云散。

“等会儿，我们好好谈谈所有问题。”柯林斯小姐领着我走入前厅，一只手仍搭在我肩上。“我保证不会太久的。请坐，随意些。”

我走进一间小小的方形房间，里面阳光普照，鲜花朵朵。一把把迥然各异的扶手椅表明，这是一间牙医或者医生的候诊室，而咖啡桌

上的杂志同样也印证了这一点。一看到柯林斯小姐，矮壮男人立刻起身，或许是出于礼貌，或许是因为他期盼她这会儿能请他进起居室。我本期待着柯林斯小姐能介绍我们认识，但从当下的规约来看，这里确实像在候诊室那样有先来后到的顺序，因为柯林斯小姐只是冲那男人微微一笑，然后就径直隐入里间，边走边满怀歉意地对我们两个人低语道：“我不会太久的。”

那矮壮男人又坐了下来，盯着地板。刹那间，我想他会说些什么，可他却一直沉默，我便转过身，坐在藤沙发上，这沙发直面阳光满溢的凸窗，正是我先前张望的那扇。一坐进那藤沙发，它便嘎嘎作响，倒也令人宽心。一大片阳光洒落在我膝盖上；在我脸旁，有一只插着郁金香的大花瓶。仅仅几分钟前，我在按响门铃时还担心着眼下之事，现在我已经神清气爽，心境与刚才大不相同。当然，刚才柯林斯小姐说得很对。在这样一座城市，人们对我想说的任何话语都会感激不尽，很难想象人们会深究我的观点，或者吹毛求疵。况且，柯林斯小姐再次指出，此类情形我之前已经历过无数次了。即便我未能好好准备讲话，但必定仍能做一场有声有色的演讲。我继续坐在阳光中，发现自己愈发心平气和，惊诧于先前自己竟陷入如此焦虑的状态之中。

“刚才我在想，”矮壮男人突然对我说，“你跟那帮老朋友是否还有联系？像汤姆·爱德华兹？或者克里斯·法利？或者那两位曾住在泽国农庄的女孩？”

这时我才意识到，这位壮汉是乔纳森·帕克赫斯特，我们俩在英国上学时相当要好。

“没有，”我告诉他，“不幸的是，我差不多与那时的所有人都失去了联系。我周游列国，哪有可能保持联系呀。”

他点了点头，没有笑。“我想肯定是很困难的，”他说，“呃，不过他们全都记得你。哦，是的。我去年回英国的时候，遇见了他们几个。显然，他们一帮人大约一年聚一次。有时我会羡慕他们，但大多数时候，我很高兴没让自己困在那样一个圈子里。那就是我为何会远居此地的原因，在这儿我可以随心所欲，人们不会要我一直做小丑。但你知道，我回去时，我在那间酒吧见到他们时，他们立刻又开始了。‘嘿，是老帕克斯！’他们全都大喊道。他们还是那样叫我，仿佛时光根本没有消逝。‘帕克斯！是老帕克斯！’我刚进去的时候，他们甚至还发出驴叫似的喊声来欢迎我，哦，天哪，我无法形容那是多么可怕。我能感到自己又变回了那个可怜的小丑，我来这儿就是不

想做小丑呀，是的，就从他们像驴叫唤的那一刻开始。那是个非常不错的酒吧，我告诉你，是个典型的老式英国乡村酒吧，生着炉火，砖墙上满是那些小小的黄铜饰品，壁炉台上方挂着一把古剑，诚恳的店主说着开心的事儿，那一切引人怀旧——在这里住了这么长时间，我可真怀念那儿啊。但余下的经历呢，老天爷，叫我一想起来就不寒而栗。他们发出那驴叫似的喊声，满心希望我跳到桌上扮演小丑。那一整个晚上，他们不停地提起一个又一个名字，他们甚至并非是在谈论这些人，而只是发出更多的喧闹声，或者只要提起另一个名字，他们就会立刻哈哈大笑。你知道，他们提到了萨曼莎，全都大笑、高呼、欢叫。接着他们叫出另一个人的名字，比方说，罗杰·皮科克，他们所有人就会发出像看足球时一样的呐喊声。太可怕了。但最糟糕的是，他们所有人都希望我再扮演小丑，我就是不能那样做啊。但令人难以置信的是，我当时仿佛变成了另一个人，然后又统统开始了——滑稽的嗓音，怪怪的鬼脸，哦，是的，我发现自己竟还可以扮演得这么惟妙惟肖。我猜他们完全有理由相信我在国外还是干这行的。事实上，他们中有一个人正是这么说的。我想应该是汤姆·爱德华兹吧，在当晚的某个时刻，他们全都喝醉了，他重重地拍了拍我的背，说道：‘帕克斯！他们那儿一定爱死你了！帕克斯！’我想，这肯定是因为在刚刚为他们表演一番后，我告诉了他们在这里的一些生活，又扮了会儿小丑，谁知道呢，总之，他就是那么说的，其他人就一个劲地笑个不停。哦，是啊，我确实很轰动呢。他们一直不停地说他们多想我，我总是这么个好笑料，哦，已经那么久了，我又听到有人这么说了，那么久了，我又受到那样的欢迎，那么温暖、热情。然而，我那样做又是为了什么呢？我曾经发誓再也不那样做了，那正是我来到此地的原因。甚至在我去酒吧的路上、我一路沿着那条小巷走下去的时候，我还一直对自己这样说。那个晚上寒飕飕、雾蒙蒙的，天非常冷，我一路走在小巷上，告诉自己：那是多年前的事了，我再也不那样了，我要给他们看看现在的我。我一遍又一遍地重复着，试图让自己强硬起来，但我一进去，看到那暖洋洋的炉火，听到他们发出驴叫似的喊声来欢迎我，哦，我就感觉到这儿太孤单了。好吧，在这儿，我不必做鬼脸，不必发怪声，但至少那些都很管用。或许那些让人无法忍受，但管用，他们全都爱我，我的大学老同学，可怜的笨蛋们，他们一定认为我现在还是那样。他们根本猜不到，我的邻居们认为我是个非常严肃、相当无趣的英国人。他们觉得我彬彬有礼却又呆头呆脑，非常孤独，非常沉闷。呃，至少那也比当小丑帕克斯要好吧。那驴叫似的喧闹声，哦，多可怜哪——一群中年男人发出那种声响，而我呢，拉长着脸，发出那些傻乎乎的声音——哦，天哪，真是太恶心

了。但我控制不住自己，我已经很久很久没有被朋友们像那样围着了。你呢，瑞德，难道你不渴望那时的时光吗？即便你已经这么成功？哦，是的，那正是我要告诉你的。你如今可能不太记得他们了，但他们却还是记得你。无论他们什么时候搞这样的小聚会，好像一晚上总会挤出一些时间专门谈论你。哦，是的，我亲眼见过。他们先是回忆许多其他人的名字，他们不喜欢直接说到你，你要知道，他们喜欢来个好的前奏。实际上，他们会有小小的停顿，假装想不起任何那时候其他人的名字了，接着，一个人终于说道：‘瑞德怎么样了？有人最近听到过他的消息吗？’随即他们闹翻了天，发出了最恶心的声音，介于讥讽与干呕之间的那种声音。他们不约而同地反复吼叫，真的，在提到你名字之后的头一分钟里，那就是他们所做的一切。接着，他们开始哈哈大笑，然后，他们全都模仿起钢琴演奏，你知道的，就像这样——”帕克赫斯特摆出一副傲慢神情，在一排想象出来的隐形琴键上矫揉造作地弹奏起来。“他们全都这样，然后发出更多的干呕声。接着，他们开始七嘴八舌地议论你，讲他们记忆中有关你的一个个小故事，听得出他们已经互相说了好多遍了，因为他们全都知道，他们全都知道何时再开始鼓噪，何时说：‘什么？你开玩笑吧！’如此等等。哦，他们真的很开心啊。我在那儿的时候，一个人回忆道，期末考试结束的那晚，他们几个正准备出去撒晚上最后一泡尿，看到你从路那边过来，满脸严肃。他们对你说：‘来吧，瑞德，过来和我们一起把你的大脑撒出去！’显然，你回了话，然后，不管是谁在讲这件事，他们都会摆出这副表情，显然你当时说，”帕克赫斯特又换上了傲慢的表情，显出一副荒谬自大的口吻，“‘我忙得不得了。今晚我可不敢不练琴呐。因为这些讨厌的考试，我已经两天没练了！’刹那间，他们异口同声地发出一阵干呕声，摆出在空中弹奏钢琴的样子，这时他们开始……呃，我就不告诉你他们其他的胡闹了，真的很可怖，真是一帮恶心鬼，他们大部分人都很苦闷，很失意，很愤怒。”

帕克赫斯特说话的时候，学生时代的记忆片段涌入我脑中，一时间，我倍感平静，无暇顾及帕克赫斯特在说些什么。我想起一个明媚的早晨，正如今日这样，阳光溢满窗，我坐在旁边的沙发上休息，我和其他四个学生一起住在一所旧农舍，那时我正待在我的小房间里，膝上放着一本协奏曲乐谱。之前一个小时，我一直在无精打采地研读乐谱，这会儿正考虑放下它，转而从脚边木地板上的一堆十九世纪小说里挑出一本来读。窗户敞开着，一阵微风吹了进来。窗外，几个学生坐在没有修剪过的草地上，正讨论着哲学，或者诗歌，或者诸如此类的东西。我的小房间里除了有张沙发，其他东西很少——只有一条

褥垫铺在地上，另外，角落里还有一张小小的书桌和一把直背椅——但我非常喜欢这沙发。地上通常摊满书籍和杂志，午后那段长长的时光里，我时常翻阅它们，而且我有个习惯，常常半开着门，这样，不论谁经过都可以晃进来聊会儿天。我闭上双眼，一时间，我迫切渴望回到那周围都是开阔农田的小农舍，伙伴们都懒懒地躺在高高的草丛中，但没多久，我开始真正理解帕克赫斯特所说的那些事实了。那时候，我才意识到，他说的正是同样这一群人，此刻他们的脸与记忆中的脸一一重合。他们在我门口张望时，我曾懒洋洋地招呼过他们，还和他们随意待了大概一两个小时，讨论某位小说家或者西班牙吉他手，而帕克赫斯特这会儿说着的，正是这些人中的某几位。即便如此，在这溢满阳光的房中一隅，我斜倚在柯林斯小姐的那张藤沙发上，对帕克赫斯特所说的话只感到隐约有些不悦——这种平和的状态让我几乎觉得高兴起来。

帕克赫斯特继续说着，我却早已没有留心听了。这时，有人敲响了我身后的窗板，把我吓了一跳。帕克赫斯特好像不想理睬这声音，继续说着话，我也试图不理那响声，就好像一个人在美梦中被闹钟吵醒时那样。但那敲击声持久不断，帕克赫斯特终于停了下来，说道：“哦，天哪，是那个叫布罗茨基的家伙。”

我睁开双眼，扭头看去。果然是布罗茨基，他正热切地往房里窥探呢。不知是因为外面的光亮，抑或是他自己视力的问题，似乎让他往里看得很费力。他的脸紧贴着玻璃，双手挡在眼睛上方，但他好像还是没有看见我们。我这才意识到：他以为是柯林斯小姐自己在这所房间里，所以才在外面敲玻璃。

终于，帕克赫斯特站起身，说道：“我最好去看看他想干什么。”

第二十二章

我能听到帕克赫斯特打开了门，接着，门厅处传来了争执的声音。最后，帕克赫斯特回到屋里，冲我翻了个白眼，叹了口气。

布罗茨基跟着他进来。他看上去比我上次越过拥挤的房间见到他时要高些，我又留意到他奇怪的站姿——角度微微倾斜，好像要倒下似的——但同时也发现他已完全清醒。他系着一个猩红色的蝴蝶领结，穿着一套看起来全新且颇为时髦的黑色西装。白衬衫的领子向外竖着——是设计如此，还是上浆过多而太硬，我无从得知。他手捧一束鲜花，眼里满是疲惫与悲伤。布罗茨基停在门槛处，试探性地在门框周围张望一番，或许是期待在屋里发现柯林斯小姐。

“她很忙，我告诉过你了，”帕克赫斯特说道，“瞧，我恰好是柯林斯小姐的一位密友，我可以肯定地告诉你，她不想见你。”帕克赫斯特瞥了我一眼，期待我确认此话，但我已决定不想卷入其中，于是只是冲布罗茨基微微一笑。就在这时，布罗茨基认出了我。

“瑞德先生。”他说道，庄重地低下了头。然后，他再次转向帕克赫斯特。“如果她在的话，求你去叫一下她。”他示意了一下手里举着的那束花，好像那花本身便能解释他为何非见她不可。“求你了。”

“我告诉过你了，我帮不了你。她不会见你的。更何况，她现在正在和客人交谈呢。”

“好吧，”布罗茨基嘀咕道，“好吧。你不愿帮我。好吧。”

他一边嘀咕，一边朝着柯林斯小姐之前消失的内门走去。帕克赫斯特迅速挡住了他的去路。一时间，布罗茨基高大瘦削的身躯与矮小粗壮的帕克赫斯特冲撞起来。帕克赫斯特用双手抵住布罗茨基的胸膛，企图阻止他继续前进。与此同时，布罗茨基一手按住帕克赫斯特的肩膀，目光越过肩膀望向内门，好像他置身于人群中，颇有礼貌地越过面前的人凝望着。这当儿，他双脚仍旧稳稳地做出拖步前行的动作，口中断断续续地说着“求你了”。

“好吧！”帕克赫斯特最终大喊道，“好吧，我去跟她说。我知道她会说什么，不过，好吧，好吧！”

他们两人分开了。帕克赫斯特举起手指，说道：

“但你得在这儿等着！你得保证在这儿等着！”

帕克赫斯特最后瞪了一眼布罗茨基，转过身，走进门去，随后牢牢地关上了门。

起先，布罗茨基站在那儿盯着门，我以为他要跟着帕克赫斯特一起进去。但最后他转过身，坐了下来。

好一阵子，布罗茨基好像在脑中排演着什么，嘴里嘟囔着一个奇怪的字眼，这时候跟他说什么都显得不甚合宜。他不时地仔细看看手中的花束，好像一切都仰仗于它似的，哪怕最微小的瑕疵都会酿成大错。接着，我们继续坐着，都没说话，过了一会儿，他终于看着我说道：

“瑞德先生。我很荣幸终于能结识您了。”

“您好，布罗茨基先生，”我答道，“希望您还好。”

“呃……”他含糊地挥了挥手，“我不能说感觉很好。您看，我很疼。”

“哦？疼？”见他什么都没说，我便继续问道：“您指的是情感上的疼吗？”

“不，不。是伤痛。多年前落下的，总是折磨我。非常疼。或许这就是我当初酗酒的原因吧。喝醉了，就感觉不到了。”

我期待他吐露更多，但他沉默了。过了一会儿，我问道：

“您是指内心的伤痛吗，布罗茨基先生？”

“内心？我的心没那么糟吧。不，不，这跟……”突然他大笑起来。“我明白了，瑞德先生。您认为我在借诗比喻吧。不，不，我的意思很简单，就是个伤口。我受过伤，非常严重，那是很多年前了。在俄罗斯。医生医术不高，他们没能治好。疼得很厉害。一直未能彻底治好。这么长时间以来一直发作，仍然很痛。”

“听到您这么说，我很难受。那一定很讨厌吧。”

“讨厌？”闻此，他想了想，又大笑起来。“您可以这么说，瑞德先生，我的朋友。讨厌。对我来说，真是太他妈的讨厌了。”突然，他似乎记起自己还举着花。他闻了闻，深吸了一口气。“我们还是别谈这个了。刚才您问我感觉如何，我就告诉了您，但其实我无意

谈那个。我想勇敢地面对伤痛。多年来我从未提起它，但现在我老了，也不喝酒了，这伤很痛啊。根本就没有真正治愈过。”

“肯定有办法治的。您去看医生了吗？或许专家之类的？”

布罗茨基又看了看花，微微一笑。“我想再向她示爱，”他几乎是自言自语道，“在这伤口恶化之前。我想再向她示爱。”

一阵诡异的沉默。接着我说：

“要是您这伤已这么久了，布罗茨基先生，我倒认为它不可能再恶化了。”

“这些旧伤，”他耸了耸肩。“多年来一直是老样子。你以为你有办法对付了。然后等你老了，它们又开始长了。但现在还没有那么糟。或许我还能行男女之事。我现在老了，但有时候……”他神秘兮兮地向前倾了倾身子。“我试过。您知道的，我自己解决。我还行。我能忘记痛。我喝醉的时候，我那玩意儿，您知道的，根本没用，没用。我从未往那方面想过。只是上厕所时用。仅此而已。但现在我可以了，即便很痛。我试过了，就在前晚。但我肯定不能，您知道的，一直都行，呃，全都行。我那玩意儿已经老了，这么多年了，只是，呃，上厕所才用。啊！”他靠回椅子，越过我的肩膀凝望阳光，双眼充满了渴望。“所以我想再次向她示爱。但我们不会住在这儿了。不在这个地方。我一直讨厌这地方。我以前来过这儿，是的，我承认，我曾经在深夜没人看见时走过这儿。她从不知道，但我过去常来，站在外面，看着这幢大楼。我一向讨厌这条街，这幢公寓。我们不会住在这儿了。您知道，这是第一次，第一次我走进这讨厌的地方。她为什么选择这样一个地方？不像她中意的啊。我们会住在城外。如果她不想回农舍，没关系。我们会再另找个地方，或许另一间农舍吧。绿草树木环绕，我们的小动物可以尽情嬉耍。我们的动物不会喜欢这儿的。”他仔细环顾四周，看了看墙壁和天花板，或许是在重估这幢公寓的优点吧。然后，他下了断论：“不，我们的动物怎么能在这儿玩耍？我们要住在有草、有树、有田野的地方。您知道，用不了一年，六个月吧，假如伤痛加剧，我那玩意就不听我使唤了，我们就不能再行男女之事了，我不在乎。只要我能和她哪怕再做一次。不，一次不够，我们得回到从前那样，您知道，我们从前那样。六次，是的，六次，我们就会记起所有事情，那就是我想要的一切。那之后呢，好吧，好吧。假若有人，一个医生，天哪，假如他说你只能再和她做六次，然后就完了，你太老了，你的伤口会太痛的，那之后就全完了，就只能上厕所用了，我统统不介意。我会说，好吧，我没关系。只要

我能重新拥她入怀，六次就足够了，那么我们就会像以前那样，回到当初，我不在乎，不在乎之后怎样。不管怎样，我们会有自己的宠物的。我们就不需要行房了。那是年轻情侣需要的，因为他们没能足够了解对方，他们不曾恨过对方，然后又重新相爱。您知道，我还能做。我试过，我自慰过，就在前晚。不是一直都行，但我能让它坚挺起来。”

他顿了顿，严肃地冲我点了点头。

“真是的，”我笑道，“那太棒了。”

布罗茨基靠回椅子，再次凝望窗外。接着他说：“一切都不同了，不像年轻的时候了。年轻时，你老想着妓女，您知道，跟妓女干些肮脏下流的事情。如今，对那些事情我一点也不上心了，我只想让我那玩意儿干一件事，我想和她再像从前那般行事，再续前缘，仅此而已。然后，假如她想休息，那好啊，我也不再做要求。但我想再来一回，干它个六次，那就足矣，就像我们从前那样。年轻时，我们不是很好的情侣。我们不像现在的年轻人那样或许哪儿都能干，我不知道。但我们，呃，有很好的默契。是的，真的，我年轻时，有时，厌倦了，因为每次都是老调重弹。但她就想那样，她……她不想用别的方式，我对此很是生气，她却不知这其中的缘故。但现在，我想重复那老惯例，按部就班，就像我们从前那样。前天晚上，您知道，当我……当我在尝试的时候，我想起了妓女，意念上的妓女，绝棒的妓女，飘飘欲仙地做着，但却没用，没用，没用。然后我就想，唉，那也无可厚非。我这杆老枪，只剩下最后一个任务了，为何要用妓女来羞辱它呢？那跟我现如今的这个老家伙又有何关系呢？只剩最后一个任务了，我应该好好思量。于是我开始思索。我躺在黑暗中，回忆，回忆，回忆。我想起我们曾经是如何干的，一步一步地。对，我们就要再那样干。当然，如今我们的身体都老了，但我已想通了。我们就一切照旧。而她一定还记得的，她不会忘记的，一步一步地。只要我们身处黑暗，钻进被窝。我们从未大胆过，您看，因为她，她很卑谦，她就想那样。我那时很介意，我总是想对她说：‘你为何就不能像妓女那样？在灯光下展现自己？’但现在，我不介意了，我只想像过去那样，假装准备睡觉了，静静地躺着，十分钟，十五分钟。然后，我猛不丁地开口，在黑暗中放肆地说些下流话。‘我想让他们看见你一丝不挂的样子，’我会说，‘酒吧里喝得烂醉的水手们。在一个港口小酒馆里，一群烂醉如泥、淫荡齷齪的人，我想让他们看见你一丝不挂地躺在地板上。’是的，瑞德先生，过去我常常在我们躺下假装入睡的时候突然说这样的话，是的，突然打破沉默，那很重要，

突然间打破。当然啰，她那时很年轻，很漂亮，现在的话，就会听起来很怪，一个老女人赤身裸体地躺在酒馆地板上，但我还是会说，因为我们过去就是这样开始的。她什么都不说的，所以我就多嘴几句。‘我想让他们全部都盯着你。四脚着地，躺在地板上。’但您能想象吗？一个孱弱的老女人那样子做？那些醉醺醺的水手如今会说什么呢？可是，或许他们也和我们一起变老了。或许，那些港口酒馆里的水手，在他们心目中，她还是过去的样子，他们才不介意呢。‘是的，他们都会盯着你看的！全部都会！’我会抚摸她，抚摸她的臀部，我记得的，她喜欢让我抚摸她的臀腰部，我会像从前那样抚摸她，然后我会靠近她，低声说：‘我要让你做个娼妓。夜复一夜。’您能想象吗？但我会那样说的，因为从前就是这样的。我会掀掉被单，俯在她身上，劈开她的双腿，也许大腿根连接处会发出“咔哒”一声，会发出“啪啪”的声响，有人说她伤到了臀部，或许她如今没法叉开双腿了。唉，我们会尽力做好的，因为接下来正需要那样。接着，我会俯身亲吻她的私处，我并不期待那儿的味道还如从前那样，不，我已经想通了，可能味道很难闻，就像臭鱼一样，她整个身体可能都很难闻，我已经仔细想过了。而我，我的身体呢，现在看来也不是那么好了。而我的皮肤，有这些鳞屑，不断剥落，我也不知道那是什么。去年，刚开始时，只是头皮上有。我梳头的时候，这些巨大的鳞片，就像透明的鱼鳞一样纷纷掉落下来。原本只是头皮，但现在全身都是，手肘上，膝盖上，连前胸都这样。这些鳞片，闻起来也像是鱼腥味。唉，不断剥落，我没法止住，她必须得忍受，所以我不会抱怨她私处闻起来也那样，或是她双腿不发出咔哒声就张不开，我不会生气，您不会看到我像对待坏掉的东西一样非要分开它们不可，不，不。我们会完全按照以前那样做的。而我那老家伙，或许只是半挺着，高潮来临时，她会伸手抓住，低声说道：‘是的，我会让他们看！我会让水手们统统都看我！我会逗弄他们，直到他们再也忍不住！’您能想象吗？以她如今这副样子？但我们不会介意。不管怎么说，我讲过的，或许水手们会和我们一起变老。她会伸手抓住它，我那老家伙，从前，到了这个时候，它就会变得非常坚硬了，世界上没有任何东西能让它萎缩，除了……唉，但如今，或许只能是半硬了，那是我在前晚达到的最佳状态了，谁知道呢，或许能坚持到底，我会使劲放进去，但她可能会像贝壳一样紧，但我们会努力的。在恰当时机，我们会记起是何时，即便那下面什么都没发生，我们也知道如何完成这些步骤，因为到那时，我们都会清晰地回忆起一切，什么都阻挡不了我们，即便那下面什么都没发生，即便我们所做的一切只是紧紧地拥着对方，那也没关系，我们仍会适时地说：‘他们会要

你！他们会要你，你逗弄他们太久了！’而她会问：‘是的，他们会要我，所有的水手，他们会要我！’即便那下面什么都没发生，我们仍能紧紧相拥，我们会紧紧相拥，像从前那样说出口，那无关紧要的。或许我那老家伙会很痛，您知道的，因为我有伤，但没关系，她会记得我们从前是如何干的。已过了这么多年，但她仍会记得的，记得每一个步骤。瑞德先生，您没受过伤吧？”

他突然间看着我。

“伤？”

“我这个是旧伤。也许那就是我酗酒的原因吧。很疼啊。”

“太不幸了。”接着，短暂沉默之后，我补充道：“我曾在一场足球赛中狠狠地伤到了一根脚趾。我当时十九岁。但那也没什么大不了的。”

“在波兰时，瑞德先生，我是个乐队指挥，那时候，我都未曾想过这伤会痊愈。我指挥乐队的时候，总是摸我的伤口，轻抚它。有段时间，我会抓弄伤口边缘，甚至狠狠地用手指按压伤口。但我很快便意识到，伤口不会痊愈了。音乐，即便我当时是个指挥，也明白只是一种安慰罢了，这也是它全部的含义。它帮了我一阵子。我曾喜欢那感觉，按压伤口的感觉，它让我着迷。一个真正的伤口，就有那样的作用，会让人着迷。每天看起来都会有些不同。你便会想，变了吗？或许最终会痊愈吧。你望着镜中的它，好像是不同了。但是，当你触碰它时，你知道还是副老样子，还是你的老朋友。年复一年都是如此，然后你知道，它不会痊愈了，最后你就厌倦了。厌倦透了。”他陷入沉默，又望了一眼手里的花束。然后他又说道：“厌倦透了。您还没有厌倦透吧，瑞德先生？厌倦透了。”

“或许，”我试探性地说道，“柯林斯小姐可以治愈您的伤。”

“她？”他突然大笑一声，接着又沉默不语。过了一会儿，他静静地说道：“她就像音乐一样。一种安慰。美妙的安慰。那就是我如今唯一的盼求。一种安慰。但要治愈伤口？”他摇了摇头。“假如我现在给您看看，我的朋友——我可以给您看一下——您就会发现那是不可能的。药是不灵的啊。我想要的，现在我唯一想要的，就是安慰。即便就像我所说的那样，只能达到半挺的程度，我们只不过是舞动而已，那么再来六次就足够了。那之后，伤口爱怎么样就怎么样吧。到时候我们有自己的动物，有青草，田野。她为何选了这样一个地方？”

他又一次环视四周，摇了摇头。这次他沉默了许久，大概有两三分钟。我正要说些什么，突然他倾身向前。

“瑞德先生，我有一条狗，叫布鲁诺，他死了。我……我还没有埋葬他呢。他装在一只箱子里，算是棺材吧。他是个好朋友。虽然只是一条狗，但却是好朋友。我筹划了一个小型葬礼，只为了与他道别。没特别的意思。布鲁诺，他如今是过去式了，但这是一个小型葬礼，只为道别而已，那何错之有？瑞德先生，我想问问您。只是个小忙，为了我还有布鲁诺。”

就在这时，门突然开了，柯林斯小姐走进房间。我和布罗茨基随即站起身，帕克赫斯特跟着她进来，关上了门。

“非常抱歉，柯林斯小姐，”帕克赫斯特说道，面带愠色地看着布罗茨基。“他就是不懂得尊重您的隐私。”

布罗茨基僵硬地站在屋子中间。柯林斯小姐走近了些，他朝她鞠了一躬，从中我看到了一丝优雅，从前他必定风度翩翩。他把花束递给她，说道：“只是个小礼物。我自己亲手摘的。”

柯林斯小姐接过花，但完全没把它当回事。“也许我猜到了你会这样子来这儿，布罗茨基先生，”她说，“我昨天去了动物园，你便以为可以肆无忌惮了。”

布罗茨基垂下双目。“可是时日不多了，”他说，“现在我们浪费不起时间啊。”

“浪费时间干什么，布罗茨基先生？太可笑了，你就这样来了。你知道我早上是很忙的。”

“求你了，”他举起手掌，“求你了。我们现在都老了，用不着像从前那样争吵了。我只是过来给你送花的，还有提个小建议。仅此而已。”

“建议？什么样的建议，布罗茨基先生？”

“就是，今天下午到圣彼得公墓和我见个面吧。就半个小时而已。就我们两个，谈点事情。”

“没什么好谈的。昨天去动物园明显是个错误。你是说公墓吗？你怎么会找这么个地方约我？你是脑袋进水了？不约在饭店、咖啡馆或某个花园或者湖滨什么的，却偏偏提议去公墓！”

“抱歉。”布罗茨基看起来真的无比沮丧。“我没想到。我忘记了。我忘记圣彼得公墓是块墓地了。”

“别装蒜了。”

“我的意思是，我经常去那儿，我们觉得那儿十分幽静，我还有布鲁诺。即便在最糟糕的时候，到了那儿我的心情就不那么糟了，那儿很静谧，很幽美，我们喜欢那儿。所以我就提议这个地方了。真的，我忘了。那儿埋着死人呢。”

“我们去那儿干吗？坐在墓碑上，回忆往日时光？布罗茨基先生，你真的要好好想想你的建议了。”

“但我们很喜欢那儿，我还有布鲁诺。我以为你也会喜欢。”

“哦，我明白了。你的狗死了，你就希望我代替它的位置。”

“我不是那个意思。”布罗茨基那矜持的表情忽然消失，脸上掠过一丝焦躁不安。“我根本不是那意思，你知道的。你总是这样。我想啊想，想要找到对我们都好的事情，而你呢，又是冷嘲，又是热讽，觉得那样很可笑。而别人的呢，你却说那是多美妙的主意啊。你老是这样。就像那次吧，我安排我们坐在科比连斯基演奏会的前排……”

“那是三十多年前的事了。你怎么还在唠叨这些事情？”

“但一样的啊，一样的。我想出了一些……一些好事情，因为我知道，在你内心深处，你喜欢让事情有点与众不同。然后呢，你却又加以嘲笑。或许是因为那是我的主意，比如公墓这事吧，在内心深处，其实很吸引你，而你呢，你也明白我懂你的心思，所以你假装……”

“胡说。我为何要跟你谈这些事情，根本没有理由。太晚了，我们没什么好谈的，布罗茨基先生。无论吸引与否，我都不会与你在公墓见面的，因为我和你没什么好谈的……”

“我只是想解释一下。这一切的一切，为何会发生，我从前为何那样……”

“一切都太晚了，布罗茨基先生。至少晚了二十年。更何况，我已无法忍受再听到你这么道歉了。即便现在，一听到你满嘴的道歉，我就不禁浑身发抖。这么多年来，你的道歉并不意味着结束，而是开始。又一轮痛苦与羞辱的开始。哦，你为何要来骚扰我？一切都太晚

了。况且，自你清醒后，又喜欢穿得怪里怪气的。你穿的都是些什么衣服呀？”

布罗茨基犹豫了一下，然后说：“是有人建议我这么穿的。那些帮我的人。我又要去指挥了。我得穿得像个指挥家，这样人们才会那样看待我。”

“昨天在动物园我就差点跟你说了。那件可笑的灰外套！谁要你穿那件衣服的呀？霍夫曼先生吗？真的，你得对自己的形象稍稍多用点心思。这些人把你打扮得像个木偶，而你竟然随他们那么做。你现在看看自己！这身可笑的行头。看看你！你以为穿成这样，就有艺术家的派头啦？”

布罗茨基垂眼瞥了瞥自己的装束，眼中露出一副受伤的神情。然后，他抬起头，说道：“你这个老太婆，根本不懂当今的时尚。”

“老人才有特权对年轻人的服饰指指点点。但你竟然穿成这样，真是太可笑了。真的，没用的，真不是你的风格。老实讲吧，我倒觉得这城市更喜欢你几个月前的穿着。就是说，那些优雅的破衣烂衫。”

“别嘲笑我了。我不会再像那样了。也许我马上又可以当指挥家了。这些是我现在的服饰。我觉得自己看上去很得体呀。你忘记了，在华沙，我也穿这样的衣服呀。打这样一个蝴蝶领结。你如今忘记了。”

刹那间，柯林斯小姐眼中掠过一丝惆怅，然后她说：

“我当然忘了。我为什么要记得这些事情？这些年来，我还有很多更有意义的事情要记呢。”

“你的裙子，”他突然说道，“真的很漂亮。非常雅致。可你的鞋子跟从前一样难看，简直糟透了。你永远不承认你的脚踝很粗。一个这么纤细的女人，脚踝却总是这么粗壮。看，现在还是这样。”他指了指柯林斯小姐的双脚。

“别耍孩子气了。你以为还像当年在华沙的时候，说一句那样的话，就能让我在出门前的几分钟更换我的全副装束吗？你还活在过去啊，布罗茨基先生！你以为我会在意你对我鞋子的看法吗？你以为我现在还不知道，那只不过是玩的小把戏，故意等最后临门一脚时批评我吗？当然，我那时改换了所有衣装，极度匆忙间也顾不上穿了什么就出去了。然后，我们一坐上车，或者是在音乐大厅，我才想起眼

影与衣衫颜色不搭，或者项链跟鞋子不配。那时候，这一切对我来说太重要了。我是指挥家的太太啊！太重要了，而你也是知道的呀。你以为我现在还不知道你那时在干吗吗？等到刚好差几分钟就要出发时，你就会说：‘很好，很好，很漂亮。’接着，是的，就会如此这般说道：‘你的鞋子太难看了！’好像你知道这回事似的！你对现在的时尚潮流知道多少？过去二十年，你一直都是醉醺醺的。”

“但是，”布罗茨基说，这会儿脸上带了些傲慢的表情，“但是，我说的是真的。那鞋子让你的下半身看起来很可笑。真的。”

“看看这身滑稽的西装吧！肯定是意大利制造的。年轻的芭蕾舞演员才可能穿这种衣服。你以为这能帮助你赢得市民的信任？”

“可笑的鞋子。你看起来就像个玩具士兵，有个底座，不会摔倒似的。”

“你该走了！你怎么敢来这儿，打搅我上午的安排！那里面有对年轻的夫妇，他们很悲伤，他们今早比以往更需要我的指导，而你却来这儿捣乱。这是我们最后一次谈话。昨天在动物园见你简直是个错误。”

“公墓。”他的声音突然带上了一丝绝望的语气。“今天下午你必须去见我。好吧，我没想到死人，我是没想到。但我解释过了。在……在今晚之前我们必须谈谈。要不然我怎么办？我怎么办？难道你不知道今晚有多重要吗？我们得谈谈，你必须去见我……”

“行了。”帕克赫斯特上前一步，怒视着布罗茨基。“你都听到柯林斯小姐的话了。她要求你离开她的寓所。从她的视线中消失，远离她的生活。她太客气了，不好意思说出来，所以我代替她说。干了这一切勾当后，你就没有权利，没有一丝一毫的权利提刚才这样的要求。你还有脸站在那儿要求见面，仿佛这一切都没发生过似的？或许你在装醉卖傻，什么都不记得了。那么我来提醒提醒你。就在不久前，你站在外面那条街上，冲着这幢大楼的墙壁撒尿，冲着这扇窗户喊着下流话。最后警察把你带走了，把你拖走，而你还对柯林斯小姐恶言恶语。这事发生还不到一年。无疑你希望柯林斯小姐现在已经忘了。但我可以明确地对你说，那只是诸如此类许多事件中的一件而已。至于你在着装方面的声明，难道不是因为在两年多前，有人在人民公园发现你不省人事，身上穿着一件被你呕吐了无数遍的衣服，被带到圣三一教堂，发现你身上生满了虱子？难道你期望柯林斯小姐会在意你这样一个男人评价她的衣着吗？面对现实吧，布罗茨基先生，

一个人一旦到了你那样的地步，就无可救药了。你永远、永远也赢不回一个女人的爱了，我可以郑重地告诉你。你甚至永远赢不回她的尊重。或许她会怜悯你，但没别的了。指挥家！你以为这个城镇还会再看你一眼？他们看到的不过就是个恶心的倒霉蛋。我提醒你吧，布罗茨基先生，四年前，或者五年前，你动手打了柯林斯小姐，就在那火车站边上，要不是两个学生经过，你一定致她重伤了。而且，你一边打她，还一边喊着不堪入耳的……”

“没有！没有！没有！”布罗茨基忽然大叫起来，他摇着头，捂住耳朵。

“你喊着最不堪入耳的脏话。既下流又变态。大家都议论说你该被关进监狱。然后，当然，还有在提尔盖斯公用电话亭的那一出……”

“不！不！”

布罗茨基一把抓住帕克赫斯特的领子，后者慌张地后退几步。不过，布罗茨基没有进一步攻击，只是紧抓住帕克赫斯特的领子不放，仿佛那是根救命稻草似的。随后的几秒钟，帕克赫斯特想奋力掰开布罗茨基的手指。待他终于成功后，布罗茨基的全身好像都松垮了下来。老人闭上双眼，叹了口气，转身默默地走出屋子。

起先，我们三人仍是默默地站着，不知道如何是好。就在这时，布罗茨基“砰”的一声关上前门，我们一下子回过神来，我和帕克赫斯特两人走到窗前。

“他走了，”帕克赫斯特说，前额顶着玻璃。“别担心，柯林斯小姐，他不会回来了。”

柯林斯小姐好像没听见。她踱步至门前，接着又转过身来。

“请原谅，我得……我得……”她迷迷糊糊地走到窗前，看向外面，“请原谅，我得……瞧，我希望您能理解……”

她没有特别对着我们哪一个说话。接着，她的惶惑好像消失了，她说道：“帕克赫斯特先生，您没有权利对里奥那样说话。过去一年里，他已经展现出巨大的勇气。”她向他投去锐利的一瞥，然后匆匆走出屋子。我们立刻听到房门又“砰”的响了一声。

我依旧在窗边，可以看见柯林斯小姐匆忙地沿街走去。她看到布罗茨基走在前面，离她已经好一段路了。过了一会儿，她突然小跑起

来，或许是想避免叫他等一下她的窘境。而布罗茨基歪歪扭扭地走着，奇怪的步履显得惊人的轻盈。他显然心绪烦乱，好像真的没有想到她会出来追他。

柯林斯小姐的呼吸越来越重，她追着他经过几排公寓大楼，然后又经过了街口的几家商店，却仍没有追近。布罗茨基继续健步走着，这会儿转过了我先前与古斯塔夫分手的那个拐角，走过宽阔的林荫大道上一家家意大利咖啡馆。那条人行道比我跟古斯塔夫一起走过时更加拥挤，但布罗茨基低着头一路前行，时常差点撞上行人。

当布罗茨基快到人行横道时，柯林斯小姐似乎意识到她已不能赶上他了。她停住脚步，双手捂着嘴巴，好像最后陷入了某种尴尬之中，或许是在想到底该喊他“里奥”呢，还是她在之前的对话中一直在称呼他的“布罗茨基先生”。无疑，本能告诫她，他们现在情势紧急，于是她大声喊道：“里奥！里奥！里奥！请等等！”

布罗茨基转过身，看到柯林斯小姐急急忙忙向他走来，露出了惊愕的神情。她依然捧着那束鲜花。困惑中，布罗茨基伸出双手，好像是主动要为她减轻负担似的。但柯林斯小姐仍然紧紧捧着花，此时尽管上气不接下气，但她还是十分镇静地说道：“布罗茨基先生，请等一下。请等一下。”

他们站在一起，颇感尴尬，两人顿然意识到周围都是行人，许多人纷纷看向他们这边，有些显然已经按捺不住好奇。这时，柯林斯小姐回头指了指她公寓的方向，轻柔地说：“每年的这个时候，斯腾伯格花园可美了。我们何不去那儿聊聊呢？”

他们动身离开，越来越多的人看向他们那边，柯林斯小姐走在布罗茨基前头一两步，显然他们要等到达目的地之后再开始谈话，为此两人都感到庆幸。他们转过拐角，回到她所在的那条街道，没多久就再次经过了公寓大楼的前方。然后，只走了大概一个街区，柯林斯小姐在一扇背靠人行道、隐蔽完好的小铁门边停了下来。

她将手伸向门闩，在打开门闩前，她下意识地迟疑了一下。那时，我突然意识到，于她而言，他们刚刚一起走完的那段短短的路程，以及他们这会儿并肩站在斯腾伯格花园入口处的这一景象，其意义远远超越了布罗茨基当时的想象。其实，这些年来，在她的想象中，她已经无数次走完了这一段短短的路程，穿过熙熙攘攘的林荫大道，停在这扇小铁门前——那个仲夏的午后，他们邂逅在这林荫大道上的珠宝店门前，从此这一幕便在柯林斯小姐脑海中时时浮现。这么

多年以来，她一直没有忘记：那天他转身背对她，假装被商店橱窗里的东西吸引了去，脸上故意摆出一副冷漠的表情。

那是他开始酗酒和对她恶言相向之前的最后一个好年月，这副冷漠的神情仍是他们之间接触的主要特征。尽管在那日午后，她已屡次决心要把和解的想法付诸行动，可她也移开目光，顾自走开了。她沿着大道继续走了一会儿，走过了意大利咖啡馆，直至这时她才好奇地向后看了一眼。她这才意识到他一直尾随着她。他又装作在看一家商店的橱窗，虽然如此，他离她只有短短的一小段路而已。

她故意放慢了脚步，以为他迟早会追上来。走到拐角的时候，仍没见到他追上来，她便又回头望了一眼。那天，与今日一样，阳光明媚的宽阔人行道上挤满了人，她却满心欢喜，只因清清楚楚地看到了他，看到他迈了小半步，停了下来，眼睛看着路旁的花摊。她的嘴角荡漾开了一丝微笑，转过拐角，惊喜地发现自己的心情竟如此轻松。这会儿她也开始闲逛起来，也不时地窥视商店橱窗。她目光依次扫过蛋糕店、玩具店、时装店——那时候那儿还没有书店——而脑海中一直在思索，等他终于赶上她时，她要如何开口。“里奥，我们多么孩子气啊。”她想这么说。但那似乎太通情达理了，于是她又想了个更刻薄的：“我发现我们好像是顺路啊”或者类似的话。接着，他的身影出现在拐角处，她看到他捧着一束鲜艳的花。她飞快地转过身，又开始走了，步伐适中。然后，快到她公寓时，那天头一次，心中不觉对他感到一阵厌烦。原本她整个下午都安排得好好的。早不选，晚不选，为何偏偏这个时候来找她谈呢？走到门前时，她又飞快地偷偷地瞥了一眼街道，发现他依然在二十码开外处。

她进屋关了门，按捺住了向窗外望的冲动，急急走到屋子后部的卧房。她对着镜子审视了一番自己，想稳定情绪，然后走出卧室，吃惊地停在走廊上。远远尽头处的门半开着，她能直直地望出去，越过阳光满溢的门厅，透过凸窗，看见外面人行道上的他。他背对着屋子，在那儿徘徊着，好像约好了在那里与什么人见面。顷刻间，她一动不动地站着，生怕他会转过身来透过玻璃看到她。渐渐地，他的身影从视野中消失了，她发现自己凝视着街对面房子的前门，等待着聆听响起的门铃声。

过了一分钟，他还没有按门铃，她又对他感到一阵愤怒。她意识到，他是在等着她请他进来。她又一次淡定下来，仔细回想了整个情景，决定什么都不做，一直等到他按响门铃为止。

接下来几分钟，她继续等待着。她了无目的地回到了卧室，然后又慢慢地回到走廊。最后，她终于发现他已经走了，于是慢慢走出门廊。

她打开门，左顾右盼，却再也看不见他的踪迹，颇为惊讶。也许他躲在了几扇门之外的地方——或者至少台阶上该放有花。但这只是柯林斯小姐的一厢情愿罢了。尽管如此，那一刻，她未感到丝毫的悔意，却有些许宽慰，夹杂着阵阵激动涌上心头，和解进程终于开始了，而她根本未感到后悔。事实上，她坐在前厅，感受到一阵胜利的喜悦在心中蔓延，因为她坚持住了自己的立场。她告诉自己，这些小小的胜利非常重要，会帮助他们避免重蹈覆辙。

但仅仅几个月后，她就意识到那天她犯了个错误。起初那个想法非常模糊，她并没有细细思量。然后，几个月过去了，那夏日午后的事渐渐占据了她的整个思维。她认为自己最大的错误就是进了自家公寓，这样做就有点太为难他了。带着他一路走过街头巷尾，经过无数店铺后，她应该在那扇小铁门前等他，确定他清清楚楚地看见了她之后再走进斯腾伯格花园。接着，毫无疑问，他会跟着她。即便他们默默地在灌木丛中闲逛一会儿，但迟早总会开口的吧。迟早，他会把花给她的。那之后，过了诡谲的二十年后，每当柯林斯小姐望向那铁门时，心中无不漾起一阵小小的悸动。于是，今天早晨，当她终于把布罗茨基领入了这花园，一种仪式感油然而生。

尽管在柯林斯小姐想象中斯腾伯格花园举足轻重，但它确实不是个特别吸引人的地方，基本上只是个水泥地广场，还没有超市停车场大，好像它的存在主要就是为了园艺栽培，而非为周围四邻提供美感与舒适。没有草坪，没有树，只有几排花坛，一天中这时候，广场上日头赤赤，明显无荫蔽之处。而柯林斯小姐四下看看花朵，还有蕨草，欢快地拍起手来。布罗茨基小心地关上身后的铁门，看着花园，没有半点兴致，但好像又满意地发现，除了头顶的公寓窗户外，这里只有他们两人。

“我有时带他们来这儿，那些来看我的人，”柯林斯小姐说道，“这儿太迷人了。你可看到欧洲其他地方都没有的品种。”

她继续闲庭信步，羡慕地四下看着，布罗茨基恭敬地跟在她身后，与她保持几步的距离。几分钟前两人刚见面时表现出的尴尬这会儿已经消失殆尽，所以从门口瞥见他们的人，很容易就会误认为他们是一对在阳光下散步的老夫老妻，这种散步的习惯已经保持了好多年。

“不过，当然啰，”柯林斯小姐说道，在一灌木丛边停下，“你从不喜欢这样的花园，是不是，布罗茨基先生？你蔑视如此自然的约束。”

“你不叫我里奥啦？”

“好吧。里奥。不，你更喜欢狂野些的东西。但你看到了，只有小心地控制培育，有些品种才能存活。”

布罗茨基肃穆地看着柯林斯小姐正在抚摸的叶片。然后他说：“你还记得吗？每个周日早晨，我们一起在普拉加喝过咖啡之后，常常去那家书店。那么多旧书，不管转到哪里，都那么狭窄，满是灰尘。你还记得吗？你老是不耐烦。但我们还是常去，每个周日，在普拉加喝过咖啡之后。”

柯林斯小姐沉默片刻。然后她轻轻笑了笑，又开始慢慢地走了起来。“那个蝌蚪人。”她说。

布罗茨基也笑了。“蝌蚪人。”他重复道，点了点头。“没错。假如我们现在回去，他或许仍旧在那儿，桌子后面。蝌蚪人。我们有没有问过他的名字？我们从未买过他的书，但他总是对我们彬彬有礼。”

“除了那天早晨，他冲我们大喊大叫。”

“他冲我们大喊大叫过吗？我不记得了。那蝌蚪人一直彬彬有礼。不过我们从未买过他的书。”

“哦，是的。有一次我们进去，那天下着雨，我们很小心不让水滴在书上，我们在门口甩了下外套，但他那天早上脾气很不好，就大声责骂了我们。你不记得了吗？他冲我大喊，说我是英国人。哦，是的，他非常粗鲁，但就只是那天早晨。接下来的周日，他好像忘记这事了。”

“有意思，”布罗茨基说，“我不记得了。蝌蚪人。我一直记得他很害羞，还很有礼貌。我不记得你说的这件事了。”

“或许我记错了吧，”柯林斯小姐说，“或许我把他和其他人弄混了。”

“应该是的。蝌蚪人，他总是那么恭敬，不会做这样的事情的。只是因为你是英国人就责骂你？”布罗茨基摇了摇头，“不，他总是很尊敬人的。”

柯林斯小姐又停了下来，一时间，她被一簇蕨草吸引住了。

“那时候许多人，”她终于开口说，“他们都是那样。很礼貌，很坚忍。他们总是千方百计与人为善，牺牲所有，然后，突然有一天，毫无缘由地，天气呀，或是其他什么的，都会让他们勃然大怒。然后又恢复正常。许多人都那样。比如安德热，他就是那样。”

“安德热是个疯子。你知道的，我在什么地方看到过，说他死于一场车祸。是的，我看到过，在一份波兰报纸上，就在五六年前，死于一场车祸。”

“太惨了。我猜那时代的许多人现在可能都过世了吧。”

“我喜欢安德热，”布罗茨基说道，“我在一份波兰报纸上看到的，只是一笔带过，说他死了，是一起公路事故。太悲惨了。我回想起了那一个个夜晚，我们坐在旧公寓里，用毯子裹起全身，一起喝着咖啡，四周到处都是书和报纸。我们谈天说地，聊音乐，侃文学，一个小时接着一个小时地聊，看着天花板，不停地聊啊聊。”

“我常常都想去睡了，但安德热却从不肯回家。有时候他会待到天亮。”

“没错。假如他辩不过我，输了的话，那他就不肯走，直到他认为自己赢了为止。那就是他为何会待到天亮的原因。”

柯林斯小姐笑了笑，然后叹了口气。“听到他死了，多难过啊。”她感叹道。

“不是那个蝌蚪人，”布罗茨基说，“是那个美术馆的人，是他在喊。一个怪人，总是假装不认识我们。你还记得吗？即使在《拉夫卡迪奥》演出之后的日子里也是。服务员和出租车司机都想跟我握手，但我们去美术馆的时候，却什么都没有发生。他看着我们，表情像块石头，一直都是那样。然后，到后来，境况越来越糟糕的时候，我们进去，那天还下着雨，他冲我们大喊。他说，我们弄湿了他的地板。我们以前总那样的啊，只要下雨，多年来一直那样啊，弄湿他的地板，过了这么些年，他厌倦了。就是他大喊，说你是个英国人，是他，不是那个蝌蚪人。那蝌蚪人总是很尊敬人的，自始至终都是。那蝌蚪人和我握过手，我记得的，就在我们离开之前。你还记得吗？我们去了书店，他知道那是最后一次了，他从桌后走了出来，和我握了握手。那时候，还没有多少人想和我握手，但他却握了。他很尊敬人，那个蝌蚪人，总是那样。”

柯林斯小姐用一只手挡住双眼，看向花园的远方的一角，然后她又开始慢慢走起来，说道：“能拥有这些回忆真好。但我们不能活在过去。”

“但你还记得，”布罗茨基说道，“你还记得那个蝌蚪人和书店。还记得那橱柜吗？门坏掉的那个？你全部记得，跟我一样。”

“有些事情我还记得。其他的那些，我已经忘记了，遗忘总是不可避免的。”此时她的声音警觉起来。“有些事，尽管也是在那时发生的，最好还是忘记吧。”

布罗茨基若有所思。最后，他说：“或许你是对的。过去，发生的事儿太多了。我很惭愧，你知道我很内疚，就让我们结束吧。让我们结束过去。我们挑选个宠物吧。”

柯林斯小姐继续走着，这会儿已经先几步走在布罗茨基前面了。过了一会，她又停了下来，转身对着他。“今天下午我会在公墓和你见面，假如那是你希望的话。但你不能把它当作什么。那并不意味着我同意养宠物或者其他任何事情。不过我看得出你在为今晚担心，希望和其他人谈谈你内心的焦虑。”

“过去这几个月。我看到了那些蠢贼，但我坚持，再坚持，做好了准备。假如你不回来，一切都毫无意义。”

“我只答应今天下午见你一小会儿。或许半个小时吧。”

“但你会考虑的。在我们见面之前，你会考虑的。你会考虑的。宠物，一切。”

柯林斯小姐转过身去，对着另一株灌木端详了许久。最后，她说道：“好吧。我会考虑的。”

“你明白那对我意味着什么吧。多么艰难啊。有时候，太痛苦了，我真想一死了之，但我这次坚持了下来，因为我看到了出路。还当乐队指挥。你得回来。会像从前一样的，甚至可能更好。有时候很痛苦，那些蠢贼，我再做不了什么去证明了。我们从未有过孩子。所以我们养宠物吧。”

柯林斯小姐又开始往前走，这次布罗茨基走在她身边，严肃地凝视她的脸。柯林斯小姐好像又要说什么，但就在这时，帕克赫斯特突然在我身后说道：

“我从未跟他们掺和在一起，你知道。我是说，他们用那样的方式开始谈论你的时候。我甚至没笑，连微笑一下都没有。我根本不掺和。你也许以为我只是说说而已，但这是真的。我讨厌他们，讨厌他们那样子。还有那驴叫似的声音！我一进门，就又会听到那驴叫声！他们甚至连一分钟都不肯施舍，连六十秒都不给我，让他们瞧瞧我已变了。‘帕克斯！帕克斯！’哦，我讨厌他们……”

“瞧，”我说道，突然对他感到一阵不耐烦，“假如他们这么惹你厌烦，你为何不直接把自己的想法说出来呢？下次，你何不当面质问他们？告诉他们住嘴，别再发出那种驴叫声。问问他们为何……为何这么讨厌我，为何我的成功这么冒犯了他们。是的，问问他们！其实，为了达到最好的效果，你何不在表演小丑的当儿直接问他们呢？是的，就在你用搞笑的声音与表情逗乐大家的时候，就在他们全都笑呵呵地拍你后背，为你一点没变而乐不可支时，你就问他们，冷不丁地问他们：‘为什么？为什么瑞德的成功让你们如此寝食难安？’就这么办。那不仅帮了我，而且可以潇洒地向那些蠢货展示，无论是过去还是现在，在你那搞笑的外表背后，一直隐藏着一个更为深邃的人，一个不容易被操纵或妥协的人。这就是我的建议。”

“听上去好极了！”帕克赫斯特愤然喊道，“你说得倒是轻巧！你没什么损失，他们还是照样恨你！但这些都是我的老朋友。我游走在外的時候，周围都是这些欧陆人，大部分时间我都是好好的。但不时地，难免会有事情发生，一些不愉快的事情，这时我就对自己说：‘那又如何？我在意什么？他们只是外国佬。在祖国，我也有好朋友，只要我回去，他们一定会在那儿等我。’好啊，你给我提那样聪明的建议。可事实上，动脑子好好想想，或许对你一点都不好。我不明白你为何如此沾沾自喜。你不比我，再也经不起忘掉老朋友了。要知道，他们有些话说得还是对的。你太洋洋自得了，总有一天会付出代价。只是因为你太出名了！他们是对的，这你知道。‘你何不当面质问他们？’多么傲慢啊！”

帕克赫斯特继续如此这般地唠叨着，但我已经充耳不闻了。他提到我“沾沾自喜”，这倒触发了我的思绪，我突然记起我父母应该很快就会到这城市了。就在柯林斯小姐的前厅，一阵恐慌似寒流袭上心头，几乎触手可及，我猛然发现自己还没准备今晚要表演的曲子。确实，一连几天，或许甚至是几个星期，我都没有碰过钢琴了。此时此刻，离这场最重要的演出就剩几个小时了，可我都来不及安排预演。我越想越揪心。我发现自己太在意要发表的演说，而不知怎么地，莫名其妙地忽视了表演这一更重要的事。实际上，我一时间甚至想不起

已决定弹奏哪首曲子了。是山中的《全结构：选择II》呢？还是穆勒里的《石棉与纤维》？当我试图回忆这两支曲子时，脑子一片纷乱和模糊。我记得，每一曲都包含了极其复杂的乐段，可当我向记忆深处发掘时，却发现几乎一无所忆。与此同时，我知道我父母已经到这城市了。我觉得一分钟都不该再浪费了，不管谁来请求占用我的时间，我首先得至少抽出两个小时安静独处，好好练琴。

帕克赫斯特仍在兴致勃勃地说着。

“哦，真不好意思，”我边说边向门口走去。“我得马上走了。”

帕克赫斯特一跃而起，用乞求的口吻说道：

“我没掺和，你知道的。哦，不，我根本没掺和！”他追随着我，好像想要抓住我的胳膊。“我甚至都没微笑。他们那样没完没了地说你，太恶心了……”

“没关系，非常感谢你，”我说道，摆脱了他伸出的手。“但我现在真的必须走了。”

我走出柯林斯小姐的公寓，急忙走上大街，这会儿一门心思就想回到酒店，到休息室去练琴。事实上，我太专注了，不仅忘记了朝经过的小铁门瞥上一眼，也没看到布罗茨基就站在我前面的人行道上，我差点跟他撞了个满怀。布罗茨基平静地向我鞠躬致意，那样子表明，他刚才一直在看着我向他走去。

“瑞德先生。我们又见面了。”

“啊，布罗茨基先生，”我应答道，没有停下迈出的流星大步。“请原谅，我有急事在身。”

布罗茨基和我一起并肩走着，好一阵子，我们都没有说话。尽管我意识到这中间有些奇怪，但我一心只想着晚上的演出，没顾得上说话。

我们一起转过拐角，走上宽阔的林荫大道。这儿的人行道比之前更挤了——白领们都出来吃午饭了——我们被迫放慢速度。这时，布罗茨基在我身边开口道：

“人们都在谈论那天晚上。一场盛典。一座塑像呐。不，不，我们不谈这些。布鲁诺讨厌这些人。我想一个人静静地埋葬他，那又怎么了？今早我找了一个地方，一块埋葬他的小地方，只有我一个人，

他不想让其他任何人来，他讨厌他们。瑞德先生，我想为他演奏音乐，最好的音乐。一块安静的小地方，我今早发现的，我知道布鲁诺会喜欢那儿的。我得掘土，但不必挖太深，然后我会坐在墓边怀念他，回想我们度过的点滴时光，最后与他道别，就这样吧。我想要一首曲子，能在我想他的时候奏起，一首最好的乐曲。您能帮我演奏吗，瑞德先生？为我和布鲁诺演奏？帮帮我吧，瑞德先生。我求您了。”

“布罗茨基先生，”我说道，又轻快地走了起来，“我不清楚您到底要我帮您什么。但我得告诉您，我时间有限，不能考虑帮更多的忙了。”

“瑞德先生……”

“布罗茨基先生，您的狗死了，我很难过。但事实是，我已经被大家使唤去，帮了太多的忙，结果我自己反倒压力重重，没法儿完成我来这儿最重要的任务……”刹那间，一阵不耐烦袭上心头，我猛然住嘴。“老实讲，布罗茨基先生，”我几乎吼叫道，“我必须得求您还有其他人不要再叫我帮忙了。你们该歇歇了！必须到此为止！”

顷刻间，布罗茨基略带困惑地看着我。然后，他挪开目光，看上去一脸丧气。我顿时为自己大动肝火而懊悔，同时也意识到，自从到这城市以来，我得处理无数心烦意乱的事情，而为此对布罗茨基撒气未免不讲道理。我叹了口气，更温和地说：

“您看，我们要不这样吧。我刚要回酒店排练。我会要求在两个小时内完完全全不受干扰。但那之后，如果一切顺利，我也许可以跟您进一步讨论一下您的狗的事情。但我必须强调，我不能做出任何承诺，不过……”

“他只是条狗，”布罗茨基突然说道，“但我想跟他道别。我想用最好的音乐。”

“好的，布罗茨基先生，但我现在必须要快点了。时间真的不多了。”

我再次走了起来，满心以为布罗茨基会像之前一样步步紧跟着我，但他却没有动。我犹豫片刻，好像有些不舍得把他一个人留在人行道上，但立刻记起，我现在根本不能分心。我急速走过意大利咖啡馆，没有回头望，直至到达十字路口，等待绿灯亮起时才回头。一时间，我没法透过熙熙攘攘的行人看到他，但过了一会儿，布罗茨基的

身影出现了，他依然站在我离开他的地方，身体稍稍前倾，眼睛凝视着迎面而来的车辆。这时我突然想到，我之前停留的地方其实是个电车停靠站，而布罗茨基一直站在那儿，只是在等电车罢了。接着，绿灯亮了，我横穿林荫大道，思绪又回到了今晚的表演这件更为紧迫的事情上来。

第二十三章

我走进酒店，发觉大厅内熙熙攘攘，但这会儿我一心想着安排练琴的事宜，无暇环顾周围。事实上，我甚至可能还推开了面前的几位宾客，凑近接待台去询问接待员。

“劳驾，这会儿会客室里有人吗？”

“会客室？嗯，是的，瑞德先生。宾客们午饭后喜欢上那儿去，所以我觉得应该……”

“我得马上与霍夫曼先生谈谈。有件事十分紧急。”

“当然可以，瑞德先生。”

前台接待员拿起电话，对讲了几句，然后放下话筒，对我说：“霍夫曼先生过会儿才能见您，瑞德先生。”

“谢谢，但这件事迫在眉睫。”

我正说着，突然感到好像有人碰了一下我的肩膀，我回头一看，原来是索菲在身边。

“哦，你好，”我向她打招呼，“你在这儿干什么？”

“我正要送点东西。你知道，给我爸爸。”索菲有些难为情地笑了笑，“但他很忙，他现在在音乐厅那里。”

“噢，是这件外套。”我注意到了她胳膊上挎着的包，说道。

“天气渐渐转冷了，我就把它带来了，但他去了音乐厅没回来。我们已经等了将近半个小时了。假如再过几分钟他不回来的话，我们今天就先回去了。”

我发现鲍里斯坐在大厅另一头的沙发上。一群游客站在大厅中央，挡住了一大半视野，但我还是能看见，他正在出神地读着我在电影院里买的那本破破烂烂的杂务工手册。索菲顺着我的目光看去，又笑了笑。

“他对那本书如此痴迷。”她说，“昨晚你走后，他立马就翻看了起来，一直看到睡着。今天一早起床后，他就又开始看。”她又笑

了笑，再次朝他望了望。“给他买这本小册子真是个好主意。”

“我很高兴他乐在其中。”我说，又转向接待台。我抬手询问接待员，霍夫曼先生何时能见我，此时，索菲靠近一步，用一种异样的声音说道：

“你还打算在这件事情上矫情多久？这让他心烦意乱，你知道的。”

我疑惑地看了她一眼，但她仍旧表情严肃地盯视着我，目不转睛。

“我知道眼下事情对你来说很棘手，”她继续说道，“我也意识到我没怎么帮上你。但事实上，他已经很烦恼了，而且为此也很担心。这样下去还要多久？”

“我不明白你在说什么。”

“瞧，我是说，我知道我也有错。可是，假装这件事没发生，这有意义吗？”

“是什么事情假装没发生啊？我猜这是那个金姆的建议，对吧？来向我发这一大堆责难？”

“其实，金姆总是说，要我最好对你坦诚一些。但这次，与她无关。我提起这件事是因为……因为我无法忍受看到鲍里斯如此担忧。”

我一头雾水，转身对着接待员。但还未等我引起他的注意，索菲便说道：

“瞧，我并没有责难你什么。你对任何事都很包容。我不能要求你再通情达理些了。你甚至没有对我大呼小叫。但我一直知道，你心里有股火气，非要这样冒出来不可。”

我笑了笑。“我猜这就是你跟那个金姆交流的所谓大众心理学吧，是不是？”

“我一直都知道。”索菲没搭理我，继续说，“对于任何事你总是很通情达理，超出所有人的想象，甚至连金姆都承认这一点。但这根本不现实。我们不能再这样下去了，仿佛什么也没有发生。你生气了。谁能怪你呢？我一直觉得早晚会爆发，只是我从未想过会是这样。可怜的鲍里斯，他不知道自己干了什么。”

我又望了望坐在那里的鲍里斯。他似乎依旧全然沉浸在那本手册里。

“瞧，”我说，“我还是一点也不明白你在说什么。或许你是在说我和鲍里斯在互相迁就对方。但肯定的是，在特定情况下，那是唯一合适的做法。如果说我最近对他稍有疏远，那仅仅是因为我不想使他对我们的生活在一起的本质产生什么误解。我们都应该更加谨慎。时过境迁，谁知道我们三个的未来会是什么样子？鲍里斯得学习，要更加能屈能伸，更加独立。我确信，他会跟我一样，以自己的方式明白个中道理。”

索菲移开目光，一时间仿佛在思索着什么。当我再次要吸引前台接待员的注意力时，她突然说道：

“求你了，过去吧，就现在，跟他说几句。”

“过去？可问题是，我现在有十分紧要的事情要处理，只要霍夫曼先生一出现……”

“求你了，就几句话。这对他可大不一样啊，求你了。”

她热切地望着我。我耸了耸肩，她转身引路，穿过大厅。

我们走近时，鲍里斯抬头飞快地瞟了我们几眼，然后又正色低头继续读他的书。我本以为索菲会说点什么，但让我恼火的是，她竟然只是意味深长地朝我看了一眼，便径直走过鲍里斯坐着的沙发，到窗边的杂志架前去了。于是，我发现自己孤零零地站在鲍里斯旁边，而小男孩儿则继续看书。最后，我拉过一把扶椅，在他对面坐了下来。

鲍里斯仍旧埋头阅读，仿佛一点儿也没注意到我。接着，他头也没抬，自己喃喃道：

“这本书真棒。包罗万象。”

我正想着该如何回答，但接着就瞥见索菲背朝我们，装作在仔细阅读刚从架子上拿下来的杂志。突然，我顿时感到胸中升腾起一股火气，后悔刚才不该跟她穿过大厅过来。我意识到，她，居然成功地操控了这一切，无论我现在对鲍里斯说什么，她都能将其看做是种胜利与推诿。我又望了望她的背影，她双肩微弓，稍稍俯身，说明她读杂志入了迷，而我却更加愤怒了。

鲍里斯翻了一页，继续读着。过了一会儿，他又一次头也没抬地喃喃道：“给浴室贴瓷砖。我现在轻而易举就能做了。”

附近的咖啡桌上放有好几份报纸，我觉得实在没理由不跟大家一样读些什么。我挑了一份，在面前打开。一时间，我们陷入了沉默。接着，我正在浏览一篇有关德国汽车工业的文章，这时我听见鲍里斯突然说：

“对不起。”

他这话说得有些突兀，我起初还以为，是不是趁我在读报的当儿，索菲暗里督促或暗示了他什么。但是，我偷偷瞄了索菲一眼，发现她还是背朝着我们，仿佛一动未动过。接着，鲍里斯说道：

“对不起，我很自私。我再也不会这样了。我再也不会说九号了。我现在可不小了，不能再玩那个了。有这本书，就会很轻松了。它真棒。我很快就什么都会做了。我要再弄下浴室。我之前不知道。但这本书讲了，它无所不包啊。我再也不会提起九号了。”

他仿佛在念背诵排演过的台词。尽管如此，他的声音仍带有感情，我一阵冲动，想伸出双手安慰安慰他。但此时，我看到索菲的肩膀上下起伏，忽而记起了对她的反感。而且，我可以预见，如果索菲再像这样操纵一切的话，那最终谁也不会得益。

我合上报纸，站起身，瞧了瞧背后，想看看有没有霍夫曼的影子。我正张望着，鲍里斯又一次开口了，他的声音明显有一丝惊慌。

“我保证。我保证学会做所有的事情。一切都会很容易的。”

他的声音有些颤抖，但我转眼看他的时候，他仍目不转睛地盯着书页。我发现，他的脸庞有些莫名其妙地红了。此时，我看到大门那边有点动静，只见霍夫曼在接待台向我挥手。

“我得走了，”我朝索菲喊了一声，“我有非常重要的事情要处理。我另找时间再见你们。”

鲍里斯翻了一页，没有抬头。

“很快，”我对索菲说，她这会儿已转过了身。“很快，我们再好好谈谈。但现在我得走了。”

霍夫曼挤到大厅中央等我，神色焦急。

“很抱歉让您久等了，瑞德先生。”他说，“我早该预料到，您会在此类会见之前出现。我刚从会议室里出来，我可以告诉您，先生，这些人，这些普普通通的女士和先生，他们特别感激，特别感激

您同意亲自见他们。感激您，瑞德先生，深知听他们亲口诉说其经历的重要性。”

我神情严肃地看着他。“霍夫曼先生，好像有点误会了。我要求即刻给我两小时的练琴时间。两个小时，绝不受干扰。我希望您能尽快清理一下会客室。”

“啊，是的，会客室。”他笑了笑，“抱歉，瑞德先生，我不是很明白您的意思。您知道，市民互助组的委员们此刻正在楼上会议室等着呢……”

“霍夫曼先生，您好像还不知道情势紧急。鉴于一桩桩意外事件接连发生，到现在，我已经接连几天没有碰过钢琴了。我坚持要求尽快为我提供一架钢琴。”

“啊，是的，瑞德先生。当然，我完全理解。我愿竭尽所能为您效劳。但是，如果是在会客室的话，恐怕这里一时半会儿根本腾不出来。您瞧，这满堂的客人……”

“但您好像非常乐意为布罗茨基先生清理这间房呢。”

“呃，是的，没错。但是，先生，如果您那么坚持不愿用本酒店里的其他钢琴，而非要用会客室里的那架，那当然，好的，我会欣然为您安排。我现在就进去，亲自请所有的客人离开，不管他们是不是才喝了一半咖啡，或者在忙些别的什么。是的，我最终会那样做的。但在采用这样极端的做法前，我恳请您再考虑一下别的选择。您看，先生，会客室里的那架钢琴绝不是酒店中最好的。事实上，有几个低音键的音明显不准。”

“霍夫曼先生，如果在会客室不行，那么，请您务必告诉我，您能提供其他什么地方。我对会客室并非情有独钟。我要的仅仅是一架好钢琴和独处空间罢了。”

“练琴房吧。那里一定会让您更满意的。”

“好的，那就去练琴房吧。”

“太好了。”

他开始带我离开，可没走几步，他又停下来，神秘兮兮地前倾身体。

“我明白了，瑞德先生，您的意思是，您开完会后需要立刻使用练琴房？”

“霍夫曼先生，恐怕我没有必要再次强调事情的紧迫性了吧……”

“噢，是，是，瑞德先生。当然，当然。我非常理解。那么……您是要求在会见之前就练琴。好的，好的，我完全明白。没问题，让这些人等一会儿，他们会非常乐意的。嗯，不管怎样，这边请。”

先前我没有注意到电梯左侧有扇门，现在我们穿过这扇门离开了大厅，很快走进了一条过道，那显然是服务员专用的走廊。墙壁上毫无装饰，头顶的荧光灯让周围的一切显得冷寂刺眼。我们走过一排巨大的滑动门，门后传来厨房的各种嘈杂声。有扇门开着，我瞥见一间亮得扎眼的房间，屋内的木质长凳上，金属罐头堆成了柱状的小山。

“我们得在酒店这儿准备好今晚的大部分食材。”霍夫曼说，“您可以想象，音乐厅里的烹饪器具数量很有限哪。”

我们走过走廊的拐角处，经过了几间房子，想必是洗衣房。有那么一阵，我走过几扇门时，其后传来了两个女人恶言相向、警笛般尖声对骂的声音。霍夫曼仿佛无动于衷，默默不语地继续向前走着。接着，我听到他低声道：

“不，不，这些市民啊，不管怎样，他们仍然会感激不尽的。稍稍耽搁一会儿，他们会毫不介意的。”

他最终停在了一扇没有任何标记的门前。我以为他会为我打开门，可是他目光一转，连整个身体也挪开了去。

“在那里面，瑞德先生。”他咕哝了一句，飞快地在肩膀上方做了个诡异的手势。

“谢谢您，霍夫曼先生。”我推开房门。

霍夫曼依然僵硬地站在原地，目光转向别处。“我会在这里等您。”他低语道。

“没有必要等我，霍夫曼先生。我能找到回去的路。”

“我在这里等您，先生。您别担心。”

我不胜其烦，不再辩驳，匆匆走进了门廊。

我走进了一个狭长的房间，地板是灰色的石头，墙壁直到天花板都用白色瓷砖铺就。我感觉左边好像有一排水槽，但因为我急着想找到钢琴，就没有注意这些细节。然而，我的目光立刻被右手边的木质

耳室吸引住了。耳室共有三间，都被漆成了令人讨厌的青蛙绿，一间连一间。外侧两间耳室的大门关着，而中间那个看起来似乎宽敞一些，门半开着，我可以瞧见里面有架钢琴，琴盖敞着，琴键裸露。没有片刻耽搁，我试图进去，却发现困难至极。那扇门向耳室内旋转打开，因被钢琴挡着，不能全开。为了进去再把门随身关上，我不得不先挤到一个角落里，然后拽住门边，慢慢地将门旋转着擦过前胸，终于把它关上锁好，接着，在这狭小的空间里，我又费了很大力气，成功地把琴凳从钢琴下拉了出来。我一坐下来，就觉得相当舒服，指尖在色泽斑驳、油漆剥落的琴键上下弹动时，音质细腻柔和，曲调准确，完美无瑕。另外，木质耳室里的音响效果也不似想象的那般幽闭恐怖。

这一发现让我如释重负，也让我突然意识到，在过去的一个小时里，我的精神是多么紧张。我缓缓地做了几次深呼吸，准备开始这最重要的练琴环节。这时，我才突然记起，我还未决定今晚弹奏哪首曲子呢。我深知，母亲觉得山中的《全结构：选择II》的中心乐章最为感人，而父亲肯定会更喜欢穆勒里的《石棉与纤维》。其实，他甚至可能不太欣赏山中的大部分作品。我坐在那儿，凝视琴键片刻，然后毅然决定选择穆勒里。

定好曲子，我心情舒畅了许多，正要准备开始那极具爆发力的开篇乐章，这时，我感到有个硬邦邦的东西顶在肩后。我扭过头，沮丧地发现小屋的门不知怎的开了，敞着一半。

我起身，将门关上。接着，我注意到门闩机关倒挂在门框上。我又仔细检查了一下，再动用一点小聪明，成功地将门闩摆正，安回了原位。可再次锁上门后，我才发现这只是个最临时的解决方法。门闩随时可能滑落，可能就在我弹奏《石棉与纤维》的中间部分——比如，第三章的一段高潮时——门又会轻而易举地旋转开来，那么此时，要是有人正巧在耳室外转悠，那我就暴露无遗了。当然，如果一个笨手笨脚的人不知道我在里面而想进来，那这门锁就连最起码的抵挡作用都没有了。

我坐回椅子上，这些想法在脑海里一一掠过。但过了一会儿，我下定结论，若我不充分利用这次机会，恐怕以后就再也不会有了。虽然这里的条件不理想，但钢琴本身就完全足够了。我暗自下定决心，不再为门的毛病忧心忡忡，便再次振作起来，准备开始弹奏穆勒里。

我将手指悬在琴键上方，这时，我听到了一丝杂音——很小的一下“吱嘎”声，就好像是一只鞋子或是一件衣服——令我警觉的是，

那声音很近。我在椅子上猛地转了一圈。这时我才发现，门虽然锁着，整个上部却空空如也，颇似马厩的拦门。刚才我的注意力全集中在了那个坏门闩上，竟没有发现这显见的事实。现在我终于看到，这扇门仅及腰高，顶部门缘粗糙不堪。这扇门的上部是被野蛮的破坏者卸掉了，还是正在翻修，我不得而知。不管怎样，即便是坐着，只要稍稍伸长脖子，我就可以清晰地看到外面的白瓷砖和水槽。

我无法相信霍夫曼如此无礼，竟给我提供这样糟糕的条件。可以肯定的是，到现在为止还没有人进来过这里，但完全可以想见，六七个酒店工作人员随时都有可能进来使用水槽。这样的环境令我忍无可忍，我正要生气地离开，猛然看到在靠近上部合叶的门柱上钉着一颗钉子，上面挂着一块破布。

我盯着它们看了一会儿，又突然发现在另一侧的门柱上，在几乎相同高度的地方也有一颗钉子。我当即猜测起破布和钉子的用途来，又起身仔细研究，结果发现，这块破布是条浴巾。我把它展开，横着挂在两颗钉子上，竟成了一块很好的门帘，巧妙地遮住了门缺失的部分。

我感觉好多了，便又坐下，再次准备弹奏开篇小节。我正欲开始，又听到“吱嘎”一声，只好再次打住。接着又传来一声噪音，我发觉它是从左边的那间耳室里传来的。我顿时醒悟过来：旁边的耳室里刚才一直有人，而耳室之间几乎没有隔音层，不知出于什么原因，那个人保持着极度安静，所以我居然直到现在才察觉到他的存在。

盛怒之下，我又站起身，一把拽开门，门闩松了，浴巾掉在地上。我从门缝挤了出去，隔壁耳室里的男子或许是明白自己没必要再克制了，便聒噪地清了清嗓子。我急忙冲出房间，心里厌恶至极。

我发现霍夫曼在走廊上等着我，这让我有些意外，但转念我又想起，他之前确实有过这样的承诺。他背靠墙站着，可是一见我出现在他面前，他立即站直立正。

“啊，瑞德先生，”他微笑道，“请您跟我来。女士们先生们正急切地盼着见您哪。”

我冷冷地看着他。“什么女士们和先生们，霍夫曼先生？”

“哦，委员会的成员哪，瑞德先生。市民互助委员会的……”

“霍夫曼先生，听着……”我火冒三丈，但因我要解释的事情太复杂微妙，我只得打住。霍夫曼终于觉察到我心烦意乱，便在走廊中

间驻步，关切地看着我。

“霍夫曼先生，很抱歉我不能参加这次见面会了。练琴之事刻不容缓。不让我先练琴，其他什么事也干不了。”

霍夫曼一脸疑惑。“对不起，先生，”他小心翼翼地压低声音说，“可您刚才没有练吗？”

“我没有。我……我根本没法练。”

“您没法练？瑞德先生，一切都好吗？我是说，您没有感觉不舒服吧？”

“我很好。瞧，”我叹了一口气，“如果您一定要知道，那么，我刚才没法练是因为……哎，老实说吧，先生，那里的条件不能给我足够的独处空间。不，先生，让我说下去。那儿的独处空间还不够。对某些人来说可能很好，但对我……呃，我告诉您吧，霍夫曼先生，我老实地告诉您。从小我就是这样，除非有个完全彻底的独处空间，否则我没法练习。”

“是这样啊，先生？”霍夫曼严肃地点了点头，“我明白了，明白了。”

“嗯，我希望您明白了。那里面的条件——”我摇了摇头，“几乎没法称得上满意。而现在的重点是，我必须，必须，有良好的练习设施……”

“好的，好的，那当然。”他同情地点点头，“我想，先生，我有办法。别馆的练琴房能为您提供绝对的隐私。钢琴是一流的，至于独处空间，我可以向您保证，先生，那儿非常非常私密。”

“很好。听上去像是个好主意。您说的是，别馆。”

“没错，先生。我亲自带您过去，等你一见完市民互助组……”

“听着，霍夫曼先生！”我突然大吼一声，要不是我极力克制，我差点没揪住他的领子。“你给我听好了！我一点儿也不在乎这些市民！我不管他们等了多久！事实就是，如果我现在不能立马练琴，我就即刻打包走人！马上！没错，霍夫曼先生。不会有演讲，不会有表演，什么都没有！你明白吗，霍夫曼先生？明白吗？”

霍夫曼怔怔地看着我，脸上的血色渐渐褪去。“是的，是的，”他低声咕哝道，“是的，当然，瑞德先生。”

“那么好吧，我得请您——”我极力压低一点自己的声音，“请您现在立刻带我去别馆。”

“好的，瑞德先生。”他尴尬地笑了笑，“我完全理解您的意思。毕竟他们只是一些普通市民，像您这样的人没有必要亲自去……”然后，他打起精神，坚定地说：“这边走，瑞德先生，请跟我来。”

第二十四章

我们沿着长廊又走了一小段路，经过一间洗衣房，里面有好几台机器在隆隆作响。接着霍夫曼领我穿过一个狭窄的出口。我走了出去，发现面前正是会客室的双开门。

“我们从这里抄条近路走。”霍夫曼说。

一进会客室，我就更加明白之前他为什么不情愿为我清理这个房间了。里面挤满了欢笑交谈的人群，有的衣着十分华丽炫目，我的第一反应是，我们误闯进了一场私人聚会。然而，随着我们慢慢穿过人群，我发现他们集群而聚，划分明显。一帮兴高采烈的本地人占据了房间一角。另一帮好像是富有的美国年轻人——其中许多人竟齐声唱起了某所大学的校歌；而在另一块地方，一群日本人把几张桌子拼在一起，也正聊得热火朝天。奇怪的是，这几群人明显各自独立，但好像又有诸多联系。在我四周，人们在桌子间走来走去，拍着彼此的背，互相拍照，递着盛有三明治的盘子。一个身着白色制服、满脸疲惫的侍者，一手一只咖啡壶，在人群中间穿梭。我想过去找钢琴，但由于要挤过人群跟上霍夫曼十分费力，所以无暇顾及。终于，我来到了会客室的另一头，霍夫曼为我打开了另一扇门。

我穿过房门，来到一条走廊上，走廊的一端通向户外。接着，我走了出去，来到了一个阳光充足的小停车场，很快我便认出，这里正是那一晚我们经过的地方，当时霍夫曼正驱车带我赶往布罗茨基的宴会。霍夫曼把我领到一辆巨大的黑色轿车上，不多时，我们就置身于午饭时间常见的拥堵车流中，缓缓向前移动。

“这个城市的交通哪！”霍夫曼叹了口气，“瑞德先生，您要开空调吗？您肯定？天哪，看看这交通！谢天谢地，我们不必忍受太久。我们走南边的路吧。”

在下一个红绿灯处，霍夫曼拐到了另一条路上，那里的交通果真顺畅了许多。没多久，我们便疾驰着穿越了一片开阔的乡间。

“啊，是啊，这就是这座城市的魅力所在。”霍夫曼说，“不用开多远，你就会发现自己置身于优美的环境中。您看，空气已经好多了。”

我附和了几句，然后陷入沉默。我现在不想交谈。一方面，我对早先决定演奏《石棉与纤维》的想法开始心怀疑虑。我越是细想，脑海中涌现的记忆就越多，我想起我母亲曾特别表示过对这首曲子的反感。有那么一瞬间，我考虑着要不要换一首风格完全不同的曲子，譬如卡赞的《风道》，但继而想到，那首曲子要弹两小时十五分钟呢。毫无疑问，精短而激越的《石棉与纤维》是明摆着的选择。长度相当的其他曲子没有一首能展示出这般丰富的情感。而且，可以肯定的是，至少在表面上，我还是极有希望让我母亲对这首曲子欣赏有加的。然而，仍有某种东西——诚然，不过只是一抹回忆——让我对这一选择无法泰然自若。

除了前方远处的一辆卡车，路上好像只有我们。我看着路两边掠过的农田，又试着回想这模糊的记忆片段。

“没多远了，瑞德先生，”霍夫曼在我旁边说，“我相信您会更喜欢别馆里的练琴房。那里很安静，您要练上一两个钟头，那就是最理想的去处。很快，您便会沉浸在自己的音乐中。我真羡慕您呀，先生！您很快就会徜徉在您的音乐灵感中，就像您在某座富丽堂皇的艺术馆内漫步时，奇迹出现了，有人告诉您可以拿一只购物篮，挑选任何喜欢的东西带回家。请原谅，”他爽朗一笑，“我总是抱有这种幻想，自娱自乐吧。我和妻子一起在瑰妙的艺术馆中漫步，里面美丽的艺术品琳琅满目。除了我们俩，那儿空无一人，甚至连个工作人员都没有。是的，我胳膊上挽着购物篮，他们告诉我们想拿什么就拿什么。自然啰，会有某些规矩。拿的东西不能超过篮子的容量。当然也不允许我们之后出售任何东西——就算不说，我们做梦也不会想到滥用这千载难逢的机会。在那里，我和妻子——我们俩一起在这天堂般的大厅里漫步。这座艺术馆是某座更大的乡间别墅的一部分，或许可以俯瞰大片土地。露台上，壮观的景色尽收眼底。每个角落里都立着巨大的狮子雕塑。我和妻子——我们会站在那儿看着这景致，讨论该拿什么。在这幻想中，不知何故总会有一场暴雨将至。天空是石板灰色，而不知怎的，阴云密布，仿佛夏日最明媚的阳光照耀那般遮蔽着我们。爬墙虎，常春藤，它们爬满了台阶。只有我和妻子在讨论要选什么，我们的超市购物篮还空空如也。”他突然笑了笑。“请见谅，瑞德先生。我太忘形了。只是，在我的想象中，比如您，像您这般才华横溢的人，在钢琴前坐了个把钟头，周围一片宁静，肯定是这样。您肯定是这样获得灵感的。您会徜徉在崇高的音乐灵感中。你会看看这个，摇摇头，把它放回去。尽管很美，却不是您要寻找的。哈！您脑袋里的景象肯定美不胜收呀，瑞德先生！在您的手指触碰琴键的那

一刻，我多想能陪同您踏上这段旅程啊。但当然，您要去的方我可能无法跟随。我真羡慕您呀，先生！”

我咕哝了几句不知所云的话，然后我们便沉默了。车行驶了一会儿。接着，霍夫曼说：

“我妻子，早先在我们结婚之前，我想她就是那样设想我们在一起的生活的。类似那样的，瑞德先生。我们手挽着手，拎着购物篮，走进某座美丽空寂的博物馆。不过，当然啰，她可从未像我这样异想天开过。您看，我妻子来自一个才华横溢、人才辈出的家族。她母亲是位非常出色的画家。她外公是他那个年代最伟大的佛兰德语诗人之一。不知何故，他被世人冷落了，但那改变不了什么。哦，那家族里还有些其他人，非常有才华，全是才子。在那样的家庭中长大，她把美和天赋视作理所当然。如若不是，会怎样？我告诉您吧，先生，就会引发种种误会。在我们早先的关系中，就引发了一个非常大的误会。”

他又陷入了沉默，盯着前面蜿蜒的路看了一会儿。

“起初，是音乐最早把我们带到了一起。”他终于开口道，“我们坐在海伦巷的咖啡馆畅谈音乐。抑或是我一个人在讲。我想，是我在一直不停地说。记得有一次，在和她一起逛人民公园时，我向她细致描述了我对穆勒里的《通风》的感受，大概整整讲了一个钟头。当然，我们那时还年轻，有时间沉溺在这种东西里。即便那时候，她也不甚言谈，可她一直在倾听我，我能看出她深受感动。哦，是的。顺便说一下，瑞德先生，我说，我们那时还年轻，但我认为事实并非如此。我们两人都已过了适婚年龄，以当时的年纪，应该已经结婚好一段日子了。或许她感觉有些着急，谁知道呢？总之，我们谈到了结婚，我又是那么爱她，瑞德先生，从一开始我就深深爱上她了。她那时那么美。即便现在，假如您见到她，也能看出当时的她有多美。她美得特别，与众不同。您立刻就能看出她对美好事物非常敏感。我不妨向您坦承，我那时非常爱她。我无法用言语告诉您，她同意嫁给我对我意味着什么。我以为我的人生会充满欢乐，持久不衰的欢乐。但是，仅仅几天后，在答应嫁给我几天之后，她第一次来我住处看望我。那时，我在勃根霍夫酒店工作，在附近的格劳肯斯拉斯租了一间房，就在运河边上。那房间谈不上很合意，但确实不错的了。一面墙上安着很棒的书架，窗口摆着张橡木书桌。如我所说，从窗口看出去就是运河。时值冬季，一个阳光灿烂的冬日清晨，一道美丽的光线射进屋子。当然，我里里外外都打扫了，一切井然有序。她走进来，四

下看了看，环顾一周。然后，她轻轻地问道：‘你在哪儿作曲呢？’我记得非常清楚，那实实在在的的一瞬间，瑞德先生，那生动的一幕。我把它视为我人生的转折点。我没有夸大其词，先生。现在看来，在很多方面，我目前的生活是从那一刻开始的。克里斯汀站在窗边，沐浴在一月的阳光中，她一只手放在桌上，好像仅用几个手指支撑着自己。她看上去美极了。她带着一脸的惊讶问我那个问题。您看，先生，她深感迷惑：‘你在哪里作曲呢？没有钢琴呀。’我不知道如何作答。我马上就察觉哪里出了误会，一个残酷的灾难性的曲解。您能怪我吗，先生，我被蛊惑了，想挽回面子？我不该撒这个彻头彻尾的谎的。哦，不，甚至不该想挽回面子。但那一刻真是难熬啊。现在想想，还会感觉一阵战栗，即使是现在，我对您讲这些的时候。‘你在哪里作曲呢？’‘不，没有钢琴。’我开心地说，‘什么都没有。没有手稿，什么也没有。我打算两年内不再作曲了。’我对她那样说的。我反应很快，说的时候外表上没有显出任何悲伤或犹豫。我甚至还说出打算具体哪天开始继续作曲。但是眼下，不，不再作曲。我能说什么呢，先生？您期望我看着这个女人，这个我爱得死去活来的女人，她几天前刚刚答应嫁给我，您期望让我说出实话而令她饱受折磨吗？期望我对她说：‘哦，天哪，这全是场误会。我自然会放你走，你不必承担责任。好吧，我们就此分手吧……’我当然不能，先生。您也许会觉得我不诚实，但那就太苛刻了。不管怎么说，您看，那时候，我的生活，我说的不全是谎言。碰巧，我非常期望有一天能摆弄一件乐器，是的，我想作曲，一试身手。所以，这不完全是个谎言。我是撒谎了，是的，我承认。但是，除此以外我又能做什么呢？我不能放她走。于是我告诉她，我已经决定两年内不再作曲，要清清头脑，理理情感，诸如此类的。我记得，这个问题我谈了好一会儿。她在听，全都听进去了，还点了点她那美丽又聪明的头，对我告诉她的这番废话深怀同情。我还能怎样呢，先生？还有，您可知道，在那个早晨之后，她再也没提起我重新作曲的事，这些年来从未提起。顺便说一句，瑞德先生，我知道您要问什么，我会告诉您的，向您保证。那日清晨之前，在我们交往的任何时候，在我们沿着运河散步的任何时候，我们在海伦巷的咖啡馆见面的任何时候，我从未，从未有意让她觉得我会作曲。我热爱音乐，乐此不疲，那使我每日精力充沛，每日清晨醒来，我都能听到心中的乐声，是的，我暗示过这一切，而且都是真的。但我从未故意误导她，先生。哦，不，从来没有。那只是个糟糕的误会啊。她，出生于那样的家族，不可避免地，她推想……谁知道呢，先生？直至那日清晨，在我房间，我从没说过哪怕一个字暗示过此事。哦，如我所说，瑞德先生，她再也没提过这

件事了，一次都没。我们如期结了婚，买了套俯瞰腓特烈广场的小公寓，我在大使馆里谋了个好差使。我们一起开始了生活，有一段时间，我们过得相当开心。当然，我从未忘记……忘记那个误会。但已不像您想象的那般困扰我了。您看，我之前说过的，那时候，唉，呃，我有意，等时机合适，有机会时，摆弄件乐器。或许是小提琴吧。想当初，我那时是有过些计划，就像您年轻时那样，在您还不知时间是多么有限的时候，您还不知您四周已建起了一个壳的时候，一具硬硬的外壳，您根本出——不——去！”突然，他双手松开方向盘，向上推了推四周无形的穹顶。这个动作蕴含更多的是疲倦，而非愤怒，下一秒，他双手又放回到方向盘上，叹息一声，继续说道：

“不，我那时还不明白这些事情。我仍希望有一天我会变成她心中的那种人。没错，先生，我相信，因她的存在，受她的影响，我一定会成功地、切切实实地变成那种人。我们结婚的头一年，瑞德先生，如我所说，相当开心。我们买下的那套公寓够住的了。有那么段日子我以为：她已经知道那是个误会，可她并不介意。我不知道，在那些日子，各种想法涌现在我的脑中。接着，过了段时间，自然地，到了那个我提过的日子，两年后我重新作曲的日子，那天来了，又过去了。我小心翼翼观察她，但她却什么都没说。她很安静，真的，但她一直如此。她什么都没说，也没做任何出格的事。但我猜想大概正是从那个时候起，大概从两年之期的那天起，我们的生活中出现了一丝紧张感。那种不太强烈的紧张感，好像总是无所不在，不论我们多么愉快地度过了一个夜晚，仍旧可以感觉到它。我会安排小小的惊喜，到她最爱的餐厅用餐，或者给她带些花回家，或者买她最爱的香水。是的，我使出浑身解数想让她开心。但那紧张的气氛一直存在。很多时候，我设法不去在意它。我告诉自己，那全都是我臆想的。其实它存在着，并且与日俱增，但我想我只是不愿意承认。我只知道，在它消失的那天，它还是存在着。是的，它消失了，接着，我明白了那是什么。我们结婚三年后的一天下午，我下班后回家，给她带了份小礼物，一本诗集，我碰巧知道她正求之不得。虽然她没有明确说过，但我猜想到了。我走进公寓，发现她正在俯瞰广场。下午的那个时候，可以看见所有人下班回家。公寓里很吵，但相对于年轻人来说，还不算太糟糕。我把诗集递给她。‘只是件小礼物。’我对她说。她继续看着窗外。她跪在沙发上，胳膊撑在沙发靠背上，支着头眺望外面。接着，她懒洋洋地接过书，一个字都没说，继续看着下面的广场。我一直站在屋子中间，等着她说点什么，称赞我的礼物。也许她身体不舒服吧。我很担心，站在那儿等着。接着，她终于转过身，看着我。不是无情地看我，哦，不，但她看着我，那眼神非常特别，流露出的

是肯定，对她一直思考的问题的肯定。是的，就是那种，那时我才意识到：她终于看透我了。也正是那时候我明白了，明白了到底紧张什么。我一直在等，一直等着这个时刻。您知道，也许那显得很奇怪，但那是莫大的解脱啊！终于，终于，她看穿了我！哦，如释重负啊！我感觉自由了。事实上，我竟大喊了一声：‘哈！’而后笑了起来。她一定感觉很奇怪，但下一秒钟，我即刻振作起来。我马上意识到——哦，是的，自由的感觉太短暂了——我马上意识到我还得经历怎样的艰难险阻，于是顷刻间我高度戒备起来。我知道，如果我想留住她，就必须付出两倍、三倍的努力。但是您看，我那时候还以为，只要我努力，即便她发现了，假如我异常努力，我还可以赢回她。我多傻呀！您知道吗？那天过后的几年中，我一直那样以为，我竟真的相信自己一点点成功了。哦，我小心翼翼，服侍周到，尽全力去取悦她，从不自满。我发现，她的品位和喜好是随时间改变的，因此我观察每一细节，提前准备应对变化。哦，是的，我对自己说，瑞德先生，那些年，我完美地扮演了她丈夫的角色。假如她开始越来越不喜欢一个中意多年的作曲家，几乎就在她自己道出那改变之前，我会立刻察觉。等下次一提到那位作曲家，我便会迅速地说道，甚至在她还在犹豫着要表示质疑时，我会立刻说：‘当然啰，他大不如前了。我们今晚别去他的音乐会了，好不好？很无聊的。’她会报以我一脸释然的表情，不会错的。哦，是的，我处处留心，我说过，先生，我相信这样可行。我是自己在骗自己啊，我这么爱她，竟自欺欺人地相信，我在慢慢把她赢回来。只那几年，我真的自信满满。然后一切都改变了，一夜间全变了。我明白了，该来的一定会来，我多年付出的巨大努力只会全部付诸东流。我一夜之间全明白了，先生。我们应邀去费希尔先生家，他为詹·彼得文斯基组织了一场小型招待会，就在他的音乐会之后。我们那时刚开始应邀参加这样的活动，由于我对艺术的热爱与敏锐鉴赏，我开始在这儿赢得了些尊敬。呃，总之，那天我们在费希尔先生家，在他雅致的客厅里。宾客不多，最多四十个人，是个非常轻松的夜晚。我不知道您是否见过彼得文斯基，先生。他确实是个非常有趣的人，最擅长让每位宾客感觉自在。谈话进行得很顺畅，大家都很开心。接着，有那么一刻，我走到放自助餐的桌子边，准备吃些东西，突然发现彼得文斯基先生正好站在我身边。我那时候还很年轻，还没多少和名流打交道的经验，而且我承认，是的，我有点紧张。但彼得文斯基先生和蔼地一笑，问我今晚是否开心，很快就使我放松了下来。然后，他说：‘我刚刚和您妻子交谈过，她真是迷人至极啊。她说，她极中意波德莱尔。我却不得不向她坦言，我对波德莱尔的作品知之寥寥。她十分得体地训诫了我，说我这状况着

实可悲。噢，她让我惭愧之至啊。我打算立刻改正。尊夫人对那诗人的热爱太有感染力了！’我点了点头，回应道：‘没错，那当然。她一直热爱波德莱尔。’‘而且激情澎湃啊，’彼得文斯基说，‘她让我惭愧之至啊。’整个事情就是这样，我们之间就说了这些。但是您看，瑞德先生，我是这样认为的。我从来不知道她喜欢波德莱尔！甚至从未想到过！您明白我在说什么吧。她从未向我表露过这种激情！当彼得文斯基告诉我这些时，我有了些头绪。突然间，我看清了多年来我一直试图忽略的事情。我的意思是，她一直在向我隐藏她的某些部分，在保护它们，仿佛与我这粗人接触会毁掉它们似的。我说过，先生，或许我一直有所怀疑，觉得她对我隐瞒了自己的另一面。但谁能怪她呢？一个无比敏感的女子，在她那样的家庭中长大。她毫不犹豫地告诉了彼得文斯基，但在我们相处的这些年里，却不曾有一刻暗示过，她如此这般地喜爱波德莱尔。接下来的几分钟里，我徘徊在招待会的人群中，根本不知道自己说了些什么，只是心不在焉地客套着，心乱如麻。然后我看向房间的另一头，与彼得文斯基结束交谈后，肯定有半个小时了吧。我看了看房间那头，看到了她，我的妻子，坐在彼得文斯基身边的沙发上开心地大笑。没有任何调情的成分，您明白的。哦，不，我妻子在礼节上一向一丝不苟。但她却在开怀大笑着，我才意识到，我们一起沿运河边散步时，她常那样，但之后，就再也没有见到过了。也就是说，在她发现之前。沙发很长，上面还坐有两个人，还有些人为了接近彼得文斯基，坐在地板上。但是彼得文斯基只和我妻子说话，她笑得很开心。我听到的，不仅仅是这大笑声，瑞德先生，还有那说话的音量。据我所见，我站在房间的另一头，接下来是这样的。在那一刻之前，彼得文斯基一直坐在沙发边沿上，双手扣膝，就像这样！他大笑着与我妻子说话时，便开始斜身侧靠，是的，好像就只想靠回沙发上一样。他开始斜身侧靠时，我妻子从身后拿出了个靠垫，为彼得文斯基放好，那动作既敏捷又娴熟，这样，他的头触到沙发靠背时，靠垫就已经在那了。这个动作是那样敏捷，几乎不假思索，还非常优雅啊，瑞德先生。我看到时，觉得心碎成了一片一片。那动作何等自然，充满了崇敬，是一种关心的渴望，是一种简单的讨好。那小小的一个动作，透露出她一整颗心都对我一直紧闭着。那一刻我才意识到我被骗得好苦啊。我终于明白了真相，从此不再怀疑了。我的意思是，先生，我意识到她会离我而去。迟早的事啊。只是个时间问题。从那个夜晚开始，我就知道了。”

他陷入沉默，好像又一次沉浸在思绪中。这会儿，小路两侧都是农田，我能看到远远的稻田里，拖拉机缓慢地移动着。我对他说道：

“请原谅，您所说的这个特别的夜晚是多久以前了？”

“多久以前？”霍夫曼似乎对这个问题稍感不快。“噢……我想那是，呃，彼得文斯基的音乐会，是二十二年前了。”

“二十二年。”我说，“我猜，尊夫人一直以来都呆在您身边？”

霍夫曼恼怒地转向我。“您在暗示什么，先生？难道我不明白自己家的状况？难道我不了解自己的妻子？我在这儿跟您推心置腹，与您分享这些秘密，您竟然教训我，对我说这些，好像您远比我了解……”

“如果冒犯了您，我向您道歉，霍夫曼先生。我只是想指出……”

“指不出什么的，先生！您什么都不知道！事实上，我的绝望处境到目前已经有段时间了。那晚在费希尔先生家，我就看出来了，清晰如白昼，清晰得如同我面前现在看到的小路一样。好吧，它还没有发生，但那仅仅是因为……仅仅因为我做了努力。是的，先生，我付出了怎样的心血呀！也许您会笑话我：如果我明知道这局必输，我为何还要折磨自己？为何还要这样紧紧地抓住她？对您来说，问这样的问题很简单。但我深爱着她，先生，比从前更甚。对我来说，那简直难以想象，我不能眼睁睁地看着她离开，否则一切都会变得毫无意义。好吧，我知道那没用，迟早有一天，她会离开我，为了某个像彼得文斯基那样、像在她发现之前所想象的我那样的人。但您不能嘲笑一个坚持不懈的人。我已经做到极致了，先生，对我这样的人来说，我已经尽了最大的努力，选择了唯一的出路。我已经倍加努力了，组织活动，参任委员会委员，这些年来，我已经成功地在这城市的音乐艺术圈内成了一个响当当的人物。不过当然了，我一直有那么个希望。那个希望或许能解释我为何能够成功地留她这么久。但那一希望如今已经破灭，破灭好多年了。可是您看，曾几何时，有这么个希望，仅存的希望。我指的，当然是，我们的儿子，斯蒂芬。假若他有所不同，假若他能幸运地拥有至少一丁点她家族所拥有的那般横溢的才华！许多年来，我们都这么希望。虽然各自方法不同，我们两人都关注着斯蒂芬，对他寄予厚望。我们送他去上钢琴课，我们小心观察，怀抱一丝希望。我们希望能听到才华迸发的火花，可是什么也听不到，我们压力倍增啊。啊，我们听得那么辛苦，各自出于不同的原因，我们多么想听到点什么，却从来没有……”

“对不起打扰下，霍夫曼先生。您说斯蒂芬的这些事，我可以向您保证……”

“我骗了自己这么多年！我说，好呀，也许他是大器晚成，还是会有出息的，就像一粒小小的种子。噢，我自欺欺人，我敢说我妻子亦是如此。我们等呀等呀，过去的这几年，再这样装下去也没用了。斯蒂芬今年已经二十三岁了。我再也无法安慰自己，明天或者后天，他会突然绽放。我得直面现实了。他随我啊。我如今是知道了，她也发现了。当然，作为母亲，她很爱斯蒂芬。但作为救赎我的方法，就远远不够了，他成了个反作用。每次她看到他，就明白了，嫁给我是个多么大的错误……”

“霍夫曼先生，真的，我有幸听过斯蒂芬的演奏，我得告诉您……”

“化身，瑞德先生！他成了她人生中犯下的巨大错误的化身。噢，如果您见过她的家人就明白了！她年轻时肯定一直在幻想自己有一天会有个漂漂亮亮、才华过人的孩子。对美十分敏感，就和她一样。但她却犯了个错误！当然，作为母亲，她全心全意地爱着斯蒂芬，但那并不是说她就没有在他身上看到自己的错误。他太像我了，先生。我无法再否认了。现在不能再否认了，他差不多已经长大成年了……”

“霍夫曼先生，斯蒂芬是个很有天赋的年轻人……”

“您不必这么说，先生！请不要用那些乏味的客套话来侮辱你我之间坦诚的亲密关系！我不是傻子，看得出斯蒂芬是块什么料。有一段时间，他是我唯一的希望，是的，但自从那以后，自从我明白一切都是徒劳之后，坦白说来，我想至少六七年前就看出来了，我努力过了——谁能怪我呢？——几乎每天一次，我拼命地想抓住她。我对她说，瞧，至少等到我下次组织的活动吧。至少等那场活动结束后，你也许就会对我刮目相看了。而等到活动开始又结束后，我便会立刻对她说，不，等一等吧，还有一个，还有另一场很棒的活动，我正努力呢。请为那场活动等待吧。那就是我所付出的努力，先生。过去六七年里都是如此。今晚，我知道，是我最后的机会。我全压在上面了。去年我第一次告诉她今晚的计划，向她概述了所有的细节，譬如桌子的摆法，当晚的节目，甚至——请原谅我——我预见到，您或者其他相当的人物会接受邀请，成为当晚的焦点。是的，那时我第一次向她解释了这一切：我这个束缚了她这么久的庸才，多亏了我的努力，布罗茨基先生才在这个非凡之夜飞跃巅峰，赢得这座城市居民的爱心与

信心，掀起全场高潮——哈哈！我告诉您吧，先生，她看着我，仿佛在说：‘又来了。’但我看到了她眼中的闪光。那意思是说：‘或许你真的会成功。那就不同了。’是的，她的眼睛只闪烁了一下，但恰恰是眼中的这道闪光让我坚持了这么久，先生。啊，我们到了，瑞德先生。”

我们靠边停在了路边停车区，旁边是一块田野，里面生长着高高的牧草。

“瑞德先生，”霍夫曼说，“其实，我有点晚了。请别介意我的无礼，请问您能自己上去到别馆吗？”

顺着他的目光，我看到了爬满野蔷薇的陡峭山坡，一间小木屋坐落在山顶上。霍夫曼翻了翻仪表板上的小柜，找出了把钥匙。

“小木屋的门上有把挂锁，里面的设施虽不豪华，但应您要求，里面有足够的独处空间。钢琴是那种二十年代生产的贝希斯坦牌立式钢琴，堪称完美的典范。”

我又抬头看了看山坡，然后说：“是上面那座小屋？”

“两个小时以后我会回来接您，瑞德先生。或者，您要求早些开车过来？”

“两个小时就可以了。”

“好的，先生，我希望一切都令您满意。”霍夫曼冲小屋摆了摆手，好像是在礼貌地为我引路，但举手间透露着一丝不耐烦。我谢过他，下了车。

第二十五章

我拉开木栅门，循迹走上了一条小径，小径向上延伸，直达小木屋。起先，地面泥泞不堪，颇为难走，不过越往上去，地面也就越发坚实平稳。爬至半坡，我望了望身后，只见一条长长的小路在田间蜿蜒，一辆汽车（很可能是霍夫曼的）只露出车顶，渐渐消失在远方。

到达小屋后，我打开锈迹斑斑的门锁，这时我已是气喘吁吁了。这间小木屋从外面看和普通的花园小屋没什么不同，里面却毫无装饰，这个发现仍然让我吃了一惊。墙壁与地板只是些粗糙的木板条，有些地方已经隆起，我看见木板间的裂缝中有虫子在爬动，而我头顶的木椽上还悬挂着残余的蜘蛛网。一架外表有些脏兮兮的立式钢琴占据了绝大部分空间，我把琴凳拉开坐下时，发觉背部几乎贴在了墙上。

背后这堵墙上有着小屋里唯一的一扇窗户。我在凳子上转了下身，伸长脖子望去，外面的风景一览无遗，田野陡降至底，与小路相连。小屋内的地板似乎有些倾斜，等我转身再次面对钢琴时，我感到心中不安，仿佛自己要朝后倒滑下山似的。我打开琴盖，弹了几小段，发现它的音色极好，尤其是低音，雄浑饱满，悦耳动听。击弦机并不太轻，钢琴的音准调得非常到位。我突发灵感：也许，周围粗糙的木料也是经过精心挑选，为的是达到最佳的吸收和反射效果。除了松弛的踏板每次被我踩到时会有点吱吱作响外，这架钢琴让我没什么可挑剔的。

我整理了会儿思绪，然后开始弹奏《石棉与纤维》那令人激荡眩晕的开篇小节。随着第一乐章渐入沉思佳境，我的身心也越发放松，最后，我弹完了这第一乐章，其中一大部分是我在闭目凝神之中弹奏完成的。

我重新睁开眼睛，开始弹奏第二乐章。午后的阳光透过我背后的窗户倾洒而入，将我的身影清晰地投射在琴键上。即便是第二乐章要求所致，我却仍然无法转变内心的沉静。的确，我发现这首曲子的方方面面尽在我的掌控之中。我忆起自己今天竟然那么焦虑和担心，现在看来，真是愚蠢至极。此外，现在我已弹到这首曲子的中间部分，

倘若我母亲不被其感动，那显然不可思议。事实很简单，我对今晚的表演信心十足，没有丝毫理由去担心焦虑。

我开始弹奏第三乐章，进入庄严忧伤的旋律，这时我才听到，背景中传来一阵噪声。起初我以为是那只软绵绵的踏板在响，接着又以为是和地板有关。那噪声很轻，带着节奏，时有时无。有那么会儿工夫，我尝试着不去理会它，但它却不绝于耳。接着，在我弹完一半乐章、弹到弱音小节部分时，我意识到：有人正在外面不远的地方挖土。

一发现这噪音与我无关，我反倒更能对它置之不理了。我继续顾自弹奏第三乐章，享受着这份轻松自如的感觉，纠结的情感恹恹地浮上心头，然后又各自散落一方。我又一次闭上双眼，没多久，脑海中便勾勒出了我父母的面庞。他们并排坐着，一脸肃穆，专注地聆听。奇怪的是，在我的想象中，我的父母并没有坐在音乐大厅里——尽管我知道，今晚我就会见到他们——而是坐在我们在伍斯特郡的一位邻居家的客厅里，那位邻居是个寡妇，姓克拉克森，跟我母亲有段时间很要好。或许是小木屋外高高的绿草让我想起了克拉克森太太家吧。和我们家一样，她的农舍建在一小块田野中央，因为她独自寡居，她自然根本无法修理纵横蔓延的杂草。相反，她家里面却整洁异常。在她家客厅的一个角落里曾摆着一架钢琴，我不记得自己曾看见那琴盖打开过。据我所知，它很可能是走调或是坏了。这时，在我脑中浮现出了一幅特别的记忆场景：我静静地坐在房间里，茶杯放在膝盖上，聆听着父母与克拉克森太太聊音乐。或许我父亲刚刚在问克拉克森太太是否弹过这架钢琴，因为音乐显然不是她常和人谈起的话题。总之，我坐在小木屋里继续弹奏《石棉与纤维》的第三乐章，想象着自己回到了克拉克森太太的那间农舍小屋，我父亲、我母亲还有克拉克森太太一脸严肃地听我坐在角落里弹奏钢琴，夏日微风徐徐，蕾丝窗帘随时会拂过我的脸庞——这种想象与当下毫无因果逻辑可言，但从中我仍然获得了莫大的满足。

弹至第三乐章的后半段时，我又留意起那挖土的噪音来。我不确定这声音是停过一阵后再次响起，还是一直持续不断地响着，不过无论如何，这声音现在好像比之前更清晰可辨了。我突然想到，制造这噪音的不是别人，正是布罗茨基，他在埋葬他的狗。没错，他今早已经不只一次宣布过，意欲在今天晚些时候埋葬他的狗，我甚至隐约记起，自己曾与他达成协议，他举行下葬仪式时，由我来弹奏钢琴。

这时，我开始想象在我到达小屋之前这里发生过的事情。据我推测，布罗茨基已来多时，一直在山顶某处等着，离小木屋只有扔出一颗石子那么远的距离。那儿有一簇灌木，地面上还有浅坑。他静静地站在那儿，铁锹靠在一棵树上，他死去的狗用床单包裹着，躺在一边的地上，几乎完全被四周的草淹没了。就像他早上对我说的那样，他打算举行一个简单的葬礼，希望我的钢琴声可以作为唯一的伴奏。他希望我到达后再开始举行仪式，这是情有可原的。因此，他就等着，等了也许有个把小时，其间一直凝望着天空和山下的风景。

很自然，刚开始等我的时候，布罗茨基脑中会浮现出他去世的爱狗，想起它陪伴他一同度过的时光。不过随着时间分秒流逝，我的身影迟迟未现，他的思绪就转向了柯林斯小姐，还有他们即将在公墓相见的情景。不久后，布罗茨基又想起了多年前那个特别的春日清晨，他搬了两把藤椅到农舍后的田野中。那时，他们到这个城市还不过两周，尽管积蓄几乎已经耗尽，柯林斯小姐还是将大量精力投入到装修他们的新家上。在那个春天的早晨，她下来吃早饭时对他说，自己很想坐在阳光中休息一小会儿，呼吸一点新鲜空气。

回想起那日清晨，他发现自己还清楚地记得那湿漉漉的黄色草坪和头顶上的朝阳，他把藤椅并排放好。没过了一会儿，她出现了，两人一起坐了一阵，彼此交流着不经常说起的轻松话题。那天早晨，有那么一小会儿，几个月来头一次，他们感觉到，未来还是有希望的。布罗茨基正欲将这一想法脱口说出，但他马上又想到，那将会触及到他近来的失败这一敏感话题，于是改变了主意。

然后她说起了厨房的事。虽然他好几天前就保证过要将那几块硬纸板移走，却仍未兑现，所以她厨房的装修工作只能遥遥无期地搁置。他沉默片刻，然后心平气和地回答说，工棚里还有好多活正等着他呢。既然他们没法愉快地坐在一起，哪怕就几分钟，那他还是开始干活吧。他站起身，穿过屋子，走进前院的一个小棚屋。他们俩自始至终都没有叫嚣相对，整个口角也只持续了不过几秒钟。当时，他并没有把那当回事，而是马上自顾自地干起了木工活。那天早晨好几次，他抬头透过满是灰尘的工棚窗户看到，她漫无目的地在前院晃来晃去。他继续低头干活，隐隐期望她突然出现在门口，但每次她都走回了屋内。午饭的时候他进了屋——诚然，那时已经很晚了——却发现她早已吃完了午饭上楼去了。稍等片刻后，他回到工棚，又忙活了一整个下午。天色渐晚，屋里的灯亮了起来。他就那样看着夜幕降临，直到快半夜时才进了屋。

农舍楼下一片漆黑。他走进客厅，在一把木椅上坐下，望着月光照射在他们破旧的家具上，思来想去地回忆今天这奇怪的一天。他想起曾有哪一整天是像他们今天这样度过的，便决心示好，结束这一切，于是他起身走上楼梯。

他走上楼，看到卧室的灯仍亮着。他走过去，脚下的地板咯吱作响，声音很大，清晰无比，宣告着他的靠近，仿佛他在大声叫她。走到房门口，他停下脚步，低头看了看从门缝中透出的一束灯光，想要让自己镇定下来。接着，他正要去抓门把手，这时从门的另一边传来了她的咳嗽声。只是轻微的一声咳嗽，几乎可以肯定是下意识的，然而当中有些什么东西让他却步了，他慢慢地抽回了手。这轻微的咳嗽声中包含了一种提醒，让他想起了他最近设法忽视的她的一性格特点，一个在欢乐时光中他颇为欣赏的特点，但自从最近摆脱的那次仓皇的失败后，他突然意识到，他渐渐坚定了决心，试图忽略那特点。不知什么原因，不知怎地，这咳嗽声中包含了她所有的完美主义信条、高尚的情操以及她总是要求自己尽可能以最有用的方式投入全部精力的特点。突然间，他对她大为生气，对她的这声咳嗽，对这一整天都很窝火。他转身走开了，浑然不顾地板在他脚下发出多大的吱嘎声。接着，他回到月光斑驳的客厅，横躺在旧沙发上，盖了一件大衣就睡着了。

翌日清晨，他早早就醒了，为他们俩准备早餐。她也跟平常一样，按时起床，两人打了招呼，看似无甚不快。他开始讲述，对发生的一切很后悔，可她打断了他，说他们两个都太孩子气了，这着实令人吃惊。然后，他们就继续吃早餐，二人显然都松了口气，将那场口角抛诸脑后。不过，在那天剩下的时间里，还有随后的几天，他们的生活中仍旧存有一丝冷漠。随后的几个月中，他们之间沉默的时间越来越长，且越来越频繁，他便不再去苦苦思考其中归根究底的原因。现在，他觉得自己又回到了那个春日，回到了那个他们并排坐在湿漉漉的草地上、预示着美好一天的早晨。

布罗茨基正沉浸在这些回忆中时，我来到了小木屋，开始弹奏钢琴。刚开始几个小节里，布罗茨基继续眼神空洞地盯着远方。接着他叹了口气，将思绪拉回手中的活计上，拿起铁锹，用它的边缘试了试地面的硬度，但之后又停了下来，也许是觉着音乐的基调跟他的要求有点出入吧。直到我开始弹奏第三乐章那缓慢忧郁的小节时，他才开始挖掘。土地很软，他没费多大力气。然后，他把狗的尸体从高高的草丛那边拖过来，不慌不忙地将其置入墓穴中，甚至根本没想要翻开床单看最后一眼。事实上，他已经开始将泥土填回坑中，这时候，某

种东西，或许是音乐的悲伤，通过空气传递给了他，终于，他停了下来。接着他直起身子，低垂着头，静静地注视着填埋了过半的坟墓。直到我快弹到第三乐章尾声时，布罗茨基才又拿起铁锹，继续往墓里填土。

弹完第三乐章时，我听到布罗茨基仍在奋力忙活。我想了想，决定还是不弹最后的乐章——这一乐章跟这整个进程的气氛很不相符——于是便又重新弹奏起了第三乐章。我觉得，为了弥补布罗茨基的等待，这是我唯一能做的了。铲土声又持续了一会儿，在第三乐章弹到一半左右时停了下来。我想，这颇合布罗茨基的境地，再给他一点时间，让他站在墓穴边上回忆。我发现自己在音乐中较之前更加重了哀伤之情。

我再一次结束了第三乐章，又静静地在钢琴边坐了几分钟，然后起身，在狭窄的空间里伸展了下手脚。这时，午后的阳光洒满了整个小屋，我听到附近草丛里传出蟋蟀的鸣叫声。过了一会儿，我意识到自己应该出去，至少跟布罗茨基先生说几句话。

我推开门望出去，惊奇地发现太阳已经沉至山下的小路那边。我走了几步，穿过草地，重新走上了那条小径，爬完剩下那点路，到达山顶。接着，我看到在山的另一侧，地面缓缓向下延伸至一处美丽的山谷。布罗茨基就站在我下面不远处，一簇稀疏的灌木丛下就是墓穴。

我朝他走去，他没有转身，只是盯着墓穴静静地说道：“谢谢您，瑞德先生。您的琴声很美。我很感激。非常感谢您。”

我喃喃言语了几句，然后就在草地上驻步，与墓穴保持一定距离，以示尊重。布罗茨基仍然低头看着坟墓，过了一会儿，他说道：

“只是条老狗。但我想要最好的音乐。我非常感激。”

“不客气，布罗茨基先生。我很高兴能够帮您。”

他叹了口气，头一次看向了我。“您知道吗，我没法为布鲁诺哭泣。我试过了，但我哭不出来。我的脑子里装的全是未来。但有时候，却又全是过去的影子。您知道，我怀念我们过去的的生活。我们走吧，瑞德先生。我们离开布鲁诺吧。”他转过身，开始慢慢走下山谷。“我们离开吧。再见了，布鲁诺，再见。你曾是个好伙伴，虽然只是条狗。我们离开他吧，瑞德先生。来吧，跟我一起走。我们离开

他吧。您为他弹奏钢琴，真是太好了。那是最好的音乐。但我现在不能哭。她很快就会来了。不会太久的。请吧，我们走吧。”

我又向面前的山谷望了一眼，这才发现那里林林总总全是墓碑。我这才意识到，我们正走向布罗茨基安排约见柯林斯小姐的那座公墓。没错，我刚与布罗茨基并肩齐行，就听他说道：

“皮尔·古斯塔森墓地。我们约好在那里见面。没有什么特殊原因。只是她说她知道那座坟墓，仅此而已。我会在那里等。我不介意等上一会儿。”

我们刚才一直在高低不平的杂草丛中前行，这会儿却来到了一条小径上。我们沿着山坡继续下行，我发现公墓越来越清晰可辨。那是个安静、隐蔽的所在。墓碑井然有序，排列在山谷平坦之处，有些则立在山坡两边的草地上。甚至在这会儿，我发现，那里正举行着一个葬礼；我依稀可见那群丧亲之人的黑衣身影，大概共有三十人，全站在我们左边的向阳地带。

“我非常希望一切顺利，”我说道，“当然，我指的是您和柯林斯小姐的会面。”

布罗茨基摇了摇头。“今天早上我感觉还挺好。我以为只要我们好好谈谈，一切就又会好起来的。但现在，我不知道了。或许，今天早上在她公寓的那个男人，您的朋友，或许他是对的。也许她现在再也不能原谅我了。也许我之前做得太过头，她永远都不会原谅我了。”

“我想您没必要这么悲观。”我说，“不管发生了什么，全都过去了。只要您两个能够……”

“这些年来，瑞德先生，”他说道，“在内心深处，我从未真正接受他们对那个时候的我的看法。我从未相信我只是个……是个无名之辈。是的，也许在我脑中，我接受他们的说法。可是在我心里——不，我绝不相信。这么多年来，我一刻也不相信。我总能听到，总能听到音乐声。所以，我知道自己比他们所说的要好，更好。在我们来这儿后的那段短暂时间里，她也知道，我知道她知道。不过后来，唉，她却开始怀疑了。谁能责怪她呢？我不怪她离开我。不，我不怪她那个。但我的确怪她——的确怪她没有做得更好。哦，是的，她理应做得更好！我让她恨我，您能想象我为此付出了多大代价吗？我给了她自由，而她干了什么呢？什么都没有，甚至都没离开这座城市，而只是在浪费时间。在这些人身上，她整天跟这些没用的软骨头瞎

聊。如果我早知道她只能做这些话，我就不会让她离开了！把自己心爱的人推开，瑞德先生，这太令人痛苦了。您以为我想那样做吗？假如我知道她那般打算的话，您以为我还会让自己变成这副德性吗？她居然跟这帮愚钝、不幸的人闲聊！曾几何时，她志向高远。她是打算要干一番大事业呀！那才对嘛。可瞧瞧现在，她把机会全浪费啦。甚至都没离开这座城市。我时不时地对她大吼大叫，您是不是很惊讶呢？假如她就只打算做这些话，为何那个时候她不这样说？她是不是认为当一个醉酒乞丐是个笑话，一个大笑话呢？人们想，好吧，他喝醉了，他什么都不在乎了。那不是真的。有时候，一切都那么清晰，非常清晰，而且那时候……您知道那时情况有多么糟吗，瑞德先生？她从没抓住我给她的机会，甚至都没有离开这个城市。她只是跟这些愚钝的人聊啊，聊啊，聊。我对她大吼，您能怪我吗？她活该，我说的每句话，每句肮脏的谩骂，她都活该……”

“布罗茨基先生，请别这样，请别这样。这可不是为这次重要的相聚做准备的办法……”

“她以为我很享受？我只为好玩？我根本不需要这样做。瞧，您看，我想戒酒的时候，我就能戒。难道她以为我是因为好玩才这样做的吗？”

“布罗茨基先生，我并不想冒犯您。但可以肯定的是，您现在是应该把这些想法都抛到脑后了。当然，这些分歧，这些误会，都应该忘记了。您必须得尝试，好好利用生命的余光。请试着让自己平静下来。您万万不可这样去见柯林斯小姐，不然以后您肯定会后悔的。其实，布罗茨基先生，请允许我这样说，到目前为止，您一再向她强调未来，这是非常正确的。我以为，养动物这个主意非常好。我真的认为您应当继续贯彻那个想法，还有其他类似的主意。真的没必要再缅怀过去了。当然，未来大有希望。对我来说，我今晚一定会尽我所能，让您能被这座城市的人民所接受……”

“啊，是的，瑞德先生！”他的心情仿佛突然为之一变，“是的，是的，是的。今晚，是啊，今晚我要……我要一鸣惊人！”

“这种精气神才对嘛，布罗茨基先生。”

“今晚，我不会妥协，绝对不会。好吧，他们是纠缠过我，我放弃了，我们逃跑了，来到了这个地方。但在我心里，我从未完全放弃。我知道我从未有过合适的机会。而现在，终于在今晚……这一天我已经等了很久，我绝不会妥协。我会好好地指挥这支乐队，让他们

大吃一惊。瑞德先生，非常感激您，您给了我极大的鼓舞。时至今早我还在害怕，害怕今晚，害怕即将发生的事。之前我还在想，自己最好还是小心点。要小心点，悠着点——霍夫曼，还有其他所有人，他们都是这样对我说的。开始的时候得慢慢来，他们说。一点一点去赢得他们的心。但在今天早晨，我在报纸上看到了您在萨特勒纪念碑旁拍的那张照片。我对自己说，就是这样，就是这样！一路坚持，坚持到底！什么都阻挡不了！这支乐队，他们肯定会大吃一惊！还有这些人，这座城市，他们也会大吃一惊。是啊，要一路坚持到底啊！她会看到的。她会再见到我，再见到我一直以来的真实面貌！萨特勒纪念碑，就是那样！”

此时，地面平坦了起来，我们沿着公墓中央一条绿草茵茵的小路一直往前走。我突然发现身后有动静，扭头一看，只见有个送葬者从葬礼现场朝我们跑来，举止间有些迫切。等他走近，我才看清，他是个黑黑的、矮胖的男人，年约五旬。

“瑞德先生，真是太荣幸了。”我转身对着他，他上气不接下气地说道。“我是那位孀妇的兄弟。若您肯加入我们，她肯定会非常高兴的。”

我看着他所指的地方，发现我们已经距离送葬队伍很近了。没错，我甚至还能在微风中捕捉到绝望抽泣的哭声。

“这边请。”那人说道。

“可是，在这么私人的场合……”

“不，不，拜托了。我妹妹，每一个人，他们都会深感荣幸。请往这边走。”

虽然有些不情愿，我还是跟着那人走了。穿过一排排墓碑时，我们脚下的地面更加泥泞不堪。起先，在一排排弓着背的黑色身影中，我并未看到那位孀妇，等我们走近，我发现她站在前面，对着尚未掩埋的墓穴鞠躬。她看起来绝望至极，好像完全有可能跳到棺材上去。也许正是因为这样，一位白发苍苍的老先生紧紧搀扶着她的胳膊和肩膀。在她身后，大队的人群低头啜泣。看起来这些人的悲恸都发自内心，但即便如此，那位孀妇的痛苦哀号仍旧清晰可辨——那声声哭泣缓慢、疲惫，发自整个胸腔，让人闻之惊愕，仿佛是出于一个长期饱受折磨的人之口。听到这种哭声，我真想转身走开，但那矮胖男人已经示意我走到前面去。我没动弹，他就颇为大声地对我说：

“瑞德先生，拜托了。”

这话使得一些哀悼者扭头看着我们。

“瑞德先生，这边请。”

那矮胖男人拉着我的胳膊穿过人群，这时，有些人转脸对着我，我至少听到有两个人咕哝了声：“是瑞德先生。”我们出现在前排时，哭泣声小了许多。我能感觉到有很多双眼睛正盯着我的后背。我摆出一副肃穆恭敬的姿势，同时痛苦地意识到自己的穿着很是随意，只有一件浅绿色的休闲夹克衫，甚至都没有打领带。更有甚者，我的衬衫上带有橘黄相间、明快轻松的图案。趁着那矮胖男人正试着引起他妹妹的注意，我迅速扣上了夹克衫的扣子。

“伊娃，”他轻喊道，“伊娃。”

白发老先生扭头看了看我们，但孀妇却似乎丝毫没听见。她仍旧沉浸在痛苦之中。她的哭声一停一顿地在墓地上方有节奏地回荡。她哥哥回头看了看我，表情明显有些尴尬。

“那么，”我小声说，一边开始后退。“我还是稍后再过来吊唁吧。”

“不，不，瑞德先生，拜托了。就一会儿。”矮胖男人将一只手放在他妹妹的肩膀上，又说了一遍，这次明显有点不耐烦：“伊娃。伊娃。”

孀妇站直身子，止住抽泣，终于转身面对我们。

“伊娃，”她兄弟对她说，“瑞德先生来了。”

“瑞德先生？”

“女士，我对您致以最深切的同情。”我边说边肃穆地低下头。

孀妇继续盯着我。

“伊娃！”她兄弟噓声道。

孀妇吓了一跳，看了她哥哥一眼，然后又盯着我。

“瑞德先生，”她开口了，声音很是镇静，颇令人吃惊，“这真是荣幸啊。赫尔曼——”她指了指坟墓，“一直非常仰慕您。”说罢，她突然又抽泣了起来。

“伊娃！”

“女士，”我飞快地说道，“我来此只是想表达我最深切的慰问。我真的很为您难过。不过，女士，还有在场的各位，请允许我现在离开，为你们的哀悼留出……”

“瑞德先生，”孀妇说，我看到她又一次镇定了下来，“的确是三生有幸啊。我相信在场的每个人与我一样都会说，您的到来让我们受宠若惊啊。”

齐声赞同的低语声在我背后响起。

“瑞德先生，”孀妇接着说，“在我们城镇逗留期间，您感觉还好吧？我真心希望您能发现至少有一两件事情能让您着迷。”

“我过得很开心。这里的人个个都很友善。这是个怡人的地方。我真的十分难过，为……为您丈夫的过世。”

“也许您不介意来些点心。茶还是咖啡？”

“不用，不用，真的，请……”

“请留下来，至少喝点茶什么的。哦，天哪，没人带茶或者咖啡吗？什么都没带？”孀妇盯着人群，细细搜寻着。

“真的不用，请别客气。我无意这样叨扰。请继续……您的仪式。”

“但您得用些什么啊。有没有人，有没有人带瓶咖啡来，没有人吗？”

在我身后，许多个声音在彼此询问，我扭头瞥到人们在翻找着他们的包，还有口袋。矮胖男人正向后排的人群挥着手，接着有人递过一样东西。他正站在那里仔细查看，这时我看到，那是一块用玻璃纸包着的蛋糕。

“这就是我们的待客之道吗？”矮胖男人大声喊道，“这是什么东西？”

这会儿，我身后响起了一阵骚动，其中有人愤怒地发问：“奥图，那块奶酪哪儿去了？”最后，一包薄荷糖递到了那矮胖男人手上，后者对着人群怒目而视，然后转身把蛋糕和薄荷糖交给了他妹妹。

“真的，您太客气了，”我说道，“但我过来只是因为……”

“瑞德先生，” 孀妇说道，她的声音因情绪而紧张起来，“看来，我们只能这样招待您了。我不知道赫尔曼会怎么说，偏偏在今天竟然这般丢脸。但是我们只能这样了，我只有向您道歉。瞧，这是所有的，这就是我们能提供的所有，所有的待客之礼。”

孀妇开始说话时，我身后的声音都已安静了下来，但这会儿却又爆出了叽叽喳喳的争执声。我听到有人喊道：“我没有！我可没有说过这样的话！”

这时，那位先前站在墓穴边上扶着寡妇的白发先生走上前，向我鞠了一躬。

“瑞德先生，” 他说，“请原谅我们以这样寒碜的方式回敬您。您能看到，我们毫无准备啊，真是太遗憾了。可是，我向您保证，在场的每个人都对您感激不尽。请接受这份茶点，尽管寒碜了些。”

“瑞德先生，来，请坐在这儿。” 孀妇正用手绢擦拭着一块平坦的大理石坟墓，就在她丈夫墓穴的旁边。“请吧。”

此时，我意识到抽身而退是不可能了。我歉疚地走向那块为我清理干净坟头的，说道：“呃，你们全都太客气了。”

我在那块灰白的大理石上刚刚坐下，哀悼者们就纷纷上前，将我团团围住。

“请用吧。” 我听到孀妇又说了一声。她凌驾在我面前，撕剥着蛋糕外层的玻璃纸，等终于撕开后，她便把蛋糕连包装纸一起递给了我。我向她道了谢，然后就开始吃了起来。那像是块水果蛋糕，我得格外小心才不会捏碎它。另外，这块蛋糕还蛮大的，一下子几口吞不掉。我继续吃着，感觉这些哀悼者在慢慢地向我靠拢，可是当我抬头看他们时，却见他们竟都安静地站着，双眼恭敬地低垂着。一阵沉默过后，那个矮胖男人咳了一声，说道：

“今天天气真好。”

“是啊，非常好，” 我答道，嘴里塞满了蛋糕。“确实非常好。”

接着，年迈的白发先生上前一步，说道：“瑞德先生，我们城里有几个风景优美的步行区。就在离城区不远的地方，还有一些很美的乡间步行区。如果您有空，我非常愿意带您去其中走一走。”

“瑞德先生，您不想来块薄荷糖吗？”

孀妇举着打开包装的薄荷糖递到我面前。我谢过她，拿了一块放进嘴里，尽管我知道和蛋糕混在一起味道会很怪。

“至于城市本身，”白发先生说道。“如果您对中世纪建筑感兴趣，这里有许多房子倒是非常迷人的。尤其是在老城区。我很乐意带您去逛一逛。”

“真的，”我说道，“您太客气了。”

我继续吃着，希望能尽快吃完。又是一阵沉默。接着，孀妇叹了口气，说：

“天气很不错啊。”

“是啊，”我说道，“自从我到这里后，天气一直挺好。”

这话得到了周围一致赞同的低语声，有些人甚至还礼貌地笑了笑，好像我说了什么俏皮话似的。我把最后一点蛋糕塞进嘴里，掸了掸手上的碎屑。

“瞧，”我说道，“你们一直都这么客气。但现在，请你们让葬礼继续吧。”

“再来一块吧，瑞德先生。我们只有这些能招待您了。”孀妇又将那包糖推到我面前。

就在这时，我突然意识到：就在这一刻，那孀妇对我充满了最强烈的痛恨感。没错，我意识到，尽管他们都很客气，但几乎所有在场的人——包括矮胖男人——都痛恨我的出现。说来也怪，在我脑中掠过这一念头的刹那间，一个声音从我身后响起，那声音不大洪亮，却十分清晰：

“他有什么了不起的？这是属于赫尔曼的时间哪。”

一阵不安的吵嚷声骤然响起，至少有两个惊讶的声音问道：“谁说的？”那位白发先生咳了咳，接着说道：

“在运河边上走走也很美呢。”

“他有什么了不起的？把一切都打乱了。”

“闭嘴，你这个笨蛋！”有人反驳道，“你可真会挑时候给我们丢脸。”

一些人发出低沉的声音，赞同此人说的最后那句话，但就在这时，第二个声音开始喊出带有攻击性的话语。

“瑞德先生，请吧。” 孀妇又将那包薄荷糖推向我。

“不用了，真的……”

“请吧，再吃一颗。”

人群后面，有四五个人开始了一场激烈的交谈，其中一个声音喊道：“他对我们太过分了。萨特勒纪念碑，太过分了。”

随后，越来越多的人开始互相叫嚷，我感觉一场大规模的争吵即将爆发。

“瑞德先生，” 矮胖男人弯下腰来对我说，“请别理他们。他们总是丢家族的脸。总是这样。我们为他们感到惭愧。哦，是的，我们很惭愧。请不要在意他们，否则我们会更加羞愧。”

“可是，肯定……” 我想站起身，却感觉有人又把我压了下去。接着，我看到孀妇用一只手抓着我的肩膀。

“请放松，瑞德先生。” 她尖声说道，“请用完您的点心。”

此刻，愤怒的争吵声此起彼伏，人群后面有些人似乎在相互推搡。那孀妇继续按着我的肩头，一脸高傲地蔑视着人群。

“我不在乎，我可不在乎，” 有一个声音喊道，“我们最好改变现在的生活！”

更多人开始推搡，一个胖胖的年轻人挤到了前面。他的脸很圆，此时显然十分激动。他盯着我，然后开口喊道：

“你就这样来了，好啊。站在萨特勒纪念碑前面！笑成那样！然后你就一走了之。但对我们这些生活在这儿的人来说，却没那么简单啊。萨特勒纪念碑！”

圆脸年轻人看起来不像是个惯于大胆言语的人，而他的真挚情感看起来也不容置疑。我稍感吃惊，一时竟无法作答。接着，圆脸小伙子又开始了新一轮的指责，我发现内心中有些东西妥协了。我意识到，无论如何，不可辩驳的是，我确实错误地估计了昨天选择在萨特勒纪念碑前面拍照的影响。然而在当时，它看起来无疑是给这座城市的居民发出恰当暗示的最有效的方法。当然，我对这其中的利弊一直太在意了——我还记得那天早晨吃早餐时，自己如何坐在那里，小心

翼翼地衡量这些利弊——但现在我明白了，萨特勒纪念碑事件不会不了了之，事态的发展很可能超出了我原先的猜测。

在那个圆脸年轻人的鼓动下，更多的人开始朝我喊叫。其他人试图制止他们，但并没有预料中的那么迫切。接着，在这一片叫喊声中，我听到了一个新的声音，轻柔地在我肩膀后面响起。那是个男人的声音，既温文尔雅又沉着冷静，我隐约觉得这声音似曾相识。

“瑞德先生，”那声音说道，“瑞德先生。音乐大厅。您真的该走了。他们都在那里等着您呐。真的，您得留出足够的时间检查设备，还有环境……”

随后，又一阵异常嘈杂的争吵声在我面前爆发，一下子盖过了这个声音。圆脸年轻人指着我，反复不停地说着什么。

接着，突然间，人群寂然无声。起初，我以为哀悼者们终于平静了下来，等待我开口说话。然而，我发现圆脸的年轻男子——没错，还有每个人——都盯视着我头顶上方的某处。过了几秒钟，我才想到转过身，看见布罗茨基站在我头顶正上方的一座坟墓上。

或许是因为我抬头看着他的缘故——他微微前倾，在广阔天空的映衬下，我看到了他颌下的大部分——从他身上透出某种令人惊愕的威严。他站在我们上方，双手在空中张开，如同一尊巨大的雕塑赫然耸现。事实上，他俯视着面前的人群，就像在开始指挥前的几秒钟里审视乐队那样，和我想象中的样子几无二致。面对刚才在他面前失控的情绪，他身上散发出了一股奇异的威严，仿佛他可以随意令其爆发或者平息。沉默持续了一会儿。接着，一个孤零零的声音喊道：

“你想干吗？你个老酒鬼！”

也许此人是想凭这一喊引发新一轮的叫嚣。然而，无人对此做出反应，仿佛都没听见。

“你个老酒鬼！”那人又试了一次，但声音中的坚定已经荡然无存了。

接着，所有人都静静地盯着高高在上的布罗茨基。仿佛又过了几个世纪的时间之后，布罗茨基说道：

“如果你们想那样称呼我，没关系。我们就等着瞧。等着瞧，看清楚我是谁。在未来的这些天，这几周，这几个月里。我们等着瞧，看清楚我是否就只能是这样了。”

他不紧不慢地说着，冷静却又不失最初的威严。哀悼者们继续凝视着他，仿佛被下了咒似的。接着，布罗茨基温和地说：

“你们所爱的人去世了。这是个宝贵的时刻。”

我感觉他雨衣的下摆拂过我的后脑，我意识到，他朝那位孀妇伸出了手。

“这是个宝贵的时刻。来吧。抚慰你的伤口吧。它将永远留在你的生命里。来抚慰它吧，尽管很痛，血流不止。来吧。”

布罗茨基走下坟墓，手仍向孀妇伸着。她恍恍惚惚地抓住了他，然后布罗茨基将他的另一只手放在她身后，慢慢地开始将她领回敞开的墓穴边。

“来吧，”我听到他轻轻地说，“现在，来吧。”

他们慢慢地走过落叶，遗孀再次走到墓穴边，低头看着棺材，抽泣起来，布罗茨基小心地抽身退开一步。这时，其他许多人也哭了起来，我发现，一切很快就如同我到来之前时的样子了。那一刻，不管怎么说，所有人的注意力都从我身上转移开了，我决定趁此机会溜走。

我悄悄起身前行，还没走过几座坟墓，这时我听到有人走近身后。一个声音说道：

“没错，瑞德先生，现在正是您去音乐厅的大好时机。谁都无法预测还会有什么样的情况需要调整。”

我一扭头，认出那个人是佩德森，就是我第一天晚上在电影院遇到的那位年长的议员。另外我也听出，刚才我从肩膀后面听到的那个轻柔的声音就是出自他口。

“啊，佩德森先生，”他与我并肩齐走，我便说道，“我非常高兴您提醒了我去音乐厅的事情。我得承认，刚才那儿的情绪如此高亢，我已经忘记时间了。”

“没错，我亦如此，”佩德森轻轻笑道，“我也要去参加会议。不算太重要，但不管怎样，它和今晚有关。”

我们走到公墓中央一条蜿蜒的绿草小径上，在这里停下脚步。

“或许您能帮我，佩德森先生，”我环顾四周说道，“我安排了一辆车送我去音乐厅，它应该已经在等我了，但我却不知道该如何回

到那条小路上。”

“我很荣幸能为您引路，瑞德先生。请跟我来。”

我们又走了起来，距离下方我与布罗茨基一同前去的那个山坡越来越远。此时，太阳已经低垂在山谷上，墓碑投射出的影子明显已经变长了。我们继续走着，我感觉至少有两次佩德森想对我说些什么，但他随后又改变了主意。最后，我实事求是地对他说道：

“刚才那群人里，有些人好像特别激动，我是指对我在报纸上的那些照片。”

“呃，您瞧，先生，”佩德森叹了口气，“那是萨特勒纪念碑。如今，马克斯·萨特勒在人们心中的影响仍然像从前那样根深蒂固。”

“我想，您也有些意见吧。我的意思是，对我在萨特勒纪念碑前拍的那些照片。”

佩德森尴尬地笑了笑，避开我的目光。“我该怎么解释好呢？”最后他说道，“外人很难理解啊，即便是像您这样的行家。马克斯·萨特勒——为什么这个人，还有他在这座城市的历史中那一整段的故事，对这里的人们具有如此重要的意义，实在叫人搞不清楚。理论上，它不足以成为意义重大的事啊。是的，没错，那差不多已经是一个世纪前的事情了。但是您瞧，瑞德先生，您无疑已经发现，萨特勒在本地居民的想象中已经占据了一席之地。可以说，他的影响力已经变得神乎其神了。有时他令人害怕，有时他令人厌恶。而在其他时候，有关他的记忆又受人崇拜。我该怎么解释好呢？让我这样说吧。我认识的一个人，一个好朋友，现在已经上了年纪，但生活得还不算赖。他在这儿深受人们的崇敬，仍旧在市政活动中发挥着积极的作用。生活得根本不算赖。但这个人时不时地就会回首往昔生活，琢磨自己有没有可能让某些东西溜走了。他会想，如果自己，呃，少一些懦弱的话，会怎样。少一些懦弱，多一些激情？”

佩德森轻声一笑。前面的小径蜿蜒曲折，我看到了前上方公墓的黑色铁门。

“接着，他可能会——您知道的——开始回忆，”佩德森继续说道，“回忆起年轻时的某些关键时刻，在现在的生活方式固定之前。他可能会想起，比方说，某个女人试图勾引他的时刻。当然，他不会允许那种事情发生，他太循规蹈矩了。或者说是胆小。或许他那时太

年轻，谁知道呢？他想，如果当初他选择了另一条路，如果他对……对爱和激情能够更自信一些，生活又会怎样。您知道那回事的，瑞德先生。您知道老人有时做梦的方式，他们心想，假如自己在某些关键时刻选择了另一条路，生活又会怎样。呃，一个城市，一个社会，也会如此啊——不时地回望过去，回想历史，扪心自问：‘会怎样呢？我们会变成什么样子呢？假如我们当初只要……’啊，假如我们当初只要怎样，瑞德先生？让马克斯·萨特勒带我们抵达他的希望之邦？那我们现在会不会完全是另外一副模样了呢？会不会成为一座像安特卫普那样的城市？或是像斯图加特？我真的不这么认为，瑞德先生。您看，这座城市有某些东西，某些根深蒂固的东西。它们永远也不会改变，再过几代都不会改变。切实地说，萨特勒无关紧要。他只是个怀有狂野梦想的人，改变不了什么实质性的东西。我那位朋友也是如此。他已经定型了。任何经历——不管有多么重要——都无法再改变他了。瑞德先生，我们到了。您走下这些台阶，就会回到小路上去了。”

穿过公墓高高的铁门，我们站在一座精心布置的大花园里。佩德森指向我左手边篱笆的方向，我看到篱笆后面有些石头台阶蜿蜒向下。我犹豫了一会儿，接着说道：

“佩德森先生，您一直都非常客气。但请允许我向您保证，不论何时，但凡我可能做出了错误的判断，我都不会刻意逃避。不管怎样，先生，这是我这样身份的人必须要妥协的。也就是说，不管在哪一天，都会有人要求我做出许多重大的决定，而事实上，我最好的应对方法就是尽可能衡量当时现有条件的利弊，而后采取行动。是的，有时我会做出错误的估计，并因此内疚万分，这是不可避免的。如若不然又会怎样呢？长久以来，我一直这样妥协着。正如您可见，这种情况一旦发生，我唯一关注的事就是如何才能在第一时间里尽快弥补错误。所以，请您千万坦白相告。如果您觉得我在萨特勒纪念碑前摆姿势拍照是个错误，请您坦言。”

佩德森看起来很是不适。他回头注视着远方的一处陵墓，然后说道：“呃，瑞德先生，这只是我的个人看法。”

“我非常乐意聆听，先生。”

“呃，既然您这样问了，那我就说了。是的，先生。说实话，今天早上看到报纸时，我感到相当失望。在我看来，先生，正如我刚才解释过的，这座城市其实在本质上并不能包容萨特勒的极端行径。正是因为他如此的遥不可及，才吸引了某些人，成为了本地的一个神

话。若是再次把他塑造成为真正的希望……先生，说句实话，这里的人们会恐慌的。他们会退缩。他们会突然发现：自己一直抱着那些已知的事物死死不放，就连它们已经带来了深深的痛苦也毫不介意。您刚才征询我的看法，先生。我觉得，将马克斯·萨特勒引入讨论，已经严重危害到了进步的可能性。不过，当然啰，还有今天晚上。最后，一切将取决于今晚，取决于您所要说的话，还取决于布罗茨基先生的表现。正如您所指出的那样，没人比您更擅长收复失地了。”一时间，他好似在默默自忖。接着，他神情严肃地摇了摇头。“瑞德先生，您现在所能做的最好的事情，先生，就是去音乐厅。今晚，一切都必须按计划进行。”

“是的，没错，您所言极是。”我说，“我肯定，这会儿汽车正等着载我过去呢。佩德森先生，非常感谢您的肺腑之言。”

第二十六章

台阶很陡，向下穿过高高的树篱和灌木。我走下台阶，站在路旁，望着夕阳徐徐沉入对面的田间。走下阶梯时，我正好来到了一处急转弯，顺着转角走了一会儿后，发现视野一下子开阔了起来。我看到，前上方刚刚爬过的山上，在天空的映衬下，依稀可见小木屋的轮廓，而霍夫曼的车就在之前放下我的停车带里等着。

我朝汽车走去，满脑子装着刚才和佩德森的对话。我想起第一次在电影院见到他时，他的一言一行无不透出对我的敬重。如今，他虽仍很礼貌，但显然已对我失望至极。这念头让我异常苦恼。我继续走着，凝视着落日，开始越来越懊恼没有更谨慎地对待萨特勒纪念碑这件事。诚然，正如我向佩德森指出的那样，我当时做出的决定似乎是最明智的处理办法了，可我还是不免隐隐纠结，虽然我时间有限，还顶着巨大压力，但那时我理应更充分地了解个中缘由。而即便到了这最后的节骨眼上，晚会几乎都要靠我压场，这些当地问题仍有些方面不甚清楚。现在我明白了，错过今早与市民互助支持小组的见面实在是个重大失误——而这一切只为了一个无甚必要的排练而已。

我来到霍夫曼的车旁，感觉既疲惫又沮丧。他坐在驾驶座里，忙着在笔记本上写些什么。我打开客座车门，他才注意到我。

“啊，瑞德先生，”他惊呼道，一边飞快地收起笔记本。“我相信，您的排练很顺利吧？”

“哦，是的。”

“设施怎么样？”他急忙发动汽车。“您满意吗？”

“非常好，霍夫曼先生，谢谢。不过我得尽快赶到音乐厅。谁也不知道会有些什么调整。”

“当然。其实，我也正急着要赶去音乐厅。”他瞥了眼手表。“我得去核查一下餐饮设施。一小时前我在那儿的时候，可以满意地说一切都进行得非常顺利。但是，当然啰，随时都可能出纰漏。”

霍夫曼驾车回到小路上，我们在沉默中行驶了几分钟。小路虽比出城时忙一些，但仍没那么拥挤。很快，霍夫曼便驾车疾驰起来，我

凝望窗外的田野，尝试放松，却发现思绪又不自主地转回到了即将来临的夜晚。这时我听到霍夫曼说：

“瑞德先生，希望您别介意我提起此事。是一件小事。也难怪您忘记了。”他轻声笑了笑，摇了摇头。

“是什么事啊，霍夫曼先生？”

“我是说，我妻子的剪报册。也许您还记得我们初次见面时我曾提过的。我妻子，她多年来一直是您忠实的仰慕者……”

“是的，当然，我记得很清楚。她准备了一些有关我职业生涯的剪报册。对，对，我没忘。事实上，这么些繁忙的活动之后，我仍非常期待看到您太太的剪报册。”

“她为这事倾注了大量心血，先生。已经好多年了。有时，为了搞到那些刊登了有关您的重要报道的过期刊物或报纸，她可颇费了周折。真的，先生，她的赤诚之心日月可鉴。对她来说，意义真的非同一般……”

“霍夫曼先生，我很想在不久之后一睹那些剪报册。正如我说，我充满了期待。但是，假若这会儿我们能趁此机会谈谈，呃，有关今晚的一些事宜，我会不胜感激的。”

“随您，先生。不过我可以向您保证，一切都在掌控之中。您没什么好担心的。”

“是的，是的，我相信。但是，既然晚会将至，将心思稍稍放在这上面，定是明智之举。比如说，霍夫曼先生，我父母的事情。我坚信这儿的市民会很好地照顾他们，但他们俩身体都很虚弱，所以我非常感激……”

“啊，当然，我完全理解。确实，请允许我这样说，您如此关心父母，让我无比感动。我十分高兴地向您保证，我们已经做了周详安排，以确保二老全程安心舒适。我们已经派遣了一群非常迷人能干的女士，在二老逗留期间全程照顾他们。至于今晚的活动，我们为二老准备了一些特别节目，我相信这点锦上添花的小插曲也会吸引您的。您肯定知道，我们当地的西勒兄弟公司两个世纪以来以制造马车而享誉世界，曾经为许多远方的贵客，比如说法国和英国的客人，提供服务。我们城里仍保留有西勒兄弟手工制造的精致马车，我想二老一定乐意乘坐这辆无比精致的尊贵马车抵达音乐厅，况且我们已为马车配备了两匹梳洗干净的纯种骏马。瑞德先生，或许您可以想象一下那副

场景。届时，音乐厅前的那块空地灯火辉煌，各路名流欢聚一堂，互致问候，大家盛装打扮，一片喜气洋洋。当然，汽车是不允许开进那块空地的，所以人们都会徒步穿过树林。那时，大厅外人潮涌动——先生，您能想象出那画面吗？——从幽暗的树丛里传来渐近的马蹄声。男女贵宾们停止交谈，扭转头来。马蹄声渐渐清晰，越来越接近那璀璨的灯光。接着，他们会突然出现在人们的视线当中，俊美的马匹，身着燕尾服、头戴礼帽的车夫，西勒兄弟制造、闪闪发光的马车，上面坐着您最洒脱的父母！您能想象那一时刻人们翘首以待的兴奋心情吗？当然，我们不会要求您父母长时间坐马车，只是在穿过树林的中央大道时才乘坐。我向您保证，那马车绝对是奢侈品中的杰作。他们会发现那马车就如同豪华轿车，是全遮蔽式的，十分惬意舒适。自然地，会有些轻微的颠簸，但在一流的马车上，那定会变成一种积极的安抚。我希望您能想象出，先生。我必须承认，原本我是想为您本人到来时做如此安排的，但之后意识到，整个活动过程中，那时候，你会更中意安坐在后台。而且，毕竟人们不希望削弱您登台亮相的影响力。就在那时，我们得到了一个振奋人心的消息，说您的父母也将莅临这座城市。我立刻就想到了：‘啊，理想的解决方案！’是的，先生，您父母的到来会将气氛烘托得恰到好处。我们当然不会让二老随后一直站着。他们会被直接引入礼堂的嘉宾座，这就示意其他所有人，他们也可以开始入座。不久之后，晚会正式开始。它会以我儿子斯蒂芬的钢琴独奏开场。哈哈！我是有些滥用职务了。可斯蒂芬如此渴望舞台，那时候我或许愚蠢地认为……唉，现在说那个没意义了。斯蒂芬会来一段轻松的钢琴独奏，只是为了营造一下气氛。在此期间，灯光依然亮着，人们可以寻找座位，互相致意，在过道上闲聊，等等。然后，待所有人落座后，灯光会暗下来。接下来是正式的欢迎致辞。然后，管弦乐队适时出场，乐手们入座，调试乐器。再然后，短暂的停顿之后，布罗茨基先生登场。他会……他会开始表演。他表演一结束，会有——我们希望，假设——会有雷鸣般的掌声，布罗茨基先生连连鞠躬，随后是短暂的休息。确切地说，不是中场休息，我们不会允许观众离席。大约五分钟后，灯又会全部亮起，人们可以借机整理思绪。然后，当人们还在忙着交换看法时，冯·温特斯坦先生出现在舞台的帷幕前。他会做个简短的介绍。就几分钟——毕竟，哪有那么多必要做介绍呢？然后他就退回侧台。整个礼堂顿时一片漆黑。然后，就到了那一刻，先生，就是您出场的时刻。其实，我一直打算跟您讨论这事儿呢，从某种程度上说，您的配合至关重要。您看，先生，虽说我们的音乐厅十分漂亮，可它毕竟已年代久远，自然少了现代建筑里面理所当然的种种设施。像餐饮设施，我

想之前我已提到过，还远远不够，这使得我们严重依赖酒店。但是，先生，我的想法是这样的：我已经从我们的体育中心——的确是现代且装备精良——借到了电子记分板，就是通常挂在室内体育馆里的那种。体育馆只在这种时候才自觉丢人呐！原本悬挂记分板的地方会摇来晃去地悬着一根根丑陋的黑电线。呃，先生，话说回来。在一番简要的介绍之后，冯·温特斯坦先生会退到侧台。顷刻间，整个礼堂一片漆黑，这当儿帷幕拉开。接着，单射灯亮起，光线聚焦于站在舞台中央讲台上的您。此时此刻，听众们显然会报以热烈的鼓掌。随后，掌声慢慢退去，在您开口之前——当然，只要您同意——一个低沉的声音会响彻礼堂，宣读第一个问题。声音是由本市最资深的男演员霍斯特·詹宁斯发出的，他在楼上音响室，通过公共演讲系统讲话。霍斯特拥有一副漂亮、浑厚的男中音，他会缓缓地读出每个问题。他一边读——这是我的小主意，先生！——文字便会同步出现在您头顶正上方钉着的电子记分板上。您看，到这一刻为止，因为四周一片漆黑，没人会留意到记分板。这些文字就好像在您头顶凌空出现一般。哈哈！望见谅，但我认为这不仅有利于这一场合的戏剧效应，同时也增加了明晰度。我敢说，记分板上的文字可帮助在场的部分听众记住您所阐述问题的严肃性以及重要性。毕竟，在群情激动时，有些人很容易注意力不集中。呃，您看，先生，有了我这个小主意，就不太会出现那种情况。每个问题都会呈现在他们眼前，用巨大的字体——拼写出来。所以，先生，若是您同意，我们就这么安排。先是宣读第一个问题，记分板上同步拼写出来，您站在讲台旁作答，然后，等您回答完毕，霍斯特会接着念下一个问题，依此类推。我们只有一个请求，瑞德先生，那就是：每答完一个问题，您就得离开讲台，走到舞台边鞠个躬。作此请求，原因有二。首先，由于电子记分板的短时性，不可避免会存在某些技术难题。技术人员得花好几秒钟将每道题录入记分板，这样，在记分板的文字出现之前会多出十五到二十秒钟的间隙。因此，您看，先生，如果您能走到舞台边行鞠躬礼，听众必然会鼓掌，那我们就能避免一系列打断整个活动进程的尴尬停顿了。接着，在每轮掌声渐息之时，霍斯特和记分板就会宣布下一个问题，此间您就有充足的时间回到讲台。此外，先生，还有一个深层原因，若此方案一旦实施，便可自行解决。您来到舞台边鞠躬，是非常隐晦地告诉技术员，您已经回答完毕了。毕竟，我们希望不惜一切避免意外情况，比如，您还在讲的时候，记分板就开始显示下一个问题。但您看，正如我所解释的，由于时间差的问题，这种状况很容易发生。毕竟，会出现此种情况：您好像说完了，停顿了一下，其实只为了酝酿最后中肯的结语，而当您继续道出结语时，技术员却已开始……

啊！这简直是灾难！不堪设想啊！所以，先生，请允许我提议使用这个简单却有效的办法，您每每回答完毕，就来到舞台边。其实，先生，就是为了给技术员多几秒钟录入下一个问题，倘若您在快回答完毕时再给点暗示，或许比方说，微微耸一下肩，那可就帮了大忙了。当然，瑞德先生，所有这些安排有待您的认可。假如您对这其中任何一个想法不满意，请尽管直说。”

霍夫曼在滔滔不绝时，我脑海中浮现出一幅栩栩如生的晚会图景。我似乎听到了掌声和头顶上电子记分板的“嚶嚶”声。我看到自己微微耸了耸肩，然后在炫目的灯光中走向舞台边。一种奇异朦胧的虚幻感袭上心头，这时我才意识到，自己根本就没有准备好。我发现霍夫曼正等着我回答，于是懒洋洋地喃喃说：

“听上去很好啊，霍夫曼先生。整件事，您考虑得非常周全。”

“啊。这么说您同意了。所有的细节，全都……”

“是的，是的，”我说道，不耐烦地挥了挥手。“电子记分板，走到舞台边，耸肩，是的，是的，是的，是的。一切都设想周到。”

“啊。”一时间，霍夫曼好像仍旧不甚肯定，但随后便断定这是我的肺腑之言。“太好了，太好了。那一切就这么定了。”他自顾自地点点头，沉默了片刻。接着，我听到他又在自言自语，眼睛目不转睛地看着小路：“是的，是的。一切都定了。”

而后的几分钟，霍夫曼没再对我说些什么，而是继续小声地自言自语。这时，天空抹上了一层粉红色，转过这条小路，穿过农田，太阳映在我们的挡风玻璃上，车内满是绚烂的阳光，我们不得不眯起眼睛。接着，有那么一刻，我盯着窗外时，突然听到霍夫曼喘着气说道：

“一头牛！牛，牛，牛！”

虽然他说得很轻，但我仍是吃惊不小，扭转头看了看他。我发现他依然沉浸在自己的世界里，眼盯着前方，自顾自地点头。我环视了一下我们经过的田地，看到了许多田间的绵羊，但没看到牛的踪迹。我隐隐记起，之前一次与我同车旅行时，他也有过类似的举动，接着，我很快便对此失去了兴趣。

没过多久，我们就回到了城市街道上，很快，车流减速，慢得像在爬行。人行道上挤满了下班回家的人，许多商店橱窗的灯已经亮起，准备晚上的营业。这下我回到了城里，感觉自己又恢复了些许信

心。我觉得只要一到音乐厅，只要有机会登上舞台审视周围环境，许多事情便会有头绪了。

“没错，先生，”霍夫曼突然说，“一切都会井然有序。您完全不必担心。您将看到，本城会为您增光的。至于布罗茨基先生，我依然对他很有信心。”

我觉得至少应该展示一下我乐观的态度。“是的，”我开心地说道，“我敢说今晚布罗茨基先生肯定会很出彩。他刚才看上去状态非常不错。”

“哦？”霍夫曼一脸疑惑。“您最近见过他？”

“刚刚在上面的公墓那儿。正如我所说，他看上去信心十足……”

“布罗茨基先生在公墓？那，我很好奇，他在那里干什么。”

霍夫曼向我投来探究的目光。我沉吟片刻，想详述整个葬礼的情形，以及布罗茨基那令人印象深刻的介入。但最后，我竟打不起一丝精神，只是简单地说道：

“我想，他过会儿在那儿有个约会。与柯林斯小姐。”

“和柯林斯小姐？哦，天哪。究竟是怎么回事？”

我看着他，有点惊诧于他的反应。“看来他们真的有可能要和解了，”我说，“如果结果真能圆满的话，那么霍夫曼先生，这将会是您真正功德无量的又一件事啊。”

“是呀，是呀。”霍夫曼若有所思，眉头皱了起来。“布罗茨基先生这会儿在公墓？在等柯林斯小姐？稀奇。太稀奇了。”

我们继续行驶，向市中心进发，交通更加拥挤，最后我们在一条狭窄的后街某处停下了。霍夫曼越发不安起来，他再次扭头转向我。

“瑞德先生，有件事情我必须处理。就是说，我还是会按照既定行程在音乐厅与您会合，只是现在……”他看了看表，露出一副惊慌失措的模样。“您看，我必须得处理……处理件事情……”接着，他握紧方向盘，直直地盯着我。“瑞德先生，是这样的。鉴于这讨厌的单行道，还有这糟糕的交通晚高峰，开车到音乐厅还得花上不少时间。而步行……”他突然指着身后的窗外。“就是那儿了。就在您眼前。走几分钟就到了。对，先生，就是那儿的那座屋顶。”

我看到不远处一座巨大的穹形屋顶隐现在其他建筑之上。毫无疑问，它看起来好像不过三四个街区的距离那么远。

“霍夫曼先生，”我说，“如果您有急事，我很乐意自己走过去。”

“真的？您会原谅我吗？”

车流向前挪了几英尺，又停住了。

“其实，我挺喜欢步行的，”我说道，“看起来，傍晚天气还不错。而您说过的，步行只要很短一段路。”

“这单行道烦透了！我们可能会在这车里再等上一个小时！瑞德先生，您能原谅我，我万分感激哪。但您看，有件事儿，我必须……必须处理……”

“是的，是的，那当然。我就在这儿下。其实，您太客气了，在这么繁忙的时候，这样载着我到处跑。我很感激。”

“您从后面走，就会到音乐大厅。就朝着那房顶一直走就行了。让那房顶一直保持在您视线中，就不会错过。”

“请不要担心。没问题的。”我打断他的致歉，又再次谢了谢他，下车来到人行道上。

很快，我便漫步在了一条狭窄的街道上，经过一排专业书店，接着走过了几座外形美观的观光酒店。要直视着那穹顶走，根本不难，我有机会边呼吸新鲜空气边散步，还庆幸了一小会儿呢。

但是，走过两三个街区之后，一连串恼人的想法钻进我脑中，挥之不去。一者，我觉得问答环节可能会不只一次遭遇阻力。的确，假如依照公墓经历，若群情激动，那么出现尴尬场面的可能性就在所难免。再者，如若问答环节洋相百出，那么可以想见，我的父母在见证了这一场面之后，心中的惊恐与尴尬有增无减，会强烈要求被带离礼堂。换句话说，在我还未有机会碰到钢琴，他们就已经离场了；接着，人们就会猜测，他们何时还会再回来听我演奏。更糟的是，如果诸事真的非常不顺，他们两个都会病发。我仍旧坚信，只要我开始弹琴，不出几秒，我母亲，还有我父亲，都会惊讶不已，但同时，问答环节大大阻碍了我。

我发现自己太投入了，不知不觉中，几幢建筑物遮住了穹顶。起先我还不太在意，以为过不了多久，就会重新看到它。然而，走着走

着，我发现街道变得越来越窄，而我周围的房子看上去都有六七层楼高，让我几乎看不到天空，更不用说那穹形屋顶了。我决定找一条与此平行的街，但每当我拐一个弯儿，我就从一条小街绕进另一条小街，很可能是在绕圈，而音乐大厅却怎么也看不见。

就这样过了几分钟，我心里开始感到恐慌起来。我考虑要不要拦住某人问问路，但转念一想，这样做有欠考虑。这一路走来，经过的路人都扭头看我，有时甚至突然停在人行道上，尽管刚才我只顾着找路，对此没有多想，但我已经有所察觉。这会儿我明白了：今晚的盛事已然逼近，还有那么多事情悬而未决，这时让人看见我在街上徘徊，明显迷了路，踌躇不定，那怎么行呢。我使劲挺直腰板，摆出一副万事胸有成竹的模样，绕着城镇闲庭信步起来。我强迫自己放慢脚步，向每个盯着我的人愉快地微笑。

我又拐了个弯，终于看见了音乐厅，就在我眼前，较之前更近。我现在所处的街道比较宽阔，街两边全是灯火明亮的咖啡吧和商店。那座穹形屋顶也只要一两个街区那么远，就在街道的转弯处那边。

我松了口气，不仅如此，对即将到来的夜晚，我的感觉也突然间好了许多。只要我到了会场，站在舞台上，许多事情就会变得有条不紊起来——我先前的这种感觉又回来了，我几近热情地继续走了下去。

然而，我弯过转角，一幅奇怪的景象映入眼帘。前方不远处横卧着一面砖墙，堵住了我走的小路——实际上，是横穿过整条街。我首先想到的是，墙后面有条铁轨，但我留意到，街道两边建筑物的楼层要高得多，延绵不绝，伸至墙的另一侧，直至远方。这面墙引起了我的好奇，但我并没有立即看出这是个问题，心想等我走近，便会发现一扇拱门或一条地道，引着我走到另一边。无论如何，那穹形屋顶此刻已经非常近了，暗空中它被聚光灯照得雪亮。

直到我走到近前，我才意识到，这里并无道路相通。两边的人行道只到砖墙处就没路了。我十分错愕，四下看了看，然后沿着长长的砖墙走上对面的人行道，心里仍旧不太能接受这一事实：四下竟连一扇门或者连一个可以趴着钻过去的小洞都没有。我在墙跟前无助地站了一会，最后只得向一位过路人——一个刚从附近礼品店里出来的中年妇女——招了招手，问道：

“打扰了，我想去音乐厅。请问该怎么通过这面墙？”

那女人看似被我的问题吓了一跳。“哦，不行，”她说，“那堵墙您过不去。当然不能。这条街封死了。”

“这可太恼人了，”我说，“我得去音乐厅。”

“我觉得，是挺恼人的，”那妇人说，好像之前她从未想过此事。“刚才我看见先生您盯着墙看，还以为您只是游客呢。您可看到了，这堵墙是个蛮有名的旅游景点。”

她指着礼品店前面的明信片旋转架。借着门口的灯光，我果真看到了一张张高调的、以墙为主题的明信片。

“但是在这种地方砌面墙究竟是何用意？”我问道，不由地提高了嗓门。“太怪异了。这墙能干什么用呢？”

“我真的感同身受。对于外地人，特别是对一个想匆忙赶往某地的人，这的确很恼人。我想那就是所谓的荒唐。这是上世纪末某个怪人建的。当然，它很古怪，但自那时起它就很有名了。夏天，就在我们现在站的这块区域挤满了游客。有美国人，日本人，都纷纷拍照呢。”

“简直不可理喻，”我愤懑地说，“请告诉我最快到音乐大厅的路。”

“音乐厅吗，先生？嗯，如果您是打算步行的话，还有相当一段路呢。当然，我们现在是离它很近，”她抬头望了望那屋顶，“但实际上，因为这堵墙，距离近也没多大意义。”

“真是太可笑了！”我耐心全失。“我自己会找到路的。您显然不能理解，一个人可能很忙，行程紧张，根本耗不起在城里瞎转上几个小时。其实，恕我直言，这堵墙就是这座城市相当典型的代表。到处都是荒诞异常的障碍。你们干什么去了？你们就没烦过它吗？你们没有要求立即拆掉它，让大家能够各忙其事？没有，你们忍气吞声了一个世纪。你们把它制作成明信片，还以为它景致优美。就这么堵砖墙有那么美吗？简直是个怪物！我可以好好利用这堵墙打个比方，我已经决定了，就在今晚的演讲中！本来我已经构思好了演讲的大部分内容，也不想在最后关头做大幅修改。幸亏遇到您啊。晚安！”

离开那个妇人后，我赶紧循原路折回，决心不让这荒唐的耽搁毁掉我重建好的自信心。然而，我一边走一边老是在想，自己离音乐厅越来越远，先前的沮丧便卷土重来。这条街好像比我记忆中的要长得多，终于，我走到底，发现自己又在纵横交错的小巷中迷路了。

我继续徒劳地转悠了几分钟，突然觉得无法再走，于是停下脚步，刚好停在了人行道上的一家咖啡店旁。我瘫坐在最近那张桌旁的椅子上，顿时感觉连残存的一丝力气也耗尽了。我模糊地意识到，在我四周，天色越来越黑，而在我头顶后面，有盏电灯正照耀着。这盏灯也照亮了我，过路人还有其他顾客都看到了，但不知怎地，我实在不想起身，甚至都不想稍稍掩饰一下自己沮丧的神情。过了一会儿，来了一位侍者，我点了一杯咖啡，然后继续低头盯着我的脑袋投射在金属餐桌表面上的倒影。先前困扰我的关于今晚活动的所有可能性统统开始涌入脑中。尤其是，我郁闷地不停回想起，决定在萨特勒纪念碑前拍照已经无可挽回地损坏了我在这座城市里的威信，留给我一堆数量惊人的问题需要弥补；还有，在问答环节，哪怕稍有任何不甚权威的表现，就会引发一场全面的、灾难性的后果。事实上，眼下一想到这些，我的眼泪差点夺眶而出。但就在这时，我感到有只手拍了拍我的后背，有人在我头顶轻柔地重复道：“瑞德先生，瑞德先生。”

我以为是侍者端着咖啡回来了，就用手势示意他把咖啡放在我面前。但那人依然叫着我的名字，于是我抬起头，发现原来是古斯塔夫，他正关切地看着我。

“哦，您好。”我说。

“晚上好，先生。您好吗？我想应该是您，但不能确定，所以就过来看一下。您没事吧，先生？我们全都在那儿，所有的小伙子，您要不要过来加入我们呢？他们一定会欣喜若狂的。”

我环顾四周，发现自己坐在一座广场的边缘。广场中央只有一盏路灯，基本上笼罩在黑暗之中，所以人们穿梭的身形看上去不过是点点暗影罢了。古斯塔夫指了指对面，我看到了另一家咖啡馆，比我现在光顾的这家要大，从它敞开的店门和窗户里透出温暖的光线看。即便相隔这么一段距离，我也能辨别出，那里面正举行着许多欢快的活动，小提琴音乐的片段，还有欢笑声，穿过夜空徐徐传来。那时，我才意识到，我其实正坐在老城区的主广场边上，对面就是匈牙利咖啡馆。我继续四下看着，听到古斯塔夫说：

“小伙子们，先生，他们让我不停地说了一遍又一遍，关于——您知道的，先生——您说了些什么，关于您如何同意的。我已经讲了五六遍了，但他们总想从头再听一遍。从上次听过后，他们就止不住地大笑，互相击掌，但他们又来了，说：‘来吧，古斯塔夫，我们知道你还没告诉我们一切呢。究竟瑞德先生说了些什么？’‘我告诉你们了啊！’我对他们这样说，‘我告诉你们了。你们都了解得非常清

楚。’但他们就是还想再听，我敢说今晚结束以前，他们还想再从头多听几遍呢。当然，先生，每次他们问起，我都是装出这么一副腻烦的口吻，这自然是为了配合效果。说真的，当然，我跟他们一样，从头至尾都很激动，从今早开始，就开心地一遍又一遍重复我们的交谈。看到他们的脸上又露出那样的表情，真是太好了。您的承诺，先生，带来了新的希望，使他们的脸上焕发出新的朝气。就连伊戈尔都在微笑，为某些笑话而开怀大笑！我都记不得上次看到他们这样笑是什么时候了。哦，是的，先生，这样再多说几遍，我是很乐意的。无论何时我说到您说‘好吧，我很乐意代表你们说些什么’的时候，无论何时我说到那个地方，您真应该看看他们，先生！他们欢呼雀跃，互相击掌，我已经很久没看到他们像这个样子了。所以我们在那儿，先生，边喝着啤酒，边谈论着您无限的慷慨，谈论着过了这么多年，迎宾业将会从今晚之后永远改变，是的，我们正说着这些的时候，我碰巧朝外望了一眼，看到了您，先生。那店主，您看得出来吧，他开着大门。让那个地方的气氛更好些，夜幕来临时可以看到对面的广场。呃，就这样，我望着对面，心想：‘那可怜的人是谁啊，怎么独自坐在那边。’可是，您瞧，我眼神不太好，所以我没意识到原来是您。后来，卡尔悄声对我说，他一定感觉到大声说出来，不是个好主意，他对我说道：‘我可能看错了，但那不是瑞德先生本人吗？就在那边？’于是我又看了看，心想，是的，可能是的。大冷天的，他究竟为何坐在那外面，而且这么悲伤？我要去看看是不是真的是他。我说吧，先生，卡尔真是非常细心。没有其他人听到他说的话，所以除了他，没人知道我为何溜了出来，不过我敢说，这会儿有几位可能正看着这边呢，纳闷我来这儿干什么。但真的，先生，您没事吧？您看上去心事重重。”

“呃……”我叹了口气，擦了把脸。“没什么。只是所有这些旅行，还有所有这些责任。偶尔，就会……”我微微一笑，声音渐渐低了下去。

“可您为何独自一人坐在这外面呢，先生？夜晚很冷，您只穿了件外套。我对您说过，无论何时您想来匈牙利咖啡馆，我们都无限欢迎，但您却这样。您难道认为，假如过来我们这边，我们就不会那么热情地欢迎您吗？独自一人坐在这外面！真的，先生！请不要再迟疑了，过来加入我们吧。然后您可以放松一下，开心一会儿。把您所有的担心都抛在脑后吧。小伙子们会欣喜若狂的。请吧。”

广场的另一边，咖啡馆门口灯光闪烁，乐音悠悠，笑声阵阵，确实令人神往。我站起身，再次擦了擦脸。

“这就对了，先生。您很快就会感觉好起来的。”

“谢谢。谢谢。真的，谢谢。”我努力控制住了自己的情绪。
“十分感激。真的。我只希望不会太叨扰。”

古斯塔夫哈哈一笑。“您很快就会见识到是不是叨扰了，先生。”

我们动身穿过广场，这时我想到，自己最好还是先调整一下心情，然后再去见那些迎宾员，他们见到我必定会激动不已，满怀感激。现在每走一步，我就对自己更有把握，我正要古斯塔夫说些愉快的话，这时，他却突然停住脚步。自我们开始动身穿过广场，他的一只手就一直轻轻地搭在我的背上，可那一刹那，我感觉到他的手指紧紧抓住了我的外套。我转过身，在昏暗的路灯下看到：古斯塔夫静静地站着，低头看着地面，一只手抬起，抚着眉毛，好像突然想起什么重要的事。然后，还没等我开口，他便摇了摇头，局促不安地微笑了一下。

“对不起，先生。我只是……只是……”他微微一笑，又开始走了起来。

“没事吧？”

“哦，是的，是的。您知道，先生，您一踏入那扇门，小伙子们就一定会激动不已的。”

他走在我前面，隔着一两步远，坚定地带着我走过了广场上剩下的路程。

第二十七章

直到我步入咖啡馆，感受到房间另一头的原木火焰散发出的阵阵温暖，我才意识到夜晚已有多么寒冷。咖啡馆的内部已重新布置过了，和我上次进来时截然不同。大部分桌子被推到后面顶墙放置，留出了房间中主要的中间部分，一张巨大的圆桌摆在那里。圆桌边大概围坐着十二个男人，喝着啤酒，一片喧闹。这些人看上去比古斯塔夫稍显年轻，但大多数也已过中年。离他们不远处，在靠近咖啡柜台的那边，两个吉卜赛人穿戴的瘦削男人正拉着小提琴，在演奏轻快的华尔兹。还有些其他客人，但他们好像都对自己坐在不显眼的位置上感到很满意，通常是房间的昏暗隐蔽处，仿佛自知是在出席他人的活动。

我和古斯塔夫走了进去，迎宾员们全部扭头看着我们，不确定是否该相信自己的眼睛。古斯塔夫说道：“是的，小伙子们，真的是他。他亲自过来问候我们了。”

咖啡馆里突然静默下来，所有人——迎宾员，服务员，乐师，顾客——都盯视着我。紧接着整个屋子爆发出一阵热烈的掌声。不知何故，这欢迎会着实让我吃了一惊，几乎让我再次落泪。我微笑道：“谢谢，谢谢！”然而热情的掌声依旧，几乎淹没了我的声音。迎宾员们统统起身，吉卜赛乐师也将小提琴夹在臂膀下，一同鼓起掌来。古斯塔夫引导我走向中央的圆桌，我顺势坐定，掌声终于平息下来。乐师们继续演奏，我发现自己周围都是些激动的面庞。坐在我身旁的古斯塔夫开口道：

“伙计们，承蒙瑞德先生的好意……”

话还未完，一个红鼻子的矮胖迎宾员就探过身子，举起了啤酒杯。“瑞德先生，您可救了我们，”他宣布道，“如今，我们的故事将会大不相同了。我的孙辈们，他们会用不同的方式记住我。对我们来说，这可是个非凡的夜晚。”

我仍旧微笑着回望他，这时我感觉有只手抓住了我的臂膀，发现一张瘦削、看似紧张的脸正盯视着我。

“求您了，瑞德先生，”那男人说。“求您了，您真的要那样做，对吗？大伙儿都在您的面前，您心中装着别的非常重要的事情，

到那时，您不会改变主意的吧，还有……”

“别这么无礼，”另一个人说道。那个一脸紧张的人消失了，仿佛有人把他拉了回去。接着，我听到一个声音在背后说：“他当然不会改变主意。你以为你在跟谁说话呢？”

我转过身，想安慰安慰那紧张的男子，然而，另一个人摇着我的手说道：

“谢谢，瑞德先生，谢谢。”

“你们太客气了，”我微笑着对众人说，“不过我……我真的得提醒你们……”

就在这时，有人推挤了我一下，差点撞到身旁的人。我听到有个人在道歉，另一个人在说：“别那样推！”接着，又有一个声音贴近我说：“我想刚才在外面的就是您吧，先生。我就是向古斯塔夫指出您的那个人。您能这样来看我们，真是太好了。今晚将会是我们永远铭记的夜晚，是城里每个迎宾员的转折点。”

“瞧，我得提醒你们，”我大声说道，“我会竭尽全力，但我得提醒你们，我可能不如以前那样有影响力了。你们看……”

但我的话被一帮迎宾员高呼的一声“万岁”给淹没了。喊第二声“万岁”时，全部迎宾员都加入其中，接着，音乐声暂停，咖啡馆的每个人都加入其中，欢呼这最后一声震耳欲聋的“万岁”。末了，更多的掌声骤然响起。

“谢谢，谢谢！”我深受感动，连连说道。随着掌声逐渐消退，隔着桌子，那红鼻子迎宾员说道：

“我们非常欢迎您的到来，先生。您是一个很有名望的人，但我想让您知道，我们在座的这些人，每每看到一个人的时候，就能识别他是不是好人。没错，我们干这行这么久了，对体面修为有很好的嗅觉。您是个真正的体面人，既正派又和善，我们都看得出这一点。您也许觉得我们在这儿欢迎您，只是因为您要帮助我们。当然，我们都很感激您，但我了解这群人，他们是真心喜爱您。如果您不是一位正派的人，他们是不会这样的。假如您太骄傲，或者有一点儿不真诚，他们就会把您给嗅出来的。哦，是的。当然，他们仍会感激您，仍会好好对待您，但绝不会如此喜欢您。我想说的是，先生，即使您不出名，即使您是个偶然闯到这儿的陌生人，但只要我们觉得您很好，只要您解释说您远道而来愿寻求陪伴，我们都会欢迎您的。一旦我们看

出您是一位多么好的先生，我们迎接您的方式不会与刚刚有所不同。哦，是的，我们并不像人们所说的那样几近冷漠无情。从现在开始，您可以把我们每个人都当作朋友。”

“没错，”在我右边的一个人也开口道，“我们现在是您的朋友了。您在这儿遇到任何困难，您都可以指望我们。”

“非常感谢，”我说道，“谢谢。我今晚会为你们尽力的。但真的，我得提醒你们……”

“先生，求您了。”古斯塔夫在我耳边轻声说道，“请不要担心了。一切都会非常顺利。何不尽兴片刻？”

“但我只是想提醒你的这些好友……”

“真的，先生，”古斯塔夫继续低声说，“您的敬业精神令人敬仰。但您实在过于担心了。请放松，尽兴一下吧。就一会儿。看看我们。我们所有在场的人都有担忧之事。我自己同样，即将要再去音乐厅，回去做那些工作。但既然我们这样在这儿相遇了，我们亦很开心能置身朋友当中，忘却一切。我们放松心情，开心一下吧。”说到这里，古斯塔夫提高音量，盖过了嘈杂的人声，说道：“来吧，我们给瑞德先生看看，我们究竟如何尽情开心的！给他看看我们如何做的！”

这一声号召赢得了一致的欢呼与又一轮的掌声，随后掌声慢慢变成了节奏强劲的拍手声，在桌子四周回荡。吉卜赛乐师和着拍手声加快了演奏，一旁的顾客们也跟着拍起手来。我还注意到，房间里其他各处的人们也中断了交谈，转过身，仿佛是要观看一个期待已久的景观。有个人，我猜应该是店主——一个黑黑的、瘦高男人——从后面房间出来，斜倚在门框边，显然很着急，不愿错过接下来的事。

此时，迎宾员们继续拍手，较之前更欢快了，有些人双脚跺地，加强节奏。接着，两个侍者出现了，他们急匆匆地收拾好了餐桌。啤酒杯、咖啡杯、糖罐子和烟灰缸转瞬间就统统不见了。接着，一个迎宾员，一个有浓密络腮胡的男人，爬到桌子上。浓密的胡子下，脸庞红彤彤的，是因尴尬还是因喝酒，我不得而知。一上餐桌，他好像就没了顾忌，咧嘴笑着，开始跳舞。

那是一种古怪的静态舞蹈，双脚几乎不离桌面，着力表现人体雕塑般的姿态，而非敏捷移动的美感。络腮胡男子张开双臂，摆出一副希腊神祇般的姿势，仿佛背负着一个隐形的重物。随着拍手声与鼓励

的叫喊声的继续，他会微微改变臀部的角度，或者慢慢转动身体。我揣测了一会儿，不知这个表演是否应该是喜剧，尽管桌边尽是欢愉的大笑声，但很快我就明白了，表演中没有讽刺的意味。我看着络腮胡迎宾员，有人推了推我，说道：

“就是这个，瑞德先生。我们的舞蹈。迎宾员之舞。我相信，您听说过的吧。”

“是的，”我说，“啊，是的。那么，这个就是迎宾员之舞了。”

“就是它。不过好戏还没上演呢。”对方咧着嘴笑了笑，又推了推我。

我看到一个巨大的棕色纸盒从一个迎宾员手里递到了另一个的手里。那箱子大致上跟手提箱一般大小，不过从空中抛掷的情况来看，很轻，而且是空的。盒子绕着桌子传递了几分钟后，在某个舞蹈间隙被抛向了络腮胡迎宾员，整个过程似是经过精心排练。就在络腮胡迎宾员转换姿势，又抬起胳膊的那一刻，纸盒从空中抛来，巧妙地落在了他手中。

看络腮胡迎宾员的反应，像是接到了一块重重的石头——这引得观众发出一阵担忧的呼叫——有那么一小会儿，他看上去要被这重量压得双腿发软了。然而，他相当坚定地站直了身体，最后，他站得非常直，盒子抱在胸前。这一举迎来了齐声欢呼，络腮胡迎宾员慢慢地将盒子举过头顶，终于将其高举在空中，双臂完全伸直。尽管这在现实中当然毫不费力，然而，表演中自有一股庄严与激情，我也加入到喝彩中去了，就好像他真的举起了千斤重物似的。接着，络腮胡迎宾员继续用某种技巧，创造出了那重物越来越轻的幻觉。不久，他就一只手举着盒子，边举着边做着小小的单脚着地旋转，有时将盒子抛过肩头，在背后接住。重物越轻，他的同伴们越是开心。接着，随着络腮胡迎宾员的表演越来越轻浮，他的同伴们就开始四下互相看看，咧嘴笑着，互相推搡着，直到另一个人，一个留着稀疏小胡子的瘦小男人开始爬上桌子。

桌子随之晃动，一侧翘起。大伙们对之报以哄笑，仿佛这全是表演的一部分。然后他们稳住桌子，瘦小的迎宾员费力地爬了上去。络腮胡迎宾员起先并没有发现他的同伴，继续卖弄着驾驭纸盒的技艺，而瘦小的迎宾员则闷闷不乐地站在他身后，仿佛等待着与一位他梦寐以求的舞伴跳舞。最后，络腮胡迎宾员看到了瘦小男子，把盒子扔给

了他。瘦小迎宾员一接到盒子，就踉跄后退，仿佛会一举翻下餐桌似的。但他立即反应过来，接着，经过一番努力后，他站直了身体，背着盒子。他做这动作的时候，络腮胡迎宾员在众人的搀扶下爬下餐桌，并一起微笑拍手起来。

瘦小的迎宾员做着与他同伴之前相似的表演，只是添加了更多喜剧夸张的动作。他卖弄着滑稽的面部表情，并用出色的闹剧手法表演了跌倒，博得了阵阵哄笑声。我注视着他，那富有节奏的拍击声、吉卜赛乐师的提琴声、欢笑声，吃惊、嘲笑的笑声，充斥着耳朵，也填满了我所有的感官。接着，第三位迎宾员爬上了餐桌，换下了瘦小的男人，我顿时感到阵阵人间暖意渐渐包围了我。我忽然觉得，古斯塔夫的那番感想颇为深邃明智。如此忧心忡忡又有何意义呢？偶尔完全放松一下，开心一下，是非常重要的。

我闭上双眼，任凭欢乐的气氛萦绕身边，只依稀知道自己仍在拍手，不时在地板上跺着脚。我的脑海中浮现出一幅我父母的图景，他们俩坐在四轮马车上，驶向音乐厅前面的空地。我看到许多当地人——身着黑夹克的男人，穿着大衣、围披肩、戴着珠宝的女人——突然中止交谈，扭头看着传来阵阵蹄声的漆黑树林。接着，闪闪发光的马车突然出现在簇簇光线中，俊美的马匹小跑着停了下来，在夜色中喘着气。我母亲，还有我父亲，望向窗外，脸上首先浮现出一丝兴奋的期待，还有一丝防备和矜持，不愿完全妥协于心中的希冀，期望今夜是个光彩夺目的胜利之夜。接着，穿着制服的车夫急忙扶他们下车，权贵们站成一排迎接他们，他们会刻意摆出平静的笑容。我记得童年时期，为数不多的几次，父母邀请客人到家里来用午餐或者晚餐时，他们就会这样。

我睁开双眼，看到此时桌上有两位迎宾员在表演滑稽的老段子。谁举着盒子就会踉跄一下，似要跌倒，眼看就要从桌边摔下，就在最后一刻，不情愿地将盒子交给另一个人。接着，我发现了鲍里斯——这期间他很可能一直就坐在咖啡馆的什么地方——径直来到桌前，乐滋滋地抬头望着这两位迎宾员。他适时地拍手大笑，看那样子，这小男孩显然十分熟悉这些老段子。他坐在两位身形巨大、皮肤黝黑的迎宾员中间，那两人看起来很像，应该是兄弟。我看见他与其中一人说了句话，那人大笑，戏谑似地捏了捏小男孩的脸颊。

这些表演吸引了广场上越来越多的人，咖啡馆里越来越拥挤了。我还留意到，我刚进来的时候，只有两位吉卜赛乐师，但这会儿又有三个人加入其中，小提琴声从四面八方传来，较之前更大，更有活

力。接着，后面一人——在我印象中，他并非其中的一位迎宾员——大喊道：“古斯塔夫！”没多久，我们餐桌前面的人就跟着叫喊起来：“古斯塔夫！古斯塔夫！”迎宾员们喊叫着，渐渐变成了吟颂。很快，就连那个看起来很紧张的迎宾员，他早先跟我说过话，这会儿正轮到他站在桌子上——并不是特别纯熟，却生气勃勃地表演着——也加入了进来。他正从后背由上至下，而后又在臀部周围摆弄着盒子，竟也吟颂起来：“古斯塔夫！古斯塔夫！”

古斯塔夫已不在我身旁了，我四下寻找，发现他已走到鲍里斯那儿，此时正对着小男孩的耳边说着什么。其中一个皮肤黝黑的兄弟一只手搭着古斯塔夫的肩膀，我看得出，他是在乞求这位年迈的迎宾员上台表演。古斯塔夫微笑着，谦逊地摇了摇头，结果却引来了更加高亢的吟颂声。这会儿，屋子里几乎所有人都在吟颂着他的名字，甚至站在外面广场上的人好像也加入了呐喊的行列。最后，古斯塔夫只好无奈地朝鲍里斯笑了笑，站起身来。

作为最年迈的一位迎宾员，古斯塔夫比其他人年长好几岁，要爬上桌子似乎难度更大，但很多人伸出援手帮他。他一上桌子，便直起身子，冲观众微笑。那位模样紧张的迎宾员把盒子递给他，然后迅速下来。

打一开始，古斯塔夫的表演便与先前几位舞者的截然不同。一接到箱子，他并没有佯装它重得不得了，而是毫不费力地将它甩上肩头，还耸了耸肩膀。围观的人群哄堂大笑，我听到人们叫喊着：“好样的，老古斯塔夫！”“相信他！”他继续表演，满不在乎地耍着那盒子。这时，一个侍者穿过人群来到前面，把一只真正的手提箱抛上桌子。从他抛掷的动作和手提箱发出的巨大声响判断，它显然不是空的。箱子恰好落在古斯塔夫的双脚旁，人群中传来了低语声。接着，吟颂声重新响起，比之前更为急促。“古斯塔夫！古斯塔夫！古斯塔夫！”我看到鲍里斯小心翼翼，紧盯着外公的每一个动作，脸上写满了无比的自豪，他欢快地拍着手，也吟颂了起来。古斯塔夫看了看鲍里斯，再次冲他微笑了一下，接着伸手抓住了箱子的手柄。

古斯塔夫弓着腰，将手提箱提到臀部，我知道他并没有假装箱子很重。然后他慢慢直起身，纸箱仍放在肩上，他手中提着手提箱，双眼紧闭，脸上愁云满布。但似乎没人发现有什么不妥——很可能这是古斯塔夫在表演重头戏之前的特色动作——吟颂声、拍手声不绝于耳，震耳欲聋，盖过了尖锐的小提琴声。果然，下一刻，古斯塔夫又一次睁开眼，笑咪咪地面对众人。接着，他又将箱子举高了些，夹在

胳膊下，保持着这个姿势——箱子在胳膊下，盒子在另一只肩膀上——开始舞动起来，双脚做出缓慢拖曳的动作。人群欢呼着，呐喊着，我听到门口有人在问：“他现在干吗呢？我看不到。他在干吗呢？”

接着，古斯塔夫又将箱子举高了些，继续舞着，一只肩膀扛着箱子，另一只扛着盒子。箱子比盒子重得多，所以他的身体被迫使劲地侧向一边，但除此之外，他气定神闲，脚步轻盈。鲍里斯开心不已，欢喜地向他外公喊着什么，我听不清，而古斯塔夫歪扭了一下头以作应答，继而又激起了啧啧声和大笑声。

古斯塔夫继续舞着，这时我留意到身后出了些动静。有好一阵子，有人一直用手肘有节奏地猛戳我的后背，令我非常厌烦，但我本以为这只是因人群在互相推搡，以争取有利视角。但转过身，我却瞥见两位侍者正跪在地板上打包手提箱，尽管人群从各方推搡着。他们已经往箱子里塞了许多像是厨房用的木质砧板。一位侍者将砧板摆放得更密集些，而另一个则不耐烦地向咖啡馆后面示意着，愤怒地指着箱子里剩下的空间。接着，我看到更多的砧板传了过来，每次两三块，在人群中手手相传，递了过来。侍者们动作很快，将砧板塞了进去，直到那箱子看起来像要爆开似的。但更多的砧板——有时只是板子的破损残片——仍旧源源不断地递了过来，训练有素、心灵手巧的侍者们想办法将这些全部塞了进去。如果不是人群的推挤终于磨光了他们的耐性，或许他们还能继续往箱子里塞得更多。他们按下盖子，拉紧皮带，挤过我，将重重的箱子推到了餐桌上。

鲍里斯望了一眼新呈上的箱子，然后抬起头，犹豫地看了看古斯塔夫。他外公正在表演一种慢速曳步舞，与斗牛舞没什么不同。而此时，他正集中力气托着纸箱和手提箱，好像并没有留意到摆在他面前的新挑战。鲍里斯小心地看了看他外公，等待他看见第二只箱子的那一刻。显然，其他人也像他一样等待着，但他的外公装作熟视无睹，继续跳着舞。毫无疑问，这肯定是他一个伎俩！几乎可以肯定，他外公正在吊观众胃口，但鲍里斯知道，外公随时会抬起那只重箱子，或许是在扔掉那空盒子之后。可是，不知何故，古斯塔夫继续无视那箱子，于是人们又喊又指。最后，古斯塔夫终于看见了，他的脸——夹在纸箱和第一只手提箱之间，仿佛成了夹心三明治——显得有些沮丧。鲍里斯周围的每个人都大笑，拍得更起劲了。古斯塔夫继续缓慢旋转，但双眼紧盯着第二只手提箱，表情仍很为难。鲍里斯立刻意识到，外公的担忧不全是装出来的。然而，周围所有的人都在大笑，这些人先前已经看过外公表演这老段子许多次了。于是，下一

刻，鲍里斯也一同大笑着催促外公继续。男孩的叫声引起了古斯塔夫的关注，祖孙二人再次相视一笑。

接着，古斯塔夫从肩上卸下空箱子，趁着箱子慢慢滑下手臂，他近乎优雅而又轻蔑地将盒子轻轻丢进了人群中。人群再次爆发出一阵欢笑与喝彩声，空箱子越过观众的头顶向后传递，消失在房间深处。接着，古斯塔夫又低头看了看第二只箱子，把肩上的旧箱子托高些。他再次摆出了一副肃穆的表情，这一次毫无疑问全然是揶揄。鲍里斯和人群一起大笑。接着，古斯塔夫开始弯曲双膝。他行动非常缓慢，不知是因为身体欠佳还是出于表演技巧，直至他蹲伏在地，一侧肩膀仍扛着第一只箱子，伸出那只空手去抓脚边手提箱的手柄。稳稳地，慢慢地，随着持续的掌声，他站立起来，提起了那只更重的箱子。

此刻，古斯塔夫做出倾尽全力的样子——跟之前络腮胡迎宾员刚接到纸板箱时的样子差不多。鲍里斯看着他，心中充满了骄傲，眼睛不时地从外公身上移开，扭头看着周围推挤的人群满含钦佩的神情。甚至连吉卜赛乐师也闻风而动，使劲地弓起手肘暗暗地推搡，以便更清楚地一睹这副场景。一位小提琴手借此手段成功地挤到了前面，身子斜倚在桌子上方，腰部紧紧地压着桌沿，拉起了小提琴。

接着，古斯塔夫再次开始拖曳起双脚，他并没有试图将那只更重些的箱子举至肩膀，两只箱子的重量，特别是那只装满砧板的箱子，无疑让他的身体难以承载。这就意味着，他的脚步只是表面上看起来弹跳轻盈而已，尽管如此，他的表演还是引人入胜，逗得观众狂喜。

“好样的，老古斯塔夫！”叫喊声再度响起。鲍里斯还不习惯这样称呼外公，尽管如此，他却也用尽全力叫喊着：“好样的，老古斯塔夫！好样的，老古斯塔夫！”

老迎宾员好像再次从众声中听到了鲍里斯的声音，虽然他这会儿不能扭头回应小男孩——他佯装专注于手提箱而无暇顾及——但他的动作有了一股新的活力。他又开始慢慢旋转，后背上的最后一丝萎靡也不见了。一时间，古斯塔夫看起来棒极了，就像矗立在桌面上的一尊雕像，一只箱子扛在肩膀上，另一只提在臀部，和着掌声还有音乐声缓缓旋转。接着，他好像一个踉跄，似要跌倒，但几乎立刻便恢复过来，人群惊叹一声“呼！”，这小小的变化引来了更多的笑声。

接着，鲍里斯听到身后有骚动声，他看见那两个侍者回来了，又在地上忙活着，他们把周围的人推到后面，以留出空间让他们工作。两人双膝跪地，抓着一只像高尔夫球袋似的巨大袋子，举止显得既暴躁又不耐烦——或许是讨厌周围人群推推挤挤，还总用膝盖顶撞着他

们。鲍里斯回头望了望他外公，接着，他又看看身后，只见其中一人撑开袋口，仿佛要悄悄放进什么庞然大物。果然，另一人从人群里现身，倒退着，粗鲁地将人群推至一边，在地板上还拖着个什么物体。鲍里斯向后朝人群中间挤了挤，看见那是个机器部件。很难看清——人们的腿挡着——但那物体好像是个破旧引擎，像是从摩托车，或是从快艇上取下的。两位侍者正辛苦地将其装进高尔夫球袋，扯了扯已经紧绷的袋子，拉上了拉链。鲍里斯又抬起头，看到外公仍牢牢地控制着那两只箱子，没有意欲停下的迹象，况且，人们也还不想让他停下。这时，周围的人群动了动，两个侍者把高尔夫球袋抬上了桌面。

前面的人说来了个袋子，这消息一传到后面，一时间哗声四起。古斯塔夫并没有立刻注意到高尔夫袋，因为此时他正紧闭双眼，凝神聚气。但很快人群的催促声令他环顾四周。他盯着那高尔夫球袋，刹那间一脸严肃。然后他微笑，继续缓慢地旋转。像先前一样，他稍费了些力，将较轻的手提箱卸下肩膀，滑至手臂。在它缓缓落下之时，古斯塔夫使出浑身力气高举手臂，将手提箱举向人群。那箱子比空盒子要重上许多，弹至桌面，然后才跌落进前排迎宾员的臂中，整个轨迹算不上是条规整的弧线。手提箱如先前的纸箱一样消失在人群中，于是所有的目光又集中在了古斯塔夫身上，人们又开始吟颂他的名字，老人仔细地 looking 脚边的高尔夫球袋。此刻他只扛着一件物品，暂感轻松——虽然那箱子里装满了木砧板——仿佛他注入了新的活力。他拉长了脸，犹疑地冲高尔夫球袋摇摇头，却只激起了人群更多的催促声。“来吧，古斯塔夫，给他们看看！”鲍里斯听到身旁的迎宾员喊道。

接着，古斯塔夫将那只重箱子举至肩膀，而刚刚那肩膀上还扛着那只轻些的箱子。他故意闭着眼，单膝跪地，慢慢直起身子。他的腿颤抖了一两下，很快又站稳了，手提箱稳稳地扛在他肩上，他朝那只高尔夫球袋伸出了手。鲍里斯心头蓦地闪过一丝恐慌，大喊道：“不要！”但他的声音却被淹没在了四周人群的呼喊声、感叹声、吟颂声与欢笑声中。

“来吧，古斯塔夫！”挨着他的那个迎宾员大喊道，“让他们见识见识你的本事！给他们看看！”

“不要！不要！外公！外公！”

“好样的，老古斯塔夫！”许多声音喊道，“来吧，给他们瞧瞧你的本事！”

“外公！外公！”鲍里斯这会儿伸长了胳膊够着那桌子，以引起他外公的注意，但古斯塔夫仍神情严峻，聚精会神地紧紧盯着桌上高尔夫球袋的挎带。接着，年迈的迎宾员再度降低重心，沉重的行李箱压得他全身颤抖。他的手离脚下的挎带尚有段距离，就早早地伸了出去。屋内又是一阵紧张，人们感到，或许古斯塔夫是在挑战能力极限，试图完成一项壮举。尽管如此，气氛仍旧欢快，人们开心地吟颂着他的名字。

鲍里斯求助似的搜寻着周围大人们的脸庞，然后用力拉了拉身旁迎宾员的手臂。

“不！不！够了。外公表演得够多了！”

络腮胡迎宾员——就是他——惊讶地看着小男孩，然后大笑道：“别担心，别担心。你外公棒极了。他能做到的，而且还可以提更多。还可以提更多呢。他很棒的。”

“不！外公已经表演得够多了！”

但没有人听，甚至连络腮胡迎宾员也没有，他只是安慰似的用一只胳膊搂着鲍里斯的肩膀。古斯塔夫此时几乎蹲伏在桌面上，指尖离高尔夫球袋的挎带只有一两英寸了。然后他一把抓住了它，身体仍蹲伏着，将挎带绕在空闲的肩膀上。他把挎带拉得近了些，然后再一次起身站立。鲍里斯大声呼喊，敲击桌面，终于使古斯塔夫注意到了他。他外公已开始站直双腿，但他停下了动作，两人对望了片刻。

“不。”鲍里斯摇头道，“不。外公已经表演得够多了。”

在这一片嘈杂声中，也许古斯塔夫听不见外孙的话语，但他好像非常明白外孙的心情。他即刻点了点头，脸上闪过一丝安慰的笑容，但接着又闭上了眼，凝神聚气。

“不！不！外公！”鲍里斯继续拉扯着络腮胡迎宾员的胳膊。

“怎么了？”络腮胡迎宾员问道，眼中已笑出了泪水。不等鲍里斯回答，他就又把注意力转回到古斯塔夫身上，比先前更大声地参与到呐喊声中去了。

古斯塔夫继续缓慢直起身。一次，两次，他的身体颤抖着，像要垮掉一样。他的脸颊异常的红，牙关紧咬，面部扭曲，颈肌突出。即使在这喧闹的嘈杂声中，都仿佛能听见年迈迎宾员的沉重呼吸声。然而，除了鲍里斯，无人察觉到这些。

“别担心，你外公棒极了！”络腮胡迎宾员说道，“这没什么！他每周都做！”

古斯塔夫继续一点一点地直起身，一侧肩膀挂着高尔夫球袋，另一侧扛着手提箱。终于，他完全站直了身子，脸颤抖着，却洋溢着胜利的表情。这会儿，有节奏的拍击声首次变成了疯狂的掌声和欢呼声。小提琴也应景拉出了缓慢、恢弘的终篇旋律。古斯塔夫缓慢旋转，双眼微睁，面部因痛苦与尊严交织而扭曲着。

“够了！外公！停下！停下！”

古斯塔夫继续旋转，执意将他的成就展现给屋里的每一双眼睛。突然，他体内像是有什么东西“啪”地折断了，人猛地停下，转瞬间便轻轻摇晃起来，如在微风中摇摆一般。但随后他又立即恢复过来，继续旋转。待回到最初直立的姿势后，他才开始将箱子从肩膀上卸下。他任其重重地砸落在桌面上——他判断，它太重了，扔到人群中难免会伤到某个观众——接着用脚把它推下桌沿，落入等待着的同事们张开的双臂中。

人群欢呼着，鼓着掌，其中几位唱起了歌——某种摇摆民谣，唱的是匈牙利歌词——吉卜赛乐师和着曲调演奏着。越来越多的人加入，很快整屋人都唱了起来。桌上，古斯塔夫卸下高尔夫球袋。它跌落在桌上，发出金属般的重响。这一次他没有试图将它推进人群，而是高举了一会儿双臂——即便这一动作似乎让他颇为费力——然后急忙从桌上下去了。无数双手伸出来帮他，鲍里斯看着外公安全着地。

这会儿，整屋人似乎都在专心歌唱。那歌谣带有甜蜜的怀旧情愫，人们边唱着边相继挽起手，一同摇摆。其中一名吉卜赛小提琴手爬上桌子，很快，第二位也紧随其后，他们两位一边演奏，一边随音乐适时地摇摆身体，引领着整屋子的人。

鲍里斯挤过人群，到了外公站着喘气的地方。奇怪的是，数秒之前古斯塔夫还是全场的焦点，这会儿却好像没一个人在意他们祖孙二人深情拥抱的场面。他们闭着眼，丝毫不向对方掩饰自己的如释重负。许久之后，古斯塔夫微笑地低头看着鲍里斯，而小男孩则继续紧紧地抱着外公，没有睁开双眼。

“鲍里斯，”古斯塔夫说道，“鲍里斯。有一件事你必须答应我。”

小男孩默不作声，只继续抱着外公。

“鲍里斯，听着。你是个乖孩子。如果有一天，我发生了什么事，如果我有什不测，你就得接我的班。你看，你母亲还有父亲，都是好人，但有时他们也有过不去的坎。他们不像你我似的这样坚强。所以你看，假如我发生了什么事，我不在了，你得坚强。你得照顾好你母亲还有父亲，照管好这个家，别让它散了啊。”古斯塔夫从怀中放开鲍里斯，冲他微微一笑。“你得保证，好吗，鲍里斯？”

鲍里斯若有所思，然后郑重地点了点头。不一会儿，他们好像就淹没在人群中，看不见身影了。有人拉了拉我的袖子，请我挽起手，一同唱歌。

我环顾四周，看到另一个小提琴手加入到了桌上的两个人中，整屋子的人都围绕他们旋转，齐声歌唱。更多的人拥进了咖啡馆，房子里严严实实填满了人。我还看见，大门依旧朝广场敞开着，门外的夜色中，人们也在摇摇摆摆，放声歌唱。我牵起一个壮硕男人的手——我猜想，应该是个迎宾员吧——另一手牵起一个大概从广场上进来的胖女人，发现自己也跟着他们在屋里转了起来。我不熟悉他们唱的这首歌，但很快我意识到，在场的大多数人也都不熟悉歌词，或者说根本不懂匈牙利语，只是唱着心中所想的隐约接近的歌词。比如，我左右的两位男女就在唱着完全不同的内容，但两人却丝毫没有尴尬或者犹豫。的确，只要留心一会儿，就会发现他们都在唱着毫无意义的词汇，但这好像并无大碍。没过多久，我亦沉湎于此情此景之中，开始唱了起来，胡编了些自以为听起来大概像匈牙利语的歌词。不知怎地，这一方法出奇的奏效——我渐渐发现这样的词语喷涌而出，让我倍感轻松愉悦——不久我也相当深情地唱了起来。

最后，大约二十分钟后，我看见人群终于慢慢退去。我还看到侍者们在清扫，把餐桌还至原位。然而，仍有相当多的人手挽着手绕着屋子转动，纵情歌唱着。吉卜赛乐师也依旧站在桌上，毫无停止演奏的迹象。我在同伴的推挤下正绕着屋子转圈，这时感觉有人拍了拍我，我转头一看，发现那人应该是我猜测的咖啡店店主，他正冲我微笑。他身材瘦高，由于我继续随众人摇摆，他便亲切地赶上我转圈的步伐，跳起了呈蹲伏姿势的曳步舞，令人想起格劳乔·马克斯<sup>(1)</sup>。

“瑞德先生，您看上去很累了。”他几乎是在我的耳边吼道，但在这一片歌声中我只能依稀听到他的话语。“您将要度过一个漫长而重要的夜晚。干吗不先休息会儿呢？我们有间舒适的后房，我太太已经在沙发上铺好了毛毯和垫子，还打开了煤气取暖器。您会感觉非常舒适的。您可以蜷身睡上一觉。房间很小，没错，就在正后面，但非

常安静。没人会进来打扰您的，我们都保证。您会感觉非常舒服。真的，先生，您该在晚会真正开始前好好利用这点时间。请吧，这边请。您看起来太累了。”

我尽情唱过了歌，尽情玩乐了一番，也觉得足够了，而且，我意识到，自己确实已经非常疲倦，他的建议颇有道理。实际上，小憩一下的想法越来越吸引我。店主继续满面笑容地在我身后摇曳舞蹈，我开始深深地感激起他来，不只是为了这善意的邀请，也为他提供了这美妙咖啡馆的诸多设施，还感谢他对迎宾员们的慷慨豪爽——他们显然是不大被社会看重的一群人。我松开双臂，微笑着对左右两边的人道别。店主用一只手揽着我，引我向咖啡馆后面的一扇小门走去。

他领着我穿过一间暗室——我隐约看到一堆堆货物顶墙擦起——然后打开另一扇门，温暖的微光从门后透出。

“就是这儿，”店主说道，领我进去。“请在这沙发上休息一会儿吧。门关着，假如太暖和的话，就把取暖器调小一点，调至低档。别担心，这儿十分安全。”

那点炉火是屋里唯一的光亮。橘黄色的微光中，我辨出了沙发，上面有些霉味，却十分舒适，接着，不知不觉中，门关上了，只剩我独自一人。我爬上沙发（它的长度正好够我屈膝躺下），拉过店主妻子为我留下的毛毯，盖在了身上。

---

\(1\) 美国电影演员（1890——1977）。

第四部

第二十八章

我惊醒过来，以为自己睡过头很久了。其实，我首先想到的是：现在已是清晨，我错过了整个晚间活动。然而，从沙发上坐起后，我看到了煤气炉的火光，除此之外，四周仍然一片漆黑。

我走到窗边，拉开窗帘，低头看到了一座狭窄的后院，被几只巨大的垃圾箱挤满。某处射出的昏暗光线照亮了小院，但我还是留意到，天空已经不全是黑蒙蒙的了，这让我的心里又打起鼓来，生怕黎明将至。我放开窗帘，走出房间，深深后悔自己接受了店主的邀请。

我走进那个小通间，先前我看到那儿有堆货物顶墙摞着。这会儿，房间中伸手不见五指，我摸索着走向门口，两次撞到了硬物。我终于走了出来，进入了咖啡馆大堂，不久前我们还都在这儿兴高采烈地跳舞唱歌呢。面向广场的窗户透进一些光亮，我隐约看到桌子上乱七八糟地摞着几把椅子。我从旁走过，来到正门前，透过玻璃嵌板向外望了望。

外面没有任何动静。孤独的街灯立在空空的广场中央，原来是它的光线照进了咖啡馆，而我再次留意到，天空中好像透出了清晨的第一缕曙光。我继续盯着外面的广场，心中越来越恼怒。我这才明白，我竟让这么多事情干扰了自己，耽误了我的首要任务，以至我人生中最关键一晚的大部分时光竟在昏睡中度过。接着，愤怒中又夹杂了一丝失望，一瞬间，我的眼泪差点掉了下来。

然而，在我继续注视夜空的同时，我开始怀疑那破晓的征兆也许只是自己的臆想罢了。的确，我细看一番，发现夜色依然深沉，此时有个念头一闪而过：现在时间相对尚早，开始惊恐实无必要。我知道，我仍有可能及时赶到音乐厅，亲眼见证大部分晚会活动，当然，我还要履行自己的责任。

在此期间，我一直心不在焉地摆弄着大门。这会儿我留意到了门闩的构造，于是将其一一松开，漫步走进广场。

从闷热的咖啡馆走出来，我感觉外面的空气格外清新，要不是赶时间，我准想在广场上逛一会儿，清理思绪。但现在，我则开始用心地寻找起音乐厅来。

随后的几分钟里，我匆匆穿过空荡的街道，走过一家家关门的咖啡馆和商店，却一直看不见那穹顶。街灯下的老城区风韵别致，但我走得越久，越难压抑那份恐慌感。我最好能遇到几辆夜间出租车，或者至少碰上几个从夜店里逛出来的人，这样我可以向他们问问路。但是，除了几只迷途的猫咪，我好像是方圆几里内唯一醒着的动物了。

我穿过一条电车轨道，发现自己走在运河堤岸上。水面上吹来一阵冷风，但四周仍无音乐厅的迹象，我不禁怀疑自己已经彻底迷路了。我决定拐进面前的一条狭窄的小路——这条小路转了个弯，弧度优美——这时，我听到了脚步声，看到一个女人从那小路上走来。

刚才我一直以为街上杳无人迹，并深以为然，所以一看到她，我就呆呆地愣在了原地。此外，我发觉她穿着飘逸的晚礼服，不由更加吃惊。那女人也停下脚步，可她好像认出了我，便又微笑着向我走来。她走进灯光中，我发现她已年近五十，或许甚至五十出头，稍显丰满，但仪态优雅。

“晚上好，夫人，”我说，“不知您可否帮我个忙。我在找音乐厅。我走的方向对吗？”

那女人径直朝我走来。她又莞尔一笑，说：

“不对，实际上，是在那边。我刚从那儿过来。我出来走走，想透透气，不过若您不反对，我很乐意带您去那儿，瑞德先生。”

“我非常乐意，夫人。但我不愿打断您散步。”

“不，不。我已经走了快一个小时了。也该回去了。我真应该等等，与其他客人一起到。但我却愚蠢地想，整个准备过程，我应该在那儿，怕万一需要我呢。当然，没什么需要我做的。瑞德先生，请原谅我，我还没有介绍我自己。我是克莉丝汀·霍夫曼。我丈夫是您下榻的酒店的经理。”

“很高兴遇见您，霍夫曼太太。您丈夫跟我讲了不少您的事情。”

这话一出口，我就后悔不迭。我飞快地瞄了霍夫曼太太一眼，但在这昏暗的光线下，根本看不清楚她的脸。

“这边走，瑞德先生，”她说，“路不远。”

我们走了起来，她晚礼服的袖子随风扬起。我咳嗽了一声，说：

“听您刚才所说，霍夫曼太太，音乐厅的活动还没有正式开始吧？客人也还没到齐？”

“客人？哦，不。我想，应该至少还要一个小时才会有宾客到呢。”

“啊。太好了。”

我们继续轻松地沿河岸走着，两人都时不时转头凝视水面上路灯的倒影。

“我想知道，瑞德先生，”她终于开口了，“我丈夫，他说起我的时候，是否给您留下了我……我十分冷漠的印象？我想问，他是否让您对我留有那样的印象呢？”

我轻笑一声。“他留给我最强烈的印象是，霍夫曼太太，他对您是极为倾心啊。”

她继续默默地走着。我不肯定她是否认可我的回答。过了一会，她说：

“我年轻时，瑞德先生，绝没人会想这样形容我。一个冷漠的人。没错，我还是个孩子的时候，一点都不冷漠。即便是现在，我也想不到自己是那样的人。”

我低声含糊地客套了几句。然后，我们离开运河，转入一条窄窄的小街，我终于看到音乐厅的圆顶在夜空中熠熠闪光。

“甚至这些日子以来，”霍夫曼太太在我身旁说道，“大清早，我就会做这些梦，总是在大清早，梦见的总是和……和温情有关。梦里没有太多内容，通常不过就是些零星琐事。比如说，可能我正看着儿子，斯蒂芬，看着他在花园里玩耍。我们曾经很亲近，瑞德先生，他小的时候。我会安慰他，同他一起分享他的小小喜悦。他小时候，我们是那么亲密。或者有时候，我会梦到我的丈夫。前天凌晨，我梦到我和丈夫在打开一个行李箱。我们在一间卧室里，在床上拆包。我们可能是在国外一间酒店的房间里，或者也许是在家里。总之，我们在一起打开这个行李箱……而在我们之间，这种感觉很舒服。我们就在那里，一起完成这件事。他拿出一样东西，然后我拿出一样东西。我们一直在聊天，也没聊什么特别的话题，只是一边拆包一边交谈。就是在前天凌晨，我做了这个梦。后来，我醒了，躺在那儿透过窗帘看着黎明降临，感到非常幸福。我对自己说，也许，很快，真的就会这样。甚至，就在那天早些时候，我们会制造一个像那样的机会。当

然，我们没必要去拆行李，而是其他什么的，那天晚些时候，我们会做些什么，总会有个机会。我这样告诉自己，又进入了梦乡，感到非常幸福。接着，清晨来临。很奇怪，瑞德先生，每次都是这样啊。白天一开始，这另外一种东西，这一股力量，就来掌控一切。不管我做什么，我们之间的一切都会背道而驰，不是我想要的。我奋起抗争过，瑞德先生，但这些年来我却节节失利。这就是……就是我身上发生的事。我丈夫非常努力地尝试，尝试帮助我，但没用。一到下楼用早餐时，所有梦中的一切，就消失得无影无踪了。”

人行道上停着几辆汽车，我们只得前后行走。霍夫曼太太走在我前头几步。等我又赶了上去，与她并肩齐行时，我问：

“您认为那是什么？您所提及的这一力量？”

她突然大笑起来。“我不想让它听起来这么不可思议，瑞德先生。当然，答案很明显，一切都跟克里斯托弗先生有关。我这么认为已经有段时间了。当然，我知道，我丈夫也这么认为。就像这城里的许多人一样，我本以为那只是件简单的事，有个更重要的人代替我们曾热爱的克里斯托弗先生就行了。但后来，我不那么肯定了。我开始认为可能与自己有关。我得了某种病。甚至可能是衰老的一个过程吧。毕竟，我们年事已高，身体的某些部分开始衰亡。也许我们的情感也在慢慢衰亡。您认为那可能吗，瑞德先生？我真的很害怕，很害怕那是真的。我们送别了克里斯托弗先生，结果却发现——至少我就是个特别的例子——什么都没有改变。”

我们又转过一个街角。人行道非常狭窄，我们走到了街中央。我感觉她在等我的回答，于是开口道：

“霍夫曼太太，在我看来，不管年老的过程如何，人都要振作精神，不管它是什么，都不要向它妥协，这是至关重要的。”

霍夫曼太太抬头凝望夜空，继续走了一会儿，没有回答。然后她说：“唉，这些清晨的美梦。白天一开始，却什么也没有发生，我就常常痛苦地自责。但是，我向您保证，我还没有放弃，瑞德先生。如果我放弃了，那我的生命就所剩无几了。我绝不放弃梦想。我仍期待终有一天能有个温馨亲近的家庭。不止那样，瑞德先生。您瞧，可能我这样想很傻，或许您能告诉我这是不是很傻。可是您瞧，我希望总有一天能抓住它，不管这东西是什么。我希望能抓住它，然后就无所谓了，这么多年来它一直困扰着我，现在它们都将被清除干净。我有预感，要抓住它只是一瞬间的事，即便是短短的一瞬间，只要恰逢其

时。就像绳结突然断开，厚重的幕帘掉落在地，然后展现出一个全新的世界，一个充满阳光与温暖的世界。瑞德先生，您看起来很怀疑啊。我相信这些，是不是完全疯了？尽管过了这么多年，只要短短一瞬间，只要恰逢其时，就会改变所有一切？”

她以为我在怀疑她，其实根本不是那么回事。其实，在她说话的时候，我想起斯蒂芬即将表演的独奏，无疑，兴奋之情在我脸上明显地暴露无遗。我说道，口气或许有些急切：

“霍夫曼太太，我不想给您任何不切实际的希望。但是，可能——只是可能——您很快就会体验到某些东西，可能正好是这一刻，正好是您所说的那种。您可能不久就会遇到这一刻。某件事情会令您惊喜，迫使您重新评估一切，去更好更轻松地看待一切。这些阴郁的岁月确实会一扫而光。我不想给您不切实际的希望。我只是说有可能。这一刻甚至可能就在今晚来临，所以您得振作精神。”

我打住话头，猛然意识到我是在铤而走险。毕竟，斯蒂芬弹奏的片段虽然让我印象深刻，但我心里十分清楚，那年轻人在压力下很有可能会演砸。事实上，我越想就越后悔刚才暗示了那番话。不过，我看了一眼霍夫曼太太，却发现我的话既没让她吃惊，也没使她激动。过了一会儿，她说：

“您刚才看见我在街上闲逛，瑞德先生，我并非只是装作出来透透气的。我是在努力做好准备，因为您提及的这种可能性，自然而然我也想到了。像今晚这样的夜晚。是啊，许多事情都有可能发生。所以我在做准备。我不介意向您坦言，这会儿我有点害怕。因为，您瞧，在过去偶尔也有一些这样的时刻，但我却没牢牢地抓住它们，我力量不够啊。但谁又知道以后还会有多少这样的机会呢？所以，您瞧，瑞德先生，我在努力做好准备。啊，我们到了。这是大楼后面。从这个入口进去会到厨房。我带您去演员专用入口。但我还不能进去。我想我需要多透会儿气。”

“很高兴遇见您，霍夫曼太太。这个时候麻烦您带我过来，我十分感谢。我真心希望您今晚一切顺利。”

“谢谢，瑞德先生，您也是，我相信您还要考虑很多事情吧。很高兴遇见您。”

第二十九章

霍夫曼太太的身影消失在夜色中，我转身匆忙走向她所指的那扇大门，边走边对自己说，应该从刚刚经历的错误恐慌中充分吸取教训，重要的是，绝不能再让任何事干扰我完成眼前的重大任务。实际上，就在这一刻，在最终进入音乐厅之时，我突然间觉得一切都好像很简单了。事实就是，终于，过了这么多年，我将再次在父母面前演奏。那么，当务之急便是要保证我力尽所能，让自己的表演精彩绝伦，令人叹为观止。相比之下，问答环节倒成了次要之事。前几天所有的挫折和混乱都无关紧要了，只要我在今晚能很快达到这唯一的核目标就行。

头顶上，唯一的一盏夜灯照射着宽大的白门，幽暗地发着光。我倾力打开门，踉跄了一下，走进了大楼。

尽管霍夫曼太太很自信，说这就是演员入口，但我的第一感觉是，自己竟是穿过了厨房走进来的。我走进了一条宽敞空荡的走廊，天花板上的荧光灯管发出刺眼的光亮。到处都是叫喊声、金属物体沉重的哐当碰撞声和水汽的嘶嘶声。我的正前方有辆送餐车，旁边站着两个穿制服的人，他们正在激烈争吵着，其中一人拿着一张展开来的长纸单，几乎垂到了脚面，他正不停地用手指戳着它。我想打断他们，问问在哪儿能找到霍夫曼——我现在关心的就是，在观众到来之前检查一下大厅和钢琴——但他们好像顾自争吵着，我便决定继续前行。

走廊缓缓地拐了个弯。我遇到了一大群人，可他们好像都很忙，还有些忧虑。他们大多穿着白色制服，一副惊慌失措的表情，要么急匆匆地走着，要么扛着重重的袋子，或是推着手推车。我不想拦住他们中的任何一个，于是继续沿着走廊走，以为最终会走到大厅的其他地方，找到化妆室——如果顺利的话，霍夫曼或是其他某个人就会带我去看设备。但接着，我意识到有人在背后叫着我的名字，我转过身，发现身后跑来一个男人。他看上去很眼熟，我认出他就是那个络腮胡迎宾员，今晚早些时候在咖啡馆时，就是他带头舞蹈的。

“瑞德先生，”他气喘吁吁地说道，“谢天谢地，我终于找到您了。这是我第三次跑遍整幢大楼了。他还顽强地挺着呢，我们都急着

要送他去医院，而他还是坚持要在和您说过话之后再动身。求您了，这边走，先生。他还顽强地挺着呢，可是，但愿老天保佑哪。”

“谁在顽强地挺着？发生什么事了？”

“这边请，先生。如果您不介意，我们最好快点走。很抱歉，瑞德先生，我没有解释清楚原委。是古斯塔夫。他病了。我本人不在现场，但两个小伙子，威尔汉姆和休伯特，他们跟他一起干活，在帮忙准备，是他们传出来的话。当然，我一听说就赶紧过来了，还有其他所有的小伙子都是。显然，古斯塔夫一直干得好好的，但接着，他去了洗手间，很久都没有出来。这一点儿也不像古斯塔夫，于是威尔汉姆进去瞧了瞧。他进去的时候，先生，古斯塔夫好像正站在水槽边，垂着头。他那时候病得还没那么重，他告诉威尔汉姆他觉得有点头晕，就那一句话，叫他不要小题大做。威尔汉姆就是威尔汉姆，他不知道该怎么办，特别是古斯塔夫说不要小题大做，所以他去找了休伯特。休伯特看了一下，觉得古斯塔夫得躺下。所以他们一边一个扶着他，那时候他们才意识到他已经晕了过去，却仍然站立着，抓着水槽。他抓着水槽边沿，结结实实地抓着啊，威尔汉姆说，他们得把他的指头一个一个掰开。接着，古斯塔夫好像稍稍清醒了些，他们一人扶着他一只胳膊，才从那儿出来。而古斯塔夫，他又说 he 不想小题大做，说他没事，可以继续工作。但休伯特不听，把他安顿进了一间化妆室，一间没人的化妆室。”

他领着路，沿着走廊走着，步伐相当快，一直扭着头，但为了避让一辆手推车，便停了下来。

“真让人担心哪，”我说道，“这事到底是几时发生的？”

“我想肯定是几个小时之前了。他起先好像还没那么糟，而且坚持只需要几分钟喘口气。但休伯特很担心，就传出了话，我们很快就全赶到了这儿，我们每一个人。我们为他找了一个垫子躺下，还找了条毯子，但随后他好像越来越糟了，我们全都商量着，说他应该得到及时的救治。但古斯塔夫不听，突然铁了心说得跟您谈谈，先生。他非常固执，他说如果我们决定送他去医院他可以马上去，但先要跟您谈谈。我们眼看着他情况越来越糟。但他已经失去理智了，先生，所以我们又出来找您。谢天谢地，我找到您了。就是那间，尽头的那间。”

在我的想象中，这条走廊绵延弯转，走起来没个完，但现在我看见它的尽头是一面米色的墙。墙壁前，最后一扇门半开着，络腮胡迎

宾员停在了门口，小心翼翼地窥探着房间里面。然后向我示意了一下，我便跟着他进去了。

门口大概有十二个人，全部转身看着我们，接着快速让到两边。我猜他们是另外几位迎宾员，但我没有停下细看他们，我的目光被小房间另一侧古斯塔夫的身影吸引了。

他躺在瓷砖地面上，身下铺着一张垫子，身上盖着一条毯子。一位迎宾员蹲在他身边，轻轻地说着些什么，但一看见我便站了起来。接着，房间一下子就空了，门在我身后关上，只留下我和古斯塔夫。

小化妆室里没有家具，连张木头椅子都没有，也没有窗户，天花板附近的通风格栅一直在嗡嗡响，空气很不新鲜。地上又冷又硬，头顶的灯要么关掉了，要么不能用，只剩下化妆镜周围的几只灯泡成了我们唯一的光源。但我看得非常清楚，古斯塔夫的脸已呈现出奇怪的灰白色。他平躺着，非常安静，除了疼痛时不时袭来，让他只得将头向后更深地压进垫子里。我一进去，他就冲我微笑，却什么也没说，无疑是要留待我们独处时才会开口。这会儿，他声音微弱，却出奇镇静地说道：

“非常抱歉，先生，就这样把您拉来了。发生这样的事情，太令人烦恼啦，偏偏是今晚。刚好在您要帮我们大忙的时候啊。”

“是的，是的，”我飞快地说道，“但瞧瞧你。你感觉怎么样了啊？”我蹲在了他身边。

“我觉得不太好。而且很快，我想我得去医院了，做一下检查。”

又一阵疼痛袭来，老迎宾员打住话头，在垫子上静静地挣扎了一会儿，其间闭上了双眼。然后，他又睁开眼睛，开口说：

“我得跟您谈谈，先生。有件事我必须要跟您谈谈。”

“请允许我现在再向你保证一次，”我说道，“我一如既往地笃信于你们的事业。其实，我非常期待今晚能够向大家证明，你和你的同事们这些年一直遭受着不公正的待遇。我迫切要强调有许多误会……”

我意识到他在极力引起我的注意，于是停了下来。

“我一分钟都没有怀疑过，先生，”他停了一会儿，然后说道：“您是一诺千金的人。我非常感激您为我们仗义执言。但我想跟您聊

聊别的事情。”他又顿了一下，毯子下又开始了一场默默的挣扎。

“真的，”我说，“如果你不赶紧去医院，是不是很不明智……”

“不，不。求您了。我一去医院，唉，一切可能就太迟了。您看，现在是时候了，我真的该跟她说说了。我是说索菲。我真的必须要跟她说说。我知道您今晚很忙，但您看，没有其他人知道啊。没有人知道我跟索菲之间的情况，关于我们的共识。我知道这个要求很过分，先生，但我想问，您能否去向她解释一切呢。没有其他人可以做这件事了。”

“很抱歉，”我一头雾水，“到底解释什么呢？”

“向她解释，先生。为何我们的共识……为何现在得结束了。说服她不容易，毕竟过了这么多年。但请您试试，让她明白为何我们现在得结束了。我知道这要求对您太过分了，但是，离您该上台的时间还有一会儿。正如我所说，您是唯一的知情人……”

又一阵疼痛吞噬了他，他的声音越来越小。我能感觉到他全身的肌肉在毯子下紧绷了起来，但这次他继续盯视着我，不知怎的，尽管他全身的骨架都在颤抖，他却一直睁着眼。等他的身体再次松弛下来后，我说：

“没错，离需要我出场的时间还有一会儿。好吧。我回去看看我能做些什么。我会想办法让她明白的。不管怎样，我会尽快带她来这儿。我们都希望你尽快痊愈，希望目前的情形不像你担忧的那样生死攸关……”

“拜托您了，先生。如果您能尽快带她来这儿的话，我会十分感激的。同时，我当然会竭尽全力支撑……”

“好的，好的，我这就出发。请耐心等待，我会尽快回来。”

我起身向门口走去。快出门时，我突然想到了一件事，于是转身，回到了地上的那个身影身边。

“鲍里斯，”我再次蹲下来对他说，“那鲍里斯呢？我是不是也应该带他过来？”

古斯塔夫抬头看着我，然后深深地吸了口气，闭上双眼。他许久都沉默不语，我便说：

“或许最好不要让他见到你这种……目前的这种状况。”

我觉得，我看到他轻微地点了点头，但古斯塔夫仍旧保持着沉默，紧闭双眼。

“毕竟，”我继续道，“他对你有种崇拜。或许你会想让他记住那样的你。”

这次，古斯塔夫更加明确地点了点头。

“我只是觉得该问问你，”我说道，又站起身。“好吧。我会只带索菲过来。不会太久的。”

我再次走到了门前——已经在扭门把手了——突然，他在我身后大喊道：

“瑞德先生！”

他的叫声出奇的响亮，而且声音中包含了一种特别的紧张感，我无法相信那出自古斯塔夫之口。然而，我回头看时，他又闭上了双眼，显得非常平静。我担心地急忙又向他跑去。这时古斯塔夫睁开双眼，抬头看着我。

“您必须也带上鲍里斯，”他轻声说道，“他现在不小了。让他看看我现在这个样子。他得学会生活。直面生活。”

他又闭上双眼，表情僵硬了起来，我想他正在经受又一阵疼痛。但这次有些不同，我关切地低头看着，发现老人正在哭泣。我继续看了一会儿，不知如何是好。终于，我轻轻拍了拍他的肩膀。

“我会尽快。”我低声道。

我走出化妆室，挤在门旁的其他迎宾员全都扭头看着我，满脸焦急。我推开他们走过去，果断地说：

“请密切观察他，先生们。我得去完成一个紧急的请求，所以请原谅我离开一会儿。”

有人开始提问题，但我匆匆前行，没有停步。

我的计划是找到霍夫曼，坚持要他开车立刻送我到索菲的公寓。然而，我疾步在走廊上前行时，发现自己根本不知道到哪里去找酒店经理。此外，走廊也与我刚才同络腮胡迎宾员走过时大为不同了：仍有几辆送餐车在推来推去，但这会儿走廊里黑压压地挤满了人，想必他们是来访乐队的成员。我的两侧是长长的几排化妆室，许多门都开着，乐手们三三两两地站在一起，谈笑风生，在走廊对面相互叫喊。

偶尔我会路过一扇关闭的门，门后传来乐器的声音，但整体而言，他们的情绪着实让我吃了一惊，都很轻浮。我正欲停下，问问其中一人我在哪儿能找到霍夫曼，突然，透过一间化妆室半开的门，我瞥见了那位酒店经理。我走上前，再往里推了推门。

霍夫曼正站在一面落地镜前，仔细地审视自己。他一袭晚装打扮，我留意到，他的脸上化着浓妆，一些粉末掉落到了他的肩膀和翻领上。他在喃喃地说着什么，目光一直没有离开镜中的影像。我继续在门口看着，他做了个奇怪的动作，突然间弯腰向前，僵硬地抬起一只手臂，胳膊肘向外突出，用拳重击自己的前额——一下，两下，三下。整个过程中，他的双眼没有离开过镜子，并且一直喃喃自语。接着，他站直身子，默默地看着自己。我突然意识到，他准备再次重复这整个动作，于是我飞快地清了清嗓子，说道：

“霍夫曼先生。”

他吃了一惊，盯视着我。

“打扰您了，”我说，“很抱歉。”

霍夫曼困惑地四下看了看，然后似乎又恢复了镇静。

“瑞德先生，”他微笑道，“您感觉如何？我相信您觉得这儿的一切都合您的意。”

“霍夫曼先生，出了件非常紧急的事情。我现在需要一辆车尽快送我去目的地。不知道能否立刻安排。”

“一辆车，瑞德先生？现在？”

“事情万分紧急。当然，我会及时返回，用充足的时间完成我各项应尽的职责。”

“是的，是的，当然。”霍夫曼隐约有些为难。“车应该没有问题。当然，瑞德先生，通常情况下，我还可以为您提供一位司机，或者，我荣幸之至，会亲自驾车送您。不幸的是，现在我的员工们手头上的工作都很多。至于我呢，还有许多事情要照管，还有几句不太重要的台词要排练。哈哈！您知道的，我今晚要做一个简短的发言。无疑，跟您的演讲相比，它微不足道，甚至还比不上我们的布罗茨基先生的呢。顺便说一句，他会晚些到，但是，我觉得我必须做好最充分的准备。是的，是的，布罗茨基先生会晚些到，没错，但这没什么好担心的。实际上，这是他的化妆间，我正要仔细核查呢。这化妆间好

极了。我完全相信，他随时会来的。您知道的，瑞德先生，一直以来，我在亲自抓布罗茨基先生的……呃，恢复情况，能够亲眼见证此事是多么令人欣喜啊。如斯的动力，如斯的庄重！所以今晚，这至关重要的夜晚，我信心十足。哦，是的。信心十足！没错，若这个时候他又故态复萌的话，就简直不可想象了。那对这整座城市将会是个灾难！自然，对我本人亦是。当然，这点担心最无需挂齿了，然而，请原谅，我得说，对我而言，今晚，这至关重要的一夜，若他故态复萌的话，对我来说，就全完了。胜利在望的时刻，恰恰是我完结的时刻。令人羞耻的完结啊！我再无颜面对这城里的任何人。我得躲起来了。哈！我在干什么啊，说这些不可能发生的事情？我对布罗茨基先生信心十足。他会来的。”

“是的，我肯定他会来的，霍夫曼先生，”我说道，“实际上，今晚整个庆典将会相当成功……”

“是的，是的，我知道！”他不耐烦地大喊道，“无需安慰我这一点！我甚至根本就不该提起这件事，毕竟离晚会开始还有充足的时间，要不是因为……因为今晚早些时候发生的事，我根本就不该提起。”

“发生什么事了？”

“是的，是的。啊，您还没听说吧。您怎么可能听说呢？没什么大不了的，先生。今晚早些时候，发生了一系列的事件，结果，几个小时前，我最后离开布罗茨基先生的时候，他呷了一小杯威士忌。不，不，先生！我明白您在想什么。不，不！他充分征询了我的意见。一番思量后，我动了怜悯之心，想想在这种特殊情况下，一小杯酒不会有什么害处。我完全充分地判断过了，先生。或许我错了，等着瞧吧。我个人认为我不会错的。当然，假若我的决定确实错了，那么这整个夜晚——噗呼！——从头至尾将会是场灾难！那样的话，我就得在藏匿中度过余生。但事实是，先生，今晚的事情十分复杂，我不得不做出决定。不管怎样，结果就是，我留布罗茨基先生在自己家里，喝了一小杯威士忌。我自信他会就此打住的。我现在唯一的想法就是，或许该处理一下那个橱柜。但另一方面，我肯定，我是太过小心了。毕竟，布罗茨基先生已经有了如此的进步，完全可以信任他的，完全信任。”他刚才一直在拨弄着自己的蝴蝶领结，这会儿他转过身，对着镜子调整起来。

“霍夫曼先生，”我说，“到底发生了什么事？假如布罗茨基先生出事情了，或者发生了其他什么事，从而有可能彻底改变整个事态

的话，那么您肯定应该立即告知我。相信您赞同我的话吧，霍夫曼先生。”

酒店经理大笑了一声。“瑞德先生，您完全想错了。您一点儿也不需要担心。瞧瞧，我担心了吗？不。我把全部的声誉都押在了今晚，难道我不够镇静，不够自信吗？告诉您吧，先生，您根本没什么可担心的。”

“霍夫曼先生，您刚才提到橱柜，是指什么？”

“橱柜？哦，就是我今晚在布罗茨基先生家发现的橱柜。您或许知道，他多年来都住在离北高速公路不远的的一个旧农舍里。我之前当然去过很多次，但屋内有些乱——当然，布罗茨基先生有他自己规整东西的方式——我从未仔细看过他的住所。就是说，直到今晚，我才发现竟然还有酒品储备。他向我发誓已经完全忘记这事了。正值今晚临近，那时，我说，好吧，在这种情况下，鉴于与柯林斯小姐之间发生了烦心事等等，在这种特殊情况下，就只在这种情况下，只喝一小杯威士忌对他来说最好，只为稳定他的心神——您看，我是在权衡轻重之后才同意他的，尽管确实有点小冒险，是的。毕竟，先生，他为柯林斯小姐之事非常烦恼。就在那个时候，在我提议从车上取个小酒瓶来的时候，布罗茨基先生才想起，他还有一个橱柜没有清理。于是我们走进他的……呃，厨房，我猜应该是吧。过去几个月来，布罗茨基先生把那块地方修整得相当不错。他取得了稳步的进展，如今，这些物件根本没派上过用场，但当然啰，还缺窗户之类的东西。总之，他打开橱柜——实际上它是一侧倒放的——里面，呃，大概有一打旧瓶装的烈酒。大部分是威士忌。布罗茨基先生跟我一样惊讶。我得承认，我确实意识到了自己应该做些什么。我应该把那些瓶子拿走，或者把酒倾倒在地上。但是，先生，您也明白，那简直是侮辱啊，是对布罗茨基先生表现出的勇气与决心的一个极大侮辱。况且，今晚因为柯林斯小姐，他的自尊心已经承受了一次重大打击……”

“抱歉，霍夫曼先生，您反复说起柯林斯小姐，到底怎么了？”

“啊，柯林斯小姐。是的，呃，那是另外一回事了。那正是我为何凑巧去那儿，去布罗茨基先生农舍的原因。您看，瑞德先生，今晚我发现自己传达了一个最为悲伤的消息。没人会妒忌我担负了这么个任务的。其实，一段时间以来，我越来越感到不安，甚至在他们昨日在动物园相见之前就开始了。可以说，我是在替柯林斯小姐担心。谁会猜到，过了这么些年，他们的事竟然会进展得这么快？是的，是的，我很担心。柯林斯小姐是我最敬重的一位女士。我不忍心看到这

那个时候她的生活再次分崩离析。您看，瑞德先生，柯林斯小姐是个极具智慧的女人，整座城市都可以作证，但尽管如此——假若您住在这儿的话，我肯定您会认同的——她总还有些脆弱的地方。我们所有人都十分敬重她，许多人认为她的教诲弥足珍贵，但同时——我怎么说呢？——我们总是觉得想保护她。几个月来，随着布罗茨基先生变得……越来越正常，许多问题凸现了出来，我之前确实没有好好考虑过这些问题，呃，我说呀，我便开始担心起来。所以，先生，今晚在您排练完毕、我带您回去的路上，您碰巧无心提起柯林斯小姐同意了与布罗茨基先生的约见，甚至还清楚地表示说，布罗茨基先生当时就在圣彼得公墓等候她，您可以想象我当时的心情如何了。天哪，进展如此神速！我们的布罗茨基俨然就是瓦伦蒂诺再世啊！瑞德先生，我意识到我得做些什么。我不能允许柯林斯小姐重新堕入痛苦的生活之中，尤其那是因为我的缘故，不管是多么间接造成的。所以，今晚早些时候，最为仁慈的您准许我在街上放下您之后，我就趁机去柯林斯小姐的公寓看望她。看到我，她当然非常惊讶：过了这么多天，我偏偏在今晚亲自前去拜访她。换句话说，我的出现就能说明一切了。她立刻让我进门，我请她原谅我此次唐突的造访，原谅我不能以通常体贴、圆滑的方式来处理我想跟她谈论的这个难题。她当然非常理解。‘我知道，霍夫曼先生，’她说道，‘您今晚肯定承受着巨大的压力。’我们坐在她的前厅，我直奔主题。我告诉她，我听说了他们约定的会面。柯林斯小姐听到这话，垂下了双眼，就像一个年轻的小女生一样。接着，她怯懦地说道：‘是的，霍夫曼先生。您刚刚登门的时候，我还正在准备呢。已经一个小时了，我尝试了不同的装扮、不同的发式。我这个年纪了，是不是很滑稽啊？是的，霍夫曼先生，是真的。他今早来了，说服了我。我同意跟他见面。’她说了诸如此类的话。她喃喃低语，这位优雅的女士平常根本不这样讲话。于是我继续说下去。当然，我说得非常委婉。我巧妙地指出了可能的隐患。‘非常好，柯林斯小姐。’我用了这样的语句。由于时间有限，我就尽量小心。自然地，假若是在另一个夜晚，假若我们有时间客套幽默一番，寒暄几句，我敢说我可以做得更好，但也可能没什么不同。事实真相对她来说总是很难接受的。总之，我尽可能用最好的方式说了出来，我终于向她说出了真相。我对她说：‘柯林斯小姐，所有这些旧伤疤会再次揭开。它们会痛，会给您带来极大的痛苦，会打垮您，柯林斯小姐，在几星期之内，几天之内。您怎么能忘记呢？您怎么能让自已再重新经历一遍？之前经受的一切，那些羞辱，那巨大的创伤，全都会回来，而且会比之前更强烈。您在这么多年以来为自已建立一个全新的生活所做的一切，又将如何呢？’我对她说出这样

的话——哦，告诉您吧，先生，这可不容易啊——我能看出她的内心在崩溃，即便她极力想维持表面上的镇静，我看到所有的记忆再次浮上她的心头，过去的痛楚又开始了。不容易啊，先生，我可以告诉您，但我认为我有责任说下去。最后，她终于非常平静地说道：‘可是，霍夫曼先生，我已经答应他了。我已经答应今晚去见他。他指望我去啊。像今晚这样的大场面，他总是非常需要我。’我回答道：‘柯林斯小姐，当然他会失望，但我会尽最大努力亲自向他解释的。不管怎么说，就像您一样，他在内心深处肯定已经明白，这次约见是非常不明智的。过去的最好就让它过去吧。’就如同梦中一般，她看着窗外说道：‘但他肯定已经在那儿了。他会在那儿一直等的。’我回答道：‘我亲自去，柯林斯小姐。是的，我今晚非常忙，但我认为此事头等重要，我只有亲自去办才能放心。实际上，我现在立马就去，去公墓，告诉他这个情况。您可以放心，柯林斯小姐，我会尽一切努力安慰他的。我会劝他想想将来，想想今晚要面对的极其重要的挑战。’我就是这样对她说的，瑞德先生。虽然我得说，她一下子好像伤透了心，但她是位讲道理的女士，内心深处肯定明白我是对的，因为她非常亲切地碰了碰我的胳膊，说道：‘去找他。马上。尽最大努力吧。’于是我起身想离开，但马上意识到还有最后一项痛苦的任务有待完成。‘哦，还有，柯林斯小姐，’我对她说道，‘至于今晚的活动，鉴于目前的情况，我觉得您最好还是待在家中。’她点了点头，我看得出她快要哭了。‘毕竟，’我继续说，‘得顾及到他的感受。在目前的情况下，在这节骨眼上，您出现在音乐厅也许会对他有一定的影响。’她又点了点头，表示她完全理解。我向她致了歉，然后就出去了。尽管我有很多其他紧急的事情要做——比如熏咸肉，送面包——但我明白，当务之急是让布罗茨基先生安然跨过这最后一道出人意料的坎儿。于是我驱车去了公墓。我到达的时候，天已经黑了，我在坟墓间走了好一会儿才找到他，他坐在一座墓碑上，垂头丧气的。看到我走近，他疲惫地抬起头，对我说：‘你是来告诉我的吧。我知道。我知道她不会来的。’这使得我的任务简单多了，您也许会这样想，但告诉您吧，先生，一点也不容易啊，要传递这样的消息。我郑重其事地点了点头，说，是的，他说得没错，她不会来了。她已经想通了，改变主意了，而且她也已决定不出席今晚的音乐会。我知道多说无益。他看上去几欲发狂，顷刻间我移开目光，假装审视他所坐的那块墓碑旁边的一座坟墓。‘哦，老卡尔茨先生，’我对着树林说道，因为我知道布罗茨基先生正悄悄地抹眼泪。‘啊，老卡尔茨先生。他埋在这里多少年了？就仿佛昨日啊，但我知道，已经十四年了。他生前是多么寂寞啊。’我如此这般地说着，就是为了让

布罗茨基先生哭出来啊。接着，我感觉他已抑制住了眼泪，便转身对着他，要他跟我一起回音乐厅做好准备。但他说不，时间还太早。在礼堂里逗留过久，他会太紧张的。我想他说得也没错，于是我提议载他回家。他答应了，于是我们离开公墓，下山到了车上。我们一路车行，上北高速路，这整个期间，他只是盯着窗外，什么都没说，眼中不时泪水盈盈。我那时才意识到，我们还未大功告成啊。一切不像几个小时前那样显得笃定了。但我仍然非常有信心，瑞德先生，就如同我现在这样。然后我们到了他的农舍。他翻新得很不错，很多房间都非常舒适。我们走进客厅，打开台灯，四下看了看，轻松地交谈了几句。我提议安排几个人过来，看看墙壁发霉的问题。他好像没听见，只是坐在椅子上，露出一副幽远的表情。接着，他说他想喝点酒，就一小杯。我告诉他这绝对不行。可他非常镇静地说，他需要喝杯酒，但并不像从前那样，不是那样的，那种饮法已一去不复返了，可他刚刚遭受了极度的失望，他的心在碎裂。他用了那样的词汇。他的心在碎裂，他说，但他知道今晚的活动还得仰仗他，他知道轻重。他知道自己得表现出众。他没有要求像从前那样喝酒。难道我真的瞧不出吗？我瞥了他一眼，看得出他说的是实话。我看到了一个伤心、失望却又有责任心的人。他越来越了解自己，比大部分男人曾希望做到的都要好得多。他说，在这场危机中，他需要的无非就是一小杯酒，让他摆脱这情感上的打击。为了满足即将到来的夜晚活动的需求，他需要稳定情绪。瑞德先生，我早些天已经多次听他说过要喝酒，但这次完全不同。我看得出来。我望向他双眼深处，说道：‘布罗茨基先生，我能信任您吗？我车上还有一小瓶威士忌。假如我只给您一小杯，我能相信您会到此为止吗？就一小杯，再不喝了？’他全力对上我的目光，回答道：‘不像从前那样了。我向你发誓。’于是我便出门走到车旁，天很黑，风中的树林发出一阵狂烈的呜咽声，我从车上取了一小瓶酒，拿了进去，这时他已离开了椅子。我走了进去，发现他在厨房里。那其实是间外屋，与农舍主屋相连，布罗茨基先生将其巧妙地改成了厨房。是的，就在那时，我发现他打开了那个侧倒在地的橱柜。他完全忘记了这里还有威士忌，发现我进去时，他这样说道。一瓶瓶的威士忌啊。他只拿出一瓶，打开它，衡量着，往酒杯里倒了一点儿。然后他直视我的眼睛，将剩下的酒倒在了地板上。他厨房的地面，我得说，大多是泥地，所以看似没弄得太乱。呃，他把酒全倒在了地上，随后我们回到主屋，他坐在椅子上，开始一口口地呷着威士忌。我仔细看着他，看得出他喝酒的样子不似从前了。他可以那样一小口一小口地呷……我知道自己做出了正确的决定。我告诉他我已离开太久，得回去了。熏肉还有面包需要有人监管。我站起身，

不用开口，我们两个彼此都知道对方在想些什么。在想那个橱柜。布罗茨基先生直直地盯着我的眼睛，说道：“不像从前那样了。”对我来说，那就够了。若我坚持继续待下去，那就是对他的诋毁，甚至是侮辱。总之，如我所说，我看着他的面庞时胸有成竹。我毫不犹豫地离开了。只在最后几分钟，先生，一丝疑虑才在我脑海中掠过。但我很清醒，我也知道，那只不过是大事前的紧张而已。他很快就会来的，我肯定。我满怀信心，整个夜晚必定会旗开得胜，会是个巨大的成功……”

“霍夫曼先生，”我说道，一丝不耐烦掠过心头，“假如您乐意让布罗茨基先生喝威士忌，呃，那是您的事。我不知道这是不是好主意，但您比我更了解情况。不管怎么说，请恕我提醒您，我这会儿也需要帮助，对吧？我跟您解释过了，我需要一辆车，越快越好。这事真的非常紧急，霍夫曼先生。”

“啊，是的，车。”霍夫曼若有所思地四下望了望，“最简单的办法，瑞德先生，就是您借用我的车。就停在外面，防火门那儿。”他指了指走廊远处，“唉，钥匙呢？喏，给您。方向盘稍微有点向左偏。我一直想修理，但太忙了。请吧，请您随意使用。我明早才会用。”

第三十章

我驾着霍夫曼的黑色大轿车出了停车场，开上一条蜿蜒的小路，小路两边是茂密的冷杉林。很显然，这条路不常有人走，路面坑坑洼洼，没有路灯，非常狭窄，两车交会时必须减速慢行。我小心翼翼地开着车，凝视着黑漆漆的前方，以防撞到什么障碍物或遇到急转弯。小路笔直起来，借着车头灯光，我发现自己正驶过一片森林。我加快速度，继续在黑暗中穿行了一会儿，接着，我透过树林瞥见左边有些光亮。我再次减速，这才意识到那是音乐厅的前部，富丽堂皇，华灯照亮了夜空。

现在音乐厅离我有些远，我的视角也有点偏斜，但我可以清楚地辨认出它那壮丽的大体外观。几排威严的石柱矗立在中央拱门两旁，高大的窗户直达巨大的圆形穹顶。我不知道宾客是否已经到达，于是干脆彻底熄火，摇低车窗，想看个清楚。但即便我从座位上直起身，还是被树木挡住了视线，丝毫看不到地平面上那建筑的情况。

接着，我继续盯着音乐厅看，脑海中突然闪过一个念头：可能就在这会儿，我父母即将到达。我忽然记起了霍夫曼那惟妙惟肖的描述，他们坐着马车，从黑暗中出现在众人艳羡的目光中。实际上，就在我倾身窗外之时，我仿佛能清楚地听到不远处马车经过的声音。我关掉汽车引擎，又听了听，把头再伸出去一些。接着我干脆下车，站在黑夜中屏息聆听。

风飕飕地在林间穿梭。接着我再次隐隐听到了先前那个微弱的声音：马蹄的嗒嗒声，有节奏的叮当声，木制车厢的嘎嘎声。随后这些声音渐渐隐没在树林的沙沙声中。我又继续听了一会儿，但是已经听不到任何声音了。最后我转身回到车中。

我感到无比平静——几乎是心若止水——站在外面小路上的时候还是这种感觉，但等我一旦重新启动车子，一股强烈的沮丧、恐惧和愤怒感便交织在一起涌上心头。我的父母这时刚刚抵达，而我却在这里，准备工作远未完成，甚至这会儿还要驱车离开音乐厅去办其他事情。我不明白自己怎么会让这样的事情发生。我穿越树林，继续前行，心里愈发感到愤怒，我决计无论如何一等手头的事情办完，就尽快赶回音乐厅。可接着我又突然想到，我其实不知道怎样去索菲的公

寓，甚至不知道走这条森林小路是否方向对头。一阵无力感席卷而来，但我依然加速行驶，看着车灯照耀下的树林在我面前一路延展。

这时，我突然发现两个人影正站在前方招手。他们就直直地站在小路中间，我靠近时，他们虽挪到了一边，但还是继续打着遇急信号。我放慢速度，看到有五六个人聚在一起，在路边支了顶帐篷，围着个小小的便携火炉。我一开始以为他们都是流浪者，但随后我看到了一位穿着时髦的中年妇女，还有一位身着西装的灰发男人，正弯腰靠向我的窗户。在他们身后，其他几个人刚才一直围着火炉，坐在好似翻转过来的木板箱上，这会儿他们都站起身，朝我的车走了过来。我留意到，他们都举着个锡制野营杯。

我摇下窗户，那女人看着车里的我，说道：

“噢，你来了，我们真高兴。你看，我们的争论陷入了僵局，根本不能达成一致。总是很麻烦，对不对？需要行动的时候，我们从未达成过一致。”

“但无疑，”穿西装的灰发男人严肃地说道，“我们得尽快得出个结论。”

他们两人还未来得及说点别的什么，我看到他们身后有个人站了起来，正弯腰看着我，此人是我的老同学杰弗里·桑德斯。他也认出了我，便推开他人来到前面，拍了拍车门。

“啊，我正在想什么时候能再见到你呢，”他说道，“老实讲，我有些生气。你知道，你保证过要来喝杯茶，却又没有过来。不过，我认为现在不是说这个的时候。你还是依然故我啊，有点无礼，老朋友。别介意。你还是出来吧。”说罢，他打开车门站在一旁。我正要抗辩，他继续说道：“最好来喝杯咖啡吧。然后你可以加入我们的讨论。”

“坦白说，桑德斯，”我答道，“现在我不是很方便。”

“噢，来吧，老朋友。”他的声音中透出一丝不耐烦。“你知道，自从我们前晚遇到后，我就一直在回想你的很多事，回想起了我们在学校里的日子，所有种种。就像今天早上，我一醒来就想起了当年，你可能已经不记得了，那个时候，我们俩为低年级男孩子们的越野跑记分。我觉得该是六年级以下吧。你可能不记得了，但是今天早上躺在床上，我一直在想。我们就站在那个旷野对面的酒吧外等着，当时你正为某事而沮丧呢。来吧，出来吧，老朋友，我没法跟你这样

对话。”他继续不耐烦地引我出来。“这就对了，好多了。”他那只空闲的手抓着我的手肘，另一只手端着他的锡制水杯，于是我不情愿地下了车。“是呀，我一直在想着那天的事。十月的一个雾蒙蒙的早晨，在英国，天气老是这样。我们站在那儿，闲站着，等待三年级学生喘着气从雾中跑出来，我记得你一个劲地说‘你可好啦，你一切可顺当呢’，真是可怜至极。所以，最后我对你说：‘你看，不光是你，老朋友。你不是世界上唯一有烦恼的人。’我开始跟你讲起我七八岁时的事情，我父母、我的弟弟和我，我们全家去度假。我们去了英国海滨的一处旅游胜地，就像伯恩茅斯那样的地方。也许是怀特岛。天气晴朗，等等，可是你知道，总有些不对劲，我们就是相处得不好。当然，一家人度假出游，这是司空见惯的事，但当时我可不知道，那时我才七八岁。总之，事情就是不顺。一天下午，父亲气冲冲地走了。我是说突然就走了。我们正在海岸边看着什么，母亲正在向我们指着什么东西，突然间，他就走了。没有叫喊，什么都没，就只是走开了。我们不知道该怎么办，于是我们就跟着他走，母亲、小克里斯托弗和我，我们三人跟着他。跟得不是很近，总保持着三十码的距离，正好还能看到他。父亲继续走着，一路沿着海滨，爬上峭壁的小路，穿过沙滩小屋和所有晒日光浴的人。接着他朝小镇走去，路过网球场，穿过购物区。我们跟了他一个多小时。过了一会儿，我们开起了玩笑。我们说：‘看哪，他不再生气了。他只是在闹着玩！’或者我们说：‘他的头故意那样的，瞧瞧啊！’然后我们笑啊笑。如果你仔细看，就会相信，他是在做一个滑稽的步行表演。克里斯托弗那时还很小，我告诉他，父亲那样走路只是为了滑稽，克里斯托弗笑得合不拢嘴，好像那全然是个游戏。母亲也是，她大笑着说道：‘噢，孩子们，看你们老爸！’然后笑得更厉害了。于是我们继续那样走着，但只有我——你看，虽然当时我只有七八岁，但只有我明白：父亲不是真的在开玩笑。我知道他根本没有恢复过来，而且由于我们一直跟着他，或许他还越来越生气呢。或许他想坐到凳子上，或者去哪里喝杯咖啡，却不能如愿，全因为我们。你还记得这些吗？我那天全告诉你了。我曾一度看着母亲，因为我希望这一切尽快停止，而就在那时我才恍然大悟。我明白母亲已说服自己，让自己彻底地相信父亲做这一切是闹着玩的，而小克里斯托弗，他一直都想跑上前，你知道，直奔到父亲身后。我只得编造各种借口，一直呵呵大笑着说：‘不行，那可不行。那不是游戏的一部分。我们必须保持远远的距离，否则就不行。’但我母亲，你看，她却说：‘哦，是的！你为什么不去拉他的衬衣，看看在他逮到你以前，是否能跑回来！’我只得继续说，因为我是唯一明白的——你知道，我是唯一的明白人——

我只得继续说：‘不，不，我们等着。退后，退后。’我父亲看上去的确滑稽。远远看去，他的步伐很是奇怪。你看，老朋友，你为什么不坐下呢？你看起来疲乏极了，而且非常焦虑。来，坐下吧，帮我们决定。”

杰弗里·桑德斯指了指营帐附近一个倒翻过来的橙色木板箱。我确实感觉很疲惫，心想小憩一下、呷口咖啡之后，不管什么任务摆在面前总能更好地完成。我坐下，发现双膝在颤抖，便颤颤巍巍地坐到箱子上。人们怜悯地围拢过来。有个人端过来一杯咖啡，另有一人将一只手放在我背上，说道：“放松。尽管放松。”

“谢谢，谢谢！”我说道，接过咖啡，尽管很烫，还是贪婪地饮了一大口。

穿西装的灰发男人蹲在我面前，直视着我的脸，非常温和地说道：“我们必须做决定。您得帮帮我们。”

“决定？”

“是的。和布罗茨基先生有关。”

“啊，是的。”我端起锡杯又喝了几口，“噢，我明白了。看来重任现在全压在我身上了。”

“也不至于那么说。”灰发男人说道。

我又看了看他。他态度友好沉静，是个令人安心的人，但在这一刻，我可以看到他非常严肃。

“我也不至于会说责任全压在了你身上。只不过事已至此，我们大家都得负起责任。我个人的意见已明确表达，那就是它该截掉。”

“截掉？”

灰发男人庄重地点了点头。我看到了挂在他脖子上的听诊器，这才意识到他是个医生什么的。

“嗯，是的，”我说道，“得截掉。是的。”

这时我才开始扫视四周，吃惊地发现离车子不远的地面上有一大团金属。一个念头隐隐划过我的脑海，是我造成了这次事故，或许我卷入了某起事故，自己却还不知道。我站起身——立刻有几双手伸出来扶稳我——走向那团金属，发现那是一辆自行车的残骸。金属已扭

曲变形，无可挽救了，而令我惊恐的是，我看到布罗茨基躺在其中。他背贴地面平躺在地上，双眼静静地看着我走近他。

“布罗茨基先生！”我盯着他喃喃道。

“啊。瑞德。”他说道，声音中几乎没有一丝痛苦，颇令我惊讶。

我转过身，对已经站到我身后的灰发男人说：“我肯定这件事和我毫无关系。我不记得有任何事故发生。我只是开车……”

灰发男人会心地点了点头，示意我保持安静。接着，他拉着我走远了一点，低声说道：“几乎可以肯定，他企图自杀。他喝醉了。烂醉如泥。”

“啊。是吗。”

“我肯定他企图自杀。可现在，结果却是双腿被缠了进去。右腿基本上没有受到伤害。只是被卡住了。左腿也被卡住了。正是这条左腿让我很难办。情况很不妙。”

“不！”我说道，回头又看了一眼布罗茨基。他好像注意到了，冲着一片夜色说道：

“瑞德。你好。”

“您来之前我们已经讨论了一会儿，”灰发男人继续说道，“我觉得应该截掉。那样我们或许能救他一命。经过一番争论，在场的大部分人都赞同。不过，那边的两位女士反对，她们要多等一会儿，等救护车来。但我觉得这样做是在冒极大的风险。这是我的专业之见。”

“噢，是的。是的。我理解您的顾虑。”

“在我看来，左腿必须马上截掉。我是个外科医生，但不巧的是，我没带工具。没有止痛药，什么都没有。连阿司匹林都没有。您看，我下了班，只是出来到这儿走走，呼吸一下新鲜空气。就像这里的其他好心人一样。碰巧早些时候口袋里装了副听诊器，但其他什么都没有。但现在您来了，也许情况会有所改变。您车里有什么用品吗？”

“车里？呃，其实我也不清楚。您看，这车是借来的。”

“您是说是雇来的车？”

“不完全正确。是借来的。从熟人那里。”

“我明白了。”他神情严肃地看着地面，在暗自思忖。越过他的肩膀，我可以看到其他人在焦急地看着我们。接着这个外科医生开口道：

“也许您不妨查查后备厢。可能有什么可以帮到我们呢。有把锋利的器具，我就可以做这手术了。”

我想了想，说：“我很乐意去看看，但首先我想去跟布罗茨基先生说句话。您看，某种程度上说，我确实了解他，我真的应该先跟他说，在……在走这极端的一步之前。”

“很好，”外科医生说道，“但我觉得——我的专业意见——就是，我们已经浪费了很多时间。请尽快吧！”

我又走向布罗茨基，低头直视他的脸。

“布罗茨基先生……”我开口道，但他立刻插话进来。

“瑞德，帮帮我。我必须找到她。”

“找柯林斯小姐？我认为现在有其他事情需要考虑。”

“不，不。我必须和她谈谈。我很清楚。我现在非常清楚。我头脑很清醒。至于这场事故，我不知道，我在骑车，什么东西撞了我一下，一辆车吧，一辆轿车，谁知道呢？我肯定喝醉了，我不记得那个了，但是其他的我都记得。我现在明白了，明白了一切。是他！一直以来，他就想破坏！是他，全是他干的！”

“谁？霍夫曼？”

“他是个下三滥！下三滥！我以前不明白，但现在我全明白了。自从车子撞了我，不管是什么，一辆轿车，一辆卡车，自那之后我全明白了。今天晚上他来找我，非常同情我。我在公墓里等，等啊等。我的心跳得厉害。我等了这么多年。你知道吗，瑞德？我等了很久。即使我喝醉了，我也在等。下个星期，我过去常说。下个星期，我就戒酒，去找她。我要约她在圣彼得公墓见面。年复一年，我都这样说。现在，我终于达成愿望了，等在那里。坐在皮尔·古斯塔森的坟墓上等待。过去，我有时会跟布鲁诺一起去坐坐的。我等着。十五分钟，半个小时，一个小时。接着，他来了。他碰了碰我，就在这儿，在我肩膀上。她改变主意了，他说，她不会来了，今晚甚至连音乐厅也不来了。他一如平常那样和善。我听他说，喝点威士忌吧，它会让

你平静下来，这次例外。但我不能喝威士忌，我说，我怎么能喝威士忌呢？你疯了吗？不，喝点威士忌吧，他说，只喝一点，它能使你平静。我以为他是好意，现在我明白了，他从一开始就不想成事。他认为我成不了大器，永远成不了大器，因为我是……我就是一坨屎！他就是那么想的！我现在很清醒。我喝的酒足够醉死一匹马，但在那辆车撞了我之后，我清醒了。我现在非常清楚，一切都明白了。是他！他比我要低贱！我不会让他得逞。我会做到的！帮帮我，瑞德。我不会让他得逞的。我现在要去音乐厅了。我要展示给每个人。音乐已准备就绪，全在这儿，全在我脑子里。我会展示给每个人看。但她得来。我得跟她谈谈。帮帮我，瑞德。她一定得来，就坐在音乐厅里。然后她会记得的。他是个下三滥，但是我现在看清楚了。帮帮我，瑞德。”

“布罗茨基先生，”我打断他，“这里有位外科医生，他得为你做个手术，可能会有点疼。”

“帮帮我，瑞德。只要帮我找到她。你的车呢？你的车呢？带我去，带我去她那儿吧。她就在那个公寓里。我讨厌那地方。我真的讨厌，讨厌透了。我以前常常站在外面。带我去找她，瑞德。现在就带我去！”

“布罗茨基先生，您好像不知道您目前的状况。没有时间耽搁了。事实上，我答应这位外科医生会翻查一下后备厢。我一会儿就回来。”

“她害怕极了。但是还不太晚。我们可以养只动物。但现在没关系了，别介意动物了。只要到音乐厅去。这是我唯一的请求。只要到音乐厅去。我只请求这一件事。”

我离开布罗茨基，走到车边。打开后备厢，发现霍夫曼往里面乱七八糟地塞满了各种东西。有一把坏椅子，一双橡胶靴子，一沓塑料盒子。接着，我又找到一个手电筒，点亮它，照了照后备厢，在角落里发现了一把钢锯，看上去有点油腻腻的。我用一根手指滑过锯片，感觉锯齿还很锋利。我关上后备厢，向围着火炉聊天的其他人走去，走近时听到外科医生说：

“现在产科是一门沉闷的学科，不像我研修时那样了。”

“抱歉，”我说道，“我找到了这个。”

“噢，”外科医生转向我，说道，“谢谢。您已经跟布罗茨基先生谈过了？很好。”

突然间，我对自己无故卷入了整件事感到非常憎恶，于是我环顾这一圈脸庞，兴许有些暴怒地说道：

“难道这座城市就没有合适的应急预案以应对这样的突发事件吗？你们不是说叫了救护车吗？”

“一个小时前我们叫了一辆，”杰弗里·桑德斯开口道，“就在那个电话亭里打的。但不巧的是，今晚救护车短缺，全因为音乐厅的盛事。”

我看了看他指的地方，确实看到，在路对面远一些的地方，几乎是在漆黑的森林边缘，有一个公共电话亭。一看到它，我突然想起了正在处理的紧急事件，想到我不仅可以打电话给索菲，提前给她提个醒，而且还可以从她那里知道怎么去她公寓。

“请原谅，”我边说边离开。“我现在有个重要的电话要打。”

我朝树林走去，进了电话亭。在我搜遍口袋想要找几枚硬币时，我从玻璃嵌板望出去，看到外科医生慢慢朝仰卧的布罗茨基走去，钢锯巧妙地藏在身后。杰弗里·桑德斯和其他人不安地围成一圈，或低头望着锡茶杯，或盯着自己的双脚。接着，外科医生转过身来，跟他们讲了几句，其中两个男人，杰弗里·桑德斯和一个穿着褐色皮夹克的年轻人，硬着头皮走到他身旁。不一会儿，三个人就站在了布罗茨基面前，神情肃穆地低头看着他。

我转过头，拨通了索菲的电话。电话响了一会儿，然后索菲接起了电话，声音有些困乏，还稍稍有点警觉。我深吸了一口气。

“听着，”我说道，“你好像根本不知道我现在的压力有多大。你以为我这样容易吗？我的时间已经所剩无几了，还没能抽出空来审查一下音乐厅，人们却反而希望我去做这些事情。你以为今晚对我来说很容易吗？你意识到今晚的重要性了吗？我的父母，他们今晚会来。对！他们终于要来了，就在今晚！也许，他们现在就在那儿了！瞧瞧发生的事儿。他们放我去准备了吗？没有！他们要我干这干那。这个讨厌的问答环节就是一宗。他们竟然还用上了电子记分牌。你能相信吗？我该怎么办？他们这么自以为是，所有这些人都是。过了这么多个晚上，独独在今晚，他们到底要我干什么？但是，其他所有地方也都一样。他们什么都指望我。他们今晚可能会指责我，我不会奇

怪。他们对我的回答不满意，就会唯我是问，那会置我于何地呢？我甚至可能撑不到钢琴演奏的环节。或者，他们开始指责我的时候，我父母可能就离开了……”

“听着，冷静点，”索菲说道，“没事的。他们绝不会指责你。你总说他们会指责你，但这些年来，到目前为止，没有人指责过你，一个都没有……”

“可是，难道你听不懂我在说什么吗？今晚非同寻常。我父母要来啊！如果他们今晚指责我的话，就会……就会……”

“他们不会指责你的，”索菲再次打断话头，“你每次都这样说。无论你在世界的哪个角落，你打电话来说的都是这同一番话。每逢你到了这一刻，就老是说，他们会指责我，会揭发我。而结果呢？几小时后你又打来，心平气和，自鸣得意。我问你怎么样了，而你听上去略显惊讶，嫌我竟旧话重提。‘噢，好得很。’你说。总是像那样，接着你会继续做其他事情，好像根本不值一提似的……”

“等一等。你什么意思？这是些什么电话？你知道我给你打这些电话有多麻烦吗？有时候，我都累疯了，但我仍旧设法在日程表上抽出点时间打电话，只是为了确认你一切都好。况且，多半是你，你把你的一肚子难题统统倒给了我。你暗示，我像你描述的那样说话，是什么意思？”

“这样深究下去毫无意义。我要说的是，今天晚上一切都会好好的……”

“你那样说倒是很轻巧。你就像其他所有人一样，就那么想当然。你以为我所要做的就是现身，然后其他一切就会自然而然地……”我突然记起古斯塔夫此刻正躺在那间没有家具的化妆室里的垫子上，愕然停住了话头。

“怎么了？”索菲问。

又过了一会儿，我稳定了一下自己的情绪，接着说：

“瞧，我本来想告诉你件事的。是个坏消息。我很抱歉。”

电话另一头，索菲沉默着。

“是你父亲，”我说道，“他病了。他现在在音乐厅。你必须马上赶来。”

我又停了一会，但索菲仍旧没有说话。

“他现在还挺得住，”又过了会儿，我继续说，“但你必须尽快赶来。鲍里斯也得一起来。其实，那正是我给你打电话的原因。我有辆车。现在我正在去接你们俩的路上。”

仿佛过了许久，电话那端依旧沉默。突然索菲开口道：

“昨晚的事我很对不起。我是说在卡文斯基画廊。”她顿了顿，我以为她又要沉默，但她接着说：“我很可悲。你不必装模作样。我知道我很可悲。我不知道怎么回事，只是不能控制那样的情况。我得要面对现实了。我永远不会是那种随你游遍一个城市又一个城市的人，陪你出席这所有的活动。我就是做不来。我很抱歉。”

“但那又有什么关系呢？”我轻柔地说道，“昨天画廊的事儿，我已经全忘了。谁在乎你给那样的人留下了什么印象？他们可差劲啦，每个都是。而你到目前为止是当晚在那儿的最美的女人。”

“我不敢相信，”她突然大笑道，“我现在是只老乌鸦了。”

“但你越老越美。”

“说什么呢！”她又笑了起来。“你怎么敢说出口啦！”

“对不起，”我也大笑起来，“我意思是你一点都没老。还没老到能让人看出来。”

“还没老到能让人看出来？！”

“我不知道……”我有些糊涂，又笑了起来。“也许你是看上去又憔悴又丑陋。我现在记不得了。”

索菲又一次爽朗大笑，接着又陷入沉默。再开口时，她的声音重新热切起来。“但是我真可悲。这样的话，我就不能跟你一起携手旅行了。”

“听着，我保证，以后我不会再游荡太久了。今晚，一切是否顺利，你不可能知晓。可能就是那样了。”

“还有，我很抱歉还没有找到合适的房子。我保证会尽快为我们找到。一个真正舒适的地方。”

我无法立刻回应她，于是两人都沉默了一会儿。接着我听见索菲说：

“你真的不介意吗？不介意我昨天那个样子？我总是那个样子？”

“一点都不介意。在那样的场合，你可以随意表现自己。做任何想做的事。不会有任何区别的。整个屋里所有的人加起来，都不及你啊。”

索菲一言未发。过了一会儿我接着说：

“我也有错。我的意思是，找房子这个事。让你一个人去找是不公平的。也许，从现在开始，假如今晚一切顺利，就能有所不同。我们可以一起去找。”

电话那端仍是沉默。一时间，我怀疑索菲是不是已经走开了。但接着她用飘渺朦胧的声音说道：

“我们一定会很快找到的，是不是？”

“那当然。我们一起去找。再加上鲍里斯。我们会找到的。”

“你会很快到的，对吗？来接我们去见爸爸？”

“是的，是的。我会尽快赶到。所以试着稳定一下情绪，你们两个都是。”

“是的，好吧。”她的声音听起来仍然很飘渺，一点不着急。
“我马上叫醒鲍里斯。是的，好吧。”

我走出电话亭，竟真切地感觉天空已泛出黎明的迹象。我看到人群聚在布罗茨基周围，我走近了些，发现外科医生双膝跪地，正来回锯着。布罗茨基看上去正默默地接受这痛苦的折磨，但就在我刚走到车边时，他发出一声骇人的尖叫，响彻树林。

“现在我得走了。”我没有对着某个特别的人说，而且，他们的确好像没有听到，可是，当我关上车门发动引擎时，所有的脸庞都转向了我，表情惊恐。我还没关上车窗，杰弗里·桑德斯已经跑了过来。

“瞧瞧，”他生气地说，“瞧瞧。你现在还不能走。救出他后，我们得把他送到某个地方。我们需要你的车，你没看见吗？这是理所当然的常识啊！”

“听着，桑德斯，”我坚定地说，“我理解你们的难处。我很想给予更多的帮助，但我已经尽了全力。我还有自己的事情要操心。”

“你这人可真够典型的啊，老伙计，”他说，“真他妈典型。”

“哎，你一点也不懂。真的，桑德斯，你一点也不了解。我还担负了更多的责任，远远超出你的想象。听着，我只是没有按你的那种方式生活而已！”

我大声吼出了这最后一句话。我注意到，连外科医生都停下了手中的工作在望着我。我知道布罗茨基也暂时忘记了疼痛在盯着我。我感到很不自在，于是以比较缓和的口吻说道：

“对不起，但我有件非常紧急的事情要处理。等你们全弄完了，等布罗茨基的状况合适转往其他地方的时候，我肯定，救护车就会到了。总之，我很抱歉，但我没法再多等一分钟了。”

说罢，我立马摇上车窗，启动汽车，穿越树林重新上路了。

第三十一章

小路穿过树林，继续往前延伸。过了一会儿，树林终于渐渐稀疏，我瞥见远处闪烁着昏暗的晨光。接着，树林终于消失了，我进入了荒寥的城市街道。

在一处十字路口，我停下来等红灯。我静静地坐在那儿等着，视线内没有其他车辆。我环顾四周，慢慢地认出了自己前往的这块地方。我欣慰地发现，我现在离索菲的公寓很近了；没错，我敢肯定，正前方的这条街直达那儿。我还想起，公寓就在一家理发店的上面。红灯变绿后，我穿过了十字路口，沿着这条寂静的街道行驶，仔细辨认途经的一幢幢建筑。过了会，我看到前方远处有两个人影站在路边等候，便踩下了油门。

索菲和鲍里斯只穿着薄外套，在大清早的空气中好像已经冻僵了。他们跑向车，索菲俯下身，生气地叫喊道：

“你怎么花了这么长时间！是什么耽搁你了？花了这么长时间！”

还没等我回答，鲍里斯把一只手放在索菲的胳膊上，说道：

“没事的。我们会及时赶到的。没事的。”

我看了看小男孩。他拿了个大公文包，就像个医疗包，严肃中透出些许滑稽。然而他这样子却出奇的使人宽心，他好像已经成功地安抚住了母亲。

我本期望索菲坐在我身边，但她却和鲍里斯一起坐进了后座。

“真对不起，”我边说边发动车子，“这一带的路我不太熟。”

“现在谁跟他在一起？”索菲问道，声音又紧张起来。“有人在照顾他吗？”

“他和他的伙伴们在一起。他们都在陪着他。每个人。”

“看到了吧？”鲍里斯的声音再次轻轻地在身后响起。“我告诉过你的。别担心。一切都会好的。”

索菲重重地叹了口气，不过鲍里斯好像又一次成功地安抚了她。过了一会儿，我听到他说：

“他们在好好地照顾他。所以别担心。他们在好好地照顾他，是不是？”

这个问题显然是在问我的。我开始有些厌恶他自以为扮演的那个角色——而且我也不喜欢他们两个一起坐在后座，好像我是出租车司机似的——所以我决定不予回应。

接下来几分钟，我们一路沉默。又来到了十字路口，随后，我极力回忆回到林间小路上的路线。我们穿梭在空荡荡的城市街道上，突然索菲轻轻开口，声音勉强盖过引擎噪声：

“这是个警告。”

我不知道她是不是在跟我说话，正欲回头看她，这时，她继续轻柔地说道：

“鲍里斯，你在听吗？我们必须得面对了。这是个警告。你的外公，他老了。他得慢下来了。没必要试图否认。他得慢下来了。”

鲍里斯回答了些什么，但我听不到。

“我一直在考虑这个，已经有段时间了，”索菲继续说道，“我之前没和你说，是因为我知道你是多么……多么想念外公。但我考虑了一段时间。在这很久之前，早就有其他迹象了。现在发生了，我们不能再隐瞒了。他老了，必须得慢下来了。我已经有计划了，我之前从未告诉过你，但我早就在谋划了。我会跟霍夫曼先生谈谈，跟他好好谈谈你外公的将来。我都打听好了。我已经和帝国酒店的塞德梅尔先生说过了，也跟大使酒店的韦斯堡先生谈了谈。我之前从未和你说起，但我看得出你外公已经不像以前那样健壮了。所以我一直在搜寻。那是很平常的事情，某个人像你外公一样在一家酒店工作了这么长时间，到了某个阶段，安排他做一个稍稍不同的工作，很正常。在帝国酒店，有这么一个男人，比你外公还老得多，你一进大堂就可看到他。他以前是个大厨，当他老得再也干不动的时候，他们就做出了那样的决定。他穿着华丽的制服，坐在大堂一角，在摆着笔墨台的桃花心木大桌后面。塞德梅尔先生说这样效果奇好，说他价有所值。客人们，尤其是常客，走进大堂时如果没有看到那位老人坐在桌后，就会大发雷霆。这一安排让酒店独具风采。呃，我想我会和霍夫曼先生谈谈这事儿。你外公也可以干点类似的活呀。当然了，收入会减少，

但他可以继续使用那小屋，他是那么喜欢它，还有可以用餐。也许他们能够给他设一张桌子，就像帝国酒店那样。不过，你外公他可能想站着。穿着特别的制服，站在大堂的某个地方。我的意思并不是这一切应该立刻安排好，但要趁不算太晚的时候。他已经不再年轻了。这次就是一个警告。我们不能隐瞒了。装聋作哑没有任何好处。”

索菲停顿片刻。此时我已把车开回森林边缘。破晓的天空已抹上了紫色。

“别担心，”鲍里斯说，“外公会好好的。”

我能听到索菲长吁了口气。接着，她说：

“到时候，他还会有更多的时间，不会太忙，你还能跟他一起在老城区度过更多的午后时光。或者你可能想跟他去其他任何地方。但他需要一件像样的外套。这不，我就带来了。是时候给他了。我已经留得够久了。”

一阵沙沙声响起，我瞥了一眼镜子，发现索菲手上正拿着那个柔软的棕色包裹，里面装着她父亲的外套。此时，我不得不吸引她的注意力，问了问我们的路线，而她似乎第一次意识到了我的存在。她倾身向前，贴近我耳朵说道：

“对这种事情我早有心理准备。我很快就会和霍夫曼先生谈谈的。”

我低声说了些什么表示赞同，进入黑漆漆的森林时，我打开了前灯。

“别人，”索菲说道，“他们就能继续，好像世上还有大把时间似的。我可怎么也办不到。”

随后几分钟，她一直沉默无语，但我能感觉到她离我很近，而且不知何故，我发现自己竟期盼着能感受到她的手指随时抚摸我面庞的感觉。然后她轻轻地说：

“我还记得，母亲死后，生活变得多么孤寂啊。”

我又从镜中瞥了她一眼。她依旧身体前倾靠近我，但她的眼睛却盯视着车窗外不停后退的森林。

“别担心，”她柔柔地说，外套又弄出了一阵沙沙声。“我保证我们都会好的。我们三个都会好的。我保证。”

我把车停在了一个小停车场上，就在音乐厅的后面。对面就是一扇门，门上面的夜灯仍旧亮着。虽然那不是我之前进去的那扇，但我还是下了车，疾奔过去。我匆匆向后瞥了一眼，只见鲍里斯正扶他妈妈下车。他们轻快地向这栋建筑走去，他坚持用一只手护在她身后，另一只手抓着医生包，那包突兀地撞击着他的双腿。

穿过门，我们走进了一条长长的环形长廊，但几乎马上就得站立一边，给一辆两人推的餐车让路。温度好像比之前上升了好几度，此时有些闷得透不过气来，但接着我发现，附近有两位身着晚礼服的乐师在一道门处亲热地闲聊，便舒了口气，意识到我们和我之前离开古斯塔夫的地方已经不远了。

我带路沿走廊而行，走廊上挤满了越来越多的乐队成员，此时，他们大部分已经换上了演出服，但其间的气氛似乎仍然一派轻薄。较之前，他们越发隔着走廊大喊大笑，有一刻，我差点撞上了一个刚从化妆间出来的男人，那人摆弄着个大提琴，好像那是个吉他似的。接着有人说道：

“哦，是瑞德先生，是不是？我们之前见过的，您还记得我吗？”

四五个沿走廊另一头过来的男人停住脚步，朝我们观望。他们都身着盛装晚礼服，我立刻发现他们全都喝醉了。说话的男人正举着一束玫瑰花，朝我走过来，其间，他漫不经心地将那束花挥来挥去。

“前天晚上在电影院，”他说，“佩德森先生介绍我们认识的。您还好吧，先生？我朋友告诉我说，那天晚上我丢脸了，我该向您深深道歉。”

“噢，是的，”我认出了那人，说道，“您好吗？真高兴能再见到您。但不巧的是，我现在有非常紧急的……”

“我希望没有太无礼，”那醉酒的男人说道，直接走上前，脸几乎碰上了我。“我本意并无冒犯。”

听到这番话，他的同伴们纷纷窃笑起来。

“不，您一点没有冒犯，”我说道，“但现在，您必须得原谅我……”

“我们在寻找，”那醉酒男人说道，“那音乐大师呢。不，不，不是您，先生。我们自己的音乐大师。您看，我们给他送花了呢，以

表我们对他的无上敬意。您知道哪儿能找到他吗，先生？”

“很遗憾，我不知道。我……我不认为这时候，你们会在这大楼里找到布罗茨基先生。”

“不会？难道他还没到？”那醉酒男人转向他的同伴们。“我们的音乐大师还没到呢。你们怎么看？”接着他对我说：“我们要送他花呢。”他又挥了挥那束花，几片花瓣飘落到了地上。“这是市议会对他表达的钟爱和敬意。还有歉意。当然啰。我们误解他太久了。”他的同伴们又发出了阵阵窃笑声。“还没到呢。我们敬爱的音乐大师。好吧，那样的话，我们最好就和这些音乐家再多消磨会儿时间吧。或者，或许我们还是回酒吧去。我们干吗去呢，朋友们？”

我看得出，在旁观望的索菲和鲍里斯越来越不耐烦了。

“不好意思。”我低声说道，走开了。在我们身后，那帮人爆发出更多含糊的大笑声，但我决计不再回头。

终于，周围安静了下来，接着，我们看到前方走廊尽头，迎宾员们都一起挤在化妆室的外面。索菲加快脚步，却在离那儿还有一小段路时停了下来。而那些迎宾员，他们留意到了我们的靠近，迅速让出了一条通道，其中一位——他身材瘦长，留一副八字胡，我在匈牙利咖啡馆见过他——向我们走了过来。他一脸踌躇不定，起先只是对我说。

“他还挺得住，先生。他还挺得住。”然后又转向索菲，垂下眼，低声道：“他还挺得住，索菲小姐。”

索菲没有回答，只是越过迎宾员们盯着化妆间稍稍半开的门。突然，她开了口，好像是为自己的到来辩白：

“我给他带了些东西。这儿，”她举高那个包裹，“我给他带了这个。”

有人通知了化妆室里的人，另外两个原本在里面的迎宾员来到门口。索菲没动，一时间，没人知道接下来该说什么或者做什么。接着，鲍里斯大步走到我们面前，他把那黑包提到了齐胸高的半空中。

“请吧，先生们，”他说，“请让开。这边，请。”

他挥了挥手，示意迎宾员们从门边挪开。站在门口的那两个人仍然没动，一脸茫然。鲍里斯不耐烦地冲他们比划了下。“先生们！这边请。”

鲍里斯清理出了门前相当大的一块地方，回头看了看母亲。索菲往前走了几步，又停了下来。她双眼紧盯着化妆间的门——那两个迎宾员将其半开着——露出一副担忧的表情。还是没人知道接下来做什么，又是鲍里斯打破了沉默。

“妈妈，请在这儿等一下。”说着，他转身走进了化妆室，消失了。

索菲明显松了口气。她又走近几步，倾身向前，冷漠地看了看，看是否能瞧见化妆室的里面。她发现鲍里斯合上了门，便直起身子，站立等候，就像在排队等待巴士，包裹垂挂在她交错的双臂上。

过了几分钟，鲍里斯又出来了，手里仍旧举着医疗包。他小心地关上了身后的门。

“外公说，我们来了他很高兴。”他看着母亲，静静地说，“他非常高兴。”

他继续抬头直视母亲的脸色，我起先对他的这一举动甚感迷惑。接着，我意识到，他是在等待索菲给他句话，传回给古斯塔夫，果然，索菲想了想，说道：

“告诉他，我给他带了东西。一件礼物。我马上就进去给他。我……我只是在准备。”

鲍里斯再次进入化妆室消失了，索菲把大衣搁在一只胳膊上，开始抚平软软的褐色包裹上的褶皱。或许是发现了此举明显毫无意义，我突然想起了我安排的其他紧急事务，比如，我记起来了，我还得查看一下礼堂里的情况，而能办成此事的机会正分秒消逝。

“我马上就回来，”我对索菲说，“我得去处理点事情。”

她继续专注地弄着包裹，没有回答我。我正要大声地重复，接着，一想到这会引来人们对我过多的关注，我便改变了主意，悄悄地匆忙离开，去找霍夫曼了。

第三十二章

我在走廊上走了一会儿，突然看见前面一阵骚动。大约十二个人在互相推搡、喊叫、打着手势，我的第一个念头是，在这愈发紧张的气氛中，厨房员工之间爆发了一场争吵。但我发现整个人群正慢慢朝我靠拢过来，各式人等奇异地混杂其中。有些身着盛装晚礼服，而其他人——穿着厚风衣、雨衣，还有牛仔服——好像是直接从街上进来的。几位乐队成员也紧跟其后。

其中一个嗓门最大的人看上去颇为眼熟，我正要回想之前在哪儿见过他，突然，我听见他大叫道：

“布罗茨基先生，真的，我必须坚持！”

这时我认出，他就是之前在树林里遇见的那个灰发外科医生，而且我发现，没错，就在人群中央，那个正在慢慢前移、表情倔强坚决的人是布罗茨基，没错，是他。他显得十分苍白，脸上和脖子上的皮肤变成了白色，令人吃惊的是，竟都还皱了起来。

“但他说他没事的！你为何就不能让他决定？”一位身穿晚宴西装的中年男子回敬道。若干声音立即附和，却又遭到了齐声抗议回应。

这当儿，布罗茨基继续慢慢前行，无视周围的喧闹声。起先，他看起来好像被人群架在半空，但等他靠近了些，我才看到他拄着一根拐杖在独自行走。这拐杖有些特别，我不由得仔细一瞧，发现布罗茨基拄的其实是块烫衣板，垂直折起，夹在腋下。

我站在那儿看着这景象，人们一个接一个地留意到了我，都恭敬地沉默了下来，结果，人群走得越近，就越是安静。不过那个外科医生却继续喊道：

“布罗茨基先生！您的身体刚经历了一场严重的创伤。我真的必须坚持要您坐下休息！”

布罗茨基低头看着，专注地走着每一步，一时半会儿没看到我。接着，感觉到身边的人有了变化，他终于抬起了头。

“啊，瑞德，”他说，“你来啦。”

“布罗茨基先生。您现在感觉怎么样？”

“我很好。”他平静地说道。

此时人群稍稍站开了些，他更加自如地走完了与我之间剩下的那段距离。我夸奖他竟如此迅速地掌握了拄拐杖走路的本领时，他低头看了看烫衣板，仿佛这段时间来第一次想起了它的存在。

“带我来这儿的那人，”他说道，“碰巧有这个东西，在他货车的后备厢里。还不算太糟糕。很结实，我可以拄着它走得很好。唯一的麻烦，瑞德，就是有时候它会撑开。像这样。”

他摇了摇，果然，烫衣板滑落开来。他伸手一抓，没让微微张开的烫衣板撑得更大，但我看得出，即便如此小幅度的重复张合，也是件极其烦人的事情。

“我需要根细绳绑上这个，”布罗茨基有些难过地说，“或者类似那样的东西。但现在没时间了。”

我低头看了看他指的地方，不由得大吃一惊：他的左裤腿空荡荡的，在大腿下方处打成一个结。

“布罗茨基先生，”我迫使自己重新抬头，说道，“您现在的感觉一定不怎么好吧。您今晚还有力气指挥乐队吗？”

“是的，是的。我感觉好得很。我会指挥的，而且会……会非常棒的。一如我一直以来料想的那样。而且，到时她一定会看到，亲眼目睹，亲耳听到。这么些年了，我可不是个蠢蛋。这么些年来，我有这潜力，在等待时机。今晚她一定会看见我，瑞德。会非常棒的。”

“您指的是柯林斯小姐？可她会来吗？”

“她会来的，她会来。哦，是的，是的。他拼尽全力阻止她，让她害怕，但她会来的，哦，是的。我现在已经看透他的把戏了。瑞德，我去她公寓了，我走了很长一段路，很艰难，但最后这位先生路过，这位好人——”布罗茨基四下看了看人群，隐约朝某个人挥了挥手，“他路过，他有辆货车。我们去了她的公寓，我敲了敲门，敲了又敲。有个人，一个邻居，以为还像以前那样呢。您知道，我以前经常那样做，大晚上不停地敲门，他们最后叫来了警察。但我说，不，你这个笨蛋，我现在已经不再酗酒了。我出了车祸，现在清醒了，我看清了一切。我冲他，那个邻居，一个胖胖的老头，大喊道。我现在看清一切了，看穿了他一向的勾当，是的，我那样大喊了出来。接

着，她来到门前，她，她来了，她听到了我对她邻居所说的话，我透过玻璃看见了她，不知如何是好，于是我抛开了邻居，开始对她说话。她听着，但她起先并没有开门，然后我说，瞧，我出了车祸，接着，她就开门了。那个裁缝在哪儿？他去哪儿了？他应该准备好我的外套了。”布罗茨基四下看了看，一个声音从人群后面传来：

“他马上就来，布罗茨基先生。实际上，他已经来了。”

一个小个男人带着把卷尺走了出来，开始为布罗茨基量身。

“这是什么？这是什么？”布罗茨基不耐烦地低语道。接着，他对我说：“我没有西装。他们准备了一套，送到了我家，他们这么说的。谁知道呢？我出了车祸，我不知道现在西装在哪儿。他们得给我弄套新的。一件西装，一件礼服衬衫，我今晚想要最好的。她会懂得我什么意思的，那么些年了。”

“布罗茨基先生，”我说道，“您一直在跟我说起柯林斯小姐。我是不是可以这样理解：您终究还是成功地说服她今晚过来了？”

“哦，她会来的。她答应了。她不会第二次违约。她没来公墓。我等了又等，但她压根就没来。不过那不是她的错。是他，那个酒店经理，是他让她害怕了。但我告诉她，现在害怕太迟了。我们一生都在害怕，但现在，我们得勇敢起来。起先她不听。你做了什么？她不停地问。她不是你平常见到的那副样子，她快要哭了，双手捂着脸，差点哭了，甚至不在乎邻居们是否全能听见。死寂的夜里，她说着，里奥，里奥——是的，她现在那么叫我了——里奥，你的腿怎么了？有血。我说，没什么，没关系，出了场车祸，但幸好有位医生经过，现在没事了。我告诉她，更重要的是，你今晚得来。不要听信那个酒店混蛋，那个……那个跑腿的！时间已经所剩无几了。今晚她会看到我素来的心意。那么些年了，我可不是她所想的那个蠢蛋。她说她来不了，她还没准备好，此外，她说，所有那些伤口会再次裂开。我说别听那个跑腿的，那个酒店看门的，说那个太晚了。她指着我说，发生什么事了，你的腿，它在流血。我说，没关系，然后我冲她大喊道，没关系，难道你不明白吗，我得让你来！你得来！你得亲自来看看，你必须得来！然后，我看出她知道了我是多么的郑重其事。我看着她双眼，看到了那双眼睛背后的变化，恐惧消失了，某些东西被激活了，我知道，我终于赢了，而那个酒店厕所清洁工输了。我对她说，轻轻地对她说：‘那你会来喽？’她静静地点了点头，我知道我可以相信她。没有一丝怀疑，瑞德。她点了点头，我知道我能相信她，所以我转身离开了。我到了这儿，这位好人——他上哪儿了？

——他用货车带我到了这儿。不过我本来想走来的，现在我没什么事了。”

“但布罗茨基先生，”我说道，“您肯定您状况良好，可以上台吗？毕竟，您刚遭遇了一场严重的车祸……”

我本无此意，但重提这一话题又引发了新一轮的喊叫。外科医生挤到前面，抬高嗓门，盖住其他人声，挥拳击掌，以示强调：

“布罗茨基先生，我坚持！您必须休息！即便只有几分钟。”

“我很好，我很好，别管我！”布罗茨基大喊一声，走了起来。接着，他转身对着我（我刚才一直没动弹）大叫道：“要是你见到那个跑腿的，瑞德，告诉他我来了！告诉他。他以为我坚持不到现在，以为我是一坨狗屎！告诉他我来了。看他是不是中意了！”说着，他沿着走廊离开，争辩纷纷的人群尾随其后。

我继续朝相反的方向走，寻找着霍夫曼的踪影。现在已经没有几个乐队成员还站在走廊上，许多化妆室的门都关上了。我正想折返回去，更加仔细地窥视那些开着的门，这时，我突然瞥见了前方走廊上霍夫曼的身影。

他背对着我，低着头，慢慢踱着步子。虽然我离他很远，听不见他说的话，但显然他正在自顾自地排练着台词。我走近了些，他突然身体往前一倾。我以为他要摔倒了，但马上又意识到，他又在表演那奇怪的动作，我在布罗茨基化妆室的镜前见他表演过。他弯腰躬身，举起一只胳膊，胳膊肘向外突出，用拳头猛击前额。我走上前，站在他身后，咳嗽了一声。霍夫曼猛地一惊，直起身，转向了我。

“啊，瑞德先生。请别担心。我肯定布罗茨基先生随时会来的。”

“没错，霍夫曼先生。实际上，假如您刚刚是在排练向观众致歉的演说，告诉布罗茨基先生不能现身的话，我高兴地通知您不需要了。布罗茨基先生现在已经来了。”我指了指走廊那头。“他刚刚到。”

霍夫曼看上去大吃一惊，一时间完全僵住了。接着他镇静下来，说道：

“啊。好啊。真让人松了口气啊。但是，当然，我一直……一直满怀信心。”他大笑着，迅速地扫视了一下走廊那头，仿佛希望瞥见

布罗茨基。接着，他又笑了笑，说：“呃，我最好去看看他。”

“霍夫曼先生，在那之前，您若能告知我父母最新的消息，我将感激不尽。我相信他们现在已经安全抵达大楼了吧？您那个用马车送他们的主意——我相信，刚才我驾车经过大楼前面时已经听到声音了——我相信它已经达到您所希望的效果了吧？”

“您的父母？”霍夫曼再次显出迷惑的神情。接着，他将一只手放在我的肩膀上，说：“啊，是的。您的父母。让我想想。”

“霍夫曼先生，我一直拜托您和您的同事照顾好我的父母。他们两位身体都不太好……”

“当然，当然。请不必担心。只是，要顾全这么多事情，而布罗茨基先生又有些迟了，尽管您告诉我他已经来了……哈哈……”他声音越来越小，再次向走廊那头瞥了一眼。我冷冰冰地问道：

“霍夫曼先生，我父母此刻身在何处？您知道吗？”

“啊。目前这一刻，老实说，我确实不知……但我向您保证，他们由最能干的人照顾着呢。当然，我非常希望能亲自监管今晚活动的方方面面，但您得理解……哈哈。斯达特曼小姐，她应该确切地知道您父母在哪儿。我指派她密切留意您父母的情况。这倒并不是说他们与我们在一起会有照顾不周之虞。恰恰相反，我倒是得要求斯达特曼小姐小心留意，不要因为各方热情款待而累坏了他们……”

“霍夫曼先生，我理解您不知道这一刻他们在哪儿。那么，斯达特曼小姐在哪儿？”

“哦，我肯定她在这里的什么地方。瑞德先生，我们一起走一走，去看看布罗茨基先生怎么样了。我敢肯定，您很快会在路上遇见斯达特曼小姐的。她甚至可能已经在办公室里了。不管怎样，先生，”他突然摆出了个更威严的姿态，“我们站在这儿也是无济于事。”

我们一起向走廊那头走去。这当儿，霍夫曼似乎完全恢复了镇静，他微笑着说：

“现在我们可以肯定一切都将非常顺利。先生，您好像很清楚自己在做什么。布罗茨基先生也来了，现在一切都确定了。一切都会按计划进行。一个美好的夜晚将展现在我们大家面前。”

接着，他变换了一下脚步，我发现他正盯着我们前方的什么东西。顺着他的目光，我看到斯蒂芬站在走廊中间，一脸担忧。年轻人看到了我们，快速向我们走来。

“晚上好，瑞德先生。”说完，他压低声音对霍夫曼说道：“父亲，或许我们可以谈谈。”

“我们很忙，斯蒂芬。布罗茨基先生刚到。”

“是的，我听说了。但您看，父亲，是跟母亲有关的。”

“啊。你母亲。”

“她还在门厅，而我再过十五分钟就该上场了。我刚刚看到她，她正在门厅徘徊呢，我告诉她我很快就上场了，她却说：‘呃，亲爱的，我得处理些事情。我会尽力赶去的，至少赶上表演结尾，但我得先处理些事情。’她是那么说的，可她看起来没那么忙啊。真的，但是，时间一到，您和母亲就该双双落座了啊。我还有不到十五分钟就上场了。”

“是的，是的，我一会儿就到。而你母亲，我肯定，不管她在做什么，她都会尽快干完的。为什么这么担忧呢？回你的化妆室准备一下吧。”

“可母亲在门厅要干什么啊？她只是站在那儿，谁碰巧经过就跟谁聊天。很快，就会只剩她一人在那儿了。人们现在都就座了。”

“我想，她只是想在坐下来看晚会前活动活动，伸伸腿脚吧。现在，斯蒂芬，冷静下来。你得给整个晚会开个好头。我们全都指望你了。”

年轻人想了想，接着好像突然记起了我。

“您真是太好了，瑞德先生，”他笑道，“您的鼓励无比宝贵。”

“您的鼓励？”霍夫曼吃惊地看着我。

“哦，是的，”斯蒂芬说道，“瑞德先生非常慷慨。他抽时间听我练琴，还给了我多年来最大的鼓励。”

霍夫曼来回打量着我们，一丝惊疑的微笑挂在唇间。然后，他对我说：

“您花时间听斯蒂芬弹琴了？听他？”

“我确实听了。我之前曾经想告诉您，霍夫曼先生。您的儿子相当有天赋，而且，不管今晚发生其他什么事，我相信他的表演肯定会引起轰动。”

“真的，您真的这么认为？但事实是，先生，斯蒂芬呢，他……他……”霍夫曼好像变得很困惑，他轻笑一声，拍了拍他儿子的后背。“那么，斯蒂芬，你可能会一鸣惊人吧。”

“我希望如此，父亲。但母亲还在门厅。或许她在等您呐。我是说，那总是很尴尬的，一个女人在这样的场合一人独坐。或许就是那样的吧。只要您一进去坐定了，她可能就会来与您会合的。只是我现在马上就要上场了。”

“好的，斯蒂芬，我会处理的。别担心。现在你回化妆室，去准备一下。我和瑞德先生还有些事情要先处理下。”

斯蒂芬看起来仍旧不甚开心，我们离开了他，继续前行。

“我该提醒您，霍夫曼先生，”我们又沿着走廊走了一会儿，我说道，“您可能会发现，布罗茨基先生的态度变得带些敌意，对……呃，对您。”

“对我？”霍夫曼一脸惊讶。

“就是说，我刚刚看见他的时候，他正在表达对您的某种恼怒之情呢。他好像有些牢骚。我想我应该让您知道。”

霍夫曼低声说了些什么，我听不清。接着，我们继续沿着走廊慢慢转了个弯，布罗茨基的化妆室——一小群人正在门外徘徊——出现在面前。酒店经理放慢脚步，然后停了下来。

“瑞德先生，我一直在想刚才斯蒂芬说的那番话。转念一想，我觉得最好去看看我妻子。确定她没事儿。毕竟，这样一个夜晚会让人很紧张，您明白吧。”

“当然。”

“那么请您原谅。我想，先生，不知可否请您去看看布罗茨基先生是否一切安好。我自己呢，是的，真的，”他看了看手表，“就座时间到了。斯蒂芬说得很对。”

霍夫曼轻笑一声，匆匆向我们来时的方向走去了。

我等他走出视线之外，然后朝布罗茨基门口周围的人群走去。一些人好像只是好奇地站在那儿，而另一些则压低声音在热切争论。灰发外科医生在房门旁徘徊，向一个乐队成员强调着什么，恼怒地冲化妆室里面反复挥手。我吃惊地发现，那扇门是大开着的，我靠近时，之前见到的那个小个子裁缝探出头来，喊道：“布罗茨基先生想要一把剪刀。一把大剪刀！”一个人急匆匆地离开，裁缝又消失在里面。我挤过人群，看向屋内。

布罗茨基背对着门口坐着，正对着镜子审视自己。他穿着一件小礼服，裁缝正在拉扯着礼服的两个肩膀。他还穿了件礼服衬衫，但还没系领结。

“啊，瑞德，”他看到了我镜中的身影，说，“进来，进来。您要知道，我很久没有穿这样的衣服了。”

他的口气听上去比我刚才遇见他时镇静多了，这时我想起了他在公墓里对哀悼者表现出威严气势的那一刻。

“好了，布罗茨基先生，”裁缝说道，站直身子，他们两人对着镜子端详了礼服一会儿。随后，布罗茨基摇了摇头。

“不，不，还得再紧些。”他说道，“这儿，还有这儿。布料太多了。”

“稍等片刻即可，布罗茨基先生。”裁缝匆匆脱下礼服，经过我身旁时，飞快地鞠了一躬，消失在门外。

布罗茨基继续看着镜中的自己，若有所思地摸着自己的翼形衣领。接着，他拿起一把梳子，梳了梳头发——我发现他的头发已抹上了光泽明亮的定型水。

“您现在感觉如何？”我走近了些，问道。

“很好。”他慢腾腾地说道，继续打理着头发。“我现在感觉很好。”

“您的腿呢？您肯定您能带着这么严重的伤表演吗？”

“我的腿，没事儿。”他放下梳子，打量了一下效果。“不像看起来的那么糟。现在我好得很。”

布罗茨基说这话的时候，我从镜子里看到外科医生——刚才他一直在房门旁——迈步走进房间，一副忍无可忍的表情。但还没等后者开口，布罗茨基就有些狂怒地对着镜子喊道：

“我现在好得很！伤口不算什么！”

外科医生退回到门口，却继续愤怒地盯着布罗茨基的后背。

“但是布罗茨基先生，”我低声说道，“您失去了一条腿。那可绝不是件小事啊。”

“我是失去了一条腿，没错。”布罗茨基又打理起头发来，“但那是多年前的事了，瑞德。许多年前的事了。或许那时我还是个孩子。那么久远的事，我都不太记得了。那个笨蛋医生，他没有发现。我是被卷进了自行车里，但那只是条假腿，卷进去的是那条假腿。那个笨蛋甚至没发现。还称自己是个外科医生！我这一生就是那感觉，瑞德，一直没有那条腿。距现在多久了？等你到这把年纪，就开始忘记了。你甚至根本不会介意了。一个伤口，就变得像个老朋友一样。当然，它时不时会烦烦你，但我已经与它生活了这么久。一定是在我还是个孩子的时候发生的。可能是一起铁路事故吧。在乌克兰的某个地方。或许是大雪天。谁知道呢？现在没关系了。感觉就像我这一生都是如此。就一条腿。不算太坏。还过得去。那个笨蛋医生，他锯掉了我的木腿。是的，有血，它还在流血，我需要剪刀，瑞德。我已经派人去拿了。不，不，不是为了伤口。裤腿，我的意思是这只裤腿。我怎么能在指挥时让这只裤腿像这样空荡荡地甩来甩去呢？但是那个笨蛋医生，那个医院实习生，他锯掉了木腿，那我以后能怎么办呢？我得——”他用手指模仿剪刀状，比划着，在膝盖正上方的布料处横剪一刀，“我得做点什么。使它尽量漂亮些。那个笨蛋，他不只毁了我的木腿，还擦伤了我的残肢。我有好多年不曾这样流血了。真是笨蛋，表情还那么严肃。他以为自己是个非常重要的人呢，锯掉了我的木腿，伤到了我的残肢尾端。难怪一直流血。到处都是血。但我多年前就没这条腿了。很久以前了，那就是我现在的感觉。我用了一生的时间去适应它。但现在，那个笨蛋用了锯子，害得它又流血了。”他低头看了看，用鞋子把什么东西抹到了地板上。“我派人去拿剪刀了。我得表现出最佳状态，瑞德。我不是个贪慕虚荣的人。我这样做不是因为虚荣。但一个人在这种时候必须看起来体面才行。她今晚看到我，在我们的余生，她将会牢记今晚。还有这个乐队，是个好乐队。来，我给你看看。”他伸手向前，对着灯光，举起一根指挥棒。“是根好指挥棒。有种特别的感觉，你能分辨的。它使得一切与众不同，你知道的。对我来说，对我来说，时机一直很重要。时机必须恰到好处。”他盯着指挥棒。“过了这么久，但我不怕。我今晚展示给他们看的。我绝不妥协。我会一直拿着它的。像你说的，瑞

德。马克斯·萨特勒。但那个家伙，他真是个白痴！那个笨蛋！那条医院的看门狗！”

这最后几句话，布罗茨基是略带享受地冲着镜子大喊出来的，我看到那位外科医生——刚才他一直从门外观望着，满脸震惊的表情——窘迫地退出了人们的视线。

外科医生终于走了，布罗茨基第一次表现出了紧张。他闭上双眼，斜倚在椅子一侧，喘着粗气。可是，过了一会儿，一个男人冲进房间，递上一把剪刀。

“啊，终于拿来了。”布罗茨基接过剪刀。随后，等那人一走，他便把剪刀放在镜子前的架子上，想站起来。他扶着椅子背，想把自己撑起来，然后伸出一只手，去够镜子旁靠墙放置的烫衣板。我上前一步想去帮他，但他却在无人辅助下惊人灵敏地够到了烫衣板，往胳膊下面一夹。

“您看，”他说道，忧伤地低头看着空荡荡的裤腿。“我得在这儿动些手脚。”

“想让我叫回裁缝吗？”

“不，不。那家伙，他可不知道该怎么做。我自己来。”

布罗茨基继续低头看着空荡荡的裤腿。我注视着他，突然想起还有其他各种急事等待我去处理，尤其是我得回到索菲和鲍里斯那里，探询古斯塔夫的最新情况。甚至还有这种可能：关于古斯塔夫的某个关键决定，还要拖到等我回去了才能做出。我咳嗽了一声，说道：

“如果您不介意，布罗茨基先生，我得离开了。”

布罗茨基仍旧低头看着裤腿。“今晚一定是个美妙的夜晚，瑞德。”他轻声说道，“她会看到的。她最后会看到的。”

第三十三章

古斯塔夫所在的化妆室外面，景象与我离开之时并无太大变化。迎宾员们或许移步到了离门口更远的地方，这会儿聚在走廊的另一头围成了一圈，小声开着会。然而，索菲还站在差不多我之前看到的位置，盯着微微开着的大门，包裹折合着挂在胳膊上。其中一个迎宾员发现我靠近，便向我走过来，压低声音道：

“他还坚持得住，先生。不过约瑟夫已经去请医生了。我们决定不能再耽搁了。”

我点了点头，接着向索菲投去一瞥，轻声问道：“她还没进去？”

“还没有，先生。但我肯定索菲小姐很快就会进去的。”

我们两个人注视了她一会儿。

“那鲍里斯呢？”我问道。

“哦，他已经进去过好几次了，先生。”

“好几次了？”

“哦，没错。刚刚他又进去了。”

我又点了点头，随后走向索菲。她没发觉我回来了，我轻碰了下她的肩膀，她吓了一跳。随即她大笑道：

“他在里面呢。爸爸。”

“嗯。”

她稍稍调整了一下姿势，倾身一侧，想透过门口看得更清楚些。

“你不打算给他外套了吗？”我问道。

索菲低头看了看外套，说道：“哦，是的。对，没错。我正打算给他呢……”她的声音逐渐小了下去，身子又偏向了一侧。随后，她喊道：

“鲍里斯？鲍里斯！你出来一下。”

过了一会儿，鲍里斯走了出来，面色镇定，小心地关上了身后的门。

“怎么样？”索菲询问道。

鲍里斯匆匆瞥了我一眼，然后转向他的母亲，说道：

“外公说他觉得很抱歉。他说要转告他很抱歉。”

“就这些？他总共就说了这些？”

有那么一会儿，小男孩的脸上掠过了一丝犹豫。随后他安慰地说道：“我再进去。他还会再说些什么的。”

“可是他刚刚跟你说的就只有这些？就只是说他很抱歉？”

“别担心，我会再进去。”

“等一下。”索菲开始撕下大衣外面的包装。“把这个拿去给你外公。给他，看看大小是不是合适。告诉他，我随时可以改的。”

她任由撕下的包装落在地上，高举起一件深褐色的外套。鲍里斯毫无怨言地接了过去，重新回到了化妆间。也许是因为这件外套的缘故——它被笨重地放置在小男孩的臂弯中——鲍里斯只半合上了身后的门，低语声随即传到了走廊里。索菲没有挪动地方，但我看得出她正紧张地捕捉一言半语。我们身后，迎宾员们依旧恭敬地与我们保持一段距离，但此刻他们也分明在焦急地注视着房门。

过了好一会儿，鲍里斯又一次走了出来。

“外公说谢谢你，”他对索菲说道，“他现在很开心。他说他非常高兴。”

“他就说了这些？”

“他说他很开心。他以前并不舒服，但现在有了大衣，他说那对他意义非凡。”鲍里斯朝身后望了一眼，然后转回头看着他母亲。

“他说收到这件大衣他非常开心。”

“他就说了这些？没有……没有说是不是合身？没有说他是不是喜欢那颜色？”

由于我此时只顾着盯着索菲看，并没有清楚地看到鲍里斯接下来做了什么。我的感觉是，他没做什么异常的举动，只是停顿了一会儿，思索着如何回答母亲的询问，但索菲突然喊道：

“你为什么要那么做？”

小男孩一脸困惑地盯着他母亲。

“你为什么要那么做？你知道我什么意思。像这样！就像这样！”她抓住鲍里斯的肩膀，开始猛摇起来。“就像他外公！”她转向我，说道，“他在模仿！”接着，她又朝着正在一旁警觉观望的迎宾员们喊道：“他外公！就是从他身上遗传的。你们看到他肩膀那样了吗？那么自以为是，那么自鸣得意。你们都看见了吧？真像他的外公啊！”她怒视着鲍里斯，继续猛烈地摇晃着。“哦，所以，你就以为你很了不起了，是不是？是不是？”

鲍里斯挣脱开来，踉跄着向后退了几步。

“你看没看见？”索菲问我道，“他总是那样。就像他外公。”

鲍里斯又走远几步，随后蹲下身，从地上捡起那个他随身携带的黑色医疗包，把它抱起护在胸前。我以为他要痛哭流涕了，然而最后他还是控制住了自己。

“别担心……”他开口道，然后又停了下来，把胸前的黑包略微举高了一些。“不用担心。我会……我会……”他放弃了，环顾四周。隔壁房间的门离他很近，小男孩快速转身，钻进去，消失了，砰的一声关上了身后的门。

“你疯了么？”我对索菲说道，“他已经够心烦的了。”

索菲继续沉默了一会儿，随后叹了口气，走到了鲍里斯消失的那扇门。她敲了敲门，走了进去。

我听到鲍里斯说了些什么，虽然索菲没有关门，但我还是听不清他的话。

“对不起，”我听到索菲说，“我不是有意的。”

鲍里斯又说了些什么，我听不清。

“不，不，没关系，”索菲轻声说，“你做得很好了。”片刻停顿后，她又继续说道：“我现在得去跟你外公谈谈。我得走了。”

鲍里斯又说了些什么。

“是的，好吧，”索菲说，“我会让他进来和你一起等着。”

这次，小男孩说了很长一段话。

“不，他不会的。”没过一会儿，索菲就打断了他的话。“他会对你很好的。不，我保证。他一定会的。我会让他进来。但我现在得去跟你外公谈谈了。在医生来之前。”

索菲走出屋子，关上了门。接着，她走近我，非常小声地说道：

“请进去跟他一起等等吧。他很烦乱。我得去跟爸爸谈谈。”之后，还没等我行动， she 就把一只手放在我的胳膊上，说道：“请再对 he 和蔼起来吧。就像以前那样。他是多么怀念从前啊。”

“我很抱歉，我不知道你指的是什么。假如他很烦乱的话，那是因为你……”

“求求你了，”索菲说道，“也许都是因为我的错，才发生了这一切，但请到此为止吧，求你进去陪 he 坐坐吧。”

“我当然会进去陪 he，”我冷冷地说道，“有何不可呢？你最好还是去你父亲那儿吧。刚才的话 he 可能全都听到了。”

我走进鲍里斯隐入的那个房间，惊讶地发现它跟我在走廊里看到的其他化妆室都不一样。事实上，它更像一间教室，里面整齐地摆放着一排排小桌椅，前边还有一块大黑板。这里很宽敞，灯光昏暗，到处都是厚重的黑影。鲍里斯坐在靠近后面的一张桌子旁，我进去的时候，他匆匆抬眼瞥了我一下。我一言未发，环视四周。

黑板上有一团潦草的字迹，我隐约觉得是鲍里斯干的。随后，我继续在空荡荡的桌旁走动，打量着钉在墙上的表格和地图，这时男孩重重地叹了一口气。我瞥了他一眼，发现他把那个黑包放在了膝盖上，正费力地从里面掏什么东西。最终，他拿出了一本巨大的书，放在面前的桌子上。

我转过身，继续在屋子里转悠。当我再次看他的时候，他正在飞快地浏览书页，脸上露出崇敬的神情。我知道他又在看那本杂务手册了。我一点也不觉恼怒，回头看着一张警告溶剂滥用危害的海报。接着，鲍里斯在我身后说道：

“我真的很喜欢这本书。里面什么都有。”

他说这些话时仿佛是在自言自语，但此时我已走到离 he 坐着的位置很远的地方，他就不得不抬高了嗓门，显得挺不自然。我不打算回答 he，继续在屋子里面转悠着。

过了一会儿，鲍里斯再次重重地叹了口气。

“妈妈有时候总是这么焦虑。”他说道。

我还是觉得他对我讲话的口气不甚得体，所以我没回答。况且，当我最终转向他的时候，他假装自己正在专心看书。我又走进屋子的另一个角落，发现墙上钉着一大张纸，上面写着“失物招领”。上边有一长串用各种笔迹书写的条目，一栏日期，一栏丢失物品，一栏物主姓名。不知何故，我发现这单子非常有趣，又继续细细地研究了一会儿。近顶端的条目好像是匆忙中写上去的——一支钢笔，一枚棋子，一个钱包。接着，从下半张开始，条目开始越来越滑稽了。有人号称自己丢了“三百万美元”。还有一个条目竟然是“成吉思汗”丢了“亚洲大陆”。

“我真的很喜欢这本书，”鲍里斯在我身后说道，“它告诉你了所有事情。”

突然间，我一下子失去了耐心，快步走向他，一掌重重地拍在他面前的桌子上。

“瞧，你为什么老是读这个？”我质问道，“你母亲怎么跟你说的？她告诉你这是个很棒的礼物，我猜。其实，不是。她是那样告诉你的？说这是个极棒的礼物？说我精心为你选的？看看吧！看看吧！”我试图把被他紧紧抓住的那本书扯过来，但他死拽着，两只胳膊放在上面护着。“这不过是一本没用的、别人想扔掉的手册。你以为这样的书，这种东西，能教你所有的事？”

我仍试图把书从他身下拉出来，但鲍里斯倾身趴到桌子上，用身体保护着那本书。同时，他一直保持着令人不安的沉默。我又去扯，决心要把那东西从他身边永远地拿走。

“听着，这是个没用的礼物。一丁点儿用都没有。没有思想，没有感情，里面什么都没有。事后回想，就是每页上面写满了字，而你却以为这是我给你的绝棒礼物！给我，给我！”

也许是害怕书会被撕破，鲍里斯突然抬起双臂，我发现自己提着一页封皮，把这本书拎了起来。他还是没吭声，我觉得我的突然爆发有些愚蠢。我看了看那本在我手中悬空垂着的书，接着把它扔进了房间远处的一角。书碰到一张桌子上，落在了暗影中。我马上觉得平静了很多，深吸了口气。接着，我再看他的时候，鲍里斯僵硬地坐着，目光盯着书掉落的地方。他随后站起身，急着想找回它。可他还没走到一半，索菲急切的喊声便从走廊里面传来：

“鲍里斯，过来一下。就来一会儿。”

鲍里斯犹豫了一阵，又看了一眼书掉落的地方，接着出了房间。

“鲍里斯，”我听见索菲在外面说道，“去问问外公他现在感觉怎么样。再问问他外套需不需要改动。底下的扣子可能有问题。如果他经常站在桥上，风一吹它就会飘来飘去。去问一下他，但别待在里面谈太久。就问问他，然后直接出来。”

我回到走廊时，鲍里斯已消失在古斯塔夫的化妆室里，而映入我眼帘的是我所熟悉的景象：索菲紧张地站在那儿，眼睛盯着门；后面不远处，迎宾员们一脸焦虑地观望着。然而，索菲的脸上掠过一丝绝望，这表情是我之前没有注意到的。我心里突然对她涌起一阵怜惜之情。我走向她，用一只胳膊挽着她的肩膀。

“这对我们所有人来说都是个艰难的时刻，”我轻柔地说道，“非常艰难的时刻。”

我将她拉近，但她突然甩开我，继续盯着门口。她的反抗让我大吃一惊，我生气地对她说：

“瞧，这种时候我们所有人都应该互相支持。”

索菲没有回答，这时鲍里斯再次走出了化妆室。

“外公说，外套正合他意，而且因为是妈妈送给他的，所以他尤其喜欢。”

索菲恼怒地喊了一声：“但他到底需不需要我把衣服改一下？他为什么就是不告诉我？医生马上就来了。”

“他说……他说他很喜欢这件外套。非常喜欢。”

“问问他底下的扣子。如果他还继续要迎风站在桥上，就得适当地往上挪挪。”

鲍里斯想了想，点了点头，又回到了化妆室里。

“你瞧，”我对索菲说道，“你好像不明白我现在压力有多大。你没意识到我很快就该上台了吗？我得回答事关这个社会未来走向的复杂问题。还会有块电子记分板。你知道这意味着什么吗？你关心的就只有那些扣子等等之类的事。你就没意识到我现在承受的压力吗？”

索菲转向我，一脸沮丧，似乎想要跟我说些什么，但就在这时鲍里斯又出现了。这次，鲍里斯表情凝重地看着他妈妈的脸，却什么也没说。

“怎么样，他说什么了？”索菲问道。

“他说他很喜欢这件外套。他说，那让他想起了妈妈您小时候穿的那件外套。差不多的颜色。他说那上面曾有一头熊的图案。妈妈您过去穿过的外套。”

“我到底需不需要改衣服？！他为什么不直接回答呢？医生马上就要到了！”

“你好像不明白，”我打断了她的话，“外面那些人都指望着我呢。会有块记分板，所有那些东西。他们想让我在答完每个问题之后就到舞台边鞠躬。我的压力很大啊！你好像不……”

我停了下来，意识到古斯塔夫正在喊着什么。鲍里斯立即转身进了化妆室，我和索菲站在那里等他出来，感觉时间过了好久。终于，小男孩又走了出来，却没有看我们两人，而是大步走了过去，停在了迎宾员们的面前。

“先生们，请。”他做了个引领的动作。“外公请你们大家都进去。他现在想跟大家在一起。”

鲍里斯开始在前面带路，迎宾员们只犹豫了片刻，随后便紧紧跟上。他们列队走过我们面前，其中几位还向索菲咕哝着说了一两句尴尬的话。

最后一位迎宾员走进后，我向房间里窥探，却仍然看不到古斯塔夫，因为迎宾员们都挤在了门口。房中立刻传出三四个人的讲话声，我正想靠近点，这时索菲突然从我身边擦过，进了化妆室。屋内一阵骚动，讲话声戛然而止。

我大步走到门口。迎宾员们已让出一条过道让索菲通过，这下我看清楚了，古斯塔夫躺在垫子上，那件褐色外套盖住他的上半身，外套下边是那条灰色毛毯，我对那条毛毯还有印象。没有枕头，很明显，他连抬起头的力气都没有了，但此时，他看着他的女儿，眼角挂着一丝轻柔的微笑。

索菲停在了距古斯塔夫所躺之处两三步远的地方。她背对着我，所以我无法看到她的表情，但她好像在低头望着他。一阵沉默之后，

索菲说道：

“您还记得您来学校的那天吗？您给我送泳具的那次？我落在家里了，一整个早上都很焦急，想着我该怎么办。后来，您拿着那个蓝色的运动包来了，有细绳背带的那个。您直接进了教室。您还记得么，爸爸？”

“有了这件外套，我就会很暖和了，”古斯塔夫说道，“这正是我一直以来想要的。”

“当时，您只有半个小时的休息时间，所以您从酒店一路跑来。您带着那个蓝色运动包走进了教室。”

“我一直为你骄傲。”

“那天早上，我一直都在担心，不知道自己该怎么办。”

“这件外套很不错。瞧这衣领。再看看这一圈，全是真皮的呢。”

“抱歉，”我身边的一个声音说，我转身发现一个戴着眼镜、背了个医用包的年轻人正想挤过去，紧随其后的是另一个迎宾员，我在匈牙利咖啡厅见过他。他们两人进到房间，那位年轻医生急忙来到古斯塔夫旁边跪了下来，开始检查。

索菲默默地盯着医生。随后，好像觉得现在该轮到其他人让父亲留心了，她向后退了几步。鲍里斯走到她身边，一时间，他们两人几乎紧贴着对方站立着，但索菲似乎没有注意到小男孩，而是继续盯视着医生弓起的背部。

就在这时，我突然又想起，演出之前我还有许多事情要做。我又想到，既然医生已经到了，这正是我溜走的大好时机。我悄悄地退回到走廊里，正打算离开去找霍夫曼，这时听到身后有动静，感觉有人粗暴地抓住了我的胳膊。

“你要去哪儿？”索菲气愤地小声问道。

“对不起，但你显然不明白。我现在还有很多事情要做。会有电子记分板什么的。还有非常多的事情指望着我呢。”我一边说，一边试图将胳膊从她紧握的手中挣脱出来。

“那鲍里斯呢？他需要你在这儿。我们俩都需要你。”

“你听着，你显然不懂！我的父母，你不懂么？我的父母随时会到！我还有一大堆事情要做！你不知道，你显然根本就不懂！”我终于挣脱了她。“听着，我会回来的，”我匆匆离开，一边还回过头安慰她，“我会尽快赶回来的。”

第三十四章

我沿着走廊继续疾步而行，突然发觉有几个人靠着墙站成一排。一眼望过去，我看到他们都穿着厨房工装，在等待轮到自己爬进一个黑色小壁橱。我心下越发奇怪，于是放慢脚步，最后转身朝他们走了过去。

我这会儿看清了，那壁橱又高又窄，像个杂物橱，钉在墙上，离地面约有半米。我碎步上前，从排队人的举止判断，那壁橱里应该有个小便器，或者是一个喷泉式饮水器。但等我靠近才看到，一个男人站在台阶顶端，弯腰向前，屁股撅得老高，好像在壁橱里翻找什么。与此同时，排队的人打着手势，不耐烦地叫喊着，让他快点结束换下一个。终于，那男人从壁橱里出来，小心地看着身后最高一级台阶，这时，队伍中有人发出一声惊呼，朝我指了指。所有人扭过头来，大家纷纷给我让路，队伍自动解散了。那个刚从壁橱中出来的人迅速下来，向我鞠了个躬，然后用手指向壁橱，做了个“请”的动作。

“谢谢，”我说，“但是好像别人都在排队等候啊。”

一阵抗议声骤然响起，几只手几乎将我推上了短短的台阶。

窄窄的壁橱门已自动关上，我推开它——它朝里面打开，而我站在最高一级台阶上，险些因此失去平衡——惊奇地发现，我正站在一处制高点上俯视礼堂。壁橱的整个后部都没有了，我觉得，假若我足够大胆，只要稍稍探出身子伸长手臂，便可碰到音乐厅的天花板。那景象当然壮观，但这整个布置让我觉得既愚蠢又危险。那壁橱居然是向前倾斜的，定然会怂恿粗心的观众向其边缘处趑趄而去。同时，在齐腰高度，只系有一根细绳，防止观者一头栽到观众席中。我看不出这壁橱的存在有何显见的理由，除非它或许是某个系统的一部分，可供大厅上空悬挂像旗子之类的东西。

我小心地移动着双脚，直到完全站在了壁橱里，然后紧紧抓着门框，向下望去。

大概四分之三的坐席都已经满了，但是，灯光依旧明亮，人们在聊着天或者相互打着招呼。一些人冲着远排的人挥手，另一些人则挤在过道上谈笑。这当儿，更多的人从两扇主大门入内。乐池里一排排闪亮的乐谱架泛着光芒，舞台上的帷幕已经拉开，一架开着琴盖的三

角钢琴孤零零地在台上等候着。当我看着眼皮底下的这件乐器时——我马上就要用它来完成这场最为重要的演奏——我突然意识到，这可能就是我对演出条件所能做的最近距离的检查了，一想到这个，我对自己到这座城市以来的整个时间安排再次感到失望。

接着，我看到斯蒂芬·霍夫曼从侧厢走上了舞台。没有报幕，甚至连灯光都没有丝毫暗下来。更有甚者，斯蒂芬的举止毫无喜庆之感。他神情专注，快速走到钢琴边，连眼都没朝观众瞥一下。所以，也难怪，音乐厅里大部分人只是稍稍好奇了一下，便继续谈天说地了。当然，他一弹奏起《玻璃激情》那激情四溢的开篇时，人们有些许的惊讶，但即便那样，大部分人马上便断定这位年轻人只是在试琴或是在调试扩音系统。接着，仅几个小节之后，好像有什么东西吸引了斯蒂芬的注意，他的演奏完全失去了激情，就仿佛有人突然拔了插头。他的目光跟随着什么东西在人群中移动，到了最后，他干脆撇开了头，不看钢琴，但手却仍在弹奏。那时我才看到，他在盯视着两个身影离开观众席，我再向前倾了倾身子，恰好看到霍夫曼和妻子走出礼堂，消失在了视线中。

斯蒂芬全然停止了弹奏，坐在高脚凳上，直直转过身来，盯着他父母的背影。这一举止好像消除了人们仅剩的疑虑：斯蒂芬是在调音试调。的确，一时间，他好像是在等待大厅另一侧的技师给他信号，因此，当他从琴凳上站起来并大步走下舞台时，并没有人留意他。

直到走进侧厢，他才任由愤怒吞噬了他。而另一方面，意识到自己只弹奏了几个小节便弃甲而去，一时间他竟有种恍若隔世之感，还没来得及再细想，他便匆匆走下木头台阶，穿过后台的一道道门。

他出现在了走廊上，到处都是忙碌奔跑的舞台工作人员和餐饮员。斯蒂芬朝大厅走去，他希望在那儿能找到他父母，但还没等他走远，便发现自己的父亲正心事重重地独自向他走来。这位酒店经理并没有发现斯蒂芬，于是他们俩差点相撞。接着他停了下来，吃惊地盯着儿子。

“怎么？你未在演奏？”

“父亲，你和母亲为何那样离开？母亲现在在哪儿？她觉得不舒服吗？”

“你母亲。”霍夫曼沉重地叹了口气，“你母亲觉着，她这时离开是对的。当然，我送了送她，而且……呃，我说实话吧，斯蒂芬。这样说吧。我往往同意她的观点。我不排斥那一想法。你那样看我，

斯蒂芬。是的，我知道，我让你失望了。我答应过你，你会有这一机会的，这一在全城面前、在我们的亲朋好友面前弹奏的机会和平台。是的，是的，我答应过你。或许是你自己向我要求的，或许是在我心烦意乱的时候，你恰好逮住了我，谁知道是怎么回事呢？这个不重要。重要的是，我同意了，我答应了，我不想再去说它了，唉，好啦，是我的错。不过，斯蒂芬，你得尽量理解我们做父母的心情。多么难过啊，亲眼目睹……”

“我要跟母亲谈谈。”斯蒂芬说道，抬步想要走开。刹那间，霍夫曼显得很惊恐，但接着他非常粗暴地抓住儿子的胳膊，同时不自然地笑了笑。

“你不能那么做，斯蒂芬。我的意思是，你看，你母亲去了洗手间。哈哈。不管怎么说，我觉得你得让她把自己的事情办完。但斯蒂芬，你都做了什么呢？你现在应该在弹奏啊。啊，但说不定这样反而最好呢。几个难堪的问题而已，不过那样罢了。”

“父亲，我正要回去弹奏呢。请您入座。还有，请劝母亲回来吧。”

“斯蒂芬啊斯蒂芬。”霍夫曼摇了摇头，将一只手搭在儿子肩上，“我想让你知道，我和你母亲都非常看重你。我们都非常为你骄傲啊。但你这想法，你这梦寐一生的想法。我是说……我是说你的音乐之梦。我，还有你母亲，我们都不忍心告诉你。自然地，我们是想让你怀抱梦想。但这个。这——”他指了指礼堂的方向，“这一切统统是个可怕的错误。我们绝不该让事情发展到这等地步。你看，斯蒂芬，你的演奏的确非常引人入胜。自成一体，极其纯熟。一直以来，我们都很喜欢听你在家里弹奏。但音乐，严肃音乐，今晚这种水平的音乐……那可是另外一回事哟。不，不，别打断我，我想跟你说些事情，一些我早就应该告诉你的事情。你看，这是市音乐厅。听众们，音乐会的听众们，他们可不像是坐在客厅里倾心聆听你演奏的亲朋好友。他们是正儿八经的音乐会听众，他们听惯了专业水准的演奏。斯蒂芬，我该怎么说呢？”

“父亲，”斯蒂芬打断道，“您不知道。我已经刻苦练习了。我所要弹奏的曲子，尽管是匆忙之选，然而，我已经用功练习了，您只要来，就会看到……”

“斯蒂芬啊斯蒂芬……”霍夫曼再次摇了摇头。“若这只是用功练习的问题就好了。若只是那样就好了。但我们中的一些人，不是天

生奇才。我们没有那种天分，我们得承认，得妥协。偏偏这时候得跟你说这些，太糟糕了，怂恿了你这么久。希望你能原谅我们，你母亲，还有我，我们心软了这么久。但我们看得出，那给你带来了多大的欢乐，我们不忍心哪。但那不是借口，我知道。这太糟了，此时此刻，我的心在为你流血啊，真的。我希望能原谅我们。让你到今天这步境地，我们犯了个大错。让你上台，面对整个城市的人。我，还有你母亲，我们太爱你了，看不下去呀。眼睁睁地看着我们亲爱的儿子成了大家的笑柄……我们受不了啊。好了，我都说出来了，都跟你和盘托出了。很残忍呐，但我终于告诉你了。我本以为我可以做到，可以安坐在一片傻笑和窃笑之中。但那一刻真的来临时，你母亲却发现她做不到，我也做不到。怎么了？你为什么不听我说？你不知道这让我有多痛苦吗？这么坦白相告不容易啊，即便是对自己的儿子……”

“父亲，求您了，我求您。就来听听吧，哪怕只是几分钟，然后您自己决定要不要继续。还有母亲。求您了，求您了，劝劝母亲吧。到时候你们就知道了，你们一定会……”

“斯蒂芬，你该回到台上去了。你的名字都印在了节目单上。你已经现身过一次。你至少总得有始有终吧。让大家看到你至少已尽力了。好了，那就是我的忠告。千万别在意他们，别管他们的窃笑。即便他们开怀大笑，就好像舞台上演的是一出滑稽哑剧，而非一支庄严深邃的乐曲，即便是那样，你也要记住，至少你母亲跟父亲为你勇敢坚持到底而骄傲啊。是的，你现在得上台去了，要坚持到底啊，斯蒂芬。不过你得原谅我们，我们只是太爱你了，所以无法亲眼目睹你的演奏。其实，斯蒂芬，我觉得这样做会伤透你母亲的心。现在，你得去了，没多少时间了。去吧，去吧，快去吧。”

霍夫曼转过身，一只手扶着额头，好像感到头昏脑涨，天旋地转，他这样走了几步，然后突然挺直了身子，又回头看了看儿子。

“斯蒂芬，”他严厉地说，“你该回到舞台上去了。”

斯蒂芬继续盯了他父亲一会儿，终于认识到自己的请求已然无望，于是转身沿走廊走去。

斯蒂芬又穿过了一连串后台门，心中五味杂陈。他没能劝服父母回到座位上，自然沮丧无比。此外，他能感觉到内心深处那缠人的恐惧苏醒了——即，他父亲所言属实，他确是一场巨大欺骗的受害者。

不过，他一走近侧厢，自信心便很快又回来了，同时，随之而来的是那咄咄逼人的冲动，他要看看自己究竟有多大能耐。

斯蒂芬回到了舞台上，发现灯光稍暗了些。但是，礼堂远没有全黑，而且，许多宾客仍站在那里。他还能看见，在大厅各个角落，当有人弓身走过一排就座时，一波波的人群便站立起来。年轻人在钢琴前坐定，而周围的噪音只稍稍有所降低，在他等待情绪稳定之时，喧闹声依旧持续。忽然，一如之前，他冷峻的双手准确无误地落下，奏起了《玻璃激情》的开篇，唤起了一种介乎震惊与兴奋之间的情愫。

短短的序曲行进到一半时，观众们明显安静了许多。他弹奏完第一乐章后，整个礼堂已经完全安静下来。站在过道上聊天的人仍旧站着，但好像全都僵住了，双眼紧盯着舞台。那些已经落座的人专注地看着，听着。一小群人聚在一个入口处，最后一批缓慢入场的人停在了半路上。斯蒂芬开始弹奏第二乐章时，技师立即关掉了观众席的照明灯，我再也看不清观众席了。但毫无疑问，人们受到的震撼将继续笼罩大厅。无可否认，有此反应的一大原因是，观众们吃惊地发现，正如他们目睹的那般，他们自己的年轻一代中竟有人能达到如此高的水准。除却专业技巧，斯蒂芬的弹奏中还有着某种奇谲的力度，让人无法忽视。此外，我感觉，在场的许多人对今晚这一意外的开场吃惊之余，还将其视为一种预兆。假如这只是前奏的话，那余下的节目将会如何呢？今晚究竟会不会是本市的一个转折点呢？在我下方这许许多多吃惊的面孔背后，这些好像都是不言而喻的疑问。

斯蒂芬用一个怅惘又略具反讽的尾音圆满地结束了他的演奏。完毕后，众人沉默了一两秒钟，然后大厅里爆发出热烈的掌声，年轻人一跃而起，向大家致谢。他显然很高兴，尽管父母没能到场见证这一胜利让他倍感沮丧，但他绝不允许这份情绪表现在脸上。在持续的掌声中，他向观众鞠了几个躬，然后便匆匆退场，或许是突然想到自己的表演仅仅是整台晚会小小的一部分吧。

热烈的掌声噼里啪啦地持续了一会儿，然后慢慢平息，变成了兴奋的低语声。这时，人们还没来得及彼此交换感想，一个满头银发、表情严肃的人就从侧厢里走了出来。他慢慢地、自命不凡地朝前方的演讲台走去，此时我认出，他就是我到达那一晚主持表彰布罗茨基晚宴的那个人。

礼堂里很快便静了下来，但足足有三十秒钟，这位满脸严肃的人一言未发，只是略带厌恶地看着观众们。最后，他终于不耐烦地吸了口气，说：

“我虽然希望你们今晚都过得很开心，但我仍得提醒你们，我们在这儿相聚，并不是来看歌舞表演的。非常重要的问题还在后面等着我们呢。可别搞错了。事关我们未来的问题，事关我们整个城市认同的问题。”

随后的几分钟时间里，满脸严肃的男子继续迂腐地反复重申着这一点，偶尔停顿片刻，怒目皱眉，审视整个大厅。我渐渐失去了兴趣，想起后面排队的人还等着用这个壁橱，于是决定让其他人上来看吧。但是，正当我想退出那狭窄的空间时，我发现那满脸严肃的人已转到了一个新话题上——其实，他此刻正在介绍某人登台亮相。

这位被引介的人士，似乎不仅是“整个城市图书馆系统的柱石”，而且拥有“一叶知秋”的本领。那满脸严肃的男子最后一次鄙夷地盯视着观众，然后咕哝出了一个人的名字，昂首阔步地走开了。礼堂爆发出雷鸣般的掌声，这掌声显然是送给那满脸严肃的男子，而非他所介绍的那个人的。确实，后者大概又过了一分钟才出现，而他一亮相，人们只是犹豫犹豫地向他致意。

那男子个头小小，干净利落，秃着头，留着一副八字须。他带了个文件夹上台，将它放在了讲台上。接着，他取出几页纸，开始摆弄起来，其间从未抬头向观众们致意。大厅内掀起一阵不安。我再次好奇起来，心想排队的人不会介意再多等会儿，于是重新小心翼翼地趴在壁橱近边缘处。

秃头男子终于说话了，由于嘴巴靠话筒太近，他的声音嗡嗡颤动着。

“今晚，我想向大家分别展示我三个时期的代表作品。这些诗歌，我大多已在阿黛尔咖啡馆朗诵过，你们会觉得很熟悉，但我相信，你们一定不会反对我在这一庄严场合再诵读一遍。还有，现在我告诉各位，到结束时会有个小小的惊喜。我相信它会给你们带来不小的欢乐。”

接着，他继续翻弄纸张，这时人群中传来窃窃私语声。秃头男子终于下定了决心，对着麦克风大声地咳嗽了几声，众人又安静了下来。

好几首诗都押韵，而且相对较短。有关于市公园鱼儿的诗，暴风雪的诗，回忆童年破窗的诗——全都以奇怪的、高亢咒符似的音调被朗诵出来。我的注意力游离了几分钟，接着，我发现正下方某处一些观众开始交谈了起来，说话声清晰可辨。

此刻，那些声音还比较低沉，然而，当我用心去听时，它们好像越来越放开了胆。最终——当秃头男子在朗诵一首有关他母亲这些年所养的几只猫咪的长诗时——那噪音渐渐传入了我耳中，变成了大型聚会中人们多少带着正常音调的声音。我克服了小心翼翼之感，挪到了壁橱的最边缘，双手紧紧抓着木框，向下望去。

那谈话声的确是由坐在我正下方的一群人发出的，但其中涉及的人数比我料想的要少些。有七八个人已然决定，不再留心聆听诗歌吟诵，这会儿正开心地互相攀谈着，其中有几位为了说话已完全转过身去。我正欲细看一下这群人，突然瞥见柯林斯小姐就坐在后面几排的地方。

她身着第一次晚宴上穿的那件精致黑色晚礼服，披肩也仍旧围在肩上。她正同情地看着那秃头男子，头微微歪向一边，一根手指抵着下巴。我又凝望了她一会儿，但她神情一片宁静安详。

我将视线转回到正下方那吵闹的人群上，发现这会儿他们正在传发扑克牌。这时我才意识到，这群人中的核心人物包括了我第一天晚上在电影院遇见的那帮醉汉，而且就在刚才，我还在走廊上撞见过他们。

纸牌游戏越玩越喧闹，他们发出了阵阵欢呼声。人们纷纷投来了不满的目光，然而，渐渐地，大厅里越来越多的人开始说起话来，尽管声音有所克制。

秃头男子好像毫无察觉，继续热切地朗诵着，一首又一首。大约二十分钟后，他停了下来，这是自他登上舞台后的首次停顿。他拢了拢纸张，说道：

“现在开始第二阶段。你们有些人已经知道了，我的第二阶段缘自一场重要的事件。那一事件让我无法再沿用迄今为止使用过的工具创作。也就是说，我发现我的妻子不忠。”

他低下头，仿佛一想起这事仍令他悲痛欲绝。就在这时，我下方的那群人中有个人喊道：

“这么说来，他过去显然一直错用了工具！”

他的同伴们哄然大笑，然后，另一个人喊道：

“拙匠总怪工具差。”

“看来他妻子也是这样。”第一个声音道。

这番对话显然是想让尽可能多的人听到，果然引得众人哧哧窃笑。秃头男子在台上到底听到了多少并不清楚，但他停了下来，并没有看向那些起哄者，而是又摆弄起手中的纸来。他本来打算多说几句，多介绍一下他的第二阶段，但现在放弃了这一念头，又开始背诵起他的作品来。

他的第二阶段与第一阶段并无明显不同，而观众的骚动不安却有增无减。就这样，又过了几分钟，一名醉汉喊了句什么，但我没听清，不过大厅里许多人放声大笑起来。秃头男子仿佛头一次意识到，他正在失去对观众的控制，一句话只背了一半便抬起头来，站在那里冲着灯光眨眼，好像受到了什么惊吓。显然，他可以选择立即放弃舞台，而更体面的选择是，在离开之前再朗诵三四首诗。然而，他却选择了另一条解决之道。他慌慌张张地又朗读起来，也许是想尽快结束这既定的节目吧。结果，他读得支离破碎，七零八落，同时也助长了他死对头的气焰，此刻他们发现他已被逼得慌不择路了。越来越多的人——不再只是我下方的人群——开始七嘴八舌起来，引起了满堂哄笑。

最后，秃头男子试图重新掌控局面。他把文件夹放在一边，一声不吭，用乞求的目光盯着观众席。刚才一直大笑的人们此时安静了下来——或许是出于好奇，或许是出于懊悔吧。秃头男子终于开口了，他的声音中有了些许威严。

“我答应过，要给你们一个小惊喜，”他说，“惊喜来了。一首新诗。我一个星期之前刚完成的。特意为今晚这一重要场合所作。题目就叫《征服者布罗茨基》。请允许我朗诵。”

此人又开始摆弄起纸张，但这次观众都保持安静。他前倾身体，开始朗诵。念了开头几行之后，他飞快地抬头看了看，吃惊地发现大厅仍旧一片安静。他继续朗读，自信心渐渐高涨，没多久便高傲地挥起双手，强调起某些重点语句。

我本以为这是一首泛泛描绘布罗茨基的诗作，但很快我就明白，此诗只关涉布罗茨基与酒精的一次次交锋。开头的几节将布罗茨基与几位神话英雄做了比较，于是，便有了布罗茨基面对入侵的敌军，站在小山顶上猛掷长矛的形象，有了布罗茨基勇抓海蛇的形象，有了布罗茨基被锁链绑在岩石上的形象。观众们继续崇敬地甚至肃穆地聆听着。我看了一眼柯林斯小姐，但没发现她表情有何明显变化。她一如之前，饶有兴趣却又超然地观察着那诗人，一根手指抵在下巴一侧。

几分钟之后，诗歌兀然转向。它放弃了神话背景，转而着力描绘最近发生在布罗茨基身上的几起真实事件——据我猜测，这些事件广为流传，已演化成当地传奇。当然，我对大部分指涉的事件一无所知，但我看得出，他在力图重估并夸大布罗茨基在每起事件中的作用。从文学角度看，我认为这部分诗歌较之前几节大有进步，但介绍如此具体且耳熟能详的内容反而打破了秃头男子在观众中已然建立起的威信。他一提到“公交车候车亭悲剧”，下面便又有人开始窃笑，当他提及布罗茨基“寡不敌众，战败负伤”、“最终被迫投降，躲在电话亭后”时，更多的窃笑声传开了，而当光头男说到“在校园远足中展现出无畏勇气”时，整个大厅爆发出了不约而同的阵阵笑声。

至此我已明白，这秃头男子已经没救了。最后的几小节主要赞颂布罗茨基重新找回了清醒，几乎每行每句都会引发阵阵大笑。我又看了看柯林斯小姐，看到她的手指快速地捋着下巴，除此之外，她一如之前那般镇定。在阵阵大笑与起哄声中，光头男子的声音几乎难以听见，他终于结束了朗诵，愤怒地聚拢纸张，大步走下舞台。一部分观众或许觉得刚才太过分了，便慷慨地鼓起掌来。

接下来几分钟，舞台空无一人，很快，观众们便扯着嗓子说起话来。我审视着下方的一张张面孔，颇有兴致地发现，虽然很多人相互交换着愉快的目光，但相当一部分人看起来很愤怒，正严厉地指着大厅里的其他人。这时，灯光又打在了舞台上，霍夫曼出现了。

酒店经理一脸暴怒，仪态全无，急匆匆走上讲台。

“女士们，先生们，拜托了！”人群安静了下来，他喊道，“拜托了！我请你们记得今晚的重要性。用冯·温特斯坦先生的话说，我们不是来观看歌舞表演的！”

这严厉的训斥并没有得到某些人的接受，一阵讥讽的“啾啾”声从我下方的人群中响起。但霍夫曼继续道：

“特别是，我吃惊地发现，你们许多人对布罗茨基先生仍抱有如此愚蠢而过时的看法。且不论齐格勒先生诗歌中许多其他的优点，其核心论点，即，布罗茨基先生已永远战胜了曾经荼毒他的一切恶魔，就无可置疑。齐格勒先生雄辩地阐述此点时，刚才那些嘲笑他的人，我相信，很快——是的，马上！——就会自惭形秽。是的，自惭形秽！一如一分钟之前，我替这座城市自惭形秽一样。”

说这话的时候，他猛捶讲台，而令人吃惊的是，很多观众竟自以为是地报以热烈掌声。霍夫曼显然松了口气，但显然不知如何回应此

种欢迎，就尴尬地鞠了几躬。接着，还没等掌声完全退去，他就镇定了下来，对着麦克风大声宣布道：

“布罗茨基先生不愧为我们这儿的一位俊杰啊！是我们年轻人精神与文化的源泉，是我们这些年长一辈的掌灯人，是我们这座城市黑暗历史篇章中的迷失与凄惨之人的指路明灯。布罗茨基先生当之无愧啊！请大家看着我！我用名誉、用我的信誉来担保我此刻对你们所说的话！但我何需说这些呢？很快，你们就会亲眼所见，亲耳所闻了。我绝非想做这样的介绍，也对不得已而为之深表遗憾。那么就让我们别再耽误时间了。允许我请出我们最尊敬的贵宾——斯图加特·内格尔基金会管弦乐团。今晚的指挥是我们自己独一无二的——里奥·布罗茨基先生！”

霍夫曼退至侧厢，一轮掌声响起。接下来几分钟悄然无息，接着，乐池亮起了灯光，乐师们鱼贯而出。又是一轮掌声，随后乐队成员循位入席，调试乐器，摆好乐谱架，此时一片寂静，寂静中透着紧张。甚至连我下方吵闹的人群，也好像明白接下来的表演十分严肃——他们已收起了扑克牌，正襟危坐，紧盯前方。

乐队终于安顿下来，灯光打在了近舞台侧厢的一片区域。又过了一分钟，全然无息，接着，后台传来了一阵撞击声。那声音愈来愈响，布罗茨基最后终于走进了灯光中。他停在那儿，也许让观众们有时间注意到他的亮相吧。

当然，在场的许多人都很难认出他来。他身着晚礼服西装，配一件鲜亮的白衬衫，头发梳得光溜溜的，可谓一表人才。然而，无可否认的是，他仍旧用那寒碜的烫衣板作拐杖，未免有煞风景。还有，他走向指挥台时，每走一步，烫衣板便“吧嗒”响一下。我留意到了他在那只空荡荡的裤腿上所做的手脚。我完全能够理解，他不希望那裤料来回摆动。但是，布罗茨基并没有在裤腿残根处打结，反而在膝盖下方一两寸处剪出了波纹状的裤边。我知道，完全雅观的办法是不可能有的，但是，在我看来，这条裤边也太夸张了，可能只会引得人们格外关注他的伤残。

然而，在他继续穿过舞台时，我好像明白自己可能完全想错了。尽管我一直盼望人群发现布罗茨基的状况后会倒吸一口气，但那一时刻却始终未曾到来。其实，就目前情势判断，观众好像根本没留意到他少了条腿，而是继续静静地期待着他走上指挥台。

可能是因为累了，也可能是因为紧张，他现在走路不像我早些时候在走廊里看见的那么顺畅。他步履如此蹒跚，我突然觉得，倘若还是无人注意到他的伤势，人家必定怀疑他喝醉酒了。离指挥台只有几码远了，他却突然停了下来，低着头愤愤地看着烫衣板——我发现它又一次开始撑开了。他晃了晃它，接着又走了起来。他坚持走了几步后，烫衣板上的什么东西散开了。正当他将全身重量压在烫衣板上时，它终于散架了。布罗茨基连同烫衣板狠狠地摔倒在地。

观众对此事的反应甚为奇异。我本以为众人会大声惊呼，可他们却不以为然地静默了几秒钟。接着，一阵低语声传遍礼堂，人们齐声“嗯嗯”着，好像面对这种种令人泄气的迹象，大家都不再妄下结论了。无独有偶，那三位上台协助布罗茨基的舞台工作人员也是一副磨磨蹭蹭的样子，甚至流露出一丝厌恶。总之，他们还未来得及到他身边，此时躺在地板上一直跟烫衣板较劲的布罗茨基便愤怒地冲他们大喊，叫他们滚开。那三个人立马站定，不无迷惑地看着布罗茨基。

布罗茨基继续在地板上挣扎了一会儿。他时而好像要站起来，时而又想将绞进烫衣板里的衣服弄出来。有一阵子，他突然连声咒骂起来，可能是针对那烫衣板的吧，而扬声器将其清清楚楚地播放了出来。我又瞟了一眼柯林斯小姐，发现她这会儿坐在那里，身子前倾着。然而，随着布罗茨基继续挣扎，她又慢慢靠回座位，手指再次抵着下巴。

布罗茨基终于有了突破。他成功地将展开的烫衣板竖了起来，然后骨碌一下站起身。他骄傲地单腿站立，双手抓着烫衣板，双肘推出，好像准备攀爬上去。他狠狠地扫了一眼那三个舞台工作人员，他们退回侧厢后，他便将目光转向观众。

“我知道，我知道，”他说，尽管声音不大，但舞台前方的一排话筒好像照单全收了，大家都听见了。“我知道你们所有人在想什么。唉，你们错了。”

他垂下双眼，重新陷入尴尬。接着，他稍稍挺直了身子，用手抚摸那块烫衣板的棉衬表面，仿佛这会儿才想起烫衣板原先的用途。最后，他再次看向观众，说道：

“把你们脑中的这些想法全部抛开吧。那，”他冲地板甩了下头，“只是个不幸的意外。仅此而已。”

又一阵低语声掠过礼堂，然后大家再次安静下来。

接下来，布罗茨基继续在烫衣板上靠了一会儿，一动未动，紧盯着指挥台。我意识到，他正在估量到指挥台的距离，没错，接着，他开始行动了。他举起整个烫衣板架，猛砸到地上，就好像它是个助行架，然后拖着仅剩的一条腿跟上。起先，观众们似乎吃惊不小，但随着布罗茨基稳稳地向前移动，某些人就觉得自己是在观赏杂技动作，于是便鼓起掌来。很快，大厅里所有的人都接收到了这一讯息，就这样，伴着潮水般的掌声，布罗茨基一步步地向指挥台进发，完成了余下的征程。

一到达目的地，布罗茨基便立马放开烫衣板，一把抓住指挥台上的半圆形栏杆，悠然就位。他小心翼翼地将身子靠在栏杆上，然后拿起指挥棒。

此刻，为烫衣板动作而响起的掌声已渐渐平息，观众席再次恢复了噤声期待的气氛。乐师们也微微紧张地看着布罗茨基。然而，布罗茨基好像在回味多年后重掌乐队指挥棒的感受，他时而微笑，时而目光灼灼。终于，他将指挥棒扬至半空。乐师们刚摆好姿态，布罗茨基却又改变了主意，放下指挥棒，转向观众。他和气地柔声笑道：

“你们都以为我是个大酒鬼。现在就让我们来瞧瞧，我还有没有别的什么能耐。”

最近的麦克风离他也有一段距离，因此只有一小部分观众听见了他的话。总之，紧接着，他又举起了指挥棒，整个乐队立刻投身于穆勒里的《垂直》那刺耳的开篇音符之中。

我倒没觉得如此开篇有什么特别奇异的，但这显然出乎观众们的意料。许多人都从座位上惊跳而起，而随着这拉长的不协和和弦延续到第六、七小节的时候，我看到有些人的脸上呈现出几近恐慌的神情。甚至连一些乐师也焦急地看了看指挥，而后又看看乐谱。但布罗茨基仍在稳步调升乐曲的强度，始终保持他那夸张的慢节拍。演奏到第十二小节时，音符突然爆发，而后戛然而止。观众们轻轻地叹了口气，音乐立即又激昂起来。

布罗茨基不时地用那只空闲的手稳住自己，但这时候他已深深地沉醉了，似乎只需象征性的支撑便能保持平衡。他摇晃着肢体，尽情地在空中甩动双臂。在第一章的头几节，我发现一些乐队成员愧疚地看着观众，仿佛在说：“是啊，真的，他就是叫我们这么演奏的！”但接着，渐渐地，乐师们也沉浸在布罗茨基的幻境之中。起先，是小提琴师们入了迷，接着，我看到越来越多的乐师沉醉在自己的演奏

中。当布罗茨基引领他们进入忧郁的第二乐章时，整个乐团似乎都被他折服了。此时此刻，观众也一改先前的不安，定定地坐在那儿。

布罗茨基利用第二乐章较为松散的形式，将其推至空前奇异的境地，而我呢，尽管我熟知穆勒里乐曲的每一细节，却也渐渐入迷了。他几乎全然无视曲子的外在结构——即作曲家向装点作品表面的音调与旋律的倾斜——而恰恰侧重于隐藏在外壳下的独特的生命形态。所有这一切略显龌龊，近乎于裸露癖，表明布罗茨基自己对他正在揭示的事物本质深感窘迫，却又无法抵挡向纵深挺进的冲动。结果，这既令人胆怯又扣人心弦。

我又仔细看了看下方的人群。毫无疑问，这群狭隘观众的情感已被布罗茨基所俘获，我发现待会儿的问答环节也许不会像我原先担心的那般棘手了。显然，假若布罗茨基凭这场表演让观众心悦诚服，那么我如何回答问题就变得远没有那么重要了。我的任务实质上就成了支持一下观众们业已认可的东西而已——这样，纵然我调查得不够充分，但凭我说上几句得体婉转、幽默诙谐的话，便可全身而退。但另一方面，假若布罗茨基让观众心烦意乱，犹豫不决，那么，不论我的地位和经验如何，都会有一大堆的工作等着我去做。观众席上仍充满了焦躁不安，我想起第三乐章那愤慨激昂的情绪，不知布罗茨基到时指挥成什么样子。

就在这时，头一次，我突然想到在观众中搜寻我的父母。几乎是同时，一个念头在我脑中一闪而过：在无数次细看人群时我都没有注意到他们，因而此刻在我下方发现他们的可能性就不大了。不过，我还是往前倾了倾身子，几乎是不顾一切地瞪大眼睛扫视了一遍礼堂。无论我如何伸长脖颈，大厅里某些地方我还是看不见，于是我意识到自己迟早得下到礼堂。然而，即使我还是没法找到父母，我至少可以找到霍夫曼或者斯达特曼小姐，问问我父母到底在哪里。不管怎样，我知道我再也耽搁不起更多时间，不能继续站在眼前的这个有利位置看演出了，于是我小心翼翼地转过身，走出了壁橱。

又一次出现在小楼梯的顶端时，我发现下面的队伍已排得老长，至少有二十个人在等待。每个排队的人刚才都在兴奋地交谈着，现在一看见我，他们就闭了口。我把壁橱占用了这么长时间，自己感觉非常内疚，走下梯子时，我含含糊糊地低声说了声抱歉，然后趁下一个排队的人开始急切地朝壁橱入口攀爬时，匆匆地沿着走廊离开了。

走廊较之前安静多了，主要是由于餐饮服务员的的活动暂停了下来。沿着走廊每走几码，我就能撞见一辆静止的推车，上面满载着货物，有时候，穿着工装的男人们会靠在上面，吸着烟，拿着泡沫塑料杯子喝东西。我终于停下脚步，问了其中一个人，到达礼堂最快的路线该怎么走，他只朝我的身后的一扇门指了指。我谢过他，拉开门，看到了下面灯光昏暗的楼梯间。

我下了至少五段楼梯。接着，我推开沉重的弹簧双开门，发现自己走进了一个洞穴般幽暗的后台区。借着微弱的灯光，我看到有几块矩形背景画板靠在墙边，上面画着一栋城堡式的房屋，月色下的天空，森林。我头顶上是呈十字形交叉的钢索。此刻，我已经可以清晰地听到乐团演奏了，我朝乐声走去，一路上尽力避开一个个盒状的障碍物。最后，我慢慢走上了几级木头台阶，这时我意识到，自己已经站在了侧厢里。我正欲转身——原本我希望悄悄出现在近前排座位的某处——突然，乐声中的某种东西，一种之前未曾有过的疑惑填满了我的耳朵，迫使我停在了那里。

我站在那儿听了大约一分钟，然后上前一步，透过眼前厚重的折叠垂幕东张西望起来。当然，做这一切时我十分小心——自然，我希望无论如何要避免人群看到我的脸而鼓起掌来——然而，我却发现自己从一个很偏的角度注视着布罗茨基和乐队，而观众们却根本看不见我。

可以看出，我在楼里转悠的这段时间里，情况已经发生了很大变化。我觉得布罗茨基走得太远了，因为，那一通常标志着指挥与乐师相互疏离的技巧炫示已经渗进了乐队的演奏中。乐师们——我现在能从近处看到他们了——脸上都挂着一副怀疑、忧虑甚至厌恶的表情。接下来，随着我的眼睛渐渐适应了耀眼的舞台灯光，我把目光由乐队转向观众。我只能看见前面几排，但显然大家都在彼此交换焦虑的目光，不安地咳嗽着，不住地摇头。就在我观察的时候，一位女士起身离开了。然而，布罗茨基继续激情豪迈地指挥着，甚至好像渴望推波助澜。随后，我看到两位大提琴手交换了下眼神，摇了摇头。这显然是个谋反的信号，而布罗茨基无疑是注意到了。这会儿，他的指挥透出一股狂躁的气象，乐声转而危险地向乖僻反常的领地挺进。

直至此时，我仍旧未能看清布罗茨基的表情——我大致只能看见他的背影——但随着他旋身扭体愈发明显，我终于比较完整地瞥见了他的脸。这时我才意识到，还有其他某种因素在影响着布罗茨基的行为。我再次端详他——他的身体紧紧和着某个节拍，不由自主地扭动

着——发现他处于极度的痛苦中，他这样痛不欲生或许已经有一段时间了。我一意识这点，种种迹象就清楚无误了。他其实只是在拼命坚持而已，他的脸扭曲着，不仅是因为激情，还有其他原因啊！

我觉得自己有义务做点什么，就立刻估量了一下情势。布罗茨基还得再指挥一个中上等难度的乐章，另加那错综复杂的尾曲。他之前营造起来的美好印象被快速地磨蚀掉了。观众随时都可能再次翻脸。我越想，就越觉得应该叫停这表演，我不知道是不是现在就该走上舞台，立马叫停。的确，也许我是大厅里唯一一个可以这么做而又不让观众感到大难临头的人。

但接下来，我并没有行动，而是在想到底应该怎样去干涉。我该走上去挥手示意暂停吗？那样不仅会显得冒昧，而且会让人觉出我的不满——这会给人留下恶劣的印象。或许，更好的方法是，等到行板乐曲开始后，我再非常谦逊地走上台去，恭敬有礼地对布罗茨基和乐队微笑，踩着音乐的节拍款款入场，好像事先早被安排好了似的。毫无疑问，观众会热烈鼓掌，这时候我就可以——一直面带微笑——先为布罗茨基拍手，再为乐师们鼓掌。但愿那时候布罗茨基会冷静沉着地“慢慢结束”音乐，并朝观众频频鞠躬。我一出现在台上，观众们就不大可能找布罗茨基的麻烦了。说实在的，在我的率先带领下——我会继续鼓掌微笑，仿佛布罗茨基刚才的表演绝对美轮美奂——观众们可能会回忆起他先前那部分的表演，而使他重获他们的支持。这时布罗茨基就可以恭恭敬敬地鞠上几个躬，然后转身离开，而我呢，在众目睽睽下亲切地扶他走下指挥台，或许再把他那块烫衣板折好递给他，好让他再当拐杖使。然后我可能会领着他走向侧厢，频频回望观众，鼓励他们继续鼓掌等等。只要我一切判断绝对正确的话，事情就可以得到完美解决。

但就在这时，又发生了一件早就可能会发生的事情。布罗茨基的指挥棒在空中画了个大大的弧线，而几乎与此同时，另一只手向空中猛击。就这样，他好像失控了似的向空中蹦了几英寸，然后摔倒在舞台前方，带倒了指挥台的扶手、烫衣板、乐谱、乐谱架等所有东西。

我本以为大家会冲过去帮他，但他摔倒时众人只是倒吸了一口气，随后抽气声便渐渐消失，人们陷入了令人尴尬的沉默。接下来，布罗茨基仍然面部朝下，一动不动地趴在地上，这时，一阵低低的喧闹声又向礼堂的四面八方传开。终于，一位小提琴手把乐器放在一边，朝布罗茨基走去。还有其他一些人——舞台工作人员，乐师——

马上一一跟上，但他们向那个匍匐倒地的人围聚过去时仍有些犹豫，仿佛害怕他们会发现完全不以为然。

刚才我一直在犹豫，不知道我的现身会造成什么结果。现在我缓过神来，急忙冲上舞台，加入到帮助布罗茨基的队伍中。我走近时，小提琴手大叫一声，跪倒在地，焦急地检查起布罗茨基。接着，他抬头看着我们，惊恐地低语道：“天哪，他失去了一条腿！他坚持了这么久才晕倒，真是奇迹！”

大家惊讶不已，我们围聚过来的十多个人互相交换了下眼色。不知何故，大家都有种明显的感觉，他失去一条腿的消息绝不能泄露出去，于是我们围聚得更紧了，以挡住观众们的视线。离布罗茨基最近的几个人在低声商榷是否要把他抬下舞台。接着，有人示意了一下，幕布开始合了起来。很快人们就发现，布罗茨基正好躺在幕布的轨线上，于是，当幕布过来时，几只胳膊伸了出来，半拖半拽地将他拉离了舞台前方。

这一拉一拽让布罗茨基稍稍清醒了一点，那位小提琴手把他的身体翻转过来，让他平躺在地上。布罗茨基睁开了眼睛，搜寻的目光扫过每张脸庞。然后，他迷迷糊糊地说：

“她在哪儿？她为什么不抱着我？”

众人又交换了下眼神。接着，有人低声说：

“柯林斯小姐。他说的一定是柯林斯小姐。”

他话音刚落，一阵轻咳声从我们背后传来，我们转身发现柯林斯小姐就站在幕布内。她看起来依然沉着淡定，礼貌而关切地看着我们。只有那交叉于胸前的双臂，比平常略高，才显示出她内心的纷乱。

“她在哪儿？”布罗茨基又迷迷糊糊地问了一遍。然后他突然轻轻地唱起歌来。

小提琴手抬头看着我们说：“他喝醉了？浑身都是酒味。”

布罗茨基停止了歌唱，闭上眼睛问道：“她在哪儿？她为什么不来？”

这一次，柯林斯小姐回了话，声音虽然不大，但从幕布那边传来却很清晰：“我在这儿，里奥。”

她的口吻近乎温柔，可是，当大家赶忙让出一条道来，她并没有动。然而，她一看到地上的人，脸上终于浮现出痛苦的神情。布罗茨基仍然紧闭双眼，又开始哼哼起来。

接着，他睁开双眼，小心地四下看了看。他的目光首先看向幕布——或许是在寻找观众——随后，发现幕布拉上了，他又审视了一下低头看着他的一张张脸庞。最后，他看向了柯林斯小姐。

“我们拥抱吧，”他说，“让大家看看。幕布……”一番挣扎，他稍稍抬起了身子，喊道：“准备好再次拉开幕布！”接着，他轻柔地对柯林斯小姐说：“过来抱我。拥抱我。然后让他们拉开幕布。让全世界见证我们。”他又渐渐倒了下去，直至平躺在地上。“过来吧，”他低声道。

柯林斯小姐欲言又止。她看了看幕布，一丝惊恐在眼中闪现。

“让他们看看，”布罗茨基说，“让他们看看我们最后在一起了。让他们看看我们一生都彼此相爱。让他们看看吧。幕布拉开时，让他们看看吧。”

柯林斯小姐继续盯着布罗茨基，最后终于走向了他。大家小心地让开，有几位甚至干脆将目光转向了别处。快到他身边时，她停了下来，声音微微颤抖地说道：

“我们握个手吧。”

“不，不。一切都结束了。我们好好拥抱一下。让他们看看。”

柯林斯小姐犹豫片刻，然后径直走到他身边，跪了下来。我看到她的双眼噙满了泪水。

“亲爱的，”布罗茨基柔声道，“再抱抱我吧。我的伤口正疼得厉害。”

突然间，柯林斯小姐抽回了已经伸出的手，站起身来。她冷冷地低头看着布罗茨基，接着迅速地朝幕布走了回去。

布罗茨基好像没有发现她已隐退。他这会儿正盯着天花板，双臂张开，仿佛期盼着柯林斯小姐从天而降。

“你在哪儿？”他说，“让他们看看。拉开幕布的时候。让他们看看，我们最后还是在一起了。你在哪儿？”

“我不会来了，里奥。不管你现在去哪儿，你都得自己去了。”

布罗茨基一定是意识到了她语气的转变，因为他虽然仍旧盯着天花板，双臂却已垂了下来。

“伤口，你的伤口，”柯林斯小姐轻轻地说，“老是你的伤口。”她的脸扭曲变形，模样丑陋。“哦，我恨透了你！我恨你浪费了我的生命！我永远，永远都不会原谅你！你的伤口，你那愚蠢的小伤口！那才是你的真爱，里奥，那伤口，它才是你一生唯一的挚爱！即使我们努力尝试，即便我们重头再来，我也知道会有怎样的未来。你的音乐也是这样，不会有丝毫的不同。即便他们今晚接受了你，即便你在这座城市成了大名人，你也会统统毁掉的，你会毁掉一切，就像从前那样，把一切都毁于一旦。而这都是因为你那个伤口。我也好，音乐也罢，对你来说，我们不过就是你寻求慰藉的情妇罢了。你总是会回到你唯一的真爱那儿去。重回那个伤口！你知道我为何如此气愤吗？里奥，你在听我说吗？你的那个伤口，一点都不特别，根本没什么特别之处。仅仅在这座城市，我就知道有许多人的伤口比你的要严重得多。可人家却坚韧不拔，每个人都是，都有着比你强不知多少倍的勇气。他们继续生活。他们成了有价值的人。而你呢，里奥，看看你自己。总是抚慰你那伤口。你在听吗？听我说，我要你仔仔细细、一字一句地听我讲！你现在只有那个伤口了。我曾经想把一切都给你，但你却不感兴趣，你不可能再拥有我了。你浪费了我多少生命啊！我恨死你了！你听到我说的话了吗，里奥？看看你自己！看看你现在都成什么样子了？好吧，我来告诉你。你现在是要去往恐怖之地。一个漆黑而孤独的地方，而我是不会跟你去的。你自个儿去吧！跟你那愚蠢的小伤口一块儿去吧！”

布罗茨基一直在空中缓缓地晃着一只手。这会儿，趁她停下来的工夫，他说：

“我也许……我也许会再次成为指挥家。刚才的音乐，我倒下之前的音乐。还是蛮好的。你听见了吗？我也许会再次成为指挥家……”

“里奥，你在听我说吗？你永远都不会成为一个名副其实的指挥家。即便在以前，你也根本不是。你永远都不能为本城的市民服务，即便他们想要你这么做。因为你毫不关心他们的人生。就是这么回事啊！你的音乐永远只会关乎那个愚蠢的小伤口，永远不会有任何别的东西，永远不会有任何深刻的内涵，对其他任何人不会有任何价值。至少，我可以这么说，我已尽了我的绵薄之力。我已尽心尽力地帮助了这里不幸的人们。而你呢，看看你吧！你只关心你那伤口！这就是为什

么即便在过去你也不是个名副其实的音乐家。而你现在也绝对成不了货真价实的音乐家。里奥，你在听我说吗？我想让你听听这话。你永远都不过是在滥竽充数。你这个懦夫，不负责任的骗子……”

这时，一个满脸通红的胖子突然穿过幕布冲了进来。

“您的烫衣板，布罗茨基先生！”他把那东西高举在身前，兴高采烈地喊道。话音刚落，他便感到气氛不对头，连忙退了回去。

柯林斯小姐看了看这位新的闯入者，最后看了布罗茨基一眼，接着就从幕布间的空隙跑了出去。

布罗茨基的脸仍然冲着天花板，不过眼睛却又闭上了。我挤上前，跪在他身边，听了听他的心跳。

“我们的水手们，”他低声道，“我们的水手们。我们喝醉了的水手们。他们在哪儿？你们在哪儿？你们在哪儿？”

“是我，”我说，“我是瑞德。布罗茨基先生，我们必须马上找人来帮您。”

“瑞德。”他张开双眼，抬头看着我。“瑞德。也许那是真的。她说的那番话。”

“别担心，布罗茨基先生。您的音乐气势磅礴，特别是头两个乐章……”

“不，不，瑞德。我指的不是这个。现在那已经无所谓了。我是指她说的另一件事。说我要独自一人去，去一个漆黑、孤独的地方。或许那是真的。”突然，他从地上抬起头，直视我的双眼，一把紧紧地抓住了我的胳膊。“我不想去，瑞德，”他低声说道，“我不想去那儿。”

“布罗茨基先生，我会想办法把她劝回来的。我说过，特别是头两个乐章展现出了极大的创新性。她肯定是个通情达理的人。请原谅，我去去就来。”

我将胳膊从他手里挣脱开来，赶紧穿过舞台幕布走了出去。

第三十五章

我吃惊地发现，礼堂里已经大变样了。灯光已重新打开，观众席上几乎一名观众都没有。多达三分之二的客人已经离去，剩下的人大多站在过道里聊天。然而，我没有在此久留，因为我看到柯林斯小姐正沿着中央过道朝出口走去。我跳下舞台，急忙穿过人群，在她身后追赶，她刚到出口时，我便赶了上去，向她喊道：

“柯林斯小姐！请等一下！”

我们距离不远，她能听到我的叫喊。她转过身，看到了我，然后狠狠地瞪了我一眼。我吃了一惊，在过道上走了一半便驻足不前。突然间，我想要赶上她并与她谈谈的决心顿然消退，不知怎的，自己竟尴尬地低头看着双脚。终于，我又抬起了头，发现她已然离开了。

我继续待在原地站了一会儿，心想自己是不是太愚蠢了，竟让她这么轻易地走掉了。但接着，我的注意力渐渐被周围的各种谈话声吸引了，特别是站在我右边的一群人——六七个颇为年长的老者——我听到其中一人说道：

“听舒斯特太太说，那家伙今儿个一整天就没清醒过。唉，不管他再怎么有才干，如何要求我们去尊敬他那样的人？他给我们的孩子树立了怎样的榜样啊？不，不，太过分了。”

“在伯爵夫人家的晚宴上，”一位妇女说，“他肯定就喝了个大醉。他们耍了聪明才瞒天过海。”

“对不起，”我插话道，“你们对此事一无所知。我向你们保证，你们的消息极不准确。”

我以为单凭我的出现便能让他们大吃一惊，说不出话来。但他们欣然看了看我，仿佛我只是问了问他们是否介意我加入他们的谈话，然后便继续聊了起来。

“没人再想恭维克里斯托弗了，”第一个人说道，“刚刚那场演出，唉，就像你说的，简直乏味透了。”

“简直伤风败俗。没错。简直伤风败俗啊。”

“请原谅，”我这次更为强硬地打断道，“我碰巧专心聆听了布罗茨基先生在倒下之前的演奏，我个人的判断与你们的不同。依我看，他的表现富有挑战性，前所未有，可谓非常接近曲子的内在世界。”

我冷冷地瞪了他们一眼。他们又开心地看了看我，其中几位还礼貌地笑了笑，好像我刚开了个玩笑。接着，第一个人说道：

“没人在袒护克里斯托弗。我们现在都已经看透他了。但听到刚刚那样的表演，确实让人脑子里想起很多事情。”

“显然，”另一个男人说道，“布罗茨基认为马克斯·萨特勒没错。是的，实际上他一天到晚都在那么说。没错，他是在醉酒恍惚中说的，但那人总是醉醺醺的，我们也能几近了解他的想法了。马克斯·萨特勒。这倒不难解释我们刚刚听到的一切了。”

“克里斯托弗至少有种结构感。你能掌握的某种体系。”

“先生们，”我对他们喊道，“你们真讨厌！”

他们甚至没有扭头看我，我生气地离开了他们。

我回到过道，周围每个人好像都在谈论他们刚刚见到的情景。我发现许多人纯粹是出于需要讲述一场经历而在夸夸其谈，就像他们在一场火灾或者意外之后可能会做的那样。走到礼堂前面的时候，我看见有两个女人在哭，还有一个女人在安慰她们说：“没关系，现在都结束了。现在都结束了。”大厅的这块区域弥漫着一股咖啡的香味，许多人紧握杯碟，喝着咖啡，好像在稳定自己的情绪。

就在那时，我突然想起，自己应该回到上面一层，去看看古斯塔夫怎么样了。于是，我挤过人群，穿过一处紧急出口，离开了礼堂。

我发现自己身在一个静悄悄、空荡荡的走廊里。与楼上的那条走廊相仿，这条走廊同样逐渐弯转延展，但它明显是供宾客使用的。地毯十分厚实，灯光柔和而温暖，墙壁上挂着镶金叶框的油画。我没料到走廊里竟然空无一人，一时间，我站在原地犹豫了起来，不知该走哪条路。接着，就在我开始抬步之时，我听到身后有一个声音喊道：

“瑞德先生！”

我转身看到霍夫曼站在走廊远处向我挥臂。他又叫了我一声，但不知何故，他依然牢牢地停在原处，所以无奈之下我只好折了回去。

“霍夫曼先生，”我边走边说，“刚才发生的事真是太不幸了。”

“一场灾难。一场十足的灾难。”

“真的是太不幸了。但霍夫曼先生，您千万不要太灰心。为保证今晚成功，您已经竭尽所能了。我不妨指出，我还没有出场呢。我向您保证，我会尽力让晚会重回掌控之中。实际上，先生，我在想，我们能不能取消原计划中的问答部分。鉴于所发生的事情，我建议我只做个演讲，讲些合宜切题的话。比方说，我会建议大家牢记布罗茨基先生在病倒之前赋予这场非凡演出的意义，还有我们应努力忠实于那演出的精神，诸如此类的话。自然啰，我会讲得简短些。然后，我也许会为布罗茨基先生，要不就是为了纪念他，献上我的独奏，全看他那时的情形了……”

“瑞德先生，”霍夫曼郑重地说道，这时我才意识到他一直没在听。他神情专注，一直在看着我，好像仅仅是为了寻找插话的机会。

“瑞德先生，有件事情我想跟您提一下。一件小事。”

“哦，什么事，霍夫曼先生？”

“小事一桩，至少对您来说吧。但对我，对我的妻子，却意义重大。”突然，他猛地向后甩了下胳膊，面容因为狂怒而扭曲起来。我以为他要打我，但我马上意识到，他是在指向身后走廊远处的一个地方。柔和的灯光下，我看到一个女人的侧影，她背对着我们，斜身靠在一处壁龛里。壁龛上有面镜子，她的头又几乎贴着镜玻璃，所以她的影子倾斜着映入其中。我看向那身影时，霍夫曼或许觉得他头一个手势没能让我明白，于是又一次猛地向后甩了甩胳膊。接着，他说道：

“我说的是，先生，我妻子的剪报册。”

“您妻子的剪报册。啊，是的。是的，她太客气了……但是，霍夫曼先生，现在不是时候……”

“瑞德先生，您还记得您答应过会看看的吧。而且我们约好了，出于对您的考虑，先生，我不会在您不方便的时间里打扰您，我们约好了——您不记得了吗，先生？——我们约好了个暗号的。您觉得准备好来看剪报册的时候，就会给我个暗号。您还记得吗，先生？”

“当然，霍夫曼先生。我本来十分愿意……”

“我一直在细心观察，瑞德先生。只要我看到您在酒店周围溜达，走过门廊，喝着咖啡，我就会想：‘啊，他好像有点空闲了。或许现在就是时候了。’我等着暗号，我细致观察，但结果怎么样呢？呸！现在，您到此地的访问即将结束，再过几个小时，您就要坐飞机去赫尔辛基，去赶赴下一个约定了！有很多次，先生，我以为自己可能错过了，我以为我转了一下身，等转回来时误将您打暗号结束时的动作当成了其他动作。当然，如果是那样的话，如果您已多次发出暗号，是我太愚钝而没能接收到，那么，我自然会毫无保留、厚着脸皮、低三下四地向您道歉，向您卑躬屈膝。但是我认为，先生，您没有发出过这样的暗号。换句话说，先生，您对待……对待……”他回头看了看走廊远处的身影，压低声音道，“您看不起我的妻子。瞧，剪报册！”

直到这时，我才发现他正抱着两大本册子。他把册子举到我面前。

“给您，先生。我妻子为您辉煌的事业而奉献的成果。她多么崇拜您啊。您看得出来吧。看看这一页页剪报册！”他使劲打开其中一本，而将另一本夹在胳膊下。“瞧，先生。甚至还有从不知名的杂志上剪下的小剪报。顺便提到的您的事情。您看，先生，她多么热爱您啊！瞧这儿，先生！还有这儿和这儿！而您甚至抽不出时间浏览一下这些册子。我现在该怎么对她说？”他又指了指走廊远处的那个身影。

“我很抱歉，”我开口道，“我非常抱歉。但您看，我在这儿的时间好像非常混乱。我本来十分愿意……”这时我意识到，在这个越来越混乱的夜晚，我至少得保持一个清醒的头脑。我稍停片刻，然后以命令的口吻说道：“霍夫曼先生，或许您的妻子听到我亲口说出诚挚的道歉，会更容易接受。很高兴今晚早些时间见到了她。或许您现在可领我过去，我们很快便能解决这件事了。接着，当然，我真的该上台了，讲几句有关布罗茨基先生的话，然后表演独奏。我父母尤其会不耐烦的。”

听到这番话，霍夫曼好像有点困惑。过了一会儿，他试图重新点燃之前的愤怒，说道：“看看这一页页剪报册，先生！看看吧！”但怒火已经熄灭，他有些窘迫地看着我。“那，我们走吧，”他低声道，声音中有种惊人的挫败感。“我们走吧。”

他又停了一会儿，我感觉他脑海中正翻腾着某些遥远的回忆。接着，他毅然决然地走向妻子，我跟在他身后几步。

我们走近时，霍夫曼太太转过身。我停在了几步开外，她越过丈夫直直地看向了我，说道：

“很高兴又见到您了，瑞德先生。不幸的是，今晚好像不如我们希望的那般顺利啊。”

“很遗憾啊，”我说道，“好像是不太顺利。”然后我上前一步，补充道：“此外，夫人，事情一件接着一件，我好像忽视了原本非常期待想做的许多事情。”

我期望她对此暗示有所回应，但她只是饶有兴致地盯着我，等着我继续。这时，霍夫曼清了清嗓子，说道：

“亲爱的，我……我知道你的心愿。”

他温柔一笑，举起了剪报册，一手拿着一本。

霍夫曼太太惊恐地看着他。“把剪报册给我，”她厉声道，“你没权利！给我。”

“亲爱的……”霍夫曼咯咯一笑，目光落在了双脚上。

霍夫曼太太仍旧伸着手，表情狂怒。酒店经理先递给她一本，然后是另一本。他妻子把每一本都迅速瞄了一眼以核实无误，接着，她尴尬地不知所措起来。

“亲爱的，”霍夫曼喃喃道，“我只是以为不会有什么坏处……”他的声音越说越小，然后他又笑了笑。

霍夫曼太太冷冷地看了他一眼，接着转身对我说道：“很抱歉，瑞德先生，我丈夫竟然觉得有必要用这等小事烦扰您。祝您晚安。”

她将册子塞进腋下，走开了。但是，她还没走出几步，霍夫曼突然惊呼道：

“小事？不，不！不是小事！科斯敏斯基的册子也不是。斯蒂凡·哈利尔的册子也不是。不是小事。但愿它们是。但愿我能相信它们是！”

他妻子停下脚步，但没有转身，我和霍夫曼盯着她的背影，她静静地站在走廊昏暗的灯光中。然后，霍夫曼朝她走了几步。

“今晚。一团糟。为什么假装那不关己事？为什么继续容忍我？年复一年，失误连连。青年节之后，你对我的耐心肯定已经荡然无存了。但不，你继续容忍我。接着是展览周。你仍然容忍我。你仍然给

了我一次机会。好吧，我求过你，我知道。我求你再给我一次机会。你不忍心拒绝我。总之，你给了我今晚这个机会。而我该怎么表现呢？今晚一团糟。我们的儿子，我们唯一的儿子，在全市最尊贵的市民面前，成了笑料。那是我的错，是的，我知道。是我在鼓励他。甚至在最后一刻，我知道应该制止他，但我没有勇气。我让他坚持到最后。相信我，亲爱的，我从未想过要这样啊！从一开始，我就对自己说，我明天会告诉他，等明天，有更多时间了，我们好好谈谈。明天，明天，我一直拖了下去。是的，我承认我软弱。甚至今晚，我刚才说，再过几分钟，我就告诉他，可是不，不，我做不到啊，他就继续了。是的，我们的斯蒂芬，他登台亮相，在世人面前，弹奏了钢琴！让人捧腹的笑料！啊，但愿只有这一半耻辱就好了！每个人，整个城市，都知道是谁负责今晚的节目。整个城市都知道谁负责布罗茨基先生的恢复。好啊，好啊，我不否认，我失败了，我没能让他恢复。他是个醉鬼，我从一开始就应该看出那毫无用处。今晚，我们说话之时，一切都在崩溃。甚至是瑞德先生，甚至他，现在也无法挽救这局面。他只是让我们更尴尬而已。世界上最好的钢琴家，我请他来干什么？参加这场丢脸的晚会？为何我会允许自己笨拙的双手贴近音乐、艺术、文化这样神圣的东西？你，来自一个才华横溢的家庭，你可以嫁给任何人。你却犯了如此的错误。一场悲剧啊！但对你来说，还不算太晚。你依然楚楚动人。你为何还要再等？你还需要什么证明？离开我吧，离开我。找一个配得上你的人。找个科斯敏斯基，哈利尔，瑞德，莱昂哈特吧。你怎么会犯这样的错误呢？离开我吧，我求你了，离开我！你明白做你的监狱长有多么可恨吗？不，更糟呢，我是你脚踝上的那条锁链！离开我，离开我！”突然间，霍夫曼弯腰向前，拳击前额，上演了今晚我之前见他排练过的那个动作。“我亲爱的，我亲爱的，离开我吧。我的地位已无望了。过了今晚，我的矫饰终于要结束了。他们全都会知道了，连城里最小的孩子都会知道了。从今晚起，他们无论何时看到我在为事业而奔走，他们都知道我一无所有。没有才华，没有悟性，没有技巧。离开我吧，离开我。我什么都不是，就是头牛，一头牛，一头牛！”

他又做了一遍那个动作，重捶前额，手肘怪异地突起。接着，他跪了下来，开始抽泣。

“一团糟啊！”他哭泣着喃喃道，“全都糟透了啊！”

此时，霍夫曼太太转过身，小心地看着她丈夫。她眼神柔和，几近渴望，好像没因丈夫这突然间的情绪爆发而有一丝惊讶。她犹豫地迈出了一步，接着又是一步，朝着霍夫曼佝偻的身体走了过去。接

着，慢慢地，她伸出一只手，仿佛是要轻抚他的头顶。这只手在霍夫曼的上方停留片刻，没有触碰头部，接着便抽了回去。下一刻，她急忙转身，消失在走廊深处。

霍夫曼继续抽泣着，显然未察觉妻子的任何动作。我看了他一会儿，不知如何是好。接着，我突然意识到，现在我必须上场演出了。我心潮澎湃，想到到现在为止我还没能在这幢大楼的任何一个角落发现我父母的踪迹。刚才我对霍夫曼还近乎怜悯，但现在这种感觉突然变了，我走近他，对着他的耳朵大喊道：

“霍夫曼先生，也许你已经把今晚弄得一团糟了，但我不想被你拖下水。我要去表演。我要竭尽全力为活动恢复秩序。但首先，霍夫曼先生，我想知道我的父母到底怎么了？”

霍夫曼抬起头，发现妻子已经离他而去，略感吃惊。然后，他有些气恼地注视着我，站起身来。

“您想知道什么，先生？”他疲惫地问道。

“我的父母，霍夫曼先生。他们在哪儿？您向我保证过，你们会好好照料他们的。但之前我找过，他们不在观众席。我现在要上台了，希望我父母已安顿好。所以现在，先生，我必须请你回答我。他们在哪儿？”

“您的父母，先生。”霍夫曼深吸了口气，一只手疲倦地捋了捋头发。“您得问斯达特曼小姐。她直接负责照顾他们。我只管活动的大框架。您看，既然我在那方面已经彻底失败了，您就别指望我能回答您的问题……”

“是的，是的，是的。”我越发不耐烦起来，“那么，斯达特曼小姐在哪儿？”

霍夫曼叹了口气，朝我身后指了指。我转过身，看到身后有一扇门。

“她在那里面？”我厉声问道。

霍夫曼点了点头，接着，他蹒跚着走向那处装了镜子的壁龛（他妻子刚才一直站在那儿），看着自己的影像。

我猛地敲了敲那扇门。没有回应。我向霍夫曼投去了责备的一瞥。这会儿他弓身伏在了壁龛的壁架上。我正想对他发泄更多的愤

怒，突然，我听到里面传出了一声人声，喊我进去。我最后看了一眼霍夫曼弓起的身子，随即打开了门。

第三十六章

我发现自己身在一间宽敞的现代化办公室里，和这幢大楼里我所看到过的任何房间都不同。它是一座附属建筑，看上去完全由玻璃搭建而成。房间里没有灯光，我看到黎明终于来临。片片柔和的晨曦映射在一摞摞摇摇欲坠的纸堆、文件柜和散落在桌上的号码簿与文件夹上。办公室里共有三张桌子，但此时只有斯达特曼小姐一人在里面。

她好像很忙，而且，房间里光线很暗淡，难以自如地阅读或写作，而她居然把灯都关了，我觉得很奇怪。我只能猜测她只是暂时关掉而已，以欣赏远方树后日出的景色。事实上，我进去的时候，她正坐在桌旁，手拿电话听筒，两眼透过巨大的玻璃窗格空洞地凝望着外面。

“早上好，瑞德先生。”她转过身来和我打招呼，“我一会儿就好。”然后她继续对着话筒说道：“是的，五分钟左右。香肠也是。几分钟后就该开始煎了。还有水果。现在应该准备好了。”

“斯达特曼女士，”我走到她的桌前，“有些事情比何时该煎香肠更急迫。”

她飞快地抬起头，向我扫了一眼，再次说道：“我一会儿就好，瑞德先生。”接着她继续对着听筒说话，并开始记下什么东西。

“斯达特曼小姐，”我的口气生硬起来，“我得请你挂断电话听我说。”

“等一下，”斯达特曼女士对电话那头的人说，“有人在我这儿，我得招待下。马上回你电话。”说着她挂断了电话，盯视着我。
“怎么了，瑞德先生？”

“斯达特曼小姐，”我说，“我们初次见面时，您就向我保证会把与我此次访问相关的方方面面全告知我。您会全方位地向我通告我的日程安排以及我需承担的各种事务。我相信您是个可以信赖的人。但是很抱歉，我觉得您大大辜负了我的期望。”

“瑞德先生，我不知您这番偏激之论缘于何故。您有什么特别不高兴的事情吗？”

“我对每件事都不高兴，斯达特曼小姐。我没有得到我所需的重要信息。也没人告知我我的日程在最后一分钟做了变更。在关键时刻，我也没有得到支持或帮助。结果呢，我未能按照自己的意愿为此行任务做好准备。但是，尽管如此，我仍打算一会儿就上台，尽力为你们挽救那将要成为灾难的夜晚。但是，在我做这些之前，我想问您一个简单的问题。我父母在哪里？他们之前就坐着马车过来了。而我刚才在礼堂里找他们的时候，却没有看到他们。我没有看到他们坐在包厢或前面的贵宾席上。所以我想再次问您，斯达特曼小姐，他们在哪儿？为什么他们没有像您承诺的那样得到细致的照料？”

斯达特曼小姐仔细地端详着晨光中的我，然后叹了一口气。

“瑞德先生，我本来一直打算要跟您说说这件事。几个月前，当您告诉我们您父母想来拜访我们城市的时候，我们大家都非常高兴。每个人都是发自内心的高兴。但是我必须提醒您，瑞德先生，我们是从您，仅仅是从您这儿听说他们打算来此地的。这么说吧，在过去的三天里，特别是今天，我已尽我所能想去查明他们到底在哪里。我三番五次地给机场、火车站、公交公司和本城的每一座酒店打电话，但仍没有发现他们的踪迹。没有人听说过他们，也没有人见到他们。现在，瑞德先生，我得问问您了。您确定他们会来这个城市吗？”

她正说着的时候，一连串疑问在我脑中掠过，我突然感觉内心里有什么东西开始崩溃。为了掩饰我的不安，我转过身，面向晨曦。

“嗯，”我终于开口了，“我当时是非常确定他们这次会来的。”

“您当时是很确定。”斯达特曼用一种苛责的目光盯视着我，显然刚才我大大刺激了她的职业自豪感。“难道您不知道，瑞德先生，为了恭候您父母的到来，这里的每个人都操透了心，费尽了神？医疗安排，殷勤款待，马匹车辆？本地几位女士花了几周的时间排练了一个节目，来给您的父母在逗留期间解解闷。现在您却说，您当时非常确定他们会来。”

“那是自然，”我笑道，“当时我要是不能十分确定，我也是绝不想给大家添麻烦的。但事实是——”我不禁又大笑一声，“事实是，我当时确定这次他们终于要来了。当然啰，我认为他们这次一定会来，也不是毫无道理吧？毕竟，我现在处于事业的巅峰。我还能再继续这样旅行多久呢？当然，如果我给任何人添了不必要的麻烦，我深感抱歉，但可以肯定不会出现这种情况。他们一定在这儿的某个地

方。况且，我听到他们了。我把车停在树林里的时候，我听到他们来了，听到了马车声。他们一定在这儿，一定在，这不是毫无道理的……”

我瘫倒在附近的一张椅子上，意识到自己开始抽泣。这时，我突然想到我父母来这城市的可能性是多么渺茫。我实在想不明白，自己怎么会对此事如此自信，居然还先后向霍夫曼和斯达特曼小姐讨要解释。我又继续抽泣了一会儿，然后发现斯达特曼小姐正站在我面前。

“瑞德先生，瑞德先生。”她轻柔地重复道。我抑制住眼泪，她和蔼地说：“瑞德先生。也许这里还没有人曾向您提起过这件事。但曾经有一次，那是好几年前了，您父母确实来过这座城市。”

我停止抽泣，抬头望着她。她冲我一笑，接着慢慢走向玻璃窗，再次凝视外面的晨光。

“他们一定是一起来度假的，”她说，目光依旧停在远处。“他们乘火车过来，在城里待了两三天。照我说，那是几年前的事情了，那时您还没有像现在这么声名显赫，但是，您也绝非无名之辈，所以呢，有个人，也许是他们住的酒店里的人，问他们是否和您有关系。您知道，他们这么问是因为他们的名字和他们是英国人。于是这件事就这么传开了，说这对和蔼、年迈的英国夫妇是您的父母。那时虽没有今天这般兴师动众，但他们着实被照顾得很周到。几年后，当您名声远扬时，人们想起了这件事，想起了您父母曾来过这里。我本人对他们的到访没有很多记忆，因为当时我还太小。不过我记得人们在谈论这件事。”

我仔细盯着她的后背。“斯达特曼小姐，您不会是为了安慰我才告诉我这些的吧？”

“不，不，全是真的。谁都可以证实我说的话。正如我所说，我当时只是个小孩，但这儿有很多人都可以告诉您这些。另外，这一切都被完好地记录在案。”

“那他们看上去开心吗？他们有没有一起欢笑，有没有享受度假？”

“我保证他们很开心，瑞德先生。大家都这么说，他们乐在其中。事实上，每个人都记得他们是非常开心的一对。彼此体贴，情投意合。”

“但……但我想问的是，斯达特曼女士，他们有没有得到很好的照顾？我想问的这个……”

“他们当然得到了很好的照料。而且他们很开心。在此逗留期间，他们一直都很开心。”

“您怎么记得这些的？您不是说您那时候还是个小女孩吗？”

“我所说的是每个人都记得的东西。”

“如果您说的是真的，那为什么在我来这儿的这段时间里没有人跟我提起过呢？”

斯达特曼小姐犹豫片刻，再次转向树林和晨曦。“我不知道，”她轻声说，摇了摇头。“我不知道为何会这样。但您说得对。人们没有像你想象的那样大谈特谈。但是这也没错啊，我向您保证。我从儿时就记得非常清楚。”

外面开始传来鸟儿的鸣叫声和歌唱声。斯达特曼小姐继续盯着远方的树木，也许童年时的其他记忆正在她脑海里浮现。我朝她望了一会，然后说：

“您说他们在这里受到了款待。”

“嗯，是的，”斯达特曼小姐几乎耳语道，双眼依旧盯着远方。“我肯定他们受到了款待。那一定是个春天，这儿的春天可美了。还有老城区，您已亲眼目睹它有多么迷人。过往的普通人会给他们指点一些地方。历史建筑、工艺品博物馆、桥梁。无论哪儿，假如他们想停下来喝杯咖啡，用些点心，却又不知道要点些什么——或许是因为语言的问题吧——服务员会非常热情地帮忙。噢，是的，他们一定非常享受在这里的时光。”

“可是你说他们是坐火车来的。有人帮他们拿行李吗？”

“火车站的搬运工会立刻帮他们的。把所有行李搬到出租车上，然后出租车司机会看管行李。把您父母送达酒店，就那样。我相信他们甚至都不用考虑行李的事儿。”

“酒店？是哪家酒店？”

“一家非常舒适的酒店，瑞德先生。那个时候最好的酒店之一。他们一定非常喜欢那里。享受在那里的每分每秒。”

“我希望酒店离主干道不是很近。我母亲历来讨厌交通噪音。”

“那时候，当然，交通并不像现在这样是个大问题。我记得小时候我经常跟伙伴们在居民区的街上跳绳或者打球。毫无疑问，今天的孩子们可不行啦！噢，是的，我以前常那样，有时一玩就是几个小时。不过回到您的问题，瑞德先生，”斯达特曼小姐转向我，面带怅惘的微笑，“您父母那时住的酒店远离交通要道。是家田园式的酒店。它现在已不复存在，但如果您愿意，我可以给您看张照片。您想看吗？您父母住的那家酒店？”

“非常想看，斯达特曼小姐。”

她又笑了笑，穿过房间，走向桌边。我以为她想打开一个抽屉，但在最后一刻她改变方向，走向办公室的后墙。她举起一只手，拉住一根粗线，开始往下拉一幅像挂图似的东西。我马上发现那不是挂图，而是一幅彩色大照片。她继续往下拉，几乎拉至地面，滚轴发出“咔哒”一声，紧紧卡住了。她走回写字台，打开阅读台灯，将光束导向那幅照片。

接下来的一段时间里，我们俩静静地看着眼前的这幅照片。酒店看上去像是一座缩小版的童话城堡，由上世纪的疯狂国王建造而成。它矗立在一处陡峭峡谷的边缘，峡谷覆满蕨草和春花。照片是在一个风和日丽的日子从山谷背面拍摄的，构图明快悦目，很适合做成明信片或日历。

“我相信您父母当时就住在这个房间。”我听到斯达特曼小姐说。她不知从哪儿弄来了一根指示棒，指了指酒店一座角楼上的一扇窗户。“您看，他们可以看到很美的风景。”

“是的，没错。”

斯达特曼将指示棒朝下指，但我继续盯着那窗户，努力想象窗外的景象。特别是我母亲，她一定会喜欢这样的景致。即使是在艰难的日子里，即使她需要长期卧床，她依旧会因这样的景色而深感欣慰。她会看着微风吹过峡谷，拂动蕨草和树上的绿叶，树木盘根交错地沿远处山谷的斜坡攀援而上。她也一定会喜欢眼前广阔的天空。我注意到照片中最前面——右边一角，横穿底部——有一截山路，很有可能摄影师就是从这儿拍摄的。几乎可以确定，我母亲会从她的房间里看到这条山路。这样她就可以一窥远处那转瞬流逝的当地生活。奇特的车子或杂货车会从中经过，甚至也许是一辆二轮马车；有时是一辆拖拉机，或者是几个徒步远足的孩子。这些景象必定会让她无比开心。

最后，当我继续看着窗户的时候，我又开始哭了，并不像刚才那样无法抑制，但泪水盈满了我的眼眶，流下脸颊。斯达特曼小姐注意到了我的眼泪，但这次她好像觉得没有必要制止。她朝我微微一笑，然后转回那幅照片。

突然，房门上响起了一下敲门声，我被吓了一跳。斯达特曼小姐也愣了一下，说了声“抱歉，瑞德先生”，然后径直朝门口走去。

我转过身，看到一位身着白色制服的男子走了进来，身后拉着一辆餐车。他将车子放在门槛的中间，顶开那道门，然后望着窗外的晨光。

“今天是个好天气，”他说，依次冲我们微微一笑。“您的早餐，小姐。要把它放在那张桌子上吗？”

“早餐？”斯特曼小姐一脸茫然。“应该是再过半个小时送过来的嘛。”

“冯·温特斯坦先生吩咐现在开始供应早餐，小姐。我觉得他是对的。一般人都在这个时间用早餐。”

“噢。”斯达特曼小姐依然一脸困惑，她回头朝我看了一眼，仿佛在寻求帮助。随后她问那位男子：“外面的一切……都好吗？”

“现在一切都好，小姐。当然，布罗茨基先生晕倒之后，有过一阵恐慌，但现在大家都很开心，很享受。您看，冯·温特斯坦先生刚才在门厅做了一场精彩的演讲，他说这座城市有辉煌的历史文化遗产，值得我们引以为傲。他提到在过去的岁月中我们取得了许多成就，指出了其他城市所面临的糟糕问题，而那些问题在我们这里都根本无需担忧。这也是我们所需要的，小姐。很遗憾您没有在场聆听。听了那演讲，我们大家都为自己和我们的城市感到高兴，现在人人都怡然自得。瞧，那儿有几个人。”他指了指窗外，果然，外面微弱的灯光中，依稀可以见到几个人影小心翼翼地端着盘子缓慢地走过草地，在寻找地方坐下。

“抱歉，”我边说边站了起来，“我得去表演了。要迟到了。斯达特曼小姐，谢谢您的好意，谢谢这一切。但现在请原谅我的离开。”

还没等她回应，我便匆匆挤过早餐车，奔向走廊。

第三十七章

一道苍白的晨光渗入这条幽暗的走廊。我朝那处镶着镜面的壁龛望去（刚才我就是在那里离开霍夫曼的），但他已经不在。我朝礼堂方向快步走去，一路经过那些镶着金框的油画，途中遇到了另一位推着早餐车的侍者，当时他在俯身敲一扇门，但是，除了他以外，走廊里空无一人。

我继续匆匆赶路，四处寻找那个紧急出口，原先我正是从那里进入这条走廊的。此时此刻，我心中有股相当强烈的冲动，想着手开始演出。我突然意识到，无论我经历了怎样的失望，都无法减少我对大家的责任，为了看我坐在他们面前演奏钢琴，他们已经等待了好几星期。换句话说，今晚至少应以我惯常的水准演奏，这是我的职责所在。达不到这一点——我突然有种强烈的预感——就势必打开一扇奇怪的大门，把我带入黑暗未知的空间。

过了一会儿，走廊变得陌生起来。墙纸变成了深蓝色，签名照替代了油画，我意识到我已错过了那扇门。我发觉自己正朝着另一扇外观更加结实的大门走去，上面写着“舞台”的字样，于是，我决定由此进入。

在黑暗中摸索了几秒之后，我发现自己又一次来到了侧厢。我看见钢琴放在空旷的舞台中央，一两盏灯从上方投下昏暗的光亮。我还看到幕布依旧拉着，于是悄悄走上了舞台。

我俯视了一下布罗茨基早前躺过的地方，但现在已看不到任何痕迹。然后我又回头扫了一眼钢琴，不知如何是好。假如我就这样坐在凳子上开始演奏，技师们也许就会心有灵犀，拉开幕布，打开聚光灯。然而，也还有可能——谁也说不准到底发生了什么——技师们早就离岗，幕布根本不会打开。更何况，我上一次见到观众的时候，他们就站在一边心神不定地在聊天。我当机立断，最好就是走出帷幕，通告众人，给大家——观众和技师——做好相应准备的机会。我在脑海中迅速排练了几句台词，然后毫不迟疑地走向褶皱空隙处，拉开了厚重的帷幕。

我已经对礼堂可能的混乱做好了心理准备，但映入眼帘的一幕还是让我大吃一惊。不仅观众完全消失不见，所有的坐席也都不复存

在。我突然想到，这座大厅也许有某种装置，只要拉动机关，全部座椅就会遁入地板，这样礼堂的面积就翻了一番，可用作舞池或其他场地。但我随即想起了这座建筑的建造年代，觉得这完全不可能。我只能猜想，这些曾经堆叠放置的座椅，现在都已悉数清除，以防火灾。总之，在我眼前的是一个巨大、昏暗、空旷的场地。没有任何灯光，却随处可见天花板上的大块长方形挡板都已被卸走，一束束惨白的日光直接洒落在地板上。

我透过混浊的光线凝望，感觉可以辨认出有些人影还在大厅后部。他们好像站成一圈在开会——或许他们是舞台工作人员，在完成清理工作——接着，我听到了其中一人大步走离某处的脚步声。

我站在舞台边，思考着接下来怎么办。我想，我在斯达特曼小姐的办公室里呆的时间比想象的要长得多——可能长达一个小时了吧——很明显，观众已经放弃希望，认为我不会出现了。然而，如果发份通告，几分钟之内客人们就可以重聚在礼堂，而且即使座位已不翼而飞，我也不觉有任何理由不能上演一场称心如意的独奏。不过，我倒不清楚人们都到哪里去了，而且我意识到，我得首先找到霍夫曼或者现在的负责人，讨论下一步行动。

我爬下舞台，穿过大厅。还没走到一半，我就感觉自己迷失在黑暗中，于是我稍稍改变了方向，朝离我最近的那束光走去。正走着，一个身影从我眼前掠过。

“噢，抱歉，”面前的人说道，“请您原谅。”

我听出了斯蒂芬的声音，回答道：“你好！呃，至少你还在这儿。”

“噢，瑞德先生。对不起，我没有看见您。”他听起来既疲惫又沮丧。

“你真的应该更加高兴才对，”我对他说道，“你的演出很精彩。观众们都被打动了。”

“是啊。是的，我觉得他们确实给了我很大的支持。”

“那么，祝贺你啦！一番辛劳之后，一定很满足吧。”

“是啊，我想是的。”

我们开始在黑暗中相伴而行。此时，天花板上倾泻而下的日光让人更难辨别方向，但斯蒂芬却好像熟门熟路。

“您知道，瑞德先生，”他说，“我十分感谢您。您一直以来都给了我巨大的鼓励。可是，我今晚没有达到目标。反正没达到我自己的水准。当然，观众给了我热烈的掌声，但那是因为他们没有料到会有如此奇特的事情。不过，说真的，我知道自己还有很长的一段路要走。我父母是对的。”

“你父母？天哪，你不应该担心他们。”

“不，不是这样，瑞德先生，您不明白。我父母，您看，他们的标准可高啦。今晚来的人，他们都很友善，但说真的，他们对这些事情知之甚少。他们看到一位当地小伙有一定的演奏水平就非常兴奋。但我希望以真正的标准来衡量自己。而我知道，我父母也是如此。瑞德先生，我已经决定了。我要走出去。我要到更大的地方去，师从像鲁伯金和佩鲁齐这样的大师。我现在意识到，在这里，我永远达不到我想要的水平，在这座城市不行。看看他们，在一场十分平常的《玻璃激情》演奏结束后，看看他们鼓掌的样子吧。基本上就可以这么概括。我以前不明白，但我想您可以称我是小池塘里的一条大鱼吧。我该出去一下。出去看看我到底能做出什么成绩。”

我们继续走着，脚步声在礼堂中回荡。我接过他的话头：

“或许那倒是个明智的决定。其实，我肯定你是对的。到一个更大的城市，接受更大的挑战，我确信这对你大有好处。不过你必须慎重选择要师从谁。如果你愿意，我倒可以思量一下，看看能有啥法子。”

“瑞德先生，若那样，我将终身感激。是的，我得看看自己究竟有多大能耐。然后，某一天，我将重新回到这里，大显身手。好好给他们展示该怎样真正演奏《玻璃激情》。”他笑了笑，但那笑声还是十分不悦。

“你是个有才华的年轻人。你有锦绣前程。真的该振奋精神才对啊。”

“我也是这样想。我觉得我只是有点胆怯。直到今晚我才意识到，眼前有多大一座山峰等待我去攀登。您也许觉得这十分可笑，但您知道吗，我直到今天才明白。生活在这样一个地方，影响不言自明啊。你的思想格局会很小。是的，我以为今晚会上大功告成呢！您看，此前我的想法是多么荒唐。我父母十分正确。我还需要学习很多东西。”

“你父母？听着，我的建议是，眼下你得彻底忘掉父母的要求。我不妨说，我真的不理解他们怎么能……”

“啊，我们到了。这边走。”我们来到一个门口，斯蒂芬此刻拉开一块门帘。“它正是从这里通过的。”

“不好意思，是什么通过这里？”

“暖房。噢，或许您没听说过这个暖房。它其实挺有名的。在大厅建成一百年后落成，但现在几乎已经和它齐名了。那是大家去吃早饭的地方。”

我们来到一条走廊里，走廊一侧是长长的一排窗户。透过较近的一扇窗户，我可以望见清晨淡蓝色的天空。

“顺便问一句，”我们又开始往前走了起来，这时我说道，“不知布罗茨基先生怎么样了。他是否健康。他……是不是去世了？”

“布罗茨基先生？喔，没有啊，他会好起来的，我相信。他们把他送到某个地方去了。实际上，我听说他们把他送到了圣尼古拉斯专科医院。”

“圣尼古拉斯专科医院？”

“那是个收容穷苦人的地方。刚才大家在暖房里还在议论呢，都说，这下好了，那正是他该去的地方，在那儿，人们知道怎样处理他这样的问题。说实话，我有些震惊。事实上——我私下告诉您吧，瑞德先生——正是那一切促使我下了决心。我指的是离开此地这件事。在我看来，布罗茨基先生今晚的演出是许许多多年来在这音乐厅里最为曼妙动听的。当然它也是我的音乐欣赏史上最精彩的演出了。但是，您看到了实际情形。他们不喜欢这种音乐，这种音乐把他们吓了一跳。这大大超出了他们的料想。他那样倒下了，他们着实安心了许多。现在他们意识到想要别的东西。一些不那么极端的東西。”

“也许是某种与克里斯托弗先生相差不大的东西。”

斯蒂芬想了想。“有一点点区别。至少是个新的名字。他们现在意识到克里斯托弗不怎么样。他们确实想要更好的东西。但……但不是那样的。”

透过窗户，我看见了外面宽阔的草坪，太阳从远处的那排树木上方冉冉升起。

“你觉得布罗茨基先生现在怎么样了？”我问道。

“布罗茨基先生？噢，他会回到一直以来的那个老样子。我想，以酒度日吧。他们肯定不会轻易允许他改变，今晚以后肯定不会。正如我所说，他们把他送到了圣尼古拉斯专科医院。我在这里长大，瑞德先生，从许多方面讲，我依然热爱这座城市。但是，现在我渴望离开。”

“也许我该尽力说些什么吧。我的意思是，跟暖房里的人说上几句。说说布罗茨基先生，让他们正确看待他。”

斯蒂芬思虑了一会儿，摇了摇头。

“不必，瑞德先生。”

“但是我必须说，我跟你一样，也不喜欢这样。你根本不知道。我讲上几句话……”

“我并不这样认为，瑞德先生。他们现在甚至不会听您的了。自布罗茨基先生的那场演出之后，他们就不会再听您的了。那使他们想起了他们所恐惧的一切。况且，暖房里没有任何麦克风，甚至连个讲台都没有。嘈杂声此起彼伏，没人听得见您说的话。您看，暖房很大，几乎赶上礼堂那么大。从一个角落到另一个角落，肯定得有……呃，即使你保持绝对笔直的对角线，将一路上所有的桌子以及落座的宾客推到一边，距离至少仍有五十米。您将看到，那是一个很大的地方。我要是您，瑞德先生，我现在就会很轻松地享用我的早餐。毕竟，您还得考虑赫尔辛基之行呢。”

暖房果真很大，此时正沐浴在晨光中。人们在愉快交谈着，有些围坐在桌旁，有些站成一群。我看到人们正在喝咖啡或果汁，吃着盘中或碗中的食物。我们从人群中走过时，新鲜的蛋卷、鱼糕以及咸肉的香味儿依次扑鼻而来。我看见侍者端着餐盘和咖啡壶来回穿梭。在我周围，人们欢声笑语，互致问候，我突然觉得这整个气氛颇像是一场重聚联欢会。可是，这些人却是时常相互见面的。显然，今晚的活动使他们得以深刻地重估自我以及他们的社团，而最终的氛围——不管出于什么原因——显得颇为喜庆。

我现在明白了，斯蒂芬是对的，我想给这群人讲话实在是没有意义，更别提请他们回到礼堂去听我的独奏了。我突然感到又累又饿，就决定坐下来吃点早餐。然而，我环顾四周，却没有看见一张空椅子。而且，我转身后发现斯蒂芬已不在我身旁，而是在跟我们刚刚路过的一桌人攀谈。我看着他们向他热情问候，隐隐期待他能把我介绍给大家。但是，他好像沉浸在交谈中，很快也露出一副开心的样子。

我决定不管他，自己继续前行。我想早晚会有一个侍者发现我，会端着盘子和咖啡快步向我走来，也许还会帮我找到个座位。可是，尽管确实有个侍者好几次匆匆朝我走来，但他每次都从我身旁而过，我只能眼睁睁看着他为其他人服务。

过了一会儿，我发现自己正站在距离暖房正门很近的地方。有人已经打开大门，许多宾客纷纷拥向草坪。我走了出去，外面寒气袭人。但是，这里也一样，人们聚在一起交谈，喝着咖啡或者吃着东西。一些人已经面向朝阳，另一些人则四处闲逛，伸展双腿。有群人甚至坐在了湿漉漉的草地上，盘子和咖啡壶摊在四周，好像在野餐似的。

我看见不远处的草地上有一辆餐车，一位侍者正弯腰忙碌着。我越发饿了，于是向餐车走去，我正要拍那侍者的肩膀，他突然转过身，匆匆从我身边跑开，臂膊上压着三只大盘子——我瞥了一眼，只见上面放着鸡蛋、香肠、蘑菇和番茄。我眼睁睁地看着他匆忙离开，于是决定就在原地等他回来。

在等他的时候，我观察了一下周围的景致，发现自己完全不必担心能否应对这个城市的各种要求。一如往昔，事实已经充分证明，我有足够的经验和直觉帮自己渡过难关。当然，对今晚，我是感到有些失望，但是，进一步思考以后，我就明白了这种感觉不合时宜。毕竟，假如一个社会无须受外人的指引即可达至某种平衡，那是再好不过了。

过了几分钟，侍者还是没有回来——这期间，餐车上的热罐子散发出各种诱人的香味，撩得我垂涎欲滴——我当机立断，自己动手也未尝不可。我拿了个餐盘，正弯腰在下面几层寻找器皿，突然意识到有几个人站在我的身后。我转过身，看到了迎宾员们。

我认出来了，上次围聚在古斯塔夫病床边的这十几个人，现在全出现在了 my 面前。我转身时，有几位垂下了眼睛，但还有几个继续逼视着我。

“我的天哪，”我极力想掩饰自己亲手取用早餐的意图。“我的天哪，怎么了？不用说，我本来是想去探问古斯塔夫的境况的。我以为他已经去医院了。那就是说，他被照料得很好。我当然正准备去看他……”他们脸上流露出悲伤的神情，我打住了话头。

络腮胡迎宾员走上前，不自在地咳嗽了一声。“他半个小时前刚刚去世了，先生。这些年，他一直生活坎坷，但身体都很健康，所以

对他的死我们都很意外。太意外了。”

“我很难过。”听到这消息，我真的很难过。“真的很难过。非常感激你们，感激大家专程来告诉我。正如你们所知，我认识他才几天，但他一直对我很好，帮我拿包呀，等等。”

我看到络腮胡迎宾员的同伴们都正看着他，怂恿他再说些什么。他深吸了一口气。

“当然，瑞德先生，”他说，“我们来这里找您，是因为我们知道您想尽快知道这消息。可是，”他突然垂下目光，“可是，您看，先生，在他去世前，古斯塔夫，他一直想知道。一直想知道您是不是做过了演讲。就是，就是您将代表我们做的那个简短的演讲，先生。直到最后，他都非常想听到这消息。”

此时，所有迎宾员都垂下了双眼，静静等待我的回答。

“啊，”我说道，“这么说来，你们到现在还不知道礼堂里发生了什么喽。”

“我们刚才一直守在古斯塔夫身边，先生，”胡子迎宾员说道，“他刚刚才被抬走。您得原谅我们，瑞德先生。您做演讲的时候，我们都不在，这十分失礼，特别承蒙您还记得您那小小的承诺……”

“哎，”我礼貌地打断他，“很多事情都没能按计划进行。我很吃惊你们到现在还未听说，不过我觉得，正如你们所说，在这样的情况下……”我停顿片刻，做了个深呼吸，然后更加坚定地说：“我很抱歉，但事实上，许多事情，包括我为了你们准备的这一场演说，都没能按原计划进行。”

“先生，那么您是说……”络腮胡迎宾员的声音越来越低，其他迎宾员刚才一直盯视着我，这会儿他们一个个又垂下了目光。接着，站在人群后面的一个人近乎愤怒地大喊起来：

“古斯塔夫一直在问。直到最后都在问‘瑞德先生有消息了吗？’他一直都在这样问！”

几位同伴很快让他镇静了下来，随后是一阵长长的沉默。最后，始终低头看着草坪的络腮胡迎宾员开口道：

“那没关系。我们会一如既往，继续努力。事实上，我们将尽更大的努力。我们绝不让古斯塔夫失望。他始终是我们的精神支柱，尽管现在他离世了，但一切都不会变。我们得艰苦奋斗，我们一直都这

样，我们知道的，将来也不会更加轻松。但我们不会降低标准，一点都不会。我们会铭记古斯塔夫，我们会坚持不懈。当然，您的演说，先生，如果可能的话，一定会……一定有助于我们，这是无可置疑的。但当然啰，如果那时您不方便……”

“哎，”我渐渐失去了耐心，“你们很快就会知道到底发生什么事了。真的，我很吃惊，你们都不大关心公共大事。还有，你们似乎都不知道我过的是一种什么样的生活，不知道我得承担多大的责任。即使是现在，我站在这里和你们讲话，我还得考虑后面的赫尔辛基之行。所以，如果万事都不如你们所愿，那我深感抱歉。可是，你们无权像现在这样来纠缠我……”

我慢慢收起了话头。在我右边的远处，有一条小径从音乐大厅通往周边的树林。有那么一会儿，我留意到人们从大楼里涌出来，消失在树林后——也许，他们想趁天亮前赶回家，再休息上一两个小时。这时我认出了索菲和鲍里斯，他们果断地沿着小径前行。小男孩再次一手搂着妈妈，但除此之外，漫不经心的旁观者不会注意到他们的痛苦。我试图一窥他们脸上的表情，但他们离得太远了，很快他们也消失在了树林后。

“很抱歉，”我转过身，更加轻柔地说道，“但请你们原谅。”

“我们绝不降低标准。”络腮胡迎宾员静静地说，他仍然盯视着地面。“总有一天，我们能做到的。您看着吧。”

“请原谅。”

我正要离开，侍者就匆匆赶回来了，他推开老人们，走到餐车旁。我想起餐盘还被我藏在身后，便一把递给了他。

“今天早上的服务简直太不像话了。”我冷冷地说道，然后快步离开。

第三十八章

林间是一条笔直的小路，我可以清楚地看到小路尽头那扇高高的铁门。索菲和鲍里斯已经走得很远，我虽极力追赶了几分钟，却仍未能缩短我们之间的距离。各种各样的阻碍无法令我加快脚步。走在我前面的是一小群年轻人，每当我想超过他们的时候，他们就稍稍加快脚步，或者分散开来把整条小路占了。最后，当我看到远处索菲和鲍里斯已经快要到街上了的时候，我再也不管会给他们留下什么印象，冲过前面这群人狂奔起来。

此后，我一路稳步小跑，但当索菲和鲍里斯经过那扇门的时候，我还是跟他们相隔很远。等我到达那扇门时，我已气喘吁吁，不得不停下来喘口气。

穿过大门便是靠近城市中心的林荫大道。清晨的阳光照亮了对面的人行道。商店都还没有开门，街上走着一些去上班的人。我看到左边一些人正排着队要上电车，索菲和鲍里斯排在最后。我再次奔跑起来，但电车必定比我想象的要远得多，因为尽管我步履飞快，但一直到整支队伍都已经上了车我才赶到，而此时电车正要开动。于是我只能疯狂地挥手，才成功拦下司机，拼命挤上了车。

电车颠簸前行，我摇摇晃晃地在中间过道上走着。我跑得上气不接下气，只隐隐注意到车厢有一半满。我走到车厢后部，瘫倒在一个座位上，这时我才记起，我一定已经从索菲和鲍里斯身边走过了。我喘着粗气，侧身靠向一边，回头沿通道看去。

车厢被中间的出口处明显分成两部分。前半节车厢里是面对面的长长两排座位，我看到索菲和鲍里斯同坐在向阳的一侧，离司机不远。中间的出口处站着几位乘客，他们抓着拉手吊环，遮住了我的视线，我只得又向中间过道倾斜身子。这时，坐在我对面的那位先生——后半节车厢里的座位是设置成两张面对面的——拍了下大腿，说道：

“看样子，今天又是个大晴天。”

他穿着一件短拉链夹克，看起来既朴素又整洁，我猜他可能是一个技工——也许是个电工吧。我飞快地朝他笑了笑，他便开始讲他和同事前几天在里面工作的一幢大楼。我并不怎么专心地听他讲着，偶

尔冲他笑笑，作些表示同意的回应。与此同时，由于更多的人站起来挤到了出口处，我就更难看清索菲和鲍里斯了。

电车停了，乘客们下了车，我的视野顿时清晰起来。鲍里斯看起来还是像往常一样镇静，他把一只手搭在索菲的肩上，满腹狐疑地盯着其他乘客，好像他们对他母亲构成了威胁。我依旧看不清索菲的表情，只能看到隔几秒钟她就恼怒地挥挥手，可能在赶一只在她旁边乱飞的虫子。

我正想再次调整姿势，突然发觉那个电工不知怎的说起了他的父母。他告诉我，他的父母都已经八十多了，虽然他尽量每天都去看他们一次，但由于现在的这份工作，他越来越难做到这样了。我突然想起了什么，打断他道：

“抱歉，不过说起父母，好像我的父母很多年来来过这座城市。只是来旅游观光的，您知道。距今已经好多年了吧。只是，告诉我这件事的那个人当时也只是个小孩，也记不大清了。所以我在想，既然我们谈起了父母——当然，我不是有意冒犯，您现在大概已经五十来岁了吧——不知您本人是否还记得他们来访过。”

“很有可能，”那个电工说道，“但是你得先描述一下他们。”

“嗯，我母亲个子很高，一头及肩黑发，鹰钩鼻，看上去颇为严厉，甚至无意严厉时也如此。”

电工想了一会儿，看着窗外掠过的城市风光。“嗯，”他点了点头，说道，“嗯，我想我记得那样一位女士。只有几天时间而已。四处观光，诸如此类的事情。”

“对。那么您想起来了？”

“嗯。她看上去非常和蔼。噢，那至少是十三四年前的事了。可能比那还要长。”

我激动地点点头。“这就跟斯达特曼小姐告诉我的对上号了。对，那就是我的母亲。告诉我，她在这儿过得好吗？”

电工仔细想了想，说：“我记得，她好像很喜欢这儿，对。事实上——”他好像看出了我脸上的关切，“事实上，我肯定她过得很好。”他向前倾了倾身，很有礼貌地拍了拍我的膝盖。“我非常肯定她在这儿很开心。呃，只要稍微想一想就知道。她一定很开心，是不是？”

“我想是的。”说着我把头扭向窗外。阳光照进了整个车厢内部。“我想是的，只是……”我深深叹了口气，“我只是希望我当时就知道。希望那时有人想到过告诉我。那我父亲呢？他看上去开心吗？”

“你父亲，嗯……”电工交叉起双臂，微微皱眉。

“他那时候一定特别瘦，”我说道，“头发花白，穿一件他最喜欢的夹克，粗花呢的，浅绿色，肘上有一块皮革补丁。”

电工继续回忆着，最后他摇了摇头，说道：“对不起，我不记得您父亲了。”

“那不可能。斯达特曼小姐很肯定地告诉我，他们是一起来的。”

“我肯定她说得没错。只是我自己记不起您的父亲了。您的母亲我记得，但您的父亲……”他又摇了摇头。

“可是，那太荒谬了！我母亲一个人来这里干什么？”

“我不是说您父亲没有和您母亲在一起。只是我记不起他了。听我说，别这么难过。要是我知道这会让您如此不安，我就不这么坦率了。我的记性很差，大家都这么说。就在昨天，我在小舅子家里吃午饭时，还把自己的工具箱忘在那儿了呢。我又浪费了四十分钟回去拿。我的工具箱啊！”他笑了笑，“您看，我的记性实在很差。像这样重要的事情，我是最不值得信任的一个人。我肯定您父亲一定跟您母亲在一起，尤其是如果别人也这样说的话。真的，我是最不可以信赖的人。”

但此时我已经扭过头，不再看他，开始再次看向车厢前部，鲍里斯终于控制不住他的情绪了。他扑进妈妈的怀里，肩膀随着抽泣不由自主地抖动。突然，我觉得好像没有比走向他更重要的事了。于是，我匆忙向电工说了句“对不起”，起身向车厢前部走去。

就在我快要走到他们身边时，电车突然一个急转弯，我不得不抓住车的横杆才没有摔倒。当我再看他们时，发现他们还是没有注意到我在靠近他们，尽管此时我正站在离他们很近的地方。他们依然紧紧相拥，闭着双眼。片片阳光洒在他们的胳膊和肩膀上。此时此刻，他们沉浸在自己的天地中，彼此安慰，仿佛连我都无法侵扰。我继续注视着他们，尽管他们显得痛苦不堪，但我的心中浮起一种奇怪的嫉妒感。我又向他们靠近了些，直至几乎可以感受到他们真切的拥抱。

索菲终于睁开了眼睛。她面无表情地看着我，小男孩继续靠在她的怀中哭泣。

“我很难过，”我终于开口了，“我对这一切很难过。我刚刚才听说了你父亲的事。当然，我一听说就赶来了……”

她脸上的表情阻止了我继续说下去。又过了一会儿，她还是对我很冷漠。最后她疲惫地说道：

“走开。你一直都徘徊在我们爱的门外。现在，看看你吧。你也同样无法走入我们的悲痛中。别管我们。你走吧。”

鲍里斯离开他母亲的怀抱，转身看着我，然后对母亲说：“不，不。我们要在一起。”

索菲摇了摇头。“不，没用的。随他去吧，鲍里斯。让他去闯荡世界，贡献他的专长和才智。他需要那么做。咱们放手让他去吧。”

鲍里斯困惑地看着我，然后又看看他妈妈。也许他是想要说些什么，但这时索菲站了起来。

“快点，鲍里斯。我们得在这儿下车了。鲍里斯，快点。”

电车正慢慢停下来，乘客们陆续从座位上站起身。一些人从我身边穿过，索菲和鲍里斯也挤过去了。我抓着横杆，看见鲍里斯沿中间的过道朝出口走去。就在那时他回头看看我，我听见他说：

“我们一定要在一起。一定要。”

然后我看见站在他后面的索菲，她怪异而冷漠地盯着我，我听到她说：

“他永远不会成为我们的一员。你得明白，鲍里斯。他永远不会像一个真正的父亲那样爱你。”

更多的人从我身边走过。我举起手。

“鲍里斯！”我喊道。

鲍里斯在人群中踌躇，再一次回头看我。

“鲍里斯！那次公共汽车之行，你还记得吗？那次乘公共汽车去人工湖。你还记得那有多好吗？车上每个人对我们都多友好啊。他们送给我们小礼物，一路歌唱。你还记得吗，鲍里斯？”

乘客们现在已经开始下车。鲍里斯最后看了我一眼，便从我的视线中消失了。更多的人从我身边走过，电车再一次开动了。

过了一会儿，我转身回到自己的座位上，再一次坐在了那个电工对面。他满脸堆笑。我发现他倾身向前，拍了拍我的肩膀，我这才意识到自己正在抽泣。

“听着，”他说道，“一切事情当时看来总是很糟糕。但是，一旦过去，就不会那么糟了。振作起来吧。”他继续说着这些空洞的话语，而我则一直抽泣不止。接着我听到他说：“来，来吃点早餐吧。像我们一样吃点东西。你一定会感觉好一点的。来吧。去吃点东西。”

我抬头看了看他，看见他的膝盖上有一只盘子，盘子上有一个吃了一半的羊角面包和一小块黄油。他的膝盖上全是面包屑。

“啊，”我挺直身子，恢复了镇静，说道，“你从哪儿拿的这个？”

电工指了指我肩膀后面。我转过身，看到一群乘客站在电车的正后方，那里有自助餐供应。我同时又发现，整个后半节车厢都非常拥挤，我们周围所有的乘客都在吃喝。与很多人的早餐相比，电工的早餐可谓简单素净。此刻我可以看到，人们从盛着鸡蛋、培根、西红柿、香肠的大盘子中间走过。

“来，”电工再一次说道，“去给你自己拿些早餐，然后我们来谈谈你所有的坎坷。或者如果你愿意的话，我们可以忘了这一切，聊聊你喜欢的事，只要能让你振作起来，什么都行。足球啊，电影呀，任何你喜欢的事情。但是，你现在要做的第一件事就是去吃早餐。你好像已经好久没吃东西了。”

“你说得很对，”我说，“现在我想起来了，我是好久没吃东西了。但请你先告诉我，这辆电车是要去哪里呀？我得回我住的酒店打包行李。你知道，我今天早上要乘飞机去赫尔辛基，必须马上先回酒店。”

“噢，这辆电车几乎可以载你到这座城市的任何一个地方。这就是我们所说的早间环线。还有夜间环线。电车一天两趟，环城走完全线。噢，是的，你可以乘这辆车到任何地方。晚上也一样，但是晚上的气氛会很不一样。噢，是的，这是一辆很不可思议的电车。”

“太好了。那么，请原谅我，我会接受你的建议，吃点早餐。其实，你说得很对。甚至单单想想这个就让我感觉好多了。”

“这种精气神才对嘛。”说完，电工拿起羊角面包向我致意。

我站起身，走向车厢后部。各种香味扑鼻而来。很多人在那儿就餐，但是越过他们的肩膀，我看到在电车后窗的下面摆放着一个大大的半圆形自助餐台。那儿的食物几乎应有尽有：炒鸡蛋，煎蛋，一系列冷盘肉和腊肠，爆炒土豆，蘑菇，熟番茄，还有一大盘鲱鱼卷和其他鱼类配品，两大篮羊角面包和不同种类的卷饼，一大玻璃碗的新鲜水果，很多壶咖啡和果汁。围在自助餐台前的每个人好像都在争先恐后地想拿取食物，但气氛显得非常亲切友好，人们互相传递食物，开心地攀谈着。

我拿了一只盘子，抬起头，透过后车窗看着渐行渐远的城市街道，感觉精神更加昂扬。毕竟，事情没有那么糟糕。不管这个城市带来了怎样的失望，我来到这儿无疑受到了极大的欢迎——就像我去过的其他任何地方一样。此刻，就在这儿，在我的访问即将结束之际，面前有一顿令人无比难忘的自助早餐，我想吃什么几乎就有什么，羊角面包看上去尤其可口诱人。的确，从周围乘客们狼吞虎咽的吃相来看，这些食物显然品质上乘，非常新鲜。可以说，我的目光所及之处，每样食物看上去无不诱人至之。

我开始动手，每样都拿了一点。这期间，我浮想联翩：我已经回到了座位上，与电工愉快地交谈，一边满口吃着食物，一边看着窗外清晨的街道。从很多方面来讲，此时此刻电工是我攀谈的理想人选。他明显很善良热心，但同时又谨慎而不冒昧。这会儿我看到他还在吃着他的羊角面包，显然不急着下车。实际上，他看上去好像准备在那儿坐很久。而且，电车在走着环线，如果我们两个相谈甚欢，他就会推迟下车，直到电车又整整绕了一圈后才下。同样，自助餐台也显然会在这儿再保留一段时间，这样我们就可以随时中止交谈去续添食物。我甚至可以看到我们不断地劝对方多吃一点儿。“来！再来一根腊肠！快，把盘子给我，我给你盛。”我们会继续坐在那儿，边吃边聊，畅谈足球或其他任何爱好。窗外，太阳越升越高，照亮了一条条街道和我们这一边的车厢。只有当我们把能吃下的都吃了，把可能聊的都聊了之后，电工才可能会看一眼手表，叹口气说，我酒店的那一站绕了一圈又要到了。我也叹了口气，不情不愿地站起身，掸了掸大腿上的面包屑。我们会握手，互道日安——他也会告诉我，他马上也得下车了——然后我离开，加入到围聚在下车处的那群兴高采烈的乘

客中。接着，电车停靠，我也许会向电工最后挥挥手，然后下车，确信我可以很自信很骄傲地期盼赫尔辛基之行。

我在杯里倒满咖啡，差点溢出来。然后，我用一只手小心地握着杯子，另一只手端着装满了丰盛食物的盘子，开始朝座位走去。

译后记

如果没有移民作家，那么整个英国当代文坛也许会大大失色，我们也无法读到众多风格迥异、多姿多彩的作品。崛起于二十世纪八十年代的石黑一雄，在英语文学界享有崇高的声望，与奈保尔、拉什迪并称“英国文坛移民三雄”。在三十多年的创作生涯中，他虽然并不多产，一共只发表了六部长篇小说和一部短篇小说集，但他的每部作品几乎都精雕细琢，堪称精品。六部小说中，除处女作《远山淡影》外，其余五部皆进入英国最重要的文学奖——布克奖——的决选名单，1989年他凭《长日将尽》一举折桂，其他作品也获得过大大小小的奖项。

石黑一雄一直把自己的小说创作视为一种国际文化的传播载体，他雄心勃勃地致力于创作一种能够把各种民族和文化背景融合一起的“国际文学题材”，他本人也以“国际主义作家”自诩。他曾在多次访谈中表示，自己希望成为一位国际化小说家。“所谓国际化小说是指这样一种作品：它包含了对于世界上各种不同文化背景的人们都具有重要意义的生活景象。它可以涉及乘坐喷气式飞机穿梭往来于世界各大洲之间的人物，然而他们又可以同样从容地稳固立足于一个小小的地方……这个世界已经变得日益国际化，这是毫无疑问的事实。在过去，对于任何政治、商业、社会变革模式和文艺方面的问题，完全可以进行高水平的讨论而毋庸参照任何国际相关因素。然而，我们现在早已超越了这个历史阶段。如果小说能够作为一种重要的文学形式进入下一个世纪，那是因为作家们已经成功地把它塑造成为一种令人信服的国际化文学载体。我的雄心壮志就是要为它作出贡献。”生于日本，长在英国，石黑一雄穿梭于英日两种文化之间，对于这两种文化驾轻就熟，特殊的生活背景使得他的作品交织着日本文学和英国文学两种传统特质。读他的小说，既能感受到日本文学中淡雅朴素的距离美，又能体会到英国人隐忍克制的性格。他的小说还秉承了东西方小说的一些特点。例如，他对一些日常的微小细节的描写受到了契诃夫的影响；他恰到好处地把握人物的心理，则得益于他对陀思妥耶夫斯基的喜爱；他在小说中对人物心理及回忆的描述颇具意识流大师普鲁斯特的风范；他简洁干净且深藏不露的语言风格又让人想起了海明威。与此同时，它们又包含着日本文学特有的“物哀”之情。“物哀”并非简单的悲哀，悲哀只是“物哀”的一种情绪，而这种情绪所

包含的同情，意味着对他人悲哀的共鸣，对世相的共鸣，对在历史大浪中命如浮萍的小人物的命运的悲戚共鸣。

《无可慰藉》是一部颇具实验性质的小说。它与前三部作品风格迥异：卡夫卡式的叙事，大量的超现实主义描写，变幻莫测的场景，走马灯式的人物，使读者仿佛置身于主人公瑞德的梦境之中。评论界对小说的评价褒贬不一。

小说基本上由第一人称叙述，讲述钢琴演奏家瑞德应邀来到中欧一座不知名的城市，以期通过钢琴独奏会的形式帮助这里的人们解决某种无法言状的危机，重新找回这座城市文化重心。但随着故事的发展，读者很快就发现，瑞德不仅没能帮助他人，自己反而如跌入兔子洞的爱丽丝，深陷困境，无可慰藉。

小说共分四部分，描摹了瑞德在这座中欧城市四天三夜的离奇经历。石黑一雄的笔触从一开始的舒缓柔和到后来的荒诞迷离再到最后的几近恐怖，为读者揭开了这座貌似平和安宁，实则危机重重的城市的神秘面纱，带我们窥探了困在这个城市中的形形色色人物的人生百态。

如果把整部小说比作一幅画，把阅读过程视为赏析此画的话，一开始我们看到的只是舒缓柔和的画面一角，如书中主人公一样，全然不觉等待着我们的将是什么。第一部分描写瑞德为参加几天后的“周四之夜”演奏，拖着疲惫不堪的身躯来到霍夫曼的酒店，浑然不知在接下来的几天这个酒店会成为他的梦魇。从来到这个城市、下榻酒店的那一刻起，瑞德每到一处，每碰到一个人，都会收到五花八门或大或小的怪异请求，就是这些请求，在事情刚刚要迈入正轨的时候，同时将他拽向不同的方向：酒店迎宾员古斯塔夫希望他能同他的女儿交谈，帮她排解心结；酒店经理霍夫曼希望他能抽时间看看他妻子的剪报本；霍夫曼的儿子斯蒂芬希望他能帮他指导一首曲子；古斯塔夫的女儿索菲想要他陪她一起去找房子；索菲的儿子鲍里斯希望他们能一起去他们的旧公寓取心爱的玩具，不会说“不”的瑞德身陷这各种各样的“小忙”中，被搞得焦头烂额，无法自拔。

到了紧接着的第二部分，画面主体开始显现。鬼使神差般，瑞德过去生活中的人物，从儿时的玩伴到幼年的同学，从相亲至爱的妻儿到一墙之隔的邻居，全都在这个本应陌生的城市冒了出来，只有他在这个最熟悉的“陌生”城市步履蹒跚，茫然找不着北。而这一切无疑向读者传达了这样一个信息：对瑞德而言，这座不知名的中欧城市，绝非如他所言般“陌生”；而对这座城市而言，瑞德也绝不仅仅是个

“外来者”。随着这些人物的出现，瑞德的生活也开始浮出水面：自小遭遇家庭不和，缺乏父母关心，导致他即使长大成人，功成名就之后，内心深处依旧极度缺乏父母肯定，自信不足。小时候的遭遇加上长期漂泊，居无定所，使他生活中除了工作，别无其他，朋友疏离，亲人淡漠。他无法替儿时密友出头，也无法在聚会上支持家人，甚至不认识自家的旧公寓。最令读者大跌眼镜的是，古斯塔夫的女儿索菲和外孙鲍里斯竟然是瑞德疏远已久的妻儿，而他“第一次”在老城广场咖啡店见他们时，竟然把他们当做陌生人！这也就使得第二部分结束时，索菲和鲍里斯期盼已久的全家福晚餐以失败告终，瑞德尴尬离开他们的公寓，回到下榻的酒店。

到了第三部分，画面继续展开，画中迷离神秘的元素开始清晰可感。石黑一雄的笔调明显变得荒诞梦幻起来，读者置身文字之中，宛如坠入梦境。先是霍夫曼给瑞德找的疑似卫生间的练琴房，然后是神秘的荒地葬礼，接着是没来由的一堵高墙阻隔道路，最后以一组同样荒诞的迎宾员之舞结束。与此同时，围绕着主人公瑞德，其他两位重要人物酒店经理霍夫曼和前钢琴家、街市酒鬼布罗茨基的重头戏也开始上演，霍夫曼貌似名利双收、琴瑟和谐的日子背后是长期以来的夫妻感情淡漠；而布罗茨基则是长期沦为笑柄，身心俱疲，同分居多年的妻子柯林斯小姐重归于好的机会也是希望渺茫。

小说的第四部分，也是最后一部分，整幅画面全然展现在读者面前。随着全城准备许久、翘首以待的“周四之夜”的来临，前面暗涌的各种困境冲突全都显现，达到高潮：古斯塔夫因为迎宾员之舞运动过度，含恨离世，既没能同女儿索菲达成谅解，为她解开心结，也没能盼到瑞德在致辞中为迎宾员这一群体的荣誉呐喊；一心想要戒除酒瘾，东山再起，赢回美人心的布罗茨基再次与威士忌亲密接触，醉酒中被瑞德开车撞倒，并由一庸医做主切掉一条大腿，强忍着剧痛上台表演，却功败垂成，依旧没能赢得柯林斯小姐的谅解，破镜重圆；多年来在妻子面前长期自卑的霍夫曼不仅给布罗茨基递上那杯致命的威士忌，亲手毁掉自己苦心经营的成果，经过最后的剪报本事件之后，更是全面崩溃，一团混乱；而作为整个“周四之夜”的压轴人物，瑞德竟然没有机会登台演奏，而刚刚略有好转的同索菲和鲍里斯的关系也随着索菲的拒绝再次宣告破裂。至此，石黑一雄带我们走完了这漫长的四天三夜的“崩溃之旅”，小说开篇存在的问题依然存在，小城里处在困境中的人们依然在苦苦挣扎：所有人都心心念念的“周四之夜”终于以全面失败落下帷幕，瑞德没能为这座城市解决危机，也没

能修复与家人朋友的关系；布罗茨基没有梦想成真，霍夫曼也没能盼来奇迹，真正获得幸福。

读罢全篇，我们不禁要问，石黑一雄用如此多的篇幅为我们讲述这样一个略带荒诞的故事，到底用意何在？《无可慰藉》的故事表面上讲的是一个小城的人生百态，透过纸页，我们却看到了作者对当代人的生存状态的深刻思考。如同小说中的瑞德及其他所有人一样，行走在当代社会，我们的心灵全都带着自己的伤口，被困在各自形形色色的大泡泡中，无法与人沟通，也无法从外界获得帮助与慰藉。

这一主题无论是在小说形式还是故事内容上全都得到了印证。从形式上来说，小说以瑞德最初到达酒店为源头触点，据此一环套一环向外发散：一个故事的终结，必然意味着下一个故事的开始，整部小说也就成了一个神秘的故事世界，读者置身其中，宛如困于文字的迷宫，茫然不知出口所在。另一方面，从内容上来说，以瑞德为代表，故事中几乎所有人物都是怏然行走在这个花花世界，既无力帮助他人，也无法获得他人的帮助：瑞德陷在各种各样的“小忙”中无力脱身，霍夫曼和克莉丝汀被困于失衡婚姻中，布罗茨基沉溺酒精，古斯塔夫直到离世也没有同索菲握手言欢，索菲受制于冷漠婚姻，柯林斯小姐对感情的再次尝试宣告失败，重归之前的困境，鲍里斯重新陷入缺乏父爱的境地，斯蒂芬再次体验无法令父母满意的苦果。就连故事中的次要人物也没能幸免：瑞德的儿时密友菲奥娜没有等来朋友为她出头说话，继续在小区过着遭人孤立、独来独往的生活，瑞德的小学同学杰弗里·桑德斯没有等来老同学的大驾光临，继续在异乡过着孤独无依、穷困潦倒的生活。这一个个名字，一个个故事，一颗颗受伤的心灵，仿佛都是作者对当代人的生存现状敲下的一记记警钟。身处一个科技爆炸、沟通无限的世界，我们感受到的，却是史无前例的孤独无助。在全世界都可以社交起来的时候，我们却无法用最原始的方式获得真正有效的沟通。

石黑一雄是一位深具“怜悯心”的作家。从《远山淡影》开始，他的小说一直都在探索普通人在不可抗拒的环境下的生存状态。作为一个当代寓言，《无可慰藉》促使读者在日常琐碎的生活中思考人生，思考本真的存在。阅罢全书，掩卷沉思，透过荒诞不经的故事外表，俨然可以看见作者对当代社会人类生存状态的声声拷问：你的心灵被困住了吗？

郭国良 2012年12月于浙江大学港湾家园

KAZUO ISHIGURO

The Unconsoled

For Lorna and Naomi

The taxi driver seemed embarrassed to find there was no one - not even a clerk behind the reception desk - waiting to welcome me. He wandered across the deserted lobby, perhaps hoping to discover a staff member concealed behind one of the plants or armchairs. Eventually he put my suitcases down beside the elevator doors and, mumbling some excuse, took his leave of me.

The lobby was reasonably spacious, allowing several coffee tables to be spread around it with no sense of crowding. But the ceiling was low and had a definite sag, creating a slightly claustrophobic mood, and despite the sunshine outside the light was gloomy. Only near the reception desk was there a bright streak of sun on the wall, illuminating an area of dark wood panelling and a rack of magazines in German, French and English. I could see also a small silver bell on the reception desk and was about to go over to shake it when a door opened somewhere behind me and a young man in uniform appeared.

'Good afternoon, sir,' he said tiredly and, going behind the reception desk, began the registration procedures. Although he did mumble an apology for his absence, his manner remained for a time distinctly off-hand. As soon as I mentioned my name, however, he gave a start and straightened himself.

'Mr Ryder, I'm so sorry I didn't recognise you. Mr Hoffman, the manager, he was very much wanting to welcome you personally. But just now, unfortunately, he's had to go to an important meeting.'

'That's perfectly all right. I'll look forward to meeting him later on.'

The desk clerk hurried on through the registration forms, all the while muttering about how annoyed the manager would be to have missed my arrival. He twice mentioned how the preparations for 'Thursday night' were putting the latter under unusual pressure, keeping him away from the hotel far more than was usual. I simply nodded, unable to summon the energy to enquire into the precise nature of 'Thursday night'.

'Oh, and Mr Brodsky's been doing splendidly today,' the desk clerk said, brightening. 'Really splendidly. This morning he rehearsed that orchestra for four hours non-stop. And listen to him now! Still hard at it, working things out by himself.'

He indicated the rear of the lobby. Only then did I become aware that a piano was being played somewhere in the building, just audible above the muffled noise of the traffic outside. I raised my head and listened more closely. Someone was playing a single short phrase - it was from the second movement of Mullery's Verticality - over and over in a slow, preoccupied manner.

'Of course, if the manager were here,' the desk clerk was saying, 'he might well have brought Mr Brodsky out to meet you. But I'm not sure ...' He gave a laugh. 'I'm not sure if I should disturb him. You see, if he's deep in concentration ...'

'Of course, of course. Another time.'

'If the manager were here ...' He trailed off and laughed again. Then leaning forward, he said in a low voice:

'Do you know, sir, some guests have had the nerve to complain? About our closing off the drawing room like this each time Mr Brodsky requires the piano? It's amazing how some people think! Two different guests actually complained to Mr Hoffman yesterday. You can be sure, they were very quickly put in their place.'

'I'm sure they were. Brodsky, you say.' I thought about the name, but it meant nothing to me. Then I caught the desk clerk watching me with a puzzled look and said quickly:

'Yes, yes. I'll look forward to meeting Mr Brodsky in good time.'

'If only the manager were here, sir.'

'Please don't worry. Now if that's all, I'd very much appreciate ...'

'Of course, sir. You must be very tired after such a long journey. Here's your key. Gustav over there will show you to your room.'

I looked behind me and saw that an elderly porter was waiting across the lobby. He was standing in front of the open elevator, staring into its interior with a preoccupied air. He gave a start as I came walking up to him. He then picked up my suitcases and hurried into the elevator after me.

As we began our ascent, the elderly porter continued to hold onto both suitcases and I could see him growing red with the effort. The cases were both very heavy and a serious concern that he might pass out before me led me to say:

'You know, you really ought to put those down.'

'I'm glad you mention it, sir,' he said, and his voice betrayed surprisingly little of the physical effort he was expending. 'When I first started in this profession, very many years ago now, I used to place the bags on the floor. Pick them up only when I absolutely needed to. When in motion, so to speak. In fact, for the first fifteen years of working here, I have to say I used that method. It's one that many of the younger porters in this town still employ. But you won't find me doing anything of that sort now. Besides, sir, we're not going up far.'

We continued our ascent in silence. Then I said:

‘So you’ve worked in this hotel for some time.’

‘Twenty-seven years now, sir. I’ve seen plenty here in that time. But of course, this hotel was standing long before I ever got here. Frederick the Great is believed to have stayed a night here in the eighteenth century, and by all accounts it was a long-established inn even then. Oh yes, there have been events here of great historic interest over the years. Some time when you’re not so tired, sir, I’d be happy to relate a few of these things to you.’

‘But you were telling me,’ I said, ‘why you consider it a mistake to place luggage on the floor.’

‘Ah yes,’ the porter said. ‘Now that’s an interesting point. You see, sir, as you can imagine, in a town of this sort, there are many hotels. This means that many people in this town have at some point or other tried their hand at portering. Many people here seem to think they can simply put on a uniform and then that will be it, they’ll be able to do the job. It’s a delusion that’s been particularly nurtured in this town. Call it a local myth, if you will. And I’ll readily confess, there was a time when I unthinkingly subscribed to it myself. Then once – oh, it was many years ago now – my wife and I took a short holiday. We went to Switzerland, to Lucerne. My wife has passed away now, sir, but whenever I think of her I remember our short holiday. It’s very beautiful there by the lake. No doubt you know it. We took some lovely boat rides after breakfast. Well, to return to my point, during that holiday I observed that people in that town didn’t make the same sorts of assumptions about their porters as people here do. How can I put it, sir? There was much greater respect paid to porters there. The best ones were figures of some renown and had the leading hotels fighting for their services. I must say it opened my eyes. But in this town, well, there’s been this idea for many many years. In fact there are days when I wonder if it can ever be eradicated. Now I’m not saying people here are in any way rude to us. Far from it, I’ve always been treated with politeness and consideration here. But, you see, sir, there's always this idea that anyone could do this job if they took it into their heads, if the fancy just took them. I suppose it's because everyone in this town at some point has had the experience of carrying luggage from place to place. Because they've done that, they assume being a hotel porter is just an extension of it. I've had people over the years, sir, in this very elevator, who've said to me: "I might give up what I'm doing one of these days and take up portering." Oh yes. Well, sir, one day - it wasn't long after our short holiday in Lucerne - I had one of our leading city councillors say more or less those exact words to me. "I'd like to do that one of these days," he said to me, indicating the bags. "That's the life for me. Not a care in the world." I suppose he was trying to be kind, sir. Implying I was to be envied. That was when I was younger, sir, I didn't then hold the bags, I had them on the floor, here in this very elevator, and I suppose in those days I might have looked a bit that way. You know, carefree, as the gentleman implied. Well, I tell you, sir, that was the last straw. I don't mean the gentleman's words made me so angry in themselves. But when he said that to me, well, things sort of fell into place. Things I'd been thinking about for some time. And as I explained to you, sir, I was fresh from our short holiday in Lucerne where I'd got some perspective. And I thought to myself, well, it's high time porters in this town set about changing the attitude prevalent here. You see, sir, I'd seen something different in Lucerne, and I felt, well, it really wasn't good enough, what went on here. So I thought hard about it and decided on a number of measures I would personally take. Of course, even then, I probably knew how difficult it would be. I think I may have realised all those years ago that it was perhaps already too late for my own generation. That things had gone too far. But I thought, well, even if I could do my part and change things just a little, it would at least make it easier for those who came after me. So I adopted my measures, sir, and I've stuck to them, ever since that day the city councillor said what he did. And I'm proud to say a number of other porters in this town followed my lead. That's not to say they adopted precisely the same measures I did. But let's say their measures were, well, compatible.'

'I see. And one of your measures was not to put down the suitcases but to continue to hold them.'

'Exactly, sir, you've followed my gist very well. Of course, I have to say, when I took on these rules for myself, I was much younger and stronger, and I suppose I didn't really calculate for my growing weaker with age. It's funny, sir, but you don't. The other porters have said similar things. All the same, we all try to keep to our old resolutions. We've become a pretty close-knit group over the years, twelve of us, we're what's left of the ones who tried to change things all those years ago. If I were to go back on anything now, sir, I'd feel I was letting down the others. And if any of them were to go back on any of their old rules, I'd feel the same way. Because there's no doubt about it, some progress has been made in this town. There's a very long way to go yet, that's true, but we've often talked it over - we meet every Sunday afternoon at the Hungarian Café in the Old Town, you could come and join us, you'd be a most welcome guest, sir - well, we've often discussed these things and each of us agrees, without a doubt, there have been significant improvements in the attitude towards us in this town. The younger ones who came after us, of course, they take it all for granted. But our group at the Hungarian Café, we know we've made a difference, even if it's a small one. You'd be very welcome to join us, sir. I would happily introduce you to the group. We're not nearly as formal as we once were and it's been understood for some time that in special circumstances, guests can be introduced to our table. And it's very pleasant at this time of the year with this gentle sunshine in the afternoons. We have our table in the shade of the awning, looking across the Old Square. It's very pleasant, sir, I'm sure you'll like it. But to return to what I was saying, we've been discussing this topic a lot at the Hungarian Café. I mean about these old resolutions we each made all those years ago. You see, none of us thought about what would happen when we got older. I suppose we were so involved in our work, we thought of things only on a day to day basis. Or perhaps we underestimated how long it would take to change these deeply ingrained attitudes. But there you are, sir. I'm now the age I am and every year it gets harder.'

The porter paused for a moment and, despite the physical strain he was under, seemed to get lost in his thoughts. Then he said:

'I should be honest with you, sir. It's only fair. When I was younger, when I first made these rules for myself, I would always carry up to three suitcases, however large or heavy. If a guest had a fourth, I'd put that one on the floor. But three, I could always manage. Well, the truth is, sir, four years ago I had a period of ill-health, and I was finding things difficult, and so we discussed it at the Hungarian Café. Well, in the end, my colleagues all agreed there was no need for me to be so strict on myself. After all, they said to me, all that's required is to impress on the guests something of the true nature of our work. Two bags or three, the effect would be much the same. I should reduce my minimum to two suitcases and no harm would be done. I accepted what they said, sir, but I know it's not quite the truth. I can see it doesn't have nearly the same effect when people look at me. The difference between seeing a porter laden with two bags and seeing one laden with three, you must admit, sir, even to the least practised eye, the effect is considerably different. I know that, sir, and I don't mind telling you it's painful for me to accept. But just to return to my point. I hope you see now why I don't wish to put down your bags. You have only two. At least for a few more years, two will be within my powers.'

‘Well, it’s all very commendable,’ I said. ‘You’ve certainly created the desired impact on me.’

‘I’d like you to know, sir, I’m not the only one who’s had to make changes. We discuss these things all the time at the Hungarian Café and the truth is, each one of us has had to make some changes. But I wouldn’t have you think we’re allowing each other’s standards to slip. If we did that, all our efforts over these years would be for nothing. We would rapidly become a laughing stock. Passers-by would mock us when they saw us gathered at our table on Sunday afternoons. Oh no, sir, we remain very strict with each other and, as I’m sure Miss Hilde will vouch, the community has come to respect our Sunday gatherings. As I say, sir, you’d be most welcome to join us. Both the café and the square are exceptionally pleasant on these sunny afternoons. And sometimes the café proprietor will arrange for gypsy violinists to play in the square. The proprietor himself, sir, has the greatest respect for us. The café isn’t large, but he’ll always ensure there’s plenty of room for us to sit around our table in comfort. Even when the rest of the café is extremely busy, the proprietor will see to it we don’t get crowded out or disturbed. Even on the busiest afternoons, if all of us around our table at one and the same time were to rotate our arms at full stretch, not one of us would make contact. That’s how much the proprietor respects us, sir. I’m sure Miss Hilde will vouch for what I’m saying.’

‘Pardon me,’ I said, ‘but who is this Miss Hilde you keep referring to?’

No sooner had I said this, I noticed that the porter was gazing past my shoulder at some spot behind me. Turning, I saw with a start that we were not alone in the elevator. A small young woman in a neat business suit was standing pressed into the corner behind me. Perceiving that I had at last noticed her, she smiled and took a step forward.

‘I’m sorry,’ she said to me, ‘I hope you don’t think I was eavesdropping, but I couldn’t help overhearing. I was listening to what Gustav was telling you, and I have to say he’s being rather unfair on those of us in this town. I mean when he says we don’t appreciate our hotel porters. Of course we do and we appreciate Gustav here most of all. Everyone loves him. You can see there’s a contradiction even in what he’s just told you. If we’re so unap-preciative, then how does he account for the great respect they’re treated with at the Hungarian Café? Really, Gustav, it’s very unkind of you to misrepresent us all to Mr Ryder.’

This was said in an unmistakably affectionate tone, but the porter seemed to feel real shame. He adjusted his posture away from us, the heavy cases thumping against his legs as he did so, and turned his gaze away sheepishly.

‘There, that’s shown him,’ the young woman said smiling. ‘But he’s one of the very best. We all love him. He’s exceedingly modest and so he’d never tell you himself, but the other hotel porters in this town all look up to him. In fact, it wouldn’t be an exaggeration to say they’re in awe of him. Sometimes you’ll see them sitting around their table on Sunday afternoons, and if Gustav hasn’t yet arrived, they won’t start talking. They feel it would be disrespectful, you see, to start proceedings without him. You’ll often see them, ten or eleven of them, sitting there silently with their coffees, waiting. At most, they might exchange the odd whisper, like they were in church. But not until Gustav arrives do they relax and start conversing. It’s worth going along to the Hungarian Café just to witness Gustav’s arrival. The contrast between before and after is very marked, I have to tell you. One moment there are these glum old faces sitting silently around the table. Then Gustav turns up and they start yelling and laughing. They punch each other in fun, slap each other on the back. They sometimes even dance, yes, up on the tables! They have a special “Porters’ Dance”, isn’t that so, Gustav? Oh yes, they really enjoy themselves. But not a bit of it until Gustav's arrived. Of course he'd never tell you any of this himself, he's so modest. We do all love him here in this town.'

While the young woman was speaking, Gustav must have continued to turn himself away, for when I next looked at him he was facing the opposite corner of the elevator with his back to us. The weight of the suitcases was making his knees sag and his shoulders quiver. His head was bent right down so as to be practically hidden from us behind him, but whether this was due to bashfulness or sheer physical exertion was hard to say.

'I'm so sorry, Mr Ryder,' the young woman said. 'I haven't yet introduced myself. I'm Hilde Stratmann. I've been given the task of ensuring everything goes smoothly while you're here with us. I'm so glad you've managed to get here at last. We were all starting to get a little concerned. Everyone waited this morning for as long as they could, but many had important appointments and had to go off one by one. So it falls to me, a humble employee of the Civic Arts Institute, to tell you how greatly honoured we all feel by your visit.'

'I'm very pleased to be here. But concerning this morning. Did you just say ...'

'Oh, please don't worry at all about this morning, Mr Ryder. No one was put out in the least. The important thing is that you're here. You know, Mr Ryder, something on which I can certainly agree with Gustav is the Old Town. It really is most attractive and I always advise visitors to go there. It has a marvellous atmosphere, full of pavement cafés, craft shops, restaurants. It's only a short walk from here, so you should take the opportunity as soon as your schedule allows.'

'I'll certainly try and do that. Incidentally, Miss Stratmann, speaking of my schedule ...' I paused rather deliberately, expecting the young woman to exclaim at her forgetfulness, perhaps reach into her attaché case and produce a sheet or a folder. But although she did break in quickly, it was to say:

‘It is a tight schedule, yes. But I do hope it’s not unreasonable. We’ve tried to keep it strictly to the essential things. Inevitably we were inundated, by so many of our societies, the local media, everybody. You have such a following in this town, Mr Ryder. Many people here believe you to be not only the world’s finest living pianist, but perhaps the very greatest of the century. But we think in the end we’ve managed to bring it down to the essentials. I trust there’s nothing there you’re too unhappy with.’

Just at this moment the elevator doors slid open and the elderly porter set off down the corridor. The suitcases made him drag his step along the carpet and Miss Stratmann and I, following on behind, had to measure our pace so as not to overtake him.

‘I do hope no one was offended,’ I said to her as we walked. ‘I mean, about my not having time for them on my schedule.’

‘Oh no, please don’t worry. We all know why you’re here and nobody wants it said that they distracted you. In fact, Mr Ryder, aside from two rather important social functions, everything else on your programme relates more or less directly to Thursday night. Of course, you’ve had a chance by now to familiarise yourself with your schedule.’

There was something about the way she uttered this last remark that made it difficult for me to respond entirely frankly. I thus muttered: ‘Yes, of course.’

‘It is a heavy schedule. But we were very much guided by your request to be allowed to see as much as possible at first hand. A very commendable approach, if I may say so.’

Ahead of us, the elderly porter stopped in front of a door. At last he lowered my suitcases and began fiddling with the lock. As we came up to him, Gustav picked up the suitcases again and staggered into the room, saying: 'Please follow me, sir.' I was about to do so, when Miss Stratmann placed a hand on my arm.

'I won't keep you,' she said. 'But I did just want to check at this stage if there was anything at all on your schedule you weren't happy with.'

The door swung shut, leaving us standing out in the corridor.

'Well, Miss Stratmann,' I said, 'on the whole, it struck me as ... as a very well-balanced programme.'

'It was precisely with your request in mind that we arranged the meeting with the Citizens' Mutual Support Group. The Support Group is made up of ordinary people from every walk of life brought together by their sense of having suffered from the present crisis. You'll be able to hear first-hand accounts of what some people have had to go through.'

'Ah yes. That's sure to be most useful.'

'And as you'll have noticed, we've also respected your wish to meet with Mr Christoff himself. Given the circumstances, we perfectly appreciate your reasons for requesting such a meeting. Mr Christoff, for his part, is delighted, as you can well imagine. Naturally he has his own reasons for wanting to meet you. What I mean, of course, is that he and his friends will do their utmost to get you to see things their way. Naturally, it'll all be nonsense, but I'm sure you'll find it all very useful in drawing up a general picture of what's been going on here. Mr Ryder, you're looking very tired. I won't keep you any longer. Here's my card. Please don't hesitate to call if you have any problems or queries.'

I thanked her and watched her go off back down the corridor. When I entered my room I was still turning over the various implications of this exchange and took a moment to register Gustav standing next to the bed.

‘Ah, here you are, sir.’

After the preponderance of dark wood panelling elsewhere in the building, I was surprised by the light modern look of the room. The wall facing me was glass almost from floor to ceiling and the sun was coming in pleasantly between the vertical blinds hung against it. My suitcases had been placed side by side next to the wardrobe.

‘Now, sir, if you’ll just bear with me a moment,’ Gustav said, ‘I’ll show you the features of the room. That way, your stay here will be as comfortable as possible.’

I followed Gustav around the room while he pointed out switches and other facilities. At one point he led me into the bathroom and continued his explanations there. I had been about to cut him short in the way I am accustomed to doing when being shown a hotel room by a porter, but something about the diligence with which he went about his task, something about his efforts to personalise something he went through many times each day, rather touched me and prevented me from interrupting. And then, as he continued with his explanations, waving a hand towards various parts of the room, it occurred to me that for all his professionalism, for all his genuine desire to see me comfortable, a certain matter that had been preoccupying him throughout the day had again pushed its way to the front of his mind. He was, in other words, worrying once more about his daughter and her little boy.

When the arrangement had been proposed to him several months earlier, Gustav had little supposed it would bring him anything other than uncomplicated delight. For an afternoon each week, he was to spend a couple of hours wandering around the Old Town with his grandson, thereby allowing Sophie to go off and enjoy a little time to herself. Moreover, the arrangement had immediately proved a success and within weeks grandfather and grandson had evolved a routine highly agreeable to them both. On afternoons when it was not raining, they would start at the swing park, where Boris could demonstrate his latest feats of daring. If it was wet, they would start at the boat museum. They would then stroll about the little streets of the Old Town, looking in various gift shops, perhaps stopping at the Old Square to watch a mime artist or acrobat. The elderly porter being well known in the area, they would never get far without someone greeting them, and Gustav would receive numerous compliments regarding his grandson. They would next go over to the old bridge to watch the boats pass underneath. The expedition would then conclude at a favourite café, where they would order cake or ice cream and await Sophie's return.

Initially these little outings had brought Gustav immense satisfaction. But the increased contact with his daughter and grandson had obliged him to notice things he once might have pushed away, until he had no longer been able to pretend all was well. For one thing, there was the question of Sophie's general mood. In the early weeks, she had taken her leave of them cheerfully, hurrying away to the city centre to shop or to meet a friend. But lately she had taken to slouching off as though she had nothing to do with herself. There were, furthermore, clear signs that the trouble, whatever it was, had started to make its mark on Boris. True, his grandson was still for the most part his high-spirited self. But the porter had noticed how every now and then, particularly at any mention of his home life, a cloud would pass over the little boy's expression. Then two weeks ago something had happened which the elderly porter had not been able to expel from his mind.

He had been walking with Boris past one of the numerous cafés of the Old Town when he had suddenly noticed his daughter sitting inside. The awning had shaded the glass allowing a clear view through to the back, and Sophie had been visible sitting alone, a cup of coffee before her, wearing a look of utter despondency. The revelation that she had not found the energy to leave the Old Town at all, to say nothing of the expression on her face, had given the porter quite a shock - so much so that it had taken a moment before he had thought to try and distract Boris. It had been too late: Boris, following the porter's gaze, had got a clear glimpse of his mother. The little boy had immediately looked away and the two of them had continued with their walk without once mentioning the matter. Boris had regained his good humour within minutes, but the episode had none the less greatly perturbed the porter and he had since turned it over many times in his mind. In fact, it was the recollection of this incident that had lent him such a preoccupied air down in the lobby, and which was now troubling him once more as he showed me around my room.

I had taken a liking to the old man and felt a wave of sympathy for him. Clearly he had been brooding on things for a long time and was now in danger of allowing his worries to attain unwarranted proportions. I thought about broaching the whole topic with him, but then, as Gustav came to the end of his routine, the weariness I had been experiencing intermittently ever since I had stepped off the plane came over me again. Resolving to take up the matter with him at a later point, I dismissed him with a generous tip.

Once the door had closed behind him, I collapsed fully clothed onto the bed and for a while gazed emptily up at the ceiling. At first my head remained filled with thoughts of Gustav and his various worries. But then as I went on lying there, I found myself turning over again the conversation I had had with Miss Stratmann. Clearly, this city was expecting of me something more than a simple recital. But when I tried to recall some basic details about the present visit, I had little success. I realised how foolish I had been not to have spoken more frankly to Miss Stratmann. If I had not received a copy of my schedule, the fault was hers, not mine, and my defensiveness had been quite without reason.

I thought again about the name Brodsky and this time I had the distinct impression I had either heard or read about him in the not so distant past. And then suddenly a moment came back to me from the long plane journey I had just completed. I had been sitting in the darkened cabin, the other passengers asleep around me, studying the schedule for this visit under the dim beam of the reading light. At one point the man next to me had awoken and after a few minutes had made some light-hearted remark. In fact, as I recalled, he had leaned over and put to me some little quiz question, something about World Cup footballers. Not wishing to be distracted from the careful study I was making of my schedule, I had brushed him off somewhat coldly. All this now returned to me clearly enough. Indeed, I could recall the very texture of the thick grey paper on which the schedule had been typed, the dull yellow patch cast on it by the reading light, the drone of the plane's engines - but try as I might, I could remember nothing of what had been written on that sheet.

Then after a few more minutes I felt my weariness engulfing me and decided there was little point in worrying myself further until I had had a little sleep. Indeed, I knew well from experience how much clearer things became after a rest. I could then go and find Miss Stratmann, explain to her about the misunderstanding, obtain a copy of my schedule and have her clarify whatever points needed clarifying.

I was just starting to doze off when something suddenly made me open my eyes again and stare up at the ceiling. I went on scrutinising the ceiling for some time, then sat up on the bed and looked around, the sense of recognition growing stronger by the second. The room I was now in, I realised, was the very room that had served as my bedroom during the two years my parents and I had lived at my aunt's house on the borders of England and Wales. I looked again around the room, then, lowering myself back down, stared once more at the ceiling. It had been recently re-plastered and re-painted, its dimensions had been enlarged, the cornices had been removed, the decorations around the light fitting had been entirely altered. But it was unmistakably the same ceiling I had so often stared up at from my narrow creaking bed of those days.

I rolled over onto my side and looked down at the floor beside the bed. The hotel had provided a dark rug just where my feet would land. I could remember how once that same area of floor had been covered by a worn green mat, where several times a week I would set out in careful formations my plastic soldiers - over a hundred in all - which I had kept in two biscuit tins. I reached down a hand and let my fingers brush against the hotel rug, and as I did so a memory came back to me of one afternoon when I had been lost within my world of plastic soldiers and a furious row had broken out downstairs. The ferocity of the voices had been such that, even as a child of six or seven, I had realised this to be no ordinary row. But I had told myself it was nothing and, resting my cheek back down on the green mat, had continued with my battle plans. Near the centre of that green mat had been a torn patch that had always been a source of much irritation to me. But that afternoon, as the voices raged on downstairs, it had occurred to me for the first time that this tear could be used as a sort of bush terrain for my soldiers to cross. This discovery - that the blemish that had always threatened to undermine my imaginary world could in fact be incorporated into it - had been one of some excitement for me, and that 'bush' was to become a key factor in many of the battles I subsequently orchestrated.

All this came back to me as I continued to stare up at the ceiling. Of course, I remained highly conscious of how all around the room features had been altered or removed. Nevertheless, the realisation that after all this time I was once more back in my old childhood sanctuary caused a profound feeling of peace to come over me. I closed my eyes and for a moment it was as though I were once more surrounded by all those old items of furniture. In the far corner to my right, the tall white wardrobe with the broken door knob. My aunt's painting of Salisbury Cathedral on the wall above my head. The bedside cabinet with its two small drawers filled with my little treasures and secrets. All the tensions of the day - the long flight, the confusions over my schedule, Gustav's problems - seemed to fall away and I felt myself sliding into a deep and exhausted sleep.

2

When I was roused by the bedside telephone, I had the impression it had been ringing for some time. I picked up the receiver and a voice said:

‘Hello? Mr Ryder?’

‘Yes, hello.’

‘Ah, Mr Ryder. This is Mr Hoffman speaking. The hotel manager.’

‘Ah yes. How do you do.’

‘Mr Ryder, we’re so extremely pleased to have you with us at last. You’re very welcome here.’

‘Thank you.’

‘Very welcome indeed, sir. Please don’t worry at all about your delayed arrival. As I believe Miss Stratmann told you, everyone present understood perfectly. After all, when one has the distances you have to cover, and with so many engagements around the world - ha ha! - such things are sometimes inevitable.’

‘But ...’

‘No, really, sir, there’s no need to utter another word on the matter. All the ladies and gentlemen, as I say, were very understanding. So let us put the matter behind us. The important thing is that you are here. And for that alone, Mr Ryder, our gratitude to you is unmeasurable.’

‘Well, thank you, Mr Hoffman.’

‘Now, sir, if you aren’t too busy just now, I would very much like at last to greet you face to face. Extend to you my personal welcome to our town and to this hotel.’

‘That’s very kind of you,’ I said. ‘But just now I’m taking a short nap ...’

‘A short nap?’ There was a flash of irritation in the voice. The next moment the geniality had returned completely.

‘Why, of course, of course. You must be very tired. You’ve come such a long way. So then, let us say, whenever you are ready.’

‘I’ll look forward to meeting you, Mr Hoffman. No doubt, I’ll be down before long.’

‘Please come absolutely in your own time. For my part, I shall continue to wait here – that is, down here in the lobby – however long you care to take. So please don’t hurry at all.’

I thought about this for a moment. Then I said: ‘But Mr Hoffman, you must have so many other things to do.’

‘True, this is a very busy part of the day. But for you, Mr Ryder, I will happily wait here for as long as necessary.’

‘Please, Mr Hoffman, don’t waste your valuable time on my account. I’ll be down presently and then I’ll come and find you.’

‘Mr Ryder, it’s no bother at all. In fact, I’ll be honoured to wait here for you. So as I say, come entirely in your own time. I assure you, I will remain standing here until you arrive.’

I thanked him again and put down the receiver. Sitting up, I looked around me and guessed from the light that it was now the late afternoon. I felt more tired than ever, but there seemed little option other than to go down to the lobby. I got to my feet, went to one of my suitcases and found a less crumpled jacket than the one I was still wearing. As I was changing into it, a strong craving came over me for some coffee and I left my room a few moments later with something approaching urgency.

I emerged from the elevator to find the lobby far livelier than before. All around me, guests were lounging in armchairs, leafing through newspapers or chatting together over cups of coffee. Near the reception desk several Japanese people were greeting one another with much jollity. I was slightly bemused by this transformation and did not notice the hotel manager until he had come right up to me.

He was in his fifties, and was larger and heavier than I had imagined from the voice on the phone. He offered me his hand, beaming broadly. As he did so, I noticed he was short of breath and that his forehead was lightly coated with sweat.

As we shook hands, he repeated several times what an honour my presence represented for the town and for his hotel in particular. Then he leaned forward and said with a confiding air: 'And let me assure you, sir, all the arrangements for Thursday night are in hand. There really is nothing you need worry about.'

I waited for him to say more, but when he merely went on smiling, I said: 'Well, that's good to hear.'

'No, sir, there really is nothing to worry about.'

There was an awkward pause. After a moment, Hoffman seemed about to say something else, but then stopped himself, gave a laugh and hit me lightly on the shoulder - a gesture I thought unduly familiar. Finally he said: 'Mr Ryder, if there is anything I can do to make your stay here more comfortable, please let me know without delay.'

'You're very kind.'

There was another pause. Then he laughed again, shook his head a little and once more hit me on the shoulder.

‘Mr Hoffman,’ I said, ‘was there perhaps something in particular you wished to speak to me about?’

‘Oh, nothing in particular, Mr Ryder. I just wished to greet you and make sure everything was to your satisfaction.’ Then suddenly he gave an exclamation. ‘Of course. Now you mention it, yes, there was something. But it was merely a small matter.’ Yet again, he shook his head and laughed. Then he said: ‘It’s to do with my wife’s albums.’

‘Your wife’s albums?’

‘My wife, Mr Ryder, is a very cultured woman. Naturally she’s a great admirer of yours. In fact she has followed your career with close interest and for some years has been collecting press cuttings about you.’

‘Really? How very good of her.’

‘In fact, she has compiled two albums of cuttings entirely devoted to you. The entries have been arranged chronologically and date back many years. Let me come to the point. It has always been my wife’s great hope that you would one day peruse these albums for yourself. The news that you were to visit our town naturally gave new life to this hope. Nevertheless she knew how busy you would be here and was insistent you should not be bothered on her account. But I could see what she secretly hoped, and so I promised her I would at least raise the matter with you. If you could find even a minute just to cast an eye over them, you have no idea what it would mean to her.’

‘You must convey my gratitude to your wife, Mr Hoffman. I shall be very happy to look at her albums.’

‘Mr Ryder, that’s very good of you! Very good of you indeed! As a matter of fact, I did bring the albums here to the hotel in readiness. But I can guess how busy you must be.’

‘I do have quite a busy schedule. However, I’m sure I’ll be able to find some time for your wife’s albums.’

‘How very good of you, Mr Ryder! But let me stress, the last thing I wish to do is put extra pressure on you. So let me make a suggestion. I will wait for you to indicate when you are ready to inspect the albums. Until you do so, I won’t bother you. Any time, night or day, when you feel the moment is right, please come and find me. I am usually to be found quite easily and I don’t leave the premises until late. I shall stop whatever it is I’m doing and go and fetch the albums. I’d feel much happier leaving it on such a basis. Really, I couldn’t bear to think I was adding further pressure to your schedule.’

‘That’s very considerate of you, Mr Hoffman.’

‘Actually it occurs to me, Mr Ryder. Over the coming days I may give the appearance of being frantically busy. But I would like you to understand, I shall never be too busy to attend to this matter. So even if I look very preoccupied, please don’t be put off.’

‘Very well. I’ll remember that.’

‘Perhaps we should agree on a signal of some sort. I say this because you may come searching for me and see me on the other side of a crowded room. It would be very onerous on you to have to push your way through such a seething mass. And in any case, by the time you reach the point in the room where you first saw me, I may myself have moved off. This is why a signal would be advisable. Something easily distinguishable which you can give above the heads of the crowd.’

‘Indeed, that seems a very sound idea.’

‘Excellent. I am heartened to discover you such an agreeable and kind person, Mr Ryder. If only one could say as much for certain other celebrities we have hosted here. So. It just remains for us to agree a signal. Perhaps I could suggest ... well, let us say something like this.’

He raised a hand, palm outwards, the fingers fanned out, and described a motion as though he were wiping a window.

‘Just an example,’ he said, putting his hand quickly behind his back. ‘Of course, another signal may be more to your liking.’

‘No, that signal is fine. I’ll give it to you as soon as I’m ready to look at your wife’s albums. It really is very kind of her to have gone to such trouble.’

‘I know it has given her profound satisfaction. Of course, if later on you think of some other signal you prefer, please phone me from your room, or else leave a message with one of the staff.’

‘You’re most kind, but the signal you suggest seems to me very elegant. Now, Mr Hoffman, I wonder if you would advise me where I might get some good coffee. I feel just now I could drink several cups.’

The manager laughed rather theatrically. ‘I know the feeling very well. I shall take you to the atrium. Please, follow me.’

He led the way to the corner of the lobby and through a pair of heavy swing doors. We entered a long gloomy corridor with dark wood panelling along both walls. There was so little natural light in the corridor that even at this point in the day a row of dim wall lamps had been left on. Hoffman continued to walk briskly ahead of me, turning every few steps to smile over his shoulder. About half-way down, we passed a rather grand-looking doorway and Hoffman, who must have noticed me looking at it, said:

‘Ah yes. Coffee would normally be served there in the drawing room. A splendid room, Mr Ryder, very comfortable. And now further adorned by some hand-made tables I found myself during a recent trip to Florence. I’m sure you’d approve of them. However, just now, as you know, we have closed off the room for Mr Brodsky.’

‘Oh yes. He was in there earlier when I arrived.’

‘He’s still in there, sir. I would take you in to introduce you to each other except, well, I feel this is perhaps not quite the moment. Mr Brodsky may ... well, let us say, it may not yet be the moment. Ha ha! But not to worry, there will be many opportunities for you two gentlemen to get to know one another.’

‘Mr Brodsky is in that room now?’

I glanced back towards the doorway and possibly slowed my pace a little. In any case, the manager grasped my arm and began firmly to lead me away.

‘He is indeed, sir. Very well, he’s sitting there silently just now, but I assure you, he will begin again at any moment. And this morning, you know, he rehearsed the orchestra for a full four hours. By all accounts, everything is going extremely well. So please, there’s nothing to worry about.’

The corridor eventually turned a corner after which it grew much brighter. In fact this section of it had windows all along one side causing pools of sunlight to form on the floor. Only when we had gone some way along this section did Hoffman let go of me. As we slowed to a leisurely pace, the manager gave a laugh to cover his embarrassment.

‘The atrium is just here, sir. Essentially it’s a bar, but it’s comfortable and you will be served coffee and whatever else you desire. Please, this way.’

We turned off the corridor and went under an arch.

‘This annexe,’ Hoffman said, leading me in, ‘was completed three years ago. We call it the atrium and we’re rather proud of it. It was designed for us by Antonio Zanotto.’

We came into a bright spacious hall. Owing to the glass ceiling high above us there was something of the feeling of stepping out into a courtyard. The floor was a vast expanse of white tiles, at the centre of which, dominating everything, was a fountain - a tangle of nymph-like figures in marble gushing water with some force. In fact it struck me the water pressure was quite excessive; one could hardly look across to any part of the atrium without having to peer through the fine mist hovering in the air. Even so, I managed quickly to ascertain that each corner of the atrium had its own bar, with its separate collection of high-stools, easy chairs and tables. Waiters in white uniforms were criss-crossing the floor and there appeared to be a fair number of guests spread about the place - though such was the feeling of space one hardly noticed them.

I could see the manager watching me with a smug expression, waiting for me to express approval of our surroundings. At that moment, however, the need for coffee came over me so strongly that I simply turned away and made for the nearest of the bars.

I had already seated myself on a high-stool, my elbows up on the bar counter, when the manager caught up with me. He snapped his fingers at the barman, who was in any case coming to serve me, saying: 'Mr Ryder would like a pot of coffee. Kenyan!' Then, turning back to me, he said: 'I would enjoy nothing better just now than to join you, Mr Ryder. Converse in a leisurely way about music and the arts. Unfortunately there are a number of things I must do which I cannot possibly delay further. I wonder, sir, if you'd be so good as to excuse me?'

Although I insisted he had been more than kind, he spent several more minutes taking his leave of me. Then at last he glanced at his watch, let out an exclamation and hurried off.

Left alone, I must quickly have drifted off into my own thoughts, for I did not notice the barman return. He must have done so, however, for I was soon drinking coffee, staring at the mirrored wall behind the bar - in which I could see not only my own reflection but much of the room behind me. After a while, for some reason, I found myself replaying in my head key moments from a football match I had attended many years earlier - an encounter between Germany and Holland. I adjusted my posture on the high-stool - I could see I was hunching excessively - and tried recalling the names of the players in the Dutch team that year. Rep, Krol, Haan, Neeskens. After several minutes I had succeeded in remembering all but two of the players, but these last two names remained just beyond the rim of my recall. As I tried to remember, the sound of the fountain behind me, which at first I had found quite soothing, began to annoy me. It seemed that if only it would stop, my memory would unlock and I would finally remember the names.

I was still trying to remember when a voice said behind me:

‘Excuse me, it’s Mr Ryder, isn’t it?’

I turned to find a fresh-faced young man in his early twenties. When I greeted him, he came up eagerly to the bar.

‘I do hope I’m not intruding,’ he said. ‘But when I saw you just now I simply had to come over and say how excited I am you’re here. You see, I’m a pianist myself. On a strictly amateur basis, I mean. And, well, I’ve always admired you terribly. When Father finally got word that you were coming, I was so thrilled.’

‘Father?’

‘I’m so sorry. I’m Stephan Hoffman. The manager’s son.’

‘Ah yes, I see. How do you do.’

‘You wouldn’t mind if I sat here for a minute, would you?’ The young man climbed up onto the stool next to mine.

‘You know, sir, Father’s just as thrilled, if not more so. Knowing Father he may not have told you just how much he’s thrilled. But believe me it means everything to him.’

‘Is that so?’

‘Yes, really, I’m hardly exaggerating. I remember the period when Father was still waiting for your reply. This peculiar silence would come over him whenever your name was mentioned. And then, when the pressure really built up, he’d start muttering under his breath about it all. “How much longer? How much longer until he replies? He’s going to turn us down. I can sense it.” I had to really work then, to keep his spirits up. Anyway, sir, you can imagine just what your being here now means to him. He’s such a perfectionist! When he organises an event like Thursday night, everything, everything, has to be just right. He goes over every detail in his head, over and over. Sometimes it does get a bit much, all this single-mindedness. But then I suppose if he didn’t have that side to him, he wouldn’t be Father and he wouldn’t achieve half of what he does.’

‘Indeed. He seems an admirable person.’

‘Actually, Mr Ryder,’ the young man said, ‘I did have something I wanted to ask you. It’s a request really. If it’s impossible, then please just say so. I won’t take it amiss.’

Stephan Hoffman paused as though to gather up his courage. I drank a little more coffee and gazed at the reflection of the two of us sitting side by side.

‘Well, this is also to do with Thursday night,’ he went on. ‘You see, Father’s asked me to play the piano at the event. I’ve practised and I’m ready and it’s not that I’m worried about it or anything ...’ As he said this, just for a second his assured manner faltered and I caught a glimpse of an anxious adolescent. But almost immediately he had recovered with a nonchalant shrug. ‘It’s just that with Thursday night being so important, I don’t want to let him down. To come to the point, I was just wondering if you would have a few minutes to spare to listen to me run through my piece. I’ve decided to play Jean-Louis La Roche’s Dahlia. I’m just an amateur and you’d have to be very tolerant. But I thought I could just run through it and you could give me a few tips about how I might polish things up. '

I thought about this for a moment. 'So,' I said after a while, 'you're set to perform on Thursday night. '

'Of course, it's a very small contribution to the evening alongside, well' - he gave a laugh - 'the other things taking place. All the same I want my bit to be as good as possible. '

'Yes, I can quite understand. Well, I'd be pleased to do what I can for you. '

The young man's face lit up. 'Mr Ryder, I'm speechless! It's the very thing I need ... '

'But there is a problem. As you can guess, my time here is very restricted. I'll have to find a moment when I have a few minutes free. '

'Of course. Whenever it's convenient for you, Mr Ryder. My goodness, I'm so flattered. To be frank, I thought you'd turn me down flat. '

A bleeper began to sound somewhere within the young man's clothing. Stephan started, then reached inside his jacket.

'Awfully sorry,' he said, 'but that's the urgent one. I should have been somewhere else long ago. But when I saw you sitting here, Mr Ryder, I couldn't resist coming over. I hope we can continue this discussion very shortly. But for now, please excuse me. '

He got down off the stool, but then for a second seemed tempted to start another exchange. Then the bleeper went off again and he hurried away with an embarrassed smile.

I turned back to my reflection behind the bar counter and began to sip my coffee again. I could not, however, recapture the mood of relaxed contemplation I had been enjoying before the young man's arrival. Instead, I found myself troubled once more by a sense that much was expected of me here, and yet that things were at present on a far from satisfactory footing. In fact, there seemed nothing for it but to seek out Miss Stratmann and clear up certain points once and for all. I resolved to go and find her as soon as I came to the end of my current cup of coffee. There was no reason for this to be an awkward encounter, and it would be simple enough to explain what had happened at our last meeting. 'Miss Stratmann,' I might say, 'I was very tired earlier and so when you asked about my schedule I misunderstood you. I thought you were asking me if I would have time to look at it straight away if you were to produce a copy then and there.' Or else I could go on the offensive, even adopting a tone of reproach. 'Miss Stratmann, I have to say I'm a little concerned and, yes, somewhat disappointed. Given the level of responsibility you and your fellow citizens seem content to place on my shoulders, I think I have a right to expect a certain standard of administrative back-up.'

I heard a movement near me and looking up saw that Gustav, the elderly porter, was standing by my stool. As I turned towards him, he smiled and said:

'Hello, sir. I just happened to see you here. I do hope you're enjoying your stay.'

'Oh, I am indeed. Though unfortunately I haven't yet had the opportunity to visit the Old Town as you recommended.'

'That's a pity, sir. Because that really is a very nice part of our city and it's so near. And the weather just now, I'd say it's ideal. A slight chill in the air, but sunny. Just warm enough still to sit outside, though I dare say you'll have to wear a jacket or a light coat. It's the best sort of day to see the Old Town.'

'You know,' I said, 'a little fresh air may be just what I need.'

‘I really would recommend it, sir. It would be such a shame if it came to your leaving our town without having enjoyed even a brief walk around the Old Town.’

‘You know, I think I’ll do just that. I’ll go off right now.’

‘If you find time to sit down at the Hungarian Café in the Old Square, I feel certain you wouldn’t regret it. I would suggest you order a pot of coffee and a piece of the apple strudel. Incidentally, sir, I did just wonder ...’ The porter paused a moment. Then he went on: ‘I did wonder if I might ask a small favour of you. I wouldn’t normally ask favours of guests, but in your case, I feel we’ve got to know one another pretty well.’

‘I’d be pleased to do something for you if it were at all possible,’ I said.

For a moment, the porter remained standing there silently.

‘It’s just a small thing,’ he said eventually. ‘You see, I know just now my daughter will be at the Hungarian Café. She’ll have little Boris with her. She’s a very pleasant young woman, sir, I’m sure you’d feel very sympathetic towards her. Most people do. She’s not what you’d call beautiful, but she has an attractive sort of appearance. She’s a very good-natured person at heart. But I suppose she’s always had this small weakness about her. Perhaps it was the way she was brought up, who can say? But it’s always been there. That’s to say, she has this tendency to let things overwhelm her sometimes, even when they’re well within her capacity to sort. Some little problem will come up, and instead of taking the few simple measures required, she just broods on it. That way, as you know, sir, small problems grow into larger ones. Before long, things look very deep to her and she gets herself into a mood of despair. It’s all so unnecessary. I don’t know what exactly is troubling her now, but I’m sure it’s not anything so insurmountable. I’ve seen it so often before. But now, you see, Boris has started to notice. In fact, sir, if Sophie doesn't get a grip on things soon, I'm afraid the boy will become seriously worried. And he's such a delight at the moment. So full of openness and trust. I know it's impossible for him to go through the whole of his life like that, perhaps it's not even desirable. But still, at his age just now, I think he should have just a few more years of believing the world to be a place of sunshine and laughter.' He fell silent again and for a few moments seemed deep in thought. Then looking up he went on: 'If only Sophie could see clearly what was happening, I know she'd get a grip on things. She is at heart very conscientious, very keen to do the best for the people she most cares about. But the thing about Sophie, well, once she gets into this state, she does need a little help to recover her sense of perspective. A good talk, that's really all she needs. Just someone to sit down with her for a few minutes and make her look at things clearly. Help establish what the real problems are, which measures she should take to overcome them. That's all she needs, sir, a good talk, something to give her back her perspective. She'll do the rest herself. She can be very sensible when she means to be. Which brings me to my point, sir. If you happen to be going to the Old Town just now, I wondered if you wouldn't mind having a little word with Sophie. Of course, I realise this might be something of an inconvenience to you, but since you're going that way anyway, I thought I'd ask you. You wouldn't have to talk to her for long. Just a short talk, just to find out what's troubling her and to give her back a sense of proportion.'

The porter stopped and looked at me appealingly. After a moment, I said with a sigh:

'I'd like to be of some help, I really would. But listening to what you say, it seems to me quite likely that Sophie's worries, whatever they are, may well relate to family issues. And as you know, such problems tend to be very deeply enmeshed. An outsider such as myself may after some frank discussion get to the bottom of one thing, only to find it connected to another problem. And so on and so on. Frankly, in my opinion, to talk through the whole tangled net of family issues, I would have thought you were yourself best suited to do that. As Sophie's father and the boy's grandfather, after all, you'd have a natural authority I simply lack.'

The porter seemed immediately to feel the burden of these words and I almost regretted having spoken them. Clearly I had hit upon a sensitive point. He turned away slightly and for several moments gazed emptily across the atrium in the direction of the fountain. Finally he said:

'I appreciate what you're telling me, sir. By rights, yes, I should be the one to talk to her, I can see that. Well, let me be honest - I don't quite know how to put this - but let me be quite honest with you. The truth of the matter is, Sophie and I haven't spoken to each other for many years. Not really since she was a child. So you can appreciate, it's somewhat difficult for me to accomplish what's required.'

The porter looked down at his feet and seemed to be waiting for my next utterance as though for a judgement.

'I'm sorry,' I said after a while, 'but I'm not quite clear what you're saying. You mean you haven't seen your daughter all this time?'

'No, no. As you know, I see her regularly, each time I take Boris off her. What I mean is, we don't speak. Perhaps you'd understand better if I were to give an illustration. Take those times Boris and I are waiting for her after one of our little walks around the Old Town. We might be sitting in Mr Krankl's coffee house, say. Boris might be in high spirits, talking loudly, laughing about everything. But as soon as he sees his mother coming through the door, he'll go silent. Not in any upset sort of way. He'll just restrain himself. He respects the ritual, you see? Then Sophie will come up to our table and address him. Did we have a nice time? Where did we go? Has Grandfather not been too cold? Oh yes, she always asks after me. She worries that I'll get ill wandering about the district like that. But as I say, we don't speak directly, Sophie and me. "Say goodbye to Grandfather," she'll say to Boris by way of farewell and off they go together. That's the way things have been with us for many years and there seems no real call to alter them at this stage. But then, you see, in a situation like this one, I find myself at something of a loss. I do feel a good talk is what's required. And someone like yourself would in my opinion be ideal. Just a few words, sir. Just to help her identify what the problems actually are. If you can just do that, she'll do the rest, you can be assured of that.'

'Very well,' I said after thinking this over. 'Very well, I'll see what I can do. But I must stress what I said earlier. These things are often too complicated for an outsider. But I'll see what I can do.'

'I'll be indebted to you, sir. She'll be at the Hungarian Café at this moment. You should have no difficulty recognising her. She has long dark hair and a number of my features. And if you're in any doubt, you could always ask the proprietor or one of his staff to point her out.'

'Very well. I'll set off straight away.'

'I'll be so indebted, sir. And even if for some reason a talk with her proves impossible, I know you'll enjoy walking around the area.'

I lowered myself off the high-stool. 'Well then,' I said to him, 'I'll let you know how I get on.'

'Thank you so much, sir.'

3

The route from the hotel to the Old Town - a walk of some fifteen minutes - was distinctly unpromising. For much of the way glassy office buildings loomed above me along streets noisy with the late-afternoon traffic. But when I came out to the river and started across the hump-backed bridge leading to the Old Town, I could sense I was about to enter a quite different atmosphere. Visible on the opposite bank were colourful awnings and café parasols. I caught the movement of waiters and of children running in circles. A tiny dog was barking excitedly at the quayside, perhaps having noticed my approach.

A few minutes later I had entered the Old Town. The narrow cobbled streets were full of people walking at an easy pace. I wandered around aimlessly for some minutes, past numerous little souvenir shops, confectioners and bakeries. I also passed several cafés and for a moment I wondered if I would have difficulty locating the particular one referred to by the porter. But then I came out to a large square at the heart of the district and the Hungarian Café was immediately obvious. The sprawl of tables occupying the entire far corner of the square was, I could see, emanating from one small doorway beneath a striped awning.

I paused a moment to recover my breath and take in the surroundings. The sun was starting to set over the square. There was, as Gustav had warned, a chilly breeze which every now and then caused a flutter to pass through the parasols surrounding the café. Regardless, the majority of the tables were occupied. Many of the customers seemed to be tourists, but I could see also a fair number who looked like locals who had left their work early and were unwinding over a coffee and newspaper. Indeed, as I crossed the square I passed many office workers standing in groups with their briefcases, talking cheerfully together.

On reaching the tables, I spent a few moments strolling around them, looking for someone likely to be the porter's daughter. Two students were arguing about a movie. A tourist was reading Newsweek. An old woman was throwing pieces of bread to some pigeons gathered around her feet. But I could not see any young women with long dark hair and a small boy. I stepped inside the café and discovered a small, rather gloomy room with just five or six tables. I could see how the overcrowding problem mentioned by the porter might become a very real one during the colder months, but on this occasion the only occupant was an old man in a beret, seated near the back. Deciding I should give up on the matter, I returned outside and was looking about for a waiter from whom to order some coffee, when I became aware of a voice calling my name.

Turning, I saw a woman sitting with a young boy waving to me from a nearby table. The pair clearly matched the porter's description and I could not understand how I had failed to notice them earlier. I was a little taken aback, moreover, that they should be expecting me, and it was a moment or two before I waved back and began making my way towards them.

Although the porter had referred to her as a 'young woman', Sophie was in early middle age, perhaps around forty or so. For all that, she was somewhat more attractive than I had expected. She was quite tall, slimly built and her long dark hair gave her a gypsy-like quality. The boy beside her was a little on the tubby side, and at this moment was regarding his mother with a cross expression.

'Well?' Sophie was looking up at me with a smile. 'Aren't you going to sit down?'

'Yes, yes,' I said, realising I had been standing there hesitantly. 'That is, if you don't mind.' I gave the boy a grin, but he just looked back at me with disapproval.

‘Of course we don’t mind. Do we, Boris? Boris, say hello to Mr Ryder.’

‘Hello, Boris,’ I said seating myself.

The boy continued to look at me with disapproval. Then he said to his mother: ‘Why did you tell him he could sit down? I was just explaining something to you.’

‘This is Mr Ryder, Boris,’ Sophie said. ‘He’s a special friend. Of course he can sit with us if he wants.’

‘But I was explaining to you how the Voyager flew. I knew you weren’t listening. You should learn to pay attention.’

‘I’m sorry, Boris,’ Sophie said, exchanging a quick smile with me. ‘I was trying awfully hard, but all this science is way above my head. Now why don’t you say hello to Mr Ryder?’

Boris looked at me for a moment, then said grumpily: ‘Hello.’ With that he turned his gaze away from me.

‘Please don’t let me be the source of any friction,’ I said. ‘Please, Boris, continue with what you were just explaining. In fact, I’d be very interested to hear about this aircraft myself.’

‘It’s not an aircraft,’ Boris said wearily. ‘It’s a vehicle for going through star systems. But you wouldn’t understand any better than Mother.’

‘Oh? How do you know I wouldn’t understand? I might have a very scientific mind. You shouldn’t judge people so quickly, Boris.’

He sighed heavily and kept his gaze averted from me. ‘You’ll be just like Mother,’ he said. ‘You’d lack concentration.’

‘Now come on, Boris,’ Sophie said. ‘You should be a little more accommodating. Mr Ryder’s a very special friend. '

'Not only that,' I said, 'I'm a friend of your grandfather. '

For the first time, Boris regarded me with interest.

'Oh yes,' I said. 'We've become good friends, your grandfather and I. I'm staying at his hotel. '

Boris went on studying me carefully.

'Boris,' Sophie said, 'why don't you say hello nicely to Mr Ryder? You still haven't shown him any manners at all. You don't want him going away thinking you're an ill-mannered young man, do you? '

Boris went on looking at me a while longer. Then quite suddenly he flopped forward onto the table, burying his head in his arms. At the same time he began to swing his feet about underneath, for I could hear the clanging of his shoes against the metal table leg.

'I'm sorry,' Sophie said. 'He's been rather moody today. '

'As a matter of fact,' I said to her quietly, 'there was something I wished to talk to you about. But, er ...' I signalled with my eyes towards Boris. Sophie looked at me, then turned to the little boy, saying:

'Boris, I've got to talk with Mr Ryder a moment. Why don't you go and look at the swans? Just for a minute. '

Boris kept his head in his arms as though asleep, though his feet continued to clang rhythmically. Sophie shook his shoulder gently.

'Come on now,' she said. 'There's a black swan out there too. Go and stand over by those railings, where those nuns are. You'll be able to see it for sure. You can come back in a few minutes and tell us what you've seen. '

For a few more seconds Boris gave no response. Then he sat up, let out another weary sigh and slid off his chair. For some reason best known to himself, he affected the mannerisms of someone utterly drunk and went staggering away from the table.

Once the boy was a sufficient distance away, I turned back to Sophie. Then an uncertainty came over me as to how I should begin and I sat hesitating for a moment. In any case, Sophie smiled and spoke first:

‘I’ve got good news. That Mr Mayer phoned earlier about a house. It’s just come on the market today. It sounds really promising. I’ve been thinking about it all day. Something tells me this might be it, the one we’ve been looking for all this time. I told him I’d go out there first thing tomorrow morning and have a good look. Really, it sounds perfect. About half an hour’s walk from the village, all by itself on a ridge, three storeys. Mr Mayer says the views over the forest are the best he’s seen in years. I know you’re very busy just now, but if it turns out to be anything like as good as it sounds, I’ll call you and perhaps you could come out. Boris too. It might be exactly what we’ve been looking for. I know it’s taken a long time, but I might have found it at last.’

‘Ah yes. Good.’

‘I’ll take the first bus out there in the morning. We’ll have to act fast. It won’t stay on the market long.’

She began to give me more details about the house. I remained silent, but only partly because of my uncertainty as to how I should respond. For the fact was, as we had been sitting together, Sophie’s face had come to seem steadily more familiar to me, until now I thought I could even remember vaguely some earlier discussions about buying just such a house in the woods. Meanwhile my expression had perhaps grown preoccupied, for even tually she broke off, then said in a different, more tentative voice:

‘I’m sorry about that last phone call. I hope you’re not still sulking about it.’

‘Sulking? Oh no.’

‘I keep thinking about it. I shouldn’t have said any of it. I hope you didn’t take it to heart. After all, how can you be expected to stay at home just now? What home? And with that kitchen the way it is! And I’ve been taking so long, finding somewhere for us. But I’m so hopeful now, about this house tomorrow.’

She began to talk again about the house. As she did so, I tried to recall something of the phone conversation to which she had just referred. After a while, I found a faint recollection returning to me of listening to this same voice – or rather a harder, angrier version of it – on the end of a telephone in the not-so-distant past. Eventually I thought I could recall also a certain phrase I had been shouting at her down the mouthpiece: ‘You live in such a small world!’ She had continued to argue and I had gone on repeating contemptuously: ‘Such a small world! You live in such a small world!’ To my frustration, however, I found nothing more of this exchange would come back to me.

Possibly I had begun to stare at her in my endeavour to jog my memory, for she now asked rather self-consciously:

‘Do you think I’ve put on weight?’

‘No, no.’ I turned away with a laugh. ‘You’re looking quite marvellous.’

It occurred to me I had not yet mentioned anything of the matter concerning her father and I tried again to think of a suitable way to broach the topic. But just then something jolted my chair from behind and I realised Boris had returned.

In fact the little boy was running around in circles near our table, kicking a discarded paper carton as though it were a football. Noticing that I was now watching him, he juggled the carton from one foot to the other, then kicked it hard through the legs of my chair.

‘Number Nine!’ he shouted, holding his arms aloft. ‘A superb goal from Number Nine!’

‘Boris,’ I said, ‘hadn’t you better put that carton in the waste bin?’

‘When are we going to go?’ he asked, turning to me. ‘We’re going to be late. It’ll be dark soon.’

Looking past him I saw that indeed the sun was beginning to set over the square and that many of the tables had become vacant.

‘I’m sorry, Boris. What was it you were wanting to do?’

‘Hurry up!’ The little boy gave my arm a tug. ‘We’ll never get there!’

‘Where is it Boris wants to go?’ I asked his mother quietly.

‘To the swing park, of course.’ Sophie sighed and rose to her feet. ‘He wants to show you the progress he’s made.’

There seemed no choice but for me to rise also, and the next moment the three of us were setting off across the square.

‘So,’ I said to Boris as he fell in step beside me, ‘you’re going to show me a few things.’

‘When we were there earlier on,’ he said, taking my arm, ‘there was this boy, he was bigger than me, and he couldn’t even do a torpedo! Mother thought he was at least two years older than me. I showed him how to do it five times, but he was too scared. He just kept going to the top, then he couldn’t do it!’

‘Really. And of course, you’re not scared to do this thing. This torpedo.’

‘Of course I’m not scared! It’s easy! It’s completely easy!’

‘That’s good.’

‘He was too scared! It was so funny!’

We left the square and began to make our way through the small cobbled streets of the district. Boris seemed to know the way well, often running a few paces ahead in his impatience. Then at one point, he fell in step beside me again and asked:

‘Do you know Grandfather?’

‘Yes, I told you. We’re good friends.’

‘Grandfather’s very strong. He’s one of the strongest men in the town.’

‘Is that so?’

‘He’s a good fighter. He was a soldier once. He’s old, but he’s still a better fighter than most people. Street thugs don’t realise that sometimes, then they get a nasty surprise.’ Boris made a sudden lunging movement as he walked. ‘Before they know it, Grandfather’s got them on the ground.’

‘Really? That’s interesting, Boris.’

Just at that moment, as we continued through the little cobbled streets, I found myself remembering more of the argument I had had with Sophie. It had taken place perhaps a week or so ago, and I had been in a hotel room somewhere, listening to her voice at the other end of the line shouting:

‘How much longer can they expect you to carry on like this? Neither of us are so young any more! You’ve done your share now! Let somebody else do it all now!’

‘Look,’ I had been saying to her, my voice still calm, ‘the fact is, people need me. I arrive in a place and more often than not find terrible problems. Deep-seated, seemingly intractable problems, and people are so grateful I've come.'

'But how much longer can you go on doing this for people? And for us, I mean for me and you and Boris, time's slipping away. Before you know it, Boris will be grown up. No one can expect you to keep on like this. And all these people, why can't they sort out their own problems? It might do them some good!'

'You've no idea!' I had broken in, now angry. 'You don't know what you're saying! Some of these places I visit, the people don't know a thing. They don't understand the first thing about modern music and if you leave them to themselves, it's obvious, they'll just get deeper and deeper into trouble. I'm needed, why can't you see that? I'm needed out here! You don't know what you're talking about!' And it was then I had shouted at her: 'Such a small world! You live in such a small world!'

We had come to a small playground encircled by railings. It was empty of people and I thought it had a rather melancholy atmosphere about it. Boris though led us enthusiastically through the little gate.

'Look, this is easy!' he said, and went running off towards the climbing frame.

For a while, Sophie and I stood in the fading light watching his figure climb higher and higher. Then she said quietly:

'You know, it's funny. When I was listening to that Mr Mayer, the way he was describing the living room of the house, I kept getting these pictures in my mind, of the apartment we lived in when I was small. All the time he was talking, I kept getting these pictures. Our old living room. And Mother and Papa, the way they were then. It's probably nothing like that. I'm not really expecting it to be. I'll get there tomorrow and I'll find it's completely different.'

But it made me hopeful. You know, a sort of omen.' She gave a small laugh, then touched my shoulder. 'You're looking so glum.'

'Am I? I'm sorry. It's all this travelling. I suppose I'm rather tired.'

Boris had reached the top of the climbing frame, but the light had grown so dim he was barely more than a silhouette against the sky. He gave us a shout, then, gripping the top rung, somersaulted his body around it.

'He's so proud of being able to do that,' Sophie said. Then she called out: 'Boris, it's too dark now. Come on down.'

'It's easy. It's easier in the dark.'

'Come on down now.'

'It's all this travelling,' I said. 'Hotel room after hotel room. Never seeing anyone you know. It's been very tiring. And even now, here in this city, there's so much pressure on me. The people here. Obviously they're expecting a lot of me. I mean, it's obvious ...'

'Look,' Sophie broke in gently, placing a hand on my arm, 'why don't we forget about it all for now? There'll be plenty of time for us to talk it over later. We're all tired. Come back with us to the apartment. It's only a few minutes' walk from here, just past the medieval chapel. I'm sure we could all do with a nice supper and a chance to put our feet up.'

She had spoken softly, her mouth close to my ear so that I could feel her breath. My earlier weariness came over me again and the idea of relaxing in the warmth of her apartment - perhaps lazing about with Boris on the carpet while Sophie prepared our meal - seemed suddenly highly enticing. So much so that for a brief moment I might even have closed my eyes and stood there smiling dreamily. In any case I was brought out of my reverie by Boris's return.

'It's easy to do it in the dark,' he said.

I saw then that Boris looked cold and somewhat shaken. All his earlier energy had evaporated and it occurred to me the performance he had just put on had required large resources on his part.

'We're all going back to the apartment now,' I said.
'We'll have something nice to eat there.'

'Come on,' Sophie said, setting off. 'Time's getting on.'

A fine drizzle had started to fall and now that the sun had set, the air was much chillier. Boris took my hand again and we followed Sophie out of the swing park into a deserted back street.

4

It was clear we had now left behind the Old Town. The dingy brick walls that towered up on either side were windowless and appeared to be the backs of warehouses. As we made our way along the street, Sophie kept up a purposeful pace and before long I could sense Boris having difficulty keeping up. But when I asked him: 'Are we going too fast?' he looked at me with a furious expression.

'I can go much faster!' he shouted and broke into a trot, tugging at my hand. But almost straight away he slowed down again with a hurt look on his face. After a while, despite my maintaining an easy pace, I could hear his breath coming with a struggle. He then started to whisper to himself. I did not pay much attention at first, assuming he was simply trying to keep up his spirits. But then I heard him whisper:

'Number Nine ... It's Number Nine ...'

I glanced at him with curiosity. He looked wet and cold, and it occurred to me I should keep him conversing.

'This Number Nine,' I said. 'Is he a footballer?'

'The top footballer in the world.'

'Number Nine. Yes, of course.'

Up ahead of us, Sophie's figure vanished around a corner and Boris's grip on my hand tightened. I had not until this moment appreciated how far in front we had allowed his mother to get, and though we increased our pace, it seemed to take an inordinate time for us to reach the corner ourselves. Once we finally turned it, I saw to my annoyance that Sophie had gained even further on us.

We went past more dirty brick walls, some with extensive damp patches. The paving was uneven and I could see before us puddles glinting under the street lighting.

‘Don’t worry,’ I said to Boris. ‘We’re nearly there now.’

Boris was continuing to whisper to himself, repeating in time with his short breaths: ‘Number Nine ... Number Nine ...’

From the first, Boris’s mentions of ‘Number Nine’ had rung some distant bell for me. Now as I listened to his whispering, I recalled that ‘Number Nine’ was not in fact a real footballer, but one of Boris’s miniature players from his table-football game. The footballers, moulded in alabaster and each one weighted at the base, could be made with flicks of the finger to dribble, pass and shoot a tiny plastic ball. The game was intended for two people each controlling a team, but Boris only ever played on his own, spending hours lying on his front orchestrating matches full of dramatic reversals and nail-biting comebacks. He possessed six full teams, as well as miniature goals with authentic netting and a green felt cloth that opened out to form the pitch. Boris despised the manufacturers’ assumption that he would enjoy pretending the teams were ‘real’ ones, such as Ajax Amsterdam or AC Milan, and had given the teams his own names. The individual players, however – though Boris had come to know each one’s strengths and weaknesses intimately – he had never named, preferring to call them simply by their shirt numbers. Perhaps because he was not aware of the significance of shirt numbers in football – or perhaps it was just another wilful quirk of his imagination – a player’s number bore no relation to where Boris placed him in the team formation. Thus, the Number Ten of one team might be a legendary central defender, the Number Two a promising young winger.

‘Number Nine’ belonged to Boris’s very favourite team, and was by far the most gifted of the players. However, for all his immense skill, Number Nine was a highly moody personality. His position in the team was somewhere in midfield, but often, for long stretches of a match, he would sulk in some obscure part of the pitch, apparently oblivious of the fact that his team was losing badly. Sometimes, Number Nine would continue in this lethargic manner for over an hour, so that his team would go four, five, six goals down, and the commentator – for indeed there was a commentator – would say in a mystified voice: ‘Number Nine so far just hasn’t found his form. I don’t quite know what’s wrong.’ Then, perhaps with twenty minutes remaining, Number Nine would finally give a glimpse of his true ability, pulling back a goal for his side with some fine piece of skill.

‘That’s more like it!’ the commentator would exclaim. ‘At last, Number Nine shows what he can do!’ From that moment on, Number Nine’s form would grow steadily stronger, until before long he would be scoring one goal after another, and the opposing team would be concentrating entirely on preventing at virtually any cost Number Nine receiving the ball. But sooner or later he would, and then, no matter how many opponents stood between him and the goalmouth, he would manage to find a way through to score. Soon the inevitability of the outcome once he had received the ball was such that the commentator would say: ‘It’s a goal,’ in tones of resigned admiration, not when the ball actually went into the net, but at the moment Number Nine first gained possession – even if this occurred deep within his own half. The spectators too – there were spectators – would commence their roar of triumph as soon as they saw Number Nine get the ball, the roar continuing intensely and evenly as Number Nine wove his way gracefully through his opponents, struck the ball past the goalkeeper, and turned to receive the adulation of his grateful team-mates.

As I was remembering all this, a vague recollection came into my head that some problem had recently arisen concerning

Number Nine, and I interrupted Boris's whispering by asking:

‘How is Number Nine these days? On good form?’

Boris walked a few steps in silence, then said: ‘We left the box behind.’

‘The box?’

‘Number Nine came off his base. Quite a few of them do that, it's easy to fix. I put Number Nine in a special box and I was going to fix him once Mother got the right kind of glue. I put him in the box, it was a special one, so I wouldn't forget where he was. But we left him behind.’

‘I see. You mean, you left him where you used to live.’

‘Mother forgot to pack him. But she said we could go back soon. To the old apartment and he'd be there. I can fix him, we've got the right sort of glue now. I've got a bit saved up.’

‘I see.’

‘Mother says it'll be all right, she's going to see about everything. Make sure the new people don't throw him away by mistake. She said we'd go back soon.’

I had the distinct impression Boris was hinting at something, and when he fell silent again, I said to him:

‘Boris, if you wanted, I could take you back. Yes, we could go back together, the two of us. Back to the old apartment and fetch Number Nine. We can do it soon. Perhaps even tomorrow if I find a spare moment. Then as you say, you've got the glue. He'll be back to his best in no time. So don't worry. We'll do that very soon.’

Sophie's figure once again disappeared from our view, this time so abruptly I thought she must have gone into a doorway. Boris tugged at my hand and we both hurried on towards the spot where she had vanished.

We soon discovered that Sophie had in fact turned down a side-alley, whose entrance was little more than a crack in the wall. It descended steeply and appeared so narrow it did not seem possible to go down it without scraping an elbow along one or the other of the rough walls to either side. The darkness was broken only by two street lamps, one half-way down, the other at the very bottom.

Boris gripped my hand as we began our descent, and soon his breath was coming with difficulty again. After a while I noticed that Sophie had already reached the bottom of the alley, but she seemed at last to have become aware of our plight, and was standing beneath the lower lamp, gazing back up at us with a vaguely concerned expression. When we finally joined her, I said angrily:

‘Look, can’t you see we’ve been having trouble keeping up with you? It’s been a tiring day, both for me and for Boris.’

Sophie smiled dreamily. Then, putting an arm around Boris’s shoulder, she drew the little boy close to her.

‘Don’t worry,’ she said to him softly. ‘I know it’s a little unpleasant here and that it’s got cold and rainy. But never mind, very soon now we’ll be at the apartment. It’ll be very warm, we’ll see to that. Warm enough so that we can all just go around in T-shirts if we want. And there are those big new armchairs you can curl up in. A little boy like you could get lost in chairs like that. And you could look at your books, or watch one of the videos. Or if you like, we could bring down some board games from the cupboard. I could bring them all down for you, and you and Mr Ryder could play whichever one you wanted. You could put the big red cushions on the carpet and spread the game out on the floor. And all the time, I’ll be cooking our evening meal and preparing the table in the corner. In fact, instead of one large dish, I think I might make a selection of small things. Little meatballs, tiny cheese flans, a few little cakes. Don’t worry, I’ll remember all your favourites and I’ll lay it all out on the table. Then we can sit down and eat, and then afterwards all three of us can go on with the board game. Of course, if you didn't feel like playing any more, we wouldn't have to go on. Perhaps you'll want to talk with Mr Ryder about football. Then, only when you're really tired, you can go off to bed. I know your new room's very small, but it's very snug, you said so yourself. You're sure to sleep very soundly tonight. You'll have forgotten all about this cold unpleasant walk by then. In fact you'll forget all about it the moment you go in through the door and you feel the nice warm heating. So don't get discouraged. It's only a little way to go now.'

She had had Boris in a hug while saying this, but now she suddenly released him, turned and began to walk again. The abruptness with which she did so caught me by surprise - for I had myself become steadily lulled by her words and had for a moment closed my eyes. Boris too looked bewildered, and by the time I had taken his hand his mother was once more several paces in front.

I was keen not to let her get too far ahead again, but just at that moment I became conscious of footsteps coming down behind us and I could not help lingering a second to look back up the alley. Just as I did so, the person entered the pool of light cast by the lower lamp and I saw that it was someone I knew. His name was Geoffrey Saunders and he had been in my year at school in England. I had not seen him since schooldays, so was naturally struck by how much he had aged. Even allowing for the unflattering effects of the lamplight and the cold drizzle, he looked overwhelmingly down-at-heel. He was wearing a raincoat that seemed to have lost its ability to fasten and which he was now clutching together at the front as he walked. I was not at all sure I wished to acknowledge him, but then, as Boris and I set off once more, Geoffrey Saunders fell in step alongside us.

'Hello, old chap,' he said. 'Thought it was you. Rotten evening it's turned out to be.'

‘Yes, miserable,’ I said. ‘And earlier it was so pleasant.’

The alley had brought us out onto a dark deserted road. There was a strong breeze and the city seemed far away.

‘Your boy?’ Geoffrey Saunders asked, nodding towards Boris. Then, before I could reply, he continued: ‘Nice boy. Well done. Looks very bright. Myself I never married. Always thought I would, but time’s just slipped away and now I suppose I never shall. To be honest, I suppose there’s more to it than that. But I don’t want to bore you with all the rotten luck I’ve had over the years. I’ve had some good things happen too. Still. Well done. Nice boy.’

Geoffrey Saunders leaned forward and gave Boris a salute. Boris, either too upset or too preoccupied, gave no response.

The road was now leading us downhill. As we walked through the darkness, I recalled how at school Geoffrey Saunders had been the golden boy of our year, always distinguishing himself both academically and on the sports field. His was the example forever being used to rebuke the rest of us for lack of effort, and it was widely reckoned that he would in time become school captain. He never did so, I recalled, owing to some crisis that had obliged him to leave the school suddenly during our fifth year.

‘I read in the papers you were coming,’ he was saying to me. ‘I’ve been expecting to hear from you. You know, to tell me when you’ll be popping round. I went and bought some cakes from the bakery so that I had something to offer you along with a cup of tea. After all, my digs may be rather dreary, what with my being single and all, but I still expect people to come and visit sometimes and I feel quite capable of looking after them well. So when I heard you were coming, I immediately popped out and bought a selection of tea cakes. That was the day before yesterday. Yesterday, I thought they were still presentable, though the icing had got a bit on the tough side. But today, when you still hadn’t called, I threw them away. Pride, I suppose. I mean, you've been so successful, and I don't want you going away thinking I'm leading this miserable existence in small rented rooms with only stale cakes to offer a visitor. So I went to the bakery and got some fresh cakes. And I tidied my room up a bit. But you didn't call. Well, I suppose I can't blame you. I say' - he leaned forward again and looked at Boris - 'are you all right there? You sound completely puffed out.'

Boris, who indeed was struggling again, gave no sign of having heard.

'Better slow down for the little slowcoach,' Geoffrey Saunders said. 'It's just that I was a little unlucky in love at one stage. A lot of people in this town assume I'm homosexual. Just because I live alone in a rented room. I minded that at first, but I don't any more. All right, they mistake me for a homosexual. So what? As it happens, my needs are met by women. You know, the sort you pay. Perfectly adequate for me, and I'd say some of them are quite decent people. All the same, after a while, you start to despise them and they start to despise you. Can't help it. I know most of the whores in this town. I don't mean I've slept with them all. Not by any means! But they know me and I know them. I'm on nodding terms with a lot of them. You probably think I lead a miserable existence. I don't. It's just a matter of how you look at things. Occasionally friends come to visit me. I'm quite capable of entertaining them over a cup of tea. I do it quite well and they often say afterwards how much they enjoyed popping round.'

The road had been descending steeply for a while, but it now levelled, and we found ourselves in what appeared to be an abandoned farmyard. All about us in the moonlight there loomed the dark shapes of barns and outhouses. Sophie was continuing to lead the way, but she was now some distance in front and often I would glimpse her figure only as it disappeared around the edge of some broken building.

Fortunately Geoffrey Saunders seemed to know his way well, navigating a route through the dark with barely a thought. As I followed close behind him, a certain memory came back to me from our schooldays, of a crisp winter's morning in England, with an overcast sky and frost on the ground. I had been fourteen or fifteen and had been standing outside a pub with Geoffrey Saunders somewhere deep in the Worcestershire countryside. We had been paired together to mark a cross-country run, our task being simply to point the runners, as they emerged out of the mist, in the correct direction across a nearby field. I had been unusually upset that morning, and after fifteen minutes or so of our standing there together staring quietly into the fog, in spite of my best efforts, I had burst into tears. I had not known Geoffrey Saunders well at that point, though like everyone else I had always been keen to make a good impression on him. I had thus been quite mortified and my initial impression, once I had finally brought my emotions under control, had been that he was ignoring me with the utmost contempt. But then Geoffrey Saunders had begun to speak, at first without looking in my direction, then eventually turning to me. I could not now bring to mind just what it was he had said on that foggy morning, but I could recall well enough the impact his words had had. For one thing, even in my state of self-pity, I had been able to recognise the remarkable generosity he was displaying, and had felt a profound gratitude. It was also at that moment I had first realised, with a distinct chill, that there was another side to the school golden boy - some deeply vulnerable dimension that would ensure he would never live up to the expectations that had been placed on him. As we continued to walk together through the dark, I tried once more to remember just what he had said that morning, but to no avail.

With the ground levelling, Boris seemed to recover a little breath and he had once more begun to whisper. Now, perhaps encouraged by a sense that we were about to reach our destination, he found the energy to kick a stone in his path, exclaiming out loud as he did so: 'Number Nine!' The stone skipped across the rough ground and landed in water somewhere in the darkness.

'That's a bit more like it,' Geoffrey Saunders said to Boris. 'Is that your position? Number Nine?'

When Boris failed to answer, I said quickly: 'Oh no, it's just his favourite footballer.'

'Oh yes? I watch a lot of football. On the television, that is.' He leaned forward to Boris again. 'Which number nine is that?'

'Oh, it's just his favourite player,' I said again.

'As far as centre forwards go,' Geoffrey Saunders went on, 'I rather like that Dutchman, plays for Milan. He's quite something.'

I was about to say something further to explain about Number Nine, but at that moment we came to a halt. I saw then that we were standing at the edge of a vast grassy field. Just how large it was, I could not ascertain, but I guessed it extended far beyond what could be seen by the moon. As we stood there, a harsh wind swept across the grass and on into the darkness.

'We appear to be lost,' I said to Geoffrey Saunders. 'Do you know your way around here?'

'Oh yes. I live not so far from here. Unfortunately I can't ask you in just now because I'm very tired and have to go to sleep. But I'll be ready to welcome you tomorrow. Let's say any time after nine o'clock.'

I looked across the field into the blackness.

'To be frank, we're in a little trouble just now,' I said. 'You see, we were on our way to the apartment of that woman we were following earlier. Now we've got ourselves rather lost and I've no idea what her address is. She said something about living near a medieval chapel.'

'The medieval chapel? That's in the city centre.'

'Ah. Can we get to it by going across there?' I pointed over the field.

'Oh no, there's nothing that way. Nothing but emptiness. Only person living out there is that Brodsky fellow.'

'Brodsky,' I said. 'Hmm. I heard him practising in the hotel today. You all seem to know about this Brodsky here in this town.'

Geoffrey Saunders gave me a glance that made me suspect I had said something foolish.

'Well, he's been living here for years and years. Why shouldn't we know about him?'

'Yes, yes, of course.'

'A bit hard to believe the crazy old fellow's got it in him to conduct an orchestra. But I'm prepared to wait and see. Things can't very well get much worse. And if you start saying Brodsky's the thing, well, who am I to argue?'

I could not think what I might say to this. In any case, Geoffrey Saunders suddenly turned away from the field, saying:

'No, no, the city's over that way. I can direct you if you like.'

'We'd be very grateful,' I said as a chilly gust blew against us.

'Well now.' Geoffrey Saunders fell into thought for a moment. Then he said: 'To be honest, you'd be best off getting a bus. To walk from here would take a good half-hour or so. Perhaps the woman persuaded you her apartment was close by. Well, they always do that. It's one of their tricks. You should never believe them. But it's no problem if you take a bus. I'll show you where you can pick one up.'

'We'd be very grateful,' I said again. 'Boris is getting cold. I hope this bus stop isn't far.'

'Oh, very near. Just follow me, old man.'

Geoffrey Saunders turned and led us back towards the abandoned farmyard. I sensed, however, that we were not retracing our footsteps and, sure enough, before long we found ourselves walking down a narrow street in what seemed a less than affluent suburb. Small terraced houses stood in rows on either side. Here and there I could see lights in windows, but for the most part the occupants appeared to have turned in for the night.

'It's all right,' I said quietly to Boris, who I sensed was close to exhaustion. 'We'll be at the apartment now very soon. Your mother will have everything ready for us by the time we turn up.'

We walked on for a while past more rows of houses. Then Boris began to mutter again:

'Number Nine ... It's Number Nine ...'

'Look, which number nine is this?' Geoffrey Saunders said, turning to him. 'You mean that Dutchman, don't you?'

'Number Nine's the best player so far in history,' Boris said.

'Yes, but which number nine do you mean?' Geoffrey Saunders's voice had now gained an edge of impatience. 'What's his name? Which is his team?'

'Boris just likes to call him ...'

'Once he scored seventeen goals in the last ten minutes!' Boris said.

'Oh nonsense.' Geoffrey Saunders seemed genuinely annoyed. 'I thought you were being serious. You're talking nonsense. '

'He did!' Boris shouted. 'It was a world record!'

'Quite!' I joined in. 'A world record!' Then, recovering my composure somewhat, I gave a laugh. 'That's to say, well, it's bound to be, isn't it.' I smiled appealingly at Geoffrey Saunders, but he ignored me.

'But who are you talking about? Do you mean that Dutchman? Anyway, young man, you've got to realise, scoring goals isn't everything. The defenders are just as important. The really great players are often defenders.'

'Number Nine's the best player so far in history!' Boris said again. 'When he's on form, no defence can stop him!'

'That's right,' I said. 'Number Nine's without doubt the world's finest. Midfield, up front, everything. He does everything. Really.'

'You're talking nonsense, old man. Neither of you know what you're talking about.'

'We know perfectly well.' By this time I was getting quite angry with Geoffrey Saunders. 'In fact, what we're saying is universally acknowledged. When Number Nine's on form, really on form, the commentator shouts "goal" the moment he gets the ball, no matter where on the pitch ...'

'Oh my goodness.' Geoffrey Saunders turned away in disgust. 'If that's the sort of rubbish you fill your boy's brain with, God help him.'

'Now look here ...' I put my face right up to his ear and spoke in an angry whisper. 'Look here, can't you understand ...'

'It's rubbish, old man. You're filling the boy's head with rubbish ...'

‘But he’s young, just a small boy. Can’t you understand ...’

‘No reason to fill his head with rubbish. Besides, he doesn’t look as young as all that. In my view, a boy his age, he should be making a proper contribution to things by now. Starting to pull his weight a bit. He should be learning about wallpapering, say, or tiling. Not all this nonsense about fantastical footballers ...’

‘Look, you idiot, just be quiet! Be quiet!’

‘A boy his age, it’s high time he was pulling his weight ...’

‘He’s my boy, I’ll say when it’s time for him to ...’

‘Wallpapering, tiling, something like that. To my mind, that’s the sort of thing ...’

‘Look, what do you know about it? What do you know, a miserable, lonely bachelor? What do you know about it?’

I pushed his shoulder roughly. Geoffrey Saunders became suddenly crestfallen. He shuffled a few paces on ahead of us, where he continued walking with his head slightly bowed, still clutching the front of his raincoat.

‘It’s all right,’ I said to Boris quietly. ‘We’ll be there soon.’

Boris did not respond and I saw that he was staring at Geoffrey Saunders’s lurching figure before us.

As we continued to walk, my anger at my old schoolmate began to subside. Besides, I had not forgotten that we were entirely reliant on him to show us the way to our bus stop. After a few moments I drew up closer to him, wondering if we were still on talking terms. To my surprise I heard Geoffrey Saunders muttering away to himself softly:

‘Yes, yes, we’ll talk over all these things when you come round for your cup of tea. We’ll talk over everything, spend a nostalgic hour or two discussing schooldays and old schoolfriends. I'll have my room tidied, and we can sit on the armchairs, on either side of the fireplace. Yes, it does look rather like the sort of room one might rent in England. Or at least might have done a few years ago. That's why I took it. Reminded me of home. Anyway, we could sit on either side of the fireplace and talk about the lot. The masters, the boys, exchange news of mutual friends we're still in touch with. Ah, here we are.'

We had emerged into what looked like a small village square. There were a few small shops - where presumably the inhabitants of this district bought their groceries - all of them closed and gridded up for the night. In the middle of the square was a patch of green not much bigger than a traffic island. Geoffrey Saunders pointed to a solitary street lamp in front of the shops.

'You and your boy should wait over there. I know there's no sign, but don't worry, it's a recognised bus stop. Now, I'm afraid I'll have to leave you.'

Boris and I stared across to where he had pointed. The rain had stopped, but a mist was hovering around the base of the lamppost. There was nothing stirring around us.

'Are you sure a bus will come?' I asked.

'Oh yes. Naturally, at this time of night it might take a little while. But certainly it'll come in the end. You have to be patient, that's all. You might get a little chilly standing here, but believe me the bus is well worth the wait. It will come out of the darkness, all brightly lit up. And once you step on board, you'll find it's very warm and comfortable. And it always has the most cheerful crowd of passengers. They'll be laughing and joking, handing out hot drinks and snacks. They'll make you and your boy very welcome. Just ask the driver to let you off at the medieval chapel. It's just a short journey by bus.'

Geoffrey Saunders bade us good night, then turned and walked off. Boris and I watched him disappear down an alleyway between two houses, then began to make our way over to the bus stop.

We stood beneath the street lamp for several minutes, surrounded by silence. Eventually I put my arm around Boris saying: 'You must be getting cold.'

He pressed himself against my body, but said nothing, and when I glanced down at him I saw he was gazing thoughtfully along the darkened street. Somewhere far away a dog began to bark, then stopped. When we had been standing like that for a time, I said:

'Boris, I'm sorry. I should have arranged things better. I'm sorry.'

The little boy remained silent for a moment. Then he said: 'Don't worry. The bus will come soon.'

I could see across the little square the mist drifting in front of the short row of shops.

'I'm not sure a bus is coming, Boris,' I said eventually.

'It's all right. You've got to be patient.'

We went on waiting for several more moments. Then I said again:

'Boris, I'm not at all sure a bus is going to come.'

The little boy turned to me and sighed wearily. 'Stop worrying,' he said. 'Didn't you hear what the man said? We just have to wait.'

'Boris. Sometimes things don't happen as you expect. Even when someone tells you it will.'

Boris gave another sigh. 'Look, the man said, didn't he? Anyway, Mother will be waiting for us.'

I was trying to think of what to say next when the sound of a cough made us both start. Turning, I saw, just beyond the light cast by the street lamp, someone leaning out of a stationary car.

‘Good evening, Mr Ryder. Excuse me, but I was just going by and happened to see you. Is everything all right?’

I took a few steps towards the car and recognised Stephan, the hotel manager’s son.

‘Oh yes,’ I said. ‘Everything’s fine, thank you. We were ... well, we were waiting for a bus.’

‘Perhaps I could give you a lift. I was just on my way somewhere, a rather delicate mission Father’s entrusted me with. I say, it’s rather chilly out there. Why don’t you jump in?’

The young man got out and opened the passenger doors front and back. Thanking him, I helped Boris into the rear seat and got into the front. The next moment, the car had begun to move.

‘So this is your little boy,’ Stephan said as we sped through deserted streets. ‘How very nice to meet him, though he looks a bit exhausted just now. Oh well, let him rest. I’ll shake his hand another time.’

Glancing behind me, I saw that Boris was in the process of falling asleep, his head against the cushioned armrest.

‘So, Mr Ryder,’ Stephan went on. ‘I assume you’re wanting to return to the hotel.’

‘Actually, Boris and I were on our way to someone’s apartment. In the centre, near the medieval chapel.’

‘The medieval chapel? Hmm.’

‘Is that going to be a problem?’

‘Oh, not really. No problem at all.’ Stephan steered round a tight corner into another narrow dark street. ‘It’s just that, well, as I mentioned, I was just on my way somewhere myself. To an appointment. Now let me see ...'

'Your appointment is an urgent one?'

'Well actually, Mr Ryder, it is rather. It's to do with Mr Brodsky, you see. In fact, it's quite crucial. Hmm. I wonder, if you and Boris were generous enough to wait just a few minutes while I saw to it, then I could drive you wherever you want afterwards.'

'Naturally you must attend to your business first. But I'd be grateful if there's not too much delay. You see, Boris hasn't had supper yet.'

'I'll be as quick as I can, Mr Ryder. I only wish I could take you immediately, but you see, I daren't be late. As I say, it's rather a tricky little mission ...'

'Of course, you must see to that first. We'll be very happy to wait.'

'I'll try and make it as quick as possible. Though to be honest, I don't see how I can take too many short cuts. In fact, it's the sort of thing Father would usually handle himself, or else one of the gentlemen, but well, it's just that Miss Collins has always had a soft spot for me ...' The young man broke off, suddenly embarrassed. Then he said: 'I'll try not to be long.'

We were now moving through a more salubrious district - closer, I guessed, to the city centre. The street lighting was much better and I noticed tram lines running alongside us. There was the occasional café or restaurant closed for the night, but for the most part the area was full of stately apartment buildings. The windows were all dark and our vehicle seemed the only thing for miles disturbing the hush. Stephan Hoffman drove in silence for a few minutes. Then he said suddenly, as though he had for some time been working himself up to it:

‘Look, it’s awfully impertinent of me. But are you sure you don’t want to go back to the hotel? It’s just that, I mean, with those journalists waiting for you there and everything.’

‘Journalists?’ I looked out into the night. ‘Ah yes. The journalists.’

‘Golly, I hope you don’t think I’m being cheeky. It’s just that I happened to see them as I was leaving. Sitting in the lobby with their folders and briefcases on their laps, looking very keyed up at the thought of meeting you. As I say, it’s none of my business and naturally you’ve got the whole thing worked out, I’m sure.’

‘Quite, quite,’ I said softly, and continued to look out of the window.

Stephan fell silent, no doubt deciding he should not press the matter further. But I found myself thinking about the journalists, and after a moment I thought I could perhaps remember some such appointment. Certainly, the image the young man had evoked of people sitting with folders and briefcases rang a bell. In the end, though, I could not recall with any definiteness such an item having been on my schedule and decided to forget the matter.

‘Ah, here we are,’ Stephan said beside me. ‘Now if you’d excuse me for a little while. Please make yourselves as comfortable as you can. I’ll be back as quickly as possible.’

We had come to a halt in front of a large white apartment building. Several storeys high, the dark wrought-iron balconies at each level gave it a Spanish flavour.

Stephan got out of the car and I watched him go up to the entrance. He stooped over the row of apartment buttons, pressed one, then stood waiting, a nervousness discernible in his posture. A moment later a light came on in the entrance hall.

The door was opened by an elderly, silver-haired woman. She looked slender and frail, but there was a certain gracefulness in her movement as she smiled and showed Stephan in. The door closed behind him, but by leaning right back in my seat I found I could still see the two of them clearly illuminated in the narrow pane to the side of the front door. Stephan was wiping his feet on the doormat, saying:

‘I’m sorry to come like this at such short notice.’

‘I’ve told you many times, Stephan,’ the elderly woman said, ‘I’m always here whenever you need to talk things over.’

‘Well actually, Miss Collins, it wasn’t ... Well, it’s not about the usual stuff. I wanted to talk to you about something else, a quite important matter. Father would have come himself, but, well, he was so busy ...’

‘Ah,’ the woman interrupted with a smile, ‘something else your father’s put you up to. He’s still giving you all the dirty work.’

There was a playful note in her voice, but Stephan seemed to miss it.

‘Not at all,’ he retorted earnestly. ‘On the contrary, this is a mission of a particularly delicate and difficult nature. Father entrusted me with it and I was very happy to accept ...’

‘So I’ve now become a mission! And one of a delicate and difficult nature at that!’

‘Well no. That’s to say ...’ Stephan paused in confusion.

The elderly woman seemed to decide she had teased Stephan enough. ‘All right,’ she said, ‘we’d better go inside and discuss this properly over some sherry.’

‘How kind of you, Miss Collins. But actually, I mustn’t stay long. I’ve got some people waiting out in the car.’ He indicated in our direction, but the elderly woman was already opening the door into her apartment.

I watched her lead Stephan through a small and tidy front parlour, through a second doorway and down a shadowy corridor decorated on either side with little framed water-colours. The corridor ended at Miss Collins’s drawing room – a large L-shaped affair at the back of the building. The light here was low and cosy, and at first glance the room looked expensively elegant in an old-fashioned way. On closer inspection, however, I could see much of the furniture was extremely worn, and that what at first I had taken for antiques were in fact little better than junk. Once luxurious couches and armchairs sat about the place in states of disrepair and the full-length velvet drapes were mottled and frayed. Stephan seated himself with an ease that betrayed his familiarity with the surroundings, but continued to look tense as Miss Collins busied herself at the drinks cabinet. When she eventually handed him a glass and sat down near him, the young man burst out abruptly: ‘It’s to do with Mr Brodsky.’

‘Ah,’ Miss Collins said. ‘I rather suspected as much.’

‘Miss Collins, the fact is, we wondered if you might consider helping us. Or rather, helping him ...’ Stephan broke off with a laugh and looked away.

Miss Collins tilted her head thoughtfully. Then she asked: ‘You’re asking me to help Leo?’

‘Oh, we’re not asking you to do anything you’d find distasteful or ... well, painful. Father understands perfectly how you must feel.’ He gave another short laugh.

‘It’s just that your help could prove crucial just at this stage in Mr Brodsky’s ... recovery.’

‘Ah.’ Miss Collins nodded and appeared to give this some thought. Then she said: ‘May I take it from all this, Stephan, that your father’s having only limited success with Leo?’

The teasing in her voice seemed to me more pronounced than ever, but again Stephan failed to notice it.

‘Not at all!’ he said crossly. ‘On the contrary, Father’s worked wonders, made enormous strides! It hasn’t been easy, but Father’s perseverance has been remarkable, even to those of us used to the way Father goes about things.’

‘Perhaps he hasn’t persevered enough.’

‘But you’ve no idea, Miss Collins! No idea! Sometimes he’s come home exhausted after a gruelling day at the hotel, so exhausted he’s had to go straight upstairs to bed. I’ve had Mother come down complaining and I’ve gone up there, up to their room, and found Father snoring away on his back, collapsed right across their bed. As you know, it’s been an important understanding for years that he goes to sleep on his side, never on his back, he always snores so badly otherwise, so you can imagine Mother’s disgust at discovering him like that. It’s usually God’s own job for me to rouse him but I have to because otherwise, I told you before, otherwise Mother refuses to go back into the bedroom. She’ll just hover out in the corridor with her angry look, she won’t go back in until I’ve woken him up, undressed him, got him in his bathrobe and guided him into the bathroom. But what I’m meaning to tell you is that, well, even when he’s that tired, sometimes the phone’s gone and it’s been one of the staff to say Mr Brodsky’s right on the edge, that he’s been demanding a drink, and, do you know, Father somehow finds more energy from somewhere. He pulls himself together, that look comes into his eyes, he gets dressed and goes off into the night, not to return for hours. He said he’d get Mr Brodsky fit and he's giving everything he's got, every last bit to accomplish what he said he would.'

'That's very commendable. But exactly how far is he getting?'

'I assure you, Miss Collins, the progress has been astonishing. Everyone who's seen Mr Brodsky recently has remarked on it. There's so much more going on behind those eyes. His comments too, they have more and more meaning by the day. But most crucially, his ability, Mr Brodsky's great ability, that's returning without a doubt. By all accounts, the rehearsals have been going extremely promisingly. The orchestra, they've been completely won over by him. And when he's not been rehearsing at the concert hall, he's been busy working things out by himself. You can often catch little snatches of him at the piano now as you wander about the hotel. When Father hears that piano, he's so encouraged you can see he's ready to sacrifice any amount of sleep.'

The young man paused and looked at Miss Collins. For a moment she seemed far away, leaning her head to one side as though she too might catch a few notes from a distant piano. Then a gentle smile returned to her face and she looked again at Stephan.

'What I've heard,' she said, 'is that your father sits him up in that hotel drawing room, sits him up in front of the piano like he's some manikin, and Leo stays there for hours gently swaying on the stool without touching a note.'

'Miss Collins, that's quite unfair! Perhaps there were occasions like that in the early days, but it's a very different story now. In any case, even if he does sit there silently sometimes, surely you must remember this, it hardly means nothing's going on. Silence is just as likely to indicate the most profound ideas forming, the deepest energies being summoned. In fact, the other day, after a particularly long silence, Father actually went into the drawing room and there was Mr Brodsky staring down at the piano keys. After a while he looked up at Father and said: "The violins need to be harsh. They must sound harsh." That's what he said. There may have been silence, but inside his head, there'd been a whole universe of music. What he'll show us all on Thursday night, it's thrilling to think about. Just so long as he doesn't falter now.'

'But you said, Stephan, you wanted me to help in some way.'

The young man, who had become increasingly animated, now collected himself.

'Well yes,' he said. 'That's what I've come here tonight to speak to you about. As I say, Mr Brodsky's been rapidly regaining all his old powers. And, well, naturally, along with his great talents, various other things are now re-emerging. To those of us who never knew him very well before, it's been something of a revelation. These days he's often so articulate, so urbane. Anyway, the point is, along with everything else, he's started to remember. Well, to put it bluntly, he talks about you. Thinks and talks about you all the time. Last night, just to give you an example - this is embarrassing but I'll tell you - last night he started to weep and couldn't stop. He just kept weeping, pouring out all his feelings for you. It's the third or fourth time it's happened, though last night's was the most extreme instance. It was almost midnight, Mr Brodsky hadn't emerged from the drawing room, so Father went to listen at the door and heard him sobbing. So he went in and found the place in complete darkness, and Mr Brodsky bowed over the piano, weeping. Well, there was a suite vacant upstairs, so Father took him up there and had the kitchen bring up all Mr Brodsky's favourite soups - he tends only to eat soups - and plied him with orange juice and soft drinks, but frankly, last night, it was touch and go. Apparently he was attacking the cartons of juice feverishly. If Father hadn't been there, it's very possible he would have cracked, even at this late stage. And all the time he continued to talk about you. Well, the point

I'm getting at - oh dear, I shouldn't stay too long, I've got people waiting in the car - my point is, with so much of the future of our city depending on him, we have to do everything to ensure he'll pull through this last bit. Dr Kaufmann agrees with Father, we're close to the last hurdle now. So you see how much hangs in the balance.'

Miss Collins continued to look at Stephan with the same distant half-smile, but still said nothing. After a moment, the young man went on:

'Miss Collins, I realise what I'm saying might well be opening up old wounds. And I appreciate you and Mr Brodsky haven't spoken to each other now for many years ...'

'Oh, that's not quite accurate. Only earlier this year, he shouted obscenities at me as I was strolling across the Volksgarten.'

Stephan laughed awkwardly, unsure how to handle Miss Collins's tone. Then he went on with some earnestness: 'Miss Collins, no one's suggesting you have any sort of extended contact with him. Good lord, no. You wish to put the past behind you. Father, everyone, they appreciate that. All we're asking, just one small thing, it might make such a difference, it would so encourage him and mean so much to him. We hoped you wouldn't mind us at least putting it to you.'

'I've already agreed to attend the banquet.'

'Yes, yes, of course. Father told me, we're so grateful ...'

'On the strict understanding there'll be no direct contact ...'

'That's completely understood, absolutely. The banquet, yes. But actually, Miss Collins, it was something further we wanted to ask of you, if you could just bear to think about it. You see, a group of gentlemen - Mr von Winterstein among them - will be taking Mr Brodsky to the zoo tomorrow. Apparently in all the years, he's never visited it. His dog can't be admitted, naturally, but Mr Brodsky has finally consented to leave it in good hands for just a couple of hours. It was felt that an outing of this sort would help calm him. The giraffes in particular we thought might be relaxing. Well, I'll come to the point. The gentlemen wondered if you might possibly care to join the group at the zoo. Even say just a word or two to him. You wouldn't need to travel out with the party, you could just join them there, just for a few minutes, exchange a pleasant remark with him, perhaps say a few uplifting things, it could make all the difference. A few minutes, then you could be on your way. Please, Miss Collins, if you'd give this some consideration. So much might hang on it.'

While Stephan had been speaking, Miss Collins had risen from her seat and moved slowly over to her fireplace. She now remained standing quite still for several seconds, one hand resting on the mantelpiece as though to steady herself. When eventually she turned to Stephan again, I saw that her eyes had become moist.

'You see my problem, Stephan,' she said. 'I may have been married to him once. But for many years now, the only times I've encountered him, he's been shouting abuse at me. So you see, it's hard for me to guess what sort of conversation he'd best enjoy.'

'Miss Collins, I swear to you he's a different man now. These days he's so polite and urbane and ... but surely, you'd remember. If you could even just think about it. There's so much at stake.'

Miss Collins sipped her sherry thoughtfully. She seemed about to reply, but just at this point I heard Boris shift behind me in the back of the car. Turning, I saw that the little boy must have been awake for some time. He was gazing through his window out across the still and empty street, and

I sensed a sadness about him. I was about to say something, but he must have realised my attention was on him, for he asked quietly without moving:

‘Can you do bathrooms?’

‘Can I do bathrooms?’

Boris sighed heavily and went on gazing out into the darkness. Then he said: ‘I’d never done tiles before. That’s why I made all those mistakes. If someone had shown me, I could have done them.’

‘Yes, I’m sure you could have done. This is the bathroom in your new apartment?’

‘If someone had shown me, I could have done them all right. Then Mother would have been happy with the bathroom. She’d have liked the bathroom then.’

‘Ah. So she’s not happy with it at the moment?’

Boris looked at me as though I had said something immensely stupid. Then, with heavy irony, he said: ‘Why would she cry about the bathroom if she liked it?’

‘Why indeed? So she cries about the bathroom. I wonder why she does that.’

Boris turned back to his window and I could now see by the mixed light coming into the car that he was struggling not to burst into tears. At the last moment he managed to disguise his upset as a yawn and rubbed his face with his fists.

‘We’ll sort all these things out eventually,’ I said.
‘You’ll see.’

‘I could have done it all right if someone had shown me. Then Mother wouldn’t have cried.’

‘Yes, I’m sure you’d have made a very good job of it. But we’ll sort everything out soon.’

I straightened in my seat and gazed through the windscreen. There was hardly a lit window anywhere down the street. After a while I said: 'Boris, we have to have a good think now. Are you listening?'

There was silence from the back of the car.

'Boris,' I went on, 'we've got to make a decision. I know earlier we were on our way to join Mother. But now it's got very late. Boris, are you listening?'

I threw a glance over my shoulder and saw he was still staring vacantly out into the darkness. We went on sitting silently for several more moments. Then I said:

'The fact is, it's very late now. If we went back to the hotel we could see your grandfather. He'd be delighted to see you. You could have a room of your own or, if you preferred, we could have them set up another bed for you in my room. We could have them bring up something good to eat, then you could get off to sleep. Then tomorrow morning we'll get up for breakfast and decide what we'll do.'

There was silence behind me.

'I should have organised things better,' I said. 'I'm sorry. I ... I just wasn't thinking clearly tonight. It was so busy earlier on. But look, I promise we'll make it up tomorrow. We can do all kinds of things tomorrow. If you like, we could go back to the old apartment and get Number Nine. What do you say?'

Boris still said nothing.

'We've both had tiring days. Boris, what do you say?'

'We'd better go to the hotel.'

'I think that's the best idea. So that's settled then. When the gentleman comes back, we'll tell him our new plan.'

Just at this point a movement caught my eye and, glancing back to the apartment building, I saw that the front door was open. Miss Collins was in the process of showing Stephan out, and though they were parting amicably, something in both their manners suggested their meeting had concluded on an uneasy note. Soon the door closed and Stephan came hurrying back to the car.

‘I’m sorry to have been so long,’ he said, climbing into his seat. ‘I hope Boris has been all right.’ Placing his hands on the wheel, he let out a troubled sigh. Then he forced a smile and said: ‘Well, let’s get going.’

‘Actually,’ I said, ‘Boris and I had a good talk while you were gone. We think we’ll return to the hotel after all.’

‘If I may say so, Mr Ryder, that’s probably a good decision. So it’s back to the hotel. Jolly good.’ He glanced at his watch. ‘We’ll be there in no time. The journalists will have no real cause for complaint. No cause at all.’

Stephan started the engine and we set off again. As we drove through the deserted streets, the rain started once more and Stephan turned on the windscreen wipers. After a while, he said:

‘Mr Ryder, I wonder if I could be cheeky enough to remind you of the conversation we were having earlier. You know, when I met you in the atrium this afternoon.’

‘Ah yes,’ I said. ‘Yes, we were discussing your recital on Thursday night.’

‘You were very kind and said you might be able to find a few minutes for me. To listen to me run through the La Roche.’

Of course, this is probably completely impossible, but, well, I thought you wouldn't mind my asking. It's just that I was going to get in a little more practice tonight, once we got back to the hotel. I was wondering if, when you'd finished with these journalists, I know it's a great nuisance, but if you could come and listen for even a few minutes and tell me what you thought ...' He trailed off with a laugh.

I could see this was a matter of considerable importance for the young man and felt tempted to comply with his request. Nevertheless, after some consideration, I said:

'I'm sorry, tonight I'm so tired, it's imperative I get off to sleep as soon as possible. But don't worry, there's bound to be an opportunity in the near future. Look, why don't we leave it like this? I'm not sure precisely when I'll next have a few minutes to spare, but as soon as I do I'll phone the desk and get them to go and find you. If you're not in the hotel, I'll simply try again the next time I'm free and so on. That way we're bound to find a mutually convenient time before long. But tonight, really, if you don't mind, I really must get a good night's sleep.'

'Of course, Mr Ryder, I quite understand. By all means, let's do as you suggest. It's extremely kind of you. I'll wait to hear from you then.'

Stephan had spoken politely, but he seemed unduly disappointed, perhaps even mistaking my reply for some subtle refusal. Evidently he was in a state of such anxiety over his forthcoming performance that any setback, however minor, was apt to send him off into a cold panic. I felt some sympathy for him and said again reassuringly:

'Don't worry, we're bound to find an opportunity very soon.'

The rain continued to fall steadily as we travelled through the night-time streets. The young man remained silent for a long time and I wondered if he had become angry with me. But then I caught sight of his profile in the changing light and realised he was turning over in his mind a particular incident from several years ago. It was an episode he had pondered many times before - often when lying awake at night or when driving alone - and now his fear that I would prove unable to help him had caused him once more to bring it to the front of his mind.

It had been the occasion of his mother's birthday. As he had parked his car in the familiar driveway that night - those were his college days when he had been living in Germany - he had braced himself for a painful few hours. But his father had opened the door to him, whispering excitedly:

'She's in a good mood. A very good mood.' His father had then turned and shouted into the house: 'Stephan is here, my dear. A little late, but he's here nevertheless.' Then in a whisper again: 'A very good mood. The best for a long time.'

The young man had gone through into the lounge to discover his mother reclining on a sofa, a cocktail glass in her hand. She was wearing a new dress and Stephan had been struck afresh at just how elegant a woman his mother was. She had not risen to greet him, obliging him to stoop down to kiss her cheek, but nevertheless the warmth of her manner as she invited him to take the armchair opposite had quite taken him aback. Behind him, his father, greatly pleased by this start to the evening, had emitted a small chuckle, then, indicating the apron he was wearing, had gone hurrying back towards the kitchen.

Left alone with his mother, Stephan's first feeling had been one of sheer terror - that something he said or did would shatter her good mood, thus undoing hours, perhaps days, of painstaking effort on his father's part. He had thus begun by giving brief, stilted replies to her queries about his college life, but when her attitude had remained consistently appreciative, found himself answering at greater and greater length. At one point he had referred to a college professor as resembling 'a mentally balanced version of our foreign minister' - a phrase he had been particularly proud of and had used numerous times to his fellow students with considerable success. Had the early exchanges with his mother not gone so well, he would not have risked repeating it to her. But he had done so and with a leap of his heart had seen amusement momentarily light up her face. For all that, it had still come as a relief when his father had returned to announce dinner.

They had gone through to the dining room where the hotel manager had laid out the first course. The meal had started quietly. Then his father - a little abruptly, Stephan had thought - had commenced to tell an amusing anecdote concerning a group of Italian guests at the hotel. When he had finished, the hotel manager had urged Stephan to recount a story of his own, and when Stephan had started somewhat uncertainly his father had proceeded to support him with exaggerated laughter. So they had gone on, Stephan and his father taking turns to tell amusing stories and supporting each other with hearty responses. The tactic seemed to work, for eventually - Stephan could hardly believe it - his mother too had started to laugh for prolonged spells. The meal itself, moreover, had been prepared with the fanatical attention to detail characteristic of the hotel manager and was an astounding piece of cuisine. The wine was clearly something very special and by the time they were midway through the main course - an exquisite concoction of goose and wild berries - the mood of the evening had become one of genuine gaiety. Then the hotel manager, his face pink with the wine and laughter, had leaned over and said:

'Stephan, tell us again about that youth hostel you stayed in. You know, that one in the woods in Burgundy.'

For a second Stephan had been horrified. How could his father, who had conducted everything thus far so faultlessly, make such an obvious misjudgement? The story he was referring to involved extensive references to the hostel's lavatory arrangements and was clearly unsuitable to put before his mother. Yet as he had hesitated, his father had given him a wink as though to say: 'Yes, yes, trust me, this will work. She'll love the story, it'll be a success.' Gravely doubtful though he was, Stephan's faith in his father had been such as to make him embark on the anecdote. He had not got far, however, before the thought ran through his mind that what had so far been a miraculously successful evening was about to come down in tatters around them. Nevertheless, egged on by his father's guffaws, he had continued, and then heard to his amazement his mother's open laughter. Looking up across the table, he had seen her shaking her head helplessly. Then, somewhere towards the end of his story, amidst all the laughter, Stephan had caught his mother giving his father a look of fondness. It was just a brief look, but there had been no mistaking it. The hotel manager, despite the tears of laughter in his eyes, had not missed it either, and turning to his son had given another wink, this time with an air of triumph. At that moment the young man had felt something very powerful rising in his breast. But before he had had the time clearly to identify it, his father had said to him:

'Now Stephan, before the sweet course we must rest. Why don't you play something for your mother on her birthday?' With this the hotel manager had waved towards the upright piano by the wall.

That gesture - that casual wave towards the dining-room upright - was one Stephan was to recall again and again over the years. And each time he did so something of the sickening chill he had felt at that moment would come back to him. At first he had looked at his father in disbelief, but the latter had simply gone on smiling contentedly, holding his hand out towards the piano.

'Come on, Stephan. Something your mother would like. A little Bach, perhaps. Or something contemporary. Kazan maybe. Or Mullery.'

The young man, forcing his gaze round to include his mother, had seen her face, softened by laughter along unfamiliar lines, smiling at him. She had then turned to the hotel manager rather than to Stephan and said: 'Yes, dear, I think Mullery would be just the thing. That would be splendid.'

'Come on, Stephan,' the hotel manager had said jovially. 'This is your mother's birthday, after all. Don't disappoint her.'

An idea had flashed through Stephan's mind - an idea rejected the very next instant - that his parents were conspiring together against him. Certainly from the way they were gazing at him - so full of proud anticipation - it was as though they had no memory at all of the anguished history surrounding his piano playing. In any case, the protest he had started to formulate had faded in his mouth, and he had risen to his feet as though it were someone else doing so.

The piano's position against the wall was such that, when Stephan had sat down at it, he had been able to see at the edge of his vision the figures of his parents, their elbows upon the table, each leaning slightly towards the other. After a moment he had actually turned and glanced directly towards them, aware as he did so that he had wanted to see them like that one last time - sitting together as though bound by an uncomplicated happiness. He had then turned back to the piano, overwhelmed by the certainty that the evening was about to fall. Curiously he had realised he was no longer at all surprised by the latest turn of events, that in fact he had been waiting for it all along and that it had brought with it a sense of relief.

For a few seconds, Stephan had gone on sitting without playing, trying desperately to shake off the effects of the wine and to run through in his mind the piece he was about to attempt. For one giddy moment he saw the possibility - it had after all been an evening of remarkable things - that he would somehow perform at a level never before attained, and that he would finish to find his parents smiling, applauding and exchanging with each other looks of deep affection. But no sooner had he commenced the opening bar of Mullery's Epicycloid, he had realised the utter impossibility of any such scenario.

He had played on nevertheless. For a long time - throughout most of the first movement - the figures at the edge of his vision had remained very still. Then he had seen his mother lean back slightly in her chair and bring a hand up to her chin. Several bars later, his father had turned his gaze away from Stephan, placed both hands on his lap and had bowed his head forward so that he appeared to be studying a spot on the table before him.

Meanwhile the piece had gone on and on, and though the young man had felt tempted several times to abandon it, to stop altogether had somehow seemed the most dreadful option of all. So he had continued, and when at last the piece had finished, Stephan had sat staring at the keyboard for several moments before working up the courage to look round at the scene awaiting him.

Neither of his parents was looking at him. His father's head had now become so bowed the forehead was almost touching the table surface. His mother was looking in the other direction across the room, wearing the frosty expression Stephan was so familiar with and which, astonishingly, had been absent until that point in the evening.

Stephan had needed only a second to appraise this scene. Then he had got up and returned quickly to the dining table, as though by doing so the minutes since his leaving it could be expunged. For a little while, the three of them had continued to sit silently. Finally his mother had risen saying:

'It's been a very nice evening. Thank you, both of you. But I'm feeling tired now and I think I ought to go up to bed. '

At first the hotel manager had seemed not to have heard. But as Stephan's mother had moved towards the door, he had raised his head and said very quietly: 'The cake, my dear. The cake. It's ... it's something rather special.'

'You're very kind, but really, I've had so much already to eat. I must get some sleep now.'

'Of course, of course.' The hotel manager had stared down at the table again with an air of resignation. But then, as Stephan's mother was about to pass through the door, the hotel manager had suddenly straightened and said loudly: 'At least, my dear, come and look at it. Just look at it. As I say, it's something special.'

His mother had hesitated, then said: 'Very well. Show it to me quickly. Then I really must sleep. It's the wine perhaps, but I feel extremely tired now.'

On hearing this, the hotel manager had started to his feet and the next instant had ushered his wife out of the dining room.

The young man had listened to his parents' footsteps going towards the kitchen, then, after no more than a minute, returning along the corridor and climbing the staircase. For some time after that Stephan had remained seated at the table. Various small noises had come from above but he had been unable to hear any voices. In the end it had occurred to him that his best course would simply be to drive back through the night to his digs. Certainly his presence at breakfast would hardly help his father on the slow, huge task of rebuilding his mother's good humour.

He had left the dining room intending to slip out of the house unnoticed, but out in the hallway he had encountered his father descending the staircase. The hotel manager had put his finger to his lips, saying:

‘We must speak quietly. Your mother’s just gone to bed.’

Stephan had informed his father of his intention to return to Heidelberg, to which the hotel manager had said:

‘What a pity. Your mother and I thought you’d be able to stay longer. But as you say, you have lectures in the morning. I’ll explain to your mother, she’s sure to understand.’

‘And Mother,’ Stephan had said. ‘I hope she enjoyed the evening.’

His father had smiled, but for a brief moment before he did so Stephan had seen a look of profound desolation cross his face.

‘Oh yes. I know she did. Oh yes. She was so glad you could take a break from your studies and come all this way. I know she was hoping you would stay a few days, but don’t worry. I’ll explain it to her.’

As he had driven along the deserted highways that night, Stephan had turned over every aspect of the evening’s events – just as he was to do again and again over the following years. The anguish he felt each time he recalled that occasion had gradually diminished with time, but now the steady approach of Thursday night had brought back many of the old terrors, causing him yet again, as he drove on through the rainy night, to be transported back to that painful evening of several years ago.

I felt sorry for the young man and broke the silence by saying to him:

‘I realise it’s none of my business, and I hope this doesn’t sound rude, but I do think you’ve been treated rather unfairly by your parents over the matter of your piano playing. My advice to you would be to try and enjoy your playing as much as you can, drawing satisfaction and meaning from it regardless of them.’

The young man considered this for several moments. Then he said:

‘I’m grateful to you, Mr Ryder, for giving my position thought and all that. But actually - well, to be quite blunt about it - I don’t think you really understand. I can see how to an outsider my mother’s behaviour that night might look a little, well, a little inconsiderate. But that would be doing her an injustice and I’d really hate for you to go away with such an impression. You see, you’ve got to understand the whole background to this matter. For one thing, you see, from when I was four I had Mrs Tilkowski as my piano teacher. I suppose there’s no reason why that would mean much to you, Mr Ryder, but you have to understand, Mrs Tilkowski is a very revered figure in this city, certainly not just any piano teacher. Her services aren’t for sale in the usual way - though of course she takes fees like anyone else. That’s to say, she’s very serious about what she does and will only take children of the city’s artistic and intellectual elite. For instance, Paulo Rozario, the surrealist painter, lived here for a time and Mrs Tilkowski taught both his daughters. And Professor Diegelmann’s children. The Countess’s nieces too. She chooses her pupils very carefully, and so you see I was very fortunate to get her, particularly since in those days Father didn’t have the sort of standing in the community he has today. But I suppose my parents were as dedicated to the arts then as they are now. All through my childhood I remember them talking about artists and musicians and how important it was that such people were supported. Mother stays at home most of the time now, but in those days she was much more outgoing. If a musician, say, or an orchestra came through the town, she’d always make a point of going along to lend her support. She’d not only attend the performance, she’d always try and go to the dressing room afterwards to give her praise personally. Even if a performer had done badly, she’d still go to his dressing room afterwards to give a little encouragement and a few gentle hints. In fact she’d often invite musicians to visit our house, or else offer to take them on a tour around the city. Usually their schedules were much too full to take up her offers, but, as no doubt you can vouch yourself, such invitations are always very uplifting to any performer. As for my father, he was extremely busy, but I remember he too used to do his best. Certainly, if there was a reception held in honour of some visiting celebrity, he'd always make a point of accompanying Mother to it, no matter how busy he was, so that he could play his part in welcoming the visitor. So you see, Mr Ryder, as far back as I can remember, my parents have been very cultured people who appreciated the importance of the arts in our society, and I'm sure that's why Mrs Tilkowski finally agreed to take me on as a pupil. I can see now it must have been a real triumph for my parents at the time, particularly for Mother, who'd gone about all the arrangements. There I was, having lessons from Mrs Tilkowski alongside Mr Rozario's and Professor Diegelmann's children! They must have been so proud. And for the first few years I did very well, I really did, so much so that Mrs Tilkowski once called me one of the most promising pupils she'd ever had. Things really went well until ... well, until when I was ten years old.'

The young man suddenly went silent, perhaps regretting having talked so freely. But I could see another part of him was eager to carry on with his revelations, and so I asked:

'What happened when you were ten?'

'Well, I'm ashamed to admit this, and to you of all people, Mr Ryder. But when I was ten, well, I just stopped practising. I'd turn up at Mrs Tilkowski's not having practised my passages at all. And when she asked why I hadn't, I'd just not speak. This is awfully embarrassing, it's like someone else I'm talking about, and I just wish by some magic it could be. But that's the truth, there you are, that's how I behaved. And after a few weeks of this, there was nothing for it but for Mrs Tilkowski to inform my parents that if things didn't change, she could no longer carry on with me. I later found out Mother lost her temper a little and shouted at Mrs Tilkowski. Anyway it all ended rather badly. '

'And after that you went to another teacher?'

'Yes, a Miss Henze, who wasn't at all bad. But she was hardly Mrs Tilkowski. I still didn't practise, but Miss Henze wasn't so strict. Then when I was twelve, it all changed. It's hard to explain just what happened, it may sound a little odd. I was just sitting in the lounge of our house one afternoon. It was very sunny, I remember I was reading this football magazine, and my father came wandering into the room. I remember he was wearing his grey waistcoat and his shirt-sleeves were rolled up and he stood in the middle of the floor and stared out through the window out into the garden. I knew Mother was out there, sitting out on the bench we used to have in those days under the fruit trees, and I was waiting for Father to go out and sit with her. But he just kept standing there. He had his back to me, so I couldn't see his face, but whenever I looked up I could see he was staring out into the garden to where Mother was. Well, the third or fourth time I looked up and Father still hadn't gone out, something suddenly dawned on me. I mean, that's when I realised. That my mother and father had barely spoken to each other for months. It was very odd, this realisation just came over me, that they'd hardly spoken at all. It's odd I hadn't noticed it earlier but I hadn't, not until that moment. But then I saw it very clearly. All in a rush, a number of different instances came back to me - times when previously Father and Mother would have said something to each other, but in fact they hadn't. I don't mean they'd been totally silent. But, you know, this coolness had come between them and I hadn't seen it until that moment. I can tell you, Mr Ryder, it was a very strange feeling, that realisation coming over me. And almost at the same time this terrible other thing occurred to me - that this change must have dated back to when I'd lost Mrs Tilkowski. I couldn't be certain, because so much time had gone by, but once I'd thought about it I was sure that's when this thing had first started. I can't remember now if Father ever went out into the garden or not. I didn't say anything, just pretended to keep reading my football magazine, then after a while I went up to my room, lay down on the bed and thought it all over. It was after that I started to work hard again. I started practising really very diligently and I must have made a lot of progress, because after a few months Mother went to see Mrs Tilkowski to ask if she'd consider taking me back. I can see now it must have been quite a humiliation for Mother, having shouted that last time, and she must have had to do a lot of work on Mrs Tilkowski. Anyway, the result was, Mrs Tilkowski agreed to take me back, and this time I worked hard all the time, practising and practising. But you see, I'd lost those crucial two years. The years between ten and twelve, you know better than anyone how crucial they are. Believe me, Mr Ryder, I tried to make up for those lost years, I did everything I could, but really it was just too late. Even now I often stop and ask myself: "What on earth could I have been thinking of?" Oh, what I'd give now to have those years again! But you see, I don't think my parents really appreciated how damaging those missing two years would be. I think they thought once I'd got Mrs Tilkowski back, so long as I worked hard, they wouldn't make much difference. I know Mrs Tilkowski tried to explain it to them on more than one occasion, but I think they were so full of love and pride for me they just didn't take on board the reality of the situation. For quite a few years, they went on assuming I was making fine progress, that I was really gifted. It was only when I was seventeen it really hit them. There used to be a piano competition in those days, the Jürgen Flemming Prize, it was organised by the Civic Arts Institute for promising young people in the city. It used to have a reputation of sorts, though it's stopped now due to lack of funds. When I was seventeen, my parents had this idea I should enter it, and my mother actually went about seeing to all the preliminaries for getting me entered. That was when they first realised how short of the mark I was. They listened very carefully to my playing - it was probably the first time they really listened - and they realised I'd only humiliate myself and the family by entering. I was quite keen to have a go anyway, but my parents decided it would damage my confidence too much. As I say, that was the first time they noticed how weak my playing was. Until then, their high hopes, and I suppose their love for me, just prevented them from listening at all objectively. That was the first time they took on board just how much damage those missing two years had done. Well, after that, naturally enough, my parents became very disappointed. Mother in particular seemed to resign herself to the idea that it had all been for nothing, all the effort she'd gone to, all the years with Mrs Tilkowski, that time she'd gone to beg her to take me back, all of it, she seemed to think of it all as a big waste. And she got rather despondent and stopped going out very much, stopped going to the concerts and functions. Father, though, he's always kept up some hope for me. That's typical of him really. He'll always keep hopeful right to the end. Every now and again, every year or so, he asks to hear me play, and whenever he does, I can see he's full of hope for me, I can see him thinking: "This time, this time it'll be different." But so far, each time I finish playing and look up I can see he's crestfallen again. Of course he does his best to hide it, but I can see it clearly enough. But he's never given up hope, and that's meant a lot to me.'

We were now speeding down a wide avenue flanked by tall office buildings. Although we sometimes passed rows of neatly parked cars, ours still seemed to be the only vehicle moving for miles.

'And it was your father's idea,' I asked, 'that you should perform on Thursday night?'

'Yes. There's faith for you! He first suggested it six months ago. He hasn't heard me play for almost two years, but he's showing real faith in me. Of course he gave me every chance to say no, but I was so moved that he should show such faith in me after all those disappointments. So I said yes, I'd do it.'

'That was very brave of you. I do hope it turns out to be the correct decision.'

'Actually, Mr Ryder, I said yes because, well, even though I say so myself, I think I've made something of a breakthrough recently. Perhaps you'll know what I'm talking about, it's rather hard to explain. It's as though something in my head, something that was always blocking my progress, like a dam or something, it's like it's suddenly burst and a whole new spirit's been allowed to flow. I can't quite explain it, but the fact is I think I'm a significantly better pianist now than when Father last heard me. So you see, when he asked if I wanted to perform on Thursday night, nervous though I was, I said yes. If I hadn't, it wouldn't have been fair on him, after all the faith he's invested in me. That's not to say I'm not worried about Thursday night. I've been working on my piece very hard and I'll admit, I am a bit worried. But I know I've got a very good chance of surprising my parents. In any case, you see, I've always had this fantasy. Even when my playing was at its most wretched. I had this fantasy of spending months somewhere locked away, practising and practising. My parents wouldn't see me for months and months. Then one day I'd suddenly come home. A Sunday afternoon probably. In any case some time when Father would be home too. I'd come in, hardly say a word, just go to the piano, lift the lid, start playing. I'd not even have taken my coat off. I'd just play and play. Bach, Chopin, Beethoven. Then on to the modern stuff. Grebel. Kazan. Mullery. I'd just play and play. And my parents would have followed me into the dining room and they'd just be looking on in astonishment. It would be beyond their wildest dreams. But then, to their amazement, they'd realise that even as I played I was reaching greater and greater heights. Sublime, sensitive adagios. Astounding fiery bravura passages. I'd climb higher and higher. And they'd be standing there in the middle of the room, Father still absently holding the newspaper he'd been reading, both of them completely astounded. In the end I'd finish with some stunning finale, then at last I'd turn to them and ... well, I've never been sure what happens after that. But it's a fantasy I've had ever since I was thirteen or fourteen. Thursday night may not turn out quite like it, but it's possible it could be pretty close. As I say, something's changed and I'm sure I'm almost there now. Ah, Mr Ryder, here we are. Well in time, I'm sure, for your journalists.'

The city centre had been so silent and devoid of traffic I had not recognised it. But, sure enough, we were now approaching the entrance of the hotel.

'If you don't mind,' Stephan went on, 'I'll drop you and Boris off here. I have to take the car round to the back.'

In the rear, Boris was looking tired, but was still awake. We got out, and I made sure the little boy had thanked Stephan before leading him towards the hotel.

The lights had been dimmed in the lobby and the hotel in general seemed to have fallen into quiet. The young desk clerk I had met on first arriving was on duty again, though he appeared to be fast asleep in his seat behind the reception desk. As we approached, he looked up and, recognising me, made an effort to wake himself up.

‘Good evening, sir,’ he said very cheerfully, but the next moment his weariness seemed to overtake him again.

‘Good evening. I’ll need another room. For Boris.’ I put my hand on the little boy’s shoulder. ‘As close to mine as possible please.’

‘Let me see what I can do, Mr Ryder.’

‘Actually, your porter here, Gustav, he happens to be Boris’s grandfather. I wonder if by any chance he’s still in the hotel.’

‘Oh yes, Gustav lives here. He has a little room up in the attic. But just now, I think he’d be asleep.’

‘Perhaps he wouldn’t mind being woken up. I know he’ll want to see Boris straight away.’

The desk clerk glanced worriedly at his watch. ‘Well, anything you say, sir,’ he said uncertainly and picked up the phone. After a short pause, I heard him get through.

‘Gustav? Gustav, I’m very sorry. This is Walter. Yes, yes, I’m sorry to wake you. Yes, I know, I’m very sorry. But please listen. Mr Ryder has just come in. He has your grandson with him.’

For the next few moments, the desk clerk listened, nodding several times. Then he put the receiver down and smiled at me.

‘He’s coming immediately. He says he’ll see to everything.’

‘Jolly good.’

‘Mr Ryder, you must be very tired now.’

‘Yes, I am. It’s been an exhausting day. But I believe I have one more appointment. There should be some journalists waiting here for me.’

‘Ah. They finally left an hour or so ago. They said they’d arrange another appointment. I suggested they deal directly with Miss Stratmann so that you’re not bothered by them. Really, sir, you look very tired. You should stop worrying about such things and go off to bed.’

‘Yes, I suppose so. Hmm. So they left. First they turn up early, then they leave.’

‘Yes, sir, very annoying. But I would say, Mr Ryder, you should just go to bed now and sleep. You really ought to stop worrying. I’m very sure everything will be taken care of.’

I was grateful to the young clerk for these comforting words and indeed for the first time in hours began to feel a sense of relaxation coming over me. I put my elbows up on the reception desk and for a moment or so began to doze off there on my feet. I did not go quite to sleep, however, for I remained aware all the while of Boris leaning his head heavily against my side, and of the desk clerk’s voice, continuing in the same reassuring tones, just in front of my face.

‘Gustav won’t be long now,’ the latter was saying, ‘and he’ll see to it your boy’s comfortable. Really, sir, there’s nothing more to worry about. And Miss Stratmann, we’ve known her at this hotel for a long time. A most efficient lady. She’s looked after the affairs of many important visitors in the past and they’ve all been a hundred per cent impressed by her. She just doesn't make mistakes. So you can leave her to worry about those journalists, there won't be any problems. And as for Boris, we're going to give him a room just across the hall from you. It has a very fine view in the morning he's bound to enjoy. So Mr Ryder, I really think you should just go off to sleep now. There's nothing more you could conceivably achieve today. In fact, if I may be so bold, I'd recommend you leave Boris to his grandfather once you've all got upstairs. Gustav will be here any minute, he's just putting on his uniform, that's what's holding him up just a little. He'll be down soon in all his finery, that's Gustav for you, uniform immaculate, not a thing out of place. Once he appears, you should just get him to take charge of everything. He's going as fast as he can. He'll just be tying his shoe-laces at this very moment, sitting on the edge of his little bed. Any moment now he'll be ready, he'll jump to his feet, though he'll have to take care not to hit his head on the rafters. A quick comb of his hair and then he'll be out into the corridor. Yes, he'll be here any second, and you can just go off to your room, unwind a little then get a good night's sleep. I'd recommend you take a night cap, one of the special cocktails you'll find ready-mixed in your mini-bar. They're quite excellent. Or perhaps you'd prefer some hot beverage to be brought up to you. And you could listen to some soothing music on the radio. There's a channel that broadcasts from Stockholm at this time of the night, just quiet late-night jazz, very soothing indeed, I often use it myself to wind down. Or else if you need to really unwind, may I suggest you go along and see the movie? Many of our guests are doing just that at this very moment.'

This last remark - this talk of a movie - brought me out of my drowsiness. Straightening, I said:

'I'm sorry, what's that you just said? Many of your guests have gone off to a movie?'

‘Yes, there’s a cinema just round the corner. They have a late-night performance. Many guests find popping round there and watching a film helps them to unwind at the end of a hard day. You could always do that as an alternative to taking a cocktail or a hot beverage.’

The telephone rang beside the desk clerk’s hand, and excusing himself he picked up the receiver. As he listened, I noticed he looked towards me awkwardly a few times. Then he said: ‘He’s just here, madam,’ and handed me the receiver.

‘Hello,’ I said.

For a few seconds there was silence. Then a voice said: ‘It’s me.’

It took me a moment to realise it was Sophie. But as soon as I did so, I became consumed by an intense rage towards her, and it was only Boris’s presence that stopped me shouting furiously down the line. In the end I said very coldly: ‘So. It’s you.’

There was another short silence before she said: ‘I’m calling from outside. In the street. I saw you and Boris go in. It’s probably better he doesn’t see me just now. It’s way past his bedtime. Try not to let him know you’re talking to me.’

I glanced down at Boris, who had dozed off on his feet leaning against me.

‘So what exactly do you think you’re doing?’ I asked.

I heard her sigh heavily. Then she said:

‘You’ve got every right to be angry. I ... I don’t know what happened. I can see how silly I’ve been now ...’

‘Look,’ I interrupted, anxious that I would not be able to keep my anger under control much longer, ‘where exactly are you?’

‘On the other side of the street. Under the arches, in front of the antique shops.’

‘I’ll be out in a minute. Just stay where you are.’

I handed the receiver back to the desk clerk and was relieved to see that Boris had remained asleep throughout the call. In any case, at that moment, the elevator doors opened and Gustav stepped out onto the carpet.

His uniform did indeed look immaculate. His thin white hair had been wetted and combed. A puffiness around the eyes and a slight stiffness in his gait were the only signs of his having been fast asleep just a few minutes earlier.

‘Ah, good evening, sir,’ he said as he approached.

‘Good evening.’

‘You’ve brought Boris with you. How very kind of you to have gone to such trouble.’ Gustav came towards us a few more steps, observing his grandson with a gentle smile. ‘My goodness, sir, look at him. Fallen fast asleep.’

‘Yes, he got very tired,’ I said.

‘He still looks so young when he’s asleep like that.’ The porter went on gazing tenderly at Boris for another moment. Then he looked up at me and said: ‘I was wondering, sir, if you managed to talk to Sophie. I’ve been thinking all afternoon about how you might have got on.’

‘Well, I did speak to her, yes.’

‘Ah. And did you get any inkling?’

‘Inkling?’

‘Of what’s preoccupying her?’

‘Ah. Well, although she said several quite revealing things ... to be frank, as I said to you earlier, it’s very difficult for an outsider like myself to make much sense of these things. Naturally I did form one or two vague ideas about what might be troubling her, but really I feel more than ever it would be best if you yourself spoke to her.'

'But you see, sir, as I believe I explained to you before ...'

'Yes, yes, you and Sophie don't talk directly, I remember,' I said with a sudden rush of impatience.

'Nevertheless, surely, if this is a matter of importance to you ...'

'It's a matter of the utmost importance to me. Oh yes, sir, the utmost importance. It's for Boris's sake, you see. If we don't get to the bottom of this matter soon, he's going to become seriously worried, I know he is. There are clear signs already. And you only have to look at him, the way he is now, sir, you look at him like this, and you see he really is still so young. We owe it to him to keep his world free of such worries for a little while longer, don't you think so, sir? In fact, to call this matter one of importance to me is something of an understatement. Latterly I've hardly stopped worrying about it day and night. But you see ...' He paused, gazing blankly at the floor in front of him. Then he shook his head a little and sighed. 'You say I should speak to Sophie myself. It's not quite that simple, sir. You have to understand the history of the situation. You see, we've had this ... this understanding now for many years. Ever since she was young. When she was very small, of course, things were different then. Up until she was eight or nine, oh, Sophie and I, we'd talk all the time. I'd tell her stories, we'd go for long walks around the Old Town, hand in hand, just the two of us, talking and talking. You mustn't misunderstand, sir, I loved Sophie dearly then and I do so to this day. Oh yes, sir. We were very close when she was small. This understanding only started when she was eight years old. Yes, that's how old she was then. Incidentally, sir, this understanding of ours, it wasn't something I originally imagined going on for very long. I suppose I saw it as something that might last just a few days. That was all, sir, that was all I intended. The first day, I remember I was off work and I was trying to put up a shelf in the kitchen for my wife. Sophie kept following me about, asking this, offering to fetch that, trying to help me. I maintained my silence, sir, I maintained it completely. She soon became bewildered and upset, of course, I could see that. But it was what I had decided and I had to be firm. It wasn't easy for me, sir. Oh goodness me, it wasn't easy at all, I loved my little girl more than anything in the world, but I told myself I had to be strong. Three days, I said to myself, three days would be sufficient, three days and that would be the end of it. Just three days, then I'd be able to come in from work, pick her up again, hold her close to me, we'd tell each other everything. Catch up, so to speak. In those days, I was working at the Alba Hotel and towards the end of that third day, as you can imagine, I was longing for my shift to end so that I could get home and see my little Sophie again. You can understand my disappointment, then, when on returning to the apartment, Sophie refused to come and greet me when I called to her. What's more, sir, when I went and found her she looked away from me very deliberately and left the room without speaking. As you can imagine, I was very hurt. And I suppose I got a little angry - as I say, I'd had a very hard day and had been so looking forward to seeing her. I said to myself, if that's how she wants to behave, let her see where it leads. So I ate my supper with my wife, then went to bed not having said a single word to Sophie. I suppose things just went on from there. One day followed another, and before you knew it, it just became the norm between us. I don't want you to misunderstand me, sir, we weren't quarrelling as such, there ceased to be any animosity between us fairly quickly. In fact, it was in those days just as it is now. Sophie and I remained very considerate towards one another. It's simply that we refrained from speaking. I admit, sir, I didn't at that stage imagine the thing going on for as long as it has. My intention, I suppose, was always that at some opportune point - on a special day such as her birthday - we'd put it all behind us and go back to the way we'd been. But then her birthday came and went, Christmas also, it came and went, sir, and we somehow never resumed. Then when she was eleven, a certain sad little event occurred. In those days Sophie had this little white hamster. She called it Ulrich, she became greatly fond of it. She'd spend hours on end talking to it, taking it around the apartment in her hands. Then one day the creature disappeared. Sophie searched everywhere. Her mother and I also searched the apartment, we asked the neighbours about it, but to no avail. My wife did her best to reassure Sophie that Ulrich was safe - that he'd just gone on a little holiday and would be back before long. Then one evening, my wife had gone out and Sophie and I were alone in the apartment. I was in the bedroom with the radio up quite loud - there was a concert being broadcast - when I became aware that in the living room Sophie was sobbing uncontrollably. Almost immediately I guessed she'd at last found Ulrich. Or what remained of him - he'd been missing a few weeks by then. Well, the door between the bedroom and the living room was closed, and as I say, the radio was up loud, so it would have been perfectly conceivable I might not have heard her. So I remained in the bedroom, my ear close to the door, the concert playing behind me. I did of course think several times I'd go through to her, but then the longer I stood there at the door, the more odd it seemed that I should suddenly burst in. You see, sir, it wasn't as though she was sobbing so loudly. For a little while, I even sat down again, tried to pretend to myself I'd never heard her. But of course it just tore me up inside to hear her sob like that and I soon found myself standing at the door again, stooped over, trying to listen to Sophie over the sound of the concert. If she calls for me, I told myself, if she knocks or calls for me, then I'll go in. That's what I decided. If she shouts: "Papa!" then I'll go in, I'll explain I hadn't heard her before because of the music. I waited, but she neither called me nor knocked. The only thing she did, after some time of very distraught sobbing - it went straight to the heart, I can tell you, sir - she called out as though to herself - I emphasise this, sir, as though saying it to herself - she called out: "I left Ulrich in the box! It was my fault! I forgot! It was my fault!" What had happened, I ascertained later, was that Sophie had put Ulrich inside this little gift box. She'd wanted to take him out somewhere, she was often taking him out to "show" him things. She'd put him inside this little gift box she had, all ready to go out, but then something had happened, she'd been distracted and she hadn't gone out at all, and meanwhile she'd forgotten she'd put Ulrich inside the box. On this night I'm telling you about, sir, weeks later, she'd been doing something around the apartment and suddenly remembered. Can you imagine what an awful moment that would have been for my little girl! Suddenly remembering like that, perhaps hoping against hope she'd remembered incorrectly and rushing to the box. Of course, there was Ulrich, still inside. Listening through the door I couldn't of course determine at the time everything that had happened, but I more or less guessed the moment she shouted that out. "I left Ulrich in the box! It was my fault!" But I want you to understand, sir, she said this as though to herself. If she'd said: "Papa! Please come out ..." But no. Even so, I did actually think to myself: "If she calls out like that again, I'll go in." But she didn't. She just went on sobbing. I could picture her holding Ulrich in her fingers, perhaps hoping he could still be saved ... Oh, it wasn't easy for me, sir. But the concert was continuing behind me, and you see, I remained in the bedroom. I heard my wife come in much later and the two of them talking and Sophie crying again. And then my wife came into the bedroom and told me what had happened. "Didn't you hear anything?" she asked, and I said: "Oh dear, no, I was listening to the concert." The next morning, at breakfast, Sophie said nothing to me, and I said nothing to her. We just continued with our understanding, in other words. But I realised, there was no doubting it, I realised Sophie knew I'd been listening. And what was more, she wasn't resenting me for it. She passed me the milk jug, just as usual, the butter, she even took away my plate for me - an extra little service. What I'm saying, sir, is that Sophie understood our arrangement and respected it. After that, as you might imagine, things rather settled on that basis. You see, since we'd not brought an end to our understanding over the matter of Ulrich, it wouldn't have seemed right to bring it to an end until something at least as significant came along. Indeed, sir, to end it suddenly one day for no special reason would not only have been odd, really, it would have belittled the tragedy the whole Ulrich episode represented for my daughter. I do hope you can see this, sir. In any case, as I say, after that our understanding became, well, cemented, and even in these present circumstances it doesn't seem to me appropriate I should suddenly break such a long-standing arrangement. I dare say Sophie would feel much the same way. That's why, sir, I asked you, as a special favour, particularly since you happened to be walking that way this afternoon ...'

'Yes, yes, yes,' I broke in, feeling another wave of impatience. Then I said more gently: 'I appreciate how things stand between you and your daughter. But I wonder, isn't it possible, this very matter - this matter of your understanding. Isn't it possible that this might itself be at the heart of what's bothering her? That it was this understanding of yours she was thinking about that time you saw her sitting so despondently in the café?'

This seemed to stun Gustav and for some time he remained silent. Finally he said: 'That's never occurred to me before, sir, what you've just suggested. I'll have to give it some thought. I must say, it's never occurred to me before.' He was silent again for a few moments, a troubled expression on his face. Then he looked up and said: 'But why would she be so concerned about our understanding now? After all this time?' He shook his head slowly. 'May I ask you, sir? Is this an idea you formed from speaking to her?'

Suddenly I felt very weary and wished the whole affair to be taken off my hands. 'I don't know, I don't know,' I said. 'As I keep saying, these family matters ... I'm merely an outsider. How can I judge? I was simply saying it's a possibility.'

'Certainly it's something I'll have to give some thought to. For Boris's sake, I'm prepared to examine every possibility. Yes, I'll have to give it some thought.' Again he fell silent, the troubled expression growing on his face.

'I wonder, sir,' he said eventually, 'if I might request another favour. When you next see Sophie, perhaps you wouldn't mind investigating this particular possibility. I know you'd go about it in a very tactful way. I wouldn't normally ask such a thing, but, you see, I'm thinking of little Boris here. I'd be so grateful.'

He looked at me appealingly. In the end I gave a sigh and said: 'Very well. I'll do what I can for Boris's sake. But I can only say again, for an outsider like me ...'

Perhaps it was the mention of his name, but at that moment Boris started awake.

'Grandfather!' he exclaimed and, releasing me, made excitedly for Gustav with the obvious intention of embracing him. But at the last moment, the little boy seemed to remember himself and held out his hand instead.

'Good evening, Grandfather,' he said with calm dignity.

'Good evening, Boris.' Gustav patted him gently on the head. 'It's good to see you again. What sort of a day have you had?'

Boris gave a casual shrug. 'Somewhat tiring. Just the usual sort of day.'

'Just one minute,' Gustav said, 'and I'll see to everything.'

His arm around his grandson's shoulders, the porter went up to the reception desk. For the next few moments, he and the desk clerk exchanged hotel jargon in lowered tones. Then they both nodded in agreement about something and the desk clerk handed over a key.

'If you'd follow me, sir,' Gustav said. 'I'll show you where Boris will be staying.'

'Actually, I have another appointment.'

'At this hour? You have such a busy life, sir. Well, in that case, may I suggest I take Boris up myself and install him?'

'That's an excellent idea. I'd be very grateful.'

I walked with them to the elevator and gave a final wave as the doors closed on them. Then all at once the frustration and anger I had thus far managed to keep in check came flooding back, and without uttering another word to the desk clerk, I crossed the lobby and went out again into the night.

The street was deserted and silent. It took me a while to spot - a little way down on the opposite side - the stone arches Sophie had mentioned on the phone. For a moment, as I made my way towards them, I wondered if she had lost her nerve and fled. But then I saw her figure emerge from the shadows and could feel my fury rising once more.

Her expression was not as meek as I would have expected. She was watching me carefully, and as I came up to her she said, almost calmly:

‘You’ve got every right to be angry. I don’t know what happened. I suppose I was confused. You’ve got every right to be angry, I know.’

I looked at her nonchalantly. ‘Angry? Oh, I see. You’re talking about your behaviour earlier this evening. Well, yes, I must say, I felt very disappointed on behalf of Boris. Obviously, he was very upset. But as far as I’m concerned, quite frankly, it’s not something I’ve spent a lot of time thinking about. I’ve so much else on just now.’

‘I don’t know why it happened. I know how much you were depending on me ...’

‘I’ve never depended on you. I think you ought to calm down a little.’ I gave a quick laugh and began to walk slowly. ‘As far as I’m concerned, this simply isn’t a major issue. I’ve always been quite ready to go about my tasks with or without your support. I’m just disappointed on Boris’s behalf, that’s all.’

‘I’ve been very stupid, I see that now.’ Sophie had fallen in step alongside me. ‘I don’t know, I suppose I thought you and Boris - you have to see it from my side - you and Boris were lagging behind and I thought perhaps you weren't so keen on what I'd planned for the evening and I supposed maybe you'd drift off anyway ... Look, if you like, I'll tell you everything. Everything you want to know. Every detail ...'

I stopped walking and turned to her. 'Obviously I haven't made myself clear. I'm not interested in any of this. I only came out here because I wanted to get some fresh air and unwind a little. It's been a hard day. As a matter of fact, I came out here because I wanted to take in a movie before bed.'

'A movie? Which movie's that?'

'How do I know which movie? Some late-night film. There's a cinema just down here. I thought I'd go and see it whatever it is. It's been a very hard day.'

I began to walk again, this time more purposefully. After a moment, to my satisfaction, I heard her footsteps pursuing me.

'Are you really not angry?' she asked, catching up.

'Of course I'm not angry. Why should I be?'

'Can I come too? To this movie?'

I gave a shrug and continued to walk at a steady pace. 'Please yourself. You're perfectly welcome.'

Sophie grasped my arm. 'If you want, I'll make a completely clean breast of it. I'll tell you everything. Everything you want to know about ...'

'Look, how many more times do I have to say this? I'm not in the least interested. All I want just now is to unwind. There's going to be a lot of pressure on me over these next few days.'

She continued to hold my arm and for a while we walked together in silence. Then she said quietly: 'It's so good of you. To be so understanding.'

I said nothing to this. In time we drifted off the pavement and continued down the centre of the deserted street.

‘Once I find a proper home for us,’ she said eventually, ‘then everything will go better. It’s bound to. This place I’m seeing in the morning, I’m really hopeful about it. It sounds exactly what we’ve always wanted.’

‘Yes. Let’s hope so.’

‘You could sound a little more excited. This could be a turning point for us.’

I shrugged and continued to walk. The cinema was still some distance away, but being virtually the only thing illuminated in the darkened street, our eyes had for some time been fixed on it. Then as we came nearer, Sophie gave a sigh and brought us to a halt.

‘Maybe I won’t come in,’ she said, disengaging her arm.

‘I need plenty of time to look at this house tomorrow. I have to make an early start. I’d better be getting back.’

For some reason her words took me quite by surprise, and for a second I remained uncertain how I should respond. I glanced over towards the cinema, then back at Sophie.

‘But I thought you said you wanted to ...’ I began, then, pausing, said in a calmer tone: ‘Listen, this is a very good film. I’m sure you’ll enjoy it.’

‘But you don’t even know which film it is.’

The idea flashed through my head that she was playing some sort of game. Even so, a strange panic had begun to seize me and I could not keep a pleading note out of my voice.

‘You know what I meant. The desk clerk. He suggested it to me. He’s someone I know to be very reliable. And the hotel has its reputation to think of. It’s hardly likely to recommend ...' I trailed off, the panic now mounting further as Sophie began to move away from me. 'Look' - I raised my voice, no longer caring who heard me - 'I know this will be a good movie. And we haven't been to one together for so long. That's true, isn't it? When did we last do something like this together?'

Sophie appeared to give this consideration, then finally smiled and came back towards me.

'All right,' she said, taking my arm gently. 'All right. It's late, but I'll come in with you. As you say, it's ages since we did anything like this together. Let's have a really good time.'

I experienced a considerable feeling of relief, and as we entered the cinema it was all I could do not to grasp her tightly to me. Sophie seemed to sense something and nestled her head on my shoulder.

'It's so good of you,' she said softly. 'Not to be angry with me.'

'What is there to be angry about?' I muttered, looking about the foyer.

A little way in front of us, the last of a queue was filing into the theatre. I looked around for somewhere to buy tickets, but the kiosk was closed, and it occurred to me there might exist some special arrangement between the hotel and the cinema. In any case, when Sophie and I brought up the rear of the queue, a man in a green suit standing at the threshold smiled and ushered us in along with everyone else.

It was virtually a full house. The lights had not yet gone down and many people were moving around finding their seats. I was looking to see where we might sit when Sophie squeezed my arm excitedly.

'Oh, let's get something,' she said. 'Ice creams or popcorn or something.'

She was pointing down to the front of the theatre where a short queue had formed in front of a uniformed woman holding a tray of confectioneries.

‘Of course,’ I said. ‘But we’d better hurry or there’ll be no seats left. It’s very crowded in here.’

We made our way down to the front and joined the queue. After a while, as I was standing there, I could feel my anger rising again, until eventually I was obliged to turn away from Sophie altogether. Then I heard her say behind me:

‘I have to be honest. I didn’t actually come to the hotel tonight to find you. I didn’t even know you two would turn up there.’

‘Oh?’ I leaned forward, looking towards the confectioneries.

‘After what happened,’ Sophie went on, ‘I mean, once I’d realised how silly I’d been, well, I didn’t know what to do. Then I suddenly remembered. About Papa’s winter coat. I remembered I still hadn’t given it to him.’

There was a rustling noise. Turning, I noticed for the first time that Sophie was carrying on one arm a large shapeless package in brown paper. She raised it in the air, but it was obviously quite heavy and she soon lowered it again.

‘It was silly,’ she said. ‘There was no need to panic. But you see, I suddenly thought I could feel the winter in the air. And I remembered about the coat and I wanted to get it to him without any more delay. So I wrapped it up and came out. But then I got to the hotel and the evening was so mild. I could see I’d been panicking about nothing and I didn’t know if I should go in and give it to him tonight or not. So I was standing there and it got later and later and eventually I realised Papa would have gone to bed. I thought about leaving it at the desk for him, but then I wanted to give it to him myself. And I was thinking, well, I could just as well give it to him in a few weeks' time, it's still so mild. That's when the car drove up and you and Boris got out. That's the truth of it.'

'I see.'

'I don't know if I'd have had the courage to face you otherwise. But there I was, right across the street from you, so I took a deep breath and phoned.'

'Well, I'm glad you did.' I gestured at our surroundings. 'After all, it's a long time since we've come to a movie together like this.'

She gave no response and when I looked at her she was gazing down fondly at the package on her arm. She patted it with her free hand.

'The season won't be turning for a little while yet,' she murmured, as much to the coat as to me. 'So there's no desperate hurry. We can give it to him in a few weeks.'

We had now reached the head of the queue and Sophie stepped in front of me to peer eagerly into the tray the uniformed woman was proffering.

'What are you going to have?' she asked. 'I think I want an icecream tub. No, a choc-ice. One of these.'

Looking over her shoulder, I saw the tray contained the usual ice creams and chocolate bars. But curiously these had all been pushed untidily to the edges of the tray to give pride of place to a large battered book. I leaned forward to examine it.

'That's a very useful manual, sir,' the uniformed woman said eagerly. 'I can heartily recommend it. I suppose I shouldn't be selling it here like this. But then the manager doesn't mind us selling the odd personal item, just so long as we don't do it too often.'

On the jacket was a photograph of a smiling man in overalls half-way up a step-ladder, a paint brush in his hand, a roll of wallpaper under his arm. When I picked it up I could feel the binding starting to come apart.

‘Actually it belonged to my eldest son,’ the uniformed woman continued. ‘But he’s grown up now and gone to Sweden. I was finally sorting through his things last week. I kept anything I thought had sentimental value and the rest of it I threw out. But then there were one or two things that didn’t seem to fit into either category. This old manual, sir, I can’t say it has much sentimental value, but it’s such a useful volume, it shows you how to do so many things around the house, decorating, tiling, it teaches you everything step by step with very clear diagrams. I remember my son found it very useful when he was growing up. I realise it’s a little ragged now, but it really is the most useful book. I’m not asking much for it, sir.’

‘Perhaps Boris would like it,’ I said to Sophie, flicking through the pages.

‘Oh, if you’ve got a growing boy, sir, it really would be perfect. I can vouch from our own experience. Our son got so much from it when he was that age. Painting, tiling, it shows you everything.’

The lights were starting to dim and I remembered we had yet to find seats.

‘Very well, thank you,’ I said.

The woman thanked me profusely as I paid her and we came away with the book and the ice creams.

‘It’s good of you to think of Boris like that,’ Sophie said as we moved up the aisle. Then she raised her package again with a rustle and hugged it to herself.

‘It’s odd to think Papa went the whole of last winter without a proper coat,’ she said. ‘But he was just too proud to wear that old one. It was mild last year, so it didn't matter so much. But he can't go another winter like that.'

'No, he certainly shouldn't.'

'I'm quite unsentimental about it. I know Papa's getting older now. I've been thinking things through. About his retirement, for instance. He's getting older and it has to be faced.' Then she added quietly: 'I'll give it to him in a couple of weeks. That should be fine.'

The lights had continued to dim and the audience had quietened in anticipation. I realised the theatre was even more crowded than before and I wondered if we had left it too late to find seats. But then as the darkness settled over us, an usher came down the aisle with a torch and pointed out two seats near the front. Sophie and I edged down the row, mumbling apologies, and sat down just as the advertisements were starting.

Most of the advertisements were for local businesses and seemed to go on interminably. When the main feature finally started we had been seated for at least half an hour, and I saw with some relief it was to be the science fiction classic, 2001: A Space Odyssey - a favourite of mine which I never tired of seeing. As soon as those impressive opening shots of a prehistoric world appeared on the screen, I could feel myself relaxing, and I was soon comfortably absorbed in the film. We were well into the central section of the narrative - with Clint Eastwood and Yul Brynner on board the spaceship bound for Jupiter - when I heard Sophie say beside me:

'But the weather could change. Just like that.'

I assumed she was referring to the film and murmured back something in assent. But a few minutes later, she said:

'Last year, it was a nice sunny autumn, just like this. It went on and on. People were sitting out on the pavements drinking coffee right into November. Then suddenly, virtually overnight, it got so cold. It could easily be like that again this year. You never know, do you?'

'No, I suppose not.' By this time, of course, I had realised she was again talking about the coat.

'But it's not so urgent yet,' she murmured.

When I next glanced at her, she appeared to be watching the film again. I too turned back to the screen, but then after a few seconds certain fragments of memory began to come back to me there in the darkness of the cinema and my attention once more drifted from the film.

I found myself recalling quite vividly a certain occasion when I had been sitting in an uncomfortable, perhaps dirty armchair. It was probably the morning, a dull grey one, and I had been holding a newspaper in front of me. Boris had been lying on his front on the carpet nearby, drawing on a sketch pad with a wax crayon. From the little boy's age - he was still very small - I supposed this to be a memory deriving from six or seven years ago, though what room we had been in, in which house, I could not remember. A door to a neighbouring room had been left ajar through which several female voices could be heard chattering away.

For some time I had gone on reading my newspaper on the uncomfortable armchair, until something about Boris - some subtle change in his demeanour or his posture - had made me glance down at him. Then in an instant I had seen the situation before me. Boris had managed to draw on his sheet a perfectly recognisable 'Superman'. He had been attempting to do just such a thing for weeks, but for all our encouragement had been unable to produce even a vague likeness. But now, perhaps owing to that mixture of fluke and genuine breakthrough so often experienced in childhood, he had suddenly succeeded. The sketch was not quite finished - the mouth and eyes needed completing - but for all that I had been able to see at once the huge triumph it represented for him. In fact I would have said something to him had I not noticed at that moment the way he was leaning forward in a state of great tension, his crayon held over the paper. He was, I had realised, hesitating whether to go on to refine his drawing at the risk of ruining it. I had been able to sense acutely his dilemma and had felt a temptation to say out loud: 'Boris, stop. That's enough. Stop there and show everyone what you've achieved. Show me, then show your mother, and then all those people talking now in the next room. What does it matter if it's not completely finished? Everyone will be astonished and so proud of you. Stop now before you lose it all.' But I had not said anything, continuing instead to watch him from around the edge of my newspaper. Finally Boris had made up his mind and begun to apply a few more touches with great care. Then, growing more confident, he had bent right forward and started to use the crayon with some recklessness. A moment later he had stopped abruptly, staring silently at his sheet. Then - and I could even now recall the anguish mounting within me - I had watched him attempting to salvage his picture, applying more and more crayon. Finally his face had fallen and, dropping the crayon onto the paper, he had risen and left the room without a word.

This whole episode had affected me to a surprising degree, and I had still been in the process of composing my emotions when Sophie's voice had said somewhere close by:

'You've no idea, have you?'

I had lowered my paper, startled by the bitterness of her tone, to find her standing in the room staring at me. Then she had said:

'You've no idea, what that was like for me, watching what happened then. It'll never be like that for you. Look at you, just reading the newspaper.' Then she had lowered her voice, making it gather even more intensity. 'That's the difference! He's not your own. Whatever you say, it makes a difference. You'll never feel towards him like a real father. Look at you! You've no idea what I went through just then.'

With that she had turned and disappeared out of the room.

It had occurred to me to follow her through into the next room, visitors or no visitors, and bring her back for a talk. But in the end I had decided in favour of waiting where I was for her return. Sure enough, a few minutes later, Sophie had come back into the room, but something in her manner had prevented me from speaking and she had gone out again. In fact, although during the following half-hour Sophie had entered and left the room several more times, for all my resolve to make my feelings known to her, I had remained silent. Eventually, after a certain point, I had realised any chance to broach the topic without looking ridiculous had passed, and I had returned to my newspaper with a strong sense of hurt and frustration.

'Excuse me,' I heard a voice say behind me and a hand touched my shoulder. Turning, I saw a man in the row behind leaning forward and studying me carefully.

'It is Mr Ryder, isn't it? My goodness, it is. Please forgive me, I've been sitting here all this time, I didn't recognise you in this poor light. I'm Karl Pedersen. I'd been so looking forward to meeting you at the reception this morning. But of course unforeseeable circumstances prevented you from attending. How opportune I should now meet you like this.'

The man had white hair, glasses and a kindly face. I adjusted my posture slightly.

'Ah yes, Mr Pedersen. I'm very pleased to make your acquaintance. It was, as you say, all very unfortunate this morning. I too had been greatly looking forward to, er, to meeting you all.'

'As it happens, Mr Ryder, there are several other councillors here now in this cinema, all of whom were most sorry to miss you this morning.' He looked about in the darkness. 'If I can just ascertain where they're sitting, I'd like to take you over to meet at least one or two of them.' Twisting round, he craned his neck to search the rows behind him. 'Unfortunately, just now I can't see anyone ...'

'Of course I'd be very pleased to meet your colleagues. But it's rather late now, and if they're enjoying the film, perhaps we should leave it to another time. There are bound to be many more opportunities.'

'I can't see anyone just now,' the man said, turning back to me. 'What a pity. I know they're in this cinema somewhere. In any case, sir, as a member of the civic council, may I say how pleased and honoured we all are by your visit?'

'You're very kind.'

'Mr Brodsky has by all accounts made very good progress at the concert hall this afternoon. Three or four hours solid rehearsing.'

'Yes, I heard. It's splendid.'

'I wonder, sir, if you managed today to visit our concert hall.'

'The concert hall? Well, no. Unfortunately I've not yet had the chance ...'

'Of course. You had a long journey coming here. Well, there's still plenty of time. I'm sure you'll be impressed by our concert hall, Mr Ryder. It really is a beautiful old building, and whatever else we've let deteriorate in this city, no one can accuse us of neglecting our concert hall. A very beautiful old building, and set in the most splendid surroundings too. That's to say, in Liebmann Park. You'll see what I mean, Mr Ryder. A pleasant walk through the trees, and then you come to the clearing - and there! The concert hall!

You'll see for yourself, sir. An ideal place for the community to gather, away from the bustle of the streets. I remember when I was a boy, there was a city orchestra in those days, and the first Sunday of each month everyone would gather in that clearing before the concert. I can remember all the various families arriving, everyone smartly dressed, more and more people arriving through the trees and greeting one another. And we children, we'd be running everywhere. In the autumn we had a game, a special game. We'd rush around gathering up all the fallen leaves we could see, bring them up to the gardener's shed and pile them up against the side. There was a particular plank, about this high on the wall of the shed, it had a stain on it. What we told each other was that we had to collect enough leaves so that the pile reached up to that stain before the adults started to file into the building. If we didn't, the whole city was going to explode into a million pieces, some such thing. So there we all were, rushing back and forth, our arms full of wet leaves! It's easy for someone of my age to become nostalgic, Mr Ryder, but there's no doubt about it, this was a very happy community once. There were large happy families here. And real lasting friendships. People treated one another with warmth and affection. We had a splendid community here once. For many many years. I'll be seventy-six next birthday, so I can vouch personally for that.'

Pedersen fell silent for a moment. He continued to lean forward, his arm on the back of my seat, and when I glanced at him I noticed his eyes were not on the screen but somewhere far away. Meanwhile, we were approaching that section of the film in which the astronauts first suspect the motives of the computer, HAL, central to every aspect of life aboard the spaceship. Clint Eastwood was stalking the claustrophobic corridors with a terse expression and a long-barrelled gun. I was just starting to become engrossed when Pedersen began to talk again.

‘I have to be honest. I can’t help feeling a little sorry for him Mr Christoff, I mean. Yes, odd as this may sound to you, I feel sorry for him. I’ve said as much to a few colleagues and they’ve just thought, oh, the old fellow’s going soft, who can feel an ounce of pity for that charlatan? But, you see, I have a better memory of it than most. I remember what happened at the time Mr Christoff first arrived in this city. Of course I feel as angry as any of my colleagues about him. But, you see, I know well enough that at the start, right at the start of it, it wasn’t Mr Christoff that pushed himself forward. No, no, it was ... well, it was us. That’s to say, people like myself, I don’t deny it, I was in a position of influence. We encouraged him. We celebrated him, flattered him, made it clear we looked to him for enlightenment and initiative. At least some of the responsibility for what happened lies with us. My younger colleagues, they perhaps weren’t around so much in those early years. They only know Mr Christoff as this dominant figure around which so much revolved. They forget that he never asked to be put in such a position. Oh yes, I remember very well Mr Christoff first arriving in this city. He was a fairly young man then, on his own, very unassuming, modest even. If no one had encouraged him, I’m sure he’d have been happy to melt into the background, give the odd recital at a private function, nothing more. But it was the timing, Mr Ryder. The timing was unfortunate. Just when Mr Christoff turned up in our city, we were going through, well, a sort of hiatus. Mr Bernd, the painter, and Mr Vollmöller, a very fine composer, both of whom had for so long been at the helm of our cultural life here, they’d both died within months of each other and there was a certain feeling ... well, a kind of unsettled feeling. We were all very sad at the passing of two such fine men, but I suppose everyone felt too that now there was a chance for a change. A chance for something new and fresh. Inevitably, happy as we’d all been, after so many years of those two gentlemen being at the centre of everything, certain frustrations had built up. So you can imagine, when word got around that the stranger lodging at Mrs Roth's was a professional cellist and one who'd performed with the Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra, and on several occasions under Kazimierz Studzinski, well, there was not a little excitement. I remember personally having much to do with the welcoming of Mr Christoff. I remember, you see, how it was, and also how unassuming he was at first. Now, with hindsight, I'd even say he was lacking in confidence. Most likely he'd had a few setbacks prior to coming here. But we fussed over him, pressed him for his views on everything, yes, that's how it all started. I remember personally helping to persuade him about that first recital. He was genuinely reluctant. And in any case, that first recital was originally to be just a small affair, to take place at the Countess's house. It was only two days before the date, when it became clear how many people were determined to attend, that the Countess was forced to move the venue to the Holtmann Gallery. From then on, Mr Christoff's recitals - we demanded at least one every six months - they were held at the concert hall, and they became our great talking points, year in, year out. But he was reluctant at the beginning. Not just that first time. For the first few years, we had to keep persuading him. Then naturally the acclaim, the applause, the flattery, they did their work, and soon enough Mr Christoff was putting himself and his ideas about. "I've flowered here," he was heard to say a lot around that time. "I've flowered since coming here." My point, you see, sir, was that it was we who pushed him. I do feel sorry for him now - though I dare say I'm probably the only person in this city who does. As you've noticed, there's a lot of anger directed at him. I'm realistic enough about the situation, Mr Ryder. One has to be ruthless. Our city is close to crisis. There's widespread misery. We have to start putting things right somewhere and we might as well start at the centre. We have to be ruthless, and as sorry as I feel for him, I can see there's nothing else for it. He and everything he has come to represent must now be put away in some dark corner of our history. ’

Although I had continued to sit slightly turned towards him, thus making it clear I had not stopped listening, my attention had been drawn back to the movie. Clint Eastwood was talking into a microphone to his wife back on earth and tears were flowing down his face. I realised we were coming close to the famous scene in which Yul Brynner comes into the room and tests Eastwood’s speed on the draw by clapping his hands in front of him.

‘Excuse me,’ I said, ‘but how long ago was it Mr Christoff came to this town?’

I had asked this without a great deal of thought, at least half my attention on the screen. In fact I went on watching the movie for another two or three minutes before realising that behind me Pedersen was hanging his head in an attitude of profound shame. Sensing that my gaze had returned to him, he looked up and said:

‘You’re very right, Mr Ryder. Very right to reprimand us. Seventeen years and seven months. That’s a long time. A mistake such as ours might have been made anywhere, but then not to rectify it for so long? I can see how we must look to an outsider, to someone like yourself, sir, and I feel thoroughly ashamed, let me say so. I make no excuses. It took us an eternity to admit our error. Not, I dare say, to see it. But to admit it, even to ourselves, that was difficult and took a long time. We had, you see, plunged deep with Mr Christoff. Virtually every council member had at some time invited him to his house. He had been regularly seated next to Mr von Winterstein at the annual civic banquets. His photograph had adorned the cover of our city almanac. He had written the introduction to the programme for the Roggenkamp Exhibition. There were yet other implications. Things had gone further. There was for instance the unfortunate case of Mr Liebrich. Ah, but excuse me, I think I’ve just spotted Mr

Kollmann over there' - he craned his neck again, looking towards the back of the cinema - 'yes, that's Mr Kollmann, and with him, if I'm not mistaken, it's so difficult to see in this light, with him is Mr Schaefer. Both these gentlemen attended this morning's welcoming reception and I know they'd both be utterly delighted to meet you. Furthermore, on this matter we're discussing, I'm sure both these gentlemen will have much to say. I wonder if you'd care to go over and meet them.'

'I'd be honoured. But just now you were about to tell me ...'

'Ah yes, of course. The unfortunate case of Mr Liebrich. You see, sir, for many years before Mr Christoff's arrival, Mr Liebrich had been one of our most respected violin teachers. He taught the children of the best families. He was highly admired. Now Mr Christoff, not long after his first recital, was asked his opinion on Mr Liebrich and he let it be known that he didn't care much for Mr Liebrich at all. Not for his playing nor his teaching methods. By the time of Mr Liebrich's death a few years ago, he had lost virtually everything. His pupils, his friends, his place in society. That was just one case that sprang to mind. To admit that we'd been wrong about Mr Christoff all along - can you imagine the enormity of it, sir? Yes, we were weak, I admit it. Then again we had no idea things would reach the present level of crisis. People seemed by and large happy still. Year after year slipped by and if some of us had doubts we kept them to ourselves. But I don't defend our negligence, sir, not for a second. And I, in my position on the council at that time, I know I'm as culpable as anyone. In the end, and I feel thoroughly ashamed to admit this, in the end it was the people of this city, the ordinary people who forced us to face up to our responsibilities. The ordinary people, their lives by this point growing ever more miserable, were at least a clear step ahead of us. I remember the exact moment this fact first dawned on me. It was three years ago, I was walking home after the latest of Mr Christoff's recitals - it was, I remember, Kazan's Grotesqueries for Cello and Three Flutes. I was hurrying home through the darkness of Liebmann Park, it was quite chilly, and I could see Mr Kohler the chemist walking a little way in front of me. I knew he'd also been at the concert and so I caught up with him and we started talking. At first I was careful to keep my thoughts to myself, but eventually I asked him if he'd enjoyed Mr Christoff's recital. Yes, he had, Mr Kohler said. There must have been something about the way he'd said it, because I recall asking him again a few moments later if he'd enjoyed the concert. This time Mr Kohler said yes, he'd enjoyed himself, but perhaps Mr Christoff's performance had been a little functional. Yes, "functional" was the word he used. As you can imagine, sir, I thought carefully before I next spoke. In the end I decided to throw caution to the wind, and I said: "Mr Kohler, I tend to agree with you. There was a certain dryness to it all." To which Mr Kohler remarked that "cold" was the word that had sprung to his mind. By then we'd reached the park gates. We wished each other good night and parted. But I remember I hardly slept that night, Mr Ryder. Ordinary people, decent citizens like Mr Kohler were now expressing such views. It was clear the pretence could no longer continue. It was time for us - all of us in positions of influence - to own up to our error, however far-reaching the implication. Ah, but excuse me, that is most definitely Mr Schaefer seated beside Mr Kollmann. Both of those gentlemen will, I know, have interesting viewpoints about what occurred. Being a generation younger than myself, they'll have seen things from a slightly different angle. Besides, I know how much they were longing to meet you this morning. Please, let's go over.'

Pedersen got to his feet and I watched his crouched figure edging down the row muttering apologies. On reaching the aisle, he straightened and gestured to me. Weary though I was, there seemed nothing for it but to join him, and I too rose and began to make my way towards the aisle. As I did so,

I noticed that an almost festive mood was pervading the cinema. Everywhere people were exchanging jokes and little remarks as they watched the film, and no one seemed to mind at all my pushing past. On the contrary, people seemed to tuck their legs to one side or jump to a standing position with eagerness. A few people even rolled right back in their seats, feet stuck up in the air, squealing with delight as they did so.

Once I reached the aisle, Pedersen began to lead the way up the carpeted slope. Somewhere among the rear stalls, he halted and with an ushering motion said:

‘After you, Mr Ryder.’

I once more found myself pushing past people, this time with Pedersen directly behind me, whispering apologies on our behalf. Before long we came upon a group of several men huddled together. It took me a moment to ascertain that a game of cards was in progress, some participants leaning forward from the row behind, while others leaned back from the row in front. They looked up as we approached, and when Pedersen announced me they all rose to a half-standing position. They seated themselves again only when I was comfortably installed in their midst, and I found myself shaking numerous hands proffered out of the darkness.

The man nearest me was dressed in a business suit, with his collar unbuttoned and his tie loosened. He smelt of whisky and I noticed he was having difficulty focusing on me. His companion, looking over his shoulder, was thin, with an oddly freckled face, and seemed more sober, though he too had his tie loosened. I did not have time to take in the rest of the company before the drunken man shook my hand a second time, saying:

‘I hope you’re enjoying the film, sir.’

‘I am indeed. In fact, it happens to be one of my all-time favourites.’

‘Ah. Well then, it’s fortunate that’s what’s showing tonight. Yes, I too like this film. A classic. Mr Ryder, would you care to take over this hand?’ He held his cards up to my face.

‘No thank you. Please don’t interrupt your game on my account.’

‘I was just telling Mr Ryder,’ Pedersen said behind me, ‘that life here wasn’t always the way it is today. Even you gentlemen who are younger than me, I'm sure you'll be able to vouch ...'

'Ah yes, the good old days,' the drunken man said dreamily. 'Ah yes. Things were good here in the good old days.'

'Theo's thinking about Rosa Klenner,' said the freckled man behind him, causing laughter all around.

'Nonsense,' the drunken man protested. 'And stop trying to embarrass me in front of our distinguished guest.'

'Oh yes, oh yes,' his friend went on. 'In those days Theo here was completely in love with Rosa Klenner. That's to say, the present Mrs Christoff.'

'I was never in love with her. Anyway, I was already married by then.'

'All the more pitiful then, Theo. All the more pitiful.'

'It's complete nonsense.'

'I can remember, Theo,' a new voice said from the row behind, 'you used to bore us for hours talking about Rosa Klenner.'

'I didn't know her true nature in those days.'

'It was precisely her true nature that appealed to you,' the voice went on. 'You've always hankered after women who wouldn't look at you for three seconds.'

'There's some truth in that,' the freckled man said.

'There's no truth at all ...'

'No, let me explain to Mr Ryder.' The freckled man put his hand on his drunken friend's shoulder and leaned towards me. 'The present Mrs Christoff - we still tend to call her Rosa Klenner - she's a local girl, one of us, grew up with us. She's still a beautiful woman, and in those days, well, she had us all captivated. She was very beautiful and very distant. She used to work at the Schlegel Gallery, which has closed now. She used to be there behind a desk, no more than an attendant really. She used to be there on Tuesdays and Thursdays ...'

'Tuesdays and Fridays,' the drunken man interrupted.

'Tuesdays and Fridays. Sorry. Naturally, Theo would remember. After all, he used to go to the gallery - it was just this little white room - he used to go there all the time and pretend to be looking at the exhibits.'

'Nonsense ...'

'You weren't the only one, were you, Theo? You had a lot of rivals. Jürgen Haase. Erich Brull. Even Heinz Wodak. They were all regulars.'

'And Otto Röscher,' Theo said nostalgically. 'He was often there.'

'Was that so? Yes, Rosa had a lot of admirers.'

'I never spoke to her,' Theo said. 'Except once, when I asked her for a catalogue.'

'The thing that became apparent about Rosa,' the freckled man continued, 'ever since we were all teenagers, was that as far as she was concerned all the local males were beneath her. She developed a reputation for turning down advances in the cruellest possible ways. That's why poor souls like Theo here, very wisely, never said a word to her. But then whenever someone of note, an artist, a musician, a writer, someone like that passed through the town, she'd pursue them with no shame whatsoever. She was always on this or that committee, which meant she had access to virtually every celebrity visiting the town. She'd get to go to all the receptions and half an hour into an event she'd have the guest in a corner, talking and talking, staring into his eyes. Of course, there was a lot of speculation - about her sexual behaviour, I mean - but no one could ever prove anything. She was always very clever. But if you saw the way she flung herself at visiting celebrities, you couldn't doubt she'd have relations with at least some of them. She certainly charmed a whole lot of them, she was extremely attractive. But as for the local men, she wouldn't look at them.'

'Hans Jongboed always claimed to have had a fling with her,' the man called Theo put in. This caused much laughter, several voices nearby repeating derisively: 'Hans Jongboed!' Pedersen, however, was stirring uneasily.

'Gentlemen,' he began, 'Mr Ryder and I were just discussing ...'

'I never spoke to her. Except that once. To ask for a catalogue.'

'Ah, Theo, never mind.' The freckled man slapped his friend on the back, causing the latter to slump forward a little. 'Never mind. Look at her plight now.'

Theo seemed lost in thought. 'She was like that about everything,' he said. 'Not just about love. She'd only really have any time for members of the artistic circle, and then only for the real elite. You couldn't get any respect from her otherwise. She was disliked here. Long before she ever married Christoff, she was disliked.'

'If she wasn't so beautiful,' the freckled man said to me, 'she'd have been universally hated. As it was, there were always men like Theo here willing to fall under her spell. Anyway, Christoff arrived in this town. A professional cellist, and one with a distinguished track record! Rosa made a completely unashamed go for him. Didn't seem to care what any of us thought. She knew what she wanted and went about it quite ruthlessly. It was admirable in an appalling sort of way. Christoff was charmed and they got married during his first year here. Christoff was what she'd been waiting for all that time. Well, I hope she's got her money's worth. Sixteen years of being his wife. It hasn't been so bad. But what now? He's finished here. What's she going to do now?'

'She won't even get a job in a gallery now,' Theo said.

'She's hurt us too much over the years. Hurt our pride. She's through in this city, every bit as much as Christoff himself.'

'One school of thought has it,' the freckled man said, 'that Rosa will leave town with Christoff and not ditch him until they're well settled elsewhere. But Mr Dremmler here' - he indicated someone in the row in front - 'is convinced she'll stay on here.'

The man in the row in front turned at the mention of his name. Evidently he had been listening to the discussion, for he now said with some authority: 'What you've got to remember about Rosa Klenner is that she's got a really timid side to her. I was at school with her, we were in the same year. She's always had it, that side to her, and it's her curse. This city isn't good enough for her, but she's too timid to leave. You notice, for all her ambitions, she's never attempted to leave us. This timid side to her, a lot of people don't notice it, but it's there. That's why my bet's on her staying. She'll stay and try her luck again here. She'll be hoping to hook some other celebrity passing through. After all, she's still a beautiful woman for her age.'

A high reedy voice somewhere nearby said: 'Maybe she'll go for Brodsky.'

This provoked the largest burst of laughter yet.

'It's perfectly possible,' the voice went on in a mock-hurt tone. 'All right, he's old, but she's no longer so young. And who else is there here in her league?' Again there was much laughter, spurring the speaker on. 'In fact, Brodsky's the best course for her. I'd recommend it to her.'

Anything else and all the resentment the town now feels towards Christoff will stay with her. But if she becomes Brodsky's mistress, or even Brodsky's wife, ah, by far the best way to obliterate her connection with Christoff. And it means she can just carry on in her ... her present position.'

By this point there was laughter all around us, with people even three rows in front turning and displaying their mirth. Next to me, Pedersen cleared his throat.

'Gentlemen, please,' he said. 'I'm disappointed. What will Mr Ryder make of all this? You're still thinking of Mr Brodsky - Mr Brodsky, please - you're still thinking of him in the old way. You're making yourselves look foolish. Mr Brodsky is no longer a figure of fun. Whatever one thinks of Mr Schmidt's proposition about Mrs Christoff, Mr Brodsky is not in any case an amusing option ...'

'It's good of you to have come here, Mr Ryder,' Theo cut in. 'But it's too late. Things have just reached a point here, it's just too late ...'

'That's rubbish, Theo,' Pedersen said. 'We're at a turning point, an important turning point. Mr Ryder has come here to tell us that. Haven't you, sir?'

'Yes ...'

'It's too late. We've lost it. Why don't we resign ourselves to being just another cold, lonely city? Other cities have. At least we'll be moving with the tide. The soul of this town, it's not sick, Mr Ryder, it's dead. It's too late now. Ten years ago, perhaps. There was still a chance then. But not now. Mr Pedersen' - the drunken man pointed limply at my companion - 'you, sir. It was you and Mr Thomas. And Mr Stika. All you good gentlemen. You all prevaricated ...'

'Let's not have this again, Theo,' the freckled man broke in. 'Mr Pedersen's right. It's not quite yet time for such resignation. We've found Brodsky - Mr Brodsky - and for all we know he may be ...'

'Brodsky, Brodsky. It's too late. We're done for now. Let's just be a cold modern city and be done with it.'

I felt Pedersen's hand on my arm. 'Mr Ryder, I'm very sorry ...'

'You prevaricated, sir! Seventeen years. Seventeen years, Christoff's been left to get on with things unchallenged. And what do you offer us now? Brodsky! Mr Ryder, it's too late.'

'I'm truly sorry,' Pedersen said to me, 'you've had to listen to such talk.'

Someone behind us said: 'Theo, you're just drunk and depressed. Tomorrow morning you'll have to search out Mr Ryder and apologise to him.'

'Well,' I said, 'I'm interested to hear all sides of the discussion ...'

'But this is no side at all!' Pedersen protested. 'I assure you, Mr Ryder, Theo's sentiments are not in the least typical of what people here are now feeling. Everywhere, in the streets, in the trams, I sense a tremendous feeling, a feeling of optimism.'

This brought a general murmur of agreement.

'Don't believe it, Mr Ryder,' Theo said, grasping my sleeve. 'You're here on a fool's errand. Let's take a quick poll here in this cinema. Let's ask a few of the people here ...'

'Mr Ryder,' Pedersen said quickly, 'I'm going to go home, turn in for the night. It's a wonderful film, but I've seen it a number of times already. And you yourself, sir, you must be getting tired.'

‘Actually, I’m very tired indeed. I might leave with you, if I may.’ Then, turning, I said to the others: ‘Excuse me, gentlemen, but I think I’ll now return to my hotel.’

‘But Mr Ryder,’ the freckled man said, concern in his voice, ‘please don’t go just yet. You must stay at least until the astronaut dismantles HAL.’

‘Mr Ryder,’ a voice said from further down the row, ‘perhaps you’d care to take over my hand here. I’ve had enough of this game for tonight. And it’s always so hard to see the cards in this sort of light. My eyesight isn’t what it used to be.’

‘You’re very kind, but really I must go.’

I was about to exchange good nights, but Pedersen was already on his feet and starting to edge his way out. I followed on behind him, giving a few waves back to the company as I went.

Pedersen was clearly upset by what had taken place, for when we reached the aisle he continued walking silently with his head down. As we left the auditorium, I threw a last glance towards the screen and saw Clint Eastwood preparing for the dismantling of HAL, carefully checking over his giant screwdriver.

The night outside - its deathly hush, the chill, the thickening mist - was such a contrast to the warm hubbub in the cinema that we both paused on the pavement as though to regain our bearings.

‘Mr Ryder, I don’t know what to say,’ Pedersen said. ‘Theo’s an excellent fellow, but sometimes after a big dinner ...’ He shook his head despondently.

‘Let’s not worry. Hard-working people need to unwind. I very much enjoyed the evening.’

‘I feel thoroughly ashamed ...’

‘Please. Let’s forget it. Really, I enjoyed myself.’

We began to walk, our footsteps echoing in the empty street. For a time, Pedersen maintained a preoccupied silence. Then he said:

‘You must believe me, sir. We’ve never underestimated the difficulties of introducing such an idea to our community. I mean, this idea of Mr Brodsky. I can assure you we’ve gone about everything with considerable caution.’

‘Yes, I’m sure that’s so.’

‘At the start we took great care to whom we even mentioned the idea. It was vital that only those most likely to be sympathetic should hear of it during the earlier stages. Then, via these persons, we allowed the thing to seep out slowly to the public at large. That way we ensured that the whole notion was presented in the most positive light. At the same time, we took other measures. For instance, we gave a series of dinners in Mr Brodsky’s honour to which we invited carefully chosen guests from our higher ranks. At first these dinners were small and virtually secret, but gradually we have been able to spread our net wider and wider, gaining more and more support for our position. At any important public event, too, we’ve made sure Mr Brodsky has been seen amidst the dignitaries. When the Peking Ballet came here, for instance, we had him seated in the same box as Mr and Mrs Weiss. Then of course, at the personal level, we’ve all made a point when referring to him of employing only the most respectful tones. We’ve been working hard at it now for two years, and by and large we’ve been very satisfied. The general picture of him has definitely been changing. So much so that we judged it time to take this vital step. That’s why it was so discouraging just now. Those gentlemen in there, they’re the very ones who should be setting an example. If they revert to such an attitude each time they unwind a little, how can we ever expect the people at large ...’ He trailed off and shook his head again. 'I feel let down. On my behalf and on yours, Mr Ryder.'

He became silent again. After we had not spoken for a while, I said with a sigh:

'Public opinion is never easy to shift.'

Pedersen remained silent for a few more steps, then said: 'You have to consider our starting point. When you look at it that way, when you consider our starting point, then I think you'll see we have made considerable progress. You must understand, sir, Mr Brodsky's been living here with us now for a long time, and in all those years no one had heard him talk about, let alone play, any music. Yes, we'd all vaguely known he'd once been a conductor in his old country. But you see, because we never saw anything of that side of him, we never thought of him like that. In fact, to be frank, until recently, Mr Brodsky was really only ever noticed when he got very drunk and went staggering about the town shouting. The rest of the time he was just this recluse who lived with his dog up by the north highway. Well, that's not quite true, he was also seen regularly at the library. Two or three mornings a week he'd come into the library, take his usual seat beneath the windows and tie his dog to the table leg. It's against the rules, to bring the dog in, but the librarians long ago decided it was the simplest thing, just to let him bring it in. Far simpler than starting a fight with Mr Brodsky. So you sometimes saw him there, his dog at his feet, thumbing through his pile of books - always these same turgid-looking volumes of history. And if anyone in the room started even the briefest of whispered exchanges, even merely greeted someone, he'd stand up and bellow at the culprit. Theoretically, of course, he was in the right. But then we've never been so strict about silence in our library. People like to talk a little when they meet, after all, as in any other public place. And when you think that Mr Brodsky was himself breaking the rules bringing his dog in, it's not surprising there was this notion that his behaviour was unreasonable. But then just every once in a while, on certain mornings, a particular mood would descend on him. He'd be there reading at the table and then this forlorn look would come over him. You'd notice him sitting there, staring off into space, sometimes with tears welling in his eyes. Once that happened, people would know it was all right to talk. Usually someone would test the water first. And if Mr Brodsky made no response, then very quickly the whole room would start talking. Sometimes - people are so perverse! - the library becomes much noisier on such occasions than at any time when Mr Brodsky is absent. I remember one morning going in to return a book and the place sounded like a railway station. I had virtually to shout to make myself heard at the issue desk. And there was Mr Brodsky, very still in the middle of it all, in a world of his own. I must say he was a sad sight. The morning light made him look rather feeble. There was a droplet on the end of his nose, his eyes seemed so far away and he'd quite forgotten the page he was holding. And it occurred to me it was a little cruel, the way the atmosphere had turned. It was as though they were taking advantage of him, though I'm not quite sure in what sense. But you see, another morning, he'd have been quite capable of silencing the lot of them in an instant. Well anyway, Mr Ryder, what I'm trying to say is that for many years that's who Mr Brodsky was to us. I suppose it's too much to expect people to change completely their view of him in such a relatively short time. Considerable progress has been made, but as you saw just now ...' Again, exasperation seemed to overtake him. 'But they should know better,' he muttered to himself.

We came to a halt at a crossroad. The fog had got much thicker and I had lost my bearings. Pedersen glanced around, then began to walk again, leading me down a narrow street with rows of cars parked on the pavements.

'I'll see you to your hotel, Mr Ryder. I might as well go home this way as any other. The hotel is to your satisfaction, I trust?'

'Oh yes, it's fine.'

'Mr Hoffman runs a fine establishment. He's an excellent manager and an excellent fellow all round. Of course, as you know, it's Mr Hoffman we have to thank for Mr Brodsky's, er, recovery.'

'Ah yes, of course.'

For a little while the cars on the pavement obliged us to walk in single file. Then we drifted out into the middle of the street, and when I drew up alongside him I saw that Pedersen's mood had lightened. He smiled and said:

'I understand you're going to the Countess's house tomorrow to listen to those records. Our mayor, Mr von Winterstein, I know he intends to join you there. He's very keen to take you aside and talk matters over with you. But the main thing, of course, is those records. Extraordinary!'

'Yes. I'm very much looking forward to it all.'

'The Countess is a remarkable lady. Time and again she's demonstrated a dimension to her thinking that puts the rest of us to shame. I've asked her more than once what on earth gave her the idea in the first place. "A hunch," she always says. "I woke up one morning with this hunch." What a lady! It could have been no easy task, obtaining those gramophone records. But she managed, using a specialist dealer in Berlin. Of course the rest of us knew nothing of it at the time, and I dare say if we had we'd have just laughed at the whole idea. And then she summoned us one evening to her residence. Just two years ago last month, a very pleasant, sunny evening. So there we all were, eleven of us, gathered in her drawing room, none of us knowing quite what to expect. She served us refreshments, then almost immediately began to address us. We had fretted long enough, she said. It was time we acted. Time we admitted how misguided we had been and took some positive steps to repair the damage as best we could.

Otherwise our grandchildren, their children after them, would never forgive us. Well, none of this was new, we'd been repeating such sentiments to each other for months by that point and we all just nodded, made the usual noises. But then the Countess continued. As far as Mr Christoff was concerned, she said, little further action was necessary. He was now thoroughly discredited in every walk of life throughout the city. But that in itself was hardly sufficient to put into reverse the spiral of misery gaining ever greater momentum at the heart of our community. We had somehow to build a new mood, a new era. We all nodded to this, but again, Mr Ryder, these were sentiments we had exchanged many times before. I believe Mr von Winterstein even said as much, though in the most courteous sort of way. This was when the Countess started to reveal just what was in her mind. The solution, she declared, had quite possibly been in our midst the whole time. She proceeded to explain herself further and, well, at first, naturally, we could hardly believe our ears. Mr Brodsky? Of the library and the drunken walks? Was she seriously talking about Mr Brodsky? Had it been anyone other than the Countess, I'm sure we'd have fallen about laughing. But the Countess, I remember, remained very sure of herself. She suggested we all make ourselves comfortable, she had some music for us to listen to. To listen to very carefully. Then she began to play those records to us, one after the other. We sat there and listened, the sun going down outside. The recording quality was poor. The Countess's stereogram, you'll see tomorrow, it's a somewhat dated affair. But none of this mattered. Within minutes the music had cast a spell over us all, had lulled us into a deeply tranquil mood. Some of us had tears in our eyes. We realised we were listening to something we had so sorely missed over the years. Suddenly it seemed more incomprehensible than ever that we should have come to celebrate someone like Mr Christoff. Here we were, listening to true music again. The work of a conductor not only immensely gifted, but who shared our values. Then the music stopped, we stood up and stretched our legs - we'd been listening for well over three hours - and then, well, the idea of Mr Brodsky - Mr Brodsky! - seemed as absurd as ever. The recordings were very old, we pointed out. And Mr Brodsky for reasons best known to himself had abandoned music a long time ago. And besides, he had his ... his problems. One could hardly call him the same person. We were soon all shaking our heads. But then the Countess spoke up again. We were approaching crisis point. We had to keep an open mind. We had to seek out Mr Brodsky, talk with him, ascertain the present state of his powers. None of us needed reminding, surely, of the urgency of the situation. Each of us could recount dozens of sad cases. Of lives blighted by loneliness. Of families despairing of ever rediscovering the happiness they'd once taken for granted. It was at this point that Mr Hoffman, the manager of your hotel, suddenly cleared his throat and declared that he would see to Mr Brodsky. He would take it upon himself - he said this all very solemnly, he actually stood up to do so - he would take it upon himself to assess the situation, and if there was any hope at all of rehabilitating Mr Brodsky, then he, Mr Hoffman, would take personal charge. If we would entrust him with this task, he would vow to us not to let the community down. That was, as I say, just over two years ago. Since then we've watched with astonishment the dedication with which Mr Hoffman has gone about fulfilling his promise. The progress, if not always smooth, has been remarkable overall. And now Mr Brodsky is, well, he has been brought to his present condition. So much so that we felt we should wait no longer to take the crucial step. After all, we can only go so far simply presenting Mr Brodsky in a better light. At some point, the people of this town have to judge with their own eyes and ears. Well, so far, every indication is that we have not been over-ambitious. Mr Brodsky has been rehearsing regularly, and by all accounts has won fully the respect of the orchestra. It may be a great many years since he last gave a public performance, but it seems little has been lost. That passion, that fine vision we encountered in the Countess's drawing room that evening, it's all been waiting somewhere deep inside and is now steadily reawakening. Yes, we have every confidence he will do us all proud come Thursday night. Meanwhile, for our part, we have done everything in our power to ensure the success of the evening. The Stuttgart Nagel Foundation Orchestra, as you know, if not of the very highest rank, is very well respected. Its services do not come cheaply. Nevertheless, there was hardly a dissenting voice over our hiring them for this most important of occasions, nor about the period involved. At first, two weeks' rehearsal time had been envisaged, but in the end, with full support from the Finance Committee, we stretched it to three weeks. Three weeks board and hospitality for a visiting orchestra, on top of fees, you can see, sir, it is no small undertaking. But there was hardly a whisper of opposition. Each council member has now come to understand the importance of Thursday night. Everyone sees that Mr Brodsky must be given every chance. For all that' - Pedersen suddenly heaved a sigh - 'for all that, as you saw yourself this very evening, old ingrained ideas are hard to erase. This is precisely why your help, Mr Ryder, your agreeing to come to our humble city may prove absolutely crucial to us. The people will listen to you in a way they would never listen to one of us. In fact, sir, I can tell you, the mood in this town has altered simply at the news of your arrival. There's the greatest anticipation building up around what you'll tell us on Thursday night. In the trams, in the cafés, people are talking of virtually nothing else. Of course, I don't know precisely what you've prepared for us. Perhaps you've taken care not to paint too rosy a picture, Perhaps you'll warn us of the hard work that lies ahead for each one of us if we're ever to re-discover the happiness we once had. You'll be very right to give us such warnings. But I know too how skilfully you'll appeal to the positive, public-spirited part of your listener. One thing in any case is certain. When you finish speaking, no one in this city will ever again look at Mr Brodsky and see the shabby old drunk they once did. Ah, I can see you looking concerned, Mr Ryder. Please don't worry. We may look like a backwater town, but there are certain sorts of occasions at which we excel. Mr Hoffman in particular has been working hard to structure a truly magnificent evening. Rest assured, sir, every citizen of any standing will attend. And as for Mr Brodsky himself, as I say, I'm sure he won't let us down. He'll surpass everyone's expectations, I'm certain of it.'

In fact the look on my face noted by Pedersen had not to do with 'concern', so much as the growing annoyance I was feeling towards myself. For the truth was that my forthcoming address to this city was not only far from ready, I had yet to complete even the background research. I could not understand how with all my experience I had arrived at such a state of affairs. I remembered how that very afternoon in the hotel's elegant atrium, I had sat sipping the strong bitter coffee, reiterating to myself the importance of planning the rest of the day with care so as to make the best use of the very limited time. As I had sat watching the misty fountain in the mirror behind the bar, I had even pictured myself in a situation not unlike the one I had just encountered at the cinema, making a striking impression on the company with my easy authority over the range of local issues, producing at least one spontaneous witticism at Christoff's expense memorable enough to be quoted throughout the town the next day. Instead I had allowed myself to be deflected by other matters, with the result that, during my entire time at the cinema, I had been unable to manage a single noteworthy comment. It was even possible I had created the impression of being less than urbane. Suddenly I felt again an intense irritation with Sophie for the chaos she had caused and for the way she had obliged me to compromise so thoroughly my usual standards.

We came to a halt again and I realised we were standing in front of the hotel.

‘Well, it’s been a great pleasure,’ Pedersen said, holding out his hand to me. ‘I look forward to enjoying more of your company over the coming days. But now you must get some rest.’

I thanked him, wished him a good night and entered the lobby as his footsteps faded away into the darkness.

The young desk clerk was still on duty. ‘I hope you enjoyed the movie, sir,’ he said, handing me my key.

‘I did, very much. Thank you for suggesting it. It was very relaxing.’

‘Yes, many guests find it a good way to round off the day. Oh, Gustav reports that Boris was very happy with his room and went off to sleep immediately.’

‘Ah, good.’

I wished him a good night and hurried across to the elevator.

I arrived in my room feeling very grimy after the long day and, changing into my dressing gown, began to prepare for a shower. But then, as I was investigating the bathroom, an intense surge of weariness came over me, so that it was virtually all I could do to stagger back to my bed and collapse on top of it, sinking at once into a deep sleep.

I had not been asleep long when the telephone rang beside my ear. I let it ring for a while, then finally sat up on the bed and picked up the receiver.

‘Ah, Mr Ryder. It’s me. Hoffman.’

I waited for him to explain why he was disturbing me, but the hotel manager did not continue. There was an awkward silence and then he said again:

‘It’s me, sir. Hoffman.’ There was another pause, then he said: ‘I’m down here in the lobby.’

‘Oh yes.’

‘I’m sorry, Mr Ryder, perhaps you were in the middle of something.’

‘Actually I was just getting a little sleep.’

This remark seemed to stun Hoffman, for there followed another silence. I laughed quickly and said:

‘What I meant was, I was lying down, as it were. Naturally I won’t be having a full sleep until ... until all the day’s business is concluded.’

‘Quite, quite.’ Hoffman sounded relieved. ‘Just catching your breath, so to speak. Very understandable. Well, in any case, I shall be here in the lobby waiting for you, sir.’

I put down the receiver and sat on the bed wondering what to do. I felt as exhausted as ever – I could not have slept more than a few minutes – and it was tempting to forget the whole matter and simply go back to sleep. But I eventually saw the impossibility of doing so and got to my feet.

I discovered I had fallen asleep in my dressing gown, and I was about to remove it and get dressed when it occurred to me I might go down and deal with Hoffman still wearing it. At this time of night, after all, I was unlikely to encounter anyone except Hoffman and the desk clerk, and my going down in such attire would emphasise subtly but pointedly the lateness of the hour and the fact that he was keeping me from my sleep. I stepped out into the corridor and made my way to the elevator feeling not a little annoyed.

Initially at least, the dressing gown seemed to have the desired impact, for Hoffman's opening words as I entered the lobby were: 'I'm sorry to have disturbed your rest, Mr Ryder. It must be so tiring for you, all this travelling.'

I made no attempt to hide my weariness. Passing a hand through my hair, I said: 'It's perfectly all right, Mr Hoffman. But I trust this won't take too long. I am, in fact, feeling pretty tired now.'

'Oh, this won't take long, not long at all.'

'Fine.'

I noticed that Hoffman was wearing a raincoat and, underneath it, full evening dress with cummerbund and bow tie.

'You'll have heard, of course, the bad news,' he said.

'The bad news?'

'It's bad news, but let me say, sir, I am confident, very confident, it will not lead to anything serious. And before the evening is out, I trust you will be equally convinced of it, Mr Ryder.'

'I'm sure I will,' I said, nodding reassuringly. Then after a moment I decided the situation was hopeless and asked point blank: 'I'm sorry, Mr Hoffman, but what bad news are you referring to? There's been so much bad news lately.'

He looked at me in alarm. 'So much bad news?'

I gave a laugh. 'I mean the fighting in Africa and so on. Everywhere, bad news.' I gave another laugh.

'Oh, I see. I was of course referring to the bad news about Mr Brodsky's dog.'

'Ah yes. Mr Brodsky's dog.'

'You'll agree, sir, this is most unfortunate. The timing of it. One can proceed with the utmost care, and then something like this happens!' He gave an exasperated sigh.

'Yes, it's awful. Awful.'

'But as I say, I am confident. Yes, confident it will not lead to any major setback. Well now, may I suggest we go off at once? Actually, now I think of it, you were quite right, Mr Ryder. This is a much better time to set off. It means we shall arrive neither too early nor too late. Quite right, one must take these things calmly. Never get panicked. Well, sir, let's be off.'

'Er ... Mr Hoffman. I seem to have made a little misjudgement about my attire for this occasion. Perhaps you'll allow me a few minutes to go back upstairs and change into something else.'

'Oh' - Hoffman glanced fleetingly at me - 'you look splendid, Mr Ryder. Please don't worry. Now' - he looked anxiously at his watch - 'I suggest we be on our way. Yes, this is just the right sort of time. Please.'

Outside the night was dark and the rain was coming down steadily. I followed Hoffman around the hotel building, down a path and into a small outdoor car park containing five or six vehicles. There was a solitary lamp fastened to a fence post by which I could make out the large puddles on the ground before me.

Hoffman ran across to a large black car and held open its passenger door. As I made my way towards it I could feel wetness seeping through my carpet slippers. Just as I was stepping into the car, one foot sank deep into a puddle, completely soaking it. I let out an exclamation but Hoffman was already hurrying around to the driver's side.

Hoffman drove us out of the car park as I did my best to dry my feet on the soft flooring. When I looked up we were already out in the main street and I was surprised to see how heavy the traffic had become. Moreover, many shops and restaurants had now come awake, and crowds of customers were milling about inside the illuminated windows. As we continued, the traffic grew steadily until somewhere near the heart of the city, amidst three lanes of vehicles, we came to a complete standstill. Hoffman looked at his watch then banged his hand against the wheel in frustration.

‘How unfortunate,’ I said sympathetically. ‘And when I was out only a little while ago, the whole town seemed to be asleep.’

He appeared very preoccupied and said absent-mindedly: ‘The traffic in this town, it just gets worse and worse. I don't know what the solution is.’ He banged the steering wheel again.

For the next few minutes, we sat in the car in silence as we edged slowly forwards. Then Hoffman said quietly:

‘Mr Ryder has been travelling.’

I thought I had misheard him, but then he said it again - this time with a suave little wave of his hand - and I realised he was rehearsing what he would say upon arrival to explain our lateness.

‘Mr Ryder has been travelling. Mr Ryder - has been travelling.’

As we proceeded through the dense night-time traffic, Hoffman continued occasionally to mutter things under his breath, most of which I failed to catch. He had gone into a world of his own and appeared to be growing increasingly tense. Once, after we had failed to reach a green light in time, I heard him mutter: 'No, no, Mr Brodsky! He was magnificent, a magnificent creature!'

Then at last we took a turning and found ourselves driving out of the city. Before long the buildings disappeared and we were travelling on a long road with dark open spaces - perhaps farmland - to either side. The traffic grew sparse enabling the powerful car to pick up speed. I could see Hoffman relaxing visibly, and when he next addressed me he had regained much of his usual urbane manner.

'Tell me, Mr Ryder. Is everything at the hotel to your satisfaction?'

'Oh yes. Everything's fine, thank you.'

'You're happy with your room?'

'Oh yes, yes.'

'Your bed. It's comfortable?'

'Very comfortable.'

'I ask because we do pride ourselves on our beds. We renew our mattresses at very frequent intervals. No other hotel in this town renews as many mattresses as we do. This I know for a fact. The mattresses we throw out would be considered serviceable for several further years by many of our so-called rivals. Did you know, Mr Ryder, that if one were to stand up, lengthways, end to end, all the used mattresses we throw out during five financial years, one would be able to make a line along our main street starting at the civic chambers, going right along to the fountain, round the corner of Sterngasse and as far down as Mr Winkler's pharmacy?'

‘Really. That’s most impressive.’

‘Mr Ryder, let me speak frankly. I’ve been giving much thought to the matter of your room. Naturally in the days leading to your arrival, I spent a long time considering which room to give you. Most hotels would have a simple answer to the question: “Which is the best room in the house?” But this is not the case in my hotel, Mr Ryder. Over the years, I’ve given so much individual attention to so many different rooms. There have even been times when I’ve become – ha ha! – some would say obsessed, yes, obsessed, with one room or another. Once I see the potential of a particular room, I spend many days thinking about it, and then I take the greatest care in having it renovated to match my vision as closely as possible. I am not always successful, but on a number of occasions the results, after much work, have come close to what I pictured in my head, and of course, that is very satisfying. But then – perhaps it’s some sort of defect in my nature – no sooner have I completed the renovation of one room to my satisfaction, I am seized by the potential of another. And before I know it, I find myself devoting great time and thought to the new project. Yes, some would call this obsessional, but I see nothing so wrong with it. Few things are as dull as a hotel with room after room completed along the same tired concepts. As far as I am concerned, each room must be thought about according to its own unique characteristics. In any case, what I’m getting at, Mr Ryder, is that I have no one favourite room in the hotel. So after a lot of thought, I concluded you’d be most happy in the room you are presently occupying. But having met you, I am now no longer certain.’

‘Oh no, Mr Hoffman,’ I said, interrupting. ‘The present room is fine.’

‘But I’ve been thinking about it on and off all day since meeting you, sir. It seems to me you’d be more temperamentally suited to another room I have in mind.’

Perhaps in the morning I'll show it to you. I'm quite sure you'll like it better.'

'No, Mr Hoffman, really. The present room ...'

'Let me be frank, Mr Ryder. Your coming has put the room you're now occupying under its first true test. You see, this is the first time I've had a truly distinguished guest in that room since its reconceptualisation four years ago. Of course, there was no way I could predict that you yourself would one day honour us. But the fact is, I worked on that room with someone very much like yourself in mind. What I'm trying to say, you see, is that it's only now, with your arrival, that it's been properly put to the use for which it was intended. And, well, I can see quite clearly that I made several crucial misjudgements four years ago. It's so difficult, even with my experience. No, without doubt I'm dissatisfied. It is not a happy match. My proposal to you, sir, is that we move you to 343, which I feel is much closer to your spirit. You'll feel much calmer there and sleep better. And as for your present room, well, I've been thinking about it on and off all day. I have a good mind to have it demolished in its present form.'

'Mr Hoffman, really, no!'

I had shouted this and Hoffman took his eyes off the road to stare at me in surprise. I laughed and, quickly recovering, said:

'What I meant was, please don't go to such trouble and expense on my account.'

'It would be for my own peace of mind, I assure you, Mr Ryder. My hotel is my life's work. I made a bad mistake concerning that room. I see nothing for it but demolition.'

'Mr Hoffman, that room ... The fact is, I feel a lot of affection for it. I really am very happy there.'

‘I don’t understand, sir.’ He seemed genuinely puzzled.

‘The room is clearly not correct for you. Now that I’ve met you, I can state that with some certainty. You don’t have to be so polite. I am surprised to find you so peculiarly attached to it.’

I gave a sudden laugh, perhaps an unnecessarily loud one.

‘Not at all. Peculiarly attached?’ – I gave another laugh – ‘It’s just a room, nothing more. If it needs to be demolished, then demolished it must be! I’ll gladly move to another room.’

‘Ah. I’m very pleased you see it that way. It would have been a source of great frustration to me, Mr Ryder, not simply during the rest of your stay, but throughout the years to come, to think that you once stayed at my hotel and were forced to endure such an unsuitable room. I really can’t think what could have been going on in my mind four years ago. A complete miscalculation!’

We had been speeding through the darkness for some time without encountering other headlights. Off in the distance I could see what may have been a few farmhouses, but otherwise there was little to break the empty blackness to either side. We travelled on in silence for a little while. Then Hoffman said:

‘This is a cruel stroke of luck, Mr Ryder. That dog, well, it wasn’t young, but it might easily have lasted another two or three years. And the preparations had been going so well.’ He shook his head. ‘It’s such bad timing.’ Then, turning to me with a smile, he went on: ‘But I’m confident. Yes, I’m confident. He won’t be deflected now, not even by something like this.’

‘Perhaps Mr Brodsky should be offered another dog as a sort of present. Perhaps a young puppy.’

I had said this without much thought, but Hoffman made a show of considering it respectfully.

‘I’m not sure, Mr Ryder. You must realise, he was extremely attached to Bruno. He kept little other company. He’ll be in a state of mourning. But you may be right, we must alleviate his loneliness now that Bruno has gone. Perhaps some other animal. Something soothing. A bird in a cage, say. Then in time, when he is ready, another dog could be introduced. I’m not sure.’

He fell silent for the next several minutes and I thought his mind had gone on to something else. But then suddenly, as he stared at the dark road unwinding before us, he muttered intensely under his breath:

‘An ox! Yes, an ox, an ox, an ox!’

But by this stage I was tired of the whole business of Brodsky’s dog and I leaned back in my seat without speaking, determined to relax for the remainder of the journey. At one point, in an attempt to find out something about the event to which we were travelling, I said to him: ‘I hope we shan’t be very late.’

‘No, no. Just right,’ Hoffman replied, but his mind seemed to be elsewhere. Then a few minutes later, I heard him mutter sharply once more: ‘An ox! An ox!’

After a while we turned off the open road and found ourselves in a salubrious residential district. I could see in the darkness large houses in their own grounds, often surrounded by high walls or hedges. Hoffman drove carefully around the leafy avenues, and I could hear him once more rehearsing his lines under his breath.

We passed through some tall iron gates into the courtyard of a substantial residence. There were already many vehicles parked around the grounds and it took the hotel manager a little while to find a space. He then got out and hurriedly went off towards the front entrance.

I remained in my seat a moment longer, studying the large house for clues concerning the occasion we were about to attend. The front comprised a long row of huge windows coming almost to the ground. Most of these were lit behind their curtains, but I could see nothing of what was going on within.

Hoffman rang the doorbell and gestured for me to join him. When I got out of the car, the rain had eased to a drizzle. I pulled my dressing gown close around me and walked towards the house, taking care to avoid the puddles.

The door was opened by a maid who showed us into an expansive hallway decorated with grand portraits. The maid appeared to know Hoffman and there was a quick exchange as she took his raincoat. Hoffman paused a moment to straighten his tie in the mirror, before leading the way deeper into the building.

We arrived at a vast room flooded with lights in which a reception was in full swing. There were at least a hundred people present, standing about in smart evening dress, holding glasses and exchanging conversation. As we stood at the threshold, Hoffman raised an arm in front of me as though to protect me and searched the room with his gaze.

‘He’s not here yet,’ he muttered eventually. Then, turning to me with a smile, he said: ‘Mr Brodsky isn’t here yet. But I’m confident, confident he’ll be here before long.’

Hoffman turned back to the room and for a second seemed at a loss. Then he said: ‘If you’d just wait here a moment, Mr Ryder, I’ll go and fetch the Countess. Oh, and if you wouldn’t mind standing a little way back over here – ha ha! – just out of sight. As you’ll remember, you’re supposed to be our big surprise. Please, I won’t be long.’

He went into the room and for a few moments I watched his figure moving about the guests, his worried demeanour in marked contrast to the merriment all around him. I saw a number of people try to speak to him, but each time Hoffman hurried on with a distracted smile. Eventually I lost sight of him and possibly drifted forward a little in my effort to locate him again. I must in any case have made myself conspicuous for I heard a voice next to me say: 'Ah, Mr Ryder, you've arrived. How delightful you're with us at last.'

A large woman of around sixty had placed her hand on my arm. I smiled and muttered some pleasantries, to which she said: 'Everyone here is so eager to meet you.' With that she began to lead me firmly into the heart of the gathering.

As I followed her, squeezing my way past the guests, the large woman began to ask me questions. At first these were the usual enquiries about my health and my journey. But then, as we continued to make our way around the room, she proceeded to quiz me with great thoroughness about the hotel. Indeed she went into such detail - did I approve of the soap? what did I make of the carpet in the lobby? - that I began to suspect she was some professional rival of Hoffman much peeved that I was staying at his establishment. However, her general attitude and the manner in which she regularly nodded and smiled at people as we passed left little doubt that she was the hostess of these proceedings, and I concluded that this was indeed the Countess herself.

I had assumed she was leading me either to a particular spot in the room or to a particular person, but after a while I got the distinct impression we were walking around in slow circles. In fact several times I felt certain we had already been in a part of the room at least twice before. The other thing I noticed with curiosity was that although heads would turn and greet my hostess she made no effort to introduce me to anyone. Moreover, although some people smiled politely at me from time to time, no one seemed especially interested in me. Certainly no one broke off a conversation on account of my passing by. I was somewhat puzzled by this, having steeled myself for the usual smotherings of questions and compliments.

Then after a while I noticed there was an odd quality to the whole atmosphere in the room - something forced, even theatrical about its conviviality - though I was unable immediately to put my finger on it. But then we finally came to a halt - the Countess falling into conversation with two women covered in jewellery - and I at last had the chance to look about me and gather some impressions. Only then did I realise that the occasion was not a cocktail party at all, but that in fact all these people were waiting to be called into dinner; that dinner should have been served at least two hours earlier, but that the Countess and her colleagues had been obliged to hold off its commencement due to the absences of both Brodsky - the official guest of honour - and myself - the evening's great surprise. Then, as I continued to cast my gaze about me, I began steadily to realise just what had taken place before our arrival.

The present occasion was the largest to date of the dinners given in Brodsky's honour. Being also the last before the crucial event on Thursday evening, it was never likely to have been a relaxed affair, and Brodsky's lateness had turned the tension up further. At first, though, the guests - all of them highly conscious of being the city's elite - had remained calm, everyone scrupulously avoiding any comment likely to be construed as casting doubt on Brodsky's dependability. Most, in fact, had managed not to mention Brodsky at all, relieving their anxiety simply by endless speculation over when dinner would be served.

Then had come the news concerning Brodsky's dog. How such news had come to be given out in so haphazard a manner was not clear. Possibly a phone call had come to the house and one of the civic leaders, in a misguided attempt to settle the atmosphere, had blurted it out to some guests. In any case, the consequences of allowing such a thing to spread mouth to mouth through a gathering already tense with worry and hunger was entirely predictable. Very soon, every sort of wild rumour had begun to circulate around the room. Brodsky had been discovered, utterly drunk, cradling his dog's corpse. Brodsky had been found lying in a puddle in the street outside, talking gibberish. Brodsky, overcome with grief, had tried to kill himself by drinking paraffin. This last story had had its origins in an incident several years earlier when indeed, during a drunken binge, Brodsky had been rushed to hospital by a neighbouring farmer after imbibing a quantity of paraffin - though whether he had done so in a bid to kill himself or simply out of drunken confusion had never been established. Before long, in the wake of these rumours, despairing talk had started up everywhere.

'That dog meant everything to him. The man will never get up from this. We have to face it, we're right back at square one.'

'We have to call off Thursday night. Call it off straight away. It can't be anything but a disaster now. If we let it go ahead, the people of this city will never give us a second chance.'

'That fellow was always too risky. We should never have let it get this far. But what do we do now? We're lost, hopelessly lost.'

Then, even as the Countess and her colleagues had sought to regain control of the evening, a burst of shouting had erupted from near the centre of the room.

Many people were rushing towards the incident, a few retreating in panic. What had occurred was that one of the younger councillors had pinned to the floor a tubby, bald-headed figure who after a moment everyone had recognised to be Keller the vet. The young councillor had been pulled off but had held onto Keller's lapel so tenaciously the vet had been pulled up with him.

'I did my best!' Keller was shouting, red in the face.

'I did my best! What more could I have done? Two days ago the animal was fine!'

‘Fraud!’ the young councillor had bellowed and attempted another assault. Again he had been pulled off, but by now a number of others, recognising a good scapegoat, had begun also to shout at Keller. For a moment accusations had rained down on the vet from all sides, charging him with negligence, and with jeopardising the future of the whole community. At this point a voice had shouted: ‘What about the Breuers’ kittens? You spend all your time playing bridge, you let those kittens die one by one ...’

‘I only play bridge once a week and even then ...’ the vet had started to protest hoarsely, but immediately more voices had shouted over him. Suddenly everyone in the room had seemed to have a long-borne grievance against the vet concerning some beloved animal or other. Then someone had shouted that Keller owed him money, another that Keller had never returned a gardening fork borrowed six years earlier. Soon the feelings against the vet had risen to such a pitch it had seemed quite natural that those restraining the young councillor should slacken their grip. And when the latter had made yet another lunge, he had seemed this time to do so on behalf of the great majority of those present. The situation had looked on the verge of turning quite unpleasant, when a voice booming across the room had at last brought everyone to their senses.

That the room had fallen silent as quickly as it had perhaps owed more to the astonishment caused by the speaker’s identity than to any natural authority he commanded. For the figure everyone had turned to see glaring down at them from the platform had been that of Jakob Kanitz, a man noted in the town principally for his timidity. Now in his late forties, Jakob Kanitz had for as long as anyone could remember held the same dull clerical post at the town hall. He was rarely known to venture an opinion, still less contradict or argue. He had no close friends and several years earlier had moved out of the small house he had shared with his wife and three children to rent a tiny attic room further down the same street. Whenever anyone had broached the matter, he had intimated he would very soon rejoin his family, but the years had gone by and his arrangements had not changed. Meanwhile, largely on account of his willingness to volunteer for the many mundane tasks around the organising of a cultural event, he had become an accepted, if somewhat patronised member of the town's artistic circles.

The room had had little time to get over its surprise before Jakob Kanitz - perhaps aware that his nerve would hold out for only so long - had begun to speak.

'Other cities! And I don't just mean Paris! Or Stuttgart! I mean smaller cities, no more than us, other cities. Gather together their best citizens, put a crisis like this before them, how would they be? They'd be calm, assured. Such people would know what to do, how to behave. What I'm saying to you, all of us here, we're the best of this town. It isn't beyond us. Together we can come through this crisis. Would they be fighting in Stuttgart?! There's no need for panic yet. No need to give up, to start quarrelling among ourselves. All right, the dog, it's a problem, but it's not the end, it doesn't mean anything yet. Whatever condition Mr Brodsky may be in at this moment, we can put him back on course again. We can do it, provided we all play our part tonight. I'm sure we can, we have to. Have to put him back on course. Because if we don't, if we don't pull together and get this right tonight, I tell you this, there's nothing left for us except misery! Yes, deep, lonely misery! There's no one else for us to turn to, it has to be Mr Brodsky, there's no one else now. He's probably on his way at this moment. We've got to stay calm. What are we doing, fighting? Would they fight in Stuttgart? We've got to think clearly. In his shoes, how would we feel? We must show we're all grieving with him, that the whole town shares his sorrow. Then again, friends, think about it, we must cheer him up. Oh yes! We can't spend the whole evening in gloom, send him away believing there's nothing left, he might as well go back to

... No, no! The right balance! We've got to be cheerful too, make him see there's so much more to life, that we're all looking to him, depending on him. Yes, we have to get it right, these next few hours. He's probably on his way now, God knows in what condition. These next few hours, they're crucial, crucial. We've got to do it right. Otherwise there's only misery. We must ... we must ...'

At this point Jakob Kanitz had become covered in confusion. He had remained standing there on the platform for several more seconds, not speaking, a huge embarrassment steadily engulfing him. Some residue of his earlier emotion had caused him to give one last glare to those assembled, then he had turned sheepishly and stepped down.

But this clumsy appeal had had an immediate impact. Even before Jakob Kanitz had finished speaking, a low assenting murmur had started up and more than one person had pushed reproachfully the shoulder of the young councillor - by this point shamefacedly shuffling his feet. Jakob Kanitz's departure from the stage had been followed by a few seconds of awkward silence. Then, steadily, conversation had broken out around the room, with everywhere people discussing in serious but calm tones what should be done once Brodsky arrived. Before long a consensus had emerged to the effect that Jakob Kanitz had got it more or less right. The task was to strike the correct balance between the sorrowful and the jovial. The atmosphere would have to be carefully monitored at all times by each and every person present. A feeling of resolution had gone around the room, and then, in time, people had begun gradually to relax, until eventually they were smiling, chatting, greeting one another in gracious, urbane tones, all as though the unseemly episodes of the last half-hour had not taken place. It had been somewhere around this point - no more than twenty minutes after Jakob Kanitz had finished speaking - that Hoffman and I had arrived. No wonder then that I should have detected something odd beneath the layer of refined merriment.

I was still turning over all that had happened prior to our arrival when I caught sight of Stephan on the other side of the room, talking to an elderly lady. Next to me, the Countess seemed still to be engrossed in her conversation with the two bejewelled women, and so, muttering an excuse under my breath, I drifted away from them. As I came towards him, Stephan saw me and smiled.

‘Ah, Mr Ryder. So you’ve arrived. I wonder if I might introduce you to Miss Collins.’

I then recognised the thin old lady to whose apartment we had driven earlier in the night. She was dressed simply but elegantly in a long black dress. She smiled and held out her hand as we exchanged greetings. I was about to make further polite conversation with her when Stephan leaned forward and said quietly:

‘I’ve been such a fool, Mr Ryder. Frankly I don’t know what’s for the best. Miss Collins has been very kind as usual, but I’d like also your opinion on it all.’

‘You mean ... about Mr Brodsky’s dog?’

‘Oh. No, no, that’s all awful, I realise that. But we were just discussing something else altogether. I really would appreciate your advice. In fact, Miss Collins was just now suggesting I seek you out, wasn’t that so, Miss Collins? You see, I hate to be a bore about this, but there’s been a complication. I mean, about my performance on Thursday night. God, I’ve been such a fool! As I told you, Mr Ryder, I’ve been preparing Jean-Louis La Roche’s Dahlia, but I never told Father about it. Not until tonight, that is. I’d been thinking I’d keep it a surprise for him, he so loves La Roche. What’s more, Father would never dream I was capable of mastering such a difficult piece, and so I thought it would be a tremendous surprise for him on both counts. But then just recently, with the big night so near now, I’d been thinking it wasn’t practical to keep it a secret any more. For one thing, it’s all got to be printed on the official programme, there's going to be a copy next to each napkin, Father's been agonising over the design, trying to decide about the embossments, the illustration on the back, everything. I realised a few days ago I'd have to tell him, but I still wanted it to be something of a surprise, so I was waiting for the right sort of moment to come along. Well, earlier on, just after I dropped you and Boris off, I went into his office to put back the car keys, and there he was on the floor, going through a pile of papers. On his hands and knees, all the papers round him on the carpet, nothing unusual about it, Father often works like that. It's quite a small office, and his desk takes up a lot of the space anyway, so I had to tiptoe around everything to put the keys back. He asked me how everything was, then before I'd said anything seemed to become engrossed in his papers again. Well, for some reason, just as I was leaving, I caught sight of him on the carpet like that and I suddenly felt it would be the right moment to tell him. It was just an impulse. So I said to him, quite casually: "By the way, Father, I'm going to play La Roche's Dahlia on Thursday night. I thought you'd like to know." I didn't say it in any special way, I just told him and waited to see his reaction. Well, he put aside the document he was reading, but he kept gazing at the carpet in front of him. Then a smile came over his face and he said something like: "Ah yes, Dahlia," and for a few seconds he looked very happy. He didn't look up, he was still on his hands and knees, but he looked very happy. Then he closed his eyes and started to hum the opening of the adagio, he started to hum it there on the floor, moving his head in time. He seemed so happy and tranquil, Mr Ryder, at that point I was congratulating myself. Then he opened his eyes and smiled dreamily up at me and said: "Yes, it's beautiful. I've never understood why your mother despises it so." As I was just telling Miss Collins, I thought at first I'd misheard him. But then he said it again. "Your mother despises it so much. Yes, as you know, she's come to despise La Roche's later work so intensely these days. She won't let me play his recordings anywhere in the house, not even with the headphones on.” Then he must have noticed how flabbergasted and upset I was. Because – typical Father! – he started straight away trying to make me feel better. “I should have asked you a long time ago,” he kept saying. “It’s all my fault.” Then he suddenly slapped his forehead like he’d just remembered something else and said: “Really, Stephan, I’ve let you both down. I thought at the time I was doing the right thing, not interfering, but I see now I’ve let you both down.” And when I asked what he meant, he explained how Mother’s been looking forward all this time to hearing me play Kazan’s Glass Passions. Apparently she’d let Father know some time ago this was what she wanted, and well, Mother would assume Father would arrange it all. But you see, Father saw my side to it. He’s very sensitive about such things. He realised that a musician – even an amateur like me – would want to make his own decision about such an important performance. So he’d not said anything to me, fully intending to explain it all to Mother when a chance came along. But then of course – well, I suppose I’d better explain it a bit more, Mr Ryder. You see, when I say Mother let Father know about the Kazan, I don’t mean she actually told him. It’s a little hard to explain to an outsider. The way it works is that Mother would somehow, you know, somehow just let it be known to Father without ever directly mentioning it. She’ll do it through signals, which to him would be very clear. I’m not sure precisely what she did this time. Perhaps he’d come home and found her listening to Glass Passions on the stereo. Well, since she very rarely puts anything on the stereo, that would be a pretty obvious sign. Or perhaps Father had come to bed after his bath and found her reading a book in bed on Kazan, I don’t know, it’s just the way things have always been done between them. Well, as you can see, it’s not as though Father could have suddenly said: “No, Stephan’s got to make his own choice.” Father was waiting, trying to find a suitable way of conveying his reply. And of course he wasn’t to know that, of all pieces, I was preparing La Roche’s Dahlia. God, I’ve been so stupid! I had no idea Mother hated it so! Well, he told me how things stood, and when I asked him what he considered the best course, he thought about it and said I ought to carry on with what I'd prepared, it was too late to change it now. "Mother wouldn't blame you," he kept saying.

"She wouldn't blame you for a moment. She'll blame me and quite rightly." Poor Father, he was trying so hard to comfort me, but I could see how distressed he was getting about it all. After a while he was looking at a spot on the carpet - he was still on the floor but by this time all crouched up, like he was doing a press-up - he was looking at the carpet and I could hear him muttering things to himself. "I'll be able to take it. I'll be able to take it. I've lived through worse. I'll be able to take it." He seemed to have forgotten I was there, so in the end I just left, just quietly closed the door behind me. And since then - well, Mr Ryder, I've not been thinking about much else all evening. To be frank, I'm at a bit of a loss. So little time left. And Glass Passions is such a difficult piece, how can I possibly have it ready? In fact, if I had to be honest, I'd say that piece is still a little beyond my ability, even if I had the whole year to prepare it.'

The young man came to a halt with a troubled sigh. When after a few moments neither he nor Miss Collins had spoken, I concluded he was waiting for my opinion. So I said:

'Of course, this is none of my business, you must decide for yourself. But my own feeling is that at this late stage you should just stick with what you've prepared ...'

'Yes, I suppose you would say that, Mr Ryder.'

It was Miss Collins who had broken in. There was an unexpected cynicism in her tone which made me stop and turn to her. The old lady was looking at me in a knowing, slightly superior manner. 'No doubt,' she went on, 'you'd call it - what? - ah yes, "artistic integrity".'

‘It’s not so much that, Miss Collins,’ I said. ‘It’s just that from a practical viewpoint, I’d think it rather too late at this stage ...’

‘But how do you know it’s too late, Mr Ryder?’ she interrupted again. ‘You know very little about Stephan’s abilities. To say nothing of the deeper implications of his current predicament. Why do you take it upon yourself to pronounce like this, as though you’re blessed with some extra sense the rest of us lack?’

I had been feeling increasingly uncomfortable since Miss Collins’s initial intervention, and while she was saying this I had found myself turning away in an effort to avoid her gaze. I could not think of any obvious retort to her questions and after a moment, deciding it best to cut short the encounter, I gave a small laugh and drifted off into the crowd.

For the next several minutes I found myself wandering aimlessly around the room. As earlier, people sometimes turned as I went by, but no one seemed to recognise me. At one point I saw Pedersen, the man I had met in the cinema, laughing with a few other guests and thought I would go over to him. But before I could do so I felt something touch my elbow and turned to find Hoffman beside me.

‘I’m sorry I had to leave you for a moment. I hope you’re being well looked after. What a situation!’

The hotel manager was breathing heavily, his face covered in perspiration.

‘Oh yes, I’ve been enjoying myself.’ ‘I’m sorry, I had to leave the room to take a phone call. But now they’re on their way, definitely, they’re on their way. Mr Brodsky will be here any minute. My goodness!’ He glanced around, then leaned closer and lowered his voice. ‘This guest list was ill-judged. I warned them. Some of these people here!’ He shook his head. ‘What a situation!’

‘But at least Mr Brodsky is on his way ...’

‘Oh yes, yes. I must say, Mr Ryder, I’m so relieved you’re with us tonight. Just when we need you. By and large, I see no reason to change your speech too much on account of the, er, the circumstances. Perhaps a mention or two of the tragedy wouldn’t go amiss, but we’ll organise someone else to say a few words about the dog, so really, there’s no need for you to deviate from what you’ve prepared. The only thing - ha ha! - your address shouldn’t be too long. But of course, you’re the last person to ...’ He trailed off with a small laugh. Then he was looking around the room again. ‘Some of these people,’ he said again. ‘Very ill-judged. I warned them.’

Hoffman went on casting his gaze around the room, and I was thus able for a moment to turn my mind to the matter of the speech the hotel manager had mentioned. After a while, I said:

‘Mr Hoffman, in view of the circumstances we now find ourselves in, I feel a little uncertain about when precisely I should get up and ...’

‘Ah, quite, quite. How sensitive of you. As you say, if you just stood up at the usual point, one never knows what might be ... yes, yes, how far-sighted of you. I shall be sitting next to Mr Brodsky, and so perhaps you might leave it to me to assess when the best moment would be. Perhaps you’d be good enough to wait for me to signal to you. My goodness, Mr Ryder, it’s so reassuring to have someone like you with us at a time like this.’

‘I’m only too pleased to be of help.’

A noise on the other side of the room caused Hoffman to turn away abruptly. He craned his neck to see across the room, though it seemed obvious nothing of significance had occurred. I gave a cough to regain his attention.

‘Mr Hoffman, there’s just one other small matter. I was just wondering’ - I indicated my dressing gown - ‘I thought I might change into something a little more formal. I wondered if it was possible to borrow some clothes. Nothing special.’

Hoffman glanced distractedly at my attire, then almost immediately looked away again, saying absent-mindedly: ‘Oh, don’t worry, Mr Ryder. We’re not at all stuffy here.’

He was craning his neck once more to see across the room. It seemed to me clear he had not taken on board at all my problem and I was about to raise the matter again when there was a flurry of activity near the entrance. Hoffman started, then turned to me with a ghastly smile. ‘He’s here!’ he whispered, touched me on the shoulder and hurried off.

A hush fell across the room, and for a few seconds everyone was looking towards the door. I too tried to see what was going on, but found my view hopelessly obstructed. Then suddenly, as though remembering their resolve, people all around me were resuming their conversations in tones of controlled gaiety.

I made my way through the crowd until eventually I managed to see Brodsky being led across the room. The Countess was supporting one arm, Hoffman the other, and four or five others were fluttering anxiously nearby. Brodsky, evidently oblivious of his attendants, was gazing darkly up at the room’s ornate ceiling. He was taller, more upright than I had expected, though at this moment he was carrying himself with such stiffness - and at an oddly sloping angle - that from a distance it seemed his entourage were rolling him along on castors. He was unshaven, but not outrageously so, and his dinner jacket was slightly askew as though it had been put on him by someone else. His features, though coarsened and aged, had a trace left about them of the debonair.

For an instant I thought they were leading him to me, but then realised they were heading for the adjoining dining room. A waiter standing at the threshold ushered through Brodsky and his attendants and as they disappeared another hush fell on the room. Before long, the guests resumed their talking again, but I could sense a new tension in the air.

I noticed at this point a solitary upright chair left against a wall and it occurred to me that a fresh vantage point might better enable me to assess the prevailing mood and decide on the most appropriate sort of talk to give at dinner. I thus walked over, seated myself and for several minutes sat watching the room.

The guests were still laughing and talking, but there was no doubt the underlying tension was increasing. In view of this, and in view of the fact that someone else would be speaking specifically about the dog, it seemed wise that I make my talk as light-hearted as was reasonable. In the end I decided the best thing might be to recount some amusing behind-the-scenes anecdotes concerning a series of mishaps that had beset my last Italian tour. I had told these stories in public often enough to be quite confident of their ability to defuse tensions and felt sure they would be much appreciated in the present circumstances.

I was testing out to myself a few possible opening lines when I noticed the crowd had thinned considerably. Only then did I realise people were steadily going through into the dining room and rose to my feet.

A few people smiled vaguely at me as I joined the procession into dinner, but no one spoke to me. I did not really mind this, since I was still trying to shape in my mind a really captivating opening statement. As I moved closer to the dining-room doors, I found myself undecided between two possibilities. The first was: 'My name over the years has tended to be associated with certain qualities. A meticulous attention to detail. Precision in performance. The tight control of dynamics.’ This mock-pompous start could then be rapidly undercut by the hilarious revelations of what had actually occurred in Rome. The alternative was to strike a more obviously farcical note from the start: ‘Collapsing curtain rails. Poisoned rodents. Misprinted score sheets. Few of you, I trust, would readily associate my name with such phenomena.’ Both openings had their pros and cons and in the end I decided against making a final choice until I had gained a better sense of the mood over dinner.

I entered the dining room, people talking excitedly all around me. Immediately I was struck by its vastness. Even with the present company - well over a hundred - I could see why it had been necessary to illuminate only one part of the room. A generous number of round tables had been laid with white tablecloths and silver, but there seemed to be just as many others, bare and without seating, disappearing in rows into the darkness on the far side. Many guests were already seated and the overall picture - the gleam of the ladies’ jewellery, the crisp whiteness of the waiters’ jackets, the backdrop of black dinner suits and the darkness beyond - was not unimpressive. I was surveying the scene from just inside the doorway, taking the opportunity to straighten my dressing gown, when the Countess appeared at my side. She began to lead me by the arm, much as she had done earlier, saying:

‘Mr Ryder, we’ve placed you at this table over here where you won’t be quite so conspicuous. We don’t want people spotting you and spoiling the surprise! But don’t worry, once we announce your presence and you stand up, you’ll be perfectly visible and audible to everyone.’

Although the table she led me to was in a corner, I could not see why it was particularly more discreet than any of the others. She seated me, then, saying something with a laugh - I could not hear her in the hubbub - hurried away.

I found I was sitting with four others - one middle-aged couple, another slightly younger - who all smiled routinely towards me before resuming their conversation. The husband of the older couple was explaining why their son wished to continue living in the United States, and then the conversation moved on to the couple's various other children. Occasionally one or the other of them remembered to include me in a nominal sort of way - by looking in my direction or, if a joke was made, by smiling at me. But none of them addressed me directly and I soon gave up trying to follow.

But then, as the waiters began to serve the soup, I noticed that their conversation had become sparse and distracted. Finally, somewhere during the main course, my companions seemed to drop all pretences and began to discuss the real matter preoccupying them. Casting barely disguised glances towards where Brodsky was seated, they exchanged speculations in lowered tones concerning the old man's present condition. At one point the younger of the women said:

'Surely, somebody should go up there and tell him how sorry we feel. We should all be going up there. No one seems to have said a word to him yet. Look, the people with him, they're hardly talking to him. Perhaps we should go up, we should start it off. Then everyone else might follow. Perhaps everyone's waiting, just like us.'

The others hastened to reassure her that our hosts had everything under control, that in any case Brodsky looked to be very well, but then the next minute they also were looking uneasily across the room.

Naturally I too had been taking the opportunity to observe Brodsky quite carefully. He had been placed at a table a little larger than the rest. Hoffman was to one side of him, the Countess on the other. The rest of his company comprised a ring of solemn grey-haired men. The way these latter seemed continuously to be conferring under their breaths gave the table a conspiratorial air hardly helpful to the general atmosphere. As for Brodsky himself, he was showing no obvious sign of drunkenness and was eating steadily, if without enthusiasm. He nevertheless seemed to have retreated into a world of his own. For much of the main course, Hoffman had an arm behind Brodsky's back and appeared constantly to be murmuring into his ear, but the old man went on staring gloomily into space without responding. Once when the Countess touched his arm and said something, he again failed to reply.

Then towards the end of dessert - the food, if not spectacular, had been satisfying - I saw Hoffman making his way across the floor past the hurrying waiters and realised he was coming towards me. Arriving, he bent down and said in my ear:

'Mr Brodsky seems to wish to say a few words, but quite frankly - ha ha! - we've been trying to persuade him against doing so. We believe he shouldn't be put under any extra strain tonight. So, Mr Ryder, perhaps you would be good enough to watch carefully for my signal and rise promptly as soon as I give it. Then immediately you finish speaking, the Countess will bring the formal part of the proceedings to an end. Yes, really, we think it best Mr Brodsky isn't put under any extra strain. Poor man, ha ha! This guest list, really' - he shook his head and sighed - 'thank goodness you're here, Mr Ryder.'

Before I could say anything, he was dodging through the waiters again, hurrying back to his table.

I spent the next several minutes surveying the room and weighing up the two possible openings I had prepared for my speech. I was still prevaricating when the noise in the room suddenly subsided. I then became aware that a severe-faced man who had been sitting next to the Countess had risen to his feet.

The man was quite elderly and silver-haired. He exuded authority and almost immediately there was complete silence in the room. For a few more seconds the severe-faced man simply looked at the assembled guests with an air of reprimand. Then he said in a voice at once restrained and resonant:

‘Sir. When such a fine, noble companion passes away, there is little, so little others can say that does not seem empty and shallow. Nevertheless, we could not possibly let this evening go by without a few formal words on behalf of everyone in this room, to convey to you, Mr Brodsky, the deep sympathy we feel for you.’ He paused while a murmur of assent went around the room. Then he continued: ‘Your Bruno, sir, was not only much loved by those of us who saw him going about his business around our town. He came to achieve a status rare among human beings, let alone among our quadrupeds. That is to say, he became an emblem. Yes, sir, he came to exemplify for us certain key virtues. A fierce loyalty. A fearless passion for life. A refusal to be looked down upon. An urge to do things in one’s own special way, however seemingly outlandish to the eyes of grander observers. That is to say, the very virtues that have gone to build this unique and proud community of ours over the years. Virtues, sir, which if I may venture’ – his voice slowed with significance – ‘we hope very soon to see flower here again in every walk of life.’

He paused and looked around once more. He continued to hold the audience in his frosty gaze for another moment, then said finally:

‘Let us now, together, observe a minute’s silence in memory of our departed friend.’

As he lowered his eyes, people everywhere bowed their heads and complete silence reigned once more. At one point I looked up and noticed that some of the civic leaders on Brodsky’s table – perhaps in their anxiety to set a good example - had adopted ludicrously exaggerated postures of grief. One of them, for instance, was clutching his forehead in both hands. For his part, Brodsky - who had remained immobile throughout the speech, not looking up once either at the speaker or the room in general - continued to sit quite still, and there was again something odd-angled about his whole posture. It was even possible he had fallen asleep in his chair and that the function of Hoffman's arm behind his back was primarily physical.

At the end of the minute, the severe-faced man sat down without speaking further, creating an awkward hiatus in the proceedings. A few people began cautiously to converse again, but then there came a movement from another table and I saw that a large balding man with blotchy skin had stood up.

'Ladies and gentlemen,' he said in a powerful voice. Then, turning to Brodsky, he bowed slightly and muttered: 'Sir.' He looked down at his hands for a few seconds, then gazed around the room. 'As many of you will already know, it was I who found the body of our beloved friend earlier this evening. I hope then that you will indulge me for a few moments while I say a few words concerning ... concerning what took place. For you see, sir' - he looked again at Brodsky - 'the fact is, I must beg your forgiveness. Let me explain myself.' The large man paused and swallowed. 'This evening, as usual, I was making my deliveries. I had almost finished by then, I had just two or three calls left to make, and I took a short cut down the alley running between the railway line and Schildstrasse. I would not normally take such a short cut, particularly after dark, but today I was earlier than usual, and as you know, there was a pleasant sunset. So I took the short cut. And there, at just about the half-way point along the alley, I saw him. Our dear friend. He had placed himself in a discreet position, virtually hidden between the lamp-post and the wooden fence. I knelt beside him to make sure that he had indeed passed on. As I did so, many thoughts went through my mind. I thought, naturally, of you, sir. Of what a great friend he had always been to you, and what a tragic loss this would be. I thought too of how much the city at large would miss Bruno, how it would join you in your hour of grieving. And let me say it, sir, I felt, for all the sorrow of the moment, that fate had handed me a privilege. Yes, sir, a privilege. It had fallen to me to transport the body of our friend to the veterinary clinic. Then, sir, for what happened next, I ... I have no excuse. Just now, as Mr von Winterstein was speaking, I was sitting here tormented by indecision. Should I too stand up now and speak? In the end, as you see, I decided that yes, I would. Much better that Mr Brodsky hears it from my own lips than as gossip in the morning. Sir, I am bitterly ashamed of what took place next. I can only say that I had no intention, not in a hundred years ... I can now only beg your forgiveness. I have gone over it in my head many times in the last few hours and I see now what I should have done. I should have put down my packages. You see, I was still carrying two of them, the last of my deliveries. I should have put them down. They would have been safe enough in the alley, tucked in next to the fence. And even if someone had made off with them, what of it? But for some foolish reason, some idiotic professional instinct perhaps, I did not. I did not think. That is to say, as I lifted up Bruno's body, I was still clinging to the packages. I don't know what I expected. But the fact is - you will learn of this tomorrow, so I will tell you now myself - the fact is your Bruno must have been there for some time, for his body, magnificent though it was in death, had become cold and, well, it had stiffened. Yes, sir, stiffened. Forgive me, what I have to say now may bring you distress, but ... but let me continue. In order to carry my packages - how I regret it, a thousand times I've regretted it already - in order to continue carrying my packages, I hoisted Bruno high up onto my shoulder, not taking into account his stiffened condition. Only when I had gone most of the way down the alley in this manner did I hear a child's shout from somewhere and stop. Then of course the enormity of my error dawned on me. Ladies and gentlemen, Mr Brodsky, need I spell it out to you? I see I must. The fact was this. On account of our friend's stiffness, on account of the foolish way I had chosen to transport him up on my shoulder, that is to say, in a virtually upright position ... Well, the point is, sir, from any of the houses in Schildstrasse the whole upper part of his body would have been visible over the top of the fence. In fact, cruelty upon cruelty, it was just that time of the evening when most households were gathered in their back rooms for their evening meals. They would have been gazing at their gardens as they ate and would have seen our noble friend gliding past, his paws thrust in front of him - ah, the indignity of it! Household after household! I have become haunted by it, sir, I can see it before me, how it must have looked. Forgive me, sir, forgive me, I could not remain sitting here a moment longer without unburdening myself of this ... this testimony to my bungling nature. What a misfortune that this sorrowful privilege should have fallen to a clod such as myself! Mr Brodsky, please, I beg you to accept these hopelessly inadequate apologies for the humiliation to which I subjected your noble companion so soon after his moment of departure. And the good people of Schildstrasse, perhaps some of them are here now, they like everyone else would have been deeply fond of Bruno. To have glimpsed him for the last time in such a manner ... I beg you, sir, everyone, I beg you, I beg your forgiveness. '

The large man sat down, shaking his head mournfully. Then a woman at a table near him rose, touching her eyes with a handkerchief.

'Surely there's no doubt about it,' she said. 'He was the greatest dog of his generation. Surely there's no doubt about it.'

A murmur of agreement went around the room. The civic leaders around Brodsky were nodding earnestly, but Brodsky himself still had not looked up.

We waited for the woman to say something more, but although she remained on her feet, she said nothing, merely continuing to sob and dab at her eyes. After a while a man in a velvet dinner jacket beside her rose and gently helped her back into her chair. He himself remained on his feet, however, and glared accusingly around the room. Then he said:

‘A statue. A bronze statue. I propose we build a bronze statue to Bruno so that we can remember him for ever. Something big and dignified. Perhaps in Walserstrasse. Mr von Winterstein’ - he addressed the severe-faced man - ‘let us resolve here, this evening, to build a statue to Bruno!’

Someone called out ‘hear, hear’ and a clamour of voices rose up expressing approval. Not only the severe-faced man, but all the civic leaders at Brodsky’s table looked suddenly confused. Several panicky glances were exchanged before the severe-faced man said without rising:

‘Of course, Mr Haller, it’s something we would consider very carefully. Along of course with other ideas as to how we might best commemorate ...’

‘This is going too far,’ a man’s voice suddenly interrupted from the other end of the room. ‘What an absurd idea. A statue for that dog? If that animal deserves a bronze statue, then our tortoise, Petra, she deserves one five times as big. And she met such a cruel end. It’s absurd. And that dog attacked Mrs Rahn only earlier this year ...’

The rest of this statement was drowned out by uproar all around the room. For a moment everyone seemed to be shouting at once. The man who had spoken, still on his feet, now turned to someone at his own table and began a furious argument. In the growing chaos, I became aware that Hoffman was waving across at me. Or rather, he was describing with his hand an odd circular motion - as though he were wiping an invisible window - and I recalled vaguely that this was some form of signal favoured by him. I rose to my feet and cleared my throat emphatically.

The room almost immediately fell silent and all eyes turned to me. The man who had objected to the statue broke off his argument and hurriedly took his seat. I cleared my throat a second time and was about to embark on my talk when I suddenly became aware that my dressing gown was hanging open, displaying the entire naked front of my body. Thrown into confusion, I hesitated for a second then sat back down again. Almost immediately, a woman stood up across the room and said stridently:

‘If a statue isn’t practical, then why not name a street after him? We’ve often changed street names to commemorate the dead. Surely, Mr von Winterstein, this isn’t too much to ask. Perhaps Meinhardstrasse. Or even Jahnstrasse.’

A chorus of approval went up for this idea and soon people were calling out all at once the names of other possible streets. The civic leaders were again looking profoundly uncomfortable.

A tall bearded man at a table near mine stood up and said in a booming voice: ‘I agree with Mr Holländer. This is going too far. Of course, we all feel sorry for Mr Brodsky. But let’s be honest, that dog was a menace, to other dogs and to humans alike. And if Mr Brodsky had thought to comb the creature’s fur from time to time, and treat him for the skin infection it obviously had for years ...’

The man was engulfed by a storm of angry protests. There were shouts of ‘Disgraceful!’ and ‘Shame!’ everywhere, and several people left their tables in order to lecture the offender. Hoffman was again signalling to me, wiping the air furiously, a horrible grin on his face. I could hear the bearded man’s voice booming over the mayhem: ‘It’s true. The creature was a disgusting mess!’

I checked that my gown was fastened tightly and was about to stand up again, when I saw Brodsky suddenly stir and rise to his feet.

The table made a noise as he rose and all heads turned towards him. In an instant, those who had left their seats had returned and silence reigned in the room once more.

For a second I thought Brodsky would crash across the table. But he maintained his balance, surveying the room for a moment. When he spoke his voice had a gentle huskiness about it.

‘Look, what is this?’ he said. ‘You think that dog was so important to me? He’s dead and that’s it. I want a woman. It gets lonely sometimes. I want a woman.’ He paused and for a while seemed to become lost in his thoughts. Then he said dreamily: ‘Our sailors. Our drunken sailors. What would have become of them now? She was young then. Young and so beautiful.’ He drifted back into his thoughts, gazing up at the lights suspended from the high ceiling, and for a second time I thought he might crash forward across the table. Hoffman must have feared something similar for he stood up and, placing a gentle hand behind Brodsky’s back, whispered something in his ear. Brodsky did not immediately respond. Then he muttered: ‘She loved me once. Loved me more than anything. Our drunken sailors. Where are they now?’

Hoffman gave a hearty laugh as though Brodsky had made a witticism. He smiled broadly at the room then whispered again in Brodsky’s ear. Brodsky finally seemed to recall where he was and, turning vaguely to the hotel manager, allowed himself to be coaxed back down into his chair.

There followed a silence during which no one stirred. Then the Countess stood up with a vivacious smile.

‘Ladies and gentlemen, at this point in the evening, we have a lovely surprise! He arrived only this afternoon, he must be very tired indeed, but he has consented nevertheless to be our surprise guest. Yes, everyone! Mr Ryder is here among us!’

The Countess made a flourishing gesture in my direction as excited exclamations broke out across the room. Before I could do anything, the people at my table had quickly engulfed me and were trying to shake my hand. The next instant I was aware of people all round me, gasping with pleasure, greeting me and holding out their hands. I responded to these advances as courteously as I could, but when I glanced over my shoulder - I had not had a chance to get up off my chair - I could see a crowd gathering at my back with many people pushing and standing on tip-toes. I saw I would have to take control of the situation before it disintegrated into chaos. With so many already on their feet, I decided the best course would be to elevate myself above them on some pedestal. Quickly ensuring my dressing gown was fastened, I clambered up onto my chair.

The clamour ceased instantly, people freezing where they stood to stare up at me. From my new vantage point I saw that over half the guests had left their tables and I decided to begin without delay.

‘Collapsing curtain rails! Poisoned rodents! Misprinted score sheets!’

I became aware of a single figure walking towards me through the stationary clusters of people. On arrival, Miss Collins pulled towards her a chair from the neighbouring table, sat down and proceeded to gaze up at me. Something about the way she did so distracted me sufficiently that for a moment I could not think of my next line. Seeing me hesitate, she crossed one leg over the other and said in a concerned voice:

‘Mr Ryder, are you feeling unwell?’

‘I’m fine, thank you, Miss Collins.’

‘I do hope,’ she went on, ‘you didn’t take too much to heart what I said to you earlier. I wanted to come and find you to apologise, but I couldn’t see you anywhere. I may have spoken much more abrasively than was called for. I do hope you'll forgive me. It's just that even now, when I come upon someone of your calling, things suddenly come back to me and I find myself adopting that sort of tone.'

'It's quite all right, Miss Collins,' I said quietly, smiling down at her. 'Please don't worry. I wasn't really upset at all. If I walked away rather abruptly, it was just that I thought you might want the opportunity to talk unhindered with Stephan.'

'It's good of you to be so understanding,' Miss Collins said. 'I am sorry I got a little angry. But you must believe me, Mr Ryder, it wasn't just anger on my part. I do quite honestly wish to be of some help to you. It would greatly sadden me to see you making the same mistakes over and over. I wanted to say to you, now that we've met, you'd be very welcome to visit me for tea some afternoon. I'd be more than happy to talk over whatever happens to be on your mind. You'd have a sympathetic ear, I can assure you.'

'That's good of you, Miss Collins. I'm sure it's well meant. But if I may say so, it would seem your past experiences have left you less than well-disposed towards, as you yourself put it, those of my calling. I'm not at all sure you would enjoy having me visit you.'

Miss Collins appeared to give this some thought. Then she said: 'I can appreciate your misgivings. But I feel it would be perfectly possible for us to get on in a civil way. If you like it need only be a short visit. If you found you enjoyed it then you could always come back. Perhaps we could even go for a short walk. The Sternberg Garden is very close to my apartment. Mr Ryder, I've had many years to reflect on the past and I really am ready to put it behind me. I would very much like once more to lend a hand to someone such as yourself. Of course, I can't promise I'll have answers to every question. But I'll listen to you with sympathy. And you can be sure, I won't idealise or sentimentalise you in the way a less experienced person might. '

'I'll think carefully about your invitation, Miss Collins,' I said to her. 'But I can't help thinking you've mistaken me for someone I clearly am not. I say this because the world seems full of people claiming to be geniuses of one sort or another, who are in fact remarkable only for a colossal inability to organise their lives. But for some reason there's always a queue of people like yourself, Miss Collins - very well-meaning people - eager to rush to the rescue of these types. Perhaps I flatter myself, but I can tell you, I am not one of their number. In fact, I can say with confidence that at this point in time, I'm not in any need of rescuing. '

Miss Collins had been shaking her head for some time. Now she said: 'Mr Ryder, it really would be a great sadness to me if you were to continue making your mistakes over and over. And to think that all the time, I was here, simply watching you and doing nothing. I really do think I might be of some help to you in your present plight. Of course, when I was with Leo' - she waved a hand vaguely towards Brodsky -

'I was too young, I didn't know nearly enough, I couldn't really see it, what was going on. But now I've had many years to think about everything. And when I heard you were coming to our town, I told myself it really was time I learnt to contain the bitterness. I've grown old, but I'm far from done yet. There are certain things in life I've come to understand well, very well, and it's not too late, I should try and put it to some use. It's in this spirit I'm inviting you to visit me, Mr Ryder. I apologise again for being a little short with you earlier when we met. It won't happen again, I promise. Please, do say you'll come. '

As she was speaking, the image of her drawing room - the low cosy light, the worn velvet drapes, the crumbling furniture - had drifted before me, and for a brief moment the thought of reclining on one of her couches, far from the pressures of life, seemed peculiarly enticing. I took a deep breath and sighed.

‘I’ll bear your kind invitation in mind, Miss Collins,’ I said. ‘But for now, I’ll have to go to bed and get some rest. You must appreciate, I’ve been travelling for months, and since arriving here I’ve hardly had a moment’s pause. I’m extremely tired.’

As I said this, all my tiredness came back to me. The skin under my eyes felt itchy and I rubbed my face with the palm of my hand. I was still rubbing at my face when I felt a touch on my elbow and a voice said gently:

‘I’ll walk back with you, Mr Ryder.’

Stephan was reaching up to help me off the chair. I leant a hand on his shoulder and climbed down.

‘I’m very tired now too,’ Stephan said. ‘I’ll walk back with you.’

‘Walk back?’

‘Yes, I’m going to sleep in one of the rooms tonight. I often do that if I’m on duty early in the morning.’

For a moment his words continued to puzzle me. Then, as I looked past the clusters of standing and seated dinner guests, past the waiters and the tables, to where the vast room disappeared into darkness, it suddenly dawned on me that we were in the atrium of the hotel. I had not recognised it because earlier in the day I had entered it – and had viewed it – from the opposite end. Somewhere in the darkness on the far side would be the bar where I had drunk my coffee and planned the day ahead.

I had no chance to dwell on this realisation, however, for Stephan was leading me away with surprising insistence.

‘Let’s be getting back, Mr Ryder. Besides, there’s something I wanted to speak to you about.’

‘Good night, Mr Ryder,’ Miss Collins called as we strode past.

I glanced back to wish her good night, and would have done so in a less cursory manner had Stephan not continued to lead me away. Indeed, as we made our way across the floor, I could hear people wishing me good night on all sides, and although I smiled and waved as best I could, I was conscious I was not making as gracious an exit as I might. But Stephan was clearly preoccupied and, even while I was still returning good nights over my shoulder, he tugged at my arm and said:

‘Mr Ryder, I’ve been thinking. Perhaps I’m just getting above myself now, but I really think I ought to try the Kazan. I’ve remembered your advice earlier, just to stick to what I’ve prepared. But really, I’ve been thinking and I feel I might be able to conquer Glass Passions. It’s within my capabilities now, I really believe that. The real problem is time. But if I really go at it, really work at it, at night and everything, I think I might be able to do it.’

We had entered the darkened section of the atrium. Stephan’s heels echoed in the emptiness, the flip-flopping of my slippers marking a counterpoint. I could make out in the gloom, somewhere to our right, the pale marble of the large fountain, now silent and still.

‘This is none of my business, I know,’ I said. ‘But in your position I would just carry on with what you were originally going to play. It’s what you’ve chosen and that should be good enough. Anyway, in my opinion, it’s always a mistake to change a programme at the eleventh hour ...’

‘But Mr Ryder, you don’t quite understand. It’s Mother. She ...’

‘I’m aware of everything you told me earlier. And as I say, I don’t wish to interfere. But with respect, I think there comes a point in one’s life when one must stand by one’s decisions. A time to say: “This is me, this is what I’ve chosen to do.” ’

‘Mr Ryder, I appreciate what you’re saying. But I think perhaps you’re only saying it - I know you’re advising me with the best of intentions - but I think you’re only saying what you’re saying because you don’t believe an amateur like me could possibly give a decent rendering of the Kazan, particularly with the limited time I have left. But you see, I was thinking hard about it all through dinner, and I really believe ...’

‘Really, you miss my point,’ I said, feeling a touch of impatience with him. ‘You really miss my point. What I’m saying is you have to make a stand.’

But the young man seemed not to be listening. ‘Mr Ryder,’ he went on, ‘I realise it’s awfully late and you’re getting tired. But I wondered. If you could just give me a few minutes, even fifteen minutes, say. We could go now to the drawing room and I could play you a snatch of the Kazan, not all of it, just a snatch. Then you could advise me whether I have any chance at all of coming up with the goods by Thursday night. Oh, excuse me.’

We had reached the far end of the atrium and we paused in the dark while Stephan unlocked the doors leading out to the corridor. I glanced back and the area where we had been dining looked hardly more than a small illuminated pool in the darkness. The guests seemed to be seated again, and I could see the figures of the waiters milling around with their trays.

The corridor was very dimly lit. Stephan locked behind us the doors to the atrium and we made our way side by side, not talking. After a while, when the young man had glanced towards me a few times, it occurred to me he was waiting for my decision. I gave a sigh, saying:

‘I’d certainly like to help you. I have much sympathy for you in your present situation. It’s just that it’s got so late now and ...’

‘Mr Ryder, I realise you’re getting tired. May I make a suggestion? What if I were to go into the drawing room by myself and you could stand outside the door and listen. Then as soon as you’d heard enough to form your opinion, you could go quietly off to bed. Of course, I won’t know if you’re still standing out there or not, so I’ll have every incentive to perform to my utmost right to the end – which is just what I need. You could tell me in the morning whether I have any chance at all for Thursday night.’

I thought about this. ‘Very well,’ I said eventually. ‘Your proposal strikes me as very reasonable. It serves both our needs very conveniently. Very well, we’ll do as you say.’

‘Mr Ryder, that’s jolly good of you. You’ve no idea what a help this is to me. I’ve been in such a quandary.’

In his excitement, the young man increased his pace. The corridor turned the corner and became very dark, so much so that as we hurried down it I had more than once to put my hand out for fear of veering into one or the other wall. Apart from at its very end, where some light was coming in from the glazed doors leading to the hotel lobby, there appeared to be no lighting whatsoever. I was making a mental note to raise the matter with Hoffman the next time I saw him when Stephan said: ‘Ah, here we are,’ and came to a halt. I then became aware we were standing by the drawing-room doors.

Stephan jingled about with more keys, and when the doors eventually opened I could see nothing beyond them except blackness. But the young man stepped eagerly into the room, then peeked his head back out into the corridor.

‘If you could give me just a few seconds to find the score,’ he said. ‘It’s somewhere in the piano stool, but everything’s such a mess in there.’

‘Don’t worry, I won’t go until I’ve formed a clear opinion.’

‘Mr Ryder, this is so good of you. Well, I won’t be a second.’

The doors closed with a rattle and for a few minutes there was silence. I remained standing in the darkness, glancing now and then to the end of the corridor and the light from the lobby.

Then at last Stephan commenced the opening movement of Glass Passions. After the first few bars, I found myself listening more and more intently. It was clear at once the young man was far from familiar with the piece, and yet, beneath the uncertainty and stiffness, I could discern an imagination of an originality and emotional subtlety that quite surprised me. Even in its present rough form, the young man’s reading of Kazan seemed to present certain dimensions never glimpsed in the great majority of interpretations.

I leaned forward closer to the doors, straining to catch his every hesitant nuance. But then, towards the end of the movement, fatigue suddenly engulfed me and I remembered how late it was. It occurred to me there was no real need to hear any more – given adequate time, the Kazan was very obviously within his capabilities – and I began to walk slowly away in the direction of the lobby.

II

I was woken by the ringing of the telephone on the bedside cabinet. My first thought was that I had again been disturbed after only a few minutes, but then I saw from the light that it was now well into the morning. I picked up the receiver, seized by a sudden concern that I had overslept.

‘Ah, Mr Ryder,’ Hoffman’s voice said. ‘You slept well, I hope.’

‘Thank you, Mr Hoffman, I slept very well. But of course I was just now in the process of getting up. With such a busy day in front of me’ - I gave a laugh - ‘it’s high time I was making a start.’

‘Indeed, sir, and what a day you have before you! I can well understand your wish to conserve your energy as much as possible at this point of the morning. Very wise, if I may say so. And particularly after giving us so much of yourself last night. Ah, that was such a marvellously witty address! The whole town is talking of nothing else this morning! In any case, Mr Ryder, since I knew you would be rising about this time I thought I might call you and let you know the situation. I am happy to inform you that 343 is now fully prepared. May I suggest you commence your occupancy of it immediately? Your belongings, if you have no objection, will be transferred while you are having your breakfast. 343, I know, will be so much more satisfactory than your present room. I do apologise once again for this mistake. It grieves me that it was made. But as I think I explained last night, it can sometimes be very hard to gauge these things.’

‘Yes, yes, I quite understand.’ I looked around the room and felt a desperate sadness starting to engulf me.

‘But Mr Hoffman’ - with an effort I brought my voice under control - 'there's a slight complication. My boy, Boris, he's now here with me at this hotel and ...'

'Ah yes, and very welcome the young man is too. I've looked into the matter and he has been transferred to 342 adjoining you. In fact, Gustav saw to the young man's move earlier this morning. So you've nothing at all to worry about. Please, then, return to 343 after breakfast. You'll find all your belongings there. It's just one floor up from where you are now, I'm confident you'll find it much more to your taste. But of course if you're unhappy with it, please let me know immediately.'

I thanked him and replaced the receiver. I then climbed out of bed, looked around me again and took a deep breath. In the morning light my room did not look anything so special - just a typical hotel room - and it occurred to me that I was indeed displaying an unseemly attachment to it. Nevertheless, as I showered and dressed, I found myself growing increasingly emotional again. Then suddenly the thought came to me that before going down to breakfast, before anything, I should go and check that all was well with Boris. For all I knew, he was at this moment sitting alone in his new room in a state of some disorientation. I quickly finished dressing and, taking one last look behind me, went out of the room.

I was going along the corridor of the third floor searching for 342 when I heard a noise and saw Boris running towards me from the far end. He was running in a curious manner and I stopped in my tracks at the sight of him. Then I saw he was making steering motions with his hands and guessed he was impersonating someone in a speeding car. He was muttering furiously under his breath to an invisible passenger on his right and showed no sign of noticing me as he went hurtling past. A door was ajar further down the corridor, and as Boris approached it he yelled: 'Look out!' and swerved sharply into the room. From within came the sound of Boris's vocal impression of things crashing. I walked up to the door and, checking that it was indeed 342, stepped inside.

I found Boris lying on his back on the bed, both feet high in the air.

‘Boris,’ I said, ‘you shouldn’t run around shouting like that. This is a hotel. For all you know, people might be asleep.’

‘Asleep! At this time of day!’

I shut the door behind me. ‘You shouldn’t make all this noise. There’ll be complaints.’

‘Tough luck if they complain. I’ll just get Grandfather to deal with them.’

His feet were still in the air and now he began languidly clapping his shoes together. I took a chair and watched him for a moment.

‘Boris, I have to talk to you. What I mean is, we have to talk, both of us. It’s good for us. You must have so many questions. About all this. Why we’re here in the hotel.’

I paused to see if he would say anything. Boris went on clapping his feet together in the air.

‘Boris, you’ve been very patient until now,’ I went on. ‘But I know there’s all kinds of things you’re wanting to ask. I’m sorry if I’ve always been too busy to sit and talk to you about them properly. And I’m sorry about last night. That was disappointing, for both of us. Boris, you must have so many questions. Some of them won’t have easy answers, but I’ll try and answer them the best I can.’

For some reason as I said this – perhaps it was to do with my old room and the thought that I might now have left it behind for ever – a powerful sense of loss welled up inside me and I was obliged to pause a moment. Boris went on clapping his feet for a little longer. Then his legs appeared to grow tired and he allowed them to flop onto the bed. I cleared my throat, then said:

‘So Boris. Where shall we begin?’

‘Solar Man!’ Boris shrieked suddenly and chanted loudly the opening bars of some theme tune. With this he crashed over, disappearing into the gap between the bed and the wall.

‘Boris, I’m being serious. For goodness sake. We’ve got to talk these things over. Boris, please, come out from there.’

There was no reply. I sighed and got to my feet.

‘Boris, I want you to know that whenever you want to ask me anything, you can just ask. I’ll stop whatever I’m doing and come to talk things over with you. Even if I’m with people who seem very important, I want you to understand, they’re not as important to me as you. Boris, can you hear me? Boris, come out from there.’

‘I can’t. I can’t move.’

‘Boris. Please.’

‘I can’t move. I’ve broken three vertebrae.’

‘Very well, Boris. Perhaps we’ll talk when you’re feeling better. I’m going downstairs now to get some breakfast. Boris, listen. If you like, after breakfast, we could go back to the old apartment. If you want, we can do that. We could go and get that box then. The one with Number Nine in it.’

There was still no response. I waited a moment longer, then said: ‘Well, think about it, Boris. I’m going down to have breakfast now.’

With that, I left the room, closing the door quietly behind me.

I was shown into a long sun-filled room adjoining the front of the lobby. The large windows appeared to face the street at pavement level, but opaque glass had been used on the lower panes to give some privacy, and the sound of the traffic passing outside could be heard only in muffled tones. Tall palms and ceiling fans gave the place a vaguely exotic air. The tables had been arranged in two long rows and, as the waiter led me down the gangway between them, I noticed most of the tables had already been cleared.

The waiter seated me near the back and poured me some coffee. As he went away, I saw the only other guests present were a couple talking in Spanish near the doorway and an old man reading a paper a few tables from me. I supposed I was perhaps the last guest down to breakfast, but then again, I had had an exceptionally demanding night and saw no reason to feel any guilt about it.

On the contrary, as I sat watching the palms waving gently under the rotating fans, a feeling of contentment began to come over me. I had, after all, reason enough to be well satisfied with what I had achieved in the short time since my arrival. Naturally there were still many aspects to this local crisis that remained unclear, even mysterious. But then, I had not yet been here twenty-four hours and answers to questions were bound to present themselves before long. Later in the day, for instance, I would be visiting the Countess, when I would have the opportunity not just to refresh my memory of Brodsky's work from his old gramophone records, but to talk over the whole crisis in detail with both the Countess and the mayor. Then there was the meeting with the citizens most directly affected by the current problems - the importance of which I had stressed to Miss Stratmann the previous day - and the encounter with Christoff himself. In other words, several of my most significant appointments still lay in front of me, and it was pointless to attempt to draw any real conclusions or even to begin thinking about finalising my speech at this stage. For the time being, I was entitled to feel pleased with the amount of information I had already absorbed, and could certainly afford a few minutes of indulgent relaxation as I ate my breakfast.

The waiter returned bearing cold meats, cheeses and a basket of fresh rolls, and I began to eat unhurriedly, pouring the strong coffee into my cup a little at a time. When eventually Stephan Hoffman appeared in the room, I was in something approaching a tranquil mood.

‘Good morning, Mr Ryder,’ the young man said, coming towards me with a smile. ‘I heard you’d just come down. I don’t want to disturb your breakfast, so I won’t stay long.’

He remained hovering beside my table, the smile still on his face, clearly waiting for me to speak. Only then did I remember our arrangement of the previous night.

‘Ah yes,’ I said. ‘The Kazan. Ah yes.’ I put down my butter knife and looked at him. ‘It is of course one of the most difficult pieces ever composed for piano. Given that you’ve only just started to practise it, it hardly surprised me to hear certain rough edges. Nothing much more than that, simply rough edges. With that piece there’s little one can do but devote time. A lot of time.’

I paused again. The smile had faded from Stephan’s face.

‘But on the whole,’ I went on, ‘and I don’t say such things lightly, I thought your rendering last night showed exceptional promise. Provided you have enough time, I’m certain you’ll give a very fair account of even that difficult piece. Of course the question is ...’

But the young man was no longer listening. Coming a step closer to me, he said:

‘Mr Ryder, let me get this clear. You’re saying practice is all it will take? That it’s within my grasp?’ Suddenly Stephan’s face contorted, his body doubled over and he hammered his fist into his raised knee. Then he straightened, took a deep breath and beamed with delight. 'Mr Ryder, you've no idea, no idea what this means to me. What marvellous encouragement, you've no idea! I know this sounds immodest, but I'll tell you, I always felt it, deep within myself, I always felt I had it. But to hear you say so, you of all people, my God, it's priceless! Last night, Mr Ryder, I played on and on. Each time I felt tiredness coming over me, whenever I was tempted to stop, a little voice inside would say: "Wait. Mr Ryder may still be outside. He may need just a little more to make his assessment." And I'd put even more into it, everything, I went on and on. When I finished, about two hours ago, I must confess I did go up to the door and peek out. And of course, I found you'd gone to bed - very sensibly. But it was so good of you to have stayed as long as you did. I just hope you didn't sacrifice too much sleep on my account.'

'Oh no, no. I stayed at the door for ... a certain period. Enough to make my assessment.'

'It was so kind of you, Mr Ryder. I feel like someone else this morning. The clouds have lifted from my life!'

'Now look, you mustn't get the wrong idea. What I'm saying is that the piece is within your capabilities. But whether you have enough time left before ...'

'I'll make sure I have enough time. I'll take every single opportunity to get to the piano and practise. I'll forget about sleep. Don't you worry, Mr Ryder. I'll do my parents proud tomorrow night.'

'Tomorrow night? Oh yes ...'

'Oh, but here I am talking on selfishly about myself, I haven't even mentioned how sensationally you went down last night. At the dinner, I mean. Everyone's been talking about it, all over the city. It really was such a charming speech.'

‘Thank you. I’m glad it was appreciated.’

‘And I’m sure it helped enormously to create the atmosphere for what came afterwards. Yes, apparently – this is the really good news I should have reported to you immediately – as you saw, Miss Collins turned up last night. Well, at one point, as she was leaving, she and Mr Brodsky, apparently they exchanged smiles. Yes, really! Many people witnessed it. Father saw it himself. He’d been making no effort at all to bring them into direct contact, he’d been very careful things weren’t pushed too fast, especially with Miss Collins thinking it over about the zoo and everything. But it was just as she was leaving. Apparently Mr Brodsky noticed she was leaving and stood up. He’d been sitting at his table the whole evening, even though by this time people were milling about freely in the way they always do. But now Mr Brodsky, he got to his feet and looked across the room to the doorway where Miss Collins was saying good night to a few people. One of the gentlemen, I think it was Mr Weber, was escorting her out, but some instinct must have told her. Anyway, she glanced back at the room and of course saw Mr Brodsky on his feet gazing at her. Father noticed this, and so did quite a few others and the room got quite a bit quieter, and Father says he thought for a terrible moment she was going to give him a cold bitter look, her face had shaped up as though she was going to. But then at the last moment, she smiled. Yes, she gave Mr Brodsky a smile! Then she went out. Mr Brodsky, well, you can imagine what that would have meant to him. Just imagine, after all these years! According to Father, I saw him just now, Mr Brodsky’s been working with a new energy this morning. Already he’s been at the piano for an hour! It’s just as well I vacated it when I did! Father says there’s something entirely different about him this morning, and of course no suggestion whatsoever of needing a drink. It’s all been a triumph for Father as much as anyone, but I’m sure your speech contributed enormously to everything. We’re still waiting to hear from Miss Collins, about her coming to the zoo, I mean, but after what happened last night, we can't help but be optimistic. What a morning it's turning into! Well, Mr Ryder, I won't keep you any longer, I'm sure you're longing to finish your breakfast. I'll just say thank you again for everything. I'm sure we'll run into each other during the day and I'll report to you how things are going with the Kazan.'

I wished him luck and watched him stride purposefully out of the room.

The encounter with the young man left me feeling more contented than ever. For the next several minutes I went on with my breakfast at the same leisurely pace, enjoying in particular the fresh taste of the local butter. At one point the waiter appeared with another pot of coffee then left again. After a while, for some reason, I found myself trying to remember the answer to a question once put to me by a man sitting beside me on a plane. Three pairs of brothers had played together in World Cup finals, he had said. Could I remember them? I had made some excuse and returned to my book, not wishing to be drawn into conversation. But then ever since, on occasions such as this when I found myself with a rare few minutes to myself, I would find the man's question coming back to me. The annoying thing was that I had at times over the years managed to remember all three sets of brothers, but then at other times would discover I had forgotten one pair or another. And so it was this morning. I remembered that the Charlton brothers had played for England in the 1966 final, the van der Kerkhof brothers for Holland in 1978. But try as I might I could not remember the third pair. After a while I began to grow quite annoyed at myself, and at one stage became quite determined I would not leave the breakfast table nor embark on my day's commitments until I had succeeded in remembering the third pair of brothers.

I was brought out of my reverie by the realisation that Boris had come into the room and was making his way towards me. He was doing so gradually, drifting nonchalantly from table to empty table, as though it were merely by chance he was getting closer to me. He avoided looking at me and even when he had arrived at the next table he loitered there fingering the tablecloth, his back turned to me.

‘Boris, have you had breakfast?’ I asked.

He continued fiddling with the tablecloth. Then he asked in a tone that suggested he did not care much one way or the other: ‘Are we going to the old apartment?’

‘If you want to. I promised we’d go if you wanted to. Do you want to go, Boris?’

‘Haven’t you got work to do?’

‘Yes, but I can manage to do that later. We could go to the old apartment if you want. But if we’re going, we’ll have to set off straight away. As you say, I have quite a busy day in front of me.’

Boris seemed to be thinking things over. He kept his back to me and went on fiddling with the tablecloth.

‘Well, Boris? Shall we go?’

‘Will Number Nine be there?’

‘I should think so.’ Deciding I should take the initiative, I stood up and tossed my napkin next to my plate.

‘Boris, let’s set off straight away. It looks like a sunny day outside. We don’t even need to go up for jackets. Let’s just go straight away.’

Boris continued to look hesitant, but I put my arm around his shoulders and led him out of the breakfast room.

As Boris and I were crossing the lobby, I noticed the desk clerk waving to me.

‘Oh Mr Ryder,’ he said. ‘Those journalists came back earlier. I thought it best to send them away for now and suggested they try again in an hour’s time. Don’t worry, they were perfectly agreeable.’

I thought for a moment, then said: 'Unfortunately, I'm in the middle of something important just now. Perhaps you might ask these gentlemen to arrange a time properly through Miss Stratmann. Now if you'll excuse us, we have to be getting along.'

It was only when we had made our way out of the hotel and were standing on the sunny pavement that it occurred to me I could not remember how to get to the old apartment. For a few seconds I looked at the traffic moving slowly in front of us. Then Boris, perhaps sensing my difficulty, said: 'We can get a tram. From outside the fire station.'

'That's good. Okay then, Boris, you lead the way.'

The noise of the traffic was such that for the next few minutes we hardly talked. We dodged along narrow crowded pavements, crossed two busy little streets, then came out onto a broad avenue with tram lines and several lanes of slow traffic. The pavement was much wider here and we walked more freely through the pedestrians, past banks, offices and restaurants. Then I heard footsteps running up behind me and felt a hand touch my shoulder.

'Mr Ryder! Ah, here you are at last!'

The man I turned to find resembled an ageing rock singer. He had a weather-beaten face and long messy hair parted down the middle. His shirt and trousers were loose and cream-coloured.

'How do you do,' I said cautiously, aware that Boris was eyeing the man with suspicion.

'What a most unfortunate series of misunderstandings!' the man said laughing. 'We've been given so many different appointments. And last night we waited a long time, over two hours, but never mind! These things happen. I dare say none of it is your fault, sir. In fact, I'm sure it isn't.'

‘Ah yes. And you were waiting again this morning. Yes, yes, the desk clerk mentioned it.’

‘This morning, again, there was some misunderstanding.’ The long-haired man shrugged. ‘They said to come back in another hour. So we were just killing time over there, in that café, the photographer and I. But now that you’re passing, I wonder if we shouldn’t just do the interview and the photographs right now. Then we won’t need to bother you ever again. Of course, we realise that for someone such as yourself, talking to a small local paper like ours won’t be high among your priorities ...’

‘On the contrary,’ I said quickly, ‘I always place the highest importance on periodicals such as yours. You hold the key to the local feelings. People like yourself I regard as being among my most valued contacts in a town.’

‘How very kind of you to say so, Mr Ryder. And if I may say so, rather insightful.’

‘But I was going on to say that, unfortunately, just at this moment, I’m in the middle of something.’

‘Of course, of course. For that very reason, I was suggesting we just get the whole thing over and done with now, rather than that we continue to bother you throughout the day. Our photographer, Pedro, he’s over there now in that café. He can take a few quick pictures while I ask you two or three questions. Then you and this young gentleman, you can hurry along to wherever it is you’re going. The whole thing would take only about four or five minutes. It seems by far the simplest solution.’

‘Hmm. Just a few minutes, you say.’

‘Oh, we’d be more than delighted with a few minutes. We fully appreciate how many other important demands there must be on your time. As I say, we’re just over there. That café there.’

He was pointing to a spot a little distance away where some tables and chairs were spilling onto the pavement. It did not look the sort of place I would ideally conduct an interview, but it occurred to me this might be the simplest way to bring the matter of the journalists to an end.

‘Very well,’ I said. ‘But I have to emphasise, I have a particularly tight schedule this morning.’

‘Mr Ryder, it’s so gracious of you. And for a humble little paper like ours! Well, let’s get it done as quickly as possible. Please, this way.’

The long-haired journalist began to lead us back along the pavement, almost colliding with another pedestrian in his eagerness to return to his café. He was soon a few paces ahead and I took the opportunity to say to Boris:

‘Don’t worry, this won’t take any time at all. I’ll make sure of that.’

Boris continued to wear a disgruntled expression and so I added:

‘Look, you can sit and have something nice while you’re waiting. Some ice cream or cheesecake. Then we’ll set off immediately.’

We came to a halt by a narrow courtyard busy with parasols.

‘Here we are,’ the journalist said, gesturing towards one of the tables. ‘We’re just over here.’

‘If you don’t mind,’ I said to him, ‘I’ll first of all install Boris inside. I’ll come back out and join you in just one minute.’

‘An excellent idea.’

Although many of the tables out in the courtyard were occupied, there were no customers at all inside. The décor was light and modern, and the room was full of sunshine. A plump young waitress of Nordic appearance was standing behind a glass counter inside which was displayed a range of cakes and pastries. As Boris seated himself at a table in the corner, the young woman came towards us with a smile.

‘So what would you like?’ she asked Boris. ‘We have this morning the freshest cakes in the whole town. They just arrived ten minutes ago. Everything’s very fresh.’

Boris proceeded to quiz the waitress very thoroughly about her cakes before settling on the almond and chocolate cheesecake.

‘Okay, I won’t be long,’ I said to him. ‘I’ll just go and see these people, then come right back. If you want anything, I’ll be just outside.’

Boris shrugged, his attention fixed on the waitress, now in the process of extricating an elaborate confection from out of the display cabinet.

When I came back out into the courtyard, I could not see the long-haired journalist anywhere. I strolled among the parasols for a while, peering at the faces of the people sitting at the tables. When I had gone once round the courtyard, I stopped to consider the possibility that the journalist had changed his mind and gone away. But this seemed extraordinary, and I looked around me once more. There were various people reading newspapers over their coffees. An old man was talking to the pigeons around his feet. Then I heard someone mention my name and, turning, saw the journalist sitting at a table directly behind me. He was in deep conversation with a squat, swarthy man whom I took to be the photographer. Letting out an exclamation I went up to them, but curiously the two men continued their discussion without looking up at me. Even when I drew up the remaining chair and sat down, the journalist - who was in mid-sentence - gave me no more than a cursory glance. Then, turning back to the swarthy photographer, he continued:

‘So don’t give him any hints about the significance of the building. You’ll just have to make up some arty justification, some reason why he has to be constantly in front of it.’

‘No problem,’ the photographer said nodding. ‘No problem.’

‘But don’t push him too much. That seems to be where Schulz went wrong in Vienna last month. And remember, like all these types, he’s very vain. So pretend to be a big fan of his. Tell him the paper had no idea when they sent you, but you happen to be a really huge fan. That’ll get him. But don’t mention the Sattler building until we’ve developed a rapport.’

‘Okay, okay.’ The photographer was still nodding. ‘But I kind of thought this would have been fixed up by now. I thought you’d have got him to agree already.’

‘I was going to try and fix it on the phone, but then Schulz warned me what a difficult shit the guy is.’ As he said this, the journalist turned to me and gave me a polite smile. The photographer, following his companion’s gaze, gave me a distracted nod, then the two of them returned to their discussion.

‘The trouble with Schulz,’ the journalist said, ‘is he never flatters them enough. And he’s got that manner, like he’s really impatient, even when he’s not. With these types, you just have to keep up the flattery. So all the time you snap, keep shouting “great”. Keep exclaiming. Don’t stop feeding his ego.’

‘Okay, okay. No problem.’

‘So I’ll start in with ...’ The journalist gave a weary sigh. ‘I’ll start talking about his performance in Vienna or something like that. I’ve got some notes on it here, I’ll bluff my way. But let’s not waste too much time. After a few minutes, you make out you’ve had this inspiration about going out to the Sattler building. I’ll make out I’m a bit annoyed at first, but then end up admitting it’s a brilliant idea.’

‘Okay, okay.’

‘You’re sure now. Let’s have no mistakes. Remember he’s a touchy bastard.’

‘I understand.’

‘Anything starts to go wrong, just say something flattering.’

‘Fine, fine.’

The two men nodded to each other. Then the journalist took a deep breath, clapped his hands together and turned to face me, brightening suddenly as he did so.

‘Ah, Mr Ryder, here you are! It’s so good of you to give us some of your precious time. And the young man, he’s enjoying himself in there, I trust?’

‘Yes, yes. He’s ordered a very large piece of cheesecake.’

Both men laughed pleasantly. The swarthy photographer grinned and said:

‘Cheesecake. Yeah, that’s my favourite. From when I was a little kid.’

‘Oh, Mr Ryder, this is Pedro.’

The photographer smiled and held out his hand eagerly.

‘Very pleased to meet you, sir. This is a real break for me, I tell you. I was put on this assignment only this morning. When I got up, all I had to look forward to was another shoot in the council chambers. Then I get this call while I’m having my shower. Do you want to do it? they ask. Do I want to do it? The man’s been my hero since I was a kid, I tell them. Do I want to do it? Jesus, I’ll do it for nothing. I’ll pay you to do it, I tell them. Just tell me where to go. I swear I’ve never been this excited over an assignment.’

‘To be frank, Mr Ryder,’ the journalist said, ‘the photographer who was with me last night at the hotel, well, after we’d been waiting a few hours he started to get a little impatient. Naturally I was quite angry with him. “You don’t seem to realise,” I said to him. “If Mr Ryder has been delayed, it’s bound to be by the most important sorts of engagements. If he’s good enough to consent to give us some of his time and we need to wait a little, then wait we shall.” I tell you, sir, I got quite angry with him. And when I got back I told the editor it just wasn’t good enough.’

“Find me another photographer for the morning,” I demanded.

“I want someone who fully appreciates Mr Ryder’s position and shows him the appropriate gratitude.” Yes, I suppose I got quite worked up about it. Anyway, we've got Pedro now, who turns out to be almost as big a fan of yours as I am.'

'Bigger, bigger,' Pedro protested. 'When I got the call this morning, I just couldn't believe it. My hero's in town and I'm going to get to shoot him. Jesus, I'm going to do the best job I've ever done, that's what I said to myself while I was taking my shower. A guy like that, you have to do the best job ever. I'll take him up against the Sattler building. That's how I saw it. I could see the whole composition in my head while I was taking my shower.'

'Now, Pedro,' the journalist said, looking at him sternly, 'I doubt very much if Mr Ryder cares to go over to the Sattler building just for the sake of our photographs. All right, it's only a few minutes drive at the most, but a few minutes is still no inconsiderable thing to a man on a tight schedule. No, Pedro, you'll just have to do the best you can here, take a few shots of Mr Ryder as we talk at this table. Okay, a pavement café, it's very clichéd, it will hardly show to good effect the unique charisma Mr Ryder carries around him. But it will just have to do. I admit, your idea of Mr Ryder against the Sattler building, it's inspired. But he simply doesn't have the time. We'll have to be satisfied with a much more ordinary picture of him.'

Pedro punched his fist into his palm and shook his head.

'I guess that's right. But Jesus, it's tough. A chance to take the great Mr Ryder, a once-in-a-lifetime chance, and I have to make do with another café scene. That's the way life deals you a hand.' He shook his head again sadly. Then for a moment the two of them sat there looking at me.

'Well,' I said eventually, 'this building of yours. Is it literally a few minutes drive away?'

Pedro sat up abruptly, his face lit with enthusiasm.

'You mean it? You'll pose in front of the Sattler building? Jesus, what a break! I just knew you'd be a great guy! ’

‘Now wait ... ’

‘Are you sure, Mr Ryder?’ the journalist said grasping my arm. ‘Are you really sure? I know you’ve got a heavy schedule. Why, that’s really magnificent of you! And truly, it will take no more than three minutes by taxi. In fact, if you’ll just wait here, sir, I’ll go and hail one now. Pedro, why don’t you get a few shots of Mr Ryder here anyhow while he’s waiting.’

The journalist hurried off. The next moment I saw him at the edge of the pavement, leaning towards the oncoming traffic, an arm held poised in the air.

‘Mr Ryder, sir. Please.’

Pedro was crouched down on one knee, squinting up at me through a camera. I arranged myself in my chair - adopting a relaxed but not overly languid posture - and put on a genial smile.

Pedro snapped the shutter a few times. Then he retreated some distance and crouched down again, this time beside an empty table, disturbing as he did so a flock of pigeons pecking away at some crumbs. I was about to re-adjust my posture, when the journalist came rushing back.

‘Mr Ryder, I can’t find a taxi just now, but here’s a tram just arrived. Please hurry, we can jump on. Pedro, quickly, the tram.’

‘But will it be as quick as a taxi?’ I asked.

‘Yes, yes. In fact with the traffic like this the tram will be quicker. Really, Mr Ryder, you’ve no need to worry. The Sattler building is very near. In fact’ - he raised his hand to shade his eyes and looked into the far distance -

‘in fact, you can almost see it from here. If it weren’t for that grey tower over there, we’d be able to see the Sattler building right at this moment. That’s how close we are, really. In fact, if someone of normal height - no taller than you or me - if such a person were to climb onto the roof of the Sattler building, stand up straight and hold up some pole-like object - a household mop, say - on a morning like this, we'd be able to see it quite easily above that grey tower. So you see, we'll be there in no time at all. But please, the tram, we must hurry.'

Pedro was already down at the kerb. I could see him, his heavy bag of equipment on his shoulder, trying to persuade the tram driver to wait for us. I followed the journalist out of the courtyard and clambered aboard.

The tram started up again as the three of us made our way down the central aisle. The carriage was crowded, making it impossible for us to sit near one another. I squeezed myself into a seat towards the back of the carriage, between a small elderly man and a matronly mother with a toddler on her lap. The seat was surprisingly comfortable and after a few moments I began rather to enjoy the journey. Opposite me were three old men reading one newspaper, held open by the man in the middle. The jogging of the tram seemed to give them difficulties and at times they tussled for command of a particular page.

We had been travelling for a while when I became aware of activity around me and saw that a ticket inspector was making her way down the aisle. It occurred to me then that my companions must have purchased my ticket for me - I certainly had not acquired one on boarding. When I next glanced over my shoulder I saw that the ticket inspector, a petite woman whose ugly black uniform could not entirely disguise her attractive figure, had all but reached our part of the carriage. All around me, people were producing their tickets and passes. Suppressing a sense of panic, I set about formulating something to say that would sound at once dignified and convincing.

Then the ticket inspector was looming above us and my neighbours all proffered their tickets. While she was still in the process of clipping them, I announced firmly:

‘I’m without a ticket, but in my case there are special circumstances which, if you’ll allow me, I’ll explain to you.’

The ticket inspector looked at me. Then she said: ‘Not having a ticket is one thing. But you know, you really let me down last night.’

As soon as she said this, I recognised Fiona Roberts, a girl from my village primary school in Worcestershire with whom I had developed a special friendship around the time I was nine years old. She had lived near us, a short way along the lane in a cottage not unlike ours, and I had often wandered down to spend an afternoon playing with her, particularly during the difficult period before our departure to Manchester. I had not seen her at all since those days, and so was quite taken aback by her accusing manner.

‘Ah yes,’ I said. ‘Last night. Yes.’

Fiona Roberts went on looking at me. Perhaps it was to do with the reproachful expression she was now wearing, but I suddenly found myself recalling an afternoon from our childhood, when the two of us had been sitting together under her parents’ dining table. We had, as usual, created our ‘hide-out’ by hanging an assortment of blankets and curtains down over the sides of the table. That particular afternoon had been warm and sunny, but we had persisted in sitting inside our hide-out, in the stuffy heat and near-darkness. I had been saying something to Fiona, no doubt at some length and in an upset manner. More than once she had tried to interrupt, but I had continued. Then finally, when I had finished, she had said:

‘That’s silly. That means you’ll be all on your own. You’ll get lonely.’

‘I don’t mind that,’ I had said. ‘I like being lonely.’

‘You’re just being silly again. No one likes being lonely. I’m going to have a big family. Five children at least. And I’m going to cook them a lovely supper every evening.’ Then, when I did not respond, she had said again: ‘You’re just being silly. No one likes being on their own.’

‘I do. I like it.’

‘How can you like being lonely?’

‘I do. I just do.’

In fact, I had felt some conviction in making this assertion. For by that afternoon it had already been several months since I had commenced my ‘training sessions’; indeed, that particular obsession had probably reached its peak just around that time.

My ‘training sessions’ had come about quite unplanned. I had been playing by myself out in the lane one grey afternoon – absorbed in some fantasy, climbing in and out of a dried-out ditch running between a row of poplars and a field – when I had suddenly felt a sense of panic and a need for the company of my parents. Our cottage had not been far away – I had been able to see the back of it across the field – and yet the feeling of panic had grown rapidly until I had been all but overcome by the urge to run home at full speed across the rough grass. But for some reason – perhaps I had quickly associated the sensation with immaturity – I had forced myself to delay my departure. There had not been any question in my mind that I would, very soon, start to run across the field. It was simply a matter of holding back that moment with an effort of will for several more seconds. The strange mixture of fear and exhilaration I had experienced as I had stood there transfixed in the dried-out ditch was one that I was to come to know well in the weeks that followed. For within days, my ‘training sessions’ had become a regular and important feature of my life. In time, they had acquired a certain ritual, so that as soon as I felt the earliest signs of my need to return home I would make myself go to a special spot along the lane, under a large oak tree, where I would remain standing for several minutes, fighting off my emotions. Often I would decide I had done enough, that I could now set off, only to pull myself back again, forcing myself to remain under the tree for just a few seconds more. There was no doubting the strange thrill that had accompanied the growing fear and panic of these occasions, a sensation which perhaps accounted for the somewhat compulsive hold my 'training sessions' came to have over me.

'But you know, don't you,' Fiona had said to me that afternoon, her face close to mine in the darkness, 'when you get married, it needn't be like it is with your mum and dad. It won't be like that at all. Husbands and wives don't always argue all the time. They only argue like that when ... when special things happen.'

'What special things?'

Fiona had remained silent for a moment. I had been about to repeat my question, this time more aggressively, when she had said with some deliberation:

'Your parents. They don't argue like that just because they don't get on. Don't you know? Don't you know why they argue all the time?'

Then suddenly an angry voice had called from outside our hide-out and Fiona had vanished. And as I had continued sitting alone in the darkness under the table, I had caught the sounds from the kitchen of Fiona and her mother arguing in lowered voices. At one point I had heard Fiona repeating in an injured tone: 'But why not? Why can't I tell him? Everybody else knows.' And her mother saying, her voice still lowered: 'He's younger than you. He's too young. You're not to tell him.'

These memories were brought to a halt as Fiona Roberts came a few steps closer, saying to me:

‘I waited till ten-thirty. Then I told everyone to eat. People were starving by then.’

‘Of course. Naturally.’ I laughed weakly and looked around the carriage. ‘Ten-thirty. By that time, yes, people are bound to get hungry ...’

‘And by that time, it was obvious you weren’t coming. No one believed any of it any more.’

‘No. I suppose by that time, inevitably ...’

‘At first it was going fine,’ Fiona Roberts said. ‘I’d never held anything like that before, but it was going fine. They were all there, Inge, Trude, all of them in my apartment. I was a little nervous, but it was going fine and I was really excited too. Some of the women, they’d prepared so much for the evening, they’d come with folders full of information and photos. It wasn’t until around nine o’clock the restlessness started up, and that’s when it first occurred to me you might not come. I kept going in and out of the room bringing in more coffee, refilling the bowls of snacks, trying to keep things going. I could see they were all starting to whisper, but I still thought, well, you might come along yet, you were probably just caught up in the traffic somewhere. Then it got later and later, and in the end they were talking and whispering quite openly. You know, even when I was still in the room. In my own apartment! That’s when I told them just to eat. I just wanted the whole thing over with then. So they all sat around eating, I’d prepared all these little omelettes, and even as they were eating, some of them like that Ulrike, they kept whispering and sniggering. But you know, in some ways I actually preferred the ones who sniggered. I preferred them to the likes of Trude, pretending to feel so sorry for me, taking care to be nice right to the end, oh, how I loathe that woman! I could see her as she was leaving, thinking to herself: "Poor thing. She lives in a fantasy world. We really should have guessed." Oh, I hate the lot of them, I really despise myself for having got involved with them at all. But, you see, I was living on the estate for four years, I hadn't made a single proper friend, I was very isolated. For ages, those women, the people who were in my apartment last night, they wouldn't have anything to do with me. They consider themselves the elite on the estate, you see. They call themselves the Women's Arts and Cultural Foundation. It's silly, it's not a foundation in any real sense, but they think it sounds grand. They like to busy themselves whenever something's being organised in the city. When the Peking Ballet came, for instance, they made all the bunting for the welcoming reception. Anyway, they consider themselves very exclusive and until recently they wouldn't consider having anything to do with someone like me. That Inge, she wouldn't even say hello if I saw her around the estate. But that all changed, of course, once it got around. That I knew you, I mean. I'm not sure how it got out, I wasn't going around boasting about it. I suppose I must have just mentioned it to someone. Well anyway, as you can imagine, that changed everything. Inge herself stopped me one day earlier this year, when we were passing on the stairs, and invited me to one of their meetings. I didn't really want to get involved with them, but I went along, I suppose I thought I might make some friends at last, I don't know. Well right from the start, some of them, Inge and Trude too, they weren't at all sure whether to believe it or not, you know, about my being an old friend of yours. But they went along with it in the end, it made them feel pretty good, I suppose. This whole idea about looking after your parents, it wasn't mine, but obviously the fact that I knew you had a lot to do with it. When the news first came about your visit, Inge went along and put it to Mr von Braun, saying the Foundation was ready now, after the Peking Ballet, ready to take on something really important, and anyway, one of the group was an old friend of yours. That sort of thing. And so the Foundation got the job, of looking after your parents during their stay here, and everybody was thrilled of course, though some of those women, they got pretty nervous about such a responsibility. But Inge kept them all confident, saying it was no more than we deserved now. We kept having these meetings when we'd come up with ideas about how to entertain your parents. Inge told us - I was sorry to hear this - neither of your parents is very well now, and so quite a lot of the obvious things, tours around the city, that sort of thing, weren't very suitable. But there were a lot of ideas, and everyone was beginning to get pretty excited. Then at the last meeting someone said, well, why shouldn't we ask you to come and personally meet us all? Talk over what your parents might like. There was dead silence for a moment. Then Inge said: "Why shouldn't we? After all, we're uniquely qualified to invite him." Then they were all staring at me. So in the end I said: "Well, I expect he's going to be busy, but if you like I could ask him." And I could see how thrilled they all were when I said that. Then once your reply came in, well, I became a princess, they treated me with such appreciation, smiling and caressing me whenever they ran into me, bringing presents for the children, offering to do this or that for me. So you can just imagine the effect it had last night when you didn't turn up.'

She gave a deep sigh and was silent for a moment, staring blankly through the window at the buildings going by outside. Eventually, she went on:

'I suppose I shouldn't blame you really. After all, we haven't seen each other for so long now. But I thought you'd want to come for your parents' sake. Everyone had so many ideas about what we could do for them here. This morning, they'll all be talking about me. Hardly any of them go out to work, they have husbands who bring in good money, they'll all be phoning each other or paying each other visits, they'll all be saying: "Poor woman, she lives in a world of her own. We should have seen it earlier. I'd like to do something to help her, except that, well, she's so wearying." I can just hear them now, they'll be really enjoying themselves. And Inge, a part of her will be very angry. "The little bitch tricked us," she'll be thinking. But she'll be pleased, she'll be relieved. Inge, you see, as much as she liked the idea of my knowing you, she always found it threatening. I could tell that. And the way the others were all treating me these last few weeks, ever since your reply, that might have given her something to think about. She's been really torn, they all have. Anyway, they'll be enjoying themselves this morning, I know they will be.'

Naturally, as I listened to Fiona, I sensed I should be feeling considerable remorse over what had happened the previous night. However, despite her vivid account of the scenes at her apartment, as much as I felt deeply sorry for her, I found I had only the vaguest recollection of such an event having been on my schedule. Besides, her words had made me realise with something of a shock how little consideration I had so far given to the whole question of my parents' imminent arrival in the city. As Fiona had mentioned, they were neither of them in good health and could hardly be left to fend for themselves. Indeed, as I looked at the harsh traffic and the glassy buildings going by outside, I felt a strong sense of protectiveness towards my elderly parents. It was in fact the ideal solution that a group of local women be entrusted with their welfare, and it had been immensely foolish of me not to have taken the opportunity to meet and talk to them. I felt a panic beginning to seize me about what to do with my parents - I could not imagine how I could have given so little thought to this whole dimension to my visit - and for a moment my mind was racing. I suddenly saw my mother and my father, both small, white-haired and bowed with age, standing outside the railway station, surrounded by luggage they could not hope to transport by themselves. I could see them looking at the strange city around them, and then eventually my father, his pride getting the better of his good sense, picking up two, then three cases, while my mother tried in vain to restrain him, holding his arm with her thin hand, saying: 'No, no, you can't carry that. It's much too much.' And my father, his face hard with determination, shaking off my mother saying: 'But who else is going to carry them? How else will we ever reach our hotel? Who else is going to help us in this place if we don't help ourselves?' All this while cars and lorries roared past them and commuters rushed by. My mother, sadly resigning herself, watching my father as he tottered with his heavy burden, four paces, five, then finally overcome, lowering the suitcases, shoulders stooped, his breath coming heavily. Then my mother, after a while, going to him, placing a gentle hand on his arm. 'Never mind. We'll find someone to help us.' And my father, now resigned, perhaps satisfied because he had demonstrated at least his spirit, looking quietly into the rush before him, searching for someone who might have come to meet them, who would see to their luggage, make welcoming conversation and take them off to a hotel in a comfortable car.

All these images filled my head as Fiona was speaking so that I was for some moments hardly able to consider her own unfortunate situation. But then I became aware of her saying:

'They'll be talking about how they'll have to be more careful from now on. I can just hear them. "We've become so much more prestigious now, we're bound to get all sorts trying to trick their way in. We have to be careful, especially now we've got so much responsibility. That little bitch should be a lesson to us." That sort of thing. God knows what kind of life I'm going to lead now on that estate. And my children, they've got to grow up there ...'

'Look,' I said interrupting, 'I can't tell you how badly I feel about this. But the fact is, something quite unforeseeable happened last night, I won't bore you with it here. I was of course extremely annoyed at having to let you down, but it was quite impossible even to get to a phone. I hope you hadn't gone to too much trouble.'

‘I’d gone to a lot of trouble. It’s not easy for me, you know, a single mother with two growing children ...’

‘Listen, I really feel very badly about this. Let me make a suggestion. Just now I’ve got something I have to do with these journalists over there, but that won’t take long. I’ll get away from them as quickly as possible, I’ll jump into a taxi and come to your apartment. I’ll be there in, say, half an hour - forty-five minutes at the most. Then what we can do is this. We’ll walk together all around your estate, so all these people, your neighbours, this Inge, this Trude, they can all see with their own eyes that we really are old friends. Then we’ll call in on the more influential ones, like this Inge person. You could introduce me, I’ll apologise about last night, explain how at the last moment I’d been unavoidably delayed. One by one, we’ll win them over and repair the harm I did you last night. In fact, if we do this well, you might be even better established with your friends than you ever would have been. What do you say to that?’

For a few moments Fiona went on staring at the passing view. Then finally she said: ‘My first instinct would be to say: “Forget the whole thing.” It’s got me nowhere, my claiming to be an old friend of yours. And anyway, maybe I don’t need to be part of Inge’s circle. It’s just that I was so lonely before on the estate, but having had a taste of how they behave, I’m not sure I won’t be happier just having my children for company. I could read a good book or watch the television in the evenings. But then I have to think not just about myself, but about my children. They have to grow up on the estate, they have to be accepted. For their sake, I ought to take up this suggestion of yours. As you say, if we do what you suggest, I might be better off than I would have been even if the party had been a roaring success. But you have to promise, swear on everything you hold dear, you won’t let me down a second time. Because, you see, if we’re to carry out your plan, it means as soon as I get in from this shift, I'll have to start phoning round to fix up our visits. There's no way we can just go knocking on doors unexpectedly, it's just not that sort of neighbourhood. So you see how it would be if I made all these appointments and you didn't show up. There'd be nothing for it but for me to go the rounds on my own, explaining your absence all over again. So you must promise me you won't let me down once more.'

'You have my promise,' I said. 'As I say, I'll just finish off this small chore here then I'll jump into a taxi and be with you. Don't worry, Fiona, everything will sort itself out.'

Just as I said this I felt someone touch my arm. Turning, I saw Pedro on his feet, his large bag once more hoisted on his shoulder.

'Mr Ryder, please,' he said and pointed down the aisle to the exit.

The journalist was standing near the front ready to disembark.

'This is our stop here, Mr Ryder,' he called down, waving to me. 'If you don't mind, sir.'

I could feel the tram slowing to a halt. Rising to my feet, I squeezed out and made my way down the carriage.

The tram rattled away leaving the three of us standing in open countryside surrounded by windswept fields. I found the breeze refreshing and for a few moments stood watching the tram disappear across the fields into the horizon.

‘Mr Ryder, this way if you please.’

The journalist and Pedro were waiting a few paces away. I went up to them and we began to make our way across the grassy field. Now and then powerful gusts of wind tugged at our clothes and sent ripples across the grass. Eventually we reached the foot of a hill where we paused to recover our breath.

‘It’s just a short way up here,’ the journalist said, pointing up the hill.

After the struggle we had had walking through the long grass I was glad to see there was a dirt path leading us up the hill.

‘Well,’ I said, ‘I don’t have much time, so perhaps we’d better be on our way.’

‘Of course, Mr Ryder.’

The journalist led the way up the path which climbed steeply in zig-zags. I managed to keep up with him, following just a step or two behind. Pedro, perhaps slowed down by his bags, quickly fell behind altogether. As we climbed, I found myself thinking about Fiona, about how I had let her down the previous night, and it struck me that for all the assurance with which I had so far conducted myself on this present visit, for all I had so far achieved, my handling of certain matters – at least by my own standards – left something to be desired. Quite aside from the embarrassment I had caused

Fiona, with my parents' arrival in the town now so imminent, it was vexing in the extreme that I had let slip such an opportunity to discuss their many complicated needs with the people in whose care they were to be entrusted. As my breath came harder, I could feel returning to me an intense sense of irritation with Sophie for the confusion she had brought into my affairs. Surely it was not too much to ask that, at such crucially important points in my life as this, she somehow contained her chaos to herself. All sorts of words I suddenly wished to say to her began filling my head and, had I not been short of breath, I might well have started to mutter them out loud.

After the path had turned three or four corners, we stopped to rest. Raising my gaze, I saw we now commanded a sweeping view over the surrounding countryside. There was field after field stretching into the distance. Only far on the horizon was there something that looked like a huddle of farm buildings.

'A splendid view,' the journalist said, panting and clawing his hair back off his face. 'It's so exhilarating to come up here. The fresh air will set us up well for the rest of the day. Well, better not waste time, pleasant as this all is.' He laughed cheerfully, then began to walk again.

As before I kept up closely with him, while Pedro lagged behind. Then at one point, as we were struggling up a particularly steep section, Pedro called out something from below. I thought he was appealing to us to slow down, but the journalist did not break his step, simply shouting over his shoulder against a blast of wind: 'What did you say?'

I could hear Pedro struggling to gain a few paces. Then I heard him shout:

'I said, we seem to have got the shit convinced. I think he's going to go along with it.'

‘Well,’ the journalist shouted back, ‘he’s co-operated so far, but you can never take these types for granted. So keep up the flattery. He’s come this far up and he seems quite happy about it. But then I don’t think the fool even knows the significance of the building.’

‘What do we tell him if he asks?’ Pedro shouted. ‘He’s bound to ask.’

‘Just change the subject. Ask him to alter his pose. Any talk about his appearance is bound to deflect him. If he keeps asking, well, we’ll have to tell him in the end, but by then we’ll have a whole lot of pictures and there’ll be nothing the shit can do.’

‘I’ll be glad when this is all over,’ Pedro said, his breath coming even harder now. ‘God, the way he keeps stroking his hands together makes my flesh creep.’ ‘We’re almost there now. We’ve been doing fine, now let’s not blow it at the last moment.’

‘Excuse me,’ I said interrupting, ‘but I need to stop for a second.’

‘Of course, Mr Ryder, how inconsiderate of me,’ the journalist said and we came to a halt. ‘I myself am a marathon runner,’ he went on, ‘and so have an unnatural advantage. But I must say, sir, you seem extremely fit indeed. And for a man of your age - I only know your age from my notes here, I’d never have guessed it otherwise - really, you’ve completely outpaced poor Pedro.’ Then he shouted to Pedro as the latter caught up with us: ‘Come on, slowcoach. Mr Ryder’s laughing at you.’

‘It’s not fair,’ Pedro said smiling. ‘Mr Ryder’s so gifted, and then on top of it all, to be blessed with such athleticism. Some of us aren’t so lucky.’

We stood looking out over the view, recovering our breath. Then the journalist said:

‘We’re very nearly there now. Let’s keep going. After all, Mr Ryder has a busy day ahead.’

The last part of the journey was the most arduous. The path grew ever steeper and frequently disintegrated into muddy puddles. Ahead of me the journalist continued on steadily, though I could see he was now bent forward with the effort. As I staggered on after him, my head began to fill again with things I wished to say to Sophie. ‘Do you realise?’ I caught myself muttering through clenched teeth in time to my steps. ‘Do you realise?’ Somehow the sentence never got any further, but with each step, either in my head or under my breath, I repeated this line over and over until the words themselves began to fuel my irritation.

The path at last levelled off and I could see a white building at the peak of the hill. The journalist and I stumbled towards it and the next moment we were leaning against its wall, panting away. After a while Pedro joined us, wheezing frantically. He collapsed against the wall, sagging down onto his knees, and I feared for a second he was about to have a seizure. But even as he continued to wheeze and pant, he began to unzip his bag. He pulled out a camera, then a lens. At this point the effort seemed to overwhelm him and, putting an arm to the wall, he buried his head in its crook and went on gasping for air.

When at last I felt reasonably recovered, I moved a few steps away from the building in order to get a view of it. A gust of wind almost flattened me back against the wall, but eventually I reached a spot from which I found myself looking at a tall cylinder of white brickwork, windowless apart from a single vertical slit near the top. It was as though a single turret had been removed from a medieval castle and transplanted here on top of the hill.

‘Mr Ryder, whenever you’re ready, sir.’

The journalist and Pedro had taken up a position some ten metres from the building. Pedro, now evidently recovered, had set up his tripod and was peering through his viewfinder.

‘Right up against the wall, if you will, Mr Ryder,’ the journalist called.

I made my way back up to the building. ‘Gentlemen,’ I said, raising my voice above the wind, ‘before we begin, I’d like you just to explain to me the precise nature of this setting we’ve chosen.’

‘Mr Ryder, please,’ Pedro called, waving his hand in the air. ‘Stand right back against the wall. Perhaps an arm against it. Like this.’ He held his elbow out to the wind.

I stepped closer to the wall and did as requested. Pedro proceeded to take a number of photographs, occasionally shifting his tripod or changing his lens. All the while, the journalist remained close by, peering over Pedro’s shoulder and conferring with him.

‘Gentlemen,’ I said after a time, ‘surely it’s not unreasonable of me to ask ...’

‘Mr Ryder, please,’ Pedro said, jumping up from behind the camera. ‘Your tie!’

My tie had blown over my shoulder. I corrected it, taking the opportunity also to rearrange my hair.

‘Mr Ryder,’ Pedro called, ‘if we could please have some with your hand raised like this. Yes, yes! As though you’re ushering someone towards the building. Yes, that’s perfect, perfect. But please, smile proudly. Very proud, as though the building is your baby. Yes, that’s perfect. Yes, you look magnificent.’

I obeyed the instructions as best I could, though the powerful gusts made it difficult to maintain a suitably genial expression on my face.

Then after a time I became aware of a figure standing over to my left. I gained an impression of a man in a dark coat huddling close to the wall, but at that moment I was having to hold a pose and could only see him at the edge of my vision. Pedro continued to shout instructions through the wind - to move my chin a fraction to one side, to smile more broadly - and some time seemed to pass before I was free to turn and look at the figure. When I finally did so, the man - he was tall and stick-like, with a bald head and bony features - started immediately to come towards me. He was holding his raincoat tightly to himself, but as he approached he held out his hand.

‘Mr Ryder, how do you do? It’s an honour to meet you.’

‘Ah yes,’ I said, studying him. ‘I’m very pleased to meet you, Mr ... er ...?’

The stick-like man looked taken aback. Then he said: ‘Christoff. I am Christoff.’

‘Ah, Mr Christoff.’ A particularly strong blast obliged us to brace ourselves for a few seconds, allowing me to recover somewhat. ‘Ah yes, Mr Christoff. Of course. I’ve heard a great deal about you.’

‘Mr Ryder,’ Christoff said, leaning towards me, ‘may I say straight away how grateful I am to you for agreeing to attend this lunch. I knew what a civilised person you were and so wasn’t in the least surprised when you responded positively. I knew, you see, you were the sort at least to give us a fair hearing. The sort that would be actually keen to hear our side of things. No, I wasn’t surprised at all, but I remain immensely grateful. Well now’ - he looked at his watch - ‘we’re a little late, but no matter. The traffic shouldn’t be so bad. Please, this way.’

I followed Christoff around to the back of the white building. Here the wind was less strong and a mass of piping spilling out of the brickwork was emitting a low humming noise. Christoff continued to lead the way towards a spot on the rim of the hill marked by two wooden posts. I pictured a steep drop beyond the posts, but on reaching them I looked down to see a long flight of rickety stone steps leading dizzyingly down the hillside. Far below, the staircase met a paved road where I could make out the shape of a black car waiting, presumably, for us.

‘After you, Mr Ryder,’ Christoff said. ‘Please, descend at your own pace. There’s no hurry.’

However, I noticed he glanced anxiously again at his watch.

‘I’m very sorry we’re late,’ I said. ‘Those photographs took a little longer than I expected.’

‘Please don’t worry, Mr Ryder. I’m sure we’ll get there in good time. Please, after you.’

I felt a little giddy negotiating the first steps. There was no banister on either side and I was obliged to concentrate hard through fear that I would miss a step and fall right the way down the hillside. But thankfully the wind was less troublesome and after a while I found myself growing more confident - it was not so different from descending any other staircase - to the extent that I occasionally took my eyes off my feet altogether to survey the panoramic view before us.

The sky was still overcast, but the sun was beginning to break through the clouds. The road on which the car was waiting, I could now see, was built into a plateau. Beyond it the hill continued its descent down through a mass of tree-tops. Further below yet I could see fields stretching off in all directions into the distance. Faintly visible on the horizon was the skyline of the city.

Christoff remained directly behind me. For the first few minutes, perhaps noticing my nervousness about the descent, he refrained from conversing. But once I had built up my rhythm, he sighed and said:

‘Those woods, Mr Ryder. Down there to your right. Those are the Werdenberger Woods. Many of the wealthier people in this town, they like to have a chalet down there. The Werdenberger Woods are very pleasant. Only a short drive to the city, and yet one feels so far from everything. Once we’re in the car and we drive down the mountainside, you’ll see the chalets. Some are perched right on the edge of sheer drops. The views must be stunning. Rosa would have loved one of those chalets. In fact we had a particular one in mind, I’ll point it out to you as we drive down. One of the more modest ones, but very attractive just the same. The present owner hardly uses it, no more than two or three weeks in the year. If I’d made a good offer, he’d certainly have given it serious consideration. But there’s no point thinking about all that now. That’s all finished with.’

He fell silent for a few moments. Then his voice started again behind me.

‘It’s nothing grand. Rosa and I have never even seen inside it. But we’ve driven past it so many times, we can imagine what it would be like. It sits out on this little promontory, there’s a sheer drop, oh, you’d get the feeling of being suspended high in the sky. You’d see clouds from every window as you walked from room to room. Rosa would have loved it. We used to drive past, slow the car right down, sometimes even stop and sit there imagining it, how it would be inside, picturing it room by room. Well, as I say, that’s all in the past now. Useless to dwell on it. In any case, Mr Ryder, you didn’t agree to give us your precious time just to hear all this. Forgive me. Let us return to more important matters. You know, sir, we are all immensely gratified by your agreeing to come and talk with us. And what a telling contrast to these people, these men who claim to lead this community! On three separate occasions we invited them to attend one of our luncheons, to come and talk over the issues just as you’re about to do. But they wouldn’t entertain it. Not for a second! Far too proud, all of them. Von Winterstein, the Countess, von Braun, all of them. It's because they're uncertain, you see. In their hearts they know they don't understand anything, so they refuse to come and have a proper discussion with us. Three times we've invited them, and each time the bluntest of refusals. But it would have been futile anyway. They wouldn't have understood the half of what we are saying.'

I became silent again. I felt I should make some comment, but it struck me I could only make myself audible by shouting back over my shoulder and I was not prepared to risk taking my eyes off the steps. For the next few minutes, then, we continued our descent in silence, Christoff's breathing becoming increasingly laboured behind me. Then I heard him say:

'To be perfectly fair, it's not their fault. The modern forms, they're so complex now. Kazan, Mullery, Yoshimoto. Even for a trained musician such as myself, it's hard now, very hard. The likes of von Winterstein, the Countess, what chance do they have? They're completely out of their depth. To them it's just crashing noise, a whirl of strange rhythms. Perhaps they've convinced themselves over the years they can hear something there, certain emotions, meanings. But the truth is, they've found nothing at all. They're out of their depth, they'll never understand how modern music works. Once it was simply Mozart, Bach, Tchaikovsky. Even the man in the street could make a reasoned guess about that sort of music. But the modern forms! How can people like this, untrained, provincial people, how can they ever understand such things, however great a sense of duty they feel towards the community? It's hopeless, Mr Ryder. They can't distinguish a crushed cadence from a struck motif. Or a fractured time signature from a sequence of vented rests. And now they misread the whole situation! They want things to go the opposite way! Mr Ryder, if you're getting tired, why don't we take a short rest?'

In fact I had paused a second because a bird, flying alarmingly close to my face, had caused me almost to lose my footing.

‘No, no, I’m fine,’ I called back, recommencing the descent.

‘These steps are rather too grimy to sit on. But if you liked, we could always just pause and stand.’

‘No, really, thank you. I’m fine.’

We proceeded down in silence for the next few minutes. Then Christoff said:

‘In my most detached moments, I actually feel sorry for them. I don’t blame them. After all they’ve done, after all they’ve said about me, I still at times see the situation objectively. And I say to myself, no, it’s really not their fault. It’s not their fault music has become so difficult and complicated. It’s unreasonable to expect anyone in a place like this to comprehend it. And yet these people, these civic leaders, they must give the appearance of knowing what they’re doing. So they repeat certain things to themselves, and after a while, they begin to believe themselves authorities. You see, in a place like this, there’s no one to contradict them. Please be very careful of the next few steps, Mr Ryder. They’re a little crumbled at the edges.’

I took the next several steps very slowly. Then when I glanced up I noticed we had not much further left to go.

‘It would have been useless,’ Christoff’s voice said behind me. ‘Even if they’d accepted our invitation, it would have been useless. They wouldn’t have understood the half of it. You, Mr Ryder, you’ll at least understand our arguments. Even if we fail to convince you, you will, I feel sure, go away with some respect for our position. But of course we hope to persuade you. Convince you that, regardless of my personal fate, the present direction must at all costs be maintained. Yes, you’re a brilliant musician, one of the most gifted presently at work anywhere in the world. But nevertheless, even an expert of your calibre needs to apply his knowledge to a particular set of local conditions. Each community has its own history, its own special needs. The people I'll shortly introduce you to, Mr Ryder, are among the few, the very few in this town one might reasonably describe as intellectuals. They've taken the trouble to analyse the particular conditions that prevail here, and what's more, they - unlike von Winterstein and his sort - they do understand something of how the modern forms work. With their help, in the most civilised and respectful way, naturally, I'm hoping to persuade you, Mr Ryder, to modify your present stance. Of course, everyone you'll meet has the utmost respect for you and all you stand for. But we feel it's possible, even with your powerful insight, there may be certain aspects of the situation here you may not yet have fully appreciated. Here we are.'

In fact there were another twenty or so steps before we reached the road. Christoff remained silent for this last part of the descent. I was relieved, for his latter utterances had begun to annoy me. His implication that I was more or less ignorant of the local conditions, that I was the sort to draw conclusions without bothering with such factors, was quite insulting. I recalled how since my arrival in the city - in spite of my tight schedule, in spite of my fatigue - I had applied myself to this very task of acquainting myself with the local situation. I remembered, for instance, how the previous afternoon, when I could so easily have been taking a well-earned rest in the comfort of the hotel's atrium, I had instead set off into the town to gather my impressions. Indeed, the more I thought about Christoff's words, the more irked I felt, so that when we finally came down to the car and Christoff held open the passenger door for me, I climbed in with barely a word.

'We're not too behind time,' he said, getting into the driver's seat. 'If the traffic's good, we'll be there very quickly. '

As he said this, I remembered all at once my many other commitments for the day. There was, for instance, Fiona - no doubt expecting me at her apartment at any moment. The situation, I could see, would require a certain firmness on my part.

He started the car and we soon found ourselves descending a steeply curving road. Christoff, who appeared to know the road well, took each sharp bend with assurance. As we came lower the road became less vertiginous and the chalets he had mentioned, often precariously perched, began appearing to either side of us. Eventually I turned to him saying:

'Mr Christoff, I've been looking forward very much to this lunch with you and your friends. To hearing your side of things. However, several things have come up unexpectedly this morning, and as a result I find I have a very busy day ahead of me. As a matter of fact, even as we speak ...'

'Mr Ryder, please, you don't have to explain. We knew from the outset how very busy you were likely to be and everyone present, I assure you, will be most understanding. If you leave after an hour and a half, even after an hour, no one, I can assure you, will be in the least offended. They're a fine bunch, the only ones in this town with the ability to think and feel to this level. Whatever the outcome of this lunch, Mr Ryder, I'm sure you'll be pleased to have met them. Many of them I remember when they were young and eager. A fine bunch, I can vouch for each of them. They'd once have thought themselves my protégés, I suppose. They still look up to me. But these days we're colleagues, friends, perhaps something even deeper. These last few years have only made us draw closer. Naturally a few have left me, that's inevitable. But the ones who've stayed, oh, they've been unwavering. I'm proud of them, I love them dearly. They're the best hope for this town, though I know they'll not be allowed any influence here for a good while yet. Ah, Mr Ryder, we'll soon be passing the chalet I was telling you about. It's around this next corner. It'll appear on your side.'

He fell silent, and when I looked at him I noticed he was close to tears. I felt a wave of sympathy for him and said gently:

'One never knows what the future might bring, Mr Christoff. Perhaps you and your wife will find a chalet very much like this some day. If not here, then in some other city.'

Christoff shook his head. 'I know you're trying to be kind, Mr Ryder. But really, there's no point. It's all finished between Rosa and me. She'll leave me. I've known that for some time. In fact the whole town knows it. No doubt you've heard them gossiping.'

'Well, I suppose I did hear one or two things ...'

'I'm sure there's a lot of gossip going about. I don't much care now. The essential thing is that Rosa will soon leave me. She won't tolerate being married to me much longer, not after what's happened. You mustn't get the wrong idea. We've grown to love each other over the years, grown to love each other very much. But you see, with us, that was always the understanding, right from the start. Ah, there it is, Mr Ryder. On your right. Rosa often sat in that seat you're in now and we'd drive past it slowly. Once we were driving past so slowly, we were so absorbed, we nearly collided with a vehicle coming up the hill. But yes, we had an understanding. While I enjoyed the pre-eminence I did in this community, she was able to love me. Oh yes, she loved me, she genuinely loved me. I can say this with utter conviction, Mr Ryder. Because you see, for Rosa, nothing else in life would be more important than to be married to someone in the position I was in. Perhaps that makes her sound a little shallow. But you mustn't misunderstand her. In her own way, in the way she knew, she loved me deeply. In any case, it's nonsense to believe people go on loving each other regardless of what happens. It's just that in Rosa's case, well, the way she is, she's able to love me only under certain circumstances. That doesn't make her love for me any less real.'

For a little while, Christoff was silent again, evidently deep in thought. The road was turning a slow curve, offering a plunging view on my side. I gazed down at the valley below us and could make out what seemed to be an affluent suburb of large houses, each with an acre or so of its own ground.

'I was just remembering,' Christoff said, 'when I first came to this town. How excited they all were. And Rosa, how she came up to me that first time at the Arts Building.' He fell silent again for a moment. Then he said: 'You know, back then, I had no fanciful ideas about myself. By that point in my life I'd come to accept I was no genius. Or anything approaching one. I'd had a career of sorts, but a number of things had happened which had forced me to see my limitations. When I came to this town, my plan was to live quietly - I have a small private income - perhaps do a little teaching, something like that. But then people here, they were so appreciative of my small talents. So pleased I had come here! And after a while, I began thinking. I had, after all, worked hard, very hard, trying to come to terms with modern musical methods. I did understand something about them. I looked around me and thought, well, yes, I could make a contribution here. In a town like this, the way things were then, I saw how I might do it. I saw how I might do some real good. Well, Mr Ryder, after all these years, my belief is that I did do something worthwhile. I believe it sincerely. It's not simply that my protégés - my colleagues, I should say, my friends whom you'll meet shortly - it's not just that they've got me thinking it. No, I believe it, believe it very firmly. I did something worthwhile here. But you know how it is. A town like this. Sooner or later things start to go wrong with people's lives. Discontent grows. And the loneliness. And people like this, who understand almost nothing about music, they say to themselves, oh, we must have had everything entirely wrong. Let's do the complete opposite. These accusations they make against me! They say my approach celebrates the mechanical, that I stifle natural emotion. How little they understand! As we'll demonstrate to you very shortly, Mr Ryder, I merely introduced an approach, a system that would allow people like this some way into the likes of Kazan and Mullery. Some way of discovering meaning and value in the works. I tell you, sir, when I first came here, they were crying out for precisely this. For some ordering, for a system they could comprehend. The people here, they were out of their depth, things were breaking down. People were afraid, they felt things slipping out of control. I have documents with me, you'll see everything shortly. You'll see then, I'm sure, just how misguided the present consensus is. Very well, I'm a mediocrity, that much I don't deny. But you'll see I was always on the right track. That what little I did achieve was a start, a useful contribution. What's needed now - I hope you'll see it, Mr Ryder, if only you would see it, then all might not be lost for this city - what's needed is someone, someone more gifted than myself, very well, but someone to continue, to build on what I've done. I made a contribution, Mr Ryder. I have the proof, you'll see when we arrive.'

We had come out onto a major highway. The road was broad and straight, revealing a large expanse of sky before us. Off in the distance, I could see two heavy lorries travelling in the inner lane, but otherwise the road ahead was virtually empty.

'I hope you don't imagine, Mr Ryder,' said Christoff after a while, 'that my bringing you to this lunch today is some desperate ploy on my part to regain my former pre-eminence here. I fully realise my personal position has become impossible. Besides, I've nothing left to give. I've given it all, everything I had, I've given it all to this city. I want to go away somewhere now, far away, somewhere quiet, by myself, and have nothing more to do with music. My protégés, naturally, they'll be devastated when I leave. They still haven't accepted it. They want me to fight back. One word from me, they'd set to work, they'd do their utmost, go door to door even. I've told them how things stand, I've explained very frankly, but they still can't accept it. It's so difficult for them. They've looked up to me for so long, always found their meanings through me. They'll be devastated. But it makes no difference, it has to finish now. I want it to end. Even Rosa. Every minute of our marriage has been precious to me, Mr Ryder. But knowing it will finish, yet not knowing quite when - it's been terrible. I want it all to end now. I wish Rosa well. I hope she finds someone else, someone of proper stature. I just hope she has the sense to look beyond this town. This town can't provide the sort of figure she needs for a husband. No one here understands music properly. Ah, but if only I had your talent, Mr Ryder! Then Rosa and I, we could grow old together.'

The sky had become overcast. The traffic remained sparse and we found ourselves regularly overtaking long-distance lorries before speeding on. Thick forests appeared to either side, then eventually gave way to flat expanses of farmland. The tiredness of the last several days began to catch up with me, and as I continued to watch the highway unwind before us, I found it difficult not to doze. Then I heard Christoff's voice say: 'Ah, here we are,' and I opened my eyes again.

We had slowed right down and were approaching a small café - a white bungalow - standing alone on the roadside. It was the sort of place one might imagine lorry drivers stopping for a sandwich, though as Christoff steered the car across the gravelled forecourt and brought it to a halt, there were no other vehicles to be seen.

‘We’re having lunch here?’ I asked.

‘Yes. Our little circle, we’ve gathered here for years now. Everything’s very informal.’

We got out and walked towards the café. As we approached I could see bright pieces of cardboard hung from the awning, announcing various special offers.

‘Everything’s very informal,’ Christoff said again, opening the door for me. ‘Please make yourself at home.’

The décor inside was very basic. There were large picture windows going all the way round the room. Here and there posters advertising soft drinks or peanuts had been put up with sellotape. Some had become faded in the sunlight and one of them had turned simply into a rectangle of pale blue. Even now, with the sky overcast, there was a harshness to the daylight falling across the room.

There were eight or nine people already present, all seated at the tables near the back. They each had in front of them steaming bowls of what looked to be mashed potato. They had been eating hungrily with long wooden spoons, but now they all stopped and stared at me. One or two began to stand up, but Christoff greeted them cheerily, waving to them to remain seated. Then, turning to me, he said:

‘As you can see, lunch has started without us. But given our lateness, I’m sure you’ll excuse them. As for the others, well, I’m sure they won’t be much longer. In any case, we shouldn’t waste any more time. If you’d just step this way, Mr Ryder, I’ll introduce you to my good friends here.’

I was about to follow him when we became aware of a heavy bearded man in a striped apron signalling furtively to us from behind the service counter nearby.

‘Very well, Gerhard,’ Christoff said, turning to the man with a shrug. ‘I’ll start with you. This is Mr Ryder.’

The bearded man shook my hand saying: ‘Your lunch will be ready in no time, sir. You must be very hungry.’ Then he muttered something quickly to Christoff, glancing as he did so towards the rear of the café.

Both Christoff and I followed the bearded man’s gaze. As though he had been waiting for our attention to turn to him, a man who had been sitting by himself in the far corner now rose to his feet. He was portly and grey-haired, perhaps in his mid-fifties, dressed in a brilliant white jacket and shirt. He started to come towards us, then, stopping near the middle of the room, smiled at Christoff.

‘Henri,’ he said, and held up his arms in greeting.

Christoff stared coldly at the man, then turned away. ‘There’s nothing for you here,’ he said.

The white-jacketed man seemed not to hear. ‘I was just watching you, Henri,’ he continued genially, gesturing out of the window. ‘Walking across from your car. You’re still walking with that stoop. It used to be a sort of affectation, but now it seems to be there for real. There’s no need for it, Henri. Things may not be going your way, but there’s no need for a stoop.’

Christoff continued to keep his back turned to the man.

‘Come on, Henri. This is childish.’

‘I’ve told you,’ Christoff said. ‘We’ve nothing to say to each other.’

The white-jacketed man shrugged and took a few more steps towards us.

‘Mr Ryder,’ he said, ‘since Henri is determined not to introduce us, I’ll introduce myself. I’m Dr Lubanski. As you know, Henri and I were very close once. But now, you see, he doesn’t even talk to me.’

‘You’re not welcome here.’ Christoff was still not looking at the man. ‘Nobody wants you here.’

‘You see, Mr Ryder? Henri’s always had this childish side to him. So silly. Myself, I long ago came to terms with the fact that our paths have diverged. Once we used to sit and talk for hours. Didn’t we, Henri? Dissecting some work or other, arguing it through from every angle over our beers at the Schoppenhaus. I still think back fondly to those days at the Schoppenhaus. Sometimes I even wish I’d never had the good sense to disagree. That we could sit down again tonight, spend more hours arguing and discussing music, about how you’d prepare this or that piece. I live alone, Mr Ryder. As you can imagine’ – he laughed lightly – ‘things can get a little lonely at times. And then I start remembering how it was in those days. I think to myself, how good it would be, just to sit down with Henri again and talk over some score he’s preparing. There was a time he wouldn’t do anything without first consulting me about it. Wasn’t that so, Henri? Come on, let’s not be childish. Let’s at least be civil.’

‘Why today of all days?’ Christoff shouted suddenly.

‘No one wants you here! They’re all still very angry at you! Look! Look for yourself!’

Dr Lubanski, ignoring this outburst, embarked on some other reminiscence concerning himself and Christoff. The point of the story quickly eluded me and I found my gaze wandering past him to those watching nervously from the tables at the back.

None of them appeared to be over forty years of age. Three were women and one of them in particular, I noticed, was looking at me with a peculiar intensity. She was in her early thirties, dressed in long black clothes and wearing spectacles with small, thick lenses. I would have studied the others more closely, but just at this point I remembered again what a busy day still lay before me, and how imperative it was that I remained firm with my present hosts if I were not to be detained here beyond the allotted time.

As Dr Lubanski came to a pause, I touched Christoff's arm, saying quietly: 'I wonder if the others will be much longer.'

'Well ...' Christoff glanced around the room. Then he said: 'It seems this might be all for today.'

I had the impression he was hoping to be contradicted. When no one said anything he turned back to me with a short laugh.

'A small gathering,' he said, 'but nevertheless we have ... we have the best minds of the town here, I assure you. Now Mr Ryder, please.'

He began to introduce his friends to me. Each smiled nervously and uttered a greeting as his or her name was called. All the while, I was aware of Dr Lubanski walking away slowly towards the back of the room, never taking his gaze off the proceedings. Then, as Christoff was coming to the end of his introductions, Dr Lubanski let out a loud laugh, causing the former to break off and throw a look of cold fury towards him. Dr Lubanski, who by this time had seated himself again at his table in the corner, gave another laugh and said:

'Well, Henri, whatever else you've lost over the years, you've not lost your nerve. You're going to repeat the whole Offenbach saga to Mr Ryder? To Mr Ryder?' He shook his head.

Christoff went on staring at his former friend. Some devastating retort seemed about to leave his lips, but then at the last moment he turned away without speaking.

'Throw me out if you like,' Dr Lubanski said, starting on his mashed potato again. 'But it's beginning to look as though' - he waved his spoon around the room - 'as though not everyone here is finding my presence so irksome. We could put it to a vote perhaps. I'd gladly leave if I'm genuinely not wanted. What about a show of hands?'

'If you insist on staying, I don't care in the least,' Christoff said. 'It makes no difference. I have my facts. I have them here.' He raised a blue folder he had produced from somewhere and tapped it. 'I'm quite sure of my ground. You can do what you want.'

Dr Lubanski turned to the others with a shrug that seemed to say: 'What can you possibly do with someone like this?' The young woman with the thick spectacles immediately looked away, but her companions seemed mostly confused, one or two of them even smiling back shyly.

'Mr Ryder,' Christoff said, 'please sit down and make yourself comfortable. As soon as Gerhard returns, he will serve you lunch. Now' - he clapped his hands together and his voice assumed the tones of someone addressing a large hall - 'ladies and gentlemen. I must first of all thank Mr Ryder, on behalf of each of us present today, for agreeing to come and debate with us in the midst of what must surely be a very busy few days ...'

'You've certainly got nerve,' Dr Lubanski called from the back. 'Not intimidated by me, not even by Mr Ryder. Quite a nerve, Henri.'

'I'm not intimidated,' Christoff retorted, 'because I have the facts! Facts are facts! I have it here! The evidence! Yes, even Mr Ryder. Yes, sir' - he turned to me

- 'even a man of your reputation. Even you are obliged to defer to facts!'

'Well, this will be worth witnessing,' Dr Lubanski said to the others. 'A provincial cellist lecturing Mr Ryder. Fine, let's hear it, let's hear it.'

For a second or two, Christoff hesitated. Then with some resolve he opened his folder saying: 'If I may start with a single case, which I think leads us to the heart of the controversy concerning ringed harmonies.'

For the next few minutes, Christoff outlined the background to the case of a certain local business family, leafing through his folder, reading out the occasional quotation or statistic. He seemed to present his case competently enough, but there was something about his tone - his unnecessarily slow delivery, the way he explained things twice and three times - that quickly got on my nerves. Indeed, it occurred to me Dr Lubanski had a point. There was something preposterous about this failed local musician presuming to lecture me.

'Now that you call a fact?' Dr Lubanski suddenly broke in as Christoff was reading from the minutes of a civic committee meeting. 'Ha! Henri's "facts" are always interesting, aren't they?'

'Let him have his say! Let Henri present his case to Mr Ryder!'

The young man who had spoken up had a pudgy face and a short leather jacket. Christoff smiled at him approvingly. Dr Lubanski raised his hands, saying: 'All right, all right.'

'Let him have his say!' the pudgy-faced young man said again. 'Then we'll see. We'll see what Mr Ryder makes of it all. Then we'll find out once and for all.'

It seemed to take Christoff a good few seconds to absorb the implication of these last words. At first he remained frozen, the folder held aloft in his arms. Then he looked around at the faces surrounding him as though for the first time. All about the room there were searching gazes directed at him. For a moment Christoff appeared badly shaken. Looking away he muttered, almost to himself:

‘These are indeed facts. I’ve gathered evidence here. Any one of you can see it, peruse it.’ He peered into his folder. ‘I’m just summarising the evidence for brevity. That’s all.’ Then with an effort he seemed to regain his poise. ‘Mr Ryder,’ he said, ‘if you will bear with me a moment. I believe things will be much clearer very shortly.’

Christoff carried on with his argument, a slight tension in his voice, but otherwise in much the same manner as before. As he talked on, I remembered how the previous night I had given up precious hours of sleep in order to carry out further my investigations of the local conditions. How, despite my great tiredness, I had sat in the cinema, talking through the issues with the town’s leading citizens. Christoff’s repeated assumptions about my ignorance – even now, he was embarking on a long digression to explain a point completely obvious to me – were steadily bringing me to the point of exasperation.

I was not, it seemed, alone in my impatience. A number of others in the room were shifting uncomfortably. I noticed the young woman with the thick spectacles glaring from Christoff’s face to mine, and several times she looked to be on the verge of interrupting. But in the end it was a man with closely cropped hair sitting somewhere behind me who broke in.

‘Just one moment, one moment. Before we go further, let’s just get one thing settled. Once and for all.’

Dr Lubanski’s laugh again came from the back of the café. ‘Claude and his pigmented triad! You still haven’t resolved that?’

... 'Claude,' Christoff said, 'this is hardly the time ...'

'No! Now that Mr Ryder's here, I want it settled.'

'Claude, this isn't the time to raise that again. I'm presenting an argument to show ...'

'Perhaps it's trivial. But let's get it settled. Mr Ryder, Mr Ryder, is it truly the case that pigmented triads have intrinsic emotional values regardless of context? Do you believe that?'

I sensed the focus of the room fixing upon me. Christoff gave me a swift look, something like a plea mingled with fear. But in view of the earnestness of the enquiry - to say nothing of Christoff's presumptuous behaviour up to this point - I saw no reason not to reply in the frankest terms. I thus said:

'A pigmented triad has no intrinsic emotional properties. In fact, its emotional colour can change significantly not only according to context, but according to volume. This is my personal opinion.'

No one spoke, but the impact of my statement was discernible. One by one, hard gazes turned towards Christoff - who meanwhile was pretending to be engrossed in his folder. Then the man called Claude said quietly:

'I knew it. I always knew it.'

'But he convinced you you were wrong,' Dr Lubanski said. 'He bullied you into believing you were wrong.'

'What has this to do with anything?' Christoff cried.

'Claude, look, you've taken us on a complete tangent. And Mr Ryder has so little time. We must return to the Offenbach case.'

But Claude seemed to be lost in thought. Eventually he turned and looked towards Dr Lubanski, who nodded and smiled back gravely.

‘Mr Ryder has very little time,’ Christoff said again. ‘So if you’d all allow me, I’ll try and summarise my argument.’

Christoff began to go through what he considered the key points concerning the tragedy of the Offenbach family. He was affecting an air of nonchalance, though by now it was clear to everyone he was badly upset. In any case, around this point, I ceased to attend to him, his remark concerning my lack of time having caused me suddenly to remember Boris sitting waiting for me in that little café.

A considerable period, I realised, had elapsed since I had left him there. A picture came into my mind of the little boy, shortly after my departure, sitting in his corner with his drink and cheesecake, still full of anticipation about the trip before him. I could see him gazing cheerfully towards the other customers out in the sunny courtyard, now and then looking beyond them to the traffic in the street, thinking how before long he too would be out there travelling. He would recall once more the old apartment, the cupboard in the corner of the living room where, he had become increasingly certain, he had left the box containing Number Nine. Then as the minutes went by, the doubts that had always been lurking somewhere, doubts he had so far kept well buried, would begin creeping to the surface. But for a while yet, Boris would succeed in keeping up his spirits. I had simply been detained unexpectedly. Or perhaps I had gone somewhere to buy a picnic to take on the trip. In any case, there was still plenty remaining of the day. Then the waitress, the plump Scandinavian girl, would ask if he wanted anything further, betraying as she did so a note of concern which Boris would not fail to detect. And he would make a renewed show of being unworried, perhaps ordering with bravado another glass of milk shake. But the minutes would tick on. Boris would notice, outside in the courtyard, customers who had sat down long after his arrival closing their newspapers, getting up and leaving. He would see the sky clouding over, the day moving into the afternoon. He would think again of the old apartment he had so loved, the cupboard in the living room, Number Nine, and slowly, as he picked away at the remains of his cheesecake, he would begin to resign himself to the idea that yet again he would be let down, that we would not set off on the journey after all.

Several voices were shouting around me. A young man in a green suit had risen to his feet and was trying to make a point to Christoff, while at least three others were waving their fingers to emphasise something.

‘But that’s an irrelevance,’ Christoff was shouting over them. ‘And in any case, it’s just Mr Ryder’s personal opinion ...’

This brought an onslaught down on him, almost everyone in the room attempting to respond at the same time. But in the end Christoff again managed to shout them down.

‘Yes! Yes! I’m aware of exactly who Mr Ryder is! But local conditions, local conditions, that’s another matter! He doesn’t yet know about our particular conditions! While I ... I have here ...’

The rest of this statement was drowned out, but Christoff raised the blue folder high above his head and waved it.

‘The nerve! The nerve!’ Dr Lubanski was calling from the back with a laugh.

‘With all respect, sir’ - Christoff was now addressing me directly - ‘with all respect, I am surprised you aren’t more interested in hearing about the conditions here. In fact, I’m surprised, your expertise notwithstanding, I’m surprised you should simply leap to your conclusions ...’

The chorus of protest came again, now more furious than ever.

‘For instance ...’ Christoff yelled over the top. ‘For instance, I was very surprised that you should allow the press to photograph you in front of the Sattler monument!’

To my consternation, this brought sudden silence.

‘Yes!’ Christoff was clearly delighted at the effect he had created. ‘Yes! I saw him! When I picked him up earlier on. Standing right in front of the Sattler monument. Smiling, gesturing towards it!’

The shocked silence continued. Some of those present seemed to grow embarrassed, while others – including the young woman with the thick spectacles – stared at me questioningly. I smiled and was about to make some comment when Dr Lubanski’s voice, now controlled and authoritative, said from the back:

‘If Mr Ryder chooses to make such a gesture, it can only indicate one thing. That the extent of our misguidedness is even deeper than we suspected.’

All eyes turned to him as he rose and came a few steps closer to the gathering. Dr Lubanski stopped and leant his head to one side as though listening to the distant sounds of the highway. Then he continued:

‘His message is one we must each of us examine carefully and take to our hearts. The Sattler monument! Of course, he’s right! It’s not overstating the case, not for one moment! Look at you, still trying to cling onto Henri’s foolish notions! Even those of us who’ve seen them for what they are, even us, the truth is we’ve remained complacent. The Sattler monument! Yes, that’s it. This city is at crisis point. Crisis point!’

It was gratifying that Dr Lubanski had immediately highlighted the preposterousness of Christoff’s statement, at the same time underlining the strong message I had wished to send out to the city. Nevertheless, my indignation towards Christoff was now considerable and I decided it was high time

I cut him down to size. But the whole room was again shouting all at once. The man named Claude was repeatedly banging his fist on a table surface to emphasise a point to a grizzled man with braces and muddy boots. At least four people, from different parts of the room, were shouting at Christoff. The situation seemed on the verge of chaos and it occurred to me this was as good a point as any to take my leave. But as I stood up, the young woman with thick spectacles materialised in front of me.

‘Mr Ryder, please tell us,’ she said. ‘Let’s get to the bottom of it. Is Henri right in believing we can’t at any cost abandon the circular dynamic in Kazan?’

She had not spoken loudly, but her voice had a penetrating quality. The whole room heard her question and immediately became quiet. A few of her companions gave her searching looks, but she glared back defiantly.

‘No, I’ll ask it,’ she said. ‘This is a unique opportunity. We can’t waste it. I’ll ask it. Mr Ryder, please. Tell us.’

‘But I have the facts,’ Christoff muttered miserably. ‘Here. I have it all.’

No one paid him any attention, every gaze having focused once more on me. Realising I would have to choose my next words carefully, I paused a moment. Then I said:

‘My own view is that Kazan never benefits from formalised restraints. Neither from the circular dynamic, nor even a double-bar structure. There are simply too many layers, too many emotions, especially in the later works.’

I could feel, almost physically, the tide of respect sweeping towards me. The pudgy-faced man was looking at me with something close to awe. A woman in a scarlet anorak was muttering: ‘That’s it, that’s it,’ as though I had just articulated something she had been struggling to formulate for years. The man named Claude had risen to his feet and now took a few steps towards me, nodding vigorously. Dr Lubanski was also nodding, but slowly and with his eyes closed as if to say: 'Yes, yes, here at last is someone who really knows.' The young woman with the thick spectacles though had remained quite still, continuing to watch me carefully.

'I can understand,' I went on, 'the temptation to resort to such devices. There's a natural fear of the music flooding the musician's resources. But the answer surely is to rise to such a challenge, not to resort to restraints. Of course, the challenge might be too great, in which case the answer is to leave Kazan well alone. One should not, in any case, attempt to make a virtue out of one's limitations.'

At this last remark, many in the room seemed no longer able to hold back their feelings. The grizzled man with the muddy boots broke into vigorous applause, throwing snarling looks towards Christoff as he did so. Several others started to shout again at Christoff, and the woman in the scarlet anorak was again repeating, this time more loudly: 'That's it, that's it, that's it.' I felt strangely exhilarated and, raising my voice above the mounting excitement, continued:

'These failures of nerve are, in my experience, very often associated with certain other unattractive traits. A hostility towards the introspective tone, most often characterised by an over-use of the crushed cadence. A fondness for pointlessly matching fragmented passages with each other. And at the more personal level, a megalomania masquerading behind a modest and kindly manner ...'

I was obliged to break off because everyone in the room was now shouting at Christoff. He in turn was holding up his blue folder, thumbing its pages in the air, crying: 'The facts are here! Here!'

'Of course,' I shouted above the noise, 'this is another common failing. The belief that putting something in a folder will turn it into a fact!'

This was met by a roar of laughter that had at its heart an uncoiling fury. Then the young woman with the thick spectacles rose to her feet and went up to Christoff. She did so very calmly, transgressing the small area of space that had hitherto been maintained around the cellist.

‘You old fool,’ she said, and again her voice penetrated clearly through the clamour. ‘You’ve dragged us all down with you.’ Then, with some deliberation, she struck Christoff’s cheek with the outside of her hand.

There was a stunned pause. Then suddenly people were rising from their chairs, pushing one another aside in an attempt to reach Christoff, the desire to follow the young woman’s example evidently seizing them with some urgency. I was aware of a hand shaking my shoulder but for the moment was too preoccupied with what was unfolding before me to attend.

‘No, no, that’s enough!’ Dr Lubanski had somehow reached Christoff first and was holding up his hands. ‘No, let Henri be! What do you think you’re doing? That’s enough!’

Possibly it was only Dr Lubanski’s intervention that saved Christoff from a full-scale assault. I caught a glimpse of Christoff’s bewildered, frightened face, and then an angry circle settled around him and he ceased to be visible to me. The hand was shaking my shoulder again and I turned to find the bearded man with the apron – I recalled that his name was Gerhard – holding a steaming bowl of mashed potato.

‘Would you care for some lunch, Mr Ryder?’ he asked. ‘I’m sorry it’s a little late. But you see, we had to start a new vat.’

‘That’s very kind of you,’ I said, ‘but actually I really have to be going. I’ve left my little boy waiting for me.’ Then, leading him away from the noise, I said to him: ‘I wonder if you would show me through to the front.’ For indeed, I had at that moment remembered that this café and the one in which I had left Boris were in fact parts of the same building, this being one of those establishments offering contrasting rooms - opening onto separate streets - catering to different kinds of clientele.

The bearded man was clearly disappointed by my refusal of lunch, but he recovered quickly, saying: 'Of course, Mr Ryder. It's this way.'

I followed him to the front of the room and round the service counter. There he unlatched a small door and indicated for me to go through. As I was doing so I took a last glance back and saw the pudgy-faced man up on a table top, waving Christoff's blue folder in the air. There were now hoots of laughter amidst the angry shouts, while Dr Lubanski's voice could be heard appealing with some emotion:

'No, Henri's had enough! Please, please! That's enough!'

I came through into a spacious kitchen tiled entirely in white. There was a strong smell of vinegar and I caught a glimpse of a large woman bent over a sizzling stove, but the bearded man had already crossed the floor and was opening another door in the far corner of the kitchen.

'It's this way, sir,' he said, ushering me.

The door was peculiarly tall and narrow. Indeed, it was so narrow I saw I would only pass through it by turning myself sideways. Moreover, when I peered in, I could see only darkness; there was nothing to suggest I was looking into anything other than a broom cupboard. But the bearded man made his ushering motion again and said:

'Please be careful of the steps, Mr Ryder.'

I then saw there were three steps - they appeared to be made from wooden boxes nailed one on top of the other - rising immediately from the threshold. I eased myself through the doorway and took each one with caution. As I reached the top step, I saw in front of me a small rectangle of light. Two paces forward brought me right up to it and I found myself looking through a glass panel into a room filled with sunlight. I saw tables and chairs, and then I recognised the room where I had earlier left Boris. There was the plump young waitress - I was viewing the room from behind her counter - and, over in the corner, Boris gazing into space with a disgruntled expression. He had finished his cheesecake and was absent-mindedly running his fork up and down the tablecloth. Apart from a young couple sitting near the windows, the interior of the café was otherwise empty.

I felt something pushing against my side and realised the bearded man had squeezed up behind me and was now crouched down in the dark, jangling a set of keys. The next moment the whole of the partition before me opened and I found myself stepping into the café.

The waitress turned to me and smiled. Then she called across to Boris: 'Look who's here!'

Boris turned to me and pulled a long face. 'Where've you been?' he said wearily. 'You've been ages.'

'I'm very sorry, Boris,' I said. Then I asked the waitress: 'Has he been behaving himself?'

'Oh, he's a complete charmer. He's been telling me all about where you used to live. On that estate by the artificial lake.'

'Ah yes,' I said. 'The artificial lake. Yes, we were just about to go there now.'

'But you've been absolutely ages!' Boris said. 'Now we'll be late!'

'I'm very sorry, Boris. But don't worry, we still have plenty of time. And the old apartment isn't about to go away, is it? Still, you're quite right, we ought to be setting off straight away. Now let me see.' I turned back to the waitress who had started to say something to the bearded man.

‘Excuse me, but I wonder if you could tell us how we can most easily get to this artificial lake.’

‘The artificial lake?’ The waitress pointed out of the window. ‘That bus waiting outside. That will take you right there.’

I looked where she was pointing and saw beyond the parasols in the courtyard a bus parked in the busy street more or less directly in front of us.

‘It’s been waiting there a long time already,’ the waitress went on. ‘So you’d better jump on. I think it’s due to leave any moment.’

I thanked her and, motioning to Boris, led the way out of the building into the sunshine.

We boarded the bus just as the driver was starting his engine. As I bought the tickets from him, I saw the bus was very full and remarked worriedly:

‘I hope my boy and I will be able to sit together.’

‘Oh, don’t worry,’ the driver said. ‘They’re a good crowd. Just leave it to me.’

With that he turned and bellowed something over his shoulder. There had been an unusually merry hubbub in progress, but the whole bus went quiet. Then the next moment, all over the bus, passengers were getting up from their seats, pointing, waving and generally conferring about how we might be best accommodated. A large woman leaned into the central aisle and called: ‘Over here! You can sit here!’ But another voice from another part of the bus shouted: ‘If you’ve got a little boy, it’s better over here, he won’t get sick. I’ll move over next to Mr Hartmann.’ Then another conference seemed to commence concerning our options.

‘You see, they’re a good crowd,’ the driver said cheerfully. ‘Newcomers always get a special welcome. Well, if you’d make yourselves comfortable, I’ll start us on our way.’

Boris and I hurried down the bus to where two passengers were standing in the aisle pointing to our seat. I let Boris in nearest the window and sat down just as the bus began to pull away.

Almost immediately I felt a tap on my shoulder and someone in the seat behind was reaching over to offer a packet of sweets.

‘The little boy might like this,’ a man’s voice said.

‘Thank you,’ I said. Then more loudly to the whole bus, I said: ‘Thank you. Thank you, all of you. You’ve all been most civil.’

‘Look!’ Boris clutched excitedly at my arm. ‘We’re going out onto the north highway.’

Before I could respond, a middle-aged woman appeared beside me in the aisle. Grasping the head-rest of my seat to maintain her balance, she held out a piece of cake on a paper napkin.

‘A gentleman at the back had this left over,’ she said. ‘He wondered if the young man would like it.’

I accepted it gratefully, once more thanking the bus in general. Then, as the woman disappeared, I heard a voice a few seats away saying: ‘It’s good to see a father and son getting on so well. Here they are, going on a little day trip together. We don’t see this sort of thing nearly enough these days.’

I felt a powerful surge of pride at these words and glanced towards Boris. Perhaps he too had heard, for he gave me a smile that had more than a hint of the conspiratorial about it.

‘Boris,’ I said, handing him the cake, ‘isn’t this a marvellous bus? It was worth the wait, don’t you think?’

Boris smiled again, but he was now examining the cake and said nothing.

‘Boris,’ I went on, ‘I’ve been meaning to say to you. Because you might wonder sometimes. You see, Boris, I could never have wished for anything better ...’ I laughed suddenly. ‘I’m sounding silly. What I mean is, I’m very happy. About you. Very happy we’re together.’ I gave another laugh. ‘Aren’t you enjoying this bus ride?’

Boris nodded, his mouth full of cake. ‘It’s good,’ he said.

‘I’m certainly enjoying it. And what kind people.’

At the back of the bus a few of the passengers began to sing. I felt very relaxed and sank deeper into my seat. Outside the day had grown overcast again. We were still in a built-up part of the town, but as I watched I saw two road signs go by, one after the other, marked: ‘North Highway’.

‘Excuse me,’ a man’s voice said somewhere behind us.

‘But I heard you saying to the driver you were going to the artificial lake. I hope it won’t be too chilly out there for you both. If you were just wanting somewhere nice to spend the afternoon, I’d recommend you get off a few stops earlier at the Maria Christina Gardens. There’s a boating pond there the young man might like.’

The speaker was sitting directly behind us. The backs of our seats were tall and I could not see the man clearly even though I craned round to do so. In any case I thanked him for his suggestion – it was clearly well meant – and started to explain the special nature of our visit to the artificial lake. I had not intended to go into detail, but once I had started I found there was something about the convivial atmosphere around us that compelled me to go on talking. In fact, I was rather pleased by the tone I happened to strike, perfectly poised between seriousness and jocularly. Moreover, I could tell from the sensitive murmurs coming from behind me that the man was listening carefully and sympathetically. In any case, before long, I found myself explaining about Number Nine and just why he was so special. I was just recounting how Boris had come to leave him behind in the box when the passenger interrupted with a polite cough.

‘Excuse me,’ he said, ‘but a trip of this kind is almost bound to cause a little worry. It’s perfectly natural. But really, if I may say so, I think you have every reason to be optimistic.’ He was presumably leaning right forward in his seat, for his voice, calm and soothing, was coming from a spot just behind where Boris's shoulder was touching mine.

'I feel sure you'll find this Number Nine. Of course, you're worried just now. So many things could have gone wrong, you're thinking. That's only natural. But from what you've just told me, I feel sure it'll turn out well. Of course, when you first knock on the door, the new people might not know who you are and be a little suspicious. But then once you've explained they're bound to welcome you in. If it's the wife who's answered the door, she'll say: "Oh, at last! We've been wondering when you'd be coming round." Yes, I'm sure she will. And she'll turn and shout to her husband:

"It's the little boy who used to live here!" And then the husband will come out, he'll be some kindly man, perhaps he'll be in the middle of re-decorating the apartment. And he'll say: "Well, at last. Come on in and have some tea." And he'll show you into the main room, while his wife slips into the kitchen to prepare the refreshments. And you'll notice straight away how much the place has changed since you were there, and the husband will see this and at first he'll be a little apologetic. But then, once you've made it quite clear you're not at all resentful about their changing things, he's sure to start showing you around the place, around the whole apartment, pointing out this change, that change, most of which he's seen to with his own hands and about which he's very proud. And then the wife will come into the living room with the tea and some little cakes she's made, and you'll all sit down and enjoy yourselves, eating and drinking, listening to this couple talking about how much they like the apartment and the estate. Of course, through all this, you'll both be concerned about Number Nine and be waiting for the right moment to bring up the purpose of your visit. But I expect they'll raise it first. I expect the wife will say, after you've been talking and drinking tea for a good while, she'll say: "And was there something you came back for? Something you left behind?" And that's when you could mention this Number Nine and the box. And then she's bound to say: "Oh yes, we kept that box in a special place.

We could see it was something important.” And even as she’s saying this, she’ll give her husband a little signal. Perhaps not even a signal, husbands and wives become almost telepathic when they’ve lived happily together for as many years as this couple have done. Of course, that’s not to say they don’t quarrel. Oh no, they may even have quarrelled quite often, perhaps even gone through patches over the years when they seriously fell out. But you’ll see when you meet them, a couple like this, you’ll see these things sort themselves out in the end and that they’re essentially very happy together. Well, the husband, he’ll go and fetch the box from some place where they keep important things, he’ll bring it in, perhaps it’ll be wrapped up in tissue paper. And of course, you’ll open it straight away and this Number Nine, he’ll be there inside, just the way you left him, still waiting to be glued to his base. So then you can close the box and the nice people will offer you some more tea. Then after a while you’ll say you’ll have to be going, you don’t wish to impose on them too much. But the wife will insist you have more of her cake. And the husband will want to show you both around the apartment one last time to admire all his redecorating. Then finally they’ll wave you off from the doorstep, saying to be sure to call whenever you’re passing by again. Of course, it may not happen precisely like this, but from what you’ve told me, I feel sure, by and large, that’s how things will turn out. So there’s no need to worry, no need at all ...’

The man’s voice in my ear, together with the gentle swaying of the bus as it proceeded along the highway, was producing an enormously relaxing effect. I had already closed my eyes soon after the man had started to speak, and now around this point, sinking further into my seat, I dozed off contentedly.

I became aware that Boris was shaking my shoulder. ‘We’ve got to get off now,’ he was saying.

Becoming fully awake, I realised the bus had come to a halt and that we were the only remaining passengers. At the front the driver had risen to his feet and was patiently waiting for us to disembark. As we made our way down the aisle, the driver said:

‘Do take care. It’s very chilly out there. That lake, in my opinion, should be filled. It’s nothing but a nuisance and every year several people drown in it. Admittedly some of these are suicides, and I suppose if the lake weren’t there, they might choose some other more unpleasant method. But in my view the lake should be filled.’

‘Yes,’ I said. ‘Obviously the lake provokes controversy. I’m an outsider myself so I tend to keep out of these arguments.’

‘Very wise, sir. Well, do enjoy your day.’ Then, saluting Boris, he said: ‘Enjoy yourself, young man.’

Boris and I stepped down off the bus and as it drove away looked around at our surroundings. We were standing on the outer rim of a vast concrete basin. Some distance away, at the centre of the basin, was the artificial lake, its kidney shape making it resemble some gigantic version of the kind of vulgar swimming pool Hollywood stars were once reputed to own. I could not help admiring the way the lake – indeed the whole estate – proudly announced its artificiality. There was no trace of grass anywhere. Even the thin trees dotted around the concrete slopes had all been encased in steel pots and cut precisely into the paving. Looking down on the whole scene, completely encircling us, were the countless identical windows of the high-rise housing blocks. I noticed there was a subtle curve to the front of each block, making possible the seamless circular effect reminiscent of a sports stadium. But for all the apartments now surrounding us – at least four hundred, I guessed – there were hardly any people to be seen. I could make out a few figures walking briskly on the other side of the lake – a man with a dog, a woman with a pram - but there was clearly something about the atmosphere that kept people indoors. Certainly, as the bus driver had warned, the climate was not conducive. Even as Boris and I stood there a bitter wind came blowing across the water.

‘Well, Boris,’ I said, ‘we’d better get a move on.’

The little boy seemed to have lost all his enthusiasm. He was staring emptily at the lake and did not move. I turned towards the block behind us, making an effort to put a spring into my step, but then remembered I did not know where in all this vastness our particular apartment was situated.

‘Boris, why don’t you lead the way? Come on, what’s the matter?’

Boris sighed then began to walk. I followed him up several flights of concrete stairs. Once, as we were turning the corner to climb the next flight, he let out a shriek and stiffened into a martial arts posture. I was startled, but saw immediately there was no assailant other than in the boy’s imagination. I said simply:

‘Very good, Boris.’

Thereafter, he repeated the shriek and the pose before turning up each new flight of stairs. Then to my relief - I was growing short of breath - Boris led us off the stairs and along a walkway. From this higher vantage point, the kidney shape of the lake was all the more evident. The sky was a dull white and although the walkway was covered - there must have been two or three more running directly above - there was scant shelter and gusts of wind blew at us with savage force. On our left-hand side were the apartments, a series of short concrete stairways linking the walkway to the main building like little bridges across a moat. Some of the stairways led up to apartment doors while others led down. As we walked on, I found myself studying each of these doors, but when after a few minutes none of them had stirred even the faintest memory I gave up and glanced out at the view over the lake.

Boris, all the while, had been walking purposefully a few paces ahead, his excitement for our venture having apparently returned. He was whispering to himself, and the longer we walked the more his whispering seemed to grow in intensity. Then he began to jump as he walked, throwing karate blows at the air, the clatter of his feet echoing about us each time he landed. But he refrained from shrieking as he had on the stairs, and since we had not yet encountered a single person on the walkway, I decided there was no cause to restrain him.

After a while I happened to glance down at the lake and was surprised to find I was now looking at it from a considerably different angle. Only then did it occur to me that the walkway described a gradual circle right the way round the estate. It was perfectly possible that we could walk in circles indefinitely. I watched Boris hurrying on in front of me, busily performing his antics, and wondered if he remembered the way to the apartment any better than I did. Indeed, it occurred to me I had not planned matters at all well. I should at the very least have taken the trouble to contact beforehand the new occupants of the apartment. After all, when one thought about it, there was no reason why they would particularly wish to entertain us. A pessimism about the whole expedition began to come over me.

‘Boris,’ I called to him, ‘I hope you’re paying attention. We don’t want to walk right past it.’

He glanced back at me without ceasing his furious mutterings, then ran on further ahead and recommenced his karate movements.

Eventually it struck me we had been walking an inordinate time, and when I glanced down again at the lake, I could see we had come at least a full circle around it. Ahead of me Boris was still muttering busily to himself.

‘Look, wait a moment,’ I called to him. ‘Boris, wait.’

He stopped walking and gave me a sulky look as I came up to him.

‘Boris,’ I said gently, ‘are you sure you remember the way to the old apartment?’

He shrugged and looked away. Then he said lamely: ‘Of course I do.’

‘But we seem to have gone right the way round.’

Boris shrugged again. He had become engrossed by his shoe, which he was angling one way and then the other. Eventually he said: ‘They would have kept Number Nine safe, wouldn’t they?’

‘I should think so, Boris. He was in a box, an important-looking box. They would keep something like that aside. High up on a shelf, somewhere like that.’

For a moment Boris continued to regard his shoe. Then he said: ‘We went past it. We’ve gone past it twice.’

‘What? You mean we’ve been walking round and round up here in this chilly wind for nothing? Why didn’t you say so, Boris? I don’t understand you.’

He remained silent, moving his foot one way, then the other.

‘Well, do you suppose we should go back?’ I asked. ‘Or do we have to circle the lake yet again?’

Boris sighed and for a moment seemed deep in thought. Then he looked up and said: ‘All right. It’s back there. Just back there.’

We retraced our steps a short distance along the walkway. Before long Boris stopped at one of the stairways and glanced quickly up at the apartment door. Then almost immediately he turned his back to it and began once more to study his shoe.

‘Ah yes,’ I said, looking carefully up at the door. In fact the door - painted blue and with virtually nothing to distinguish it from any of the others - aroused no memories for me at all.

Boris glanced over his shoulder up at the apartment, then looked away again, poking his toe at the ground. For a while I remained at the bottom of the stairway, a little uncertain what to do next. Eventually, I said:

‘Boris, why don’t you just wait here a minute? I’ll go up and see if anyone’s in.’

The little boy went on prodding with his foot. I went up the steps and knocked on the door. There was no response. When I had knocked a second time with no result, I put my face up to the small glass panel. The glass was frosted and I could see nothing.

‘The window,’ Boris called from behind me. ‘Have a look through the window.’

I saw to my left a sort of balcony - really no more than a ledge running along the front of the building, too narrow even to put out an upright chair. I reached out a hand to its iron balustrade, and by leaning my body right over the wall of the stairway I was just able to peer in through the nearest window. I found myself looking into an open-plan lounge with a dining table at one end against a wall and rather dated modern furnishings.

‘Can you see it?’ Boris was calling. ‘Can you see the box?’

‘Just a minute.’

I tried to lean my body even further over the wall, conscious though I was of the gaping drop below me.

‘Can you see it?’

‘Just a minute, Boris.’

The room was by now growing steadily more familiar to me. The triangular clock on the wall, the cream foam sofa, the three-tiered hi-fi cabinet; I found object after object, as my gaze fell on it, bringing with it a poignant nudge of recognition. However, as I continued to peer into the room, I gained the strong impression that the whole of the rear section - which adjoined the main portion to form an 'L' - had not previously been there at all, that it was a very recent addition. Nevertheless, as I continued to look at it, this same rear section seemed in itself strongly reminiscent, and after a moment I realised this was because it resembled exactly the back part of the parlour in the house my parents and I had lived in for several months in Manchester. The house, a narrow city terrace, had been damp and badly in need of redecorating, but we had put up with it since we were staying only until my father's work enabled us to move away to something much better. To me, a nine-year-old, the house quickly came to represent not only an exciting change, but the hope that a fresh, happier chapter was unfolding for us all.

'You won't find anyone in there,' a man's voice said behind me. Straightening, I saw that the speaker had emerged from the neighbouring apartment. He was standing in front of his door at the top of a stairway parallel to the one I was standing on. The man was around fifty, with heavy, bulldog-like features. He was unkempt and his T-shirt had a damp patch around the chest.

'Ah,' I said, 'so this apartment is empty?'

The man shrugged. 'Maybe they're coming back. My wife and I, we don't like an empty apartment next to us, but after all that trouble, we're relieved, I can tell you. We're not unfriendly people. But after all of that, well, we'd much sooner have it the way it is now. Empty.'

'Ah. So it's been empty for some time. Weeks? Months?'

‘Oh, a month at least. They might be coming back, but we wouldn’t care if they didn’t. Mind you, I felt sorry for them at times. We’re not unfriendly people. And we’ve been through difficult times ourselves. But when it goes on like that, well, you just want them to go. We’d rather have it empty.’

‘I see. A lot of trouble.’

‘Oh yes. To be fair, I don’t think there was physical violence. But still, when you had to listen to them shouting late at night, it was very upsetting.’

‘Excuse me, but look here ...’ I came a step closer to him, signalling with my eyes that Boris was within earshot.

‘No, my wife didn’t like it one bit,’ the man went on, ignoring me. ‘Whenever it started, she used to bury her head in the pillow. Even in the kitchen once. I came in and there she was cooking with a pillow around her head. It wasn’t pleasant. Whenever we saw him he was sober, very respectable. He’d give us a quick salute, be on his way. But my wife was convinced that’s what was behind it. You know, drink ...’

‘Look,’ I whispered angrily, leaning over the concrete wall separating us, ‘can’t you see I have my boy with me? Is this the sort of talk to come out with in front of him?’

The man looked down towards Boris with a surprised expression. Then he said: ‘But he’s not so young, is he? You can’t protect him from everything. Still, if you don’t like talk of this kind, fine, let’s talk about something else. You think of a better topic if you can. I was just telling you how it was. But if you don’t want to talk about it ...’

‘No, I certainly don’t! I certainly don’t wish to hear ...’

‘Well, it wasn’t important. It’s just that, quite naturally, I tended to side with him rather than with her. If he’d actually got violent, well, that would have been something else, but there was never any evidence of that. So

I tended to blame her. Okay, he went away a lot, but from what we understood he had to, that was all part of his work. It wasn't a reason, that's what I'm saying, it wasn't a reason for her to behave in the way she did ...'

'Look, will you stop it? Don't you have any sense? The boy! He can hear ...'

'All right, he may be listening. So what? Children always hear these things sooner or later. I was just explaining why I tended to take his side, and that's why my wife brought up the drinking. The going away was one thing, my wife would say, but the drinking was another ...'

'Look, if you carry on like this, I'll be forced to terminate this conversation here and now. I'm warning you. I'll do it.'

'You can't hope to protect your boy for ever, you know. How old is he? He doesn't look so young. It's not good to over-shelter them. He's got to come to terms with the world, warts and all ...'

'He doesn't have to yet! Not just yet! Besides, I don't care what you think. What is it to you anyway? He's my boy, he's in my charge, I won't have this sort of talk ...'

'I don't know why you're getting so angry. I'm only making conversation. I was just telling you what we made of it. They weren't bad people, it's not that we disliked them, but it sometimes got too much. Mind you, I suppose it always sounds much worse when it's coming through a wall. Look, it's useless trying to hide it from a boy his age. You're fighting a losing battle. And what's the point ...'

'I don't care what you think! Not for a few years yet! He won't, he won't hear about such things ...'

'You're foolish. These things I'm talking about, it's just what happens in life. Even my wife and me, we've had our ups and downs. That's why I sympathised with him. I know what it feels like, that first moment you suddenly realise ...'

'I warn you! I'll terminate this conversation! I'm warning you!'

'But then I never drank. That does change things. Going away a lot is one thing, but to drink like that ...'

'This is your last warning! Any more and I'll leave!'

'He was cruel when he was drunk. Not physical, all right, but we could hear a lot of it, he was cruel all right. We couldn't make out all the words, but we used to sit up in the dark and listen ...'

'That's it! That's it! I warned you! Now I'm going! I'm going!'

Turning my back on the man, I ran down the steps to where Boris was standing. I took his arm and began to hurry away, but as I did so the man started to yell after us:

'You're fighting a losing battle! He has to find out what it's like! It's just life! There's nothing wrong with it! It's just real life!'

Boris was looking back with some curiosity and I was obliged to tug hard at his arm. For several moments we kept up a steady pace. More than once I sensed Boris trying to slow down, but I kept going, anxious to put beyond possibility any threat of the man pursuing us. By the time we slowed to a halt, I found I was badly out of breath. Staggering over to the wall - it was disconcertingly low, finishing only just above my waist - I put my elbows up and leaned over. I looked out at the lake, at the high-rise blocks beyond, at the pale wide sky, and waited for my chest to stop heaving.

After a while I became aware of Boris standing alongside me. He had his back to me and was fiddling with a loose fragment of masonry near the top of the wall. I began to feel a certain embarrassment about what had just occurred, and realised I would have to offer him some sort of explanation. I was still trying to think of something to say, when Boris, keeping his back to me, muttered:

‘That man was mad, wasn’t he?’

‘Yes, Boris, completely mad. Possibly deranged.’

Boris went on fiddling with the wall. Then he said: ‘It doesn’t matter any more. We don’t have to get Number Nine.’

‘If it wasn’t for that man, Boris ...’

‘It doesn’t matter. It doesn’t matter any more.’ Then Boris turned to me and smiled. ‘It’s been a great day so far,’ he said brightly.

‘You’re enjoying it?’

‘It’s been great. The bus trip, everything. It’s been great.’

I was seized by an impulse to reach out and embrace him, but it struck me he would be puzzled, possibly alarmed by such a gesture. In the end I lightly tousled his hair then turned back to the view.

The wind was no longer troublesome, and for a moment we stood there quietly side by side, looking out over the estate. Then I said:

‘Boris, I know you must be wondering. I mean, why it is we can’t just settle down and live quietly, the three of us. You must, I know you do, you must wonder why I have to go away all the time, even though your mother gets upset about it. Well, you have to understand, the reason I keep going on these trips, it’s not because I don’t love you and dearly want to be with you. In some ways, I’d like nothing better than to stay at home with you and Mother, live in an apartment like that one over there, anywhere. But you see, it’s not so simple. I have to keep going on these trips because, you see, you can never tell when it's going to come along. I mean the very special one, the very important trip, the one that's very very important, not just for me but for everyone, everyone in the whole world. How can I explain it to you, Boris, you're so young. You see, it would be so easy just to miss it. To say one time, no, I won't go, I'll just rest. Then only later I'll discover that was the one, the very very important one. And you see, once you miss it, there's no going back, it would be too late. It won't matter how hard I travel afterwards, it won't matter, it would be too late, and all these years I've spent would have been for nothing. I've seen it happen to other people, Boris. They spend year after year travelling and they start to get tired, perhaps a little lazy. But that's often just when it comes along. And they miss it. And, you know, they regret it for the rest of their lives. They get bitter and sad. By the time they die, they've become broken people. So you see, Boris, that's why. That's why I've got to carry on for the moment, keep travelling all the time. It makes things very difficult for us, I realise. But we have to be strong and patient, all three of us. It won't be much longer, I'm sure. It'll come soon, the very important one, then it will all be done, I'll be able to relax and rest then. I could stay at home all I wanted, it wouldn't matter, we could enjoy ourselves, just the three of us. We could do all the things we haven't been able to do. It won't be long now, I'm sure of it, but we'll just have to be patient. Boris, I hope you can understand what I'm saying. '

Boris remained silent for a long time. Then suddenly he straightened and said sternly: 'Move off quietly. All of you. ' With that he ran a few steps away and began his karate movements again.

For the next few minutes I went on leaning against the wall, looking out at the view, listening to the sounds of Boris whispering furiously to himself. Then when I glanced at him again, I realised he was enacting in his imagination the latest version of a fantasy he had been playing through over and over during the past weeks. No doubt the fact of our being so close to its actual setting had made irresistible the prospect of going through it all again. For indeed, the scenario involved Boris and his grandfather fighting off a large gang of street thugs, in this very walkway, directly outside the old apartment.

I continued to watch him moving busily, now several yards away from me, and supposed he was coming to that part where he and his grandfather, standing shoulder to shoulder, ready themselves for another onslaught. There would already be a sea of unconscious bodies over the ground, but a number of the most persistent thugs would now be re-grouping for another assault. Boris and his grandfather would wait calmly side by side, while the thugs whispered strategies in the darkness of the walkway. In this, as in all such scenarios, Boris was in some vague way older. Not an adult exactly - which would make things too remote, as well as raising complications as to his grandfather's age - but somehow old enough to make credible the necessary physical feats.

Boris and Gustav would allow the thugs all the time they required to take up their formation. Then once the wave came, grandfather and grandson, a smoothly co-ordinated team, would deal efficiently, almost sadly, with the assailants flying at them from all sides. Eventually the attack would be over - but no, one last thug might leap out of the dark wielding some hideous blade. Gustav, being the nearest, would deliver a quick blow to the neck and then the battle would at last be over.

For a few silent moments, Boris and his grandfather would gravely survey the bodies littered about them. Then Gustav, casting his experienced gaze one last time over the scene, would give a nod, at which the two of them would turn away with the expressions of men who had undertaken work they had had to do, but had not enjoyed. They would ascend the short stairway to the door of the old apartment, take a last look at the defeated street thugs - some of them by now beginning to moan or crawl away - before going inside.

‘It’s all right now,’ Gustav would announce at the door. ‘They’re gone.’

Sophie and I would then emerge nervously into the entrance hall. Boris, coming in behind his grandfather, would add: ‘But it’s not quite over yet. They’ll attack once more, perhaps before morning.’

This assessment of the situation, which had been so obvious to grandfather and grandson they had not even bothered to confer, would be greeted with anguish by myself and Sophie.

‘No, I can’t stand it!’ Sophie would wail, then break down sobbing. I would hold her in my arms in an attempt to comfort her, but my own features would be crumpling. Faced with this pathetic spectacle, Boris and Gustav would not show a flicker of disparagement. Gustav would place a reassuring hand on my shoulder, saying: ‘Don’t worry. Boris and I will be here. And after this last attack, that will be the end of it.’

‘That’s right,’ Boris would confirm. ‘One more battle is the most they’ll take.’ Then turning to Gustav he would say: ‘Grandfather, perhaps this next time, I’ll try reasoning with them again. Give them a last chance to back away.’

‘They won’t listen,’ Gustav would say, shaking his head gravely. ‘But you’re right. We should give them a last chance.’

Sophie and I, overwhelmed with fear, would disappear deeper into the apartment weeping in each other’s arms. Boris and Gustav would look at each other, sigh wearily, then, unbolting the front door, go back outside.

They would find the walkway dark, silent and empty.

‘We might as well get some rest,’ Gustav would say.
‘You sleep first, Boris. I’ll wake you if I hear them coming.’

Boris, nodding, would sit down on the top step of the stairway and, with his back against the front door, go promptly to sleep.

Some time later, a touch on his arm, and he would spring to his feet instantly awake. His grandfather would already be staring down at the street thugs gathering before them in the walkway. They would be more numerous than ever, the last confrontation having compelled them to recruit every one of their number from every dark recess of the city. Now they would all be there, dressed in torn leathers, army jackets, cruel belts, holding metal bars or bicycle chains - but their own sense of honour forbidding them to bring guns. Boris and Gustav would come slowly down the stairway towards them, pausing perhaps on the second or third step up. Then Boris, at a signal from his grandfather, would begin to speak, raising his voice so that it rang around the concrete pillars:

‘We’ve fought you many times. There are even more of you this time, I can see. But you must each of you know in your hearts you cannot win. And this time my grandfather and I can’t guarantee some of you won’t get seriously hurt. There’s no sense in this fighting. You must all have had homes once. Mothers and fathers. Perhaps brothers and sisters. I want you to understand what’s happening. These attacks of yours, your continual terrorising of our apartment, has meant that my mother is crying all the time. She’s always tense and irritable, and this means she often tells me off for no reason. It also means Papa has to go away for long periods, sometimes abroad, which Mother doesn’t like. This is all the result of your terrorising the apartment. Perhaps you’re simply doing it because you’re high-spirited, because you come from broken homes and you know no better. This is why I’m trying to get you to understand what’s really happening, the real effects of your inconsiderate behaviour. What it could come to sooner or later is that Papa won't come back home at all. We might even have to move out of the apartment altogether. This is why I've had to bring Grandfather here, away from his important work in charge of a big hotel. We can't allow you to continue with what you've been doing. And this is why we've been fighting you. Now that I've explained things to you, you have a chance to think it all over and go back. If you don't, then Grandfather and I will have no choice but to fight you again. We'll do our best to knock you unconscious without doing any long-lasting damage, but in a large fight, even with our level of skill, we can't guarantee some of you won't end up with bad bruises, even broken bones. So take your chance and go back.'

Gustav would give a small smile of approval at this speech, then the two of them would survey again the brutish faces before them. A significant proportion would be looking uncertainly at each other, fear rather than reason causing them to re-consider. But then their leaders - horrific, scowling characters - would start up a war-like growl, which would steadily spread through their ranks. Then they would surge forward. Quickly, Boris and his grandfather would take up positions, back to back, moving neatly in formation, employing their own carefully developed blend of karate and other combat techniques. The street thugs would come at them from every direction, only to be sent spinning, stumbling, flying away emitting grunts of surprised horror, until once again the ground would be covered with unconscious bodies. For the next several moments Boris and Gustav would stand together waiting, watching carefully, until the thugs began to stir, some groaning, others shaking their heads trying to determine where they were. At this point, Gustav would take a step forward, saying:

'Now go, let that be the finish. Leave this apartment alone. This was a very happy home before you started to terrorise it. If you return again, my grandson and I will have no choice but to start breaking bones. '

This speech would hardly be necessary. The street thugs would know that this time they had been thoroughly defeated, that they were fortunate not to be more badly hurt. Slowly they would begin to clamber to their feet and hobble away, supporting each other in twos and threes, many moaning in pain.

Once the last thug had limped away, Boris and Gustav would exchange a look of quiet satisfaction, turn and go back up to the apartment. As they came in, Sophie and I - we would have witnessed the entire scene from the window - would welcome them back jubilantly. 'Thank God it's over,' I would say excitedly. 'Thank God.'

'I've already started to cook a celebratory meal,' Sophie would announce, beaming happily, all the tension now fallen from her face. 'We're so grateful to you and Grandfather, Boris. Why don't we all play a board game tonight?'

'I'll have to be going,' Gustav would say. 'I've got a lot to do back at the hotel. If there's any further trouble, let me know. But I'm certain that's the end of it.'

We would wave Gustav off as he went down the stairway. Then, closing the door, Boris, Sophie and I would settle in for the evening. Sophie would move in and out of the kitchen, preparing the meal, singing lightly to herself, while Boris and I lounged about on the floor of the living room, engrossed in the board game. Then, after we had been playing for an hour or so, at a point when Sophie was out of the room, I would suddenly look up at Boris with a serious expression and say quietly:

'Thank you for what you did, Boris. Now things can be as they were. The way they were before.'

‘Look!’ Boris shouted, and I saw he was standing beside me again, pointing over the wall. ‘Look! It’s Aunt Kim!’

Sure enough, down on the ground below us, a woman was waving frantically to attract our attention. She was wearing a green cardigan which she was holding tightly to herself, and her hair was blowing about messily. Noticing we had at last spotted her, she shouted something, but it was lost in the wind.

‘Aunt Kim!’ Boris called down.

The woman gesticulated and shouted something again.

‘Let’s go down,’ Boris said, and began to lead the way, suddenly full of excitement once more.

I followed Boris as he ran down several flights of concrete stairs. As we came out at ground level, the wind immediately hit at us with great force, but Boris still managed to perform for the woman’s benefit a staggering motion as though landing from a parachute jump.

‘Aunt Kim’ was a stocky woman of around forty, whose somewhat stern face was definitely familiar to me.

‘You must be deaf, both of you,’ she said as we came up to her. ‘We saw you get off that bus and we were calling and calling, but were you listening? And then I come down here to get you and you’re nowhere to be found.’

‘Oh dear,’ I said. ‘We didn’t hear anything, did we, Boris? It must be this wind. So’ – I cast my gaze around me – ‘you were watching us from your apartment.’

The stocky woman pointed vaguely to one of the countless windows overlooking us. ‘We were calling and calling.’ Then, turning to Boris, she said: ‘Your mother’s up there, young feller. She’s just longing to see you.’

‘Mother?’

‘You’d better come on up straight away, she’s just longing to see you. And you know what? She’s been cooking all afternoon, getting the most fantastic feast ready for when you get home tonight. You’re just not going to believe it, she says she’s prepared everything, all your favourites, everything you can think of. She was just telling me all about it, and then we looked out of the window and there you were, getting off the bus. Listen, I’ve just spent half an hour looking for you guys, I’m frozen. Do we have to keep standing out here?’

She had been holding out her hand. Boris took it and we all started towards the section of the building she had indicated. As we got closer, Boris ran on ahead, pushed open a fire door and disappeared inside. The door was swinging shut as the stocky woman and I approached. She held it open for me, saying as she did so: ‘Ryder, aren’t you supposed to be somewhere else? Sophie was just telling me how her phone’s been ringing all afternoon. People trying to track you down.’

‘Really? Ah. Well, as you see, I’m here.’ I gave a laugh. ‘I brought Boris here.’

The woman shrugged. ‘I suppose you know your business.’

We were standing in a dimly lit space at the bottom of a stairwell. On the wall next to me was a bank of mail boxes and some fire equipment. As we started up the first flight – there were at least five more flights above us – the clatter of Boris’s running feet came from somewhere over our heads, and then I heard him shout: ‘Mother!’ There were exclamations of delight, more clatter of feet, and Sophie’s voice saying: ‘Oh my darling, my darling!’ A muffled quality to her voice suggested they were embracing, and by the time the stocky woman and I arrived on the landing they had disappeared inside the apartment.

‘Excuse the mess,’ the woman said, ushering me in.

I went through a tiny entrance hall into an open-plan room furnished with simple modern items. A large picture window dominated the room, and as I came in I saw Sophie and Boris standing together in front of it, their figures almost silhouettes against the grey sky. Sophie smiled briefly at me, then resumed her conversation with Boris. They seemed excited about something and Sophie kept hugging Boris's shoulders. From the way they were pointing out of the window, I thought that perhaps Sophie was recounting how she and the stocky woman had spotted us earlier. But as I moved closer I heard Sophie saying:

'Yes, really. Everything's virtually ready. We just have to heat a few things up, like the meat pies.'

Boris said something I did not catch, to which Sophie replied:

'Of course we can. We'll play whichever one you like. You can see which one you want once we've finished eating.'

Boris looked at his mother questioningly, and I noticed a guardedness had entered his manner, preventing him from becoming as excited as perhaps Sophie would have liked. Then, as he wandered off to another part of the room, Sophie stepped closer to me and shook her head sadly.

'I'm sorry,' she said quietly. 'It wasn't any good. If anything, it was worse than the one last month. The views are stunning, it's built right on a cliff edge, but it's just not sturdy enough. Mr Mayer agreed in the end. He thinks the roof could fall down in a strong gale, perhaps even within the next few years. I came straight back, I was home by eleven. I'm sorry. You're disappointed, I can tell.' She glanced across towards Boris, who was examining a portable cassette player left on a shelf.

'There's no need to get discouraged,' I said with a sigh. 'I'm sure we'll find something soon.'

‘But I was thinking,’ Sophie said. ‘On the coach coming back. I was thinking there’s no reason we can’t start doing all sorts of things together now, house or no house. So as soon as I got in, I started cooking. I thought tonight we could have a great feast, just the three of us. I remembered the way Mother used to do it when I was small, before her illness. She used to cook lots and lots of different little things and put them all out for us to pick and choose. They were such great evenings and I thought, well, tonight there’s no reason we couldn’t do something like that, just the three of us. I hadn’t really considered it before, not with that kitchen the way it is, but I had a good look around it and realised I was being silly. Okay, it’s far from ideal but a lot of it works. So I started cooking. I’ve been cooking right through the afternoon. And I’ve managed to make just about everything. All Boris’s favourites. It’s just sitting there waiting for us, it just needs warming up. We’ll have a great feast tonight.’

‘That’s good. I’m very much looking forward to it.’

‘There’s no reason why we can’t, even in that apartment. And you’ve been so understanding about ... about everything. I was thinking about it all. On the coach coming back. We’ve got to put the past behind us now. We’ve got to start doing things together again. Good things.’

‘Yes. You’re quite right.’

Sophie stared out of the window for a few seconds. Then she said: ‘Oh, I nearly forgot. That woman kept phoning. All the time I was cooking. Miss Stratmann. Asking if I knew where you were. Did she get hold of you?’

‘Miss Stratmann? Well no. What was she wanting?’

‘She seemed to think there’d been a mix up over some of your appointments today. She was very polite, kept apologising for disturbing me. She said she was sure you were well on top of everything, she was just phoning to check up, that was all, she wasn't worried in the least. But then fifteen minutes later the phone would ring and it would be her again. '

'Well, it's nothing to be concerned about. Er ... she was under the impression I should have been somewhere else, you say? '

'I'm not sure what she was saying. She was very nice, but she kept on phoning. I over-cooked a tray of chicken tarts because of that. Then, the last time she phoned, she asked if I was looking forward to it. To this reception this evening at the Karwinsky Gallery. You hadn't told me about it, but she said it like they were expecting me. So I said, yes, I was very much looking forward to it. Then she asked if Boris was, and I said yes, he was too, and so were you, that you were really looking forward to it. That seemed to reassure her. She said she wasn't worried, she was just mentioning it, that was all. I put the phone down and I was a little disappointed at first. I thought this reception might interfere with our feast. But then I saw I had time to get everything ready first, that we could all go and come back, as long as we didn't have to stay too long we could still have our evening together. And then I thought, well, it's a good thing really. A good thing both for me and for Boris, to go to a reception like this.' She suddenly reached out to Boris, who had come wandering back towards us, and hugged him roughly. 'Boris, you'll be a big hit, won't you? You won't mind all these people. You just be yourself and you'll really enjoy it. You'll be a big hit. Then before you know it, it'll be time to go home and then we'll have a really great evening, just the three of us. I've got everything ready, all your favourites. '

Boris wearily fought off his mother's embrace and went off again. Sophie watched him with a smile, then turned to me, saying:

‘Hadn’t we better be setting off soon? The Karwinsky Gallery, it might take some time from here.’

‘Yes,’ I said and glanced at my watch. ‘Yes, you have a point.’ I turned to the stocky woman who had come back into the room. ‘Perhaps you could advise us,’ I said to her. ‘I’m not entirely certain which bus will take us to this gallery. Do you know if it’s coming in soon?’

‘To the Karwinsky Gallery?’ The stocky woman gave me a look of contempt and only Boris’s presence seemed to stop her adding something sarcastic. Then she said: ‘You won’t get a bus out to the Karwinsky Gallery from here. You’d have to take a bus back into the city centre. Then you’d have to wait for a tram outside the library. There’s no way you’ll make it on time.’

‘Ah. What a pity. I’d been relying on a bus being available.’

The stocky woman gave me another scornful look, then said: ‘Take my car. I won’t be needing it this evening.’

‘That’s awfully kind of you,’ I said. ‘But are you sure we won’t be ...’

‘Oh, cut the crap, Ryder. You need the car. There’s no other way you’d get out to the Karwinsky Gallery in time. Even with a car, you’d have to be starting out right now.’

‘Yes,’ I said, ‘that’s just what I was thinking. But look, we don’t want to inconvenience you.’

‘You can just take a few boxes of books with you. I won’t be able to carry them if I have to go in by bus tomorrow.’

‘Yes, of course. Whatever we can do.’

‘Just drive them round to Hermann Roth’s shop in the morning, any time before ten.’

‘Don’t worry, Kim,’ Sophie said before I could say anything. ‘I’ll see to all that. You’re so good.’

‘Okay, you guys had better start moving. Hey, young feller’ – the stocky woman gestured to Boris – ‘why don’t you help me load up these books?’

For the next few minutes I found myself alone at the window gazing out at the view. The others had disappeared into a bedroom and I could hear them talking and laughing behind me. It occurred to me I should go in and assist them, but then I saw the importance of my taking the opportunity to collect my thoughts on the evening ahead, and I went on staring down at the artificial lake. Some children had started to kick a ball against the fence on the far side of the water, but otherwise the perimeter areas were deserted.

Eventually I heard the stocky woman calling me and became aware that they were waiting to leave. I came into the hallway to find Sophie and Boris, each carrying a cardboard box, already going out into the corridor. They began to argue about something as they set off down the staircase.

The stocky woman was holding open the front door for me. ‘Sophie’s determined it goes well tonight,’ she said, her voice lowered. ‘So don’t let her down again, Ryder.’

‘Don’t worry,’ I said. ‘I’ll make sure everything goes well.’

She gave me a hard look, then turned and went down the staircase jingling her keys.

I followed after her. We were on the second flight down when I saw a woman coming up the stairs with a tired gait. The figure squeezed past the stocky woman with a muttered ‘excuse me’ and we had already passed each other before I realised that it was Fiona Roberts, still in her ticket inspector’s uniform. She too did not seem to recognise me until the last moment – the light was poor on the stairs – but she turned wearily, a hand on the metal banister, and said:

‘Oh, here you are. It’s good of you to be so punctual. I’m sorry I was a little longer than I said. There was a re-routing, a tram on the eastern circuit, so my shift went on much longer. I hope you haven’t been waiting here long.’

‘No, no.’ I drifted back up a step or two. ‘Not long at all. But unfortunately, my schedule has got very tight ...’

‘It’s all right, I won’t take any more of your time than necessary. Actually, I have to tell you, I phoned round the girls, just as we said, I phoned from the depot canteen during my break. I told them to expect me with a friend, but I didn’t actually tell them it was you. I was going to at first, just as we’d agreed, but I started by phoning Trude and as soon as I heard that voice, the way she said: “Oh yes, it’s you, dear,” I could hear so much in that voice, so much patronising bile. I could tell how all day she’d been talking about me, one phone call after another, with Inge and all the rest of them, discussing last night, all of them pretending to feel pity for me, saying how they’d have to treat me with sympathy, after all I was like an ill person, it was their duty to be kind. But of course they couldn’t keep me, how could someone like me be part of the Foundation? Oh, they’ll have enjoyed themselves today, I could hear it all, just in the way she said it as soon as I phoned. “Oh yes, it’s you, dear.” And I thought, all right then, let’s not give you any warning. Let’s see where you get by not believing me. That’s what I thought to myself. I thought, let’s hope you’re completely thrown when you open the door and see who’s standing there next to me. Let’s hope you’ve got your worst clothes on, perhaps your sportswear, and all your make-up’s off so that mound next to your nose is completely visible, and that your hair’s pinned back the way you do sometimes that makes you look at least fifteen years older. And let’s hope your apartment’s looking a mess, with all those stupid magazines, those scandal sheets and romantic novelettes you read littering the furniture, and you'll be so thrown you won't know what to say, you'll be so embarrassed about everything, and you'll make it worse by saying one completely inane thing after another. And you'll offer refreshments then find you're short of everything, and you'll feel so foolish for never having believed me. Let's do that, I thought. So I never told her, I didn't tell any of them. I just said I'd be coming round with a friend.' She stopped and calmed herself a little. Then she said: 'I'm sorry. I hope I didn't sound vindictive. But I've been longing for this all day. It kept me going, doing all those tickets, it kept me going. The passengers must have wondered why I was going around like that, you know, with a gleam in my eye. Well, if you've got a tight schedule, I suppose we ought to start straight away. We can start at Trude's. Inge should be with her, she usually is at this time of the day, so we can deal with them both first off. I hardly care about the others. I just want to see the looks on the faces of those two. Well, let's go.'

She started up the stairs, all her former weariness gone. The stairs seemed to go on endlessly, one flight after another, until I was struggling for breath. Fiona, however, did not appear to be exerting herself at all. As we climbed she continued to talk, her voice lowered as though people might be listening all around us.

'You don't have to say too much to them,' I heard her saying at one point. 'Just let them fawn over you for a few minutes. But of course you might want to discuss your parents with them.'

When we finally came off the staircase I was so out of breath - my chest was actually wheezing - I was unable to attend much to the surroundings. I was aware of being led down a dim corridor past rows of doors and that Fiona, oblivious of my difficulties, was marching on ahead. Then suddenly she stopped and knocked at a door. Catching up with her, I was obliged to lean a hand on the door frame, my head bowed, in an effort to recover my breath. When the door opened, I must have presented a somewhat crumpled figure beside the triumphant Fiona.

‘Trude,’ Fiona said. ‘I’ve brought a friend with me.’

With an effort I straightened myself and smiled pleasantly.

The woman who had opened the door was around fifty, plump with short white hair. She was wearing a loose pink jumper and baggy striped trousers. Trude glanced towards me briefly, then, noticing nothing out of the ordinary, turned to Fiona and said: 'Oh, yes. Well, I suppose you ought to come in.'

The condescension was obvious, but appeared only to heighten Fiona's anticipation, and she gave me a conspiratorial smile as we followed Trude inside.

'Is Inge here with you?' Fiona asked as we came into a tiny entrance hall.

'Yes, we've just come back,' Trude said. 'As it happens, we've got a lot to report. And since you just happened to call, you'll be the first to hear our news. That's lucky for you.'

This last remark seemed to be made entirely without irony. Trude then disappeared through a door, leaving us standing in the tiny hall, and we could hear her voice from within saying: 'Inge, it's Fiona. And some friend of hers. I suppose we ought to tell her what happened to us this afternoon.'

'Fiona?' Inge's voice sounded mildly outraged. Then with an effort, she said: 'Well, I suppose she ought to come in.'

Hearing this exchange, Fiona once again smiled excitedly at me. Then Trude's head peered round the door and we were shown into the lounge.

The room was not unlike the stocky woman's in size and shape, though the furniture was fussier and dominated by floral patterns. Perhaps it was simply that this apartment faced a different direction, or perhaps the sky outside had cleared a little. In any case, the afternoon sun was drifting in through the large window and as I stepped into the light I fully expected the two women to start with recognition. Fiona obviously did so too for I noticed how she carefully stood to one side in case her presence lessened the impact. Neither Trude nor Inge, however, appeared to register anything. They each cast a quick uninterested glance at me and then Trude invited us, rather coldly, to sit down. We did so side by side on a narrow couch. Fiona, though initially bewildered, seemed to conclude that this unexpected turn of events could serve only to intensify the moment of revelation once it came, and gave me another gleeful little grin.

‘Shall I tell her or do you want to?’ Inge was saying.

Trude, who clearly deferred to the younger woman, said: ‘No, you tell it, Inge. You deserve to. But Fiona’ - she turned to us - ‘you’re not to go around telling people yet. We want to keep it a surprise for the meeting tonight, that’s only fair. Oh, didn’t we tell you about tonight’s meeting? Well, there, we’ve just told you. Do come if you’ve got time. Though since you’ve got your friend staying with you’ - she nodded towards me - ‘we’ll understand perfectly if you’re not able to come. But Inge, you tell it, you deserve to, really.’

‘Well, Fiona, I’m sure you’ll be interested in this, we’ve had a most exciting day. As you know, Mr von Braun had invited us to his office today to discuss with him personally our plans for looking after Mr Ryder’s parents. Oh, you didn’t know? I thought you all knew. Well, we’ll be reporting in detail tonight just how the meeting went, I’ll just tell you for now it went very nicely indeed, even if it had to be cut a little short. Oh, Mr von Braun was so apologetic about that, he couldn’t have been more so, could he, Trude? He was so apologetic about having to get away early, but when we learnt the reason, well, then we understood perfectly. You see, there’d been this very important trip arranged to the zoo. Ah, you might laugh, Fiona dear, but this was no ordinary trip to the zoo. An official party, including naturally Mr von Braun himself, was going to take Mr Brodsky there. Do you know, Mr Brodsky had never been to the zoo? But the point was, Miss Collins had been persuaded to be there. Yes, at the zoo! Can you imagine that? After all these years! And no more than Mr Brodsky deserves, that's what we both said immediately. Yes, Miss Collins was going to be there when they arrived, she'd be waiting at an agreed place, and the official party would encounter her, and she would exchange conversation with Mr Brodsky. It had all been arranged. Can you imagine it? They were going to meet and actually talk after all this time! We said we could understand perfectly why our meeting had to be cut short, but Mr von Braun, he was so kind to us, he obviously felt badly about it, he said to us: "Why don't you ladies also come along to the zoo? I can't very well ask you to join the official party, but you could perhaps look on from a little distance." We said we'd be absolutely thrilled. And that's when he said to us: "Of course, if you do as I suggest, you'll not only get a glimpse of Mr Brodsky's first encounter with his wife after all this time, you'll" - and he paused, didn't he, Trude? he paused, then he said, cool as you like - "you'll also be able to see at close quarters Mr Ryder, who has most kindly agreed to be part of the official party. And if an opportune moment arises, though I can't guarantee this, I'll signal to you ladies and I could introduce you both to him." We were absolutely stunned! But of course, when we thought about it afterwards on the way home, we were just saying so to each other just now, when you think more carefully about it, it wasn't so surprising really. After all, we've come a long way in the last few years, what with the bunting for the Peking people, and all the effort we put into the sandwiches for the Henri Ledoux lunch ...'

'The Peking Ballet, that was the real turning point,' Trude put in.

‘Yes, that was the turning point. But I suppose we’d never really stopped to think about it, we’d just been getting on with things, going hard at it, we probably never realised how much we were going up all the time in everyone’s esteem. The truth is, quite honestly, we’ve now become a very important part of life in this city. It’s high time we realised that. Let’s face it, that’s why Mr von Braun invites us personally to his office, why he ends up suggesting the sorts of things he suggested today. “If an opportune moment arises, I’ll introduce you to him.” That’s what he said, wasn’t it, Trude? “I know Mr Ryder would be delighted to meet you both, especially since you’ll be looking after his parents, a matter of the utmost concern for him.” Of course, we’d always said, hadn’t we, that once we’d been given this assignment, we had a good chance of being introduced to Mr Ryder. But we hadn’t expected it to happen quite so soon and so we were very excited. Fiona, what’s wrong, dear?’

Beside me, Fiona had been shifting impatiently, trying to interrupt the flow of Inge’s words. Now that Inge had paused, Fiona nudged my arm and gave me a look as though to say:

‘Now! This is the moment!’ Unfortunately I was still a little out of breath from the climb up the stairs and this perhaps caused me to hesitate. In any case there was an awkward moment when all three women were staring at me. Then, when I said nothing, Inge went on:

‘Well, if you don’t mind, Fiona, I’ll just finish what I was saying. I’m sure you have plenty of very interesting stories to tell us, dear, and we’re very keen to hear them. No doubt you’ve had another very interesting day on your trams while we were in the city centre doing all this I’m now telling you about, but if you’d like to wait just a minute, you might hear something of passing interest to you. After all’ – and here the sarcasm in her voice struck me as crossing the boundary of civilised behaviour – ‘this does involve your old friend, your old friend Mr Ryder ...’

‘Inge, really!’ Trude put in, but a smile was hovering around her lips and the two of them exchanged a quick smirk.

Fiona was nudging me again. Glancing at her, I could see her patience had run out and that she was wanting her tormentors to get their comeuppance without further delay. Leaning forward, I cleared my throat, but before I could actually say anything, Inge had started to talk again.

‘Well, what I was saying was that when you think about it, it’s no more than we deserve now, this level of treatment. Clearly Mr von Braun believes so anyway. He was very kind and courteous to us the whole time, wasn’t he? He was so apologetic when he had to go off to the city hall to join the official party. “We’ll be arriving at the zoo in about thirty minutes,” he kept saying. “I do hope you ladies will be there.” It would be perfectly all right, he told us, if we came as close as five or six metres from the official party. After all, it wasn’t as though we were just members of the public! Oh, I’m sorry, Fiona, we hadn’t forgotten, we were going to mention to Mr von Braun how one of our group, that’s to say you, dear, how one of us was a very dear friend of Mr Ryder, a very dear friend of many years’ standing. We had every intention of mentioning it, but somehow we just never got round to it, did we, Trude?’

Again the two women exchanged smirks. Fiona stared at them in cold fury. I saw at this point things had gone too far and decided to intervene. However, two possible ways of doing so immediately presented themselves to me. One option was to draw attention to my identity in a way that elegantly entered the flow of what Inge happened to be saying. For instance, I might have interjected calmly: ‘Well, we didn’t have the pleasure of meeting at the zoo, but what does that matter when we can meet in the comfort of your own home?’ or some such thing. The alternative was simply to rise abruptly, perhaps throwing my arms out as I did so, and making the blunt declaration: ‘I am Ryder!’ I naturally wished to choose the course that would yield the maximum impact, but the resulting hesitation caused me once more to miss my opportunity, for Inge had begun to talk again.

'We got to the zoo and we waited, oh, it was about twenty minutes, wasn't it, Trude? We waited by the little stand-up place where you can drink a cup of coffee, and after about twenty minutes we saw these cars come driving right up to the gates, and this very distinguished party got out. About ten or eleven of them, all gentlemen, Mr von Winterstein was there, and Mr Fischer and Mr Hoffman. And Mr von Braun, of course. And in the middle of it there was Mr Brodsky, looking very distinguished indeed, wasn't he, Trude? Nothing like the way he used to be. Of course we looked immediately for Mr Ryder but he wasn't there. Trude and I were looking from face to face, but they were all the usual ones, the councillors, you know. For a second we thought Mr Reitmayer was Mr Ryder, just as he was getting out of the car. Anyway, he wasn't with them, and we were saying to each other, he's probably coming along just a little later, what with his busy schedule. And there they were, all these gentlemen coming up the path, all wearing dark overcoats, except for Mr Brodsky who was wearing a grey one, very distinguished looking, with a matching hat. They came up past the maple trees, all at a leisurely pace, up to the first of the cages. Mr von Winterstein seemed to be the host, pointing things out to Mr Brodsky, pointing out the animals in each cage. But you could see no one was paying much attention to the animals, they were so keyed up about Mr Brodsky's encounter with Miss Collins. And we couldn't resist, could we, Trude? We went on ahead, we went round the corner to the central concourse and sure enough, there was Miss Collins, all by herself, standing in front of the giraffes, looking at them. There were a few other people strolling about, but of course they had no idea, it was only when the official party came round the corner people realised something was happening and moved away respectfully, and there was Miss Collins still standing in front of the giraffes, looking more alone than ever, and you could see her glancing towards the official party as they came closer. She seemed so calm, you wouldn't know what was going on inside. And Mr Brodsky, we could see his expression, very stiff, stealing glances towards Miss Collins, even though they were still quite a long way apart, there were all the monkey and racoon cages still to go. Mr von Winterstein seemed to be introducing all the animals to Mr Brodsky, it was like the animals were all official guests at a banquet, wasn't it, Trude? We didn't know why the gentlemen couldn't just go straight to the giraffes and Miss Collins, but obviously this was the way it had been decided. And it was so exciting, so moving, for a moment we even forgot about the possibility of Mr Ryder turning up. You could see Mr Brodsky's breath in the air, all misty, and all the other gentlemen's too, and then, when there was only a few cages left, Mr Brodsky seemed to lose all interest in the animals and he took off his hat. It was a very old-fashioned, respectful sort of gesture, Fiona. We felt privileged to be there to see it.'

'You could see so much,' Trude broke in. 'So much in the way he did it, then just held his hat to his chest. It was like a declaration of love and apology all at the same time. It was very moving.'

'But I was telling the story, thank you, Trude. Miss Collins, she's so elegant, you'd never guess she was that age from a distance. Such a youthful figure. She turned to him very nonchalantly, just a cage or so separating them. Any members of the public there'd been had backed right away by this time, and Trude and I, we remembered what Mr von Braun had said, about the five metres, and we crept forward as much as we dared, but it seemed such a private moment, we didn't dare get up too close. First they nodded to each other and exchanged some very ordinary sort of greeting. Then Mr Brodsky, he suddenly took a few steps forward and reached out, quite swiftly, it was like he'd been planning it beforehand, Trude thought ...'

‘Yes, like he’d been rehearsing it in private for days ...’

‘Yes, it was like that. I agree with that. It was just like that. He reached out and took her hand and kissed it very lightly and politely, then let go. And Miss Collins, she just bowed gracefully, then immediately turned her attention to the other gentlemen, greeting them and smiling, we were too far away to catch what they were all saying. So there they all were and for a little while no one seemed to know what to do next. Then Mr von Winterstein took the initiative and started to explain something about the giraffes to both Mr Brodsky and Miss Collins, addressing them as though they were a couple – wasn’t he, Trude? As though they were a nice old couple who’d arrived together from the start. So there they were, Mr Brodsky and Miss Collins, after all these years, standing side by side, not touching, just standing side by side, both of them staring at the giraffes, listening to Mr von Winterstein. This went on for some time, and you could see the other gentlemen whispering among themselves about what ought to happen next. Then gradually, before you knew it, the gentlemen had all melted back, it was all very well done, so civilised, they all pretended to be in conversation with each other and drifted away a little at a time so that in the end there was just Mr Brodsky and Miss Collins left in front of the giraffes. Of course, we were watching very closely now and everyone else must have been too, but of course everyone was pretending not to look. And we saw Mr Brodsky turn very gracefully to Miss Collins, raise a hand towards the giraffes’ cage and he said something. It seemed to be something very heartfelt and Miss Collins bowed her head just a little, even she couldn’t remain unmoved, and then Mr Brodsky went on talking, occasionally you’d see him raise his hand again, like this, very gently, towards the giraffes. We couldn’t be sure if he was talking about the giraffes or about something else, but he kept raising his hand to the cage. Miss Collins did seem very overcome, but she’s such an elegant lady, she straightened herself and smiled and then the two of them came strolling over to where the other gentlemen were talking. You could see her exchanging a few words with the gentlemen then, very pleasant and polite, she seemed to have quite a long talk with Mr Fischer, and then she was saying goodbye to them all, each of them in turn. She gave a little bow to Mr Brodsky, and you could see how pleased Mr Brodsky was with it all. He was standing there in a sort of dream, holding his hat to his chest. Then off she went up the path, all the way up to the refreshments hut, up past the fountain and out of sight by the polar bear enclosure. And once she'd gone, the gentlemen, they seemed to drop all their earlier pretence and gathered round Mr Brodsky, and you could see everyone was very pleased and excited and they seemed to be congratulating him. Oh, we'd have loved to have known what Mr Brodsky had said to Miss Collins! Perhaps we should have been bolder and gone a few steps nearer, we might have caught at least the odd word. But then, now we're who we are, we have to be more careful. In any case, it was all wonderful. And those trees at the zoo, they're so beautiful at this time of year. I do wonder what they said to each other. Trude thinks they really will get back together again now. Did you know, they never divorced? Isn't that interesting? All those years, and for all of Miss Collins's insisting on being called Miss Collins, they never divorced. Mr Brodsky deserves to win her back again. Oh, but I'm sorry, with all this excitement, we haven't even started telling you the main point! About Mr Ryder! You see, since Mr Ryder wasn't with the official party, we didn't really think we could come forward, even after Miss Collins had left. After all, Mr von Braun had suggested we come forward specifically to meet Mr Ryder. In any case, although we were watching Mr von Braun carefully, and we were quite near sometimes, he never looked towards us, he was probably very taken up with Mr Brodsky. So we didn't come forward. But then as they were leaving, we were watching them about to go through the gate, they all stopped and they were joined by someone, a man, but they were so far away by this time we couldn't see clearly. But Trude felt sure it was Mr Ryder who'd joined them - her long sight's better than mine and I wasn't wearing my lenses. She was sure, weren't you, Trude? She was certain it was him, that he'd very tactfully kept out of the way so as not to make things any more difficult than they were for Mr Brodsky and Miss Collins, and he was now re-joining the official party at the gates. I thought at first it was just Mr Braunthal, but I didn't have my lenses in, and Trude was very sure it was Mr Ryder. And afterwards, when I thought about it, I too felt perhaps it was Mr Ryder. So we missed the opportunity to be introduced to him! They were so far away by this point, you see, already at the gates, and the drivers were already holding open the car doors. Even if we'd rushed across, we wouldn't have got there in time. So we didn't, in the strictest sense, meet Mr Ryder. But Trude and I were just discussing it, and we were saying, in almost every other sense, I mean in any sense that really matters, it's fair to say we met him today. After all, if he'd been with the official party, then certainly, that time by the giraffe cage, just after Miss Collins had gone, Mr von Braun would definitely have introduced us. It was hardly our fault we didn't realise how tactful Mr Ryder was going to be, that he'd stay down by the gates. Anyway, the point is, it's beyond question it would have been appropriate, our being introduced to him. That's the point. Mr von Braun for one obviously thought so, now that we occupy the position we do, it would clearly have been appropriate. And you know, Trude' - she turned to her friend - 'now I think about it further, I agree with you. We might as well announce to the meeting tonight that we actually met him. As you say, that's closer to the truth than saying we didn't. And we've so much to get through tonight, we simply don't have time to explain everything all over again. After all, it's only a quirk of fate that kept us from being formally introduced, that's all. To all intents and purposes, we have met him. He'll certainly hear all about us, if he hasn't already, he's bound to enquire very closely about how his parents are to be looked after. So we've as good as met him, and as you say, it would be unfair if people thought otherwise. Oh, but please forgive me' - Inge suddenly turned to Fiona - 'I've forgotten, I'm talking to an old friend of Mr Ryder. This must all seem a fuss about nothing to such an old friend...

'Inge,' Trude said, 'poor Fiona, she's very confused. Don't tease her.' Then, smiling at Fiona, she said: 'It's all right, dear, don't worry.'

As Trude was saying this, memories came back to me of the warm friendship Fiona and I had had as children. I recalled the small white cottage where she had lived, just a little walk away down that muddy lane in Worcestershire, and the two of us playing for hours under her parent's dining table. I remembered the times I had wandered down to the cottage, upset and confused, and how skilfully she had comforted me, allowing me quickly to forget whatever scene I had just left behind. The realisation that it was this same precious friendship that was being mocked before my eyes caused a fury to well up in me, and although Inge had again started to speak, I decided I could not let the situation go on unchecked another second. Determined not to repeat my earlier mistake of prevaricating, I leaned forward decisively, my intention to cut Inge off with a bold announcement of who I was, then to recline back again as the impact settled on the room. Unfortunately, although I put much force behind my intervention, all that came out was a slightly strangled grunt, which was nevertheless loud enough to cause Inge to stop and all three women to turn and stare at me. There was an awkward moment, before Fiona, no doubt wishing to cover up for my embarrassment - perhaps something of her old protectiveness towards me momentarily re-awakening - burst out:

'You two, you've no idea how foolish you look! Do you know why? No, you wouldn't guess, you two, you'd never guess just how stupid, how unspeakably ridiculous you both look at this moment. You really wouldn't, it's typical, just typical of you both! Oh, I've meant to tell you for so long, ever since we met, well, you'll see for yourselves now, you can judge for yourselves now if you're fools or what. Look! '

Fiona jerked her head in my direction. Inge and Trude, both bewildered, once again stared at me. I made another concerted effort to announce myself, but to my dismay all I could manage was another grunt, more vigorous than the last but no more coherent. I took a deep breath, a panic now beginning to seize me, and tried again, only to produce another, this time more prolonged, straining noise.

'What on earth is she saying to us, Trude?' Inge said.

'Why's this little bitch speaking to us like this? How dare she? What's come over her? '

'It's my fault,' Trude said. 'It was my mistake. It was my idea to invite her into our group. It's just as well she's revealing her true colours before Mr Ryder's parents arrive. She's jealous, that's all. She's jealous that we met Mr Ryder today. While all she has are these pathetic little stories ... '

'What do you mean you met him today?' Fiona exploded.

'You said yourself just now you didn't ... '

'You know perfectly well it was as good as meeting him! Wasn't it, Trude? We're perfectly entitled to say we've met him now. It's just something you'll have to come to terms with, Fiona ... '

'Well in that case' - Fiona was now almost shrieking - 'let's see you come to terms with this!' She flung her arm towards me as though announcing the most dramatic of stage entrances. Once more I did my best to oblige. This time, fuelled by my mounting anger and frustration, the straining noise was more intense than ever and I could feel the sofa shake with my effort.

‘What’s wrong with this friend of yours?’ Inge asked, suddenly noticing me. But Trude was paying no attention.

‘I should never have listened to you,’ she was saying to Fiona bitterly. ‘It should have been obvious from the start what a little liar you were. And we let our children play with those brats of yours! They’re probably little liars too and now they’ve probably taught all our children how to tell lies. How ridiculous your party was last night. And the way you’ve decorated your apartment! How absurd! We were all laughing about it this morning ...’

‘Why don’t you help me!’ Fiona suddenly addressed me directly for the first time. ‘What’s the matter, why don’t you do something?’

In fact, all this time I had been continuing to strain. Now, just as Fiona turned to me, I caught a glimpse of myself in a mirror hung on the opposite wall. I saw that my face had become bright red and squashed into pig-like features, while my fists, clenched at chest level, were quivering along with the whole of my torso. Catching sight of myself in this condition took the wind right out of my sails and, losing heart, I collapsed back into the corner of the sofa, panting heavily.

‘I think, Fiona dear,’ Inge was saying, ‘it’s time you and this ... this friend of yours went on your way. I don’t think your attendance will be required this evening.’

‘It’s out of the question,’ Trude shouted. ‘We’ve got responsibilities now. We can’t afford to indulge little birds with broken wings like her. We’re no longer just a group of volunteers. We’ve got very important work to do and anyone not up to the mark will have to be let go.’

I could see tears appearing in Fiona’s eyes. She looked at me again, now with growing bitterness, and I thought of trying just once more to declare my identity, but the thought of the figure I had glimpsed in the mirror made me decide against doing so. Instead, I staggered to my feet and went in search of the exit. I was still considerably out of breath from the straining, and when I reached the doorway I was obliged to stop a moment to lean against its frame. Behind me, I could hear the two women continuing to talk in heated tones. At one point, I heard Inge say: 'And what a disgusting person to bring to your apartment.' With an effort, I hurried out across the small hallway and, after some moments of fumbling frantically at the locks of the main door, succeeded in letting myself out into the corridor. Almost at once, I began to feel better and proceeded towards the staircase in a more composed manner.

Going down the successive flights of stairs, I looked at my watch and saw that it was high time we were setting off for the Karwinsky Gallery. Naturally I felt considerable regret about the situation I was having to leave behind, but clearly my priority had to be to ensure our punctual arrival at the evening's important event. I resolved nevertheless to attend to Fiona's problems in the reasonably near future.

When I finally reached the ground floor, I was greeted by a sign marked 'Car Park' on the wall and an arrow pointing the way. I went past several storage cupboards, then out through an exit.

I emerged at the rear of the apartment buildings, on the other side from the artificial lake. The evening sun was now low in the sky. There was an expanse of green land before me, sloping gradually away into the distance. The car park, immediately in front of me, was simply a rectangle of grass that had been fenced off, like a corral on an American ranch. The ground had not been concreted, though the to-ing and fro-ing of vehicles had worn it down virtually to bare earth. There was enough space for perhaps fifty cars, but at this moment there were only seven or eight, each parked some way away from the other, the sunset glancing off their bodywork. Near the back of the car park I could see the stocky woman and Boris loading the boot of an estate car. As I moved towards them, I noticed Sophie sitting in the front passenger seat, gazing emptily through the windscreen at the sunset.

The stocky woman was closing the boot as I came up to them.

'I'm sorry,' I said to her. 'I didn't realise you had so much to load up. I'd have given a hand except ...'

‘It’s all right. This one here gave me all the help I needed.’ The stocky woman ruffled Boris’s hair, then said to him: ‘So don’t worry, okay? You’re all going to have a great evening. Really. She’s cooked all your favourites.’

She bent down and gave Boris a reassuring squeeze, but the little boy seemed to be in a dream and stared off into the distance. The stocky woman held out the car keys to me.

‘There should be plenty of petrol. Take care how you drive.’

I thanked her and watched her walk off towards the apartment buildings. When I turned to him, Boris was staring at the sunset. I touched his shoulder and led him round the car. He climbed into the back seat without speaking.

Evidently the sunset was having an hypnotic effect, for when I got in behind the wheel Sophie too was still staring into the distance. She seemed hardly to notice my arrival, but then, as I was familiarising myself with the controls, she said quietly:

‘We can’t let this house business drag us all down. We can’t afford to. We don’t know when it’ll be, the next time you’re back with us. House or no house, we’ve got to start doing things, good things together. That’s what I realised this morning, coming back in the bus. Even with that apartment. And that kitchen.’

‘Yes, yes,’ I said and put the key into the ignition. ‘Now. Do you know the way to the gallery?’

The question brought Sophie out of her trance-like condition. ‘Oh,’ she said, putting her hands up to her mouth as though she had just remembered something. Then she said: ‘I could probably find the way from the city centre. But from here, I don’t know.’

I sighed heavily. I could sense things were in danger of slipping out of control again, and I felt returning some of the intense annoyance I had experienced earlier in the day about the way Sophie had brought such chaos into my life. But then I heard her voice beside me say brightly:

‘Why don’t we ask the car park attendant? He might know.’

She was pointing to the entrance of the car park where, sure enough, there was a little wooden kiosk housing a uniformed figure, visible from the waist up.

‘All right,’ I said. ‘I’ll go and ask him.’

I got out and made my way towards the wooden kiosk. A car in the process of leaving the enclosure had paused beside the kiosk, and as I came closer I could see the attendant – a bald, fat man – leaning over his hatch, smiling jovially and gesturing to the driver. Their conversation went on for some time and I was on the verge of stepping in between them when the car at last started to pull away. Even then, the attendant continued to follow the vehicle with his eyes as it drove off along the long curving road that ran the perimeter of the housing estate. Indeed, he too seemed to have become transfixed by the sunset and, although I coughed directly under his hatch, he continued to gaze dreamily after the car. In the end I simply barked: ‘Good evening.’

The plump man started, then, looking down at me, replied: ‘Oh, good evening, sir.’

‘I’m sorry to disturb you,’ I said. ‘But we happen to be in something of a hurry. We need to get to the Karwinsky Gallery, but you see, being a visitor to this town I’m not at all sure of the quickest route from here.’

‘The Karwinsky Gallery.’ The man thought for a moment, then said: ‘Well, to be honest, it’s not at all straightforward, sir. In my opinion, the simplest thing would be for you to follow that gentleman who just left. In that red car.’ He pointed into the distance. ‘That gentleman, as luck would have it, lives very near the Karwinsky Gallery. I could of course try and give you directions, but I'd have to sit and work it all out first, all those different turnings, particularly towards the end of your journey. I mean, when you come off the highway and you have to find your way through all those little roads around the farms. Simplest by far, sir, just to follow that gentleman in the red car. If I'm not mistaken, he lives just two or three turnings on from the Karwinsky Gallery. It's a very pleasant area and that gentleman, he and his wife very much like it there. It's the countryside out there, sir. He tells me he has a nice cottage with hens in the back yard and an apple tree. A nice sort of area for an art gallery, even if it's a bit out of the way. Well worth the drive, sir. The gentleman in that red car, he says he doesn't ever think of moving even though it's quite some way for him to come every day, here to this estate. Oh yes, he works here, he works in the administration block' - the man suddenly leaned right out of his hatch and pointed to some windows behind him - 'that block over there, sir. Oh no, these aren't all residential apartments by any means. To run an estate of this size, oh, it requires a lot of paperwork. That gentleman in the red car, he's been working here right from the first day the water company began building here. And now he oversees all the maintenance work on the estate. It's a big job, sir, and it's a long way for him to have to commute each day, but he says he never thinks about moving nearer. And I don't blame him, it's very nice out there. But here I am chattering on, and you must be in a hurry. I do apologise, sir. As I say, if you just follow that red car, that's by far the simplest way to do it. I'm sure you'll enjoy the Karwinsky Gallery. It's a nice part of the country, and the gallery itself, I'm told it has some very beautiful objects.'

I thanked him tersely and walked back to the car. When I climbed back in behind the wheel, Sophie and Boris were again gazing at the sunset. I started the engine without speaking. Only after we had bumped past the wooden kiosk - I gave the car park attendant a quick wave - did Sophie ask: 'So you found out the way?'

'Yes, yes. We just follow the red car that left just now.'

As I said this, I realised how angry I still was at her. But I said nothing further and moved the car onto the road that circled the edge of the estate.

We passed block after block of apartments, the sunset reflected in the countless windows. Then the housing estate vanished and the road turned into a highway bound on either side by fir forests. The road was virtually empty, offering a clear view, and before long I spotted the red car up ahead, a small dot in the distance, travelling at an easy speed. Given the sparse traffic, I saw no necessity to follow hard up behind him and I too dropped to a leisurely speed with a respectful distance still between us. All the while, Sophie and Boris had both remained dreamily silent, and eventually I too began to get lulled into a tranquil mood watching the sun setting over the deserted highway.

After a little time, I found myself re-playing in my head the second goal scored by the Dutch football team in a World Cup semi-final against Italy some years ago. It had been a stupendous long-range shot and had always been one of my favourite sporting memories, but now, to my annoyance, I found I had forgotten the identity of the goal scorer. The name of Rensenbrink came drifting through my mind, and certainly he had been playing in that match, but in the end I felt certain he had not been the scorer. I saw again the ball floating through the sunshine, past the curiously transfixed Italian defenders, drifting on and on, beyond the outstretched hand of the goalkeeper. It was frustrating to have forgotten such a detail and I was systematically going through the names of all the Dutch footballers I could recall from that era, when Boris suddenly said behind me:

‘We’re too near the centre of the road. We’re going to crash.’

‘Nonsense,’ I said. ‘We’re fine.’

‘No, we’re not!’ I could feel him banging the back of my seat. ‘We’re too near the centre. If something comes the other way, we’ll crash!’

I said nothing, but moved the car a little more towards the edge of the road. This seemed to reassure Boris and he became quiet again. Then Sophie said:

‘You know, I have to admit, I wasn’t at all happy when I first heard. About this reception, I mean. I thought it would spoil our evening together. But when I thought about it some more, and especially when I realised it wouldn’t stop us having our meal tonight, I thought, well, it’s a good thing. In some ways, it’s exactly what we need. I know I can do well at it, and Boris too. We’ll both do well, and then we’ll have something to celebrate when we get back. The whole evening, it could really seal things for us.’

Before I could say something to this, Boris shouted again:

‘We’re much too near the centre!’

‘I’m not moving any further over,’ I said. ‘We’re perfectly fine now.’

‘Perhaps he’s frightened,’ Sophie said to me quietly.

‘Of course he’s not frightened.’

‘I’m frightened! We’re going to have a major accident!’

‘Boris, please be quiet. I’m driving perfectly safely.’

I had spoken quite sternly and Boris fell silent. But then, as I continued to drive, I became aware that Sophie was watching me uneasily. Occasionally she would glance back at Boris, then her gaze would return to me. Finally, she said quietly:

‘Why don’t we stop somewhere?’

‘Stop somewhere? Why do we want to do that?’

‘We’ll get to the gallery in good time. A few minutes wouldn’t make us late.’

‘I think we should just find the place first.’

Sophie fell into silence for another few minutes. Then she turned to me again and said: ‘I think we should stop. We could all have a drink and some refreshments. It’ll help you cool down.’

‘What do you mean, cool down?’

‘I want to stop!’ Boris called from the back.

‘What do you mean, cool down?’

‘It’s so important you two don’t have another quarrel tonight,’ said Sophie. ‘I can see it starting up again. But not this evening. I won’t let it. We should all go and relax. Get ourselves into the right sort of mood.’

‘What do you mean, right sort of mood? There’s nothing the matter with any of us.’

‘I want to stop! I’m frightened! I feel sick!’

‘Look’ – Sophie pointed at a passing sign – ‘there’s a service station coming up soon. Please, let’s stop there.’

‘This is completely unnecessary ...’

‘You’re getting really angry. And tonight’s so important. It’s not to happen tonight.’

‘I want to stop! I want the toilet!’

‘There it is now. Please, let’s stop. Let’s put it right before it gets any worse.’

‘Put what right?’

Sophie did not reply, but went on looking anxiously out through the windscreen. We were now moving through mountainous country. The fir forests had gone and in their place were craggy slopes towering up on either side of us. The service station was visible on the horizon, a structure resembling a spaceship built high into the cliffs. All my anger at Sophie had for the moment returned with a fresh intensity, but for all that - almost in spite of myself - I slowed down into the inside lane.

‘It’s all right, we’re stopping,’ Sophie said to Boris. ‘Don’t worry.’

‘He wasn’t worried in the first place,’ I said coldly, but Sophie did not seem to hear.

‘We’ll have a quick snack,’ she was telling the little boy. ‘We’ll all feel much better then.’

I followed a sign off the highway and up a steep narrow road. We climbed on through a number of hair-pin bends, then the road levelled off and we pulled into an open-air car park. Several lorries were parked side by side, as well as a dozen or so cars.

I climbed out and stretched my arms. When I glanced back, I saw Sophie helping Boris out of the car. I watched him take a few steps across the tarmac looking rather dozy. Then, as though to wake himself up, he turned his face up to the sky and let out a Tarzan yell, actually beating his chest as he did so.

‘Boris, stop that!’ I shouted.

‘But he’s not disturbing anyone,’ Sophie said. ‘No one can hear him.’

We were, it was true, high on a cliff-top and standing some distance away from the glassy structure that was the service station. The sunset had become a deep red and was reflecting off all the surfaces of the building. Without speaking, I strode past the pair of them and on towards the entrance.

‘I’m not disturbing anyone!’ Boris shouted after me. There came a second Tarzan yell, this time tailing off into a yodel. I carried on without turning. Only when I got to the entrance did I pause and wait, holding open the heavy glass door for them.

We crossed a lobby area with a bank of public telephones, and then through a second glass door into the café area. An aroma of grilled meat greeted us. The room was vast, with long rows of oval tables. On all sides were large glass panes through which we could see expanses of sky. From somewhere far off came the sounds of the highway beneath us.

Boris hurried over to the self-service counter and picked up a tray. Asking Sophie to buy me a bottle of mineral water, I went off to select a table. There were not many customers – only four or five tables were occupied – but I walked right to the end of one of the long rows and sat down with my back to the clouds.

After a few minutes Boris and Sophie came down the aisle holding their trays. They sat down in front of me and began to spread out their refreshments in an oddly muted manner. I then noticed Sophie giving Boris glances and supposed that while at the counter she had been urging the little boy to say something to me – something to make good the damage done by our recent altercation. It had not until this point occurred to me any sort of reconciliation was necessary between me and Boris, and I was annoyed to see Sophie so clumsily meddling in the situation. In an attempt to lighten the mood, I made some humorous remark concerning the futuristic décor surrounding us, but Sophie replied distractedly and darted another glance at Boris. The lack of subtlety was such that she might as well have nudged him with an elbow. Boris, understandably, seemed reluctant to comply and continued grumpily to twist around his fingers a packet of nuts he had purchased. Finally he mumbled without looking up:

‘I’ve been reading a book in French.’

I shrugged and looked out at the sunset. I was aware of Sophie urging Boris to say something further. Eventually he said sulkily:

‘I read a whole book in French.’

I turned to Sophie and said: ‘Myself, I’ve never got on with the French language. I still have more trouble with French than I do with Japanese. Really. I get by in Tokyo better than in Paris.’

Sophie, presumably dissatisfied with this response, fixed me with a hard stare. Irritated by her coerciveness, I turned away and looked again over my shoulder at the sunset. After a while, I heard Sophie say:

‘Boris is getting so much better at languages now.’

When neither Boris nor I responded, she leaned over towards the little boy, saying:

‘Boris, you’ve got to make more effort now. We’ll arrive at the gallery soon. There’ll be a lot of people there. Some of them might look very important, but you won’t be afraid, will you? Mother’s not going to be afraid of them, and neither will you. We’ll show everyone how well we can cope. We’ll be a big success, won’t we?’

For a moment Boris went on twisting his little packet round and round his fingers. Then he looked up and gave a sigh.

‘Don’t worry,’ he said. ‘I know what you have to do.’ Then he sat up and went on: ‘You have to put one hand in your pocket. Like this. And then you hold your drink, like this.’

He held the posture for a while, putting on as he did so an expression of great haughtiness. Sophie burst out laughing. I too could not help smiling a little.

‘And when people come up to you,’ Boris continued, ‘you just say over and over: “Quite remarkable! Quite remarkable!” Or if you like, you can say: “Priceless! Priceless!” And when the waiter comes up with things on a tray, you do this to him.’ Boris made a sour face and shook his finger from side to side.

Sophie was still laughing. ‘Boris, you’ll be a big hit tonight.’

Boris beamed, clearly pleased with himself. Then suddenly he got up, saying: ‘I’m going to the toilet now. I forgot I wanted to go. I won’t be a minute.’

He performed his disdainful finger shake for us one last time, then hurried off.

‘He’s very amusing sometimes,’ I said.

Sophie was watching over her shoulder Boris going off up the aisle. ‘He’s growing so fast,’ she said. Then she sighed and her expression grew more thoughtful. ‘Soon he’ll be grown. We don’t have much time.’

I said nothing, waiting for her to continue. For a few seconds she went on gazing over her shoulder. Then turning to me she said quietly: ‘This is his childhood, now, slipping away. Soon he’ll be grown and he’ll never have known anything better.’

‘You talk as though he’s having an awful time. He has a perfectly good life.’

‘All right, I know, his life isn’t so bad. But this is his childhood. I know what it should be like. Because I remember, you see, the way it was. When I was very small, before Mother got ill. Things were good then.’ She turned back to face me, but her eyes seemed to focus on the clouds behind my back. 'I want something like that for him.'

'Well, don't worry. We'll sort things out very soon. In the meantime, Boris is doing just fine. There's no need to worry.'

'You're like everyone else.' There was now a hint of anger in her voice. 'You go on like there's all the time in the world. You just don't realise, do you? Papa may have a good few years left in him yet, but he's not getting any younger. One day he'll be gone and then there'll be only us. You and me and Boris. That's why we have to get a move on. Build something for ourselves soon.' She took a deep breath and shook her head, her eyes falling to the cup of coffee in front of her. 'You don't realise. You don't realise what a lonely place the world can become if you don't get on with things.'

I saw no point in taking issue. 'Well, that's what we'll do then,' I said. 'We'll find something soon.'

'You don't realise how little time there is. Look at us. We've hardly started.'

The accusing tone in her voice was growing. Meanwhile she appeared to have forgotten entirely the not insignificant role her own behaviour had played in preventing us from 'getting on with things'. I felt a sudden temptation to point out all kinds of things to her, but in the end remained silent. Then, when neither of us had spoken for some time, I rose to my feet, saying:

'Excuse me. I think I'll get something to eat after all.'

Sophie was staring again at the sky and seemed hardly to notice my departure. I made my way to the self-service counter and took a tray. It was as I was studying the choice of pastries, I suddenly remembered I did not know the way to the Karwinsky Gallery and that we were for the time being entirely dependent on the red car. I thought about the red car, even now travelling out there on the highway, getting further and further from us, and I realised we could not afford to waste much more time lingering around the service station. In fact, it occurred to me we should set off again without delay, and I was on the verge of returning my tray and hurrying back to our table when I became aware that two people sitting nearby were talking about me.

Glancing round, I saw they were two middle-aged women, both smartly dressed. They were leaning across their table towards one another, speaking in lowered voices and, as far as I could make out, had no idea I was at that moment standing so close to them. They rarely referred to me by name and for this reason I could not at first be certain I was the subject of their discussion, but before long it became impossible to suppose they were talking of anyone else.

‘Oh yes,’ one of the women was saying. ‘They’ve been in touch with that Stratmann woman any number of times. She keeps assuring them he’ll turn up to inspect, but so far he hasn’t. Dieter says they don’t mind so much, it’s not as though they don’t have plenty of work to be getting on with, but they’re all of them so keyed up now, thinking he’s about to turn up any minute. And of course, Mr Schmidt keeps coming in every so often, shouting at them to tidy the place up, what if he came now and found the civic concert hall in such a condition? Dieter says they’re all nervous, even that Edmundo. And you never know with these geniuses, what they’ll pick out to criticise. They all still remember the time Igor Kobylansky came to inspect and he tested everything so minutely. How he got down on all fours while they all stood in a big circle on the stage around him, how they all watched him while he crawled about, tapping all the floorboards, putting his ear right down to them. The last two days Dieter’s not been the same, he’s been so on edge when he’s set off to work. It’s been awful for all of them. Each time he doesn’t show at an appointed time, they wait an hour or so then phone this Stratmann woman again. She's always very apologetic, she's always got excuses, and arranges another time with them.'

As I listened to this, a thought that had occurred to me several times during the past few hours came to the fore of my mind: namely that it would be wise for me to contact Miss Stratmann more frequently than I had been doing thus far. In fact I could even see some point in telephoning her from the public call boxes I had seen out in the lobby. But before I could give further consideration to this idea, the woman went on:

'And this is all after this Stratmann woman had been insisting for weeks how anxious he was to carry out the inspection, that he wasn't concerned just about the acoustics and all the usual things, but about his parents, how they were to be accommodated in the hall during the evening. Apparently they're neither of them very well, so they require special seating, special facilities, they require trained people nearby in case one or the other has a seizure or whatever. The arrangements needed are quite complicated and, according to this Stratmann woman, he was keen to go over each and every detail with all the staff. Well, that part of it was quite touching, to show so much concern about his aged parents. But then what do you know, he doesn't show up! Of course, it could be to do with this Stratmann woman rather than him. That's what Dieter thinks. By all accounts he's got an excellent reputation, he doesn't sound at all the type to keep inconveniencing people like this.'

I had been getting quite annoyed at the women and was naturally relieved to hear these latter remarks. But it was what they had said concerning my parents - about the need to see to their various special requirements - that convinced me I could not afford to put off phoning Miss Stratmann a moment longer. Abandoning my tray on the counter, I hurried out into the lobby.

I stepped into a phone booth, searching through my pockets for Miss Stratmann's card. After a moment I found it and dialled the number. The phone was answered immediately by Miss Stratmann herself.

'Mr Ryder, how good of you to call. I'm so glad everything has been going so well.'

'Ah. So you think everything is going well.'

'Oh splendidly! You've been such a success everywhere. People have been so thrilled. And your after-dinner speech last night, oh, everyone's talking about how witty and entertaining it was. It's such a pleasure, if I may say so, having someone like you to work with.'

'Well, thank you, Miss Stratmann. It's kind of you to say so. It's a pleasure to be so well looked after. I was ringing just now because, er, because I wanted to check certain things relating to my schedule. Of course, there have been some unavoidable delays today, leading to one or two unfortunate consequences.'

I paused, expecting Miss Stratmann to say something, but there was silence at the other end. I gave a small laugh and continued: 'But of course, we're on our way at this moment to the Karwinsky Gallery. I mean, we're actually in the middle of our journey at this very moment. Naturally we wanted to get there in plenty of time, and I must say, we're all greatly looking forward to it. The countryside around the Karwinsky Gallery, I understand, is quite splendid. Yes, we're very happy to be on our way.'

'I'm so pleased, Mr Ryder.' Miss Stratmann sounded uncertain. 'I do hope you'll find the event enjoyable.' Then she said suddenly: 'Mr Ryder, I do hope we haven't offended you.'

'Offended me?'

‘We really didn’t mean to imply anything. I mean, by suggesting you go to the Countess’s house this morning. We all knew you’d be thoroughly familiar with Mr Brodsky’s work, no one ever dreamt otherwise. It’s just that some of those recordings were quite rare and the Countess and Mr von Winterstein both thought ... Oh dear, I do hope you’re not offended, Mr Ryder! We really didn’t mean to imply anything.’

‘I’m not offended in the least, Miss Stratmann. On the contrary, I’ve been very concerned that the Countess and Mr von Winterstein aren’t offended I was unable to turn up...’

‘Oh, please don’t worry on that score, Mr Ryder.’

‘I was very keen to meet and talk with them, but when circumstances made it impossible for me to do everything we had originally hoped, I thought they would understand, particularly since, as you say, there was no actual necessity for me to listen to Mr Brodsky’s recordings ...’

‘Mr Ryder, I’m sure the Countess and Mr von Winterstein both understand the situation perfectly. It was, in any case, I can see it now, a very presumptuous thing to have arranged, especially with your time so limited. I do hope you’re not offended.’

‘I assure you I’m not at all offended. But actually, Miss Stratmann, if I may. I was phoning you just now to discuss certain aspects, that is, certain other aspects of my schedule here.’

‘Yes, Mr Ryder?’

‘For instance, my visit to inspect the concert hall.’

‘Ah yes.’

I waited to see if she would say anything more, but when she said nothing, I went on: ‘Yes, I simply wanted to make sure everything was in order for my coming.’

Miss Stratmann at last responded to the troubled tone in my voice. 'Oh, I see,' she said. 'I take your point. I haven't scheduled very much time for you to carry out your inspection. But as you can see' - she paused and I could hear the rustle of a sheet of paper - 'as you can see, on either side of the concert hall visit, you have these two very important appointments. So I thought if you had to be a little squeezed for time anywhere, it should be at the concert hall. You could always return there at another point if you really needed to. Whereas, you see, we couldn't really afford to give less time to either of the other appointments. For instance, the meeting with the Citizens' Mutual Support Group, I know how much importance you place on meeting the ordinary people affected ...'

'Yes, of course, you're quite right. I agree absolutely with what you say. As you point out, I can always squeeze in a second visit to the concert hall at some later point. Yes, yes. It's just that I was slightly concerned about the, er, the arrangements. That's to say, for my parents.'

There was again silence at the other end. I cleared my throat and continued:

'That's to say, as you know, my mother and father are both advanced in years. It will be necessary to have special facilities for them at the concert hall.'

'Yes, yes, of course.' Miss Stratmann sounded slightly puzzled. 'And medical help nearby in the event of any unfortunate occurrences. Yes, it's all well in hand, as you'll see when you carry out your inspection.'

I thought about this for a moment. Then I said: 'My parents. That's who we're talking about. There's no confusion here, I trust.'

'Not at all, Mr Ryder. Please don't worry.'

I thanked her and came away from the telephone booths. As I stepped back into the café, I paused a moment inside the doorway. The sunset was causing long shadows to fall across the room. The two middle-aged women were still talking earnestly, though I could not guess if they were still discussing me. Over at the far end, I could see Boris explaining something to Sophie and the two of them laughing happily. I continued to stand there for a few moments, turning over in my mind the conversation I had just had with Miss Stratmann. Thinking further about it, I could see there was something presumptuous in the notion that I would benefit from having the Countess play me Brodsky's old records. No doubt she and von Winterstein had been looking forward to guiding me step by step through the music. The thought irritated me and I felt thankful I had been obliged to miss the appointment.

Then I glanced at my watch and saw that, for all my words of reassurance to Miss Stratmann, we were in danger of arriving late at the Karwinsky Gallery. I made my way over to our table and, without sitting down, said:

'We'll have to be getting on now. We've been here quite some time.'

I had spoken with a certain urgency, but Sophie simply looked up and said:

'Boris thinks these doughnuts are the best he's ever tasted. That's what you were saying, wasn't it, Boris?'

I glanced at Boris and saw he was ignoring me. I then recalled our recent little altercation - I had for the moment forgotten all about it - and it struck me it would be best to say something conciliatory.

'So the doughnuts are good, you say,' I said to him. 'Are you going to let me try a piece?'

Boris continued to look the other way. I waited for a few seconds, then gave a shrug.

‘All right,’ I said. ‘If you don’t want to talk, that’s fine.’

Sophie touched Boris on the shoulder and was about to appeal to him, but I turned away saying: ‘Come on, we have to be on our way.’

Sophie nudged Boris once more. Then she said to me, a touch of desperation in her voice: ‘Let’s stay just a little longer. You’ve hardly sat with us at all yet. And Boris is so enjoying it here. Aren’t you, Boris?’

Again Boris showed no sign of having heard.

‘Look, we’ve got to get a move on now,’ I said. ‘We’re going to be late.’

Sophie looked again at Boris, then at me, anger gathering in her expression. Then finally she began to get up. I turned and made my way out of the café without looking back at them.

By the time I brought the car down the steep winding road and back onto the highway, the sun was very low in the sky. The traffic was as sparse as ever and I drove for a while at a good speed, scanning the horizon for signs of the red car. After several minutes we had left the mountains and were crossing vast expanses of farmland. On both sides of the highway the fields stretched on into the distance. It was while the road was taking a long slow curve across a piece of flat land that I spotted the red car again. It was still some way ahead, but I could see the driver proceeding as before at a leisurely speed. I reduced my own speed, and soon began to enjoy the scenery unfolding before me; the evening fields, the low sun flickering behind far-off trees, the occasional clusters of farm buildings - and all the while, the red car in front of us, drifting in and out of view with each turn of the road. Then I heard Sophie say beside me:

‘How many people do you think there’ll be?’

‘At this reception?’ I shrugged. ‘How should I know? I have to say, you seem to be getting yourself very worked up about this thing. It’s just another reception, that’s all.’

Sophie went on staring out at the view. Then she said: ‘A lot of the people tonight. They’ll be the same ones who were at the Rusconi banquet. That’s why I’m nervous. I thought you’d have realised that.’

I tried to recall the banquet she was referring to, but the name meant little to me.

‘I was getting so much better at these things until then,’ Sophie went on. ‘Those people were so horrible to me. I haven’t really recovered yet. There’s bound to be a lot of the same people tonight.’

I was still trying without success to recall this event. 'You mean, people were actually rude to you?' I asked.

'Rude? Well, I suppose you could call it that. They certainly made me feel pretty small and pathetic. I do hope they're not all there again tonight.'

'If anyone's rude to you tonight, you just come and tell me. And as far as I'm concerned, you can be as rude as you like back to them.'

Sophie turned and looked at Boris in the back seat. After a moment I realised the little boy had fallen asleep. Sophie went on watching him for a little longer, then turned back to me.

'Why are you starting it again?' she asked in a quite different voice. 'You know how much it upsets him. You're starting it all again. How long do you plan to keep it up this time?'

'Keep what up?' I asked tiredly. 'What are you talking about now?'

Sophie stared at me for a moment, then turned away. 'You don't realise,' she said almost to herself. 'We've no time for things like this. You just don't realise, do you?'

I felt my patience coming to an end. All the chaos I had been subjected to throughout the day came back to me and I found myself saying loudly:

'Look, why do you think you've got the right to criticise me like this all the time? Perhaps you haven't noticed, but I happen to be under great pressure just now. But instead of supporting me, you decide to criticise, criticise, criticise. And now you seem to be getting all ready to let me down at this reception. At least, you appear to be preparing the ground well enough for doing just that ...'

‘All right! We won’t come in then! Boris and I will wait in the car. You go to this thing by yourself!’

‘There’s no need for that. I was only saying ...’

‘I mean it! You go by yourself. That way we won’t be able to let you down.’

After this we travelled on for several minutes without speaking. Eventually I said:

‘Look, I’m sorry. You’ll probably be fine at this reception. In fact, I’m sure you will be.’

She did not reply. We continued to travel in silence and each time I glanced at her, I found her staring blankly at the red car in the distance. An odd sense of panic began to grow within me until finally I said:

‘Look, even if things don’t go right this evening, well, it won’t matter. What I mean is, it won’t make any difference to anything important. There’s no need for us to be silly like this.’

Sophie continued to stare at the red car. Then she said: ‘Do I look like I’ve put on weight? Be honest.’

‘No, not at all. You look marvellous.’

‘But I have. I’ve put on a little.’

‘It doesn’t matter. Whatever happens tonight, it won’t make any difference. Look, there’s no need to worry. We’ll have everything ready soon. A home, everything. So there’s no need to worry.’

As I said this something began to come back to me of the banquet she had mentioned earlier. In particular, an image came into my mind of Sophie, in a dark crimson evening dress, standing awkwardly by herself in the centre of a crowded room, while all around her people stood laughing and talking in little groups. I found myself thinking about the humiliation she must have endured and eventually touched her gently on the arm. To my relief she responded by resting her head on my shoulder.

‘You’ll see,’ she said, almost under her breath. ‘I’ll show you. And so will Boris. Whoever’s there tonight, we’ll show you.’

‘Yes, yes. I’m sure you will. You’ll both be fine.’

It was several minutes later that I noticed the red car indicating to turn off the highway. I reduced the distance between us and soon we were following our guide up a quiet road rising between meadows. The noise of the highway receded as we continued to climb, and then we were travelling on dirt tracks hardly fit for modern transportation. At one point a thick hedge scraped all along one side of our car, and soon afterwards we were bumping across a muddy yard full of broken-down farm vehicles. Then we came out onto some good country roads weaving smoothly through the fields and picked up speed again. Eventually I heard Sophie shout: ‘Oh, there it is!’ and saw a wooden board on a tree announcing the Karwinsky Gallery.

I slowed right down as we approached the gateway. Two rusted gateposts were still standing, but the gate itself had gone. As the red car continued down the road, finally vanishing from our view, I steered between the posts into a large overgrown field.

There was a dirt path running up the middle of the field and for a little while we moved slowly uphill. As we reached the crest, a fine view opened before us. The field swept down into a shallow valley, in the pit of which sat an imposing house built in the manner of a French chateau. The sun was setting in the woods behind it, and even from this distance, I could see the building was full of faded charm, evoking the slow decline of some dreamy land-owning family.

I engaged a low gear and took the car carefully down the hill. I could see in my mirror Boris, now fully awake, looking left and right, but the grass was so high it obscured entirely any view from the side windows.

As we came closer, I saw that a large area of the field near the house had become taken over with parked cars. I steered towards these as we completed our descent and saw there were almost a hundred vehicles in all, many of them polished to a gleam for the occasion. I drove around a little, trying to find a suitable spot to park, and came to a halt not far from the crumbling courtyard wall.

I got out of the car and stretched my limbs about. When I glanced back I saw that Sophie and Boris had also got out and that Sophie was fussing over Boris's appearance.

'Just remember,' I could hear her saying to him. 'No one in the room's more important than you. You just keep telling yourself that. Anyway, we won't be staying long.'

I was about to set off for the house when I became distracted by something at the corner of my eye. Turning, I saw that an old ruined car had been left abandoned in the grass close to where I was standing. The other guests had all left a space around it, as though its rust and general dilapidation might spread to their own vehicles.

I took a few steps towards the wreck. It had sunk some way into the earth and the grass had grown all around it, so that I might not have noticed it at all had the sunset not been striking its bonnet. There were no wheels and the driver's door had been torn off at the hinges. The paintwork had been gone over on numerous occasions, on the last of which the painter appeared to have used house paint before giving up mid-way. Both rear fenders had been replaced by mismatched substitutes from other vehicles. For all that, and even before I had examined it more closely, I knew I was looking at the remains of the old family car my father had driven for many years.

It was, of course, a long time since I had last laid eyes on it. Seeing it again in this sad state brought back to me its final days with us, when it had become so old I was acutely embarrassed my parents should continue to go about in it. Towards the end, I recalled, I had started to invent elaborate ploys to avoid taking journeys in it, so much did I dread being spotted by a schoolfriend or a teacher. But that had only been at the end. For many years I had clung to the belief that our car - despite its being quite inexpensive - was somehow superior to almost any other on the road and that this was the reason my father chose not to replace it. I could remember it parked in the drive of our little cottage in Worcestershire, its paint and metalwork gleaming, and my gazing at it for minutes at a time, feeling immensely proud. And on many afternoons - particularly on Sundays - I had spent hours playing in and around it. Occasionally I had brought out toys - perhaps even my collection of plastic soldiers - to lay out in the back seat. But more often I had simply built endless imaginary scenarios around the car, firing pistols through its windows, or conducting high-speed chases behind the wheel. Every so often, my mother would emerge from the house to tell me to stop slamming the car doors, the noise was driving her mad, and that if I did it once more she would 'skin me alive'. I could see her again quite vividly, standing at the back door of the cottage, shouting towards the car. The cottage had been a small one but, being deep in the countryside, had stood in a half-acre of grass. A lane went past our gate and on to the local farm, and twice a day a line of cows would go by, driven on by farmboys with muddy sticks. My father always left the car in the drive with its rear pointing to this lane, and I would often break off from what I was doing to watch the procession of cows through the back windscreen.

What we called our 'drive' was just an area of grass to the side of the house. It had never been concreted and in heavy rain the car would stand deep in water - a fact that could not have helped its rust problems and had possibly hastened it to its present condition. But as a child I had found wet days a particular treat. Not only did the rain create an especially cosy atmosphere inside the car, it provided me with the challenge of having to leap over canals of mud each time I got in or out. At first my parents had disapproved of this practice, claiming I was making marks all over the car's upholstery, but once the vehicle was a few years old they had ceased to care about this point. The slamming doors, however, continued to annoy my mother throughout the time we owned the car. This was unfortunate since this slamming was central to the enacting of my scenarios, invariably punctuating key moments of dramatic tension. Matters were complicated by the fact that my mother sometimes went weeks, even months, without complaining about the doors, until I would have all but forgotten they could be a source of conflict. Then one day, when I was completely absorbed in some drama, she would suddenly appear, highly distressed, telling me just one more time and she would 'skin me alive'. On a few occasions this threat had been issued at a point when a door was actually ajar, leaving me in a quandary as to whether I should leave it open once I had finished playing - even though it might then remain open all night - or whether I should risk shutting it as quietly as possible. This dilemma would torment me throughout the remainder of my time playing with the car, thoroughly poisoning my enjoyment.

'What are you doing?' Sophie's voice said behind me.
'We ought to be going in.'

I realised she was talking to me, but I had become so taken up by the discovery of our old car that I murmured something back without really thinking. Then I heard her say:

'What's got into you? You seem to have fallen in love with that thing.'

Only then did I realise I was holding the car in a virtual embrace; I had been resting my cheek on its roof while my hands made smooth circular motions over its scabbed surface. I straightened with a quick laugh, and turned to see Sophie and Boris staring at me.

‘In love with this? You have to be joking.’ I gave another laugh. ‘It’s criminal the way people leave wrecks like this lying around.’

They continued to stare at me, so I shouted: ‘What a disgusting heap!’ and gave the car a few good kicks. This seemed to satisfy them and they both turned away. I then saw that Sophie, despite her show of hurrying me, was still preoccupied with Boris’s appearance and had now resumed combing his hair.

I turned my attention back to the car, anxiety mounting that I might have inflicted some damage with my kicks. Closer examination showed that I had done no more than dislodge a few rusted flakes, but I was already full of remorse at having shown such callousness. I made my way through the grass around to the other side of the vehicle and peered in through the rear side window. Some flying object had struck the window but the glass had stayed intact, and I stared through the spiderweb cracks into the rear seat where I had once spent so many contented hours. Much of it, I could see, was covered with fungus. Rain water had pooled in one corner where the seat cushion met the arm-rest. When I tugged at the door, it came open with little trouble, but then became stuck half-way in the thick grass. There was just enough of a gap to enable me to squeeze in, and after a small struggle I managed to clamber onto the seat.

Once inside, it became clear that one end of the seat had fallen through the floor of the car, and I found myself unnaturally low. Through the window nearest my head I could see blades of grass and a pink evening sky. Re-adjusting myself I tugged at the door until it was almost shut again – something obstructed it from closing completely – and, after a few moments, found myself in a reasonably comfortable position.

Before long, a deep restfulness started to settle over me and I allowed my eyes to close for a moment. As I did so, I found a memory coming back of one of the happier family expeditions undertaken in the vehicle, a time we had driven all over the local countryside in search of a second-hand bicycle for me. It had been a sunny Sunday afternoon and we had gone from village to village, examining bicycle after bicycle, my parents conferring earnestly in the front while I sat behind them in this very seat, watching the Worcestershire scenery go by. Those were the days before telephones were routinely owned in England, and my mother had had on her lap a copy of the local newspaper in which people advertising items for sale printed their whole addresses. Appointments had been unnecessary; a family like us could simply materialise at a door and say: 'We've come about the boy's bike' and be shown around to the back shed for the inspection. The more friendly people would offer tea - which my father would decline each time with the identical humorous remark. But one old woman - who had turned out to be selling not a 'boy's bike' at all, but her husband's after the latter's death - had insisted on our coming in. 'It's always such a pleasure,' she had said to us, 'to receive people like yourselves.' Then, as we had sat in her little sunlit parlour with our teacups, she had referred to us once more as 'people like yourselves', and suddenly, in the midst of listening to my father talking about the sort of bicycle most suitable for a boy of my age, it had dawned on me that to this old woman my parents and I represented an ideal of family happiness. A huge tension had followed this realisation, one which had continued to mount within me throughout the half-hour or so we had stayed. It was not that I had feared my parents would fail to keep up their usual show - it was inconceivable they would have started even the most sanitised version of one of their rows. But I had become convinced that at any second some sign, perhaps even some smell, would cause the old woman to realise the enormity of her error, and I had watched with dread for the moment she would suddenly freeze in horror before us.

Sitting in the back of the old car, I tried to recall how that afternoon had ended, but I found my mind wandering instead to another afternoon altogether, one full of pouring rain, when I had come out to the car, to the sanctuary of this rear seat, while the troubles had raged on inside the house. On that afternoon, I had lain across the seat on my back, the top of my head squeezed under the arm-rest. From this vantage point, all I had been able to see from the windows had been the rain streaming down the glass. At that moment my profound wish had been that I would be allowed just to go on lying there undisturbed, hour after hour. But experience had taught me my father would at some stage emerge from the house, that he would walk past the car, go down to the gate and out into the lane, and so I had lain there for a long time, listening intently through the rain for the rattle of the back door latch. When at last the sound had come, I had sprung up and begun to play. I had mimicked an exciting tussle over a dropped pistol in such a way as to make clear I was far too absorbed to notice anything. Only when I had heard the wet tread of his feet go right to the end of the drive had I dared to stop. Then, quickly kneeling up on the seat, I had peered cautiously out of the back windscreen in time to see my father's raincoated figure, pausing by the gate, hunching slightly as he opened his umbrella. The next moment he had stepped purposefully into the lane and out of view.

I must have dozed off for I awoke with a jolt and saw that I was sitting in the back of the ruined car in complete darkness. In a slight panic I pushed at the door nearest me. At first it remained stuck, but then shifted a little at a time until I was able at last to squeeze myself out.

Brushing down my clothes, I looked about me. The house was brightly lit - I could see glittering chandeliers inside tall windows - and over beside our car Sophie was still fussing with Boris's hair. I was standing beyond the pool of light cast by the house, but Sophie and Boris were virtually floodlit. As I watched, Sophie leaned down to the wing mirror to add some finishing touches to her make-up.

Boris turned to me as I emerged into the light. 'You've been ages,' he said.

'Yes, I'm sorry. We ought to be going in now.'

'Just one second,' Sophie muttered distractedly, still bending over the mirror.

'I'm getting hungry,' Boris said to me. 'When do we go home?'

'Don't worry, we won't stay long. All these people, they're waiting to meet us, so we'd better just go in and say hello. But we'll leave pretty quickly. Then we'll go home and have a good evening. Just ourselves.'

'Can we play Warlord?'

'Of course,' I said, delighted the little boy seemed now to have forgotten our earlier altercation. 'Or any other game you fancy. Even if we start playing one and half-way through you want to stop and play a different one, because you're bored or because you're losing, that's fine, Boris. Tonight we'll just change to whichever one you want to play. And if you wanted to stop altogether and just talk for a while, about football, say, then that's what we'll do. It'll be a marvellous evening, just the three of us. But first let's go in and get this over with. It won't be so bad.'

'Okay, I'm ready now,' Sophie announced, but then she bent down to the mirror one last time.

We passed under a stone arch into the courtyard. As we made our way towards the front entrance, Sophie said: 'I'm actually looking forward to this now. I feel good about it.'

‘Fine,’ I said. ‘Just relax and be yourself.
Everything will be fine.’

The door was opened by a stout housemaid. As we wandered into the spacious entrance hall, she muttered:

‘It’s nice to see you again, sir.’

Only when I heard her say this did I realise I had been to the house before – that in fact it was the same one Hoffman had brought me to the previous evening.

‘Ah yes,’ I said, looking around at the oak-panelled walls, ‘it’s nice to be back again. This time, as you see, I’ve brought my family.’

The maid did not reply. Possibly this was due to deference, but when I glanced quickly at the woman standing sullenly by the door, I could not avoid sensing hostility. It was then that I noticed, on the round wooden table next to the umbrella stand, my face peering up from amid a spread of magazines and newspapers. Going up to the table, I pulled out what I saw to be the evening edition of the local newspaper, the entire front of which comprised a photograph of myself – taken apparently in a windswept field. Then I spotted the white building in the background and remembered the morning’s photo-session on the hilltop. I took the newspaper over to a lamp and held the picture under the yellow light.

The force of the wind was causing my hair to be flung right back. My tie was fluttering stiffly out behind an ear. My jacket was also flying behind me so that I looked to be wearing a cape. More puzzlingly, my features bore an expression of unbridled ferocity. My fist was raised to the wind, and I appeared to be in the midst of producing some warrior-like roar. I could not for the life of me understand how such a pose had come about. The headline – there was no other text at all on the front page - proclaimed: 'ryder's rallying call'.

Somewhat nervously, I opened the newspaper and was confronted by a spread of six or seven smaller pictures, each a variation on the one on the front. My belligerent demeanour was evident in all but two of them. In these latter, I appeared to be presenting proudly the white building behind me, displaying as I did so a strange smile that revealed extensively my lower teeth but none of the upper. Scanning the columns beneath, my eye caught repeated references to someone named Max Sattler.

I would have examined the newspaper further but, suspecting as I did that the maid's hostility had to do with these very photographs, I began to feel distinctly uncomfortable. I put the paper down and came away from the table, resolving to study the report carefully at a later opportunity.

'It's time we went in,' I said to Sophie and Boris, who had been hovering in the middle of the hall. I had spoken loudly enough for the maid to hear and fully expected her to lead us through to the reception. But she made no movement and, after an awkward few seconds, I smiled at her saying: 'Of course, I can remember from last night.' With that I led the way into the house.

In fact the building was not at all as I remembered it, and we quickly found ourselves in a long panelled corridor quite unfamiliar to me. This proved not to matter, however, for a hubbub could be heard as soon as we had gone a little way down, and before long we were standing at the doorway of a narrow room packed with people in evening dress holding cocktail glasses.

At first glance the room appeared to be of a much smaller scale than the grand ballroom in which guests had gathered the night before. In fact on closer inspection I saw that originally it had probably not been a room at all, but a corridor, or at best a long curving vestibule. Its curve was such as to suggest it might eventually describe a semi-circle, though it was impossible to ascertain this glancing in from the doorway. I could see on its outer side the huge windows, now covered by curtains, going on round the curve, while the inner wall appeared to be lined by doors. The floor was marble, chandeliers hung from the ceiling, and here and there around the room were art objects displayed on pedestals or in elegant glass cabinets.

We paused at the threshold, taking in this scene. I looked about for someone to come and usher us in, perhaps even announce our arrival, but though we stood and watched for some time no one came to us. Occasionally some person would come striding hurriedly in our direction, but then at the last moment turn out to have been making for some other guest.

I glanced at Sophie. She had an arm around Boris and both were staring apprehensively at the crowd.

‘Come on, let’s go in,’ I said nonchalantly. We all took a few steps into the room, but then came to a halt again a little way inside.

I looked around for Hoffman or Miss Stratmann or anyone else I recognised, but could see no one. Then, as I continued to stand there looking from face to face, the thought came to me that a great many of these same people might well have attended the event at which Sophie had been so appallingly treated. Suddenly I could see all the more vividly what Sophie had had to endure and felt a dangerous anger rising in me. Indeed, as I continued to look around the room, I could spot at least one group of guests – standing together almost where the room curved out of our view – who almost certainly had been among the major culprits. I studied them through the crowd: the men with their self-satisfied smiles, the pompous way they took their hands in and out of their trouser pockets as though to demonstrate to one and all how at ease they were in a gathering of this sort; and the women, with their ridiculous costumes, and their way of shaking their heads helplessly when they laughed. It was unbelievable - utterly preposterous - that such people should presume to sneer or look down on anyone, let alone on someone like Sophie. In fact I saw no reason not to go immediately up to this group to give them a firm dressing down under the full gaze of their peers. Murmuring a quick word of reassurance in Sophie's ear, I set off across the floor.

As I made my way through the crowd, I saw that the room did indeed turn a slow semi-circle. I could now see also the waiters standing like sentries all along the inner wall, holding their trays of drinks and canapés. Sometimes people would jog me and apologise pleasantly, or I would exchange smiles with someone trying to push through in the opposite direction, but curiously no one appeared actually to recognise me. At one stage I found myself squeezing past three middle-aged men who were shaking their heads despondently at something, and I noticed that one was holding under his arm a copy of the evening newspaper. I saw my windswept face peeking from behind his elbow and wondered vaguely if the appearance of the photographs could in some way account for the odd way our arrival had thus far been ignored. But I was now virtually next to the people I had been making for and gave this idea no further thought.

Noticing my approach, two of the group stepped aside as though to welcome me into their circle. They were, I realised, discussing the art objects surrounding us, and as I came into their midst they were all nodding over something the last speaker had said. Then one of the women said:

‘Yes, it’s so clear you could draw a line across this room, just after that Van Thillo.’ She pointed to a white statuette on a stand not far from us. ‘Young Oskar never had the eye. And to be fair, he knew it, but he felt a duty, a duty to his family.’

‘I’m sorry, but I have to agree with Andreas,’ one of the men said. ‘Oskar was too proud. He should have delegated. To people who knew better.’

Then one of the other men said to me, smiling pleasantly: ‘And what is your feeling on this, sir? About Oskar’s contribution to the collection?’

I was momentarily taken aback by this enquiry, but I was not in a mood to be deflected.

‘It’s all very well you ladies and gentlemen standing here discussing Oskar’s inadequacy,’ I began. ‘But more important and to the point ...’

‘It would be going too far,’ a woman interrupted, ‘to call young Oskar inadequate. His taste was very different to his brother’s, and yes, he did make the odd mistake, but all in all I think he’s brought a welcome dimension to the collection. It breaks up the austerity. Without it, well, this collection would be like a good dinner without the sweet course. That caterpillar vase over there’ – she pointed through the crowd – ‘it really is rather delightful.’

‘It’s all very well ...’ I began again heatedly, but before I could get further, a man said firmly:

‘The caterpillar vase is the only one, the only one of his choices that earns its place here. His problem was that he had no sense of the collection as a whole, the balance of the thing.’

I could feel my patience running out.

‘Look,’ I shouted, ‘just stop this! Just for one second stop this, this inane chatter! Just stop it for one second and let someone else say something, someone else from outside, outside this closed little world you all seem so happy to inhabit!’

I paused and glared at them. My assertiveness had paid off for they were all of them – four men and three women – staring at me in astonishment. Having at last gained their attention, my anger now felt deliciously under control, like some weapon I could wield with deliberation. I lowered my voice - I had shouted a little more loudly than I had intended - and continued:

‘Is it any wonder, is it any wonder at all that in this little town of yours, you have all these problems, this crisis as some of you choose to term it? That so many of you are so miserable and frustrated? Does it puzzle anyone, anyone from outside? Is it a surprise? Do we, we observers from a bigger, broader world, do we scratch our heads in bewilderment? Do we say to ourselves, how can it possibly be that a town such as this’ - I could feel someone tugging at my arm, but I was now determined to have my say - ‘that a town, a community like this should have such a crisis on its hands? Are we puzzled and amazed? No! Not for a moment! One arrives and immediately what does one see all around? Exemplified, ladies and gentlemen, by people like you, yes, you here! You typify - I’m sorry if I’m being unfair, if there are examples yet more gross and monstrous to be found under the rocks and paving stones of this city - but to my eyes, you, sir, and you, madam, yes, as much as I regret to break it to you, yes, you exemplify everything that’s so wrong here!’ The hand tugging at my sleeve, I realised, belonged to one of the women I was addressing, who for some reason was reaching behind the man standing next to me. I glanced a second in her direction, then went on: ‘For one thing, you lack basic manners. Look at the way you treat each other. Look at the way you treat my family. Even myself, a distinguished figure, your guest, look at you, far too concerned about Oskar’s art collecting. In other words, too obsessed, obsessed with the little internal disorders of this thing you call your community, too obsessed to display even the minimum level of good manners to us.’

The woman tugging my arm now moved round so that she was directly behind me and I was aware that she was saying something to me in her effort to tear me away. I ignored her and continued:

‘And it’s here, of all places, what a cruel irony! Yes, it’s here, to this place my parents have to come. Of all places, here, to receive your so-called hospitality. What an irony, what a cruelty, of all places, after all these years, that it should be somewhere like this, with people like you! And my poor parents, coming all this way, to hear me perform for the very first time! Do you suppose this makes my task any easier, that I’m obliged to leave them in the care of people like you, and you, and you?’

‘Mr Ryder, Mr Ryder ...’ The woman at my elbow had been pulling insistently for some time and I now saw that this was none other than Miss Collins. This realisation made me lose my momentum and before I knew it she had succeeded in pulling me back from the group.

‘Ah, Miss Collins,’ I said to her, a little confused. ‘Good evening.’

‘You know, Mr Ryder,’ Miss Collins said, continuing to lead me away. ‘I’m genuinely surprised, I have to say it. I mean by the level of fascination there is. A friend told me just now that the whole town is gossiping about it. Gossiping, she assures me, in the kindest possible way! But I really can’t see what all the fuss is about. Just because I went today to the zoo! I really can’t understand it. I only agreed because they convinced me it was in everyone’s interests, you know, for Leo to do well tomorrow night. So I merely agreed to be there, that was all. And I suppose, to be truthful, I wished to say a few encouraging words to Leo, now that he’s gone this long without drinking. It seemed only fair I acknowledged it in some way. I assure you, Mr Ryder, if he’d gone this long without drinking at any other point in these last twenty years, I would have done exactly the same. It’s just that it hadn’t happened until now. There really wasn't anything so significant about my presence at the zoo today. '

She had ceased to pull at me, but had kept her arm in mine and we now settled to a slow walk through the crowd.

'I'm sure there wasn't, Miss Collins,' I said. 'And let me assure you, when I came over to you just now, I didn't have the slightest intention of raising the subject of yourself and Mr Brodsky. Unlike the great majority of this town, I'm quite content not to pry into your private concerns. '

'That's very decent of you, Mr Ryder. But in any case, as I say, our meeting this afternoon didn't amount to anything so significant. People would be so disappointed if they knew. All that happened was that Leo came up to me and said: "You're looking very lovely today." Just the sort of thing you'd expect Leo to say after twenty years of being drunk. And that was just about all there was to it. Of course I thanked him, and said that he was looking better than I'd seen him for some time. He looked down at his shoes then, something I don't recall him ever doing when he was younger. He never did anything so timid in those days. Yes, his fire's burnt out, I could see that. But something's replaced it, something with some gravity. Well, there he was, looking down at his shoes, and Mr von Winterstein and the other gentlemen were all hovering about a little way behind, looking the other way, pretending they'd forgotten about us. I made some remark to Leo about the weather and he looked up and said, yes, the trees were looking splendid. Then he began to tell me which animals he'd liked of the ones he'd just seen. It was clear he hadn't been attending at all, because he said: "I love all these animals. The elephant, the crocodile, the chimpanzee." Well, the monkeys' cages were nearby and certainly they would have come that way, but they certainly wouldn't have passed the elephants or crocodiles and I said as much to Leo. But Leo brushed this aside as though I'd brought up something completely irrelevant. Then he seemed to get into a slight panic. Perhaps it had to do with Mr von Winterstein coming a little closer just then. You see, my original agreement had been that I'd say a few words to Leo, just literally a few words. Mr von Winterstein had assured me he'd intervene after a minute or so. Well, those had been my conditions but then, once we'd started to talk, it did feel hopelessly short. I myself began to dread the sight of Mr von Winterstein hovering nearby. Anyway, Leo knew we had very little time because then he plunged right in. He said: "Perhaps we might try again. To live together. It's not too late." You must accept, Mr Ryder, this was somewhat blunt after all these years, even allowing for this afternoon's time restrictions. I simply said: "But what would we do together? We've hardly a thing in common now." And for a second or two, he looked about bewildered, as though I'd brought up a point he'd never before thought of. Then he pointed to the cage in front of us and said: "We could keep an animal. We could love and care for it together. Perhaps that was what we didn't have before." And I didn't know what to say so we were just standing there, and I could see Mr von Winterstein starting to come over, but then he must have sensed something, something in the way Leo and I were standing there, because he changed his mind and moved away again and started talking to Mr von Braun. Then Leo put up a finger in the air, that's a gesture of his from long ago, he put up his finger and said: "I had a dog, as you know, but he died yesterday. A dog's no good. We'll choose an animal that will live a long time. Twenty, twenty-five years. That way, so long as we look after it well, we'll die first, we won't have to mourn it. We never had children so let's do this." To which I said: "You simply haven't thought this through. Our beloved animal may well outlive us both, but it's unlikely the two of us will die at the same time. You may not have to mourn the animal, but if, say, I died before you, you'd have to mourn me." To which he said quickly: "That's better than having no one mourn you after you've gone." "But I have no fear of such a thing," I said to him. I pointed out that I'd helped many people in this town over the years and that when I died I wouldn't be at all short of mourners. To which he said: "You never know. Things might go well for me from here. I too might have many mourners when I die. Perhaps hundreds." Then he said: "But what would that matter, if none of them really cared for me? I'd swap them all. For someone whom I'd loved and who'd loved me." I must admit, Mr Ryder, this conversation was making me a little sad and I was unable to think of anything else to say to him. Then Leo said: "If we'd had children back then, how old would they be? They would be beautiful by now." As though they take years to become beautiful! Then he said again: "We never had children. So let's do this instead." When he said this again, well, I suppose I became confused and I glanced past his shoulder at Mr von Winterstein, and immediately Mr von Winterstein came towards us making some jokey remark, and that was it. That was the end of our conversation.'

We were continuing to walk slowly around the room, her arm still in mine. I spent a moment digesting what she had told me. Then I said:

'I was just recalling, Miss Collins. The last time we met, you were kind enough to invite me to your apartment to discuss my problems. Ironically there seems now much more to discuss about the decisions you must make in life. I do wonder what you'll decide to do. If I may say so, you stand at something of a crossroad.'

Miss Collins laughed. 'Oh dear, Mr Ryder, I'm much too old to be standing at any crossroad. And it's really much too late for Leo to be talking like this. If this had all happened even just seven or eight years ago ...' She gave a sigh and for a fleeting moment a profound sadness crossed her face. Then she was once more wearing her gentle smile. 'This is hardly the time to be starting out with a whole new set of hopes and fears and dreams. Yes, yes, you'll hasten to tell me I'm not so elderly, that my life is far from over, I do appreciate it. But the fact is, it is all very late in the day and it would be ... well, let us say it would be messy to complicate things now. Ah, the Mazursky! It never fails to captivate me!' She gestured towards a red clay cat mounted on a stand we were just passing. 'No, Leo has created quite sufficient mess in my life already. I've long since built up a different life for myself and if you ask people in this town, most of them I hope will tell you I've acquitted myself rather well. That I've been of much service to many of them over a time of increasing hardship here. Of course, I've not been able to achieve anything on your sort of scale, Mr Ryder. But that doesn't mean I can't enjoy a certain sense of satisfaction when I look back and see what I've been able to do. Yes, by and large, I feel quite satisfied with the life I've made for myself since Leo, and I'm quite content to let it stand at that.'

'But surely, Miss Collins, you should at least consider very carefully the present situation. I can't understand why you wouldn't see it as a fine reward, after all your good work, to be able to share the evening of your life with the man who - excuse me - with the man whom at some level one assumes you still love. I say this because, well, why else have you continued to live here in this city all these years? Why else have you never considered another marriage?'

'Oh, I've considered other marriages, Mr Ryder. At least three men over the years I might easily have settled for. But they ... they weren't right. Perhaps there is something in what you say. Leo was nearby and that made it impossible for me to feel sufficiently towards these others. Well, in any case, I'm talking of long ago. Your question, and perhaps an understandable one, is why shouldn't I now end my days with Leo? Well, let us consider for a moment. Leo is sober and calm now. Will he remain like that for long? Perhaps. There's a chance, I'll allow that. Particularly if he now wins recognition here, becomes a figure of renown again with large responsibilities. But if I agree to return to him, well, that'll be a different matter. He will decide after a little time to destroy everything he's built, just as he did before. And where would that leave everyone? Where would that leave this city? In fact, Mr Ryder, I rather think I have a public duty not to accept these proposals of his.'

'Forgive me, Miss Collins, but I can't help feeling you're really not as convinced by your own arguments as you would like to be. That somewhere deep down you've always been waiting and waiting for your old life, your life with Mr Brodsky, to resume. That all your good work, for which I don't doubt the people of this town will always be grateful, you nevertheless looked on it essentially as something to be getting on with while you waited.'

Miss Collins leant her head and considered my words with an amused smile.

'Perhaps there's something in what you say, Mr Ryder,' she said eventually. 'Perhaps I wasn't so aware of the speed at which time went by. It was only recently, last year in fact, that it really struck me how time was getting on. That we were both of us getting old and that it was perhaps too late to think about retrieving what we had. Yes, you may be right. When I first left him, I didn't see it as such a permanent thing. But was I waiting, as you claim? I really don't know. I thought about things on a day by day basis. And now I find the time's all gone. But when I look at it all now, my life, what I've done with it, it doesn't seem so bad. I'd like to finish things this way, the way I have it now. Why must I get involved with Leo and his animal? It really will be much too messy.'

I was about to express again, in the gentlest sort of way, my scepticism as to whether she really believed all she was saying, when I became aware of Boris at my elbow.

'We've got to go home soon,' he said. 'Mother's getting upset.'

I looked across to where he was pointing. Sophie was standing a few steps from where I had originally left her, quite isolated, not talking to anyone. A feeble smile hovered on her face, though there was no one to display it to. Her shoulders were hunched and her gaze seemed to be fixed on the footwear of the group of guests nearest her.

The situation was clearly hopeless. Containing my fury at the whole room, I said to Boris: 'Yes, you're right. We'd better go. Bring your mother over. We'll try and slip out without people noticing. We attended, so no one can complain.'

I recalled from the previous evening that the house adjoined the hotel. As Boris disappeared into the crowd, I turned to look at the doors lining the wall, trying to recall which of them it had been that had led Stephan Hoffman and myself through to the hotel corridor. But just then Miss Collins, who was still holding my arm, started to talk again, saying:

'If I had to be honest, perfectly honest, then I'd have to admit it. Yes, in my less rational moments, it's been my dream.'

'Oh, what's that, Miss Collins?'

'Well, everything. Everything that's happening now. That Leo would pull himself together, that he'd find some position in this town worthy of him. That it would all be fine again, that the terrible years would be behind us for ever. Yes, I have to admit it, Mr Ryder. It's one thing, in the daylight hours, to be wise and reasoned. But during the nights, that's a different matter. Often enough over these years, I've woken up in the darkness, in the small hours, and I've lain awake thinking about it, thinking about just something like this happening. Now it's starting to happen for real, it's rather confusing. But then you see, it's not really starting. Oh, Leo might well be capable of achieving something here, he did once have a lot of talent, it can't all have faded away. And it's true, he never got a chance, a proper chance before, where we were. But for the two of us, it's too late. Whatever he says, it's surely too late.'

'Miss Collins, I'd very much like to discuss this whole matter with you at greater length. But unfortunately, just now, I'm afraid I have to be going.'

Indeed, as I said this, I could see Sophie and Boris coming across the room towards me. Disentangling myself from Miss Collins, I considered again the choice of doors, stepping back a little to take in those hidden round the curve. When I studied them in turn, each door looked vaguely familiar, but I found I did not feel confident about any of them. It occurred to me to ask someone's advice, but I decided against this for fear of attracting attention to our early departure.

I led Sophie and Boris towards the doors, still in a quandary. For some reason, there had come into my head the numerous scenes from movies in which a character, wishing to make an impressive exit from a room, flings open the wrong door and walks into a cupboard. Although for exactly the opposite reason - I wished us to leave so inconspicuously that when it was discussed afterwards no one would be quite sure at which point we had done so - it was equally crucial I avoided such a calamity.

In the end I settled for the door most central in the row simply because it was the most imposing. There were pearl inlays within its deep panels and stone columns flanking each side. And at this moment, in front of each column, there stood a uniformed waiter as rigid as any sentry. A doorway of this status, I reasoned, while it might not necessarily take us directly through to the hotel, was certain to lead somewhere of significance from where we could work out our route, away from the public gaze.

Motioning Sophie and Boris to follow, I drifted towards the door and, giving one of the uniformed men a curt nod, as though to say: 'There's no need to stir, I know what I'm doing,' pulled it open. Whereupon, to my horror, the very thing I had most feared occurred: I had opened a broom cupboard and, at that, one which had been filled beyond its capacity. Several household mops came tumbling out and fell with a clatter onto the marble floor, scattering a dark fluffy substance in all directions. Glancing into the cupboard, I saw an untidy heap of buckets, oily rags and aerosol cans.

'Excuse me,' I muttered to the uniformed man nearest me as he hastened to gather up the mops and, with glances now turning accusingly our way, I hurried in the direction of the neighbouring door.

Determined not to make the same mistake twice, I set about opening this second door with caution. I proceeded very slowly, and even though I could sense many eyes on my back, even though I could hear a rise in the hubbub and a voice saying close by: 'My God, that's Mr Ryder, isn't it?' I resisted the temptation to panic, inching the door toward me a little at a time, all the while peering into the crack to ensure there was nothing about to fall out. When to my relief I saw the door led into a corridor, I stepped quickly through and gestured urgently to Sophie and Boris.

I closed the door behind them and we all three looked about us. With some triumph I saw that I had, at the second attempt, chosen exactly the right door and we were now standing in the long dark corridor that led past the hotel drawing room and into the lobby. At first we remained motionless, a little stunned by the hush after the noise of the gallery. Then Boris yawned and said: 'That was a really boring party.'

'Atrocious,' I said, feeling furious again at every one of the people at the reception. 'What a pathetic lot. No idea at all about civilised behaviour.' Then I added: 'Mother was by far the most beautiful woman there. Wasn't she, Boris?'

Sophie giggled in the darkness.

'She was,' I said. 'By far the most beautiful.'

Boris seemed about to say something, but just then we all became aware of a slithering noise coming from somewhere in the darkness around us. Then, as my eyes accustomed themselves, I managed to make out further down the corridor the outline of some large beast, coming towards us slowly, emitting the noise each time it moved. Sophie and Boris had become aware of its presence at the same time and for a moment we all seemed to become transfixed. Then Boris exclaimed in a whisper:

'It's Grandfather!'

I then saw that the beast was indeed Gustav, hunched right over, holding one suitcase under his arm, a second by its handle and dragging behind him a third - the source of the slithering noise. For a moment he appeared to be hardly moving forward at all, but simply rocking himself to a slow rhythm.

Boris made eagerly for him, while Sophie and I followed somewhat hesitantly. As we approached, Gustav, at last becoming aware of our presence, stopped and partially straightened. I could not see his expression in the darkness, but his voice sounded cheerful as he said:

‘Boris. What a pleasant surprise.’

‘It’s Grandfather!’ Boris exclaimed again. Then he said: ‘Are you busy?’

‘Yes, there’s lots of work.’

‘You must be very busy.’ There was an odd tension in Boris’s voice. ‘Very, very busy.’

‘Yes,’ Gustav said, recovering his breath. ‘It’s very busy.’

I stepped up to Gustav and said: ‘We’re sorry to interrupt you in the middle of your duties. We’ve just been attending a reception, but we’re now on our way home. To a big supper.’

‘Ah,’ the porter said looking at us. ‘Ah yes. That’s jolly good. I’m very pleased to see you all together like this.’ Then he said to Boris: ‘How are you, Boris? And how is your mother?’

‘Mother’s a bit tired,’ Boris said. ‘We’re all looking forward to the supper. We’re going to play Warlord afterwards.’

‘Now that sounds splendid. I’m sure you’ll enjoy yourselves. Well ...’ Gustav paused for a moment. Then he said: ‘I’d better be getting on with my work. We’re very busy at the moment.’

‘Yes,’ Boris said quietly.

Gustav ruffled Boris's hair. Then he hunched down again and recommenced his pulling. Reaching a hand out to Boris, I guided the little boy out of Gustav's way. Perhaps because we were watching, perhaps because the brief pause had restored some of his energy, the porter seemed this time to make much steadier progress as he moved past us into the darkness. I began to lead the way towards the lobby, but Boris was reluctant to follow, staring back down the corridor to where his grandfather's hunched shape could still be made out.

'Come on, let's hurry,' I said, putting an arm around his shoulder. 'We're all getting very hungry.'

I had started to walk again when I heard Sophie say behind me: 'No, it's this way.' I turned to find her stooping down by a small door I had not previously noticed. In fact, had I noticed it at all, I would not have assumed it to be anything more than a cupboard door, for it barely came up to my shoulder. Nevertheless, Sophie was now holding it open and Boris, with the air of someone who had done so numerous times before, stepped through it. Sophie continued to hold the door open and, after a little hesitation, I too stooped down and crept through after Boris.

I had half expected to find myself in a tunnel having to crawl on hands and knees, but in fact I was standing in another corridor. If anything it was more spacious than the one we had just left, but clearly intended only for staff. The floor was uncarpeted and there were bare pipes running along the wall. We were again in near-darkness, though a little further down, a bar of electric light was falling across the floor. We walked a short way towards the light, then Sophie stopped again and pushed a fire door by its bar. The next moment we were outside, standing in a quiet side-street.

It was a fine night with many stars visible. Glancing down the street I saw it was deserted and that all the shops were closed. As we started to walk, Sophie said lightly:

‘That was a surprise, meeting Grandfather like that. Wasn’t it, Boris?’

Boris did not respond. He was striding on in front of us, muttering quietly to himself.

‘You must be very hungry too,’ Sophie said to me. ‘I just hope there’ll be enough. I got so carried away cooking all these things earlier, I forgot to prepare a really substantial course. This afternoon I thought there’d be plenty, but now I think about it ...’

‘Don’t be silly, it’ll be fine,’ I said. ‘That’s exactly what I feel like anyway. A lot of small things, one after the other. I quite understand why Boris enjoys eating like that.’

‘Mother used to do it this way, when I was small. For our special evenings. Not birthdays or Christmas, we did the same as everyone else then. But for evenings we wanted to make special, just the three of us, Mother used to do it this way. Lots of delicious little things, one after the next. But then we moved, and Mother wasn’t well, and so we never did it much after that. I hope I’ve made enough for you. You must both be so hungry.’ Then suddenly she added: ‘I’m sorry. I wasn’t very impressive tonight, was I?’

I saw her again, standing alone helplessly in the middle of the throng, and I reached out and placed my arm around her. She responded by drawing herself close against me, and for the next few minutes we walked like that, not talking, through a series of deserted side-streets. At one point Boris fell in step beside us to ask:

‘Can I eat sitting on the sofa tonight?’

Sophie thought for a moment, then said: ‘Yes, all right. For this meal, yes, all right.’

Boris walked alongside us for several more paces, then asked: ‘Can I lie on the floor and eat?’

Sophie laughed. 'Just tonight, Boris. Tomorrow morning, at breakfast, you have to sit at the table again.'

This seemed to please Boris and he ran on ahead with some enthusiasm.

Eventually we came to a halt in front of a door squeezed between a barber's shop and a bakery. The street was a narrow one, made narrower by the many cars parked up on the pavement. As Sophie sorted through her keys, I glanced up and saw there were four more storeys above the shops. Some of the windows had lights on and I could hear faintly a television.

I followed the pair of them up two flights of stairs. As Sophie unlocked the front entrance the thought struck me that I was perhaps expected to behave as though familiar with the apartment. On the other hand, it was equally possible I was expected to behave like a guest. As we stepped inside, I decided to observe carefully Sophie's manner and take my cue from that. As it happened, no sooner had she closed the door behind us than Sophie announced she would have to turn on the oven and vanished further into the apartment. Boris, for his part, threw off his jacket and went running off making a noise like a police siren.

Left standing in the entrance hall, I took the opportunity to take a good look at my surroundings. There could be little doubt both Sophie and Boris expected me to know my way around, and certainly, the longer I stood gazing at the choice of half-open doors facing me, the dingy yellow wallpaper with its faint floral pattern, the exposed piping climbing from floor to ceiling behind the coat stand, I could feel some memory of this entrance hall gradually returning to me.

After a few minutes I went through into the living room. Although there were a number of features I did not recognise - the pair of old sunken armchairs to either side of the disused fireplace were undoubtedly recent acquisitions - my impression was that I could remember this room more clearly than I had the entrance hall. The large oval dining table pushed against the wall, the second door leading through to the kitchen, the dark shapeless sofa, the tired orange carpet were all distinctly familiar. The overhanging light - a single bulb covered by a chintz shade - was casting a shadowy pattern all around so that I could not be sure the wallpaper was not here and there developing damp patches. Boris was lying in the middle of the floor and rolled over onto his back as I came further into the room.

‘I’ve decided to try an experiment,’ he declared, as much to the ceiling as to me. ‘I’m going to keep my neck like this.’

I looked down and saw that he had shortened his neck so that his chin was squeezed into his collar bone.

‘I see. And for how long are you going to do that?’

‘At least twenty-four hours.’

‘Very good, Boris.’

I stepped over him and went through into the kitchen. This was a long narrow room and once again unmistakably familiar. The grimy walls, the traces of cobweb near the cornicing, the dilapidated laundry equipment all tugged naggingly at my memory. Sophie had put on an apron and was kneeling down arranging something inside the oven. She looked up as I came in, made some remark about the food, pointed inside the oven and laughed cheerfully. I too gave a laugh, then, casting one more look about the kitchen, turned and went back into the living room.

Boris was still lying on the floor and as I entered he immediately shortened his neck again. I paid him no attention and sat down on the sofa. There was a newspaper on the carpet nearby and I picked it up thinking it might be the one containing the pictures of me. It was in fact several days old, but I decided to peruse it anyway. As I read through the front story - the man von Winterstein was being interviewed about plans to conserve the Old Town - Boris continued to lie there on the carpet, not speaking, emitting occasionally some little robot-like noise. Whenever I stole a glance at him, I saw his neck was still shortened and decided to say nothing to him until he at least stopped this ridiculous game. Whether he was shortening his neck each time he guessed I was about to look at him, or whether he had it in a permanently contracted state, I could not tell and quickly ceased to care. 'Let him just lie there then,' I thought to myself and went on reading.

Eventually, after twenty minutes or so, Sophie came in with a platter laden with food. I could see vol-au-vents, savoury parcels, pies, all hand-sized and much of it intricate. Sophie laid the platter down on the dining table.

'You're very quiet,' she said looking about the room. 'Come on, let's enjoy ourselves now. Boris, look! And there's another plate like this to come. All your favourites! Now, why don't you choose a board game for us to play while I go and get the rest.'

As soon as Sophie disappeared back into the kitchen, Boris leapt to his feet, went to the table and stuffed a pie into his mouth. I was tempted to point out that his neck had returned to normal, but in the end went on reading the newspaper without speaking. Boris made his siren noise again and, moving rapidly across the room, stopped in front of a tall cupboard in the far corner. I remembered this was the cupboard inside which all the board games were kept, the broad flat boxes piled precariously on top of other toys and household items. Boris went on looking at the cupboard for a moment, then suddenly flung open the door.

'Which one are we going to play?' he asked.

I pretended not to hear and went on reading. I could see him at the edge of my vision, first turning towards me, then, as the realisation dawned on him that I would not reply, turning back to the cupboard. For some time, he stood there contemplating his pile of board games, now and then reaching out to finger the edge of one or another box.

Sophie returned with more food. As she set about arranging the table, Boris went over to her and I could hear the two of them arguing quietly.

‘You said I could eat on the floor,’ Boris was maintaining.

Then after a while, he slumped down in front of me on the carpet again, placing a heaped plate beside him.

I rose to my feet and went to the table. Sophie hovered about me anxiously as I took a plate and regarded the choice.

‘It looks quite magnificent,’ I said, as I served myself.

Returning to my sofa, I saw that, by putting my plate down on a cushion beside me, I would be able to eat and continue to read my newspaper at the same time. I had decided earlier to examine the newspaper very carefully, scrutinising even the adverts for local businesses, and I now continued with this project, reaching over occasionally to my plate without taking my eyes off the newsprint.

Meanwhile Sophie had sat down on the floor near Boris, from time to time asking him a question – about how he liked a particular meat tart, or about some schoolfriend. But whenever she tried to start a conversation in this way, Boris had his mouth too full to reply with anything more than a grunt. Then Sophie said: ‘Well, Boris, did you decide which game you wanted?’

I could sense Boris’s gaze turning to me. Then he said quietly:

‘I don’t mind which one we play.’

‘You don’t mind?’ Sophie sounded incredulous. There was a lengthy pause, then she said: ‘All right then. If you really don't care, I'll choose one.' I heard her rising to her feet. 'I'm going to choose one now.'

This strategy appeared to win Boris over for a moment. Getting up with some excitement, he followed his mother to the cupboard and I could hear the two of them conferring in front of the stack of boxes, their voices lowered as though in deference to the fact that I was reading. Eventually they came back and sat down on the floor again.

'Come on, let's set this out now,' Sophie said. 'We could start playing while we're eating.'

When I next glanced down at them, the board had been opened out and Boris was positioning the cards and plastic counters with some enthusiasm. I was thus surprised when a few minutes later I became aware of Sophie saying:

'What's the matter? You said you wanted this one.'

'I did.'

'Then what's the matter, Boris?'

There was a pause before Boris said: 'I'm too tired. Like Papa.'

Sophie gave a sigh. Then suddenly she said in a brighter voice:

'Boris, there's something Papa's bought for you.'

I could not resist peering round the edge of the newspaper, and as I did so Sophie threw me a conspiratorial smile.

'Can I give it to him now?' she asked me.

I had no idea what she was talking about and returned a puzzled look, but she rose to her feet and left the room. She returned almost immediately, holding up the tattered handyman's manual I had bought at the cinema the previous night. Boris, forgetting his supposed tiredness, leapt to his feet, but Sophie teasingly held the book away from him.

‘Papa and I went out together last night,’ she said. ‘It was a wonderful evening and, in the middle of it all, he remembered you and he bought this for you. You’ve never had anything like this before, have you, Boris?’

‘Don’t tell him it’s anything so marvellous,’ I said from behind the newspaper. ‘It’s just an old manual.’

‘It was very kind of Papa, wasn’t it?’

I stole another peek. Sophie had now let Boris take the book and he had dropped to his knees to examine it.

‘It’s great,’ he murmured, going through it. ‘This is really great.’ He paused at a page and stared at it. ‘It shows you how to do everything.’

He turned over some more pages and as he did so the book gave a sharp crack and fell apart into two sections. Boris carried on turning the pages as though nothing had happened. Sophie, who had started to reach down, stopped on seeing Boris’s reaction and straightened again.

‘It shows you everything,’ Boris said. ‘It’s really good.’

I had the distinct impression he was trying to address me. I went on reading, and a few seconds later I heard Sophie say softly: ‘I’ll get some sellotape. That’s all it needs.’

I heard Sophie leave the room and carried on reading. I could see, at the corner of my eye, Boris still turning the pages. After a little while, he looked up at me and said:

‘There’s a special sort of brush you can get for putting up wallpaper.’

I continued to read. Eventually Sophie came wandering back in.

‘It’s odd, I can’t find the sellotape anywhere,’ she was mumbling.

‘This book’s great,’ Boris said to her. ‘It shows you how to do everything.’

‘It’s odd. Perhaps we finished it.’ Sophie went back through into the kitchen.

I had a faint recollection of various rolls of adhesive tape being kept in the same cupboard as the board games, inside one of the small drawers near the bottom right-hand corner. I was thinking about putting down my newspaper and going over to conduct a search, but then Sophie came back into the room again.

‘Never mind,’ she said. ‘I’ll buy some tape in the morning and we’ll mend the book then. Now come on, Boris, let’s get started with the game or we’ll never finish before bed.’

Boris did not reply. I could hear him down on the carpet, still turning pages.

‘Well, if you’re not going to play,’ Sophie said, ‘I’ll just start on my own.’

There came the sound of a dice being rattled in its beaker. As I continued through my newspaper, I could not help feeling a little sorry for Sophie about the way the evening was turning out. But then, she could hardly have expected to introduce the level of chaos she had done without our having to pay some sort of price. Moreover, it was not even as though she had particularly excelled herself with the cooking. She had not thought to provide, for instance, any sardines on little triangles of toast, or any cheese and sausage kebabs. She had not made an omelette of any sort, or any cheese-stuffed potatoes, or fish cakes. Neither were there any stuffed peppers. Nor those little cubes of bread with anchovy paste on them, nor those pieces of cucumber sliced lengthways, not even wedges of hard-boiled egg with the zig-zag edges. And for afterwards, she had made no plum slices, no buttercream fingers, not even a strawberry Swiss roll.

I became gradually conscious that Sophie had been rattling the dice for an inordinate period. In fact, the rattling had changed in character since she had first started to play with the dice. She now seemed to be shaking it with a feeble slowness, as though in time to some melody running through her head. I lowered the newspaper with a sense of alarm.

On the floor, Sophie was leaning on one stiffened arm, a posture that made her long hair plunge down over her shoulder, concealing her face entirely. She appeared to have become completely absorbed with the game, and her weight had tipped forward oddly, so that she was hovering right over the board. The whole of her body was rocking gently. Boris was watching her sulkily, passing his hands over the crack in his book.

Sophie went on and on shaking the dice, for thirty, forty seconds, before finally letting it roll out in front of her. She studied it dreamily, moved some pieces about the board, then began to shake the dice again. I could sense something dangerous in the atmosphere and decided it was time I took charge of the situation. Throwing the newspaper aside, I clapped my hands together and got to my feet.

‘I have to be getting back to the hotel,’ I announced. ‘And I’d suggest, very strongly, you both go off to bed. We’ve all had a long day.’

I glimpsed Sophie’s surprised expression as I strode out into the hall. The next moment she appeared behind me.

‘You’re going already? But have you had enough to eat?’

‘I’m sorry, I know you’ve worked hard to prepare the meal. But it’s got too late now. I have a very busy morning tomorrow.’

Sophie sighed and looked despondent. 'I'm sorry,' she said eventually. 'The evening wasn't very successful. I'm sorry.'

'Don't worry. It's not your fault. We were all rather tired. Now, I really have to be going.'

Sophie let me out sullenly, saying she would call me in the morning.

I spent the next several minutes wandering through the deserted streets trying to remember the way back to the hotel. I eventually came out onto a street I recognised, and began rather to enjoy the quiet of the night and the chance to be alone with just my thoughts and the sound of my footsteps. Before long, however, I felt again a certain regret about the way the evening had ended. But then the fact was, along with so much else, Sophie had succeeded in reducing my carefully planned time-table to chaos. And now here I was, reaching the end of my second day in the city having gained only the most superficial insights into the crisis I had come to assess. I recalled that I had even been prevented from keeping my morning's appointment with the Countess and the mayor, when I would have had the chance at last to hear for myself something of Brodsky's music. There was, of course, still plenty of time for me to make up lost ground; a number of substantial meetings still in front of me - such as that with the Citizens' Mutual Support Group - were certain to give me a much fuller picture of the situation here. Nevertheless, there could be no denying I had been placed under some pressure, and Sophie could hardly complain if I had not finished the day in the most relaxed of moods.

I had been strolling over a stone bridge thinking these thoughts. As I paused to gaze down into the water and at the row of lamps along the canalside, it occurred to me I still had the option of accepting Miss Collins's invitation to call on her. She had certainly intimated she was in a unique position to be of assistance, and now, with my time here growing ever more limited, I could see how a good talk with her might greatly expedite matters, providing me with virtually all the information I would by now have gathered myself had Sophie not had her way. I thought again of Miss Collins's drawing room, the velvet drapes and the weary furniture, and felt a sudden wish that I was there at this very moment. I began to walk again, over the bridge and into the dark street, resolving to call on her in the morning at the first opportunity.

III

I awoke to find bright sunlight pouring in through the vertical blinds and was seized by the panicky feeling I had let far too much of the morning slip by. But then I remembered my decision of the night before to pay a call on Miss Collins and got out of bed feeling much calmer.

The room was smaller and distinctly stuffier than my former one and I again felt annoyed at Hoffman for having obliged me to move. But the whole matter of the rooms no longer seemed as important as it had done the previous morning and as I washed and dressed I found no difficulty placing my mind firmly on the important meeting with Miss Collins upon which so much now depended. By the time I left my room, I had stopped worrying altogether about having slept in - the sleep, I knew, would prove invaluable in the long run - and was looking forward to a good breakfast over which I could organise my thoughts on the issues I would raise with Miss Collins.

I was surprised, then, on arriving down at the breakfast room to be greeted by the sound of a vacuum cleaner. The doors to the room were closed and when I pushed them open a little I saw two women in overalls cleaning the carpet, the tables and chairs pushed against the walls. The prospect of facing such a crucial meeting without breakfast was not a happy one and I returned to the lobby more than a little disgruntled. I walked past a group of American tourists up to the reception desk. The desk clerk was sitting reading a magazine, but on seeing me rose to his feet.

‘Good morning, Mr Ryder.’

‘Good morning. I’m somewhat disappointed to find breakfast is not being served.’

For a second, the desk clerk looked puzzled. Then he said: 'Normally, sir, even at this hour, someone would have been able to serve you breakfast. But of course, today being today, naturally enough, a great many of our staff are over at the concert hall to assist with the preparations. Mr Hoffman has himself been there since the early hours. I'm afraid we're very much running at half strength. Unfortunately the atrium also has had to be closed until lunch time. Of course, if it's a matter of coffee and a few rolls ...'

'It's quite all right,' I said coldly. 'I simply don't have time to wait around while it's organised. I'll just have to do without breakfast this morning.'

The desk clerk began to apologise again, but I cut him off with a wave of my hand and walked away.

I stepped out of the hotel into the sunshine. It was not until I had walked some distance alongside the heavy traffic that I realised I was not at all sure of the location of Miss Collins's apartment. I had not attended carefully the night Stephan had driven us there, and besides, with the streets now so crowded with pedestrians and traffic, nothing was recognisable. I paused a moment on the pavement and considered asking a passer-by for directions. It was just conceivable Miss Collins was sufficiently well known in the city for me to do this. In fact I was about to stop a man in a business suit striding towards me, when I felt someone touch my shoulder from behind.

'Good morning, sir.'

I turned to find Gustav, holding a large cardboard box whose dimensions virtually obscured the upper half of his body. He was panting heavily, but whether this was due solely to his burden or because he had come hurrying after me, I could not tell. In any case, when I greeted him and enquired where he was going, it was a little while before he could reply.

‘Oh, I was just taking this to the concert hall, sir,’ he said eventually. ‘The larger items were all transported by van last night, but then there are so many things still needed. I’ve been having to go back and forth between the hotel and the concert hall since early morning. Everyone’s very excited over there already, I can tell you, sir. There’s a real atmosphere there.’

‘That’s good to hear,’ I said. ‘I’m also very much looking forward to the event. But I wonder if you might be able to assist me. You see, I have an appointment at Miss Collins’s apartment this morning, but I’ve just for the moment lost my way a little.’

‘Miss Collins? Well then you’re not far at all. It’s this way, sir. I’ll walk with you, if I may. Oh no, don’t worry, sir, it’s directly on my route.’

His box was perhaps not as heavy as it looked, for once we started to walk, Gustav set a steady pace alongside me.

‘I’m very glad we’ve coincided like this, sir,’ he went on, ‘because to be quite frank, there’s a matter I’d been meaning to raise with you. In fact, I’d been meaning to raise it ever since we met, but somehow with one thing then another I never got around to it. And now tonight’s almost upon us and I still haven’t asked you. It’s just something that came up a few weeks ago, at the Hungarian Café, at one of our Sunday gatherings. It wasn’t long after we heard the news about you coming to our town, and of course, like everyone else, we were talking about it. And someone, I think it was Gianni, he was saying how he’d read you were a very decent sort, as different as you could get from these prima donna types, how you had a reputation for being very concerned about the ordinary citizen, he was saying all these things, sir. And there we were around the table, eight or nine of us, Josef wasn’t there that night, we were watching the sun go down over the square and I think we each had the same thought all at once. At first we were all just sitting there in silence, none of us daring to say it aloud. In the end it was Karl, typical of him, Karl said what we were all thinking.

"Why don't we ask him?" he said. "What have we got to lose? We should at least ask him. He sounds completely different to that other one. He might even agree, you never know. Why don't we ask him, it might be our last chance." And then we were all suddenly talking and talking about it, and ever since then, sir, to tell you the truth, we haven't sat together for any length of time without bringing up the topic. We'd be talking about something else, everyone laughing, and then this silence would come over us and we'd realise we were all thinking about it again. That's why I was starting to feel rather sorry for myself, sir. I thought, I'd seen you a few times, I'd had the honour of talking with you and yet I hadn't worked up the nerve to ask. Now here we are, the big event only hours away and I still haven't asked. How could I ever explain that to the boys on Sunday? As a matter of fact, when I got up this morning, sir, I said to myself, I must find him, I must at least put it to Mr Ryder, the boys are depending on it. But then everything was so busy, and you were bound to have so much to do, and I thought, well, I may well have lost my chance. So you see, I'm very glad we've coincided like this, I hope you won't mind my putting it to you, and of course, if you felt we were asking the impossible, then naturally that would be the last of it, the boys would accept that, oh yes.'

We had turned a corner into a busy boulevard. Gustav fell silent as we crossed at a set of lights and it was not until we were on the other side walking past a row of Italian cafés that he said:

'I'm sure you've guessed what I'm going to ask, sir. All we're requesting is a small mention. That's all, sir.'

'A small mention?'

‘Just a small mention, sir. As you know, many of us, we’ve worked and worked over the years to try and change the attitude in this town towards our profession. We may have had a small effect, but by and large we’ve failed to make a general impact and, well, it’s perfectly understandable, there’s frustration setting in. We’re none of us getting any younger, there’s a feeling that things may never really change. But one word from you tonight, sir, that could alter the course of everything. It could be an historic turning point for our profession. That’s how the boys see it. In fact, sir, some of the boys believe this is our last chance, at least for our generation. When will we get a chance like this again? That’s what they keep asking. So here I am, I’ve put it to you, sir. Of course, if you feel it’s not quite the thing, and I could well understand your feeling that way, after all you’ve come here to address some very important issues, and what I’m talking about is a small matter. Big for us, but seen overall, I appreciate, it’s a small matter. If you felt it was impossible, sir, please say so and that’ll be the last you’ll hear of it.’

I thought for a moment, conscious that he was watching me intensely from around the edge of his box.

‘What you’re suggesting,’ I said after a while, ‘is that I make some small mention of you during ... during my address to the people of this town.’

‘No more than a few words at the most, sir.’

Certainly, the notion of coming to the help of the elderly porter and his colleagues in such a way had its appeal. I thought for a moment, then said: ‘Very well. I’d be happy to say something on your behalf.’

I heard Gustav take a deep breath as the impact of my reply sank in. Then he said quite quietly:

‘We’d be forever indebted to you, sir.’

He was about to say more, but I had somehow become taken by the idea of frustrating, for a while, his attempts to express his gratitude to me.

‘Yes, let’s think about it, how could we do it?’ I said quickly, assuming a preoccupied air. ‘Yes, I could say as I came up to the podium something like: “Before I begin, there’s a small yet rather important point I’d like to make.” Something like that. Yes, that would be easy enough.’

I suddenly saw quite vividly the gathering of sturdy old men around a café table, the looks on their faces – of disbelief, of unfathomed joy – as Gustav announced the news to them. I saw myself entering their midst, quietly and modestly, and their faces turning to me. All the while, I was conscious of Gustav walking by my side, no doubt virtually bursting to finish thanking me, but I nevertheless kept up my talk.

‘Yes, yes. “A small but important point,” I could say to them. “There is something which I, having seen many other cities around the world, find somewhat peculiar here ...” Perhaps “peculiar” is too strong a word. Perhaps I might say “eccentric”.’

‘Ah yes, sir,’ Gustav broke in. ‘“Eccentric” would be a fine word. None of us wants any antagonism stirred up. But this is precisely why you’re such a unique opportunity for us. You see, even if in a few years’ time another celebrity agreed to come to our town, and even if we were to succeed in persuading him to speak for us, what are the chances of his having your sort of tact, sir? “Eccentric” would be a perfect way to put it, sir.’

‘Yes, yes,’ I went on, ‘and I’d perhaps pause a second, looking at them with mild accusation, so that everyone, the whole hall, they’d be hushed and waiting. Then finally I might say something like, well, let me see, I might say: “Ladies and gentlemen, to all of you, living here as you have for so many years, certain things may have come to appear normal, certain things which an outsider would immediately deem conspicuous ...” ’

Suddenly Gustav stopped walking. At first I thought he had perhaps done so because his urge to express his thanks had become overwhelming. But then I looked at him and realised this was not the case. He had frozen on the pavement, his head pushed right over to one side by the box so that his cheek was squashed against its side. His eyes were closed tight, and his expression bore a slight frown as though he was trying to make a difficult calculation in his head. Then, as I watched, his Adam's apple moved slowly up and down his neck - once, twice, three times.

‘Are you all right?’ I asked, putting an arm behind him. ‘Good gracious, you’d better sit down somewhere.’

I started to take the box from him, but Gustav's hands did not relinquish their grip.

‘No, no, sir,’ he said, his eyes still closed. ‘I’m perfectly all right.’

‘Are you sure?’

‘Yes, yes. I’m perfectly all right.’

For a few more seconds he remained standing quite still. Then he opened his eyes and glanced about him, gave a faint laugh and began to walk again.

‘You’ve no idea what this will mean to us, sir,’ he said after we had gone several steps together. ‘And after all these years.’ He shook his head with a smile. ‘I’ll convey the news to the boys at the first opportunity. There’s a lot of work this morning, but one phone call to Josef, that will do it. He’ll let the others know. Can you imagine, sir, what it will mean to them? Ah, but there’s your turning. I have to go on a little further. Oh, don’t worry, sir, I’m perfectly all right. Miss Collins’s apartment, as you know, is just down there on your right. Well, sir, I can't tell you how grateful I am. The boys will wait for tonight as they've waited for little else in their lives. I know it, sir.'

Wishing him a good day, I took the turning he had indicated. When, after a few steps, I glanced over my shoulder, Gustav was still standing on the corner watching me from around the edge of his box. Seeing me turn, he nodded his head emphatically - the box prevented him from waving - then went on his way.

The street I found myself in was a predominantly residential one. After a few blocks it grew quieter and there appeared above me the apartment houses with the Spanish-style balconies which I recognised from the night I had come down the street in Stephan's car. They stretched ahead block after block, and as I continued to walk I began to fear I might never recognise the one in front of which Boris and I had waited that night. But then I found myself stopping before a distinctly familiar entrance and after a moment I went up and peered through the glass panels on either side of the door.

The entrance hall was furnished in a tidy neutral way, and I was able to ascertain almost nothing from it. Then I remembered how that night I had watched Stephan and Miss Collins talk for a while in the front parlour before going further inside the building, and at the risk of being mistaken for an intruder I hooked a leg over the low wall and leaned across to look through the nearest window. The bright sun made it difficult for me to see inside, but I managed to make out a small stocky man in a white shirt and tie sitting alone in an armchair, more or less directly facing the window. His gaze appeared to be fixed on me, but his expression was empty and it was not at all clear whether he had registered me at all, or was simply staring out of the window lost in thought. None of this told me much, but when I pulled my leg back off the wall and looked again at the door,

I felt convinced it was indeed the right one and pressed the bell for the ground-floor apartment.

After a short wait, I was gratified to see through the glazed panels Miss Collins's figure coming towards me.

'Ah, Mr Ryder,' she said opening the door. 'I was wondering if I would see you this morning.'

'How do you do, Miss Collins. After some consideration, I decided I'd take advantage of your kind suggestion that I come and call on you. But I see you have a guest already this morning.' I gestured towards her front parlour. 'Perhaps you'd prefer I came back another time.'

'I won't hear of you going away, Mr Ryder. Actually, although you suggest I'm busy, compared to an average morning it's rather quiet here today. As you see, I've only one person waiting. Just now I'm with a young couple. I've been talking to them for an hour already, but they have such deep-seated problems, they've so much to talk about and haven't been able to until today, I haven't the heart to rush them. But if you wouldn't mind waiting in the front room, it really shouldn't take much longer.' Then, suddenly lowering her voice, she said: 'The gentleman waiting now, poor man, he's just miserable and lonely and wants a few minutes of someone listening to him say so, that's all. He won't be long, I'll send him away quite quickly. He comes virtually every morning, he doesn't mind being hastened on now and again, he gets a lot of my time.' Her voice then resumed its normal tones as she continued: 'Well, please come in, Mr Ryder, don't just keep standing out there like that, even though I see it's a very pleasant day. If you liked, if no one's waiting by then, we could go and walk in the Sternberg Garden. It's very close and we've a lot to discuss, I'm sure. In fact, I've given your position quite a lot of thought already.'

'How kind of you, Miss Collins. Actually, I knew you might be busy this morning, and I wouldn't have intruded on you like this if there wasn't a certain amount of urgency involved. You see, the fact is' - I gave a heavy sigh and shook my head - 'the fact is, for one reason or another, I've not been able to go about things in quite the way I originally planned, and now, here we are, time is getting on and ... Well, for one thing, as you know, I have to give my talk to the people here tonight, and to be absolutely frank with you, Miss Collins ...' I almost came to a stop, but then saw her looking at me with a kindly expression and made an effort to continue. 'To be frank, there are a number of issues, local issues here, I'd like your advice on before ... before I can finalise' - I paused in an attempt to stop my voice wobbling - 'before I can finalise my address. After all, all these people are depending so much on me ...'

'Mr Ryder, Mr Ryder' - Miss Collins had placed her hand on my shoulder - 'please calm yourself. And do come in, please. That's better, come right in. Now please stop worrying yourself. It's very understandable you'd get a little agitated at this stage, that's perfectly natural. In fact, it's rather commendable you should be so concerned. We can discuss all these things, these local issues, don't worry, we'll do that very shortly. But let me say this much now, Mr Ryder. I do think you're worrying unduly. Yes, you'll have a lot of responsibility on your shoulders tonight, but then you've been in similar situations many many times before and by all accounts you've acquitted yourself more than creditably. Why would it be any different this time?'

'But what I'm saying to you, Miss Collins,' I said interrupting, 'is that this time it's been quite different. This time I've not been able to go about things ...' I sighed heavily again. 'The fact is I haven't had a chance to prepare my ground in the usual way ...'

'We'll talk about it all very soon. But Mr Ryder, I feel certain you're getting things out of all proportion. What have you to so concern yourself about? You have unrivalled expertise, you're a man of internationally recognised genius, really, what have you to fear? The truth is' - she lowered her voice again - 'the people in a town like this, they'd be grateful for anything from you. Just talk to them about your general impressions, they're not about to complain. You've nothing at all to fear.'

I nodded, realising that she indeed had a point, and almost immediately I felt a tension lifting from me.

'But we'll discuss it all very thoroughly in just a little while.' Miss Collins, her hand still on my shoulder, was guiding me through into her front parlour. 'I promise I shan't be long. Please take a seat and make yourself comfortable.'

I went into a small square room filled with sunlight and fresh flowers. The disparate assortment of armchairs suggested the waiting room of a dentist or doctor, as did the magazines on the coffee table. At the sight of Miss Collins, the stocky man rose immediately to his feet, either out of courtesy or because he hoped she would now invite him through into the drawing room. I was expecting to be introduced, but the prevailing protocol seemed indeed to be that of a waiting room, for Miss Collins merely smiled at the man before disappearing through the inner door, murmuring apologetically as she did so, apparently to us both: 'I shan't be long.'

The stocky man sat down again and gazed at the floor. I thought for a moment he would say something, but when he remained silent I turned and seated myself on a wicker couch occupying the sun-filled bay of the window I had earlier looked through. The basket work creaked reassuringly as I settled myself into it. A broad band of sunlight was falling across my lap, and there was a large vase of tulips close to my face. I immediately felt very comfortable and in a quite different frame of mind concerning what lay before me than when I had rung the doorbell only minutes before. Of course, Miss Collins was absolutely right. A town of this sort would be grateful for virtually anything I cared to offer it. It was hardly conceivable that people would scrutinise my points closely or become critical. And as Miss Collins had again pointed out, I had been in such positions countless times before. Even with my ground less well prepared than I would like, I was still bound to be able to deliver an address of some authority. As I continued to sit there in the sunshine, I found myself growing ever more tranquil, and more and more amazed I could ever have worked myself into such a state of anxiety.

‘I was just wondering,’ the stocky man suddenly said to me. ‘Are you still in touch with any of the old crowd? People like Tom Edwards? Or Chris Farleigh? Or those two girls who used to live at the Flooded Farmhouse?’

I realised then that the stocky man was Jonathan Parkhurst, whom I had known reasonably well during my student days in England.

‘No,’ I said to him, ‘unfortunately I’ve rather lost touch with everyone from those days. Having to move around from country to country as I do, it’s just impossible.’

He nodded without smiling. ‘I suppose it must be difficult,’ he said. ‘Well, they all remember you. Oh yes. When I was back in England last year I met up with a few of them. They’d all apparently been meeting once a year or so. I envy them sometimes, but mostly I’m glad I haven’t got myself stuck in a circle like that. That’s why I like living out here, I can be anyone I want here, people don’t expect me to be the clown all the time. But you know, when I went back, when I met them in this pub, they immediately started again.

“Hey, it’s old Parkers!” they all shouted. They still call me that, as though no time at all had gone by. “Parkers! It’s old Parkers!” They actually made this big braying noise to welcome me when I first came in, oh God, I can’t tell you how awful it was. And I could feel myself turning back into that pathetic clown I came here to get away from, yes, from the moment they started that braying noise. It was a nice enough pub, mind you, a typical old English country pub, a real fire, those little brass things all over the bricks, an old sword over the mantelpiece, a hearty landlord saying cheerful things, all of that was very nostalgic, I do miss it all living out here. But the rest of it, my God, it makes me shudder just to think of it. They made that braying noise, fully expecting me to come bounding up to the table clowning away. And all through the evening, they kept mentioning one name after another, it wasn't as though they even discussed them, they just made more noises, or else laughed immediately they mentioned another name. You know, they'd mention someone like Samantha, and they'd all laugh and cheer and whoop. Then they'd call out some other name, Roger Peacock, say, and they'd all break out into some sort of football chant. It was quite awful. But the worst of it was they all expected me to be the clown again and I just couldn't do anything about it. It was like it was completely unthinkable I could have become someone else, and so I started it all again, the funny voices, the faces, oh yes, I found I could still do it all very well. I suppose they'd no reason to suppose I didn't carry on like that out here. In fact, that's exactly what one of them said. I think it was Tom Edwards, at one point in the evening, they were all very drunk, he slapped me hard on the back and said: "Parkers! They must love you out there! Parkers!" I suppose this must have been just after I'd done another of my turns for them, perhaps I'd been telling them about some aspect of life out here and I'd been clowning it up a bit, who knows, anyway that's what he said and the others were laughing and laughing. Oh yes, I was a big hit. They all kept saying how much they missed me, I was always such a good laugh, oh it was so long since I'd heard anyone say such a thing, so long since I'd been received like that, it was so warm and friendly. And yet what was I doing that for again? I'd vowed never to be like that, that's why I came out here. Even as I was walking to the pub, I'd been saying to myself all the way down the lane, it was very chilly that night, foggy and very chilly, I was telling myself all the way down the lane, that was years ago, I'm not like that any more, I'm going to show them how I am now, and I said it over and over trying to make myself strong, but as soon as I walked in and saw that warm fire and they did that braying noise to welcome me, oh, it's been so lonely out here. Okay, here I don't have to do all those faces and funny voices, but at least that all worked. It may have been intolerable, but it worked, they all loved me, my old university friends, poor sods, they must believe I'm still like that. They'd never guess it, that my neighbours think I'm this very solemn, rather dull Englishman. Polite, they think, but very dull. Very lonely and very dull. Well, at least that's better than being Parkers again. That braying noise, oh, how pathetic, a group of middle-aged men making that sort of noise, and me, pulling my faces and doing those silly voices, oh God, it was truly nauseating. But I couldn't help it, it was so long since I'd been surrounded by friends like that. What about you, Ryder, don't you long for those days sometimes? Even you with all your success? Oh yes, that's what I was going to tell you. You may not remember any of them very well now, but they certainly remember you all right. Whenever they have one of these little reunions, it seems, there's a little part of the evening devoted specially to you. Oh yes, I've witnessed it. They go through a lot of the other names first, they don't like to get to you straight away, you know, they like a good run-up. They actually have little pauses when they all pretend they can't think of any more people from those days. Then finally one of them says: "What about Ryder? Anyone heard of him lately?" Then they all explode, making the most disgusting noise, something half-way between a jeer and a retch. They do it all together, repeatedly, really, that's all they do for about the first minute after your name's mentioned. Then they start to laugh and then they all start to mimic piano-playing, you know, like this' - Parkhurst put on a haughty expression and played an invisible keyboard in a highly precious manner - 'they all do this, then make more retching noises. Then they start in on the stories, little things they remember about you, and you can tell they've already told them to each other many times over because they all know, they all know at which points to make the noises again, at which point to say: "What? You're kidding!" and so on. Oh, they really enjoy themselves. The time I was there, someone was remembering the evening the finals finished, how they were all getting ready to go out on the piss for the night and saw you coming up the road looking very serious. And they'd said to you: "Come on, Ryder, come and get pissed out of your brain with us!" and apparently you'd replied, and here whoever's telling it puts on this face, apparently you'd said' - Parkhurst once more transformed into the haughty creature and his voice assumed a preposterously pompous tone - ' "I'm much too busy. I can't afford not to practise tonight. I've missed two days' practice on account of these horrid exams!" Then they all make the retching noise together, and do their piano-playing in the air, and that's when they start ... Well, I won't tell you some of the other things they get up to, they're quite appalling, they're a loathsome lot and so unhappy, most of them, so frustrated and angry. '

As Parkhurst had been talking, a fragment of memory had come back to me from my student days, one which for a moment made me feel very tranquil, so much so that for a while I hardly cared what Parkhurst was saying. I was recalling a fine morning not unlike the present one, when I had also been relaxing in a couch beside a sunny window. I was in my little room in the old farmhouse I was sharing with four other students. On my lap was the score of some concerto I had been studying in a lackadaisical way for the previous hour, which I had been considerer-ing abandoning for one of the nineteenth-century novels piled on the wooden floor near my feet. The window was open allowing a breeze to drift through, and from outside came the voices of several students sitting in the uncut grass arguing about philosophy or poetry or some such thing. My small room had had little else in it apart from that couch - just a mattress on the floor and, in the corner, a small desk and upright chair - but I had been very fond of it. Often the floor had become entirely covered with the books and magazines I browsed through on those long afternoons, and I had got into the habit of leaving my door ajar so that whoever happened to be passing could just wander in for a talk. I closed my eyes and for a moment was seized by a powerful longing to be back in that little farmhouse again surrounded by open fields and companions lazing in the tall grass, and it was some time before what Parkhurst was actually saying began to sink in. Only then did it occur to me that it was some of these same people, whose faces had now merged with one another in the memory, whom I had once languidly welcomed when they had peered around my door, and with whom I had spent a casual hour or two discussing some novelist or Spanish guitarist, it was some of these very people Parkhurst was now speaking of. But even then, such was the almost sensuous pleasure I was experiencing as I reclined in Miss Collins's wicker couch in the sun-filled bay that I still felt no more than a vague and distant discomfort concerning Parkhurst's words.

He went on talking and I had long since ceased to attend to him when I was startled by the sound of someone tapping the window pane behind me. Parkhurst seemed not to want to hear this and continued talking, and I too tried to ignore the noise as one might an alarm clock when disturbed in luxurious sleep. But the tapping persisted and Parkhurst finally broke off, saying: 'Oh goodness, it's that Brodsky fellow.'

Opening my eyes, I looked over my shoulder. Indeed Brodsky was peering in intently. The brightness outside, or perhaps something about his own vision, appeared to be giving him difficulty seeing in. His face was pressed against the glass and he was shading his eyes with both hands, but he seemed still not to see us and it occurred to me he was tapping the glass believing Miss Collins herself to be here in the room.

Eventually Parkhurst got to his feet, saying: 'I suppose I'd better see what he wants.'

I could hear Parkhurst opening the door and then voices arguing out in the hallway. Eventually Parkhurst came back into the room, rolled his eyes at me and gave a sigh.

Brodsky came in behind him. He looked taller than when I had last seen him across a crowded room, and I again noticed the odd way he held himself - at a slightly tilted angle as though about to topple over - but saw too that he was completely sober. He had on a scarlet bow tie and a rather dandy-ish black suit which looked brand-new. The collars of his white shirt were pointing outwards - whether by design or through excessive starching, I could not tell. He was holding a bouquet of flowers and his eyes were weary and sad. Brodsky paused at the threshold and peered tentatively around the door frame, perhaps expecting to discover Miss Collins in the room.

'She's busy, I told you,' Parkhurst said. 'Look, I happen to be a confidant of Miss Collins and I can say with certainty she will not wish to see you.' Parkhurst glanced at me, expecting me to confirm this, but I had decided not to get involved and simply gave Brodsky a weak smile. Only then did Brodsky recognise me.

'Mr Ryder,' he said, and bowed his head gravely. Then he turned again to Parkhurst. 'If she's in there, please, go and get her.' He indicated his bouquet as though it would in itself explain why his seeing her was so imperative. 'Please.'

'I told you, I can't help you. She won't see you. Besides, she's talking to some people.'

'Okay,' Brodsky murmured. 'Okay. You won't help me. Okay.'

With that he began to move towards the inner door through which Miss Collins had earlier disappeared. Parkhurst quickly blocked his route and for a moment Brodsky's tall gangly frame and Parkhurst's small stocky one came into conflict. Parkhurst's method of halting Brodsky consisted simply of pushing at the latter's chest with both hands. Brodsky, meanwhile, had placed a hand on Parkhurst's shoulder and was gazing over it towards the inner door, as though he were in a crowd and was politely peering over the person in front of him. All the while he continued to make a steady shuffling motion with his feet, intermittently mumbling the word 'please'.

'All right!' Parkhurst eventually shouted. 'All right, I'll go and talk to her. I know what she'll say, but all right, all right!'

They separated. Then Parkhurst said, raising his finger:

'But you wait here! You make jolly sure you wait here!'

Giving Brodsky a final glare, Parkhurst turned and went through the door, closing it firmly behind him.

At first Brodsky stood staring at the door and I thought he was about to follow Parkhurst. But in the end he turned around and sat down.

For some time Brodsky appeared to be rehearsing something in his head, his lips mouthing the odd word, and it did not feel appropriate to say anything to him. From time to time he would scrutinise the bouquet as though everything depended on it and the slightest blemish would be a major setback. Then, after we had been sitting without speaking for some time, he finally looked towards me and said:

'Mr Ryder. I'm very pleased to make your acquaintance at last.'

'How do you do, Mr Brodsky,' I said. 'I hope you're well.'

‘Oh ...’ He waved his hand in a vague gesture. ‘I can’t say I feel well. I have, you see, a pain.’

‘Oh? A pain?’ Then, when he said nothing, I asked: ‘You mean an emotional pain?’

‘No, no. It’s a wound. I got it many years ago and it’s always given me trouble. Bad pain. Perhaps that’s why I drank so much. If I drink, I don’t feel it.’

I waited for him to say more, but he became silent. After a moment I said:

‘You’re referring to a wound of the heart, Mr Brodsky?’

‘Heart? My heart’s not so bad. No, no, it’s to do with ...’ Suddenly he laughed loudly. ‘I see, Mr Ryder. You think I am being poetic. No, no, I meant simply, I had a wound. I was injured, very badly, many years ago. In Russia. The doctors weren’t so good, they did a bad job. And the pain’s been bad. It’s never healed properly. I’ve had it for so long now, it still hurts me.’

‘I’m sorry to hear that. It must be a great nuisance.’

‘Nuisance?’ He thought about this then laughed again.

‘You could say that, Mr Ryder, my friend. A nuisance. It’s been a hell of a nuisance to me.’ He suddenly seemed to remember he was holding his flowers. He sniffed them and breathed in deeply. ‘But let’s not talk of this. You asked how I felt and I told you, but I didn’t mean to talk about it. I try to be brave about the wound. For years I never mentioned it, but now I’m old and I don’t drink, it’s got very painful. It hasn’t really healed at all.’

‘Surely there’s something you can do about it. Have you seen a doctor? Perhaps a specialist of some sort?’

Brodsky looked at his flowers again and smiled. ‘I want to make love to her again,’ he said almost to himself.

‘Before this wound gets worse. I want to make love to her again.’

There was an odd silence. Then I said:

‘If your wound is so old, Mr Brodsky, I wouldn’t have thought it’s likely to get worse.’

‘These old wounds.’ He gave a shrug. ‘They stay the same for years. You think you’ve got the measure of it. Then you get old and they start to grow again. But it’s not so bad just now. Perhaps I can still make love. I’m old now, but sometimes ...’ He leaned forward confidentially. ‘I tried it. You know, on my own. I can still do it. I can forget the pain. When I was drunk, my prick, you know, it was nothing, nothing. I never thought about it. Just for the toilet. That was all. But now I can do it, even with all the pain. I tried it, the night before last. I can’t necessarily, you know, not all the way, not everything. My prick’s so old and for so many years it was just, well, it was just the toilet. Ah.’ He leaned back in his chair and gazed past my shoulder into the sunshine. A wistful look had come into his eyes. ‘I so want to make love to her again. But we wouldn’t live here. Not in this place. I’ve always hated this place. I used to come by here, yes, I admit it, I used to walk by here late at night when no one could see me. She never knew, but I often used to come and stand out there, looking at the building. I used to hate this street, this apartment. We wouldn’t live here. You know, this is the first time, the first time I’ve come inside this terrible place. Why did she choose a place like this? It’s not what she likes. We’ll live outside the city. If she doesn’t want to come back to the farmhouse, that’s okay. We’ll find something else, another cottage maybe. Something surrounded by grass and trees where our animal can enjoy itself. Our animal, it won’t like it here.’ He looked around carefully at the walls and ceilings, perhaps for a moment re-considering the merits of the apartment. Then he concluded: ‘No, how can our animal enjoy it here? We’ll live somewhere, grass, trees, fields. You know, in a year’s time, six months, if the pain gets too much, my prick can’t do it, we can’t make love any more, I don’t care. As long as I can make love to her just once more. No, once wouldn't be enough, we'll have to get back, you know, like we used to be. Six times, that's it, six times and we'll have remembered everything, that's all I want. After that, all right, all right. If someone, a doctor, God, if he said you can make love to her just six more times, then that's it, you'll be too old, your wound will hurt too much, after that it's the finish, it's just the toilet, I won't care. I'll say, all right, fine by me. As long as I can take her in my arms again, six times is enough, so we're like we used to be, back where we were, then I don't care, I don't care after that. We'll have our animal anyway. We won't need to make love. That's for young lovers who don't know each other enough, who've never hated each other and loved each other again. You know, I can do it still. I tried it, on my own, the night before last. Not all the way, but I could make it stiff.'

He paused and nodded to me with a serious expression.

'Really,' I said smiling. 'That's marvellous.'

Brodsky leaned back in his chair and gazed out of the window again. Then he said: 'It was different, not like when you're young. When you're young you think of whores, you know, whores doing filthy things, stuff like that. I don't care about any of that now, there's only one thing left I want my prick to do, I want to make love to her again in the old way, just where we left off, that's all. Then if it wants to rest, that's okay, I don't ask any more. But I want to do it again, six times, that's enough, the way we used to do it. When we were young, we weren't great lovers. We didn't do it everywhere like young people maybe do now, I don't know. But we had, well, a good understanding. Yes, at times, it's true, when I was young I got tired of it, the same way every time. But she was like that, she was ... she didn't want to do it any other way, I used to get angry with her, and she didn't know why. But now I want to repeat that old routine, step by step, exactly as we used to do it. The night before last, when I was, you know, when I was trying, I thought about whores, imaginary ones, fantastic ones doing fantastic things, and nothing, nothing, nothing. And then I thought, well, that's reasonable. My old prick, there's only one last mission, why taunt it with all these whores, what's that got to do with my old prick now? There's only one last mission, I should think about that. So I did. I lay there in the dark, remembering, remembering, remembering. I could remember how we used to do it, step by step. And that's how we're going to do it again. Of course our bodies are old now, but I've thought it through. We'll do it just the way we did. And she'll remember, she'll not have forgotten, step by step by step. Once we're in the darkness, under the sheet, we were never so bold, you see, it was her, she was modest, she wanted it that way. I minded it then, I always wanted to say to her: "Why can't you be like a whore? Display yourself in the light?" But now I don't mind, I want to do it just the way we used to, pretend we're going to sleep, keep quiet, ten minutes, fifteen minutes. Then I'll say something suddenly, something bold and dirty in the dark. "I want them to see you naked," I'll say. "Drunken sailors in a bar. A sea-port tavern, drunken filthy men, I want them to see you naked on the floor." Yes, Mr Ryder, I used to say such things, suddenly, after we'd been lying there pretending to go to sleep, yes, suddenly break the silence, that's important, suddenly. Of course, she was young then, she was beautiful, now it sounds strange, an old woman naked on the floor of a tavern, but I'll say it anyway because that's how we used to get it started. She'll say nothing and so I'll say more. "I want them all to stare at you. On all fours, on the floor." But can you imagine it? A frail old woman doing that? What would our drunken sailors say now? But then maybe they've grown old with us, our sailors in the seaport tavern, maybe in their mind's eye she'll be just as she was then and they wouldn't care. "Yes, they'll be staring at you! All of them!" And I'll touch her, just the side of her hip, I remember that, she liked me to touch her sides, I'll touch her just as I used to, then I'll get close to her and whisper: "I'll make you work in a brothel. Night after night." Can you imagine it? But I'll say it, because that's how it was. And I'll throw off the bedclothes and bend over her, I'll part her thighs, maybe they'll click, the joint between the thigh and the hip, it might make a little snapping noise, someone said she'd hurt her hip, maybe she can't part her thighs widely now. Well, we'll do it the best we can because that's what came next. Then I'll bend down to kiss her pussycat, I won't expect it to smell the way it did then, no, I've thought it through, it might smell bad, like stale fish, her whole body will smell bad maybe, I've thought hard about it. And me, my body, look at me now, it's not so good either. My skin, I have these scales, they keep flaking off, I don't know what it is. When it started, last year, it was just the scalp. When I combed my hair, these huge flakes, like fish scales, you could see through them, they came off. It was just the scalp, but now it's all over, my elbows, then my knees, now my chest. They smell like fish too, these flakes. Well, they'll keep falling, I won't be able to stop that, she'll have to put up with it, so I won't complain about her pussycat smelling the way it does, or the way her thighs won't part properly without clicking, I won't get angry, you won't see me trying to force them apart like something broken, no, no. We'll do it exactly like we used to. And my old prick, maybe only half stiff, when the time comes she'll reach down and she'll whisper: "Yes, I'll let them! I'll let the sailors all see me! I'll tease them till they can bear it no more!" Can you imagine it? The way she is now? But we won't care. And anyway, like I said, maybe the sailors will have aged with us. She'll reach down for it, my old prick, back then it would have been very hard, nothing in the world would have made it slack except for ... well, but now maybe it'll be only half stiff, that was the best I could get it the other night, who knows, maybe it will be all the way, and we'll try and put it in, but she might be like a shell, but we'll try. And at just the right moment, we'll remember when, even if nothing's happening down there, we'll know how to finish the steps, because by then we'll have remembered so well, there'll be nothing to stop us, even if there's nothing happening down there, even if all we're doing is holding ourselves against each other, it won't matter, we'll still say it at just the right time. "They'll take you! They'll take you, you've teased them too long!" And she'll say: "Yes, they'll have me, all the sailors, they'll have me!" and even if nothing's happening down there, we can still hold each other, we'll hold each other and say it like we used to, it won't matter. Maybe the pain will be too much for my old prick, you know, because of my wound, but it won't matter, she'll remember how we did it. All these years, but she'll remember, every step. Mr Ryder, you don't have a wound?'

He was suddenly looking at me.

'A wound?'

'I have this old injury. Maybe that's why I drink. It gives me so much pain.'

'How unfortunate.' Then, after a short silence, I added: 'I did once injure a toe quite badly in a football match. I was nineteen. It wasn't anything too serious.'

'In Poland, Mr Ryder, when I was a conductor, even then, I never thought the wound would heal. When I conducted my orchestra, I always touched my wound, caressed it. Some days I picked at its edges, even pressed it hard between the fingers. You realise soon enough when a wound's not going to heal. The music, even when I was a conductor, I knew that's all it was, just a consolation. It helped for a while. I liked the feeling, pressing the wound, it fascinated me. A good wound, it can do that, it fascinates. It looks a little different every day. Has it changed? you wonder. Maybe it's healing at last. You look at it in a mirror, it looks different. But then you touch it and you know it's the same, your old friend. You do this year after year, and then you know it's not going to heal and in the end you get tired of it. You get so tired.' He fell silent and looked again at his bouquet. Then he said again: 'You get so tired. You're not tired yet, Mr Ryder? You get so tired.'

'Perhaps,' I said tentatively, 'Miss Collins has the power to heal your wound.'

'Her?' He laughed suddenly then went silent again. After a while he said quietly: 'She'll be like the music. A consolation. A wonderful consolation. That's all I ask now. A consolation. But heal the wound?' He shook his head. 'If I showed it to you now, my friend, I could show it to you, you'd see that was an impossibility. A medical impossibility. All I want, all I ask for now is a consolation. Even if it's like the way I said, just half-way stiff and we're doing no more than just dancing, six more times, that'll be enough. After that the wound can do what it likes. We'll have our animal by then, the grass, the fields. Why did she choose a place like this?'

He looked around again and shook his head. This time he remained silent for a long time, perhaps for as long as two or three minutes. I was about to say something when he suddenly leaned forward in his chair.

'Mr Ryder, I had a dog, Bruno, he died. I've ... I've still not buried him. He's in a box, a sort of coffin. He was a good friend. Just a dog, but a good friend. I planned a small ceremony, just to say goodbye. Nothing special. Bruno, he's the past now, but a small ceremony just to say goodbye, what's wrong with that? Mr Ryder, I wanted to ask you. A small favour, for me and Bruno.'

The door suddenly opened and Miss Collins came into the room. Then, as Brodsky and I rose to our feet, Parkhurst came in behind her and closed the door.

'I'm very sorry, Miss Collins,' he said, giving Brodsky an angry look. 'He just wouldn't hear of respecting your privacy.'

Brotsky was standing stiffly in the middle of the room. As Miss Collins came closer, he gave a bow and I could see the shadow of a considerable elegance he must once have possessed. He held the bouquet out to her saying: 'Just a small gift. I picked them myself.'

Miss Collins took the flowers from him, but otherwise completely disregarded them. 'I might have guessed you'd come here like this, Mr Brotsky,' she said. 'I came to the zoo yesterday and now you think you can take any liberties you wish.'

Brotsky lowered his eyes. 'But there's so little time,' he said. 'We can't afford to waste time now.'

'Waste time to do what, Mr Brotsky? It's quite ridiculous, your coming here like this. You must know I'm busy in the mornings.'

'Please.' He raised his palm. 'Please. We're old now. We don't have to argue like we used to. I just came by to give you the flowers. And to make a simple proposal. That was all.'

'A proposal? What sort of proposal was that, Mr Brotsky?'

'Simply that you meet me this afternoon at St Peter's Cemetery. Half an hour, that's all. To be on our own and talk a few things over.'

'But there's nothing to talk over. It was clearly a mistake for me to come to the zoo yesterday. And did you say the cemetery? Why on earth are you proposing such a place for a rendez-vous? Have you altogether taken leave of your senses? A restaurant, a café, perhaps some gardens or a lake. But you propose a cemetery!'

'I'm sorry.' Brotsky seemed genuinely crestfallen. 'I didn't think. I'd forgotten. That is, I'd forgotten St Peter's Cemetery was a cemetery.'

‘Don’t be so absurd.’

‘I mean, I’ve been there so often, we used to feel so peaceful there, Bruno and I. Even when things were at their worst, I felt not so bad when I was there, it was peaceful, very beautiful, we liked it there. That’s why I asked. Really, I’d forgotten. About the dead people being there.’

‘And what did you intend for us to do there? Sit on a gravestone and reminisce about old times? Mr Brodsky, you really ought to think more carefully about your proposals.’

‘But we used to like it there, Bruno and I. I thought you’d like it too.’

‘Oh, I see. Now that your dog has died, you wish me to go in its place.’

‘I didn’t mean it like that.’ Brodsky suddenly lost his demure look and a flash of impatience crossed his face. ‘I didn’t mean it that way at all, you know it. You always did this. I spend a long time thinking, trying to find something good for us, and then you, you scorn it, you laugh at it, you make out it’s a ridiculous thing. Anyone else and you’d say what a charming idea. You always did this. Like the time I arranged for us to sit in the front at the Kobylainsky concert ...’

‘That was over thirty years ago. How can you still be talking about such things?’

‘But it’s the same, the same. I think of something, something good for us, because I know deep down you like things to be a little unusual. Then you just laugh at them. Maybe it’s because my ideas, like the cemetery, they really appeal to you, deep down, and you can see I understand your heart. So you pretend ...’

‘This is a nonsense. There’s no reason on earth why we should be discussing such matters. It’s much too late, there’s nothing for us to discuss, Mr Brodsky. I can’t meet you in a cemetery whether it appeals to me or not, because I have nothing to discuss with you ...'

'I just wanted to explain. Why it happened, everything, why I was the way I was ...'

'It's much too late for that, Mr Brodsky. At least twenty years too late. Besides, I couldn't bear to listen to you trying to apologise all over again. Even now, I'm sure, I wouldn't be able to hear an apology on your lips without shuddering. For many, many years, an apology from you was not the end but the beginning. The beginning to another round of pain and humiliation. Oh, why don't you just leave me alone now? It's simply too late. Besides, you've taken to dressing absurdly since you became sober. What are these clothes you've started to wear?'

Brodsky hesitated, then said: 'It's what I've been advised to wear. By the people helping me. I'm to be a conductor again. I have to dress so people see me that way.'

'I almost said to you yesterday at the zoo. That ridiculous grey coat! Who told you to wear it? Mr Hoffman? Really, you should have a little more sense of your own appearance. These people are dressing you like some puppet, and you let them do it. And now look at you! This ridiculous suit. Do you imagine you look artistic like that?'

Brodsky glanced down at his attire, a hurt expression in his eyes. Then he looked up and said: 'You're an old woman. You don't know about the fashions now.'

'It's the prerogative of the old to deplore the clothes of the young. But how ridiculous that you should be the one dressed like that. Really, it's no use, it's simply not your style. Quite frankly, I think the town will prefer you in what you used to wear a few months ago. That's to say, rather elegant rags.'

'Don't laugh at me. I'm no longer like that. I might soon be a conductor again. These are my clothes now. When I looked at myself, I thought I looked right. You forget, in Warsaw, I had clothes like these. A bow tie like this one. You forget now. '

For a second, a sad look came into Miss Collins's eyes. Then she said:

'Of course I forget. Why would I remember such things? There have been so many more vivid things to remember in the years since. '

'Your dress,' he said suddenly. 'It's very good. Very elegant. But your shoes, they're as bad as ever, a disaster. You never accepted you have fat ankles. For a woman so thin, your ankles were always fat. And now look, even now.' He pointed at Miss Collins's feet.

'Don't be so childish. Do you think it's like those days in Warsaw when you could make me change my whole costume minutes before we left with just one remark like that? How much you live in the past, Mr Brodsky! Do you think it means the slightest thing to me, what you think of my footwear? And do you think I don't realise now that it was all merely a trick you played, deliberately leaving it to the last possible moment to make your criticism? Of course, I'd change everything then, go out in something thrown on in a terrible rush. Then once we were sitting in the car, or perhaps at the concert hall, only then would I remember my eye-shadow was the wrong colour for the dress, or the necklace looked awful with the shoes. And it was all so important for me in those days. The conductor's wife! It was so important for me and you knew that. Do you suppose I don't see now just what you were doing? How you would say: "Good, good, very nice," right until there were only a few minutes left. Then, yes, it would be something exactly like this. "Your shoes are a disaster!" As if you would know such a thing! What would you know about fashions today, you've been drunk for the last two decades. '

‘Nevertheless,’ Brodsky said, a hint of imperiousness now entering his expression, ‘nevertheless, what I say is true. Those shoes make the lower half of your figure look absurd. It’s true.’

‘Look at this ridiculous suit! Some Italian creation, no doubt. The sort of thing a young ballet dancer might wear. And you believe this will help you gain credibility in the eyes of people here?’

‘Absurd shoes. You look like one of those toy soldiers with a base so you don’t fall over.’

‘It’s time for you to leave! How dare you come here like this, disturbing my morning! The young couple in there, they’re very distressed, they need my counsel more than ever this morning, and here, you’ve disturbed us. This is our last conversation. It was a mistake to have met you yesterday at the zoo.’

‘The cemetery.’ There was suddenly a desperate note in his voice. ‘You must meet me, this afternoon. Okay, I didn’t think, the dead people, I didn’t think. But I explained that. We have to talk before ... before this evening. Or else how can I? How can I do it? Can’t you see how important tonight is? We have to talk, you must meet me ...’

‘Look here.’ Parkhurst stepped forward and glared at Brodsky. ‘You heard what Miss Collins said. She’s requested you leave her residence. Leave her sight, leave her life. She’s too polite to say it, so I’ll say it on her behalf. After everything you’ve done, you have no right, not the shred of a right to make the request you’ve just made. How can you stand there requesting a meeting, as though all those things never occurred? Perhaps you’re pretending you were so drunk you don’t remember. Well then I’ll remind you. It’s not so long ago you stood out there in that street, urinating on the wall of this building, shouting obscenities at this very window. The police took you away in the end, dragged you away while you shouted the vilest things about Miss Collins. This was no more than a year ago. No doubt, you're expecting Miss Collins to have forgotten by now. But I can assure you it was only one of many incidents like it. And as for your sartorial pronouncements, wasn't it less than three years ago you were found unconscious in the Volksgarten in clothes you'd repeatedly vomited over, taken to the Holy Trinity Church and there found to have body lice? Do you expect Miss Collins to care what such a man has to say about her dress sense? Let's face it, Mr Brodsky, once a man falls to the depths to which you fell, his position is irredeemable. You'll never, never win back a woman's love, I can tell you that with some authority. You'll never win back even her respect. Her pity perhaps, but nothing more. Conductor! Do you imagine this town will ever look at you and see anything other than a disgusting down-and-out? Let me remind you, Mr Brodsky, four years ago, perhaps five now, you physically attacked Miss Collins just off the Bahnhofplatz, and if not for two students who were passing you'd certainly have caused her serious injury. And all the time you were attempting to strike her, you were shouting the vilest ...'

'No, no, no!' Brodsky suddenly cried, shaking his head and covering his ears.

'You were shouting the vilest obscenities. Of a sexual and deviant nature. There was talk you should have been imprisoned for it. Then of course there was the episode at the telephone kiosk in Tillgasse ...'

'No, no!'

Brodsky grabbed Parkhurst by the lapel, causing the latter to recoil in alarm. But then Brodsky carried out no further aggression, simply clutching Parkhurst's lapel as though it were a lifeline. For the next few seconds, Parkhurst struggled to prise off Brodsky's fingers. When he finally succeeded, the whole of Brodsky's posture seemed to sag. The old man closed his eyes and sighed, then turned and walked silently out of the room.

At first the three of us remained standing in silence, unsure what to do or say next. Then the sound of Brodsky slamming the front door brought us to life and Parkhurst and I both moved to the window.

‘There he goes,’ Parkhurst said, his forehead against the glass. ‘Don’t worry, Miss Collins, he won’t be back.’

Miss Collins appeared not to hear. She wandered towards the door, then turned back again.

‘Please excuse me, I must ... I must ...’ She walked dreamily up to the window and looked out. ‘Please, I must ... You see, I hope you understand ...’

She was speaking to neither of us in particular. Then her confusion appeared to clear and she said: ‘Mr Parkhurst, you had no right to speak in that way to Leo. He has shown enormous courage this past year.’ She gave Parkhurst a piercing look, then hurried out of the room. The next moment we heard the door slam again.

I was still beside the window and could see Miss Collins’s figure hurrying away down the street. She had caught sight of Brodsky already a good way ahead and after a few seconds broke into a trot, perhaps wishing to avoid the indignity of having to call to him to make him wait. But Brodsky, with his odd lop-sided gait, kept up a surprisingly brisk pace. He was obviously upset and it appeared genuinely not to have occurred to him she would come out after him.

Miss Collins, her breath coming harder, pursued him past the rows of apartment houses, then past the shops at the upper end of the street, without appreciably closing the distance. Brodsky continued to walk steadily, now turning the corner where I had earlier parted with Gustav, and past the Italian cafés on the wide boulevard. The pavement was even more crowded than when I had come along it with Gustav, but Brodsky walked without looking up, so that he often came close to colliding with people in his path.

Then, as Brodsky approached the pedestrian crossing, Miss Collins appeared to realise she stood no chance of overtaking him. Coming to a halt, she cupped her hands around her mouth, but then seemed caught in some last dilemma, perhaps concerning whether to call out 'Leo' or else, as she had called him throughout their conversation, 'Mr Brodsky'. No doubt some instinct warned her of the urgency of the situation at which they had now arrived, for she called out: 'Leo! Leo! Leo! Please wait!'

Brodsky turned with a startled expression as Miss Collins came hurrying towards him. She was still holding the bouquet, and in his confusion Brodsky held out both hands as though offering to relieve her of it. But Miss Collins kept hold of the flowers and, though short of breath, sounded quite calm as she said: 'Mr Brodsky, please. Please wait.'

They stood together awkwardly for a moment, both suddenly conscious of the passers-by all around them, many of whom were starting to look their way, some barely hiding their curiosity. Then Miss Collins gestured back in the direction of her apartment, saying softly: 'The Sternberg Garden is very beautiful at this time of year. Why don't we go there and talk?'

They set off with more and more people looking their way, Miss Collins a step or two in front of Brodsky, both grateful for a clear reason to delay conversation until they had reached their destination. They turned the corner back into her street and before long were passing once again in front of the apartment houses. Then just a block or so away, Miss Collins stopped by a small iron gate tucked discreetly back from the pavement.

She reached for the latch, but paused a moment before opening the gate. It occurred to me then that the simple walk they had just completed together, the mere fact that they were now standing side by side at the entrance to the Sternberg Garden, would hold a significance for her far beyond anything Brodsky could at that moment have suspected. For the truth was, she had made that same short journey with him, from the bustle of the boulevard, finishing at the little iron gate, countless times in her imagination down the years - ever since the mid-summer's afternoon they had chanced upon one another on the boulevard in front of the jeweller's shop. And in all those years, she had not forgotten the look of studied indifference with which he had turned away from her that day, pretending to be engrossed by something in the shop's window.

At that point - a good year before the start of the drunkenness and the abuse - such shows of indifference had still been the principal feature of any contact between them. And although by that afternoon she had already resolved several times to set in motion some form of reconciliation, she too had looked away and gone on walking. Only when she had gone further along the boulevard, beyond the Italian cafés, had she given in to her curiosity and glanced back. It was then she had realised he had been following her. He had again been peering into a shop window, but there he had been none the less, only a short way away.

She had slowed her walk, assuming he would sooner or later catch up. When she had reached her corner and he had still not done so, she had taken another glance back. On that day, as on this, the broad sunny pavement had been crowded with pedestrians, but she had had the satisfaction of gaining a clear view of him as he checked himself in mid-stride and looked away towards the flower stall he was passing. A smile had come to her lips, and as she had turned her corner she had been pleasantly surprised by the lightness of her own mood. Her walk now reduced to a dawdle, she too had started to peer into shop windows. She had looked in turn at the pâtisserie, the toy shop, the drapers - in those days the bookshop had not been there - all the while trying to formulate in her head her opening remark to him when he finally came up to her. 'Leo, what children we must be,'

she had considered saying. But that had seemed altogether too sensible and she had thought about something more ironic: 'I notice we seem to be going the same way' or some such thing. Then his figure had appeared around the corner and she had seen he was holding a bright bouquet. Turning away quickly, she had started to walk again, now at a reasonable pace. Then as she had approached her apartment, for the first time that day, she had been seized by a sense of annoyance at him. Her afternoon had been neatly planned. Why had he chosen this of all moments to seek a conversation with her? When she had arrived at her door, she had stolen another quick glance up the street, only to discover he was still at least twenty yards away.

She had closed her door behind her and, resisting the urge to look out of the window, had hurried to her bedroom at the rear of the building. There she had checked her appearance in her mirror and composed her emotions. Then, emerging from the bedroom, she had come to a startled halt in the corridor. The door at the far end had been standing ajar and she had been able to see right through, across her sun-filled front parlour and through the bay windows, to the pavement outside where he was now visible, his back to the house, loitering there as though he had arranged to meet someone at that very spot. For a moment she had not moved, suddenly afraid he would turn, look in through the glass and see her. Then his figure had drifted out of view and she had found herself gazing at the fronts of the houses on the opposite side, listening intently for the ring of the doorbell.

When after a minute he had still not rung, she had again felt a flash of anger towards him. He was, she had realised, waiting for her to come and invite him in. She had again calmed herself and, thinking over the situation carefully, had resolved to do nothing until he had rung the bell.

For the next several minutes she had proceeded to wait. Once she had returned to her bedroom for no particular reason, then drifted back out into the corridor. Then eventually, when it had finally occurred to her he had gone, she had made her way slowly out to the entrance hall.

Opening the door and looking left and right, Miss Collins had been surprised to find no trace of him whatsoever. She had expected to discover him lurking a few doors away - or at least the flowers to be on the doorstep. For all that, at that moment, she had felt no regret. A small sense of relief, certainly, and a not unpleasant feeling of excitement that the reconciliation process had at last begun, but she had felt no regret at all. In fact, as she had sat down in her front parlour she had experienced a triumphant glow at having stood her ground. Such small victories, she had told herself, were very important and would help them to avoid repeating the errors of the past.

Only several months later had it occurred to her she had made a mistake that day. Even then, at first, the idea had remained a very vague one she did not examine carefully. But then as the months had continued, that summer's afternoon had come to occupy an increasingly dominant place in her thoughts. Her great error, she had concluded, had been to enter her apartment. By doing so, she had asked just a little too much of him. Having led him all that way, around the corner and down past the shops, what she should have done was to have paused at the little iron gate, then, making quite sure he had a clear view of her, gone into the Sternberg Garden. Then, without a doubt, he would have followed. And even if for a while they had wandered about the shrubs in silence, sooner or later they would have started to talk. And sooner or later he would have given her the flowers. Throughout the twenty odd years that had passed since then, Miss Collins had rarely glanced towards that iron gate without experiencing a small tug somewhere within her. And so it was that on this morning, as she finally led Brodsky into the garden, she did so with a certain sense of ceremony.

For all the prominence the Sternberg Garden had come to assume in Miss Collins's imagination, it was not an especially appealing place. Essentially a concreted square no larger than a supermarket car park, it seemed to exist primarily for horticultural interest, rather than to provide beauty or comfort to the neighbourhood. There was no grass or trees, simply rows of flower beds, and at this point in the day the square was a sun-trap with no obvious sign of shade anywhere. But Miss Collins, looking around at the flowers and ferns, clapped her hands in delight. Brodsky, closing the iron gate carefully after him, looked at the garden without enthusiasm, but seemed to take satisfaction from the fact that, aside from the apartment windows overlooking them, they had complete privacy.

'I sometimes bring them here, the people who come to see me,' Miss Collins said. 'It's so fascinating here. You'll see specimens you won't find anywhere else in Europe.'

She continued to stroll slowly, glancing admiringly about her, while Brodsky walked respectfully a few paces behind. The awkwardness they had displayed in each other's presence only a few minutes before had now evaporated entirely, so that someone glimpsing them from the gate might easily have mistaken them for an elderly couple of many years standing taking an habitual walk together in the sunshine.

'But of course,' Miss Collins said, pausing by a shrub, 'you've never liked gardens like these, have you, Mr Brodsky? You despise all this harnessing of nature.'

'Won't you call me Leo?'

'Very well. Leo. No, you'd prefer something wilder. But you see, it's only with careful control and planning some of these species can survive at all.'

Brodsky regarded solemnly the leaf Miss Collins was touching. Then he said: 'Do you remember? Every Sunday morning, after we'd had our coffee together at the Praga, we used to go to that bookstore. So many old books, so cramped and dusty whichever way you turned. You remember? You used to get so impatient. But we used to go anyway, every Sunday, after our coffee at the Praga. '

Miss Collins remained silent for a few seconds. Then she laughed lightly and began to walk slowly again. 'The tadpole man,' she said.

Brotsky smiled. 'The tadpole man,' he repeated, nodding. 'That was it. If we went back now, maybe he'll still be there, behind his table. The tadpole man. Did we ever ask him his name? He was always so polite to us. Even though we never bought his books. '

'Except for that morning he shouted at us. '

'He shouted at us? I don't remember that. The tadpole man was always so polite. And we never bought his books. '

'Oh yes. Once we went in, it was raining, and we took great care not to drip water over his books, we shook our coats at the doorway, and yet he was very ill-tempered that morning and shouted at us. Don't you remember? He shouted about my being English. Oh yes, he was very rude, but only that morning. The next Sunday, he seemed to have no memory of it. '

'That's funny,' Brotsky said. 'I don't remember. The tadpole man. I always remember him as so shy and polite. I don't remember this time you're talking about. '

'Perhaps I've remembered incorrectly,' said Miss Collins. 'Perhaps I've muddled him with someone else. '

'I think so. The tadpole man, he was always respectful. He wouldn't have done such a thing. About you being English?' Brotsky shook his head. 'No, he was always respectful. '

Miss Collins stopped again, for a moment absorbed by a fern.

‘So many people in those days,’ she said eventually.

‘They were like that. They would be so polite, so long-suffering. They’d go out of their way to be kind to you, sacrifice all sorts of things, and then one day, for no reason, the weather, anything, they’d just explode. Then back to normal again. There were so many like that. Like Andrzej. He was like that.’

‘Andrzej was crazy. You know, I read somewhere, he was killed in a car accident. Yes, I read it, in a Polish journal, five, six years ago. Killed in a car accident.’

‘How sad. I suppose many of those people from those days might be gone now.’

‘I liked Andrzej,’ Brodsky said. ‘I read it in a Polish journal, just a mention in passing, saying he’d been killed. A road accident. It was sad. I thought about those evenings, sitting in the old apartment. How we’d wrap up in blankets, share the coffee between us, all those books and journals everywhere and talk. About music, about literature, hours and hours, looking at the ceiling, talking, talking.’

‘I used to want to go to bed, but Andrzej would never go home. Sometimes he stayed till dawn.’

‘That’s right. If he was losing an argument, then he wouldn’t go. He’d never go until he thought he was winning. That’s why sometimes he stayed till dawn.’

Miss Collins smiled, then sighed. ‘How sad to hear he was killed,’ she said.

‘It wasn’t the tadpole man,’ Brodsky said. ‘It was the man in the picture gallery. He was the one who shouted. A strange one, always pretended not to know who we were. You remember? Even in the days after that performance of Lafcadio. Waiters, taxi drivers wanting to shake my hand, but when we went to the gallery, nothing. He looked at us, face like a stone, same as always. Then at the end, when things were going badly, we went in, it was raining that day, and he shouted at us. We were making his floor wet, he said. And we'd always done it, whenever it rained, for years we'd done it, got his floor wet, all these years and he was sick of it. He was the one who shouted, said about you being English, it was him, not the tadpole. The tadpole was always respectful, right to the end. The tadpole shook my hand, I can remember, just before we left. You remember? We went to the bookshop, he knew it was the last time, he came out from behind his table and shook my hand. Most people didn't want to shake my hand by then, but he did. He was respectful, the tadpole, always.'

Miss Collins shielded her eyes with a hand and looked across to the far corner of the garden. Then she began to walk slowly again, saying: 'It's nice to remember some of these things. But we can't live in the past.'

'But you remember it,' Brodsky said. 'You remember it, the tadpole, the bookshop. Remember too that wardrobe? The door that fell off? You remember it all, just as I do.'

'Some things I remember. Other things, inevitably, I've forgotten.' Her voice had now become guarded. 'Some things, even from those times, are best forgotten.'

Brodsky appeared to give this consideration. Finally he said: 'Maybe you're right. The past, it's full of too many things. I'm ashamed, you know I'm ashamed, so let's finish. Let's finish with the past. Let's choose an animal.'

Miss Collins went on walking, now several steps in front of Brodsky. Then she stopped again and turned to him. 'I'll meet you this afternoon in the cemetery if that's what you wish. But you mustn't take that to mean anything. It doesn't mean I'm agreeing about your animal or about anything else. But I can see you're worried about tonight, that you'd wish to talk over your anxieties with someone else.'

'These last months. I saw the caterpillars, but I went on, I went on, I made myself ready. It will be for nothing if you don't come back. '

'I'm only agreeing to meet you for a short time this afternoon. Half an hour perhaps. '

'But you'll think about it. You'll think about it before we meet. You'll think about it. The animal, everything. '

Miss Collins turned away and for a long time stood examining another shrub. Finally she said: 'Very well, I'll think about it. '

'You can see how it's been for me. How hard. Sometimes it was so terrible I wanted to die, just to stop it, but I went on because this time I could see a way. Conductor again. You'd come back. It will be like it was, even better maybe. Sometimes it got terrible, the caterpillars, there's nothing more I can do to prove it. We never had children. So let's get an animal. '

Miss Collins began to walk again, and this time Brodsky kept up alongside her, gazing gravely into her face. Miss Collins seemed about to speak again, but just at that moment Parkhurst said suddenly from behind me:

'I never join in with them, you know. I mean when they start in on you the way they do. I don't even laugh, not even smile, I don't join in at all. You probably think I'm just saying that, but it's true. They disgust me, the way they go on. And that braying noise! As soon as I walk through the door, that braying noise again! Not even a minute, they won't even give me that, they won't give me sixty seconds to show them I've changed. "Parkers! Parkers!" Oh, they disgust me ...'

'Look,' I said, feeling suddenly very impatient with him, 'if they annoy you so much, why don't you just speak your mind? Next time, why don't you confront them? Tell them to stop the braying noise. And ask them why, just why they hate me so much. Why my success offends them so. Yes, ask them that! In fact, for maximum impact, why don't you do it right in the middle of your clowning? Yes, right in the middle of one of your anecdotes, when you're doing all those funny voices and faces. When they're all laughing and slapping you on the back, so delighted you haven't changed a bit, do it right then. Ask them suddenly: "Why? Why does Ryder's success challenge you so much?" That's what to do. That would not only do me a service, it would demonstrate to these fools in one elegant move that there is, and always was, a much deeper person behind your clowning exterior. Someone not easily manipulated or compromised. That would be my advice.'

'That's all very well!' Parkhurst shouted angrily. 'It's very easy for you to say that! You've nothing to lose, they hate you anyway! But these are my oldest friends. When I'm out here, surrounded by all these continentals, most of the time I'm fine. But now and again something happens, something unpleasant, and then I say to myself: "So what? What do I care? These are just foreigners. In my own country, I've got good friends, I've only to go back, they'll all be waiting there." It's all very well, you coming out with smart advice like that. Actually, come to think of it, it probably isn't all very well for you at all. I don't see why you're so complacent. You can't afford to forget your old friends any more than I can. It's right, you know, some of these things they say. You're downright complacent and you'll pay for it one day. Just because you've become famous! They're right, you know. "Why don't you confront them?" What arrogance!'

Parkhurst continued in this vein for a while longer, but I had stopped listening. For his mention of my 'complacency' had triggered something, causing me suddenly to remember that my parents were due shortly to arrive in the city. And there came over me, there in Miss Collins's front parlour, seizing me with an icy panic that was almost tangible, the realisation that I had not prepared at all the piece I was to perform before them this evening. Indeed, it was several days, perhaps even weeks, since I had last touched a piano. Now here I was, only hours from this most important of performances, not even having made arrangements to rehearse. The more I thought over my situation, the more alarming it appeared. I saw I had allowed myself to become far too preoccupied with the talk I was to deliver, and somehow, unaccountably, had neglected the more fundamental matter of the performance. In fact, I could not for a moment even remember which piece I had decided to play. Was it Yamanaka's Globe-structures: Option IP? Or was it Mullery's Asbestos and Fibrø? Both pieces, when I came to think about them, were disturbingly hazy in my mind. Each, I remembered, contained sections of great complexity, but when I tried to think further about these passages, I found I could recall almost nothing. And meanwhile, for all I knew, my parents were already here in the city. I saw there was not a minute to be lost, that whatever the other calls on my time I had first to secure for myself at least two hours of quiet and privacy with a good piano.

Parkhurst was still talking earnestly.

'Look, I'm sorry,' I said, moving towards the door. 'I have to go immediately.'

Parkhurst jumped to his feet and his voice now took on a pleading tone.

'I don't join in, you know. Oh no, I don't join in at all.' He came after me as though to grasp my arm. 'I don't even smile. It's disgusting, the way they go on about you ...'

'That's fine, I'm grateful,' I said, moving out of his reach. 'But I really have to go now.'

Letting myself out of Miss Collins's apartment I hurried up the street, now unable to think of anything other than the need to get back to the hotel and the piano in the drawing room. In fact I was so preoccupied I not only neglected to glance towards the little iron gate as I passed it, I failed to see Brodsky standing before me on the pavement until I was virtually on top of him. Brodsky bowed and greeted me calmly in a way that suggested he had been watching my approach for some time.

‘Mr Ryder. We meet again.’

‘Ah, Mr Brodsky,’ I replied, not breaking my stride. ‘Please excuse me, but I’m in a terrible hurry.’

Brodsky fell in step alongside me and for a while we walked together without speaking. Although it occurred to me there was something odd about this, I was too preoccupied to attempt any conversation.

We turned the corner together into the wide boulevard. Here the pavement was more crowded than ever – the office workers had come out for their lunch break – and we were obliged to slow down. It was then that Brodsky said beside me:

‘All that talk the other night. A big ceremony. A statue. No, no, we won’t have any of that. Bruno hated all these people. I’m going to bury him quietly, just me, what’s wrong with that? I found a place this morning, a little spot to bury him, just me, he wouldn’t want anyone else, he hated them all. Mr Ryder, I wanted music for him, the best music. A quiet little spot, I found it this morning, I know Bruno would like it there. I’ll dig. No need to dig so deep. Then I’ll sit beside the grave, think about him, all the things we did, say goodbye, that’s all. I wanted music while I think about him, the best music. Will you do it for me, Mr Ryder? Will you do it for me and Bruno? A favour, Mr Ryder. I’m asking you.’

‘Mr Brodsky,’ I said, walking briskly again, ‘I’m not clear what exactly you’re requesting. But I have to tell you, I’m in no position to consider any more calls on my time.’

‘Mr Ryder ...’

‘Mr Brodsky, I’m very sorry about your dog. But the fact is, I’ve been obliged to attend to too many requests, and as a result I’m now very hard pressed to get done the most important things I came here to ...’ Suddenly I felt a flash of impatience seize me and came to an abrupt halt. ‘Frankly, Mr Brodsky,’ I said, almost shouting, ‘I must ask you and everybody else to stop asking favours of me. The time has come for it to stop! It must stop!’

For a second Brodsky regarded me with a slightly puzzled expression. Then his gaze fell away and he looked utterly dejected. I immediately regretted my outburst, realising also the unreasonableness of blaming Brodsky for the numerous distractions I had had to deal with since arriving in the city. I sighed and said more gently:

‘Look, let me make a suggestion. Just now I’m going back to the hotel to rehearse. I’ll require at least two hours completely undisturbed. But after that, depending on how things have gone, I might be in a position to discuss further with you this matter concerning your dog. I must emphasise I can’t promise anything, but ...’

‘He was just a dog,’ Brodsky said suddenly. ‘But I want to say goodbye. I wanted the best music.’

‘Very well, Mr Brodsky, but I must now hurry on. I really am very short of time.’

I began to walk again. I had fully expected Brodsky to fall in step with me as before, but he did not move. I hesitated a second, somewhat reluctant simply to leave him on the pavement, but then remembered I could not now afford to be side-tracked at all. I hurried on past the Italian cafés, and did not glance back until I had reached the crossing and was waiting for the lights to change. For a moment, I could not see past the throngs of pedestrians, but then Brodsky’s figure came into view standing exactly where I had left him, leaning forward a little to gaze at the approaching traffic. The thought occurred to me that the spot where I had halted earlier was in fact a tram stop and that Brodsky had remained standing there for the simple reason he was waiting for a tram. But then the lights changed and, as I crossed the boulevard, I found my thoughts turning back again to the much more pressing matter of my evening's performance.

When I came into the hotel I gained the impression the lobby was busy, but I had by this time become so preoccupied about my practice arrangements I did not look around at all. In fact I might even have pushed in front of some other guests as I leaned against the reception desk to address the clerk.

‘Excuse me, but is there anyone in the drawing room at the moment?’

‘The drawing room? Well, yes, Mr Ryder. Guests like to go there after lunch, so I should think ...’

‘I need to speak to Mr Hoffman immediately. It’s a matter of the utmost urgency.’

‘Yes, of course, Mr Ryder.’

The desk clerk picked up a phone and exchanged a few words. Then putting down the receiver he said: ‘Mr Hoffman won’t be a moment, Mr Ryder.’

‘Very well. But this is a matter of some urgency.’

As I said this, I felt a touch on my shoulder and turned to find Sophie next to me.

‘Oh hello,’ I said to her. ‘What are you doing here?’

‘I was just trying to deliver something. You know, for Papa.’ Sophie gave a self-conscious laugh. ‘But he’s busy, he’s over at the concert hall.’

‘Oh, the coat,’ I said, noticing the package she was holding over her arm.

‘It’s getting chillier, so I brought it along, but he’s over at the concert hall and hasn’t come back. We’ve been waiting almost half an hour now. If he isn't back in the next few minutes, we'll have to leave it for today.'

I noticed Boris sitting on a sofa on the other side of the lobby. My view of him was largely obscured by a group of tourists standing in the middle of the floor, but I could see that he was engrossed in the tattered handyman's manual I had bought at the cinema. Sophie followed my gaze and laughed again.

'He's been so absorbed in that book,' she said. 'After you left last night, he was looking at it right up until bed. And then this morning, from the time he got up.' She gave another laugh and looked over towards him again. 'It was such a good idea, to buy it for him.'

'I'm glad he's enjoying it,' I said, turning back to the reception desk. I raised my hand to enquire of the desk clerk what had become of Hoffman, but just then Sophie came a step closer and said in a different voice:

'How much longer are you planning to keep it up? It's really upsetting him, you know.'

I gave her a puzzled look, but she continued to fix me with a severe stare.

'I know things are difficult for you just now,' she went on. 'And I haven't helped much, I realise. But the fact is he's upset and worried by it. How much longer is it going to go on?'

'I'm not sure what you're referring to.'

'Look, I said I realise it's my fault too. What's the point in pretending it's not happening?'

'Pretending what's not happening? I suppose this is that Kim's suggestion, is it? To come to me with all these accusations?'

‘As a matter of fact, Kim always says it’s best I be much more frank with you. But this time, it’s nothing to do with her. I’m bringing this up because ... because I can’t bear to see Boris worrying like this.’

A little bewildered, I began to turn back to the desk clerk. But before I could attract his attention, Sophie said:

‘Look, I’m not accusing you of anything. You’ve been very understanding about everything. I couldn’t ask you to have been more reasonable. You haven’t even shouted at me. But I always knew there’d have to be some anger and it’s coming out like this.’

I gave a laugh. ‘I suppose this is the sort of pop psychology you talk with that Kim, is it?’

‘I always knew it,’ Sophie continued, ignoring my remark. ‘You’ve been very understanding about everything, more than anyone could ever expect, even Kim admits that. But it was never realistic. We couldn’t just go on like this, as though nothing had happened. You’re angry. Who can blame you? I always knew it would have to come out somehow. I just never thought it would be like this. Poor Boris. He doesn’t know what he’s done.’

I looked again over to where Boris was sitting. He seemed still to be completely absorbed in his manual.

‘Look,’ I said, ‘I’m still not at all sure what you’re talking about. Perhaps you’re just referring to the fact that Boris and I, we’ve been adjusting our behaviour towards one another a little. But surely that’s only appropriate given the circumstances. If I’ve been a little distant towards him recently, it’s simply because I don’t want to mislead him about the true nature of our life together now. We have to all be more cautious. After what’s happened, who knows what the future holds for the three of us? Boris has to learn to become more resilient, more independent. I’m sure in his own way, he understands this as much as I do.’

Sophie looked away and for a moment seemed to be thinking something over. I was about to attract the desk clerk's attention again when she said suddenly:

'Please. Come over now. Say something to him.'

'Come over? Well, the problem is, I've a matter of some urgency to attend to and just as soon as Hoffman turns up ...'

'Please, just a few words. It would make such a difference to him. Please.'

She was looking at me intently. When I gave a shrug, she turned and began to lead the way across the lobby.

Boris glanced up briefly as we approached, then stared down at his book again with a serious expression. I had assumed Sophie was going to say something, but to my annoyance, she simply gave me a meaningful look then walked on past Boris's sofa towards a magazine rack next to the windows. I thus found myself standing alone next to Boris while the little boy went on with his reading. Eventually I pulled up an armchair and sat down opposite him.

Boris continued to read, showing no sign of having noticed my presence. Then, without looking up, he muttered to himself:

'This book's great. It shows you everything.'

I was wondering how to respond, but then caught sight of Sophie, her back to us, pretending to examine a magazine she had just taken off the rack. I suddenly felt a wave of anger and bitterly regretted having followed her across the lobby. She had, I realised, managed to manoeuvre things so that, whatever I now said to Boris, she could count it a triumph and a vindication. I cast another look at her back, the slight stoop she was affecting around the shoulders to suggest her fascination with the magazine, and felt steadily more angry.

Boris turned over a page and continued to read. After a while he muttered once more without looking up: 'Tiling the bathroom. I'll be able to do it easily now.'

There was a selection of newspapers on a coffee table nearby and I saw no reason why I too should not be reading. I picked a paper and held it open before me. A few moments passed in silence. Then, as I was glancing over an article about the German car industry, I heard Boris say suddenly:

'Sorry.'

He had uttered the word in a somewhat aggressive manner and at first I wondered if Sophie had managed to prod him or give him a signal while I had been reading. But when I stole a glance towards Sophie, her back was still turned and she appeared not to have moved at all. Then Boris said:

'I'm sorry I was selfish. I won't be any more. I won't talk about Number Nine ever again. I'm much too old for that now. It'll be easy with this book. It's great. I'll be able to do everything soon. I'm going to do the bathroom again. I didn't realise before. But it shows you in here, it shows you everything. I won't talk about Number Nine ever again.'

It was as though he were uttering lines he had memorised and rehearsed. None the less, there was something emotional in his voice and I felt a strong urge to reach out and comfort him. But then I saw Sophie's shoulders rise and fall, and remembered my annoyance at her. I could see, moreover, that in the long run none of our interests would be served if I allowed Sophie to manipulate matters in the manner she was now attempting.

I closed the newspaper and rose to my feet, glancing behind me to see if Hoffman was anywhere to be seen. As I did so, Boris spoke again, a panic now evident in his voice.

'I promise. I promise I'll learn to do everything. It'll be easy now.'

His voice wobbled a little, but when I looked at him again, his eyes were still fixed firmly on his page. His face, I noticed, looked strangely flushed. I then caught a movement across the lobby and saw Hoffman waving to me from beside the reception desk.

‘I have to go now,’ I called to Sophie. ‘I’ve got something very important. I’ll see you both another time.’

Boris turned over a page, but did not look up.

‘Very soon,’ I said to Sophie, who had now turned. ‘We’ll talk more very soon. But I have to go now.’

Hoffman had made his way into the centre of the lobby and was waiting for me with an anxious demeanour.

‘I’m sorry to have kept you waiting, Mr Ryder,’ he said. ‘I should have anticipated you’d turn up well before time for a meeting such as this. I’ve just this moment come from the boardroom, and I can tell you, sir, these people, these ordinary ladies and gentlemen, they’re so extremely grateful, so grateful you’ve agreed to meet with them in person. That you, Mr Ryder, appreciate the importance of hearing from their own lips what they’ve been through.’

I looked at him sternly. ‘Mr Hoffman, there appears to be a misunderstanding. I require at this point in time two hours in which to practise. Two hours of complete privacy. I must ask you to clear the drawing room as quickly as possible.’

‘Ah yes, the drawing room.’ Then he gave a laugh. ‘I’m sorry, Mr Ryder, I don’t quite understand. As you know, the committee of the Citizens’ Mutual Support Group is at this very moment waiting up in the boardroom ...’

‘Mr Hoffman, you don’t seem to appreciate the urgency of the situation. Owing to one unforeseen event after another, I haven’t had a chance to touch a piano now for many days. I must insist I be allowed access to one as quickly as possible. '

'Ah yes, Mr Ryder. Of course, that's perfectly understandable. I'll do everything I can to be of assistance. But as far as the drawing room is concerned, it would not be at all practical at this moment. You see, it's so full of guests ... '

'You appear quite ready to clear it for Mr Brodsky. '

'Ah, yes, quite right. Well, sir, if you were absolutely insistent you wanted the piano in the drawing room above all other pianos in the hotel, then certainly, yes, I would gladly comply. I would go in there now, personally, and request that all the guests leave, never mind if they are in the middle of taking coffee or whatever. Yes, I would do that ultimately. But perhaps before I resort to such extreme measures, you'd be so good as to consider certain other options. You see, sir, it is by no means the case that the piano in the drawing room is the best in the hotel. In fact some of the bass notes are distinctly dubious. '

'Mr Hoffman, if it isn't to be the drawing room, then by all means, please, tell me what else you have available. I have no peculiar attachment to the drawing room itself. What I need is simply a good piano and privacy. '

'The practice room. That would serve your needs much better. '

'Very well, then. The practice room it is. '

'Excellent. '

He began to lead me away. Then after just a few steps he stopped again and leaned forward confidentially.

'I take it then, Mr Ryder, you'll be requiring the practice room immediately you come out of the meeting? '

‘Mr Hoffman, I don’t wish to have to stress to you yet again the urgency of the present situation ...’

‘Ah yes, yes, Mr Ryder. Of course, of course. I very much understand. So ... you’re requiring to practise before the meeting. Yes, yes, I understand perfectly. That will be no problem, these people will be more than happy to wait a little. Well, no matter, this way please.’

We left the lobby via a door I had not noticed before situated to the left of the elevator, and we were soon walking along what was clearly a service corridor. The walls were undecorated and the fluorescent tubes overhead lent everything a hard, stark aspect. We passed a series of large sliding doors from behind which came various kitchen noises. One door was open and I glimpsed a harshly lit room with metal canisters piled in columns on a wooden bench.

‘We’re having to do much of the catering for tonight here on hotel premises,’ said Hoffman. ‘The concert hall, as you can imagine, has very limited kitchen facilities.’

The corridor turned a corner and we passed what I supposed were the laundry rooms. At one point we passed a set of doors from behind which came the sound of two women screaming at each other with alarming venom. Hoffman, however, seemed to register nothing and walked on in silence. Then I heard him mutter:

‘No, no, these citizens. They’ll be grateful regardless. A little delay, they won’t mind at all.’

He eventually stopped in front of an unmarked door. I expected him to hold it open for me, but instead he averted his eyes from it and turned his whole body away.

‘In there, Mr Ryder,’ he mumbled and made a quick furtive gesture over his shoulder.

‘Thank you, Mr Hoffman.’ I pushed open the door.

Hoffman continued to stand rigidly on his spot, his gaze still averted. 'I shall wait here for you,' he muttered.

'No need to do that, Mr Hoffman. I'll be able to find my way back out.'

'I shall be here, sir. Don't you worry.'

I could not be bothered to argue and hurried on through the doorway.

I entered a long narrow room with a grey stone floor. The walls were covered to the ceiling with white tiles. I had the impression there was a row of sinks to my left, but I was by this point so anxious to get to the piano I paid little attention to such details. My gaze, in any case, had been immediately drawn to the wooden cubicles on my right. There were three of these, painted an unpleasant frog-green colour, standing side by side. The doors to the two outer cubicles were closed, but the central cubicle - which looked to have slightly broader dimensions - had its door ajar and I could see inside it a piano, the lid left open to display the keys. Without further ado I attempted to make my way inside, only to find this a frustratingly difficult task. The door - which swung inwards into the cubicle - was prevented from opening fully by the piano itself, and in order to get inside and close the door again I was obliged to squeeze myself tightly into a corner and to tug the edge of the door slowly past my chest. Eventually I succeeded in closing and locking the door, then managed - again with some difficulty in the cramped conditions - to pull the stool out from under the piano. Once I had seated myself, however, I felt reasonably comfortable, and when I ran my fingers up and down the keys I discovered that for all its discoloured notes and scratched outer body, the piano possessed a mellow sensitive tone and had been perfectly tuned. The acoustics within the cubicle, moreover, were not nearly as claustrophobic as one might have supposed.

A great sense of relief swept over me at this discovery and I suddenly realised how tense I had been over the past hour. I took several slow deep breaths and set about preparing myself for this most important of practice sessions. It was then I remembered I had still not resolved the question of which piece to perform this evening. My mother, I knew, would find particularly moving the central movement of Yamanaka's Globestructures: Option II. But my father would certainly prefer Mullery's Asbestos and Fibre. In fact it was even possible he would not approve much of the Yamanaka. I sat gazing at the keys for a few more moments before deciding firmly in favour of the Mullery.

The decision made me feel all the better and I was just preparing to embark on those explosive opening chords when I felt something hard tap against the back of my shoulder. Turning, I saw with dismay that the door of the cubicle had somehow come unlocked and was hanging open.

I clambered to a standing position and pushed the door closed. I then noticed the latch mechanism was dangling upside down on the door frame. After further examination, and with a little ingenuity, I managed to fix the latch back in place, but even as I locked the door once more I could see I had effected only the most temporary of solutions. The latch was liable to slip down again at any moment. I could be in the middle of Asbestos and Fibre - in the midst, say, of one of the highly intense passages in the third movement - and the door could easily swing open again exposing me to whoever happened by then to be wandering about outside my cubicle. And certainly, if some obtuse person, not realising I was inside, were to attempt to gain entry, the lock would not offer even nominal resistance.

All these thoughts ran through my mind as I seated myself back on the stool. But after a little while, I came to the conclusion that if I did not make full use of this opportunity to practise, I might never get another. And if the conditions were less than ideal, the piano itself was perfectly adequate. With some determination, I willed myself to stop worrying about the faulty door behind me and to prepare myself once more for the opening bars of the Mullery.

Then, just as my fingers were poised over the keys, I heard a noise - a small creaking sound such as might be made by a shoe or some piece of clothing - somewhere alarmingly close by. I spun round on my stool. Only then did I notice that although the door had stayed closed, the whole of its upper section was missing, so that it more or less resembled a stable door. I had been so preoccupied with the faulty latch I had somehow completely failed to register this glaring fact. I now saw how the door ended at a rough edge just above waist height. Whether the upper section had been torn off as a result of wanton vandalism or because some renovation was taking place I could not be sure. In any case, even from my seated position I could, by craning my neck slightly, gain a clear view of the white tiles and sinks outside.

I could not believe Hoffman had had the effrontery to offer me such conditions. To be sure, no one else had come into the room so far, but it was perfectly conceivable a group of six or seven hotel staff could come in at any moment and begin using the sinks. The situation seemed to me untenable and I was about to abandon the cubicle angrily when I caught sight of a rag hanging from a nail on the door post close to the upper hinge.

I stared at this for a second, and then spotted another nail on the other door post at exactly the same height. Immediately guessing the purpose of the rag and the nails, I rose to my feet again to examine them further. The rag turned out to be an old bath towel. When I opened it out and hung it across the two nails, I found it formed a perfectly good curtain over the missing section of the door.

I sat down again feeling much better and prepared myself once more for the opening bars. Then, just as I was about to start playing, I was yet again stopped by the creaking noise. Then I heard it once more, and I realised it was coming from the cubicle on my left. It now dawned on me not only that someone had been in the next cubicle the whole time, but that the sound insulation between the cubicles was virtually non-existent, and that I had remained unaware of the person until this point only because - for whatever reason - he had remained very still.

Furious, I rose again and pulled at the door, causing the latch to come loose again and the towel to fall to the ground. As I squeezed my way out, the man in the next cubicle, perhaps seeing no further reason to restrain himself, cleared his throat noisily. I hurried out of the room feeling thoroughly disgusted.

I was a little surprised to find Hoffman waiting for me in the corridor, but then remembered that he had indeed promised to do so. He was standing with his back to the wall, but as soon as I emerged straightened himself and stood to attention.

‘Now, Mr Ryder,’ he said smiling, ‘if you’d follow me. The ladies and gentlemen are very eager to meet you.’

I looked at him coldly. ‘What ladies and gentlemen, Mr Hoffman?’

‘Why, the members of the committee, Mr Ryder. Of the Citizens’ Mutual Support Group ...’

‘Look, Mr Hoffman ...’ I was very angry, but the delicacy of what I had to explain caused me to pause. Hoffman, at last noticing that something was troubling me, stopped in the middle of the corridor and gazed at me with concern.

‘Look, Mr Hoffman. I’m very sorry about this meeting. But it is imperative I get to practise. I cannot do anything else until I’ve first been allowed to practise.’

Hoffman appeared genuinely puzzled. 'I'm sorry, sir,' he said, his voice lowered discreetly. 'But you didn't practise just now?'

'I did not. I was ... I was unable to.'

'You were unable? Mr Ryder, is everything in order? I mean, you're not feeling unwell?'

'I'm perfectly well. Look' - I gave a sigh - 'if you must know, I was unable to practise in there because ... well, frankly, sir, the conditions do not provide the necessary level of privacy. No, sir, let me speak. The level of privacy is inadequate. It might be fine for some people, but for me ... Well, I'll tell you, Mr Hoffman, I'll tell you quite frankly. It's been the same since I was a child. I've never been able to practise unless I had complete, utter privacy.'

'Is that so, sir?' Hoffman was nodding gravely. 'I see, I see.'

'Well, I hope you do see. The conditions in there' - I shook my head - 'they are nowhere near adequate. Now the point is, I must, must, have satisfactory practice facilities ...'

'Yes, yes, of course.' He nodded sympathetically. 'I think, sir, I have the solution. The practice room in the annexe will give you absolute privacy. The piano is excellent, and as for the privacy, I can guarantee it, sir. It is very, very private.'

'Very well. That sounds like the answer. The annexe, you say.'

'Yes, sir. I'll take you there myself as soon as you've finished your meeting with the Citizens' Mutual Support ...'

'Look, Mr Hoffman!' I suddenly shouted, only just resisting the urge to grab his lapel. 'Listen to me! I do not care about this group of citizens! I do not care how long they are kept waiting! The fact is, if I am not able to practise, I will pack up and leave this city immediately, in the next hour! That's right, Mr Hoffman. There will be no lecture, no performance, nothing! You understand me, Mr Hoffman? You understand me?'

Hoffman stared at me, the colour draining from his face. 'Yes, yes,' he muttered. 'Yes, of course, Mr Ryder.'

'So I must ask you' - I managed to control my voice a little - 'please. Kindly lead me to this annexe without further delay.'

'Very well, Mr Ryder.' He laughed oddly. 'I understand perfectly. After all, these are just ordinary citizens. What need is there for someone such as yourself ...' Then he collected himself and said firmly: 'This way, Mr Ryder, if you'd care to follow me.'

We walked a little way further along the corridor, then crossed a large laundry room containing several growling machines. Hoffman then ushered me through a narrow exit and I stepped out to find the double doors of the drawing room facing me.

‘We’ll take a short cut through here,’ Hoffman said.

As soon as we entered the drawing room, I understood better his earlier reluctance to clear the room for me. It was packed to overflowing with people, laughing and talking, some of them dressed very flamboyantly, and my first thought was that we had stumbled into a private party. But as we slowly made our way through the crowd, I could make out several distinct groups. Some exuberant locals were occupying one section of the room. Another group appeared to be comprised of rich young Americans - many of whom were singing in unison some college anthem; while in yet another area a group of Japanese men had drawn several tables together and were also carrying on boisterously. Curiously, though these groups were clearly separate, there appeared to be much interaction between them. All around me, people were wandering from table to table, slapping one another on the back, taking photographs of each other and passing plates of sandwiches back and forth. A harassed-looking waiter in a white uniform was going among them with a coffee jug in each hand. I thought to look for the piano, but found myself too busy squeezing past people in an effort to keep up with Hoffman. Eventually I reached the other side of the drawing room where Hoffman was holding open another door for me.

I went through into a passageway, one end of which was open to the outdoors. The next moment I stepped out into a small sunny car park, which I quickly recognised as the one

Hoffman had led me to the night we had driven to Brodsky's banquet. Hoffman ushered me towards a large black car, and a few minutes later we were moving slowly through the lunch-time congestion.

'The traffic in this town,' Hoffman sighed. 'Mr Ryder, would you like the air-conditioning? Are you sure? My goodness, look at this traffic. Thankfully we won't have to put up with it for long. We'll take the south road.'

Sure enough, at the next traffic lights Hoffman turned down a road on which the vehicles were moving much more smoothly, and in no time we were travelling at a good speed across open countryside.

'Ah yes, this is the wonderful thing about our town,' Hoffman said. 'No need to drive far before you find yourself in pleasant surroundings. You see, the air is improving already.'

I said something in agreement and fell silent, not wishing to be drawn into conversation at this point. For one thing I had begun to have misgivings about my earlier decision to perform Asbestos and Fibre. The more I thought about it, the more some recollection seemed to come back to me of my mother once expressing her irritation specifically with this composition. I considered for a moment the possibility of something altogether different, something like Kazan's Wind Tunnels, but then remembered the piece would take two and a quarter hours to perform. There was no doubting that the short, intense Asbestos and Fibre was the obvious choice. Nothing else of that length would provide quite the same opportunity to demonstrate such a wide range of moods. And certainly, on the surface at least, it was a piece one could expect my mother very much to appreciate. And yet there was still something - admittedly nothing more than the shadow of a recollection - that prevented me from feeling at ease with the choice.

Apart from a lorry far up ahead in the distance, we appeared now to be alone on the road. I watched the farmland going by on either side of us and tried again to recall this elusive fragment of memory.

‘We won’t be long now, Mr Ryder,’ Hoffman said beside me. ‘I’m sure you’ll find the practice room in the annexe much more to your liking. It’s very tranquil, an ideal place to practise for an hour or two. Very soon now, you’ll be lost in your music. How I envy you, sir! You’ll soon be browsing among your musical ideas. Just as if you were wandering through some magnificent gallery where by some miracle you’d been told you could pick up a shopping basket and take home whatever you fancied. Forgive me’ - he gave a laugh -

‘but I’ve always entertained just such a fantasy. My wife and I, walking together through some wonderful gallery full of the most beautiful objects. Apart from ourselves, the place is deserted. Not even an attendant. And yes, there is a shopping basket on my arm, we have been told we can take whatever we wish. There would be certain rules, naturally. We could not take more than could be held in the basket. And of course, we would not be permitted to sell anything later on - not that we would dream of abusing such a sublime opportunity in that way. So there we would be, my wife and I, walking together through this heavenly hall. This gallery, it would be part of some large country mansion somewhere, perhaps overlooking vast areas of land. The balcony would have a spectacular view. And great statues of lions at each corner. My wife and I, we would stand there gazing over the scenery, discussing which items we should take. In this fantasy, for some reason, there is always a storm about to break. The sky is a slate grey, and yet somehow the shadows are all as though the brightest summer sun were shining on us. Creepers, ivy, all over the terrace. And just my wife and I, our supermarket basket still empty, discussing our choice.’ He laughed suddenly. ‘Forgive me, Mr Ryder, I’m being indulgent. It’s just that this is how I imagine it must be for someone like yourself, someone of your genius, left at a piano for an hour or so in tranquil surroundings. That this is how it must be for the inspired. You will wander amidst your sublime musical ideas. You will examine this one, shake your head, put it back. Beautiful as it is, it isn't quite what you were looking for. Ha! How beautiful it must be inside your head, Mr Ryder! How I would love to be able to accompany you on the journey you will embark on the moment your fingers touch the keys. But of course, you will go where I can't possibly follow. How I envy you, sir! '

I muttered something nondescript and we travelled on in silence for a while. Then Hoffman said:

'My wife, in the early days before we married. I think that's how she saw our life together. Something like that, Mr Ryder. That we would enter arm in arm some beautiful deserted museum with our shopping basket. Though of course she would never have seen it in quite such fanciful terms. You see, my wife comes from a long line of talented people. Her mother was a very fine painter. Her grandfather one of the greatest poets in the Flemish language of his generation. For some unaccountable reason, he was neglected, but that alters nothing. Oh, there are others in the family, very talented, all of them. Being brought up in a family like that, she always took beauty and talent for granted. How could it have been otherwise? I tell you, sir, it led to certain misunderstandings. In fact it led to a very large misunderstanding early in our relationship.'

He fell silent again and for a while stared at the road unwinding before us.

'It was music that first brought us together,' he said eventually. 'We would sit in the cafés in Herrengasse and talk about music. Or rather, I talked. I suppose I talked and talked. I remember once walking through the Volksgarten with her and describing in great detail, perhaps for a full hour, my feelings about Mullery's Ventilations. Of course, we were young, we had time to indulge ourselves in such things. Even in those days, she didn't talk so much, but she listened to what I had to say and I could see she was deeply moved. Oh yes. Incidentally, Mr Ryder, I say we were young, but then I suppose neither of us were as young as all that. We were both the sort of age when we might already have been married for some time. Perhaps she was feeling some sense of urgency, who knows? In any case we talked of getting married, I was so in love with her, Mr Ryder, from the first I was very much in love with her. And she was so beautiful then. Even now, if you saw her, you'd see how very beautiful she must have been then. But beautiful in a special sort of way. You could see immediately she had a sensitivity to the finer things. I don't mind admitting to you, I was very much in love with her. I can't tell you what it meant to me when she agreed to marry me. I thought my life would be a joy, a continuous unbroken joy. But then it was just a few days later, a few days after she agreed to marry me, she came to visit me in my room for the first time. I was at that time working at the Hotel Burgenhof, and I was renting a room nearby in Glockenstrasse, beside the canal. Not exactly desirable, but a perfectly fine room. There were good bookshelves on one wall and an oak desk at the window. And as I say, it looked over the canal. It was the winter, a splendid sunny winter's morning, there was a beautiful light coming into the room. Of course, I had tidied everything, made it just so. She came in and looked around, she looked all around. Then she asked quietly: "But where do you compose your music?" I remember that very well, that actual instant, Mr Ryder, I remember it very vividly. I see it as a sort of turning point in my life. I don't exaggerate, sir. In many ways, I see it now, my present life started from that moment. Christine, standing by the window, that January light, her hand on the desk, just a few fingers as though to steady herself. She looked very beautiful. And she asked me that question with genuine surprise. You see, sir, she was puzzled. "But where do you compose your music? There's no piano." I didn't know what to say. I saw in an instant there had been a misunderstanding, a misunderstanding of catastrophically cruel proportions. Can you blame me, sir, if I felt the temptation to save myself? I wouldn't have told an out and out lie. Oh no, not even to save myself. But it was a very difficult moment. I think of it now and I feel a shudder go through me, even now as I tell you this. "But where do you compose your music?" "No, there's no piano," I said cheerfully. "There's nothing. No manuscript paper, nothing. I've decided not to compose again for two years." That's what I said to her. I was very quick, I said it with no outward sign of distress or hesitation. I even gave a specific date on which I planned to return to my composing. But for the time being, no, I wasn't composing. What could I say, sir? Did you expect me to look at this woman, this woman I loved desperately, who had only a few days earlier agreed to marry me, did you expect me to take it lying down? To say to her: "Oh dear, it's all been a misunderstanding. Naturally I release you from any obligation. Please, let's part herewith ..." Of course I could not, sir. You might think I was dishonest. That's too harsh. In any case, you see, at that point in my life what I said wasn't entirely a lie. As it happened, I had every intention of taking up an instrument one day, and yes, I wished to try my hand at composition. So it wasn't a complete lie. I was disingenuous, yes, I admit it. But what else could I do? I couldn't let her go. So I told her I had made a decision to stop composing for two calendar years. In order to clear my head and my emotions, some such thing, I remember talking about it for some time. And she listened to me, taking it all in, nodding her beautiful, intelligent head in sympathy to this nonsense I was telling her. But what could I do, sir? And you know, after that morning, she never mentioned my composing again, never in all these years. Incidentally, Mr Ryder, I can see you're about to ask, I will tell you, I will assure you. I had never before that morning, never at any time during our courtship, during all our walks along the canal, the times we met for coffee in the cafés on Herrengasse, I never, never, intentionally led her to believe

I composed music. That I was perpetually in love with music, that it fuelled my spirit every day, that I heard it in my heart each morning I awoke, yes, these things I implied and they were true. But I never deliberately misled her, sir. Oh no, never. It was simply a terrible misunderstanding. She, coming from the family that she comes from, inevitably she assumed ... Who knows, sir? But until that morning in my room, I had never uttered a single word to imply such a thing. Well, as I say, Mr Ryder, she never mentioned the matter again, not once. We married in due course, bought a small apartment over Friedrich Square, I found a good position at the Ambassadors. We began our life together and for a time we were reasonably happy. Of course, I never forgot about ... about the misunderstanding. But it didn't worry me as much as you might suppose. You see, as I said before, in those days, well, I had every intention, when the time came, when there was an opportunity, to take up my instrument. Perhaps the violin. I had certain plans then, such as you do when you are young, when you don't realise how limited time is, when you don't realise there's a shell built around you, a hard shell so you can't - get - out!' Suddenly he took both hands off the steering wheel and pushed upwards against an invisible dome around him. The gesture contained more weariness than anger, and the next second he let his hands fall back onto the wheel again. He went on with a sigh: 'No, I didn't know about such things then. I still hoped I would become in time the sort of person she believed me to be. Indeed, sir, I believed I would succeed in becoming such a person precisely because of her presence, because of her influence. And the first year of our marriage, Mr Ryder, as I say, we were reasonably happy. We bought that apartment, it was perfectly adequate. There were days when I thought she'd realised about the misunderstanding and that she didn't mind. I don't know, every sort of thought ran through my mind in those days. Then in time, naturally, the date I'd mentioned, the two-year point when I was to return to composing, it came and went. I watched her carefully, but she said nothing about it. She was quiet, that was true, but she was always quiet. She said nothing, did nothing unusual. But I suppose it was from around that time, around the time of the two-year mark, the tension came into our lives. It was a sort of low-lying tension, it seemed always to be there, however happily we might spend an evening, it would still be there. I would arrange little surprise outings to her favourite restaurant. Or bring home flowers or her favourite perfumes. Yes, I worked diligently to delight her. But there was always this tension. For a lot of the time I managed not to notice it. I told myself I was imagining it. I suppose I didn't wish to admit it was there and growing by the day. I only knew for sure it had been there the day it went away. Yes, it went away and then I realised what it had been. It was one afternoon, we'd been married three years by then, I came in from work, I'd brought her a little present, a book of poetry I happened to know she was wanting. She hadn't explicitly said so, but I had guessed it. I came into the apartment and found her looking down at the square. You could see all the people returning from work at that time of the afternoon. It was a noisy apartment, but not so bad when one is relatively young. I handed her the volume. "Just a small gift," I said to her. She continued to look out of the window. She was kneeling up on the sofa, her arms resting on the back of it so she could cradle her head as she gazed out. Then she took the book from me, very wearily, and without saying a word went on looking down at the square. I remained standing in the middle of the room waiting for her to say something, to acknowledge my gift. Perhaps she wasn't well. I stood waiting with some concern. Then finally she turned round and looked at me. Not unkindly, oh no, but she looked at me, it was a particular look. The look of someone confirming with her eyes what she had been thinking. Yes, that's what it was, and I knew then she had finally seen through me. And that was when I realised, realised what the tension had been. I had been waiting, all that time, I had been waiting for this moment. And you know, it may seem odd, but it was a huge relief. At last, at last, she had seen through me. Oh, what a relief! I felt so liberated. I actually exclaimed: "Ha!" and smiled. She must have thought it odd and the next second I pulled myself together. I realised immediately - oh yes, my feeling of liberation was all too brief - I realised immediately what new dragons I had to wrestle and in a moment I was all caution. I saw I would have to work doubly, triply hard if I were to keep her. But you see, I still thought then that if I worked at it, even though she had realised, if I worked very hard at it, I could yet win her. What a fool I was! Do you know, for several years after that day, I continued to believe it, I actually believed I was succeeding? Oh, I attended very carefully. I did all in my power to please her. And I never grew complacent. I realised that her tastes, her preferences, were bound to change with time and so I watched every nuance, ready to anticipate any change. Oh yes, even though I say so myself, Mr Ryder, for those few years, I performed my role as her husband quite magnificently. If a composer she had liked for years was beginning to please her less, I would pick it up instantly, almost before she had articulated the change to herself. The next time the composer was mentioned, I would say quickly, even as she was hesitantly thinking of expressing her doubt, I would say quickly: "Of course, he's not what he was. Please, we won't bother to go to the concert tonight. You'll find it tiresome." And I would be rewarded by the unmistakable look of relief on her face. Oh yes, I was extremely attentive, and as I say, sir, I believed it. I fooled myself, I loved her so, I fooled myself into believing I was slowly winning her. For just a few years, I actually felt confident. And then it all changed, all changed in one evening. I saw how inevitable it all was, how all my great efforts could only add up to nothing. I saw it all in one evening, sir. We'd been invited to Mr Fischer's house, he'd organised a little reception for Jan Piotrowski following his concert here. We were just starting to get invited to such things then, I was beginning to earn a certain respect here for my keen appreciation of the arts. Well, in any case, there we were at Mr Fischer's house, in his fine drawing room. Not a large gathering, forty at the most, it was a very relaxed sort of evening. I don't know if you ever met Piotrowski, sir. He turned out to be a very pleasant man indeed, most skilled at putting everyone at their ease. The conversation flowed very easily, we were all enjoying ourselves. Then at one point I went over to the table where there was a buffet, and I was helping myself to a few things when I realised Mr Piotrowski was standing there right next to me. I was still quite young then, I hadn't so much experience of celebrities, and I admit, yes, I was a little nervous. But then Mr Piotrowski smiled pleasantly, asked me if I was enjoying the evening, very quickly put me at my ease. And then he said: "I was just speaking to your most charming wife. She was telling me about her great love of Baudelaire. I had to confess to her I didn't know Baudelaire's work in any depth. She very correctly reprimanded me for this deplorable state of affairs. Oh, she made me thoroughly ashamed. I mean to put it right without delay. Your wife's love for the poet is absolutely infectious!" To which I nodded and said: "Yes, of course. She's always loved Baudelaire." "And with such passion," Piotrowski said. "She made me thoroughly ashamed." And that was all that took place, all that was said between us. But you see, Mr Ryder, my point is this. I had never known of her love of Baudelaire! Never even suspected it! You see what I am saying. She had never revealed this passion to me! And when Piotrowski said this to me, something fell into place. All of a sudden I saw clearly something I'd been trying not to see over the years. I mean, that she had always hidden certain parts of herself from me. Preserving them, as though contact with my coarseness would damage them. As I say, sir, I had perhaps always suspected it. That there was a whole side to herself she was preserving from me. And who could blame her? A woman of great sensitivity, brought up in a household such as hers. She had not hesitated to tell

Piotrowski, but at no point during our years together had she once hinted of this love of Baudelaire. For the next several minutes I wandered about the reception hardly knowing what I was saying to people, just mouthing pleasantries, in a turmoil inside. Then I looked across the room, it must have been half an hour after the conversation with Piotrowski, I looked across the room and I saw her, my wife, laughing happily on the sofa beside Piotrowski. There was nothing flirtatious, you understand. Oh no, my wife has always been meticulous where propriety is concerned. But she was laughing with an ease I realised I had not seen since our walks together along the canal in the days before we were married. That's to say, before she realised. It was a long sofa and there were two others sitting on it, and some people were also sitting on the floor in order to be near Piotrowski. But Piotrowski had just spoken to my wife and she was laughing happily. But it was not just this laugh, Mr Ryder, that spoke volumes to me. As I watched, I was standing on the other side of the room, as I watched, what happened next was this. Piotrowski until that point had been sitting on the edge of the sofa, his hands clasped around his knee, like so! As he laughed and made some remark to my wife, he began to recline, yes, as though he wished simply to sit back in the sofa. And as he began to recline, very swiftly, very deftly, my wife took a cushion from behind her and placed it for Piotrowski, so that by the time his head touched the back of the sofa, the cushion was there. It was done so swiftly, almost without thinking, a very graceful movement, Mr Ryder. And when I saw it, I felt my heart breaking. It was a movement so full of natural respect, a desire to be solicitous, to please in a small way. That little action, it revealed a whole realm of her heart she kept tightly closed to me. And I realised at that moment how deluded I had been. I realised then what I have known and never doubted since. I mean, sir, I realised she would leave me. Sooner or later. It was just a matter of time. Ever since that evening, I've known it.'

He fell silent and seemed once more to become lost in his thoughts. There was now farmland to either side of the road and I could see tractors moving slowly in the distance across the fields. I said to him:

‘Excuse me, but this particular evening you talk of. How long ago was it?’

‘How long ago?’ Hoffman seemed slightly affronted by the question. ‘Oh ... I suppose it was, well, Piotrowski’s concert here, that must have been twenty-two years ago.’

‘Twenty-two years,’ I said. ‘I take it your wife has remained with you all that time?’

Hoffman turned to me angrily. ‘What are you implying, sir? That I don’t know the state of affairs in my own home? That I don’t understand my own wife? Here I am confiding in you, sharing with you these intimate thoughts, and you care to lecture me about these matters as though you know far better than I ...’

‘I apologise, Mr Hoffman, if I appeared to be intruding. I simply wished to point out ...’

‘Point out nothing, sir! You know nothing of all this! The fact is, my situation is desperate and has been now for some time. I saw it that evening at Mr Fischer’s, as clear as daylight, as clear as I see this road before me now. Very well, it hasn’t happened yet, but that’s only because ... only because I’ve made efforts. Yes, sir, and what efforts I’ve made! Perhaps you would laugh at me. If I know it’s a lost cause, why do I torture myself? Why do I cling to her like this? It’s very easy for you to ask such a thing. But I love her deeply, sir, more today than ever. It’s unthinkable for me, I could never watch her leave, everything would become meaningless. Very well, I know it’s pointless, that sooner or later she’ll leave me for someone like Piotrowski, someone like that, someone like the man she thought I was before she realised. But you can’t scoff at a man for clinging on. I've done my very best, sir, I've done my best in the only way open to someone like me. I've worked hard, I've organised events, sat on committees, and I've succeeded over the years in becoming a figure of some stature among the artistic and musical circles of this city. And then of course, there was always the one hope. There was the one hope, which perhaps explains how I've managed to keep her so long. That hope is now dead, has been dead for a good few years already, but you see, for a while, there was this one, single hope. I refer, of course, to our son, Stephan. If he'd been different, if he'd been blessed with at least some of the gifts her side of the family possess in such abundance! For a few years, we both hoped. In our separate ways, we both watched Stephan and hoped. We sent him to piano lessons, we watched him carefully, we hoped against hope. We strained to hear some spark that was never there, oh, we listened so hard, each for our different reasons, we wanted so much to hear something, but it was never there ...'

'Excuse me, Mr Hoffman. You say this about Stephan, but I can assure you ...'

'For years I fooled myself! I said, well, perhaps he will develop late. There's something there, some little seed. Oh, I fooled myself and I dare say my wife did too. We waited and waited, then in the last few years it became useless to pretend any more. Stephan is now twenty-three years of age. I can no longer tell myself he will suddenly blossom tomorrow or the next day. I've had to face it. He takes after me. And I know now, she realises it too. Of course, as a mother, she loves Stephan dearly. But far from being the means to my salvation, he has become the very opposite. Each time she looks at him, she sees the great mistake she made in marrying me ...'

'Mr Hoffman, really, I've had the pleasure of listening to Stephan's playing, and I have to say to you ...'

‘An embodiment, Mr Ryder! He’s become an embodiment of the great mistake she made in her life. Oh, if you’d met her family! When she was young she must always have assumed. She must have thought she’d one day have beautiful, talented children. Sensitive to beauty, like herself. And then she made her mistake! Of course, as a mother, she loves Stephan utterly. But that’s not to say she doesn’t look at him and see in him her mistake. He’s so like me, sir. I can’t deny it any longer. Not now he’s virtually a grown man ...’

‘Mr Hoffman, Stephan is a very gifted young man ...’

‘You don’t have to say such things, sir! Please don’t insult the frank intimacy into which I’ve taken you with such banal expressions of courtesy! I’m not a fool, I can see what Stephan is. For a while, he was my one hope, yes, but since then, since I saw it was useless, and if I am honest, I suppose I saw it at least six or seven years ago, I’ve tried - who can blame me? - I’ve tried to cling to her virtually one day at a time. I’ve said to her, look, wait at least until this next event I’m organising. Wait at least until that’s over, you might see me differently then. And when that event has come and gone, I’ll say to her immediately, no, wait, here’s something else, another magnificent event, I’m working at it. Please wait for that. That’s how I’ve worked it, sir. For the last six or seven years. Tonight, I know, is my last chance. I’ve staked everything on it. When I told her last year, when I first told her of my plans for this evening, when I outlined to her all the details, how the tables would be, the programme for the evening, even - you’ll forgive me - I had foreseen that you, or someone else of almost comparable stature, would accept the invitation and form the centrepiece of the evening, yes, when I first explained it all to her, explained how because of me, this mediocrity she has been chained to for so long, how because of me, Mr Brodsky would win the hearts and confidence of the citizens of this town, and on the crest of this great evening, turn the whole tide here - ha ha! - I tell you, sir, she looked at me as though to say: "Here we go again." But I could see in her eyes a flicker. Something that said: "Perhaps you really will bring it off. That would be something." Yes, just a flicker, but it's just such flickers that have kept me going for this long, sir. Ah, here we are, Mr Ryder,'

We had pulled into a lay-by beside a field of tall grass.

'Mr Ryder,' Hoffman said. 'The fact is, I'm running a little late. I wonder if I could be so discourteous as to ask you to make your own way up to the annexe.'

Following his gaze, I saw that the field rose steeply up a hill and that perched at the very top was a small wooden hut. Hoffman rummaged about in the glove compartment and produced a key.

'You'll find a padlock on the door of the hut. The facilities are not luxurious, but then you'll have privacy, just as you requested. And the piano is an excellent example of the sort of uprights Bechstein produced in the twenties.'

I looked up at the hill again, then said: 'That hut up there?'

'I shall return for you, Mr Ryder, in two hours' time. Unless you would require a car sooner?'

'Two hours would be fine.'

'Well then, sir, I hope you find everything to your satisfaction.' Hoffman waved his hand towards the hut as though politely ushering me, but there was a trace of impatience in the gesture. I thanked him and got out of the car.

I pulled open a barred gate and followed a footpath that climbed up to the little wooden hut. The field was at first disconcertingly muddy, but as I climbed higher the ground grew firmer. Half-way up, I glanced over my shoulder and found I could see the long road curving through the farm fields, and the roof of what might well have been Hoffman's car going off into the distance.

I was a little out of breath by the time I reached the hut and unlocked the rusted padlock on the door. From the outside, the hut looked no different to an ordinary garden shed, but I was nevertheless taken aback to find it entirely undecorated inside. The walls and the floor were just rough boards, some of which had warped. I could see insects moving along the cracks in between them, while above me the remains of old cobwebs dangled from the rafters. An upright piano of somewhat grubby appearance took up most of the space, and when I pulled out the stool and sat down, I found my back virtually touching the wall behind me.

This same wall contained the only window in the hut, and by twisting round on my stool and craning my neck I found I had a view of the field outside descending steeply down to the road. The floor of the hut did not seem entirely level, and once I turned to face the piano again I had the uneasy feeling I was about to slide backwards down the hill. However, when I opened the piano and played a few phrases, I found it had a perfectly fine tone, the bass notes in particular having a pleasing richness to them. The action was not too light and the instrument had been very adequately tuned. It occurred to me the rough timber around me might even have been carefully chosen to provide the optimum level of absorption and reflection. Aside from a slight creaking each time I pressed the sustaining pedal, the facilities left me with little to complain of.

After a short moment to collect my thoughts I went into the vertiginous opening of Asbestos and Fibre. Then as the first movement settled into its more reflective phase, I became increasingly relaxed, so much so that I found myself playing most of the first movement with my eyes closed.

As I began the second movement, I opened my eyes again and found the afternoon sunshine streaming through the window behind me, throwing my shadow sharply across the keyboard. Even the demands of the second movement, however, did nothing to alter my calm. Indeed, I realised I was in absolute control of every dimension of the composition. I recalled how worried I had allowed myself to become over the course of the day and now felt utterly foolish for having done so. Moreover, now I was in the midst of the piece, it seemed inconceivable that my mother would not be moved by it. The simple fact was, I had no reason whatsoever to feel anything other than utter confidence concerning the evening's performance.

It was as I was entering the sublime melancholy of the third movement that I became aware of a noise in the background. At first I thought it was connected with the soft pedal, and then that it was something to do with the floor. It was a faint, rhythmic noise that would stop and start, and for some time I tried not to pay any attention to it. But it continued to return, and then, during the pianissimo passages mid-way through the movement, I realised that someone was digging outside not far away.

The discovery that the sound had nothing to do with me enabled me to ignore it all the more easily and I continued with the third movement, enjoying the ease with which the tangled knots of emotion rose languidly to the surface and separated. I closed my eyes again, and before long began to picture the faces of my parents, sitting side by side, listening with looks of solemn concentration. Oddly I did not picture them sitting in a concert hall - as I knew I would see them later in the evening - but in the living room of a neighbour in Worcestershire, a certain Mrs Clarkson, a widow with whom my mother had for a time been friendly. Possibly it was the tall grass outside the hut that had reminded me of Mrs Clarkson's. Her cottage, like ours, had been in the middle of a small field and naturally enough, being on her own, she had been unable to keep the grass under any sort of control. The inside of her house, by contrast, had been impeccably tidy. There had been a piano in one corner of her living room, which I could not remember ever having seen with the lid raised. For all I knew, it might well have been out of tune or broken. But a particular memory came back to me, of sitting quietly in that room, my cup of tea on my knee, listening to my parents chatting to Mrs Clarkson about music. Perhaps my father had just asked if she ever played her piano, for certainly, music had not been a regular topic with Mrs Clarkson. In any case, for no real logical reason, as I continued with the third movement of Asbestos and Fibre there in the wooden hut, I allowed myself the satisfaction of pretending I was back in that room in Mrs Clarkson's cottage, my father, my mother, Mrs Clarkson listening with serious expressions while I played the piano in the corner, the lace curtain threatening to blow across my face in the summer breeze.

As I approached the latter stages of the third movement I became conscious again of the digging noise. I was not sure whether it had ceased for a while then started up again or if it had been going on all the time, but in any case it now seemed much more conspicuous than before. The thought then suddenly occurred to me that the noise was being made by none other than Brodsky in the process of burying his dog. Indeed, I recollected his having declared on more than one occasion this morning his intention to bury his dog later in the day, and I even had a vague memory of having agreed to some arrangement whereby I played the piano while he performed the burial ceremony.

I now began to picture something of what must have taken place prior to my arrival at the hut. Brodsky, presumably, had arrived some time earlier and had been waiting at a spot just over the peak of the hill, a stone's throw from the wooden hut, where there was a cluster of trees and a slight dip in the ground. He had stood at the spot quietly, having placed his spade against a tree trunk, and nearby on the ground, concealed almost entirely by the surrounding grass, the body of his dog wrapped in a bed sheet. As he had said to me this morning, he had planned a simple ceremony for which my piano accompaniment was to be the sole embellishment, and understandably he had not wished to commence proceedings until my arrival. He had thus waited, perhaps for as long as an hour, gazing at the sky and the view from the hill.

At first, naturally enough, Brodsky would have turned over memories of his late companion. But as the minutes had ticked by and there had continued to be no sign of me, his thoughts had turned to Miss Collins and their forthcoming rendez-vous at the cemetery. Before long, Brodsky had found himself remembering again a particular spring morning of many years ago, when he had carried two wicker chairs out into the field behind their cottage. That had been no more than a fortnight after their arrival in the city, and despite their depleted funds Miss Collins had been going about furnishing their new home with considerable energy. On that spring morning she had come down to breakfast and expressed a desire to take a short rest sitting in the fresh air and sunshine.

Thinking back to that morning, he had found he could recall vividly the wet yellow grass and the morning sun overhead as he had positioned the chairs side by side. She had emerged a little later and they had sat together for a time, exchanging the occasional relaxed remark. For a small moment that morning, there had been for the first time in months a feeling that the future might hold something for them after all. Brodsky had been on the verge of articulating such a thought but then, remembering that it touched on the delicate topic of his recent failures, had changed his mind.

Then she had made her statement about the kitchen. Since he would not remove the sheets of hardboard from it, despite his having promised to do so for days, her progress there was hopelessly impeded. He had remained silent for a while, then had responded by saying, quite calmly, that he had much work waiting for him in the workshed. As they were unable to sit together even for a few minutes without becoming unpleasant, he might as well be making a start. And he had got up and walked through the cottage to the small shed in the front yard. Neither of them had raised their voices at any point and the entire altercation had lasted no more a few seconds. He had not attached much significance to it at the time and had soon become absorbed in his carpentry projects. On a few occasions during the course of the morning, he had looked up and seen her through the dusty shed window, wandering aimlessly about the front yard. He had gone on working, half expecting her to appear in the doorway, but each time she had gone back inside. He had come in for lunch - admittedly rather late - to discover she had already finished hers and disappeared upstairs. He had waited for a while then, returning to his shed, had gone on working there all through the afternoon. In time he had found himself watching the darkness falling and the lights coming on in the cottage. Close to midnight he had finally gone inside.

The whole of the downstairs of the cottage had been in darkness. In the living room, he had sat down on a wooden chair and, gazing at the moonlight falling over their ramshackle furniture, had thought over the curious way the day had gone. He had not been able to remember when they had ever spent an entire day in the way they had just done and, resolving to end things on a better note, had got to his feet and made his way up the staircase.

On reaching the landing, he had seen the light was still on in their bedroom. As he had made his way towards it, the floorboards had creaked loudly under him, announcing his approach as clearly as if he had called out to her. Arriving in front of their door he had paused and, looking down at the bar of light beneath it, had tried to collect himself a little. Then, just as he was reaching for the handle, from the other side of the door had come her cough. It had only been a small cough, almost certainly involuntary, and yet something about it had made him stop, then slowly retract his hand. Somewhere in that small sound had been a reminder of a dimension of her personality he had managed of late to keep shut out of his mind; a trait he had in happier times much admired, but which - he had suddenly realised it - he had been trying to ignore with increasing determination ever since the débâcle from which they had recently fled. Somehow, the cough had contained in it all her perfectionism, her high-mind-edness, that part of her that would always ask of herself if she was applying her energies in the most useful way possible. He had suddenly felt enormous irritation at her, for the cough, for the whole way the day had gone, and had turned and walked away, not caring how loudly the boards creaked under him. Then, back in the mottled darkness of the living room, he had lain down across the old sofa under an overcoat and fallen asleep.

The next morning he had woken early and prepared breakfast for them both. She had come down at her usual time and they had greeted each other not unpleasantly. He had started to express his regret about what had happened, but she had stopped him, saying they had both been astonishingly childish. They had then continued their breakfast, both clearly relieved the dispute was behind them. And yet for the rest of that day, for several of the days that had followed, something cold had remained in their lives. And when in the months to come, after the periods of silence between them had grown in both duration and frequency, and he had paused to puzzle over their origins, he had found himself returning to that spring day, to the morning that had started so promisingly for them sitting side by side in the wet grass.

It was while he had been lost in such memories that I had finally arrived at the hut and begun to play. For the first several bars, Brodsky had gone on staring emptily into the distance. Then, with a sigh, he had brought his mind back to the task in hand and had picked up his spade. He had tested the ground with its edge, but then had gone no further, perhaps deciding the mood of the music was not yet what he required. Only when I had started upon the slow melancholy of the third movement had Brodsky commenced his digging. The ground was soft and had given him little trouble. He had then dragged the body of the dog across the tall grass and into the grave with little fuss, not feeling the temptation even to turn back the bed sheet for a last look. He had actually started to shovel some earth back when something, perhaps the sadness of the music drifting through the air to him, had finally made him pause. Then, straightening, he had allowed himself a few quiet moments looking down at the half-filled grave. Only as I had approached the end of the third movement had Brodsky retrieved his spade and recommenced his shovelling.

As I concluded the third movement, I could hear Brodsky still hard at work and decided I would forget the final movement - it was hardly suitable for the proceedings - and simply recommence the third once more. This, I felt, was the least I could do for Brodsky after having kept him waiting. The shovelling went on for a little longer, then came to a stop with almost half of the movement left to play. This would suit Brodsky well enough, I supposed, giving him a little more time to stand over the grave with his thoughts, and I found myself lending a greater emphasis to the elegiac nuances than I had previously.

When I had come once more to the end of the movement, I remained sitting quietly at the piano for several minutes before rising to stretch my limbs in the confined space. The afternoon sunshine was now filling the hut, and I could hear crickets in the grass nearby. After a little while, it occurred to me I should go out and say at least a few words to Brodsky.

When I pushed open the door and looked out, I was surprised to see how low the sun had sunk over the road below. A few steps through the grass brought me to the footpath again and I climbed the remaining distance to the peak of the hill. I was then able to see how on the other side the ground descended more gradually down into a pleasant valley. Brodsky was standing over the grave under a cluster of thin trees a short way below me.

He did not turn as I came down to him, but he said quietly, not taking his eyes from the grave: 'Mr Ryder, thank you. That was very beautiful. I'm grateful, very grateful.'

I muttered something and stopped in the grass a respectful distance from the grave. Brodsky went on looking downwards for a while, then said:

'Just an old animal. But I wanted the best music. I'm very grateful.'

'Not at all, Mr Brodsky. It's my pleasure.'

He gave a sigh and glanced towards me for the first time. 'You know, I can't cry for Bruno. I tried, but I can't cry. My mind, it's full of the future. And sometimes, full of the past. I think, you know, of our old life. Let's go now, Mr Ryder. Let's leave Bruno here.' He turned and started to walk slowly down towards the valley. 'Let's leave now. Goodbye, Bruno, goodbye. You were a good friend, but just a dog. Let's leave him, Mr Ryder. Come, walk with me. Let's leave him. It was good you played for him. The very best music. But I can't cry now. She'll be coming soon. It won't be long now. Please, let's walk.'

I looked again down at the valley before us and now noticed it was entirely covered with gravestones. It occurred to me then that we were walking towards the very cemetery where Brodsky had arranged to meet Miss Collins. Indeed, as I fell in step alongside him, I heard Brodsky say:

‘Per Gustavsson’s tomb. We’re meeting there. No special reason. She said she knew the grave, that’s all. I’ll wait there, I don’t mind waiting a little.’

We had been walking through the rough grass, but now we came to a footpath, and as we made our way further down the hillside I found I could make out the cemetery more and more clearly. It was a tranquil, secluded setting. The gravestones were set out in orderly rows across the bed of the valley, with some making their way up the grass slopes on either side. Even at this moment, I noticed, a burial was taking place; I could make out the dark figures of the bereaved party, perhaps thirty people in all, gathered in the sunshine over to our left.

‘I do hope it goes well,’ I said. ‘I mean, of course, your meeting with Miss Collins.’

Brodsky shook his head. ‘This morning, I felt good. I thought if we only talked, things could come right again. But now, I don’t know. Maybe that man, your friend at her apartment this morning, maybe he’s right. Maybe she can never forgive me now. Maybe I went too far and she’ll never forgive me.’

‘I’m sure there’s no need to be so pessimistic,’ I said. ‘Whatever happened, it’s all in the past now. If the two of you could just ...’

‘All these years, Mr Ryder,’ he said. ‘Deep down. I never really accepted it, what they said about me back then. I never believed I was just this ... this nobody. Maybe with my head, yes, I accepted what they said. But in my heart, no, I never believed it. Not for a minute, in all these years. I could always hear it, I could hear the music. So I knew I was better, better than they said. And for a little while after we came here, she knew it too, I know she did. But then, well, she began to doubt it, who can blame her? I don't blame her for going away. No, I don't. But I do blame her, I do blame her for not having done better. Oh yes, she should have done better! I made her hate me, can you imagine what that cost me? I gave her her freedom and what does she do? Nothing. Not even leave this town, just waste her time. On these people, these weak, useless people she talks to all day. If I'd known that was all she would do! A painful thing, Mr Ryder, to push away someone you love. You think I'd have done it? You think I'd have turned myself into this creature if that was all she was going to do? These weak, unhappy people she talks to! Once she had the highest goals. She was going to do great things. That's how it was. And look, she wasted it all. Didn't even leave this town. Do you wonder that I shouted at her from time to time? If that's all she was going to do, why didn't she say so back then? Does she think it's a joke, a big joke, being a drunken beggar? People think, okay, he's drunk, he doesn't care about anything. That's not true. Sometimes everything gets clear, very clear, and then ... do you know how awful it is then, Mr Ryder? She never took it, the chance I gave her. Never even left the city. Just talk, talk, these weak people. I shouted at her, can you blame me? She deserved it, everything I said, every piece of filthy abuse, she deserved it ...'

'Mr Brodsky, please, please. This is hardly the way to prepare yourself for this most important encounter ...'

'Does she think I enjoyed it? That I did it for fun? I didn't have to do it. Look, you see, when I want to stop the drink, I can. Does she think I did it for a joke?'

'Mr Brodsky, I don't wish to intrude. But surely the time has come to put such thoughts away for ever. Surely all these differences, misunderstandings, it's time they were forgotten. You must try and make the best of what's left of your lives. Please, try and calm yourself. It won't do to meet with Miss Collins like this, you're sure to regret it later. In fact, Mr Brodsky, if I may say so, you've been quite correct so far in emphasising to her the future. Your idea of an animal is, in my view, a very good one. I really think you should continue to pursue that idea and others like it. There's really no reason to go over the past again. And of course there's every hope for the future now. For my part, I intend to do what I can tonight to see that you're accepted by the people of this city ...'

'Ah yes, Mr Ryder!' His mood seemed suddenly to change.

'Yes, yes, yes. Tonight, yes, tonight I intend ... I intend to be magnificent!'

'That's more the spirit, Mr Brodsky.'

'Tonight, I won't compromise, not at all. Yes, all right, they hounded me, I gave up, we ran away, came to this place. But in my heart I never gave up completely. I knew I'd never had a proper chance. And now, at last, tonight ... I've waited a long time, I won't compromise. This orchestra, they won't believe it, the way I'll stretch them. Mr Ryder, I'm grateful to you. You've been an inspiration. Until this morning I was afraid. Afraid of tonight, afraid what will happen. I'd better be careful, that's what I thought. Hoffman, all of them, go carefully, slowly, that's what they said. Take it slowly at the beginning, they said. Win them over little by little. But this morning, I saw your photograph. In the paper, the Sattler monument. I said that's it, that's it! All the way, take it all the way! Hold back nothing! This orchestra, they won't believe it! And these people, this city, they won't believe it either. Yes, take it all the way! She'll see it then. She'll see me again, she'll see who I really am, who I was all along! The Sattler monument, that's it!'

By this time the ground had levelled and we were walking along the grassy central path of the cemetery. I became aware of some movement behind us and, glancing over my shoulder, saw one of the mourners from the funeral running towards us, signalling with some urgency. As he came nearer, I saw he was a dark, thick-set man of around fifty.

‘Mr Ryder, this is a real honour,’ he said breathlessly as I turned to him. ‘I’m the brother of the widow. She’d be so delighted if you’d join us.’

Looking where he was indicating, I saw we were now quite close to the funeral. Indeed, I could even catch in the breeze the sounds of forlorn sobbing.

‘This way, please,’ the man said.

‘But surely, at such a private moment ...’

‘No, no, please. My sister, everyone, they’d be so honoured. Please, this way.’

Somewhat reluctantly I began to follow. The ground became more marshy as we made our way through the gravestones. I was unable at first to see the widow amidst the rows of dark hunched-over backs, but as we came up to the gathering I spotted her at the front, bowed over the unfilled grave. Her distress seemed so immense, she looked perfectly capable of throwing herself onto the coffin. Perhaps because of this possibility, an old white-haired gentleman was holding her tightly by the arm and shoulder. Behind her, the great majority were sobbing in what appeared to be genuine grief, but even so, the widow’s anguished moans remained clearly distinguishable - slow, exhausted, yet shockingly full-chested cries such as might emerge from a victim of prolonged torture. The sound made me want to turn away, but the thick-set man was now gesturing for me to make my way to the front. When I did not move, he whispered none too quietly:

‘Mr Ryder, please.’

This caused a few mourners to turn and look at us.

‘Mr Ryder, this way.’

The thick-set man took my arm and we began to make our way through the crowd. As we did so, a number of faces turned to me and I heard at least two voices murmur: 'It's Mr Ryder.' By the time we had emerged at the front, much of the sobbing had abated and I could feel many pairs of eyes focused on my back. I adopted a posture of quiet respect, painfully aware that I was dressed in a casual light green jacket with not even a tie. My shirt, moreover, had a breezy orange and yellow pattern. I quickly buttoned the jacket while the thick-set man tried to attract the widow's attention.

'Eva,' he was saying gently. 'Eva.'

Although the white-haired gentleman turned to look at us, the widow gave no sign of having heard. She remained lost in her anguish, her cries falling rhythmically over the grave. Her brother glanced back at me with obvious embarrassment.

'Please,' I whispered, beginning to retreat, 'I'll offer my condolences a little later.'

'No, no, Mr Ryder, please. Just one moment.' The thick-set man now placed a hand on his sister's shoulder and said again, this time with distinct impatience: 'Eva. Eva.'

The widow straightened and finally, controlling her sobs, turned to face us.

'Eva,' her brother said. 'Mr Ryder is here.'

'Mr Ryder?'

'My deepest sympathies, madam,' I said lowering my head solemnly.

The widow continued to stare at me.

'Eva!' her brother hissed.

The widow started, looked at her brother, then at me again.

‘Mr Ryder,’ she said in a surprisingly composed voice, ‘this is truly an honour. Hermann’ – she gestured towards the grave – ‘is a great admirer of yours.’ Then suddenly she was overcome by sobs once more.

‘Eva!’

‘Madam,’ I said quickly, ‘I came here merely to express my deepest sympathies. I really am very sorry. But please, madam, everyone, let me now leave you to your grief ...’

‘Mr Ryder,’ the widow said, and I saw she had composed herself again. ‘This is an honour indeed. I’m sure everyone here would join me in saying that we are greatly, profoundly flattered.’

A chorus of assenting murmurs rose up behind me.

‘Mr Ryder,’ the widow went on, ‘how are you enjoying your stay in our town? I do hope you’ve found one or two things at least to fascinate you.’

‘I’m enjoying myself very much. Everyone here has been so kind. A delightful community. I’m very sorry about ... about the death.’

‘Perhaps you’d care for some refreshments. Some tea or coffee perhaps?’

‘No, no, really, please ...’

‘Do at least stay for something to drink. Oh dear, has no one brought any tea or coffee? Nothing?’ The widow gazed searchingly into the crowd.

‘Really, please, I had no intention of interrupting like this. Please, continue with ... what you were doing.’

‘But you must have something. Somebody, hasn’t somebody even a flask of coffee?’

Behind me many voices were consulting one another, and when I glanced over my shoulder I could see people searching through their bags and pockets. The thick-set man was waving to the back of the crowd and then something was passed to him. As he stood examining it, I could see it was a slice of cake in a cellophane wrapper.

‘Is this the best we can do?’ the thick-set man shouted. ‘What is this?’

There was by now quite a hubbub building behind me. One voice in particular was asking angrily: ‘Otto, where’s that cheese?’ Eventually a packet of peppermints was handed to the thick-set man. The latter glared angrily back at the gathering, then turned to present the cake and the peppermints to his sister.

‘Really, you’re most kind,’ I said, ‘but I only came because ...’

‘Mr Ryder,’ the widow said, her voice now tense with emotion, ‘it seems this is all we can offer you. I don’t know what Hermann would have said, to be disgraced like this on this of all days. But here we are, I can only apologise. Look, this is all, this is all we can offer, all the hospitality we can offer.’

The voices behind me, which had quietened as the widow had started to speak, now broke into numerous arguments. I could hear someone shouting: ‘I didn’t! I didn’t say anything of the sort!’

Then the white-haired gentleman who earlier had been holding the widow at the graveside stepped forward and bowed to me.

‘Mr Ryder,’ he said, ‘forgive us for the shabby way we are returning this great compliment. You find us, as you can see, woefully unprepared. I can assure you, nevertheless, that each of us here is profoundly grateful. Please, accept the refreshments, inadequate though they are.’

‘Mr Ryder, here, please sit down.’ The widow was brushing with a handkerchief the surface of a flat marble tomb adjacent to her husband’s grave. ‘Please.’

I could now see a retreat was out of the question. I moved apologetically towards the tomb the widow had cleaned for me, saying: ‘Well, you’re all very kind.’

As soon as I sat down on the pale marble, the mourners seemed all to step forward and gather around me.

‘Please,’ I heard the widow say again. She was standing above me tearing at the cellophane containing the cake. When she had finally got it open, she handed me the cake, wrapper and all. I thanked her and began to eat. It was some sort of fruit cake and I had to make an effort to prevent it crumbling in my hands. It was, moreover, a somewhat generous slice and not something I could devour in a few quick mouthfuls. As I went on eating I had the feeling the mourners were steadily edging closer around me, though when I looked up at them, I saw they were all standing quite still, their eyes lowered respectfully. There was silence for some time, and then the thick-set man coughed and said:

‘It’s been a very pleasant day.’

‘Yes, very pleasant,’ I replied, though my mouth was full. ‘Very pleasant indeed.’

Then the elderly white-haired gentleman took a step forward and said: ‘There are some wonderful walks around our city, Mr Ryder. Just a little way out of the centre, some splendid rural walks. If you find yourself with a spare hour, I’d be very happy to take you on one of them.’

‘Mr Ryder, won’t you have a peppermint?’

The widow was holding the opened packet close to my face. I thanked her and put a peppermint in my mouth even though I knew it would go oddly with the cake.

‘And as for the city itself,’ the white-haired gentleman was saying. ‘If you have any interest in medieval architecture, there are a number of houses that would be of immense fascination. Particularly in the Old Town. I’d be very happy to show you around.’

‘Really,’ I said, ‘you’re very kind.’

I carried on eating, wishing now to finish the cake as quickly as possible. There was another silence and then the widow sighed and said:

‘It’s turned out very nice.’

‘Yes,’ I said, ‘the weather has been marvellous here ever since my arrival.’

This was met by a general murmur of approval all round, some people even laughing politely as though I had made a witticism. I forced what remained of the cake into my mouth and brushed the crumbs from my hands.

‘Look,’ I said, ‘you’ve all been so kind. But now, please, go on with the ceremony.’

‘Another peppermint, Mr Ryder. It’s all we can offer.’ The widow again thrust the packet towards my face.

It was then that the realisation suddenly dawned on me that at this precise moment the widow was feeling the most intense hatred towards me. Indeed, it occurred to me that, polite though they all were, virtually everyone else present – the thick-set man included – was bitterly resenting my presence. Curiously, just as this thought flashed through my head, a voice from the back said, not loudly but quite distinctly:

‘Why’s he so special anyway? This is Hermann’s time.’

There was an uneasy rumble of voices and at least two shocked whispers of: ‘Who said that?’ The white-haired gentleman coughed, then said:

‘The canals are also very beautiful to walk beside.’

‘What’s so special about him anyway? Interrupting everything.’

‘Shut up, you fool!’ someone retorted. ‘A fine time to disgrace us all.’

A number of voices growled support for this last utterance, but now a second voice had started to shout something aggressively.

‘Mr Ryder, please.’ The widow was again thrusting the peppermints at me.

‘No, really ...’

‘Please. Take another.’

A furious exchange involving four or five people started at the back of the crowd. A voice was shouting: ‘He’ll take us too far. The Sattler monument, that’s going too far.’

Then more and more people were starting to shout at each other, and I could sense a full-scale row about to erupt.

‘Mr Ryder’ – the thick-set man was bending down to me – ‘please ignore them. They’ve always disgraced the family. Always. We’re ashamed of them. Oh yes, we’re ashamed. Please don’t double our shame by listening.’

‘But surely ...’ I began to stand up, but felt something push me down again. I then saw the widow had a hand grasped around my shoulder.

‘Please relax, Mr Ryder,’ she said sharply. ‘Please finish your refreshments.’

There were now arguments raging everywhere and towards the back some people seemed to be jostling one another. The widow was continuing to hold me down by the shoulder, looking at the crowd with an expression of proud defiance.

‘I don’t care, I don’t care,’ a voice was shouting.
‘We’re better off the way we are!’

There was more jostling, and then a fat young man pushed his way out to the front. His face was very round and at this moment he was clearly worked up. He glared at me, then shouted:

‘It’s all very well your coming here like this. Standing in front of the Sattler monument! Smiling like that! Then you’ll move on. It’s not that simple for those of us who have to live here. The Sattler monument!’

The round-faced young man did not look like someone accustomed to making bold utterances and there seemed no doubting the sincerity of his emotions. I felt a little taken aback and for a moment found myself unable to respond. Then, as the round-faced young man began another volley of accusations, I felt something inside me give way. It occurred to me that I had somehow, unaccountably, made a miscalculation the previous day in choosing to be photographed in front of the Sattler monument. At the time, certainly, it had seemed the most telling way of sending out an appropriate signal to the citizens of this city. I had, of course, been all too aware of the pros and cons involved – I could recall how at breakfast that morning I had sat carefully weighing these up – but I now saw the possibility that there was even more to the business of the Sattler monument than I had supposed.

Encouraged by the round-faced young man, a few more people had begun to shout in my direction. Others were trying to restrain them, though not with the urgency one might have expected. Then, amidst all the shouting, I became aware of a new voice, speaking gently just behind my shoulder. It was a male voice, cultured and calm, which struck me as vaguely familiar.

‘Mr Ryder,’ it was saying. ‘Mr Ryder. The concert hall. You really ought to be on your way. They’re waiting for you there. Really, you must allow yourself plenty of time to inspect the facilities and conditions ...'

Then the voice was drowned out as another particularly noisy exchange erupted in front of me. The round-faced young man pointed at me and began to say something over and over.

Then quite suddenly a hush descended over the crowd. At first I thought the mourners had finally calmed down and were waiting for me to speak. But then I noticed that the round-faced young man - indeed, everyone - was staring at a spot somewhere above my head. It was a few seconds before it occurred to me to twist round, and then I saw that Brodsky had stepped up onto a tomb and was standing directly over me.

It was perhaps simply the angle at which I was looking up at him - he was leaning forward slightly so that I could see against a vast background of sky much of the underside of his jaw - but there was something strikingly commanding about him. He seemed to loom above us like a huge statue, his open hands poised in the air. In fact, he was surveying the gathering before him in much the way I imagined he would an orchestra in the seconds before he began to conduct. Something about him suggested a strange authority over the very emotions which had just been running riot in front of him - that he could cause them to rise and fall as he pleased. For a little while longer, the silence continued. Then a solitary voice shouted:

'What do you want? You old drunk!'

Perhaps the person had intended this cry to set off another round of shouting. As it was, no one showed any sign of having heard it.

'You old drunk!' the person tried again, but already the conviction was evaporating from his voice.

Then there was silence as all eyes stared up at Brodsky. After what seemed an inordinate length of time, Brodsky said:

‘If that’s what you want to call me, fine. We’ll see. We’ll see who I am. In these days, weeks, months to come. We’ll see if that’s all I am.’

He had spoken unhurriedly, with a calm power that did nothing to undermine his initial impact. The mourners went on staring up at him, seemingly spellbound. Then Brodsky said tenderly:

‘Someone you loved has died. This is a precious moment.’

I felt the ends of his raincoat brush the back of my head, and I realised he was extending a hand down towards the widow.

‘This is a precious time. Come. Caress your wound now. It will be there for the rest of your life. But caress it now, while it’s raw and bleeding. Come.’

Brodsky stepped off the tomb, his hand still extended to the widow. She took it with a dreamy look, and then Brodsky placed his other hand behind her and began gently to lead her back to the edge of the open grave.

‘Come,’ I could hear him saying quietly. ‘Come now.’

They moved slowly through the fallen leaves until she was once again at the graveside looking down at the coffin. Then, as the widow began once more to sob, Brodsky withdrew carefully and took a step away from her. By this time there were many others weeping again, and I could see that in no time things would be as they had been prior to my arrival. For the moment, in any case, all attention had turned from me and I decided to take the opportunity to slip away.

I rose to my feet quietly and had managed to make my way past several graves when I heard someone walking close behind me. A voice said:

‘Indeed, Mr Ryder, it’s high time you got to the concert hall. One never can tell what adjustments might be called for. '

Turning, I recognised Pedersen, the elderly councillor I had met in the cinema on my first evening. I realised, furthermore, that it had been his voice I had heard speaking softly behind my shoulder earlier on.

'Ah, Mr Pedersen,' I said as he fell in step beside me. 'I'm rather glad you reminded me about the concert hall. With feelings running so high back there, I must confess, I'd started to lose track of the time.'

'Indeed and so had I,' Pedersen said with a small laugh. 'And I too have a meeting to get to. Hardly of comparable importance, but nevertheless, it has to do with this evening.'

We came to the grassy path running through the middle of the cemetery and both paused.

'Perhaps you might assist me, Mr Pedersen,' I said, looking about me. 'I've arranged for a car to take me to the concert hall, it should be waiting for me. It's just that I'm not certain how to get back down to the road.'

'I'll be pleased to show you, Mr Ryder. Please follow me.'

We began to walk again, away from the hill down which I had come with Brodsky. The sun was now setting over the valley and the shadows cast by the gravestones had noticeably lengthened. As we walked on, I sensed on at least two occasions that Pedersen was about to speak, but then he seemed to change his mind. In the end, I said to him matter-of-factly:

'Some of those people just now. They seemed extremely exercised. I mean, about those photographs of me in the newspaper.'

'Well you see, sir,' Pedersen said with a sigh, 'it's the Sattler monument. Max Sattler has today as strong a hold on people's emotions as he ever did.'

'I suppose you too have some views. I mean, about those photographs in front of the Sattler monument.'

Pedersen smiled awkwardly and avoided my gaze. 'How can I explain it?' he said eventually. 'It's so hard for an outsider to understand. Even an expert like yourself. It's not at all clear why Max Sattler - why that whole episode in the city's history - has come to mean so much to people here. On paper, it hardly amounts to anything very significant. And yes, it all happened almost a century ago. But you see, Mr Ryder, as you've no doubt discovered, Sattler has gained a place in the imaginations of citizens here. His role, if you like, has become mythical. Sometimes he's feared, sometimes he's abhorred. And at other times, his memory is worshipped. How can I explain it? Let me put it to you like this. There's a certain man I know, a good friend. Getting on in years now, but he's not had a bad life. He's well respected here, still plays an active role in civic affairs. Not a bad life at all. But this man, every now and then, he looks back over this life he's led and wonders if he didn't perhaps let certain things slip by. He wonders how things might have been if he'd been, well, a little less timid. A little less timid and a little more passionate.'

Pedersen gave a small laugh. The path had now curved round and I could see up ahead the dark iron gateway of the cemetery.

'Then he might, you know, start to think back,' Pedersen went on. 'Back to some pivotal point somewhere in his youth, before he became so set in his ways. He might recall, let us say, a moment when some woman tried to seduce him. Of course, he didn't allow it, he was much too proper. Or perhaps it was cowardice. Perhaps he was too young, who knows? He wonders if he'd taken another path then, if he'd been just a little more confident about ... about love and passion. You know how it is, Mr Ryder. You know the way old men dream sometimes, wondering how it would have been if some key moment had gone another way. Well it can also be like that for a town, for a community. Every now and then, it looks back, looks back at its history and asks itself: "What if? What might we have become by now if we'd only ..." Ah, if we'd only what, Mr Ryder? Allowed Max Sattler to take us where he wished? Would we now be something else altogether? Would we be today a city like Antwerp? Like Stuttgart? I honestly don't think so, Mr Ryder. There are, you see, certain things about this town, certain things that are so embedded. They will never change, not in five, six, seven generations. Sattler, in practical terms, was an irrelevance. Just a man with wild dreams. He would never have changed anything fundamentally. It's just the same as with this friend of mine. He's the way he is. No experience, however crucial, would have changed that for him. Now, Mr Ryder, here we are. If you go down these steps, you'll find yourself back on the road. '

We had passed through the tall iron gates of the cemetery and were now standing in a large, carefully landscaped garden. Pedersen was pointing towards a hedge on my left behind which I could see some stone steps commencing a curving descent. I hesitated a moment, then said:

'Mr Pedersen, you've been exceedingly polite. But let me assure you, whenever the possibility arises that I've made an error of judgement, I'm not one to turn and hide from it. In any case, sir, this is something a person in my position has to come to terms with. That's to say, during the course of any one day I'll be called upon to make many important decisions, and the truth is, the most I can do is to weigh up the evidence available at the time as best I can and forge on. Sometimes, inevitably, yes, I'll be guilty of a miscalculation. How could it be otherwise? This is something I've long come to terms with. And as you can see, when such a thing occurs, my only concern is how I might make good the error at the first opportunity. So please, feel free to speak frankly. If it's your view that I've made a mistake in posing in front of the Sattler monument, then please say so.'

Pedersen looked uncomfortable. He gazed back towards a mausoleum in the distance, then said: 'Well, Mr Ryder, this is simply my opinion.'

'I'd be very keen to hear it, sir.'

'Well, since you ask. Yes, sir. To be frank, I was rather disappointed when I saw the newspaper this morning. In my opinion, sir, as I've just explained, it's simply not in this city's nature to embrace the extremes of Sattler. He holds an attraction for certain people precisely because he's so distant, a piece of local myth. Reintroduce him as a serious prospect ... then frankly, sir, people here will panic. They will recoil. They will suddenly find themselves clinging to what they know, never mind what misery it has already brought them. You asked my view, sir. I feel that the introducing of Max Sattler into these discussions has seriously undermined the possibility of progress. But of course there is still tonight. In the end, it will all hinge on what happens tonight. On what you will say. And on what Mr Brodsky will show us. And as you point out, there's no one more adept than yourself at recovering lost ground.' For a moment he appeared to be pondering something quietly to himself. Then he shook his head gravely. 'Mr Ryder, the best thing you can do now, sir, is to get to the concert hall. Tonight, everything must go according to plan.'

'Yes, yes, you're quite right,' I said. 'I'm sure my car's at this moment waiting to take me there. Mr Pedersen, I'm grateful to you for your frankness.'

The steps descended steeply past tall hedges and shrubs. I then found myself standing beside the road, looking at the sun setting across the field on the opposite side. The stairway had brought me out at a point where the road curved sharply, but when I followed it round a little the view widened. I could then see up ahead the hill I had recently climbed - the outline of the little hut was visible against the sky - and Hoffman's car waiting down in the lay-by where he had dropped me earlier.

I walked on towards the car, my thoughts filled with the exchange I had just had with Pedersen. I remembered the time I had first met him in the cinema when his esteem for me had been obvious in his every word and gesture. Now, for all his good manners, it was clear he was deeply disappointed with me. I found this thought oddly troubling and, as I continued along the roadside gazing at the sunset, began to feel more and more annoyed that I had not proceeded with greater caution over the matter of the Sattler monument. It was true - as I had pointed out to Pedersen - that my decision had seemed to represent the wisest course open to me at the time. Nevertheless, I could not avoid the niggling feeling that for all the limitations on my time, for all the enormous pressures impinging on me, I should somehow by that point have been better informed. And now, even at this late stage, with the evening's event virtually upon me, there were still certain aspects to these local issues that were far from clear. I saw now what a mistake it had been to miss the Citizens' Mutual Support Group meeting earlier in the day - and all for the sake of a practice session that had proved far from necessary.

By the time I came up to Hoffman's car, I was feeling tired and disheartened. Hoffman was behind the wheel, writing busily in a notebook, and did not notice me until I had opened the passenger door.

'Ah, Mr Ryder,' he exclaimed, quickly putting his notebook away. 'Your practice went well, I trust?'

'Oh yes.'

'And the facilities?' He hurriedly started up the car. 'They were to your satisfaction?'

'Excellent, Mr Hoffman, thank you. But now I must get to the concert hall as quickly as possible. One never knows what sorts of adjustment may be necessary.'

'Of course. In fact, I too have to hurry to the concert hall just now.' He glanced at his watch. 'I must check the catering facilities. When I was there an hour ago, I'm pleased to say everything was going very smoothly. But of course, havoc can set in so rapidly.'

Hoffman steered the car back onto the road and we drove for a few minutes without talking. The road, though somewhat busier than on the outward journey, was still far from crowded and Hoffman quickly built up a good speed. I gazed out at the fields and tried to relax, but found my mind returning to the evening ahead. Then I heard Hoffman say:

'Mr Ryder, I hope you won't mind my bringing this up. Just a small matter. No doubt you've forgotten.' He gave a short laugh and shook his head.

'Which matter is this, Mr Hoffman?'

'I meant simply my wife's albums. You might recall I told you about them when we first met. My wife, she's been such a devoted admirer for so many years ...'

'Yes, of course, I remember very well. She has prepared some albums of cuttings of my career. Yes, yes, I hadn't forgotten. In fact, throughout all these busy events, it's something I've been looking forward to very much.'

'She's gone about the matter with enormous devotion, sir. Over many years. Sometimes she's taken huge trouble to acquire certain back issues of journals or newspapers containing important articles about you. Indeed, sir, her dedication has been marvellous to witness. It really would mean so much to her ...'

'Mr Hoffman, I have every intention of inspecting the albums before long. As I say, I'm very much looking forward to doing so. However, just at this moment, I'd much appreciate it if we could take this opportunity to discuss, well, certain aspects concerning this evening.'

'As you wish, sir. But I can assure you, everything is well in hand. You have nothing to be concerned about.'

'Yes, yes, I'm sure. Nevertheless, since the event is now so close, surely it would be sensible to turn our minds to it a little. For instance, Mr Hoffman, there's the matter of my parents. While I have every confidence the people of this city will look after them well, the fact remains they're both in fragile health and so I'd greatly appreciate ...'

'Ah, of course, I perfectly understand. Indeed, may I say I find it most touching that you should display such concern over your parents. I'm only too happy to assure you that very thorough arrangements have been made to ensure their comfort at all times. A group of very charming and able local ladies has been detailed to look after them throughout their stay. And as for this evening's event, we have planned something a little special for them, a little flourish I trust will appeal to you. As you no doubt know, our local company, Seeler Brothers, was renowned for two centuries for its carriage-making, once supplying many distinguished customers as far afield as France and England. There are some splendid examples of the Seeler Brothers' craft still in the city and it was my fancy your parents would like to arrive at the concert hall in a particularly distinguished specimen, for which we have prepared a pair of beautifully groomed thoroughbreds. Perhaps you can imagine the scene, Mr Ryder. By that time in the evening the clearing in front of the concert hall will be bathed in lights, and all the prominent members of our community will be congregating there, laughing and greeting one another, all of them wonderfully dressed, much excitement in the air. Cars, of course, are unable to reach the clearing, so people will be arriving on foot from out of the trees. And then once a substantial crowd has assembled outside the hall - can you picture this, sir? - there'll come from the darkness of the woods the sound of approaching horses. The ladies and gentlemen, they'll stop talking and turn their heads. The sound of hooves will get louder, coming all the time closer to the pool of light. And then they will burst into view, the splendid horses, the driver in tails and top hat, the gleaming carriage of the Seeler Brothers carrying your most charming parents! Can you imagine the excitement, the anticipation that will go through the crowd at that moment? Of course, your parents will not be required to ride in the carriage for long. Just for that central avenue through the woods. And I assure you, the carriage is a masterpiece of luxury. They will find it as sheltered and comfortable as any limousine. Naturally, there will be a slight rocking motion, but that, in a first-class carriage, becomes a positively soothing feature. I hope you can picture it, sir. I must confess, I had originally conceived this whole arrangement for your own arrival, but then realised you would prefer to be well ensconced backstage by that point in the proceedings. And after all, one wishes nothing to dilute the impact of your appearance on the stage. Then, when we heard the very happy news that your parents would also be honouring this town, I thought immediately: "Ah, the ideal solution!" Yes, sir, your parents' arrival will set the mood very nicely. We do not, of course, expect your parents to stand about thereafter. They'll be led straight into their special seats in the auditorium, and this will signal to everyone else it is time they too were beginning to take their seats. And then, shortly after that, the formal part of the evening will commence. We will begin with a short piano recital by my son, Stephan. Ha ha! I admit this is something of an indulgence on my part. But Stephan was so eager for a platform and at the time I perhaps foolishly believed ... Well, there's no point in going into that now. Stephan will give a light piano recital, simply to create a certain atmosphere. For this part of the proceedings, the lights will remain up, to give people the chance to find their seats, greet one another, chat in the aisles and so on. Then, once everyone has settled, the lights will dim. There will follow a few formal words of welcome. Then, in time, the orchestra will come out, take their places, tune their instruments. And then, after a certain pause, Mr Brodsky will emerge. He will ... he will then perform. When he has finished, and there is - let us hope, let us assume it - there is thunderous applause, and Mr Brodsky has taken many bows, there will follow a small break. Not an intermission exactly, we will not allow the audience to leave their seats. But a short period of five minutes or so, when the lights will go up again and people will have a chance to collect their thoughts. Then, while people are still busy exchanging their views, Mr von Winterstein will appear on stage in front of the curtain. He will give a simple introduction. No more than a few minutes - what introduction is necessary, after all? Then he'll retreat to the wings. The whole auditorium will be plunged into darkness. And now we come to the moment, sir. The moment of your appearance. Indeed, this is a matter I'd been meaning to discuss with you, since to some degree your co-operation is essential. You see, sir, our concert hall is extremely beautiful but, being very old, it naturally lacks many facilities one would take for granted in a more modern building. The catering facilities, as I believe I've already mentioned, are far from adequate, obliging us to rely heavily on those of the hotel. But my point is this, sir. I have borrowed from our sports centre - which is indeed very modern and well-equipped - the electronic scoreboard that usually hangs over the indoor arena. Just at this moment, the arena is looking very sorry for itself! Ugly black wires dangling down from the space the scoreboard usually occupies. Well, sir, to return to my point. Mr von Winterstein will retreat to the wings after his brief introduction. The whole auditorium, for a single moment, will be plunged into blackness, during which time the curtains will open. And then a single spot will come on, revealing you standing at the centre of the stage at the lectern. At that moment, obviously, the audience will burst into excited applause. Then, once the applause has subsided, before you have uttered a word - of course, this is so long as you are agreeable - a voice will boom out across the auditorium, pronouncing the first question. The voice will be that of Horst Jannings, this city's most senior actor. He will be up in the sound box speaking through the public address system. Horst has a fine rich baritone and he will read out each question slowly. And as he does so - this is my little idea, sir! - the words will be spelt out simultaneously on the electronic scoreboard fixed directly above your head. You see, until this point, owing to the darkness, no one would have been aware of the scoreboard. It will be as though the words are appearing in the air above you. Ha ha! Forgive me, but I thought the effect would serve both the drama of the occasion and at the same time bring added clarity to it. The words on the scoreboard, dare I say, will help some of those present to remember the gravely important nature of the issues you are addressing. After all, it could easily be that in all this excitement certain people will forget to concentrate. Well, you see, sir, with my little idea, there'll be little chance of that. Each question will be there in front of them, spelt out in giant letters. So then, sir, with your approval this is what we shall do. The first question will be announced, spelt out on the scoreboard, you will give your reply from the lectern, and, once you have finished, Horst will read out the next question and so on. The only thing we would ask, Mr Ryder, is that at the end of each reply, you leave the lectern and come to the edge of the stage and bow. The reason for my requesting this is twofold. Firstly, because of the temporary nature of the electronic scoreboard, there are inevitably certain technical difficulties. It will take the electrician several seconds to load each question into the scoreboard, and then there will be an additional lag of fifteen to twenty seconds before the words start to appear on the board. So you see, sir, by moving to the edge of the stage and bowing, thus provoking inevitable applause, we will avoid a series of awkward pauses punctuating the proceedings. Then, just as each round of applause is dying, Horst's voice and the scoreboard will announce the next question, giving you ample time to return to the lectern. There is, sir, a further reason this strategy recommends itself. Your coming to the edge of the stage and bowing will tell the electrician, very unambiguously, that you have completed your answer. After all, we wish to avoid at all costs a situation in which, for instance, the scoreboard starts to print out the next question while you are still speaking. But you see, as I've explained, because of the time-lag problems this could all too easily occur. All it would take, after all, is for you to appear to finish - for you merely to pause - only for some final pertinent point to occur to you. You proceed to make this final point, but meanwhile the electrician has already started ... Ha! What a disaster! Let us not even contemplate it! So, sir, allow me then to suggest this simple but effective device of your coming to the edge of the stage at the end of each answer. In fact, sir, to give the electrician a few extra seconds to load the next question, it would be enormously helpful if you could in addition give some sort of inconspicuous signal as you approach the end of each reply. Perhaps, let us say, a modest shrug of the shoulder. Of course, Mr Ryder, all these arrangements are subject to your approval. If you're unhappy about any of these ideas, please speak plainly.'

As Hoffman had been talking, an all too vivid picture of the evening ahead had started to form in my mind. I could hear the applause, the buzz of the electronic scoreboard above my head. I saw myself performing the little shrug, then moving into the blinding lights towards the edge of the stage. And a curious, dreamy sense of unreality came over me as I realised just how unprepared I was. I saw Hoffman waiting for my response and murmured wearily:

‘It all sounds splendid, Mr Hoffman. You’ve thought the whole thing out very well.’

‘Ah. So you approve. All the details, they are all ...’

‘Yes, yes,’ I said, waving my hand impatiently. ‘The electronic scoreboard, the walking to the edge of the stage, the shrugs, yes, yes, yes. It’s all very well thought out.’

‘Ah.’ For a second Hoffman continued to look uncertain, but then seemed to conclude I had spoken sincerely.

‘Splendid, splendid. Then everything’s settled.’ He nodded to himself and fell silent for a while. Then I heard him mutter to himself again, not taking his eyes off the road:

‘Yes, yes. Everything’s settled.’

For the next several minutes, Hoffman said nothing further to me, though he continued to mutter to himself under his breath. There was now a pink hue over much of the sky, and as the road turned this way and that through the farmland the sun would appear in the windscreen before us, filling the car with its glow and obliging us to squint. Then at one point, as I was gazing out of my window, I heard Hoffman gasp suddenly:

‘An ox! An ox, an ox, an ox!’

Although this too had been uttered under his breath, I was sufficiently startled to turn and look at him. I saw then that Hoffman was still lost in his own world, staring ahead of him and nodding to himself. I looked around at the fields we were passing but, although I saw sheep in many of the fields, could see no sign of an ox. I had a vague recollection of Hoffman doing something similar once before on a car journey with me, but then soon lost interest in the matter.

Before long we found ourselves back in the city streets and the traffic quickly slowed to a crawl. The pavements were crowded with people making their way home from work and many shop windows had already turned on their lights for the night. Now that I was back in the city, I felt some of my confidence returning. It occurred to me that once I reached the concert hall, once I had had the chance to stand on the stage and survey the surroundings, many things would fall into place.

‘Indeed, sir,’ Hoffman suddenly said, ‘everything is going to order. Nothing at all for you to worry about. This town, you’ll see, will do you proud. And as for Mr Brodsky, I continue to have every confidence in him.’

I decided I should at least make a show of being optimistic. ‘Yes,’ I said cheerfully, ‘I’m sure Mr Brodsky will be splendid tonight. He certainly seemed in fine form just now.’

‘Oh?’ Hoffman gave me a puzzled look. ‘You’ve seen him recently?’

‘Up at the cemetery just now. As I say, he seemed very confident ...’

‘Mr Brodsky was at the cemetery? Now I wonder what he was doing up there.’

Hoffman gave me a searching stare, and I thought for a moment about recounting the whole story of the funeral and Brodsky’s impressive intervention. But then in the end I could not find the energy and said simply:

‘I believe he has an appointment there in a little while. With Miss Collins.’

‘With Miss Collins? Good gracious. What on earth can this be about?’

I looked at him, somewhat surprised by his reaction. ‘It seems a reconciliation is becoming a genuine possibility,’ I said. ‘If such a happy conclusion does ensue, then Mr Hoffman, that will be something else you could quite legitimately take much credit for.’

‘Yes, yes.’ Hoffman was thinking something over, a frown forming on his face. ‘Mr Brodsky is at the cemetery now? Waiting for Miss Collins? How curious. Very curious.’

As we went further into the city centre, the traffic became ever more dense, until at one point, in a narrow back street, we came to a standstill. Hoffman, whose manner had continued to grow increasingly troubled, now turned to me again.

‘Mr Ryder, there’s something I must attend to. That is to say, I’ll still be joining you at the concert hall in due course, but just now ...’ He looked at his watch with distinct signs of panic. ‘You see, I must attend to ... to something ...’ Then he gripped the wheel and fixed me in a stare. ‘Mr Ryder, the fact is this. Owing to this wretched one-way system and this diabolical evening traffic, it will take us some time yet to reach the concert hall in this vehicle. Whereas on foot ...’ He suddenly pointed past me out of the window. ‘There it is. Before your very eyes. No more than a few minutes’ walk. Yes, sir, that roof there.’

I could see a large dome-shaped roof looming above the other buildings in the mid-distance. Certainly, it did not appear to be more than three or four blocks away.

‘Mr Hoffman,’ I said, ‘if you have something urgent to attend to, I’m quite happy to make my way on foot.’

‘Really? You’d forgive me?’

The traffic moved forward a few more inches then came to a standstill again.

‘In fact, I’d welcome the walk,’ I said. ‘It looks a pleasant evening. And as you say, it’s only a short distance on foot.’

‘This infernal one-way system! We might sit in this car for another hour! Mr Ryder, I’d be enormously grateful if you’d forgive me. But you see, there’s something I must ... I must see to ...’

‘Yes, yes, of course. I’ll get out here. You’ve been most kind as it is, driving me about like this at such a busy time. I’m most grateful.’

‘You’ll be approaching the concert hall from the rear. It’s a case of just proceeding on towards that roof. You can’t miss it if you keep the roof in view.’

‘Please don’t worry. I’ll have no trouble.’ Cutting short his apologies, I thanked him again and stepped out onto the pavement.

I soon found myself wandering down a narrow street past a row of specialist bookshops, then past some pleasant-looking tourist hotels. It was not at all difficult to keep the domed roof in view and for a little while I felt thankful for the chance to walk in the fresh air.

By the time I had gone two or three blocks, however, a number of troubling thoughts had entered my head which I found I could not dislodge. For one thing, I could see there was more than a chance the question-and-answer session would fail to go smoothly. Indeed, if the intensity of emotions displayed at the cemetery was anything to go by, the possibility of ugly scenes could not be ruled out. Moreover, if the question-and-answer session went badly enough, it was conceivable that my parents, witnessing the scene with mounting horror and embarrassment, would demand to be taken out of the auditorium. In other words, they would leave before I had had the chance to get to the piano, and then it would be anyone's guess when they would ever again come to hear me perform. Even worse, if things went very badly indeed, it was not impossible one or the other of them would suffer a seizure. I felt as confident as ever that my mother and my father would be united in astonishment within seconds of my starting to play, but meanwhile the question-and-answer session stood massively in my way.

I realised I had become so preoccupied I had allowed the domed roof to disappear behind some buildings. I thought little of this at first, assuming it would come back into view soon enough. But then, as I walked on, the street grew even narrower, while the buildings around me seemed all to be six or seven storeys high, so that I could hardly see any sky, let alone the domed roof. I decided to look for a parallel street, but then, once I had taken the next turning, I found myself wandering from one tiny side-street to the next, quite possibly going in circles, the concert hall not visible anywhere.

After several minutes of this, a sense of panic began to engulf me and I thought about stopping someone to ask directions. But then it occurred to me this would be unwise. All the time I had been walking, people had been turning - sometimes even stopping dead on the pavement - to look at me. I had been vaguely aware of this, though in my concern to find my way I had not given it much thought. But I now saw that, with the evening's event so close, and with so much hanging in the balance, it would not do for me to be seen wandering the streets, obviously lost and uncertain. With an effort, I straightened my posture and adopted the demeanour of someone who, with all his affairs well in hand, was taking a relaxing stroll around the town. I forced myself to slow my pace and smiled pleasantly at anyone who stared my way.

Finally I turned another corner and spotted the concert hall before me, closer than ever. The street I now entered was broader, with brightly lit cafés and shops on either side. The domed roof was no more than a block or two away, just beyond where the street curved out of view.

I felt not only relief, but also suddenly much better about the whole evening ahead. The feeling I had had earlier - that many things would fall into place once I reached the venue and was able to stand on the stage - came back to me and I proceeded down the street with something approaching enthusiasm.

But then, as I came round the bend, an odd sight greeted me. A little way ahead was a brick wall running across my path - in fact, across the entire breadth of the street. My first thought was that a railway line ran behind the wall, but then I noticed how the higher storeys of the buildings on either side of the street continued unbroken above the wall and on into the distance. While the wall aroused my curiosity, I did not immediately see it as a problem, assuming that once I got up to it I would find an arch or subway leading me through to the other side. The domed roof, in any case, was now very near, lit up by spotlights against the darkening sky.

It was only when I was virtually right up to the wall, it dawned on me there was no way to get past. The pavements on both sides of the street simply came to a dead stop at the brickwork. I looked around in bewilderment, then walked the length of the wall to the opposite pavement, unable quite to accept there was not somewhere a doorway, or even a small hole through which to crawl. I found nothing, and eventually, after standing helplessly before the wall for a time, I waved to a passer-by - a middle-aged woman emerging from a nearby gift shop - saying:

‘Excuse me, I wish to get to the concert hall. How can I get past this wall?’

The woman seemed surprised by my question. ‘Oh no,’ she said. ‘You can’t get past the wall. Of course you can’t. It completely seals the street.'

'But this is extremely annoying,' I said. 'I have to get to the concert hall.'

'I suppose it is annoying,' the woman said as though she had never before considered the matter. 'When I saw you staring at it just now, sir, I just assumed you were a tourist. The wall's quite a tourist attraction, as you can see.'

She pointed to a spinner of postcards in front of the gift shop. Sure enough, in the light from the doorway, I could see postcard after postcard proudly featuring the wall.

'But what on earth's the point in having a wall in a place like this?' I asked, my voice rising despite myself.

'It really is monstrous. What purpose can it possibly serve?'

'I do sympathise. To an outsider, particularly to one trying to get somewhere in a hurry, it must be an annoyance. I suppose it's what you'd call a folly. It was built by some eccentric person at the end of the last century. Of course it's rather odd, but it's been famous ever since. In the summer, this whole area where we're standing now, it gets completely full of tourists. Americans, Japanese, all taking photographs of it.'

'This is nonsensical,' I said furiously. 'Please tell me the quickest way to reach the concert hall.'

'The concert hall, sir? Well, it's quite a long way if you're thinking of going on foot. Of course, we're very near it just now' - she glanced up at the roof - 'but in practical terms, that doesn't mean very much because of the wall.'

'This is quite ridiculous!' I had lost all patience.

'I'll find my own way. You're obviously quite unable to appreciate that a person might be very busy, working on a tight schedule, and simply can't afford to dawdle about the town for hours. In fact, if I may say so, this wall is quite typical of this town. Utterly preposterous obstacles everywhere. And what do you do? Do you all get annoyed? Do you demand it's pulled down immediately so that people can go about their business? No, you put up with it for the best part of a century. You make postcards of it and believe it's charming. This brick wall charming? What a monstrosity! I may well use this wall as a symbol, I've a good mind to, in my speech tonight! It's just as well for you I've already composed much of what I'm going to say in my head and so am naturally reluctant to change things too much at this late stage. Good evening! '

I left the woman and began rapidly to retrace my steps back up the street, determined not to let such an absurd setback destroy my renewed sense of confidence. But then as I continued to walk, conscious all the time of the concert hall getting further and further away, I could feel my earlier despondency returning to me. The street seemed much longer than I remembered it, and then when I finally reached the end I found myself getting lost again in the network of narrow little alleys.

After several further minutes of useless wandering, I suddenly felt unable to go on and halted. Noticing I had stopped beside a pavement café, I collapsed into a chair at the nearest table and immediately felt what remained of my energy draining away. I was vaguely conscious that around me the darkness was falling, that an electric light was shining somewhere behind my head, that this same light was in all likelihood illuminating me to passers-by and fellow customers, but somehow I still could not find the urge to straighten my posture or even nominally to disguise my dejection. In time, a waiter appeared. I ordered a coffee from him, then went on staring down at the shadow cast by my head over the metallic surface of the table. All the possibilities that had disturbed me earlier concerning the evening ahead now began to crowd all at once into my mind. Above all, the depressing idea kept returning to me that my decision to be photographed before the Sattler monument had irrevocably damaged my authority in this town; that it had left me with a daunting amount of ground to make up and that anything less than an utterly commanding performance during the question-and-answer session would result in catastrophic consequences all round. In fact, for a moment, I felt so overwhelmed by these thoughts I was on the brink of tears. But then I became aware of a hand on my back and someone repeating gently above me: 'Mr Ryder. Mr Ryder.'

I assumed it was the waiter returned with my coffee and gestured for him to place it before me. But the voice continued to call my name, and looking up I found Gustav regarding me with a concerned expression.

'Oh, hello,' I said.

'Good evening, sir. How are you? I thought it was you, but I wasn't sure so I came over. Are you all right, sir? We're all over there, all the boys, won't you come and join us? The boys would be so thrilled.'

I looked around me and saw I was sitting on the edge of a square. Although there was a single street lamp at its centre, the square was largely in darkness, so that the figures of the people moving across it appeared to be little more than shadows. Gustav was indicating to the opposite side where I could see another café, somewhat larger than the one I was now patronising, its open doorway and windows throwing out a warm light. Even at this distance, I could make out a lot of lively activity inside, and strains of fiddle music and laughter came drifting out to us through the evening. Only then did it dawn on me I was in fact sitting in the Old Town by the main square, looking over to the Hungarian Café. As I continued to glance about me, I could hear Gustav saying:

‘The boys, sir, they’ve been making me tell them over and over again. About, you know, sir, what you said, about how you agreed. I’d already told them five, six times, but they wanted it all again. They’d barely stopped laughing and slapping each other about from the last time, but there they were again, saying: “Come on, Gustav, we know you haven’t told us everything yet. What exactly did Mr Ryder say?”

“I’ve told you,” I was saying to them. “I’ve told you. You know perfectly well.” But they wanted to hear it all again and I dare say they’ll want to hear it all several times more before the evening’s out. Of course, sir, although I adopt this weary tone each time they ask, naturally, that’s just for effect. In truth, of course, I’m every bit as thrilled as any of them and could happily repeat our conversation from this morning over and over. It’s so good to see them wearing such expressions again. Your promise, sir, it’s brought new hope, a new youth to their faces. Even Igor was smiling, laughing at some of the jokes! I can’t remember when I last saw them like this. Oh yes, sir, I’d be very happy to go over it many more times yet. Whenever I get to that moment, when you said: “Very well, I’d be happy to say something on your behalf,” whenever I get to that part, you should see them, sir! Cheering and laughing, slapping each other about, it’s been so long since I’ve seen them like this. So there we were, sir, drinking our beers and talking about your great generosity, talking about how after all these years portering would change for ever after tonight, yes, while we were in the midst of saying all this I happened to look out and I saw you, sir. The proprietor, as you can see, he’s left the door open. It gives the place a much better atmosphere, to be able to see right across the square as the night’s coming in. Well, there I was looking across the square and I was thinking to myself: “I wonder who that poor soul is sitting by himself over there.” But my eyes aren’t so good, you see, and I wasn’t aware it was actually you, sir. Then Karl, he said to me in a sort of whisper, he must have sensed it wouldn’t be a good idea to say it out loud, he said to me:

“I’m probably wrong, but isn’t that Mr Ryder himself? Over there?” And then I looked again and thought, yes, that’s possible. What on earth could he be doing out there in the cold and looking so sad? I’ll go and see if it really is him. Let me say, sir, Karl was very discreet. None of the others heard what he said, so aside from him, they won’t know why I’ve slipped out, though I dare say some of them might now be looking this way wondering what I’m up to. But really, sir, are you all right? You look like you’ve something on your mind.’

‘Oh ...’ I gave a sigh and wiped my face. ‘It’s nothing. It’s just that all this travelling, all this responsibility. Now and again it just gets ...’ I trailed off with a small laugh.

‘But why sit out here like this by yourself, sir? It’s a chilly evening, and in only your jacket. And this after my saying to you how welcome you’d be to join us whenever you wished at the Hungarian Café. Did you think you’d be welcomed with anything less than huge enthusiasm if you’d come over to us? Sitting out here on your own! Really, sir! Please come and join us without further delay. Then you can relax and enjoy yourself for a little while. Put all your worries out of your head. The boys will be overjoyed. Please.’

On the other side of the square, the glowing light in the doorway, the music, the laughter all certainly seemed inviting. I rose to my feet and wiped my face once more.

‘That’s it, sir. You’ll feel better in no time.’

‘Thank you. Thank you. Really, thank you.’ I made an effort to control my emotions. ‘I’m very grateful to you. Really. I just hope I won’t be intruding.’

Gustav laughed. ‘You’ll see soon enough if you’re intruding or not, sir.’

As we set off across the square, it occurred to me I had better prepare to present myself to the porters, who undoubtedly would be overwhelmed with gratitude and excitement at my appearance. I felt more in control with each step I took and was about to make some pleasant remark to Gustav when he suddenly stopped walking. He had kept his hand gently on my back as we had set off across the square and I felt his fingers, just for a second, clutch at the material of my jacket. I turned and saw in the shadowy light Gustav standing quite still, looking down towards the ground, a hand raised to his brow as though he had suddenly remembered something of importance. Then, before I could say anything, he was shaking his head and smiling self-consciously.

‘Excuse me, sir. I just ... just ...’ He gave a small laugh and began to walk again.

‘Is everything all right?’

‘Oh yes, yes. You know, sir, the boys are going to be so thrilled when you walk in through that door.’

He moved a step or two ahead of me and led the way determinedly across the remainder of the square.

Only when I entered the café and felt the warmth of the log fire at the far end of the room did I realise how chilly the evening had become. The interior of the café had been rearranged since the previous time I had stepped inside it. Most of the tables had been pushed back against the walls, so as to allow a large circular table to dominate the centre of the floor. Around this were a dozen or so men, drinking beers and carrying on boisterously. They looked somewhat younger than Gustav, though almost all were in late middle-age. A little way away from them, over near the café counter, two thin men in gypsy dress were playing a brisk waltz on their fiddles. There were other customers present, but they all seemed content to sit in the background, often in the shadowy recesses of the room, as though conscious of being present at someone else's event.

As Gustav and I came in, the porters all turned and stared, not certain whether to believe their eyes. Then Gustav said: 'Yes, boys, it really is him. He's come in person to wish us well.'

A complete hush fell over the café while everyone - the porters, the waiters, the musicians, the other customers - stared at me. Then the room broke into warm applause. For some reason this reception took me by surprise and almost brought the tears back to my eyes. I smiled, saying: 'Thank you, thank you,' while the applause continued so intensely I could barely hear myself. The porters had all risen to their feet and even the gypsy musicians had tucked their fiddles under their arms to join in the applause. Gustav ushered me towards the central table and as I sat down the applause finally subsided. The musicians resumed their playing and I found myself surrounded by a ring of excited faces. Gustav, who had seated himself next to me, began to say:

‘Boys, Mr Ryder has been good enough to ...’

Before he could finish, a stout porter with a red nose leaned over to me and raised his beer glass. ‘Mr Ryder, you’ve saved us,’ he declared. ‘Now our story will be different. My grandchildren, they’ll remember me differently. This is a great night for us.’

I was still smiling back at him when I felt a hand grasp my arm and found a gaunt, nervous-looking face staring into mine.

‘Please, Mr Ryder,’ the man said. ‘Please, you’ll really do it, won’t you? You won’t when the time comes, with all the other very important things on your mind, in front of all these people, you won’t change your mind and ...’

‘Don’t be so insolent,’ someone else said and the nervous man vanished as though someone had pulled him back. Then I could hear a voice saying behind me: ‘Of course he won’t change his mind. Who do you think you’re talking to?’

I turned in my seat, wishing to reassure the nervous man, but then someone else was shaking my hand saying:

‘Thank you, Mr Ryder, thank you.’

‘You’re all very kind,’ I said, smiling at the company in general. ‘Though I ... I really ought to warn you ...’

At that moment someone pushed against me, almost knocking me into the person next to me. I heard someone apologising and someone else saying: ‘Don’t push like that!’ Then another voice said, close to me: ‘I thought that was you out there just now, sir. I’m the one who pointed you out to Gustav. It’s so good of you to come and see us like this. Tonight will be a night we’ll remember for ever. A turning point for every porter in the town.’

‘Look, I have to warn you,’ I said loudly. ‘I’ll do my very best for you, but I have to warn you, I may not be quite the influence I once was. You see ...’

But my words were drowned out by a number of the porters starting up a chorus of ‘hurrahs’ for me. By the second one, the entire company of porters joined in, and then the music momentarily stopped as everyone else in the café joined in for the final, deafening hurrah. Then there was more applause.

‘Thank you, thank you,’ I said, genuinely moved. Then, as the applause began to fade, the red-nosed porter across the table said:

‘You’re very welcome here, sir. You’re a famous and renowned person, but I want you to know we here know a good sort when we see one. That’s right, we haven’t spent so long in this trade without developing a good nose for decency. You’re decent through and through, we can all see that. Decent and kind. You might think we’re all welcoming you now simply because you’re going to help us. And of course, we’re grateful to you. But I know this crowd, they’ve really taken to you, and they wouldn’t have done so if you weren’t a decent sort. If you’d been too proud, or insincere in any way, they’d have sniffed you out. Oh yes. Of course, they’d still have felt grateful, they’d have treated you well, but they wouldn’t be taking to you like this. What I’m trying to say, sir, is that even if you hadn’t been famous, if you were just some stranger who’d stumbled in here by accident, once we’d seen you were all right, once you’d explained you were far from home and were looking for some company, we’d have welcomed you. We wouldn’t have received you so differently from the way we did just now, once we’d seen what a good sort you were. Oh yes, we’re not nearly so stand-offish here as people say. From now on, sir, you can count each of us as your friend.’

‘That’s right,’ said someone to my right. ‘We’re your friends now. If you’re ever in any difficulty in this town, you’ll be able to rely on us.’

‘Thank you so much,’ I said. ‘Thank you. I’ll do my best for you all tonight. But really, I have to warn you ...’

‘Sir, please.’ It was Gustav talking gently near my ear. ‘Please stop worrying. Everything will be fine. Why not enjoy yourself for a few minutes at least?’

‘But I just wanted to warn these good friends of yours ...’

‘Really, sir,’ Gustav went on quietly. ‘Your dedication is admirable. But you worry too much. Please relax and enjoy yourself. Just for a few minutes. Look at us. All of us here have worries. I myself have to be off shortly to the concert hall again, back to all that work. But when we meet like this here, we’re glad to be among friends and we forget about things. We unwind and enjoy ourselves.’ Then Gustav raised his voice over the hubbub. ‘Come on, let’s show Mr Ryder how we really enjoy ourselves! Let’s show him how we do it!’

This pronouncement was met by a cheer and another burst of applause, then the applause turned into rhythmic clapping all around the table. The gypsies began to play faster in time with the clapping, and some of the other customers looking on began also to clap. I noticed too people elsewhere in the room actually breaking off their conversations and turning their seats around as though to witness an eagerly awaited spectacle. Someone I supposed was the proprietor – a dark, lanky man – emerged from a back room and stood leaning on the door frame, evidently just as anxious not to miss what was to follow.

Meanwhile the porters kept up their clapping, becoming ever more mirthful, some of them thumping the floor with their feet to emphasise the beat. Then two waiters appeared and began hurriedly to clear the surface of the table. Beer glasses, coffee cups, sugar pots, ashtrays all vanished in an instant, and then one of the porters, a heavy bearded man, climbed up onto the table top. Behind his bushy beard his face was bright red, whether from embarrassment or from drinking I could not tell. In any case, once up on the table he seemed to have little inhibition and with a grin began to dance.

It was a curious, static dance, the feet hardly leaving the table surface, with the emphasis on the statuesque qualities of the human body rather than its agility or mobile grace. The bearded porter adopted a pose like some Greek god, his arms positioned as though carrying an invisible burden, and as the clapping and the shouts of encouragement continued, he would subtly change the angle of his hip or rotate himself slowly. I wondered for a moment if the whole thing was supposed to be comic, but for all the exuberant laughter around the table, it soon became clear there was no satiric intention in the performance. As I watched the bearded porter, someone nudged me and said:

‘This is it, Mr Ryder. Our dance. The Porters’ Dance. You’ve heard about it, I’m sure.’

‘Yes,’ I said. ‘Ah yes. So this is the Porters’ Dance.’

‘This is it. But you haven’t seen anything yet.’ The speaker grinned and nudged me again.

I became aware that a large brown cardboard box was being passed around from porter to porter. The box had roughly the dimensions of a suitcase, though to judge from the way it was being tossed through the air, it was light and empty. The box travelled around the table for a few minutes then, at a particular point in the dance, was thrown up to the bearded porter. There was something well-practised about the whole routine. At the precise moment the bearded porter switched pose and raised his arms up again, the cardboard box came through the air, landing smartly in his hands.

The bearded porter reacted as though he had caught a slab of stone - bringing a growl of apprehension from his audience - and for a second or two looked certain to buckle under the weight. But then, with considerable determination, he began to straighten himself, until finally he was standing perfectly upright, the box held against his chest. As cheers greeted this achievement, the bearded porter began slowly to raise the box above his head, until finally he was holding it aloft, both arms absolutely straight. Although in reality, of course, this was no feat at all, there was a dignity and drama to the performance which caused me to join in with the cheering, just as if he really had lifted a huge weight. The bearded porter then proceeded to create with some skill the illusion of his burden getting lighter and lighter. Before long he was holding the box up with one hand, performing little pirouettes as he did so, sometimes tossing the box over his shoulder and catching it behind his back. The lighter the burden became, the more exuberant his colleagues grew. Then, as the bearded porter's feats grew ever more flippant, his colleagues began to look around the table at one another, grinning, egging each other on, until another of their number, a wiry little man with a thin moustache, began to climb onto the table top.

The table wobbled and tilted, but the other porters laughed, as though this were all part of the drama, then held the table firm as the wiry porter clambered up. The bearded man failed at first to notice his colleague and continued to show off his control over the cardboard box, while the wiry porter stood moodily behind him like a man awaiting his turn with a coveted dance partner. Then at last the bearded porter saw the wiry man and threw the box over to him. As he caught the box the wiry porter staggered backwards, and it seemed he might tumble off the table altogether. But he recovered just in time, then, with much effort, straightened himself, the box held on his back. As he did so, the bearded porter, now joining in with the clapping and smiling happily, came down off the table assisted by many hands.

The wiry porter went through much the same procedure as his predecessor, though with many more comic flourishes. He provoked roars of laughter as he pulled funny faces and performed stumbles in the best slapstick fashion. As I watched him, the rhythmic clapping, the gypsy violins, the laughter, the mock hoots of astonishment seemed to fill not just my ears but all my senses. Then, as a third porter replaced the wiry man on the table, I felt the human warmth starting to engulf me. Gustav's sentiments suddenly struck me as profoundly wise. What indeed was the point in worrying so much? It was essential every once in a while to unwind completely and enjoy oneself.

I closed my eyes and let the pleasant atmosphere wash around me, only vaguely conscious that I was still clapping, and that my foot was thumping time on the floorboard. A picture entered my mind of my parents, of the two of them in their horse-drawn carriage approaching the clearing outside the concert hall. I could see the local people - the black-jacketed men, the ladies with their coats and shawls and jewellery - breaking off their conversations and turning towards the sound of horse hooves coming from the darkness of the trees. And then the gleaming carriage would burst into the wash of lights, the handsome horses trotting to a halt, their breaths rising in the night air. And my mother and my father would be peering out of the carriage window, on their faces the first traces of excited anticipation, but also something guarded and reserved, a reluctance to give in completely to the hope that the evening would turn out a glittering triumph. And then, as the liveried coachman hurried to help them down, and a line of dignitaries formed to greet them, they would adopt the wilfully calm smiles I recalled from my childhood, from those rare occasions when my parents invited guests to the house for lunch or dinner.

I opened my eyes and saw there were now two porters up on the table together, performing an amusing routine. Whichever one was holding the box would stagger about on the verge of collapse, threatening to fall off the edge, only to relinquish the box to the other at the last moment. Then I noticed that Boris - who presumably had all this time been sitting somewhere in the café - had come right up to the table and was looking up at the two porters with obvious delight. From the way he clapped and laughed at all the right moments, the little boy was clearly very familiar with all the routines. He was sitting between two large swarthy porters who looked similar enough to be brothers. As I watched, Boris exchanged a remark with one of them, and the man laughed and tweaked playfully the little boy's cheek.

All the activity seemed to be drawing in more and more people from the square and the café was becoming very crowded. I noticed too that although there had been only two gypsy musicians when I had arrived, three others had now joined them and the music of their fiddles was coming from all directions with greater energy than ever. Then someone at the back - I had the impression it was not one of the porters - shouted out: 'Gustav!' and in no time the call had been taken up at the front of our table. 'Gustav! Gustav!' the porters shouted, turning it into a chant. Soon even the nervous-looking porter who had spoken to me earlier and who was now taking his turn up on the table - a spirited if not particularly skilful performance - joined in, so that even as he manipulated the box down his back and around his hip, he did so chanting: 'Gustav! Gustav!'

I looked around for Gustav - he was no longer by my side - and saw that he had gone over to Boris and was saying something into the little boy's ear. One of the swarthy brothers put a hand on Gustav's shoulder and I could see him imploring the elderly porter to take his turn. Gustav smiled and shook his head modestly, to be met only with an intensification in the chanting. Now virtually every person in the room was chanting his name, and even those standing out in the square seemed to be joining in. Finally, giving Boris a weary smile, Gustav rose to his feet.

Being by some years the eldest of the porters, Gustav appeared to have more difficulty clambering up onto the table, but many hands reached forward to help him up. Once on the table, he straightened and smiled at his audience. The nervous-looking porter handed him the box, then promptly got down.

From the start Gustav's routine departed from that established by the earlier dancers. Rather than pretend the box was extremely heavy on first receiving it, he tossed it effortlessly onto one shoulder and made a shrugging motion. This produced loud laughter all round and I could hear cries of 'Good old Gustav!' and 'Trust him!' And then, as he continued to make light of the box, a waiter broke through to the front and tossed up onto the table an actual suitcase. From the way he swung it and the loud thud it produced, the suitcase was clearly not empty. It had landed close to Gustav's feet and a murmur went around the crowd. Then the chanting picked up again, faster than ever: 'Gustav! Gustav! Gustav!' I could see Boris following carefully every move his grandfather made, immense pride across his face, clapping his hands vigorously and joining in with the chanting. Gustav, noticing Boris, smiled once more to him, then reached down and grasped the handle of the suitcase.

As Gustav - still hunched over - brought the suitcase up to his hip, it seemed clear to me he was not faking its weight. Then as he straightened himself, the box still up on his shoulder, the suitcase in his hand, he closed his eyes and his face appeared to cloud over. But no one seemed to notice anything untoward - quite possibly this was a characteristic mannerism of Gustav's before he performed a feat - and the chanting and clapping continued deafeningly over the squealing violins. Sure enough, the next moment, Gustav had opened his eyes again and was smiling broadly at everyone. Then, lifting the suitcase up further, he managed to grip it under his arm, and in this posture - the suitcase under one arm, the box on the opposite shoulder - he began to dance, making some slow shuffling movements with his feet. There were cheers and whoops, and I could hear someone near the entrance asking: 'What's he doing now? I can't see. What's he doing now?'

Then Gustav raised the suitcase up further and continued the dance with the suitcase up on one shoulder, the box on the other. The fact that the suitcase was much heavier than the box obliged him to lean very much to one side, but otherwise he looked at ease and his steps continued to have a sprightliness about them. Boris, beaming with delight, shouted to his grandfather something I could not hear, to which Gustav responded with a wry twist of the head, provoking further hoots and laughter.

Then, as Gustav continued his dance, I became aware of something going on behind me. For some time, someone had been jabbing an elbow into my back with annoying regularity, but I had assumed this had simply to do with the crowd's eagerness to get a good view of the performance. But I now turned and found that, directly behind me, despite the crowd pushing against them on all sides, two waiters were kneeling on the floor packing a suitcase. They had already filled much of it with what looked to be wooden chopping boards from the kitchen. One waiter was arranging the boards into a more dense formation while the other was gesturing impatiently to the back of the café, pointing angrily at the spaces that remained inside the suitcase. Then I could see more chopping boards arriving, two or three at a time, passed hand to hand through the crowd. The waiters worked quickly, packing the boards in until the case seemed full to bursting. But more chopping boards - sometimes just the broken sections of boards - were still coming down, and the waiters with practised ingenuity found ways to squeeze these in too. Perhaps they would have continued to pack more and more into the case, but the jostling of the bodies around them seemed finally to exhaust their patience and they pushed down the lid, tugged at the straps and, pushing past me, heaved the suitcase onto the table.

Boris gave the new suitcase a stare then looked uncertainly up at Gustav. His grandfather was performing a slow shuffle not unlike that of a matador. For the moment the effort required to hold the box and the suitcase on his shoulders seemed to prevent him from noticing the fresh challenge placed before him. Boris watched his grandfather carefully, waiting for the moment he would see the second suitcase. Clearly everyone else was also waiting, but his grandfather went on and on with the dance, pretending to have noticed nothing. This was surely a trick on his part! Almost certainly, his grandfather was teasing the audience, and any moment now, Boris knew, he would pick up the heavy suitcase, perhaps discarding the empty box to do so. But for some reason, Gustav continued not to see it, and now people were shouting and pointing. Then at last Gustav noticed and his face - sandwiched between the box and the first suitcase - took on an expression of dismay. Everyone around Boris laughed and clapped all the harder. Gustav continued slowly to rotate himself but kept his gaze fixed on the new suitcase, his expression still troubled, and for an instant it occurred to Boris that his grandfather was not entirely faking his concern. But then all around him people were laughing, people who had seen his grandfather perform this same routine many times before, and the next moment Boris too was laughing and urging Gustav on. The little boy's voice caught Gustav's attention and once more grandfather and grandson exchanged smiles.

Then Gustav brought the empty box off his shoulder, and as it slid down his arm, with a contemptuousness that was almost graceful, he flicked the thing into the crowd. There was again a mixture of laughter and cheering, and the box, passed back over the heads of the spectators, vanished into the recesses of the room. Then Gustav glanced down again at the new suitcase and hoisted the first higher on his shoulder. He put on once more an expression of grave concern - this time it was without any doubt entirely mock - and Boris laughed along with everyone else. Then Gustav began to bend at the knees. He did so very slowly, whether because of infirmity or out of showmanship was not clear, until he was crouching, the first suitcase still held on one shoulder, his free arm reaching for the handle of the suitcase at his feet. Then steadily, slowly, as the clapping continued, he raised himself again to a standing position, the heavier suitcase coming up with him.

Gustav was now mimicking enormous effort - much as the bearded porter had done earlier when he had first caught the cardboard box. Boris watched, pride welling inside him, turning occasionally from his grandfather to look at the admiring faces of the spectators pressing in around him. Even the gypsy musicians were now jockeying for a better view, employing the vigorous movement of their bowing elbows as a covert means to jostle. One fiddler had by this method made his way right to the front, so that he was now playing his violin leaning right over the table, his waist pressed against its edge.

Then Gustav again began to shuffle his feet. The weight of the two suitcases, particularly the one filled with the chopping boards which he did not attempt to hoist onto his shoulder - surely a physical impossibility - meant his steps now had only a nominal spring to them, but it was impressive nevertheless and the crowd became ecstatic. 'Good old Gustav!' the cries were going up again, and Boris too, unfamiliar though he was with this way of addressing his grandfather, called out at the top of his voice: 'Good old Gustav! Good old Gustav!'

Again the old porter appeared to hear Boris's voice above the rest and although this time he did not turn and acknowledge the little boy - he was pretending to be much too concerned with his suitcases to do such a thing - a fresh jauntiness entered his movements. He started again to rotate slowly and his back lost the last hint of a slouch. For a moment Gustav looked magnificent, poised like a statue on the table top, one suitcase on his shoulder, the other at his hip, rotating to the clapping and the music. Then he appeared to stumble, but recovered almost immediately, and the crowd gave an 'ooh!' and more laughter at this little variation.

Then Boris became aware of some commotion behind him and saw that the two waiters were back, once more fussing with something on the floor, pushing back people around them to make room for their work. Both men were on their knees and were grappling with what looked like a large golfing bag. Their manner was cross and impatient - perhaps they were annoyed at the way the people pressing around them seemed forever to bump their knees into them. Boris glanced back at his grandfather, and then, when he looked again behind him, saw one of the waiters holding open the mouth of the bag as though something large was about to be slid into it. Sure enough, the other waiter emerged through the crowd, walking backwards, pushing people aside brusquely, dragging some object along the floor. Squeezing a little way back into the crowd, Boris saw that the object was a piece of machinery. It was hard to get a view - people's legs were in the way - but the object was an old engine of some kind, either from a motor bike or perhaps a speedboat. The two waiters were working hard to get it into the golfing bag, pulling at the already taut material, tugging at the zipper. Looking up again, Boris saw that his grandfather was still in full control of the two suitcases, showing no sign of needing to stop. The crowd, in any case, had no intention of letting him do so yet. And then there was a movement around him and the two waiters had heaved the golfing bag up onto the table.

There was for a moment a rise in the hubbub as word of the bag's arrival passed from the front to those further back. Gustav did not notice the golfing bag immediately because his eyes were for the moment tightly shut in concentration, but soon enough the urgings of the crowd made him look around. His gaze fixed on the golfing bag and for a second Gustav looked very serious. Then he smiled and continued to rotate slowly. Then as before, though with nothing like the ease, he slid the lighter of the suitcases off his shoulder and down his arm. As it fell, Gustav, with a supreme effort, managed to push up his arm so that the suitcase was hoisted up towards the crowd. Being much heavier than the empty box, it could hardly describe a neat arc, and it bounced on the table top before falling into the arms of the porters at the front. The first suitcase, like the box earlier, vanished into the crowd, and all eyes were again fixed on Gustav. The chanting of his name started up again and the old man looked carefully at the golfing bag near his feet. The momentary relief of carrying only the one object - albeit the suitcase filled with chopping boards - seemed to give him new energy. He pulled a long face and shook his head doubtfully at the golfing bag, prompting the crowd to urge him on all the more. 'Come on, Gustav, you show them!' Boris could hear the porter next to him shouting.

Gustav then began to raise the heavy suitcase up to the shoulder on which earlier he had held the lighter one. He did this with deliberation, his eyes closed, crouched down on one knee, then slowly straightening. His legs quivered once or twice, and then he stood steady, the suitcase safely on his shoulder, his free arm outstretched towards the golfing bag. Suddenly a fear went through Boris and he shouted: 'No!' but this was drowned out in the chanting and the laughter, the 'oohs' and sighs of the crowd around him.

'Come on, Gustav!' the porter next to him was shouting. 'Show them what you can do! You show them!'

'No! No! Grandfather! Grandfather!'

‘Good old Gustav!’ voices were shouting. ‘Come on! Show them what you can do!’

‘Grandfather! Grandfather!’ Boris was now stretching his arms out across the table to catch his grandfather’s attention, but Gustav’s face remained grim with concentration, staring with enormous intensity at the strap of the golfing bag lying on the table surface. Then the elderly porter began to lower himself again, his whole body trembling under the weight of the suitcase on his shoulder, his hand grasping prematurely for the strap still some distance below him. There was a new tension in the room, a feeling perhaps that Gustav was at last attempting a feat that stretched even his abilities. The atmosphere, for all that, remained festive, the chanting of his name celebratory.

Boris searched appealingly the faces of the adults around him, then tugged at the arm of the porter next to him.

‘No! No! That’s enough. Grandfather’s done enough!’

The bearded porter – for it was he – looked at the little boy with surprise, then said with a laugh: ‘Don’t worry, don’t worry. Your grandfather’s magnificent. He can do this and much more. Much more. He’s magnificent.’

‘No! Grandfather’s done enough now!’

But no one, not even the bearded porter – who had placed a reassuring arm around Boris’s shoulder – was listening. For Gustav was now crouched virtually down to the table, his hand only an inch or two from the strap of the golfing bag. Then he had grasped it and, with his body still crouched low, positioned the strap around his free shoulder. He tugged the strap closer to himself and then began once more the ascent to a standing position. Boris shouted and banged the table top, then at last Gustav noticed him. His grandfather had already started to straighten his legs, but he stopped and for a second the two of them stared at each other.

‘No.’ Boris shook his head. ‘No. Grandfather’s done enough.’

Perhaps Gustav could not hear in all the noise, but he appeared to understand his grandson’s sentiments well enough. He nodded quickly, a reassuring smile flashed across his face, and then his eyes closed again in concentration.

‘No! No! Grandfather!’ Boris tugged again the bearded porter’s arm.

‘What’s the matter?’ the bearded porter asked, tears of laughter in his eyes. Then, without waiting for a reply, he turned his attention back to Gustav, joining in more loudly than ever with the chanting.

Gustav continued slowly to straighten himself. Once, twice, his body shook as though it might buckle. His face became strangely flushed. His jaw clenched furiously, his cheeks grew distorted, the muscles on his neck stood out. Even in the heavy din, the elderly porter’s breathing seemed audible. Yet no one other than Boris seemed to notice any of this.

‘Don’t worry, your grandfather’s magnificent!’ the bearded man said. ‘This is nothing! He does it every week!’

Gustav continued to straighten more and more, the golfing bag hanging from one shoulder, the suitcase hoisted up on the other. Then at last he was standing completely straight, his face quivering but triumphant, and for the first time in many minutes the rhythmic clapping broke down into wild applause and cheering. The fiddles too broke into a slower, grander melody befitting a finale. Gustav rotated slowly, his eyes barely open, his face a contortion of pain and dignity.

‘That’s enough! Grandfather! Stop! Stop!’

Gustav went on turning, determined to display his achievement to every eye in the room. Then something inside him seemed suddenly to snap. He paused abruptly, and for a second seemed to rock gently, swaying as though in a breeze. The next instant he had recovered again and was continuing with his rotation. When he had come back to exactly the position in which he had first stood upright, only then did he begin to lower the suitcase from his shoulder. He let it fall to the table with a loud slam - it was too heavy, he had judged, to throw into the crowd without risk of injury to a spectator - then pushed it with his foot until it slid off the edge of the table into the arms of his waiting colleagues.

The crowd was now cheering and applauding, and then a section of it started to sing a song - some swaying ballad with Hungarian lyrics - along with the tune the gypsies were playing. More and more took up the song and very soon the whole room was singing. Up on the table, Gustav was lowering the golfing bag. It fell to the table with a metallic bang. This time he did not attempt to push it into the crowd, but held his arms aloft for a second - even this gesture now seemed to cost him greatly - then hastened to get down from the table. Numerous hands assisted him, and Boris watched his grandfather lower himself safely to the floor.

The room seemed now to have become preoccupied with the singing. The ballad had a sweet nostalgic quality to it, and as they sang people everywhere were starting to link arms so they could sway along together. One of the gypsy fiddlers climbed onto the table, to be quickly joined by a second, and soon the two of them were leading the whole room, moving their bodies in time even as they played their instruments.

Boris pushed through the crowd to where his grandfather was standing recovering his breath. Oddly, although Gustav had only a few seconds before been the focus of every gaze in the room, no one seemed now to pay much attention as grandfather and grandson embraced deeply, their eyes closed, making no attempt to hide from each other their immense relief. After what seemed a long time, Gustav smiled down at Boris, but the little boy went on holding his grandfather tightly, not opening his eyes.

‘Boris,’ Gustav said. ‘Boris. There’s something you must promise me.’

The little boy gave no response other than to continue holding his grandfather.

‘Boris, listen. You’re a good boy. If something ever happens to me, if something ever does, you’ll have to take my place. You see, your mother and father, they’re fine people. But sometimes they find it hard. They’re not strong like you and me. So you see, if something happens to me, and I’m no longer here, you must be the strong one. You must look after your mother and father, keep the family strong, keep it together.’ Gustav released Boris from the embrace and gave him a smile. ‘You’ll promise me that, won’t you, Boris?’

Boris appeared to give this consideration, then nodded seriously. Then, the next moment, they seemed to become engulfed by the crowd and I could no longer see them. Someone was pulling at my sleeve, imploring me to link arms and join in the singing.

Looking around me, I saw that the other fiddlers had joined the two up on the table and the entire room appeared to be revolving around them united in song. Many more people had come into the café and the room was now virtually solid with bodies. I saw too that the doors were still open to the square, and that in the darkness outside people were also swaying and singing. I linked arms with a large man – a porter as far as I could guess – and a fat woman who presumably had walked in off the square, and found myself going round the room with them on either side of me. I was not familiar with the song being sung, but then I came to realise that most people present did not know the lyrics either, or have any familiarity with the Hungarian language, and were simply singing vague approximations of what they imagined the words to be. The man and woman on either side of me, for instance, were singing quite different things, both entirely without embarrassment or hesitation. Indeed, a moment's attention revealed they were both singing nonsense words, but this seemed to matter little, and before long I too became caught up in the atmosphere and began to sing, making up words I thought sounded vaguely Hungarian. For some reason, this worked surprisingly well - I found more and more such words pouring out of me with gratifying ease - and before long I was singing with considerable emotion.

Eventually, perhaps twenty minutes later, I saw the crowd was at last starting to thin. I could see too the waiters sweeping up and returning tables to their original positions around the café. There was however a sizeable group of us still circling the room, arms linked together, singing passionately. The gypsies also had remained up on the table, displaying no signs of wishing to stop their playing. As I went around the room, carried along by the gentle tugs and pushes of my companions, I felt someone tapping me and looked over my shoulder to find the man I assumed was the café proprietor smiling at me. He was a lanky man and as I continued to sway along he obligingly kept up with me, adopting a crouched shuffle somewhat reminiscent of Groucho Marx.

'Mr Ryder, you look very tired.' He was shouting virtually in my ear, but I could still only just hear him above the singing. 'And you have such a long and important evening in front of you. Please, why don't you rest for a few minutes? We have a comfortable back room, my wife has prepared the couch with some blankets and cushions, she's turned on the gas fire. You'll find it very comfortable. You could just curl up and sleep for a while. The room's small, that's true, but it's right at the back and very quiet. No one will come in and disturb you, we'll make sure of that. You'll find it very comfortable. Really, sir, I think you should take advantage of the little time you now have before the evening really begins. Please, come this way. You look so tired. '

As much as I was enjoying the singing and the company, I realised I was indeed immensely tired and that there was much sense in his suggestion. In fact the idea of a short rest appealed to me more and more, and as the proprietor continued to shuffle after me with a smile, I began to feel a deep gratitude towards him, not only for this kind offer, but also for having provided the facilities of this wonderful café, and for his generosity towards the porters - an obviously under-appreciated group within the community. I unlinked my arms, smiling my farewells to the people on either side, and then the proprietor had placed a hand on my shoulder and was guiding me towards a door at the back of the café.

He led me through a darkened room - I could make out stacks of merchandise piled up against the walls - and then opened another door through which a low warm light was visible.

'Here,' the proprietor said, ushering me in. 'Just relax here on the couch. Keep this door closed, and if it gets too warm just turn the gas fire down to the lower setting. Don't worry, it's perfectly safe.'

The fire was the only source of light in the room. In the orange glow I discerned the couch, which smelt musty but not unpleasant, and then before I realised it the door had closed, leaving me alone. I climbed onto the couch, which was just long enough for me to lie down on provided I curled my knees, and pulled up the blanket the proprietor's wife had left out for me.

IV

I awoke with the panicky sense that I had slept far too long. In fact my first thought was that it was now morning and that I had missed the whole of the evening's proceedings. But when I sat up on the couch I saw that apart from the glow of the gas fire everything around me was still dark.

I went to the window and pulled back the curtain. I found myself looking down on a narrow back yard taken up by several large dustbins. A light left on somewhere was dimly illuminating the yard, but I noticed too that the sky was no longer entirely dark and the fear went through me again that dawn was approaching. Letting go of the curtain, I began to make my way out of the room, bitterly regretting having ever taken up the café proprietor's offer of a place to rest.

I stepped into the small connecting room where earlier I had seen merchandise piled against the walls. The room was now in utter blackness and I twice bumped into hard objects as I groped about for a doorway. Eventually I came out into the main section of the café where not so long ago we had all danced and sung with so much good feeling. A little light was coming in from the windows facing the square and I could make out the jumbled shapes of chairs piled on top of tables. I made my way past them, and reaching the main doors looked out through the glass panels.

Nothing was stirring outside. The solitary street lamp at the centre of the empty square accounted for the light coming into the café, but I noticed again how the sky appeared to carry the first hints of morning. As I went on gazing out at the square, I found myself becoming increasingly angry. I could now see how I had allowed too many things to distract me from my central priorities - to the extent that I had now slept through a substantial part of this most crucial of evenings in my life. Then my anger became mingled with a sense of despair and for a while I felt close to tears.

But then, as I continued to look at the night sky, I began to wonder if I had imagined the signs of dawn breaking. Indeed, now that I studied it more carefully, I saw the sky was still very dark, and the thought struck me that it was still relatively early and that I had begun to panic quite needlessly. For all I knew, it was still possible to arrive at the concert hall in time to witness much of the evening's events, and certainly to make my own contribution.

I had all the while been absent-mindedly rattling the doors. I now noticed the system of bolts and, unlatching each in turn, wandered out into the square.

The air felt wonderfully refreshing after the stuffiness of the café, and had I not been so short of time I would have strolled about the square for a few moments to clear my head. As it was, I set off purposefully in search of the concert hall.

For the next several minutes I hurried through the empty streets, past the closed cafés and shops, without once catching sight of the domed roof. The Old Town under the street lamps had a distinct charm about it, but the longer I went on walking the harder it became to suppress a sense of panic. I had expected, not unreasonably, to encounter a few taxis cruising the night; at the least a few people, perhaps drifting out of some late-night establishment, from whom I could get directions. But apart from some stray cats I appeared to be the only thing awake for miles around.

I crossed a tram line, then found myself walking along the embankment of a canal. There was a chilly wind blowing across the water and, with still no sign of the concert hall, I could not avoid the feeling that I was getting myself thoroughly lost. I had decided to try a turning a little way in front of me - a narrow street going off at a fine angle

- when I heard footsteps and saw a woman emerge from out of it.

I had grown so accustomed to the idea of the streets being completely deserted that I stopped in my tracks at the sight of her. My surprise had been compounded, moreover, by the fact that she was dressed in a flowing evening gown. The woman for her part had also stopped, but she seemed then to recognise me and with a smile started towards me again. As she stepped further into the lamplight, I saw she was in her late forties, perhaps even her early fifties. She was slightly plump, but carried herself with considerable grace.

‘Good evening, madam,’ I said. ‘I wonder if you might help me. I was looking for the concert hall. Am I going in the right direction?’

The woman had now come right up to me. Smiling again, she said:

‘No, actually it’s over that way. I’ve just come from it. I was walking to take the air, but I’ll gladly guide you back there, Mr Ryder. If you don’t object, that is.’

‘It would be a great pleasure, madam. But I don’t want to cut short your walk.’

‘No, no. I’ve already been walking for nearly an hour. It’s time I got back. I should really have waited and arrived with all the other guests. But I had this foolish notion I should be there through all the preparations, just in case I was needed. Of course, there’s nothing for me to do. Mr Ryder, please excuse me, I’ve not introduced myself. I’m Christine Hoffman. My husband is the manager of your hotel.’

‘I’m delighted to meet you, Mrs Hoffman. Your husband has told me a great deal about you.’

I regretted this remark as soon as it had left my mouth. I glanced quickly at Mrs Hoffman, but could no longer see her face clearly in the light.

‘It’s this way, Mr Ryder,’ she said. ‘It’s not far.’

The sleeves of her evening dress billowed as we started to walk. I coughed and said:

‘May I take it, from what you say, Mrs Hoffman, that proceedings are not yet fully under way at the concert hall? That the guests and so on, they’ve not yet all arrived?’

‘The guests? Oh no. I shouldn’t imagine any guests will arrive for at least another hour.’

‘Ah. Fine.’

We continued at an easy pace along the canal, both of us turning from time to time to gaze at the reflection of the lamps in the water.

‘I was wondering, Mr Ryder,’ she said eventually, ‘if my husband, when he spoke about me, if he left you with the impression that I was ... a rather cold person. I wonder if he left you with that impression.’

I gave a short laugh. ‘The overwhelming impression he left me with, Mrs Hoffman, was that he’s extremely devoted to you.’

She continued to walk in silence and I was not sure she had registered my reply. After a while she said:

‘When I was young, Mr Ryder, no one would ever have thought to describe me in such a way. As a cold person. Certainly when I was a child, I was anything but cold. Even now, I can’t think of myself like that.’

I mumbled something vaguely diplomatic. Then, as we turned away from the canal into a narrow side-street, I saw at last the domed roof of the concert hall illuminated against the night sky.

‘Even these days,’ Mrs Hoffman said beside me, ‘early in the morning, I have these dreams. Always early in the morning. The dreams are always about ... about tenderness.’

Nothing much happens in them, they're usually no more than little fragments. I might be watching my son, Stephan, for instance. Watching him play in the garden. We were very close once, Mr Ryder, when he was small. I'd comfort him, share his little triumphs with him. We were so close when he was small. Or sometimes a dream might be about my husband. The other morning, I dreamt my husband and I were unpacking a suitcase together. We were in some bedroom and we were unpacking it onto the bed. We might have been in an hotel room abroad or perhaps we were at home. In any case, we were unpacking this suitcase together and there was this ... this comfortable feeling between us. There we were, performing this task together. He'd take something out, then I'd take something out. Talking all the time, about nothing special, just exchanging conversation while we unpacked. It was only the morning before last, I had this dream. Then I woke up and I lay there looking at the dawn through the curtains, feeling very happy. I said to myself, it might soon really be like that. Later that very day, even, we would make a moment just like that one. We wouldn't necessarily unpack a suitcase, of course. But something, we'd do something later in the day, there'd be some chance. I fell asleep again, telling myself this, feeling very happy. Then the morning came. It's an odd thing, Mr Ryder, it happens like this every time. As soon as the day starts, this other thing, this force, it comes and takes over. And whatever I do, everything between us just goes another way, not the way I want it. I fight against it, Mr Ryder, but over the years I've steadily lost ground. It's something that's ... that's happening to me. My husband tries very hard, tries to help me, but it's no use. By the time I go down to breakfast, all the things I felt in the dream, they've long since gone.'

Some parked cars on the pavement obliged us to walk in single file and Mrs Hoffman moved a few steps ahead of me. When I drew up alongside her again, I asked:

'What do you suppose it is? This force you talk of?'

She laughed suddenly. 'I didn't mean it to sound quite so supernatural, Mr Ryder. Of course, the obvious answer would be that it's all to do with Mr Christoff. That's what I believed for some time. Certainly, that's what my husband believes, I know. Like many people in this city I thought it simply a matter of replacing Mr Christoff in our affections with someone more substantial. But lately I'm not at all sure. I'm coming to believe it might be to do with me. A sort of illness I have. It might even be part of the ageing process. After all, we get older and parts of us start to die. Perhaps we start to die emotionally too. Do you think that's possible, Mr Ryder? I do fear it, I do fear that might be the truth of it. That we shall see off Mr Christoff, only to find, in my particular case at least, that nothing has changed.'

We turned another corner. The pavements were very narrow and we moved into the centre of the street. I had the impression she was waiting for my response, and said eventually:

'Mrs Hoffman, in my opinion, whatever the facts about the ageing process, I would say it's essential for you to keep up your spirits. To not give in to this ... whatever it is.'

Mrs Hoffman looked up at the night sky and walked on for a while without replying. Then she said: 'These lovely dreams in the early morning. When the day starts and none of it happens, I often blame myself bitterly. But I assure you, I haven't given up yet, Mr Ryder. If I gave up, there'd be very little left in my life. I refuse just yet to let go of my dreams. I still want one day a warm and close family. But it's not just that, Mr Ryder. You see, I may be quite silly in believing this, perhaps you can tell me if I am. But one day, you see, I hope to catch it out, this whatever it is. I hope to catch it out and then it won't matter, all these years it's been steadily working on me, they'll all be wiped away. I have this feeling, that all it will take will be one moment, even a tiny moment, provided it's the correct one. Like a cord suddenly snapping and a thick curtain dropping to the floor to reveal a whole new world, a world full of sunlight and warmth. Mr Ryder, you look utterly incredulous. Am I completely mad to believe this? That despite all these years, just one moment, the right moment, will change it all?'

What she had taken for incredulity had been nothing of the sort. Rather, while she had been speaking, I had remembered about Stephan's forthcoming recital and no doubt my excitement had made itself obvious. I now said, perhaps a little eagerly:

'Mrs Hoffman, I don't wish to raise any false hopes. But it's possible, just possible, you'll experience something very soon, something that might well be such a moment, exactly of the sort you talk of. It's just possible you'll encounter such a moment in the very near future. Something that will surprise you, force you to re-assess everything and see everything in a better, fresher light. Something that will indeed wipe away all these bad years. I don't wish to raise false hopes, I'm merely saying it's possible. Such a moment might even occur tonight, so it's essential you keep up your spirits.'

I stopped myself, the thought striking me that I was tempting fate. After all, although I had been impressed by the snatch of Stephan's playing I had caught, for all I knew the young man was perfectly capable of crumbling under pressure. In fact, the more I thought about it, the more I regretted having intimated as much as I had. When I looked at Mrs Hoffman, however, I noticed my words had neither surprised nor excited her. After a few moments she said:

'When you found me wandering these streets just now, Mr Ryder, I wasn't simply taking the air as I pretended. I was trying to prepare myself. Because the possibility you mention, it naturally did occur to me. A night like tonight.'

Yes, many things are possible. So I was preparing myself. And I don't mind confessing to you, I am at this moment a little frightened. Because you see, just occasionally in the past, such moments have come and I've not been strong enough to seize them. Who knows how many more such chances there will be? So you see, Mr Ryder, I was doing my best to prepare myself. Ah, here we are. This is the rear of the building. This entrance will take you into the kitchens. I'll show you to the performers' entrance. I won't come in myself just yet. I think I need to take a little more air. '

'I'm very glad to have met you, Mrs Hoffman. It's kind of you to have shown me here at such a time for you. I do hope everything goes well for you tonight. '

'Thank you, Mr Ryder. And you too, you have a lot to think about, I'm sure. It's been delightful to meet you. '

As Mrs Hoffman disappeared into the night, I turned and hurried towards the doorway she had indicated. I did so telling myself that I should heed fully the lesson of the false alarm I had just experienced; that it was imperative I did not let anything further deflect me from the crucial tasks in front of me. In fact, at this moment, on the point at last of entering the concert hall building, everything seemed suddenly very simple to me. The fact of the matter was that finally, after all these years, I was about to perform once more before my parents. The priority above all else, then, was to ensure that my performance was the richest, the most overwhelming of which I was capable. By comparison, even the question-and-answer session was a secondary consideration. All the setbacks, all the chaos of the preceding days would prove to have been of no consequence whatsoever provided I could now achieve, on this evening, my one central objective.

The broad white door was dimly illuminated from above by a single night light. I had to lean my weight on it before it would open and I entered the building with a slight stumble.

Although Mrs Hoffman had been confident this was the performers' entrance, my immediate impression was that I had come in through the kitchens after all. I was in a wide bare corridor lit harshly with fluorescent ceiling strips. From all around came the sound of voices calling and shouting, the clanging of heavy metallic objects, the hissing of water and steam. Directly in front of me was a catering trolley beside which two men in uniforms were arguing furiously. One man was holding a long piece of paper which had unrolled almost to his feet, and was repeatedly thrusting his finger at it. I thought about interrupting them to ask where I might find

Hoffman - my first concern now being to carry out an inspection of the auditorium, and of the piano itself, before the public began to arrive - but they seemed lost in their argument and I decided to walk on.

The corridor curved gradually. I encountered a good many people, but they all seemed very busy and somewhat fraught. Most of them, dressed in white uniforms, were hurrying with distracted expressions, carrying heavy sacks or else pushing trolleys. I did not feel inclined to stop any of them and carried on down the corridor assuming I would eventually reach some other section of the building where I would find the dressing rooms - and hopefully Hoffman or someone else who could show me the facilities. But then I realised a voice behind me was calling my name and turned to find a man running after me. He looked familiar, and then I recognised the bearded porter who had opened the dancing at the café earlier in the evening.

‘Mr Ryder,’ he said panting, ‘thank God I’ve found you at last. This is the third time I’ve gone round the building. He’s holding out well, but we’re all anxious to get him to hospital and he’s still insisting on not budging until he’s spoken to you. Please, it’s this way, sir. He’s holding out well, though, God bless him.’

‘Who’s holding out well? What’s happened?’

‘It’s this way, sir. We’d better go quickly, if you don’t mind. I’m sorry, Mr Ryder, I’m not explaining anything. It’s Gustav, he’s been taken ill. I wasn’t here myself when it happened, but a couple of the boys, Wilhelm and Hubert, they were working here with him, helping with the preparations, and they sent out the word. Of course as soon as I heard I sped over here and so did all the other boys. Apparently Gustav had been working very well, but then he went to the washroom and didn’t come out for a long time. This not being at all like Gustav, Wilhelm went in and had a look. It seems, sir, when he went in, Gustav was standing over a sink, his head bowed over it. He wasn't so ill at that stage, he told Wilhelm he felt a bit giddy, that was all, and not to make a fuss. Wilhelm being Wilhelm, he wasn't sure what to do, especially with Gustav saying not to make a fuss, and so he went and got Hubert. Hubert took one look and decided Gustav had to lie down somewhere. So they got on either side of him to help him, and that's when they realised he'd passed out, still on his feet, gripping the sink. He was gripping the edges, really gripping them, and Wilhelm says they had to prise off his fingers one by one. Then Gustav seemed to come to a bit and they each took an arm and brought him out of there. And Gustav, he was saying again how he didn't want any fuss, how he was all right and could carry on working. But Hubert wouldn't hear of it and they put him in one of the dressing rooms, one of the empty ones.'

He had been leading the way down the corridor at a considerable pace, talking all the time over his shoulder, but now broke off as we dodged past a trolley.

'This is all very disturbing,' I said. 'Exactly when did this all happen?'

'I suppose it must have been a couple of hours ago. He didn't seem so bad at first and insisted all he needed was a few minutes to get his breath back. But Hubert was worried and sent out the word and we were all round here in no time, every one of us. We found a mattress for him to lie on, and a blanket, but then he seemed to get worse and we all talked about it and said he should get proper help. But Gustav wouldn't hear of it, he suddenly got very determined and said he had to speak to you, sir. He was very insistent, he said he'd go along to hospital soon enough if that's what we decided, but not before he'd spoken with you. And there he was getting worse right before our eyes. But there was no reasoning with him, sir, and so we went out searching for you again. Thank God I found you. It's this one here, the one on the end.'

I had imagined the corridor to be a continuous circuit, but I now saw that it came to an end at a cream-coloured wall ahead of us. The last door before the wall was ajar and, stopping at the threshold, the bearded porter peered cautiously into the room. Then he gestured to me and I stepped in after him.

There were a dozen or so people just inside the doorway who all turned to us, then hastily stood aside. I supposed these to be the other porters, but I did not pause to look at them carefully, my gaze being drawn to Gustav's figure on the other side of the small room.

He was lying on a mattress across the tiled floor, a blanket over his body. One of the porters was squatting down beside him saying something softly, but on seeing me stood up. Then within a moment the room had emptied, the door had closed behind me and I was alone with Gustav.

The small dressing room contained no furniture, not even a wooden chair. It was windowless and, though the ventilation grid near the ceiling was emitting a low hum, the air felt stale. The floor felt cold and hard, and the overhead light had either been extinguished or was not working, leaving the bulbs around the make-up mirror as our only source of light. I could see well enough, though, how Gustav's face had gone an odd grey colour. He was lying on his back, quite still except when every now and then some wave passed over him causing him to press his head back deeper into the mattress. He had smiled at me the moment I had entered, but had said nothing, no doubt saving himself for when we were alone. He now said, in a voice that was weak, but otherwise surprisingly composed:

'I'm very sorry, sir, to have dragged you here like this. It's most galling this should have happened, and tonight of all nights. Just when you're about to do your great favour for us.'

‘Yes, yes,’ I said quickly, ‘but look here. How are you feeling?’ I crouched down beside him.

‘I don’t suppose I’m so well. And in time I think I ought to go along to the hospital and have a few things checked out.’

He paused as another wave swept over him, and for a few seconds a quiet struggle ensued there on the mattress during which time the elderly porter closed his eyes. Then he opened them again and said:

‘I had to speak to you, sir. There was something I had to speak to you about.’

‘Please, let me assure you at once,’ I said, ‘that I remain as committed as ever to your cause. In fact, I’m very much looking forward to demonstrating to all the assembled tonight the unfairness of the treatment you and your colleagues have endured over the years. I fully intend to highlight the many misunderstandings ...’

I stopped, realising he was making an effort to attract my attention.

‘I didn’t doubt for a minute, sir,’ he said after a pause, ‘you’d be as good as your word. I’m very grateful to you for standing up for us like this. But it was about something else I wished to speak to you.’ He paused again and another silent struggle commenced under the blanket.

‘Really,’ I said, ‘I wonder if it wouldn’t be wise to go straight away to the hospital ...’

‘No, no. Please. Once I go to hospital, well, then it might all be too late. You see, it’s really time now I spoke to her. To Sophie, I mean. I really must speak to her. I know you’re very busy tonight, but you see, no one else knows. About the situation between me and Sophie, about our understanding. I know it’s a lot to ask, sir, but I wondered if you might go and explain things to her. There's no one else who could do it.'

'I'm sorry,' I said, genuinely puzzled. 'Explain what exactly?'

'Explain to her, sir. Why our understanding ... why it has to finish now. It won't be easy to persuade her of it, after all these years. But if you could try and make her see why we have to try and end it now. I realise it's a lot to ask of you, but then it's a little while yet until you're expected on the stage. And as I say, you're the only one who knows ...'

He trailed off as another wave of pain engulfed him. I could sense all his muscles bracing themselves under the blanket, but this time he continued to gaze at me, somehow keeping his eyes open even as his whole frame shook. When his body had slackened again, I said:

'It's true, there's a little time yet until I'm required. Very well, I'll go and see what I can do. I'll try and make her understand. In any case, I'll bring her here as quickly as possible. But let's hope you'll recover very soon and the present situation will prove to have been not as crucial as you feared ...'

'Sir, please. I'd be very grateful if you'd bring her here quickly. Meanwhile I'll of course do all I can to hold out ...'

'Yes, yes, I'll set off straight away. Please be patient, I'll be as fast as I can.'

I rose to my feet and started for the door. I had almost reached it when a thought occurred to me and, turning, I made my way back to the figure on the floor.

'Boris,' I said to him, crouching down again. 'What about Boris? Should I bring him here too?'

Gustav looked up at me, then took a deep breath and closed his eyes. When he had not spoken for some moments, I said:

‘Perhaps it’s best he doesn’t see you in this ... this present condition.’

I thought I saw the faintest of nods, but Gustav remained silent, his eyes still closed.

‘After all,’ I went on, ‘he has a certain picture of you. Perhaps you’ll want him to remember you that way.’

This time Gustav nodded more definitely.

‘I just thought I should ask you,’ I said, rising to my feet again. ‘Very well. I’ll bring just Sophie here. I won’t be long.’

I had reached the door again – I was already turning the handle – when he suddenly shouted behind me:

‘Mr Ryder!’

Not only had he called surprisingly loudly, his voice had contained such a peculiar intensity I could hardly believe it had emerged from Gustav. And yet when I looked back at him, his eyes were again closed and he seemed quite still. I hurried to him once more with some apprehension. But then Gustav opened his eyes and looked up at me.

‘You must bring Boris too,’ he said very quietly. ‘He’s not so small now. Let him see me like this. He has to learn about life. Face up to it.’

The eyes closed again and as his features tightened I thought he was suffering another fit of pain. But this time there was something different, and as I looked down in concern I realised that the old man was crying. I continued to watch for a moment, not sure what to do. Finally I touched his shoulder gently.

‘I’ll be as quick as I can,’ I whispered.

When I came out of the dressing room, the other porters, who were all crowded near the doorway, turned to me with anxious looks. I pushed my way past them, saying firmly:

‘Please keep a careful watch on him, gentlemen. I have to carry out an urgent request and so you’ll have to excuse me for the moment.’

Someone started to ask a question, but I hurried on without stopping.

My plan was to find Hoffman and insist on being driven immediately to Sophie’s apartment. But then, as I continued briskly along the corridor, I realised I had no idea where to look for the hotel manager. Moreover, the corridor itself had taken on a very different aspect from the time I had come down it with the bearded porter. There were still a few catering trolleys being pushed about, but it had now become overwhelmingly dominated by persons I could only suppose were members of the visiting orchestra. Long rows of dressing rooms had appeared on either side of me, many with their doors open, and the musicians were standing about in twos and threes, chatting and laughing, sometimes calling across the corridor to one another. Occasionally I would pass a closed door from behind which came the sounds of some instrument, but on the whole their mood struck me as surprisingly frivolous. I was about to stop and ask one of them where I might find Hoffman when I suddenly caught sight of the hotel manager himself through the half-open door of a dressing room. I went up to it and pushed it a little further.

Hoffman was standing before a full-length mirror, studying himself carefully. He was in full evening dress and his face, I noticed, had been made up excessively so that some of the powder had fallen onto his shoulders and lapels. He was muttering something under his breath, never taking his gaze off his reflection. Then, as I continued to watch from the door, he performed a curious action. Bending forward suddenly at the waist, he brought his arm up very stiffly so that the elbow was jutting outwards, and thumped himself on the forehead with his fist - once, twice, three times. Throughout it all he did not take his eyes off the mirror or cease his whispering. Then he straightened and looked at himself silently. It occurred to me he was about to repeat the whole action again and so I quickly cleared my throat and said:

‘Mr Hoffman.’

He started and stared at me.

‘I’ve disturbed you,’ I said. ‘I do apologise.’

Hoffman looked around him in a bewildered manner, then seemed to regain his composure.

‘Mr Ryder,’ he said with a smile. ‘How are you feeling? I trust you’re finding everything here to your satisfaction.’

‘Mr Hoffman, something of great urgency has come up. What I need just now is a car to take me to my destination as quickly as possible. I wonder if this could be arranged without delay.’

‘A car, Mr Ryder? Now?’

‘It’s a matter of the utmost urgency. Of course I intend to return here very promptly, in plenty of time to fulfil my various commitments.’

‘Yes, yes, of course.’ Hoffman looked vaguely troubled.

‘A car should be no problem at all. Of course, Mr Ryder, in normal circumstances I could have provided you also with a driver, or else I would have gladly driven you myself. Unfortunately, just at this moment, my staff have their hands very full. And as for myself, I have so many things to see to, as well as a few modest lines to rehearse. Ha ha! As you know, I will be making a short speech myself tonight. And as trivial as it undoubtedly will seem alongside your own contribution, and indeed, that of our Mr Brodsky, who incidentally is a little late, I feel nevertheless I must prepare myself the best I can. Yes, yes, Mr Brodsky is a little late, it's true, but there's nothing to worry about. In fact, this is his dressing room, I was just checking it over. A perfectly good dressing room. I'm fully confident he'll be here at any moment. As you know, Mr Ryder, I personally have been overseeing Mr Brodsky's, er, recovery, and what a satisfying thing it has been to witness. Such motivation, such dignity! So much so that tonight, on this crucial night, I have utter confidence. Oh yes. Utter confidence! Indeed, a relapse at this stage, that would be unthinkable. A disaster for this whole city! And naturally a personal disaster for me. Of course this is the most trivial of concerns, but nevertheless, you'll forgive me, let me say it, for myself, a relapse on this crucial night, at this point, ah yes, for me it would mark the end. On the very brink of triumph, it would be my finish. A humiliating finish! I could look no one in this town in the face again. I would have to hide. Ha! But what am I doing, talking of such improbable scenarios? I have utter confidence in Mr Brodsky. He will be here. '

'Yes, I'm sure he will be, Mr Hoffman,' I said. 'In fact, I'm sure this whole occasion tonight will be a fine success ...'

'Yes, yes, I know it!' he shouted impatiently. 'I hardly need reassurance on such a point! I wouldn't have even mentioned it at all, after all there's plenty of time yet until things get started, I wouldn't have mentioned it at all if it wasn't for ... for the occurrences earlier tonight.'

'Occurrences?'

'Yes, yes. Ah, you haven't heard. How could you have done? There's nothing much to it, sir. A certain sequence of events took place earlier this evening, and as a consequence, when I last left Mr Brodsky a few hours ago, he was sipping a small glass of whisky. No, no, sir! I can see what you're thinking. No, no! He consulted me fully. And after some consideration I relented, coming to the view that in these very special circumstances, a small glass would do no harm. I judged it best, sir. Perhaps I was wrong, we shall see. Personally, I do not think so. Of course, if I did make the wrong decision, then this whole evening - pugh! - a catastrophe from start to finish! I will be forced to hide for the rest of my life. But the fact is, sir, things became very complicated this evening and I was obliged to make a decision. In any case, the upshot of it all is that I left Mr Brodsky at his home with his small glass of whisky. I am confident he will stop at that. My only thought now is that I should perhaps have done something about that cupboard. But then again, I'm sure I'm being over-cautious. After all, Mr Brodsky has made such progress, he can surely be trusted absolutely, absolutely.' He had been fiddling with his bow tie and he now turned to the mirror to adjust it.

'Mr Hoffman,' I said, 'what exactly has happened? If something has happened to Mr Brodsky, or if anything else has occurred that's likely to alter the overall picture in any way, then surely I should be informed of it straight away. Surely you'll agree with me, Mr Hoffman.'

The hotel manager gave a laugh. 'Mr Ryder, you have entirely the wrong idea. There's no need for you to worry in the least. Look here, am I worried? No. My entire reputation rests on this evening, and yet am I not calm and confident? I tell you, sir, there's nothing whatsoever to concern yourself with.'

'Mr Hoffman, what were you referring to just now when you mentioned a cupboard?'

'Cupboard? Oh, merely the cupboard I discovered this evening at Mr Brodsky's home. You may know, he has for many years lived in an old farmhouse a little way off the north highway. I had of course been there many times before, but things being a little untidy - no doubt Mr Brodsky has his own way of ordering things - I had never looked so carefully about his residence. That's to say, it was only this evening I discovered that he did after all have a further supply of drink. He swore to me he had forgotten all about it. It was only when it came up this evening, when I said, well, in the circumstances, in these very special circumstances owing to the upsetting business with Miss Collins and so on, it was only in these circumstances, you see, I agreed with him that on balance, despite the very small risk, yes, it would be best for him to have just one small glass of whisky, just to steady himself. After all, sir, the man was very distressed over this business of Miss Collins. It was only then, when I offered to fetch a hip flask from my car, that Mr Brodsky remembered there was still one cupboard he had not cleared out. And so we went into his, er, kitchen, I suppose you would call it. Mr Brodsky has done very well over the last months repairing the place. He's made steady progress, and now the elements hardly come in at all, though of course there aren't yet any windows as such. In any case, he opened the cupboard, which was actually lying on its side, and inside, well, there were a dozen or so old bottles of spirits. Mostly whisky. Mr Brodsky was as surprised as I was. It did occur to me, I have to admit it, that I should do something. That I should take the bottles away with me, or perhaps pour them out onto the ground. But then, sir, you can see it, that would have been an insult. A great affront to the courage and determination Mr Brodsky has shown. And having already suffered one great blow to his ego this evening on account of Miss Collins ...'

'Excuse me, Mr Hoffman, but what is this you keep mentioning about Miss Collins?'

'Ah, Miss Collins. Yes, well, that's another matter. That was why I happened to be there, at Mr Brodsky's farmhouse. You see, Mr Ryder, this evening I found myself the bearer of a most sad message. No one would have envied me such a task. The fact was, I had been growing uneasy for some time, even before their meeting at the zoo yesterday. I had been worried, that's to say, on Miss Collins's behalf. Who would have guessed things would move so fast with them, and after all these years? Yes, yes, I was worried. Miss Collins is a dear lady for whom I have the highest regard. I could not bear to see her life torn apart again at this stage. You see, Mr Ryder, Miss Collins is a woman of immense wisdom, this whole town will testify to it, but for all that - and if you lived here, I'm sure you would agree - there has always been something vulnerable about her. We have all come to respect her enormously, and many people have found her counsel invaluable, but then at the same time - how can I put it? - we have always felt protective towards her. As Mr Brodsky became ... more himself over the months, many issues presented themselves that I for one had not properly considered before, and well, as I say, I became concerned. So you can imagine how it was, sir, when as I was driving you back this evening from your practice and you happened to mention so innocently that Miss Collins had agreed to a rendez-vous with Mr Brodsky, when you made it clear that Mr Brodsky was even at that moment waiting for her at St Peter's Cemetery ... My goodness, such fast moves! Our Mr Brodsky was clearly once something of a Valentino! Mr Ryder, I realised I had to do something. I could not allow Miss Collins's life to be plunged back into misery, particularly as a result of something I had done, however indirectly. So earlier this evening, after you most graciously allowed me to drop you off in the street, I took the opportunity to go and visit Miss Collins in her apartment. She was of course surprised to see me. Surprised I should have come personally on this of all evenings. In other words my presence alone spoke volumes. She showed me in immediately and I asked her to excuse the abruptness of my visit, and the fact that I could not approach the difficult topic I wished to discuss with the care and tact I would normally wish to employ. She of course understood perfectly. "I realise, Mr Hoffman," she said, "what great pressure you must be under this evening." We sat down in her front parlour and I came straight to the point. I told her I had heard about their proposed rendez-vous. Miss Collins lowered her eyes at this, just like a young schoolgirl. Then she said very sheepishly: "Yes, Mr Hoffman. Even as you were coming to my door just now, I was preparing myself. For well over an hour now, I've been trying out different outfits. Different ways to pin my hair. At my age, isn't it amusing? Yes, Mr Hoffman, it's quite true. He was here this morning and he persuaded me. I agreed to meet him." She said some such thing, it was mumbled, not at all the way that elegant lady usually speaks. And so I proceeded. Of course I did so very gently. I tactfully pointed out the possible pitfalls. "It is all very well, Miss Collins." I used such phrases. I trod as carefully as I could given the constraints on my time. Naturally, had it been another evening, had we had time to exchange pleasantries, to make small talk, I dare say I might have made a better job of it. Or perhaps it would have made little difference. The truth of the matter would always have been difficult for her. In any case, for all my going about things in the best way I could, when I eventually confronted her with the truth, when I said to her: "Miss Collins, all those old wounds will be reopened. They will hurt, they will give you agony. It will break you down, Miss Collins. Within weeks, within days. How can you have forgotten? How can you lay yourself open to it all again? Everything you went through before, the humiliation, the great hurt, it will all come back and more acutely than ever. And after everything you've done over the years to build a new life for yourself!" When I put things to her in such terms - oh, I tell you, sir, it was not easy - I could see her crumbling inside, even as she tried to maintain her outward calm. I could see the memory of it all coming back to her, the old aches starting again. It was not easy, sir, I can tell you, but I felt it my duty to continue. Then finally, she said very quietly: "But Mr Hoffman. I've promised him. I've promised I'd meet him this evening. He'll be depending on me. He always needs me before a big night like this.” To which I said: “Miss Collins, of course he’ll be disappointed. But I will personally do my utmost to explain it to him. In any case, he’ll already know in his heart of hearts, just as you do, that this rendez-vous is ill-advised. That the past is now best left well alone.” And she looked out of the window as if in a dream and said: “But he’ll be there already. He’ll be there waiting.” To which I said: “I will go myself, Miss Collins. Yes, I am very busy tonight, but this is something I regard as so important I can only entrust myself with the task. In fact I will go now, immediately, to the cemetery and inform him of the situation. You can rest assured, Miss Collins, that I will do everything I can to comfort him. I will encourage him to think ahead, to the immensely important challenge in front of him this evening.” I said some such thing to her, Mr Ryder. And though I must say she looked for the moment completely destroyed, she is a sensible lady and a part of her must have known I was right. Because she touched my arm quite kindly, saying: “Go to him. Straight away. Do what you can.” And so I got up to leave, but then realised I still had one last painful duty left to perform. “Oh, and Miss Collins,” I said to her. “As far as this evening’s event is concerned. Under the circumstances, I would have supposed it best you stayed at home.” She nodded and I could see she was close to tears. “After all,” I went on, “one has to be sensitive to his feelings. Under the circumstances your presence in the hall might have a certain influence on him at this most crucial juncture.” She nodded again and indicated that she understood fully. I excused myself then and showed myself out. And then, although there were so many other pressing things waiting to be done – the bacon, the bread deliveries – I saw that the overwhelming priority was to see Mr Brodsky safely over this last unexpected hurdle. So I drove to the cemetery. It was dark by the time I arrived and it took me a little while walking among the graves before I could locate him, sitting on a tomb, looking despondent. And when he saw me approaching he looked up tiredly and said to me: “You’ve come to tell me. I knew it. I knew it wasn't to be." This made my task easier, you might think, but I tell you, sir, it wasn't easy at all. To be the bearer of such news. I nodded solemnly and said, yes, he was right, she was not coming. She had thought things through and had changed her mind. Furthermore she had decided not to come to the concert hall tonight. I saw no point in going into it any further than that. And he looked very distraught, so for a moment I looked away and pretended to inspect the tomb next to the one he was sitting on. "Ah, old Mr Kaltz," I said to the trees, because I knew Mr Brodsky was weeping to himself quietly.

"Ah, Mr Kaltz. How many years is it now since we buried him? It seems like yesterday, but I see it's already fourteen years. How lonely he was before he died." I was making some such conversation, so as to allow Mr Brodsky to weep. Then I sensed he had brought his tears under control and I turned to him and suggested he come back with me to the concert hall to get himself ready. But he said no, it was too early. He would become too tense hanging around the venue for so long. And I thought he might be right and suggested I drive him home. He agreed to this and so we made our way out of the cemetery and down to the car. And all through the drive, the whole time we were going up the north highway, he was just staring out of the window, saying nothing, the tears occasionally welling in his eyes. I realised then that we were not yet home and dry. That things were not quite so certain as they had seemed a few hours earlier. But I was still very confident, Mr Ryder, just as I am now. Then we arrived at his farmhouse. He has renovated it well, many of the rooms are now perfectly comfortable. We went into the main room and turned on the lamp and I looked about the place making light conversation. I offered to arrange for some people to come and look at the mildew problems on the walls. He didn't seem to hear, but just went on sitting in his chair with a far-away look. Then he said he wanted a drink. A small drink. I told him this was impossible. Then he said, very calmly, that it wasn't like the old way he wanted a drink. It wasn't like that. That sort of drinking was behind him for good. But he had just suffered a terrible disappointment. His heart was breaking. He used those words. His heart was breaking, he said, but he knew how much rested on him this evening. He knew he had to do well. He wasn't asking for a drink in the old way. Surely I could tell that? And I looked at him and I could see he was telling the truth. I saw a saddened, disappointed but responsible man. He had come to know himself better than most men can ever hope to do, and he was fully in control. And he was saying that, in this crisis, a small drink was what he needed. To get him over the shock of this emotional blow. To give him the steadiness he needed for the demands of the evening ahead. Mr Ryder, I heard him ask for drink many times in the early days and this was a different thing altogether. I could see that. I looked deep into his eyes and said: "Mr Brodsky, can I trust you? I have some whisky in a hip flask in the car. If I gave you just a small glass can I trust you that that will be the end of it? One small glass and no more?" To which he said, meeting my gaze full on: "It's not like before. I swear to you." And so I went out to the car, it was very dark and the trees were making a furious noise in the wind, and I got the flask from the car and brought it in, and he was no longer in his chair. That's when I went through and found him in his kitchen. It's really an outhouse connected to the main farmhouse that Mr Brodsky has been very skilfully converting. Yes, that's when I found him opening the cupboard, the cupboard that was lying on its side. He'd forgotten all about it, he said when he realised I had come in. And there was the whisky. Bottles and bottles of it. He took out just one of the bottles, opened it and poured a small measure into a tumbler. Then, looking me in the eye, he poured the remainder of the bottle onto the floor. His kitchen floor, I should say, is largely earth, it's not as though it made a terrible mess. Well, he poured it out onto the ground, then we came back through to the main room and he sat down in his chair and began to sip the whisky. I watched him very carefully and I could see he was drinking not in the way he used to. Even the fact that he could just sip like that ... I knew I had made the right decision. I told him I would have to be returning. That I had already stayed away much too long. The bacon and the bread had to be supervised. I stood up and then we both knew without speaking what was on my mind. That's to say, the cupboard. And Mr Brodsky looked me straight in the eye and said: "It's not like before." That was enough for me. To insist on staying any longer, that would only have undermined him. It would have been an insult. In any case, as I say, when I looked into his face I felt perfectly confident. I left without another thought. And it is only in the last few minutes, sir, that even a flicker of a doubt has crossed my mind. But I know rationally it is simply the tension before a great event. He will be here shortly, I'm certain of it. And the whole evening, I feel very confident, will be a success, a great success ...'

'Mr Hoffman,' I said, my impatience overtaking me, 'if you feel happy having left Mr Brodsky drinking whisky, well, that's your business. I'm not at all sure it was such a good decision, but then you know the situation much better than I do. In any case, may I remind you that I am myself in need of assistance at this moment? As I explained to you, I need a car as soon as possible. This really is a matter of some urgency, Mr Hoffman.'

'Ah yes, a car.' Hoffman looked about thoughtfully. 'The simplest thing, Mr Ryder, might be if you borrowed my car. It is parked outside that fire door just there.' He pointed a little further down the corridor. 'Now, where are the keys? Ah, here you are. The steering is slightly tilted to the left. I've been meaning to get it adjusted but things have been so busy. Please, make whatever use of it you will. I won't be needing it again until morning.'

I brought Hoffman's large black car out of the parking area and onto a twisting road shrouded on both sides by fir trees. This was clearly not the usual route out of the grounds. The road was pitted, unlit, and too narrow for two vehicles to pass without slowing. I drove cautiously, peering into the dark, expecting at any moment an obstacle or sharp bend. Then the road straightened and the headlights showed me I was driving through a forest. I picked up speed and for a few minutes travelled on through darkness. Then I caught sight of something bright through the trees to my left and, slowing down again, realised I was looking at the front of the concert hall, grandly illuminated against the night.

The building was now some way away and I was viewing it at an angle, but I could make out much of its impressive façade. There were rows of dignified stone columns to either side of the central arch, and tall windows reaching towards the vast domed roof. I wondered if the guests had started to arrive and, stopping the car altogether, lowered my window for a clearer view. But even when I raised myself in my seat, the trees prevented me from seeing anything of the building at ground level.

Then, as I continued to gaze towards the concert hall, the possibility struck me that at that very moment my parents were themselves on the point of arriving. I suddenly remembered with great vividness Hoffman's description of their horse-drawn carriage emerging out of the darkness into the admiring gaze of the crowd. In fact, just at that moment, as I continued to lean out of the window, I had the distinct impression I could hear somewhere not so far away the sound of their carriage going by. I switched off the engine and listened again, leaning my head out further. Then I got out of the car altogether and stood there in the night, listening intently.

The wind was moving in the trees. Then I heard once more the faint noises I had before: the beat of hooves, a rhythmic jingling, the rattle of a wooden vehicle. Then the sounds faded behind the rustling of the trees. I went on listening for a little while longer, but could hear nothing more. Eventually I turned and got back into the car.

I had felt quite calm - almost tranquil - while standing out in the road, but once I started the car again I was seized by a powerful mixture of frustration, panic and anger. My parents were at that moment arriving, and yet here I was, my preparations far from completed, even now driving away from the concert hall in pursuit of some other matter altogether. I could not understand how I had allowed such a thing to come to pass, and I travelled on through the forest, my anger mounting, resolving to get finished whatever I had now to do at the first opportunity and return to the concert hall as quickly as possible. But then the further thought occurred to me that I did not really know how to reach Sophie's apartment or even if this forest road was taking me in the correct direction. A sense of futility began to come over me, but I sped on none the less, staring at the forest unfolding before me in the headlights.

Then suddenly I became aware of two figures standing waving up ahead of me. They were directly in my path and, though they moved aside as I came nearer, they continued to signal with urgency. Slowing down, I saw that a group of five or six people had set up camp on the roadside around a small portable stove. My first notion was that these were vagrants, but then I saw a middle-aged woman in smart clothes and a grey-haired man in a suit leaning down to my window. Behind them, the others - who had been sitting around the stove on what appeared to be upturned crates - were now rising and coming towards the car. They were all, I noticed, holding tin camping mugs.

As I lowered the window, the woman peered in at me, saying:

‘Oh, we’re so glad you came along. You see, we were just locked in debate and we couldn’t come to any sort of agreement. That’s always the trouble, isn’t it? We can never agree about anything when there’s action needed.’

‘But certainly,’ the grey-haired man in the suit said solemnly, ‘we need to come to some conclusion soon.’

But before either of them had said anything else, I saw that the figure who had come up behind them and was now leaning down looking at me was that of Geoffrey Saunders, my old schoolmate. Recognising me, he pushed his way in front and tapped the door of the car.

‘Ah, I was wondering when I’d see you again,’ he said.

‘To be perfectly honest, I’d been getting a bit cross about it. You know, you not coming by for your cup of tea. And when you’d said and all. Still, I suppose now’s not the time to go into it. But all the same, it’s a bit cheeky of you, old chap. Never mind. You’d better come on out of there.’ With that, he opened the car door and stood aside. I was about to protest, but he continued: ‘Better come and get a cup of coffee. Then you can join in with the discussion we’re having.’

‘Quite frankly, Saunders,’ I said, ‘this isn’t the best time for me.’

‘Oh, do come on, old chap.’ There was a hint of annoyance in his voice. ‘You know, I’ve been thinking quite a lot about you since we met the other night. Remembering about our schooldays and all that. This morning, for instance, I woke up thinking about that time, you probably don’t remember it, that time the two of us were marking a cross-country run for some younger boys. Must have been the lower sixth, I suppose. You probably don’t remember, but I was thinking about it, this morning, lying in bed. We were standing waiting outside this pub opposite this big field and you were awfully upset about something. Come on out, old chap, I can't speak to you like this.' He was continuing to usher me impatiently. 'That's it, that's better.' He grasped my elbow with his free hand - he was holding his tin cup in the other - as I came reluctantly out of the car.

'Yes, I was thinking about that day. One of those foggy October mornings you always get in England. There we were, standing around, waiting for these third-years to come puffing their way out of the mist, and I remember you kept saying: "It's all right for you, it's all very well for you" and being awfully miserable. So in the end I said to you: "Look, it's not just you, old chap. You're not the only one in the world with worries." And I started telling you about that time when I was seven or eight, when we'd gone on one of our family holidays, my parents, my little brother and I. We'd gone to one of those English seaside resorts, Bournemouth, some place like that. Perhaps it was the Isle of Wight. The weather was fine and all that, but you know, something wasn't right, we just weren't getting on. Common enough on family holidays, of course, but I didn't know that then, I was only seven or eight. Anyway it just wasn't working out and one afternoon Father just stormed off. I mean just out of the blue. We'd been looking at something on the seafront and my mother was in the middle of pointing out something to us and suddenly, off he went. Didn't shout or anything, just walked off. We didn't know what to do, so we just started following him, Mother, little Christopher and I, we followed him. Not close up, always thirty yards or so behind, just enough so we could still see him. And Father kept walking. All along the seafront, up the path with the cliffs, past the beach huts and all the people sunbathing. Then he went towards the town, past the tennis courts and through the shopping areas. We must have followed him for over an hour. And after a while we started to make a sort of game of it. We'd say: "Look, he's not angry any more. He's just playing about!" Or we'd say: "He's got his head like that on purpose. Look at that! ” and laugh and laugh. And if you looked carefully, you could believe he was doing a funny walk. Christopher, he was only little, I told him that, I told him Father was doing the walk just to be funny and Christopher laughed and laughed, like it was all a great game. And Mother too, she was laughing, saying: “Oh your father, boys! ” and laughing some more. And we kept on walking like that, and I was the only one, you see, even though I was only seven or eight, I was the only one who knew Father wasn't really doing it for a joke. That he hadn't got over it at all and was perhaps getting angrier and angrier because we were following him. Because perhaps he wanted to sit down on a bench or go into a café somewhere, but couldn't because of us. You remember all this? I told it all to you that day. And I looked at Mother at one point because I wanted it all to stop, and that was when I realised. I realised she'd convinced herself, convinced herself utterly that Father was doing it all for fun. And little Christopher, he was all the time wanting to run up. You know, run right up behind Father. And I had to keep making excuses, laughing all the time, saying: “No, that's not allowed. That's not part of the game. We've got to keep a long way back or it won't work.” But Mother, you see, she was saying: “Oh yes! Why don't you go and pull his shirt and see if you can get back before he catches you! ” And I had to keep saying, because I was the only one, you realise, I was the only one, I had to keep saying: “No, no, let's wait. Stay back, stay back.” He looked funny, my father. He had an odd sort of gait when you looked at him like that from a distance. Look, old chap, why don't you sit down? You look completely exhausted and very worried. Just sit down here and help us decide. ’

Geoffrey Saunders was indicating an upturned orange crate near the camping stove. I felt indeed very tired and decided that whatever tasks lay before me, I would accomplish them better after a brief pause and a sip of coffee. I seated myself, aware as I did so that my knees were shaking and that I was lowering myself onto the crate in the most unsteady way. People gathered around me sympathetically. Someone was holding out a cup of coffee, while someone else had placed a hand on my back, saying: 'Just relax. Just take it easy.'

'Thank you, thank you,' I said and, taking the coffee, gulped it greedily despite its being very hot.

The grey-haired man in the suit now crouched down in front of me and, looking into my face, said very gently: 'We're going to have to come to a decision. You're going to have to help us.'

'A decision?'

'Yes. About Mr Brodsky.'

'Ah yes.' I drank a little more from the tin cup. 'Yes, I know. I realise it's all down to me now.'

'I wouldn't go so far as to say that,' the grey-haired man said.

I looked at him again. He was a reassuring figure with a kindly, calm manner. But just at this moment, I could see, he was very serious.

'I wouldn't go so far as to say it was all down to you. It's just that, given the situation, we each of us have to take some responsibility. My own opinion, as I've made clear, is that it should come off.'

'Come off?'

The grey-haired man nodded gravely. I then saw the stethoscope round his neck and realised he was a doctor of some sort.

'Ah yes,' I said. 'It has to come off. Yes.'

It was then that I looked about me and saw with a start, on the ground not far from the car, a large tangle of metal. The thought vaguely crossed my mind that I had caused this wreck, that I had perhaps been involved in some accident without knowing it. Rising to my feet - immediately several hands reached out to steady me - I moved towards the metal and saw that it was in fact the remains of a bicycle. The metal was hopelessly contorted and, to my horror, I saw Brodsky in the midst of it. He was lying with his back to the earth and his eyes watched calmly as I approached him.

‘Mr Brodsky,’ I murmured, staring at him.

‘Ah. Ryder,’ he said, with surprisingly little pain in his voice.

I turned back to the grey-haired man, who had come up behind me, saying to him: ‘I’m sure this was nothing to do with me. I have no recollection of any sort of accident. I was merely driving ...’

The grey-haired man, nodding understandingly, signalled to me to be quiet. Then, leading me away a little, he said in a low voice: ‘Almost certainly, he was attempting suicide. He’s very drunk. Very very drunk.’

‘Ah. Yes.’

‘I’m certain he was attempting suicide. But now, all he’s achieved is to get his legs entangled. The right leg is virtually unscathed. It’s simply stuck. The left leg is also stuck. It’s this left leg that troubles me. It isn’t in a good condition.’

‘No,’ I said, and glanced over my shoulder at Brodsky again. He appeared to notice and said up into the darkness:

‘Ryder. Hello.’

‘We were discussing it for some time before you came by,’ the grey-haired man continued. ‘My feeling is that it has to come off. That way we might save his life. After some debate, the majority of those present have come to that view. Though the two ladies over there are against it. They are all for waiting longer for an ambulance. But I feel we run a grave risk by doing so. That is my professional opinion.’

‘Ah yes. Yes, I can see your point.’

‘In my view, the left leg must come off without delay. I am a surgeon, but unfortunately I have no equipment with me. No painkillers, nothing. Not even an aspirin. You see, I was off-duty, just walking out here to get some air. Just like these other good people here. I happened to have this stethoscope in my pocket from earlier, but nothing else. But now you’ve arrived, this may change things. You have supplies in the car?’

‘In the car? Well, actually, I don’t know. You see, it’s a borrowed car.’

‘You mean it’s a hired car.’

‘Not exactly. It’s borrowed. From an acquaintance.’

‘I see.’ He looked gravely down at the ground, thinking to himself. Over his shoulder I could see the others watching us anxiously. Then the surgeon said:

‘Perhaps you wouldn’t mind looking in the boot. There might be something there to help us. Some sharp implement with which I could carry out the operation.’

I thought about this, then said: ‘I’ll be happy to go and look. But perhaps first I should go and have a word with Mr Brodsky. You see, I do know him to some extent and I really should speak to him before ... before such a drastic step is taken.’

‘Very well,’ the surgeon said. ‘But my feeling - my professional opinion - is that we’ve wasted a great deal of time already. Please be as quick as you can.’

I went over again to Brodsky and looked down into his face.

‘Mr Brodsky ...’ I began, but he interrupted immediately.

‘Ryder, help me. I have to get to her.’

‘To Miss Collins? I think there are other things just now to be concerned with.’

‘No, no. I must speak with her. I see it. I see it very clearly now. My mind’s very clear now. Since this happened, I don’t know, I was on my bicycle, something hit me, some vehicle, a car, who knows? I must have been drunk, I don’t remember that part, but I can remember the rest of it. I can see it now, I can see everything. It’s him. All the time, he’s wanted it to fail. It’s him, he’s done all this.’

‘Who? Hoffman?’

‘He’s the lowest. The lowest. I couldn’t see it before, but now I see it all. Since the vehicle hit me, whatever it was, a car, a truck, since then I can see it all. He came to me tonight, very sympathetic. I was waiting in the cemetery. Waiting and waiting. My heart pounding. I’ve been waiting all these years. You don’t know, Ryder? I’ve been waiting a long time. Even when I was drunk, I was waiting. Next week, I used to say. Next week I’ll stop drinking and go to her. I’ll ask her to meet me at St Peter’s Cemetery. Year after year I said this. And now at last there I was, waiting. On Per Gustavsson’s tomb where I used to sit sometimes with Bruno. I was waiting. Fifteen minutes, then half an hour, then an hour. Then he comes. He touches me, here, on the shoulder. She’s changed her mind, he says. She’s not coming. Not even coming tonight to the concert hall. He’s kind as usual. I listen to him. Drink whisky. It will calm you. This is special. But I can’t drink whisky, I say. How can I drink whisky? Are you crazy? No, drink whisky, he says. Just a little. It’ll steady you. I thought he was being kind. Now I see it. Right from the start, he never meant it to work. He believed I could never do it. I could never do it because I’m this ... this piece of dung. That’s what he thought. I’m sober now. I drank enough to kill a horse, but since that vehicle, I’m sober. I can see it all clearly now. It’s him. He’s lower than me. I won’t let him succeed. I’ll do it. Help me, Ryder. I won’t let him. I’m going to the concert hall

now. I'll show everyone. It's ready, the music, it's all here in my head, all here. I'll show everyone. But she has to come. I've got to speak to her. Help me, Ryder. Get me to her. She has to come, just sit in the concert hall. She'll remember then. He's the lowest, but I can see it clearly now. Help me, Ryder. '

'Mr Brodsky, ' I said interrupting. 'There's a surgeon present. He's going to have to perform an operation. It might be a little painful. '

'Help me, Ryder. Just help me get to her. Your car? Your car? Take me. Take me to her. She'll be in that apartment. I hate it. How I hate it, hate it. I used to stand outside. Take me to her, Ryder. Take me now. '

'Mr Brodsky, you don't seem to realise your condition. There's little time to be lost. In fact, I promised the surgeon I'd search the boot. I'll be back in just a moment. '

'She's so afraid. But it's not too late. We could have an animal. But never mind that now, never mind the animal. Just come to the concert hall. That's all I ask. Just come to the hall. That's all I ask. '

I left Brodsky and went to the car. Opening the boot I found that Hoffman had crammed it untidily with assorted items. There was a broken chair, a pair of rubber boots, a collection of plastic cartons. Then I found a torch, and when I shone it around the boot I discovered a small hacksaw lying in a corner. It looked a little oily, but when I ran a finger along the blade the teeth felt sharp enough. I closed the boot and made my way over to where the others were standing talking around the stove. As I approached, I could hear the surgeon saying:

'Obstetrics is a dull field now. Not like when I was studying. '

'Excuse me, ' I said. 'I found this. '

‘Ah,’ the surgeon said, turning to me. ‘Thank you. And you’ve spoken with Mr Brodsky? Good.’

I suddenly felt resentful at having been drawn into this whole affair to the extent that I had, and I said, perhaps a little tetchily, looking around at the ring of faces:

‘Aren’t there proper resources in this town for eventualities like this? Did you say you’d called an ambulance?’

‘We called for one about an hour ago,’ Geoffrey Saunders spoke up. ‘From that call box over there. Unfortunately, ambulances are in short supply tonight on account of the big event at the concert hall.’

I looked where he was pointing and saw that indeed, standing some way back from the road, almost where the darkness of the forest began, was a public telephone box. The sight of it suddenly brought back to me the urgent business I had been in the midst of, and it occurred to me that by telephoning Sophie now I would not only be able to give her some advance warning, I would be able to get some directions as to how I might reach her apartment.

‘If you’d excuse me,’ I said, moving off. ‘I have an important call to make just now.’

I walked towards the trees and entered the telephone box. As I searched through my pockets for some coins, I could see through the glass panel the figure of the surgeon walking slowly towards the prone Brodsky, the hacksaw held tactfully behind his back. Geoffrey Saunders and the others were circling uneasily, looking down into their tin cups or at their feet. Then the surgeon turned and said something to them, and two of the men, Geoffrey Saunders and a young man in a brown leather jacket, went over reluctantly to join him. For a few seconds the three of them stood looking down grimly at Brodsky.

I turned away and dialled Sophie's number. The phone rang for some time, then Sophie, sounding sleepy and slightly alarmed, came on the line. I took a deep breath.

'Look,' I said, 'you don't seem to realise just how much pressure is on me now. Do you suppose this is easy for me? I've very little time left now and I've still not had a second to inspect the concert hall. Instead there are all these other things people expect me to do. You think tonight's easy for me? Do you realise what tonight is? My parents, they're coming tonight. That's right! They're coming at last, tonight! They may well be there at this very moment! And look what happens. Do they leave me free to prepare? No, they give me one thing to do after the other. This confounded question-and-answer session for one thing. They've actually brought in an electronic scoreboard. Can you believe it? What am I supposed to do? They take so much for granted, all these people. What do they want me to do, on this night of all nights? But it's the same as everywhere else. They expect everything from me. They'll probably turn on me tonight, it wouldn't surprise me. When they get unhappy about my answers, they'll turn on me, and then where will I be? I might not even get as far as the piano. Or my parents might leave, the moment they start to turn on me ...'

'Look, calm down,' Sophie said. 'It'll be all right. They never turn on you. You always say they'll turn on you and so far no one, not a single person in all these years, has turned on you ...'

'But don't you understand what I'm saying? This isn't just any night. My parents are coming. If they turn on me tonight, it will be ... it will be ...'

'They're not going to turn on you,' Sophie broke in again. 'You say this every time. From all over the world you phone to say the same thing. Whenever you reach this point. They're going to turn on me, they're going to find me out. And what happens? A few hours later you call again, and you're very calm and self-satisfied. I ask you how it went and you sound mildly surprised I should even bring it up.

"Oh, it was fine," you say. Always just something like that and then you move onto other things, like none of it's worth discussing ...'

'Wait a minute. What are you referring to? What phone calls are these? These phone calls, do you realise how much trouble I go to to make them to you? Sometimes I'm frantically busy, but I still somehow find a few minutes in my schedule to call, just to make sure you're all right. And more often than not it's you, you pour out all your problems to me. What do you mean implying I talk the way you say ...'

'There's no point in going into it. The point I'm making is that everything will be fine tonight ...'

'It's all very well for you to say that. You're just like all these others. You just take it for granted. You think all I have to do is turn up and everything else will just follow ...' I suddenly remembered Gustav lying on his mattress in the unfurnished dressing room and stopped abruptly.

'What's the matter?' Sophie asked.

For a few moments more I continued to collect myself. Then I said:

'Look. There's something I meant to tell you. It's bad news. I'm sorry.'

Sophie was silent at the other end.

'It's your father,' I said. 'He's been taken ill. He's at the concert hall. You have to come immediately.'

I paused again, but Sophie still did not speak.

'He's holding out well,' I went on after another moment. 'But you have to come straight away. Boris too. In fact, that's why I was calling. I have a car. I'm on my way now to pick you both up. '

For what seemed a long time, the line remained silent. Then Sophie said:

'I'm sorry about yesterday evening. At the Karwinsky Gallery, I mean. ' She paused and I thought she was going to go silent again. But then she continued: 'I was pathetic. You don't have to pretend. I know I was pathetic. I don't know what it is, I just can't manage in situations like that. I'm going to have to face it. I'll never be the sort who can travel with you from city to city, accompanying you at all these functions. I just can't do it. I'm sorry. '

'But what does that matter?' I said gently. 'That gallery yesterday, I'd forgotten all about it. Who cares what sort of impression you make on people like that? They were awful people, every one of them. And you were by far the most beautiful woman there. '

'I can't believe that,' she said, laughing suddenly. 'I'm an old crow now. '

'But you're ageing beautifully. '

'What a thing to say!' She laughed again. 'How dare you! '

'I'm sorry,' I said, laughing also. 'I meant you hadn't aged at all. Not so anyone would notice. '

'Not so anyone would notice?! '

'I don't know ...' Confused, I gave another laugh. 'Perhaps you looked haggard and ugly. I can't remember now. '

Sophie laughed once more, then fell silent. When she next spoke, her voice had become earnest again. 'But I was pathetic. I can't ever travel with you while I'm like this. '

‘Look, I promise, I won’t be travelling much longer now. Tonight, if it goes well, you never know. That might be it.’

‘And I’m sorry I haven’t found anything yet. I promise I’ll find something for us soon. Somewhere really comfortable.’

I could not find an immediate response to this and for a few seconds we were both silent. Then I heard her say:

‘Do you really not mind? About the way I was yesterday? The way I always am?’

‘I don’t mind at all. You can behave in any way you like at functions like that. Do whatever you want. It doesn’t make any difference. You’re worth more than the whole room of them put together.’

Sophie said nothing. After a while I went on:

‘It’s partly my fault too. About the house, I mean. It’s not fair just leaving it to you to find one. Perhaps from now, provided tonight goes well, we can do it differently. We could look for something together.’

The line remained silent and for a second I wondered if Sophie had gone away. But then she said in a distant, dreamy voice:

‘We’re bound to find something soon, aren’t we?’

‘Yes, of course. We’ll search together. Boris too. We’ll find something.’

‘And you’re coming by soon, aren’t you? To take us to Papa?’

‘Yes, yes. I’ll be coming as quickly as I can. So try and be ready, both of you.’

‘Yes, all right.’ Her voice still sounded distant and lacking in urgency. ‘I’ll wake Boris up now. Yes, all right.’

When I stepped out of the phone box, it was my impression there were definite signs of dawn in the sky. I saw the crowd around Brodsky and, as I came closer, spotted the surgeon down on his knees, sawing away. Brodsky appeared to be accepting his ordeal in silence, but then, just as I reached the car, he let out a hideous cry that rang through the trees.

‘I have to be going now,’ I said to no one in particular, and indeed no one seemed to hear me. But then, as I closed my door and started the engine, their faces all turned to me with horrified expressions. Before I could close my window, Geoffrey Saunders had come running up.

‘Look here,’ he said angrily. ‘Look here. You can’t go just yet. Once he’s freed, we’ll need to take him somewhere. We’ll need your car, can’t you see that? Surely that’s common sense.’

‘Look, Saunders,’ I said firmly. ‘I appreciate you’ve got problems here. I’d like to help more, but I’ve done all I can. I’ve got things of my own to worry about now.’

‘That’s typical of you, old chap,’ he said. ‘Just typical.’

‘Look, you just haven’t the faintest. Really, Saunders, you haven’t the faintest. I’ve got more responsibilities than you could ever imagine. Look, I just don’t lead the sort of life you do!’

I had bellowed this last statement, and I noticed that even the surgeon had stopped his work and was looking over at me. For all I knew Brodsky too had for the moment forgotten his pain and was staring at me. I felt self-conscious and said in a more conciliatory tone:

‘I’m sorry, but I’ve got something very urgent to attend to. By the time you’re all through, by the time Mr Brodsky’s in any condition to be transported anywhere, I’m certain the ambulance will have arrived. In any case, I'm sorry, but I can't wait a minute longer. '

With that I quickly raised the window and set the car moving again through the forest.

The road continued through the forest for some time. Eventually the trees began to thin out and I could glimpse the morning glowing dimly in the distance. Then the trees finally disappeared and I came into the deserted city streets.

A red light obliged me to stop at an intersection, and as I sat there waiting in the silence - no other vehicle was in sight - I looked about and found myself slowly beginning to recognise the district I had entered. I was, I realised with relief, already very near Sophie's apartment; indeed, the street directly facing me would, I was sure, lead me directly to it. I recalled too that the apartment was over a barber's shop, and when the lights changed I crossed the intersection and drove down the silent street, studying carefully the buildings I was passing. Then I saw ahead of me in the distance two figures waiting at the edge of the kerb and pushed down on the accelerator.

Sophie and Boris were wearing only light jackets and looked to have grown cold in the early morning air. They came running up to the car, and Sophie, leaning down, shouted angrily:

'You were so long! What took you so long?'

Before I could respond, Boris placed a hand on Sophie's arm, saying:

'It's all right. We'll get there in time. It's all right.'

I looked at the little boy. He was holding a large briefcase resembling a doctor's bag, which gave him a slightly comical air of gravity. But his manner was nevertheless oddly reassuring and he seemed to succeed in calming his mother.

I had expected Sophie to sit next to me, but she and Boris both got in the back.

‘I’m sorry,’ I said as I turned the car, ‘but I don’t know my way around here so well yet.’

‘Who’s with him now?’ Sophie demanded, her voice again very taut. ‘Is someone looking after him now?’

‘He’s with his colleagues. They’re all with him. Every one of them.’

‘You see?’ Boris’s voice said gently behind me. ‘I told you. So don’t worry. It’ll be all right.’

Sophie gave a heavy sigh, but again Boris seemed to have succeeded in calming her. Then a moment later, I heard him say:

‘They’re taking good care of him. So don’t worry. They’re taking good care of him. Aren’t they?’

This question was evidently directed at me. I had become somewhat resentful about the role he had assumed for himself – I was not happy either that the two of them should sit together in the back as though I were a taxi driver – and I decided not to reply.

For the next few minutes we travelled in silence. We came to the intersection again, after which I did my best to remember the route back to the forest road. We were still going through the empty city streets when Sophie said softly, her voice barely audible above the engine:

‘This is a warning.’

I was not sure if she was addressing me and was about to glance over my shoulder at her when she continued in the same soft voice:

‘Boris, are you listening to me? We have to face up to it, this is a warning. Your grandfather, he’s getting older. He needs to slow down. There’s no point trying to deny it. He needs to slow down.’

Boris said something in reply, but I could not hear him.

‘I’ve been thinking about it for some time now,’ Sophie went on. ‘I didn’t say anything to you before, because I know how much you ... how much you think of your grandfather. But I’ve been thinking it over for some time. There were other signs long before this. Now this has happened, we can’t hide from it any more. He’s getting older and he’s got to slow down. I’ve made plans, I never told you, but I’ve been making plans for a long time. I’m going to have a talk with Mr Hoffman. A good talk with him about Grandfather’s future. I’ve prepared all the information. I’ve spoken to Mr Sedelmayer at the Imperial Hotel and also Mr Weissberg at the Ambassadors. I never said to you before, but I could see Grandfather wasn’t as strong as he used to be. So I’ve been finding out. It’s not at all unusual, when someone’s worked at an hotel for as long as your grandfather has, it’s not at all unusual at a certain stage that he’s given a slightly different sort of job. So that he doesn’t have to do quite as much as before. At the Imperial Hotel, there’s this man, much older than your grandfather, you see him as soon as you go into the lobby. He used to be the chef, but when he was too old to do that any more, that’s what they decided. He’s got a splendid uniform and he’s in the corner of the lobby behind this big mahogany desk with a pen-and-ink stand. Mr Sedelmayer says it works very well, that he’s worth every penny. The guests, particularly the regular ones, they’d be outraged if they came into the lobby and the old man wasn’t sitting there behind the desk. The whole thing gives the place so much distinction. Well, I thought I’d talk to Mr Hoffman about it. Grandfather could do something like that. Of course, he’d get paid less, but he could keep his little room, he’s so fond of it, and get his meals. Perhaps they could set him up with a desk like at the Imperial. But then Grandfather might want to stand. In a special uniform, somewhere in the lobby. I don't mean this should all happen immediately. But before too long. He's not so young now and this is a warning. We can't hide from it. There's nothing to be gained in pretending about it.'

Sophie paused a moment. I had by this time brought the car back to the edge of the forest. The dawn sky had become a purple colour.

'Don't worry,' Boris said. 'Grandfather will be all right.'

I could hear Sophie let out a deep breath. Then she said:

'He'll have more time then, too. He won't be nearly as busy, and you'll be able to spend more afternoons with him in the Old Town. Or wherever else you might want to go with him. But he'll need a good coat. That's why I'm bringing this now. It's time I gave it to him. I've had it long enough.'

There was a rustling sound and, glancing in my mirror, I noticed that Sophie was holding beside her the soft brown package containing her father's overcoat. At this point I was obliged to attract her attention to ask something about our route, and she seemed to become aware of my presence for the first time since setting out. She leaned forward and said close to my ear:

'I've been ready for something like this to happen. I'm going to talk to Mr Hoffman soon.'

I murmured something in assent and turned the headlights up as we entered the darkness of the forest.

'Other people,' Sophie said. 'They just carry on like there's all the time in the world. I've never been able to do that.'

For the next few minutes she remained silent, but I could sense her presence very near me, and for some reason found myself expecting to feel at any moment the touch of her fingers on my face. Then she said quietly:

‘I remember. After Mother died. How lonely it got.’

I glanced at her again in the mirror. She was still leaning forward towards me, but her eyes were fixed on the forest going by outside.

‘Don’t worry,’ she said softly, and made another rustling sound with the coat. ‘I’ll see to it we’re all fine. The three of us. I’ll see to it.’

I brought the car to a halt in a small parking area somewhere behind the concert hall. A door was facing us over which a night light was still shining and, though it was not the door I had used before, I got out and hurried towards it. When I glanced back, Boris was helping his mother out of the car. He insisted on keeping one hand protectively behind her as the two of them came briskly towards the building and the doctor’s bag he was clutching in the other hand banged awkwardly about his legs.

The door brought us into the long circular corridor and almost immediately we were obliged to stand aside for a catering trolley being pushed by two men. The temperature felt a good few degrees warmer than before – it was now positively stuffy – but then I noticed nearby two musicians in evening dress chatting amiably in a doorway and realised with relief that we had entered not far from where I had left Gustav.

As I led the way down the corridor, it became increasingly crowded with orchestra members. Most had by now changed for the performance, but the atmosphere among them seemed still to be a very frivolous one. They were shouting and laughing across the corridor more than ever and at one point we nearly collided with a man emerging from a dressing room posturing with a cello as though it were a guitar. Then someone said;

‘Oh, it’s Mr Ryder, isn’t it? We met before, you remember me?’

A group of four or five men coming the other way along the corridor had paused and was looking towards us. They were in full evening dress and I saw in an instant they were all drunk. The man who had spoken was holding a bouquet of roses and, as he came towards me, waved it about carelessly.

‘The cinema the other night,’ he said. ‘Mr Pedersen introduced us. How are you, sir? My friends tell me I disgraced myself that night and that I owe you many apologies.’

‘Oh yes,’ I said, recognising the man. ‘How are you? I’m very pleased to see you again. Unfortunately, I have something very urgent just now ...’

‘I hope I wasn’t rude,’ the drunken man said, coming right up to me until his face was almost touching mine. ‘My intention is never rude.’

At this his companions all made noises of suppressed mirth.

‘No, you weren’t rude at all,’ I said. ‘But just now, you must forgive me ...’

‘We were searching,’ the drunken man said, ‘for the maestro. No, no, not you, sir. Our very own maestro. We’ve brought him flowers, you see. As a token of our great respect. Do you know where we might find him, sir?’

‘Unfortunately I have no idea. I ... I don’t think you’ll find Mr Brodsky in this building just yet.’

‘No? Not arrived yet?’ The drunken man turned to his companions. ‘Our maestro isn’t here yet. What do you make of it?’ Then to me: ‘We have flowers for him.’ He shook the bouquet again and a few petals drifted to the floor. ‘A token of fondness and respect from the city council. And apology. Of course. We misunderstood him for so long.’ There were more sounds of suppressed laughter from his companions.

‘Not here yet. Our very own beloved maestro. Well, in that case, we’d better while away a little more time with these musicians. Or perhaps we’ll go back to the bar. What do we do, my friends?’

I could see Sophie and Boris both watching with mounting impatience.

‘Excuse me,’ I muttered and started to walk away. Behind us, the men erupted into more muffled laughter, but I decided not to look back.

Eventually our surroundings grew quieter and then we could see in front of us the end of the corridor and the porters crowded together outside the last dressing room. Sophie increased her pace, but then halted while we were still a little way away. For their part, the porters, noticing our approach, had quickly formed a gangway and one of them – a wiry man with a moustache I recognised from the Hungarian Café – came towards us. He looked uncertain and initially addressed only me.

‘He’s holding out well, sir. He’s holding out well.’ Then he turned to Sophie and, lowering his eyes, muttered: ‘He’s holding out well, Miss Sophie.’

Sophie did not respond at first, simply staring past the porters to where the door of the dressing room was standing slightly ajar. Then she said suddenly, as if to justify her presence:

‘I’ve brought something for him. Here’ – she lifted up the package – ‘I’ve brought this for him.’

Someone called into the dressing room and two more porters who had been inside appeared at the threshold. Sophie did not move and for a moment no one appeared to know what to say or do next. Then Boris strode in front of us, his black bag hoisted up in the air before him.

‘Please, gentlemen,’ he said. ‘Stand to one side, please. Over here, please.’

He waved the porters away from the door. The two men at the threshold remained where they were, looking bemused, and Boris gestured impatiently to them. ‘Gentlemen! Over here please!’

Having cleared a reasonable space in front of the dressing room, Boris glanced back at his mother. Sophie came forward a few more steps then stopped again. Her eyes fixed on the door the two porters had left it half open – with a look of some apprehension. Again no one seemed sure what to do next, and again it was Boris who broke the silence.

‘Mother, wait here please,’ he said, and with that, turned and vanished into the dressing room.

Sophie relaxed visibly. She came a few steps closer and leaned forward almost nonchalantly to see if any of the room’s interior was visible. Finding that Boris had pushed the door virtually closed behind him, she straightened and stood waiting as though in a bus queue, her package draped over her folded arms.

Boris emerged again after a few minutes. Still holding his doctor’s bag, he carefully closed the door behind him.

‘Grandfather says he’s very pleased we’ve come,’ he said quietly, looking at his mother. ‘He’s very pleased.’

He went on looking up into his mother’s face and I was at first puzzled by the way he did so. Then I realised he was waiting for Sophie to give him a message to take back to Gustav, and sure enough, Sophie said after some thought:

‘Tell him I’ve brought something for him. A present. That I’m bringing it in for him in just a moment. I’m ... I’m just getting it ready.’

Once Boris had disappeared back into the dressing room, Sophie placed the overcoat over one arm and began to smooth out the wrinkles on the soft brown packaging. It was perhaps to do with the glaring pointlessness of this activity, but I was at this moment suddenly reminded of the many other calls on my time. I remembered, for instance, that I had still to inspect the conditions in the auditorium and that my chances of doing so to any useful degree were diminishing by the minute.

‘I’ll be back very soon,’ I said to Sophie. ‘There’s something I have to see to.’

She continued to attend to her package and gave no response. I was about to repeat myself more loudly, but then, thinking better of drawing undue attention to myself, hurried off quietly in search of Hoffman.

I had gone a little way down the corridor when I saw a commotion ahead of me. A dozen or so people were pushing against one another shouting and gesticulating and my first thought was that in all the mounting tension a quarrel had broken out among the kitchen staff. But then I noticed the entire crowd was moving slowly towards me and that it comprised a curious mixture of people. Some were in full evening dress, while others - in anoraks, raincoats and jeans - appeared to have come straight in off the streets. A few orchestra members had also attached themselves to this group.

One of the men shouting the loudest looked familiar and I was trying to recall where I had seen him before when I heard him cry:

‘Mr Brodsky, I really must insist!’

I then recognised the grey-haired surgeon I had encountered earlier in the forest, and realised that indeed, at the centre of the crowd, moving forward slowly with a look of stubborn determination, was Brodsky. He looked ghastly. The skin on his face and neck had become white and startingly shrivelled.

‘But he says he’s all right! Why can’t you let him decide?’ a middle-aged man in a dinner suit shouted back. A number of voices immediately endorsed this statement, to be met in turn by a chorus of protest.

Meanwhile Brodsky continued his slow progress, ignoring all the commotion around him. It looked at first as though he were being borne aloft by the crowd, but as he came closer I saw he was walking by himself with the aid of a crutch. There was something about this crutch which made me look at it more closely and I saw that it was in fact an ironing board which Brodsky was holding, vertically and folded, under his armpit.

As I stood watching this spectacle, people seemed one by one to notice me and fall respectfully silent, so that the closer the crowd came, the more quiet it grew. The surgeon, however, continued to shout:

‘Mr Brodsky! Your body has had a very severe shock. I really must insist you sit down and relax!’

Brodsky was looking downwards, concentrating hard on each step, and did not see me for some time. Then finally, sensing a change in those around him, he glanced up.

‘Ah, Ryder,’ he said. ‘Here you are.’

‘Mr Brodsky. How are you feeling now?’

‘I’m fine,’ he said calmly.

The crowd now stood off a little and he covered the remaining distance towards me with greater ease. When I complimented him on the way he had so quickly mastered the art of walking with a crutch, he looked down at his ironing board as though remembering it for the first time in a while.

‘The man who brought me here,’ he said, ‘he happened to have it, this thing, in the back of his van. It’s not so bad. It’s strong, I can walk with it fine. The only trouble, Ryder. Sometimes it starts to open up. Like this.’

He shook it, and sure enough the ironing board began to slip open. A catch prevented it from opening more than slightly, but I could see how its repeatedly unfolding even to this extent would prove a serious irritation.

‘I need some string for it,’ Brodsky said a little sadly. ‘Something like that. But there’s no time now.’

As I looked down to where he was indicating, I could not help staring aghast at his left trouser leg, tied into a knot just below his thigh.

‘Mr Brodsky,’ I said, forcing myself to look up again, ‘you can’t be feeling so well just now. Do you have the energy to conduct the orchestra this evening?’

‘Yes, yes. I feel fine. I’ll conduct and it will be ... it will be magnificent. Just the way I’ve always known it would be. And she’ll see then, with her own eyes and ears. All these years, I wasn’t being such a fool. All these years I had it in me, waiting. She’ll see me tonight, Ryder. It will be magnificent.’

‘You’re referring to Miss Collins? But is she coming here?’

‘She’s coming here, she’s coming. Oh yes, yes. He did his best to stop her, make her afraid, but she’s coming, oh yes. I’ve seen through his game now. Ryder, I got to her apartment, I walked a long way, it was hard, but in the end this man came by, this good man here’ – Brodsky looked around at the crowd and waved vaguely towards someone – ‘he came by, he had a van. We went to her apartment, I knocked on the door, I knocked and knocked. Someone, a neighbour, thought it was like before. You know, I used to do that, knock and knock on the door at night, and they’d get the police in the end. But I said, no, you fool, I’m not drunk any more. I had an accident and now I’m sober, I can see everything. I shouted this all up to him, the neighbour, some fat old man. I can see everything now, see everything he’s been doing all this time, yes, that’s what I shouted up. And then she was coming to the door, her, she was coming, and she could hear me talking to her neighbour and I could see her through the glass, not knowing what to do, and so I forgot the neighbour and started to talk to her. She listened, but she didn’t open the door at first, but then I said, look, I’ve had an accident, and she opened the door then. Where’s that tailor? Where’s he gone? He was supposed to get my jacket ready.’ Brodsky looked around him and a voice from the back of the crowd said:

‘He won’t be long, Mr Brodsky. In fact, here he is.’

A small man emerged with a tape measure and began to measure up Brodsky.

‘What’s this? What’s this?’ Brodsky muttered impatiently. Then he said to me: ‘I have no suit. They had one ready, it was delivered to my house, they say. Who knows? I had the accident, I don’t know where it is now. They’ll just have to get me a new one. A suit and a dress shirt, I want the best tonight. She’ll see what I meant, all those years.’

‘Mr Brodsky,’ I said, ‘you were telling me about Miss Collins. Do I understand you’ve managed to persuade her to come tonight after all?’

‘Oh, she’ll be coming. She promised. She won’t break her promise a second time. She never came to the cemetery. I waited and waited but she never came. But that wasn’t her fault. It was him, that hotel manager, he made her afraid. But I told her it’s too late for fear now. We’ve been afraid all our lives and now we have to be brave. At first she wasn’t listening. What have you done? she kept asking. She wasn’t the way you usually see her, she was almost crying, holding her hands up to her face, almost crying, not even caring the neighbours could hear it all. The dead of night and she was saying, Leo, Leo - yes, she calls me that now - Leo, what have you done to your leg? There’s blood. And I said it’s nothing, it doesn’t matter. An accident, but there was a doctor passing by, never mind that now, I told her, much more important, you have to come tonight. Don’t listen to that wretch from the hotel, that ... that bell-boy. There’s very little time left. Tonight she’d see what I’d always meant. All those years, I wasn’t the fool she thought. And she was saying she couldn’t come, she wasn’t ready, and besides, she said, all those wounds, they’d open again. And I said don’t listen to that bell-boy, that hotel janitor, it’s too late for that. And she pointed and said, but what’s happened, your leg, it's bleeding, and I said never mind, I shouted at her then. Never mind, I said. Don't you see it, I have to have you come! You have to come! You have to see for yourself, you have to come! Then I could see it, that she knew how serious I was. I could see her eyes, how things changed behind them, how the fear went, how something came alive, and I knew I'd won at last and that cleaner of hotel lavatories had lost. And I said to her, quietly now, I said to her: "So you'll come?" And she nodded calmly and I knew I could trust her. Not a trace of doubt, Ryder. She nodded and I knew I could trust her so I turned and went away then. I came here, this good man - where is he? - he brought me here in his van. But I would have walked, there's nothing so wrong with me now.'

'But Mr Brodsky,' I said, 'are you sure you're well enough to go on stage? After all, you've had a terrible accident ...'

I had not intended it, but my taking up of this theme had the effect of setting off another round of shouting. The surgeon pushed his way to the front and, raising his voice above the others, punched his fist into his hand for emphasis.

'Mr Brodsky, I insist! Even if it's only for several minutes, you must relax!'

'I'm fine, I'm fine, leave me be!' Brodsky shouted and began to walk. Then, turning back to me - I had remained stationary - he called: 'If you see that bell-boy, Ryder, tell him I'm here. Tell him that. He thought I'd never get this far, he thinks I'm dog-shit. Tell him I'm here. See how he likes it.' With that he went off down the corridor, pursued by the arguing crowd.

I continued in the opposite direction, looking for some sign of Hoffman. There were now fewer orchestra members standing about the corridor and many of the dressing-room doors had closed. At one point I was thinking of doubling back and peering in more closely through those doorways that were open, when I caught sight of Hoffman's figure in the corridor up ahead of me.

He had his back to me and was pacing slowly with his head bowed down. Although I was too far away to hear him, it was clear he was rehearsing his lines to himself. Then as I came nearer he suddenly lurched forward. I thought he was about to fall, but then realised he was once more performing the curious movement I had watched him practising in Brodsky's dressing-room mirror. Stooping right over, he brought up his arm, the elbow jutting outward, and began to bang his forehead with his fist. He was still doing so when I came up behind him and coughed. Hoffman straightened with a start and turned to me.

'Ah, Mr Ryder. Please don't worry. I'm sure Mr Brodsky will be here any moment now.'

'Indeed, Mr Hoffman. In fact, if you were just now rehearsing your speech of apology to the audience for Mr Brodsky's nonappearance, I'm pleased to inform you it will not be required. Mr Brodsky is now here.' I gestured down the corridor. 'He's just arrived.'

Hoffman looked astonished and for a second froze completely. Then he collected himself and said:

'Ah. Good. What a relief. But then of course, I was always ... I was always very confident.' He laughed, looking up and down the corridor as though hoping to catch sight of Brodsky. Then he laughed again and said: 'Well, I'd better go and see to him.'

'Mr Hoffman, before you do that, I'd very much appreciate you giving me the latest news regarding my parents. They are, I trust, safely in this building by now? And your idea of the horse and carriage - I believe I heard it as I was driving past the front of the building earlier on - I trust it created the impact you were hoping for?'

'Your parents?' Hoffman looked confused again. Then he put his hand on my shoulder and said: 'Ah yes. Your parents. Now let me see.'

'Mr Hoffman, I've been trusting you and your colleagues to take good care of my parents. Neither is in the best of health ...'

'Of course, of course. There's no need to worry. It's simply that, with so many things to consider, and Mr Brodsky being a little late, though you tell me he has now appeared ... Ha ha ...' He trailed off and once more cast his gaze down the corridor. I asked quite coldly:

'Mr Hoffman, where are my parents at this moment? Do you have any idea?'

'Ah. At this precise moment, I have to be honest, I do not myself ... But I can assure you they are in the most capable hands. Of course, I would dearly wish to oversee personally every aspect of the evening, but you must understand ... Ha ha. Miss Stratmann. She would know exactly where your parents are. She has been instructed to keep a close eye on the situation regarding your parents. Not that there is any danger of their ever being in want of attention while they're with us. On the contrary I have had to ask Miss Stratmann to watch carefully that they don't become exhausted on account of the hospitality that will inevitably be showered on them from all directions ...'

'Mr Hoffman, I take it you have no idea where they are at this point in time. And where is Miss Stratmann?'

'Oh, I'm sure she's here somewhere. Mr Ryder, let's walk along and go and see how Mr Brodsky is doing. I've no doubt we'll soon come across Miss Stratmann along the way. She may even be in the office. In any case, sir' - he suddenly adopted a more commanding manner - 'we won't achieve a great deal standing here.'

We set off together down the corridor. As we walked, Hoffman seemed to recover completely his composure and he said with a smile:

'Now we can be certain it will all go well. You, sir, look like a man who knows exactly what he's doing. And with Mr Brodsky here, all is now set. Everything will go just as planned. A splendid evening lies before us all.'

Then his step altered and I noticed he was staring at something in front of us. Following his gaze, I saw Stephan standing in the middle of the corridor with a troubled expression. The young man saw us and came towards us quickly.

'Good evening, Mr Ryder,' he said. Then, lowering his voice, he said to Hoffman: 'Father, perhaps we could have a word.'

'We're very busy, Stephan. Mr Brodsky has just now arrived.'

'Yes, I heard. But you see, Father, it's to do with Mother.'

'Ah. Mother.'

'It's just that she's still in the foyer and I'm due on in fifteen minutes. I saw her just now, she was just wandering about the foyer, and I told her I was going on soon and she said: "Well, dear, I have to see to a few things. I'll try and catch the end of your performance at least, but I'll just have to see to a few things first." That's what she said, but she didn't look that busy. Really, though, it's time you and Mother were both taking your seats. I'm on in less than fifteen minutes.'

'Yes, yes, I'll be along in just a moment. And your mother, I'm sure she'll finish whatever she's doing very soon. Why get so worried? Just go back to your dressing room and get yourself ready. '

'But what is it Mother's got to do in the foyer? She's just standing there, chatting with anyone who happens by. Soon she'll be the only one left there. People are taking their seats now. '

'I expect she's just stretching her legs before settling down for the evening. Now, Stephan, calm yourself. You've got to get the evening off to a good start. We're all counting on you. '

The young man thought about this, then seemed suddenly to remember me.

'You've been so kind, Mr Ryder,' he said with a smile. 'Your encouragement has been invaluable. '

'Your encouragement?' Hoffman looked at me in astonishment.

'Oh yes,' Stephan said. 'Mr Ryder has been extremely generous with both his time and his praise. He's been listening to me practise and he's given me the greatest encouragement I've had in years. '

Hoffman was looking from one to the other of us, a smile of incredulity hovering on his lips. Then he said to me:

'You've been spending time listening to Stephan? To him? '

'I have indeed. I tried to tell you this once before, Mr Hoffman. Your son has considerable gifts and, whatever else occurs tonight, I feel sure his performance will prove a sensation. '

'Why, you really think so? But the fact remains, sir, that Stephan here, he ... he ... ' Hoffman appeared to become confused, and with a quick laugh slapped his son on the back.

‘Well then, Stephan, it seems you might have something for us.’

‘I hope so, Father. But Mother’s still in the foyer. Perhaps she’s waiting for you. I mean, it’s always awkward, a woman sitting by herself at an occasion like this. Perhaps that’s all it is. As soon as you go in and take your seat, she might come and join you. It’s just that I have to go on very soon now.’

‘Very well, Stephan, I’ll see to it. Don’t worry. Now you get back to your dressing room and get yourself ready. Mr Ryder and I have just a few things to deal with first.’

Although Stephan still looked unhappy, we left him and continued on our way.

‘I should warn you, Mr Hoffman,’ I said when we had gone a little further down the corridor. ‘You may find Mr Brodsky has adopted a somewhat hostile attitude towards ... well, towards yourself.’

‘Towards me?’ Hoffman looked surprised.

‘That’s to say, when I saw him just now, he was expressing a certain annoyance with you. He seemed to have some sort of grievance. I thought I ought just to let you know.’

Hoffman mumbled something I could not hear. Then, as the corridor continued its gradual curve, what was obviously Brodsky’s dressing room - a small crowd was loitering outside it - appeared ahead of us. The hotel manager slowed down, then stopped altogether.

‘Mr Ryder, I’ve been thinking over what Stephan just said. On second thoughts, I think I’d better go and see to my wife. Make sure she’s all right. After all, the nerves on a night like this, you understand.’

‘Of course.’

‘Then you’ll forgive me. I wonder, sir, if I could ask you just to check that all is well with Mr Brodsky over there. I myself, yes, really’ – he looked at his watch – ‘it’s time I was taking my seat. Stephan’s quite right.’

Hoffman gave a short laugh and hurried off in the direction from which we had come.

I waited until he was out of sight, then walked towards the gathering around Brodsky’s doorway. Some people seemed to be standing there out of simple curiosity, while others were conducting heated arguments in subdued tones. The grey-haired surgeon was hovering close to the door, emphasising something to an orchestra member, repeatedly waving his hand in an exasperated manner towards the interior of the dressing room. The door itself, I was surprised to see, was wide open, and as I approached it the little tailor I had seen earlier popped his head out, shouting: ‘Mr Brodsky wants a pair of scissors. A large pair of scissors!’ Someone went hurrying off and the tailor disappeared again inside. I pushed my way through the crowd and looked into the room.

Brodsky was sitting with his back to the doorway, studying himself in his dressing mirror. He was now wearing a dinner jacket, both shoulders of which the tailor was pinching and tugging. He had on also a dress shirt, but as yet no bow tie.

‘Ah, Ryder,’ he said, seeing my reflection. ‘Come in, come in. You know, it’s a long time since I’ve worn clothes like these.’

He sounded much calmer than when I had last encountered him and I was reminded of the commanding air he had displayed in the cemetery that moment he had appeared in front of the mourners.

‘Now, Mr Brodsky,’ the tailor said, straightening himself, and for a few moments the two of them considered the jacket in the mirror. Then Brodsky shook his head.

‘No, no. A little tighter still,’ he said. ‘Here and here. Too much material.’

‘It won’t take a moment, Mr Brodsky.’ The tailor hurriedly took off the jacket and, giving me a quick bow as he passed, disappeared out of the door.

Brodsky went on looking at his reflection, fingering thoughtfully his winged collar. Then he picked up a comb and made some adjustments to his hair - which I noticed had been rubbed with a shiny lotion.

‘How are you feeling now?’ I asked, moving closer to him.

‘Good,’ he said slowly, continuing to attend to his hair. ‘I feel good now.’

And your leg? You’re sure you can perform with such a severe injury?’

‘My leg, it’s nothing.’ He put down his comb and considered the effect. ‘It wasn’t so bad as it looked. I’m fine now.’

As Brodsky said this, I could see in the mirror the surgeon - who had all the time remained near the doorway - take a step into the room with the look of someone no longer able to contain himself. But before the latter could say anything, Brodsky shouted at the mirror with some ferocity:

‘I’m fine now! The wound is nothing!’

The surgeon retreated back to the threshold, but from there continued to stare angrily at Brodsky’s back.

‘But Mr Brodsky,’ I said quietly, ‘you’ve lost a limb. That can never be a trivial matter.’

‘I lost a limb, it’s true.’ Brodsky was attending again to his hair. ‘But that was years ago, Ryder. Many years ago. When I was a child perhaps. It was all so long ago, I don’t quite remember. That fool of a doctor, he didn’t realise. I was all caught in that bicycle, but it was just the artificial leg, the one that was trapped. The fool didn't even realise it. Calls himself a surgeon! All my life, it feels like it, Ryder, I've been without that leg. How long ago was it now? You start to forget, once you get to this sort of age. You don't even mind it any more. It gets to be like an old friend, a wound. Of course, it troubles you from time to time, but I've lived with it so long. It must have happened when I was a child. A railway accident, maybe. In the Ukraine somewhere. In the snow maybe. Who knows? It doesn't matter now. It feels like it's been this way all my life. Just one leg. It's not so bad. You get by. That fool of a doctor. He sawed off the wooden leg. Yes, there was blood, it's bleeding still, I need scissors for it, Ryder. I've sent out for scissors. No, no, not for the wound. The trouser leg, I mean this trouser leg here. How can I conduct with this trouser leg flapping empty like this? But that idiot of a doctor, that hospital intern, he cut off the wooden one, so what can I do now? I have to' - he mimicked with his fingers scissors cutting across the material just above the knee - 'I have to do something. Make it as elegant as possible. That fool, not only does he ruin my wooden leg, he grazes the stump. It's years since the wound's bled like this. What an idiot, with his face so serious. A very important man he thinks himself, and he saws off my wooden leg. Cuts the end of my stump. No wonder it keeps bleeding. Blood everywhere. But I lost it years ago. A long time ago, that's how it feels now. I've had a lifetime to get used to it. But now the idiot with his saw, it's bleeding again.' He looked down and rubbed something into the floor with his shoe. 'I've sent out for scissors. I have to look my best, Ryder. I'm not a vain man. I don't do this because I'm vain. But a man must look decent at a time like this. She'll see me tonight, she'll remember tonight through all the years we've got left. And this orchestra, it's a good orchestra. Here, let me show you.' He reached forward and held a baton up to the light. 'A good baton. There's a particular feel, you can tell. It makes a difference, you know. For me, the point is always important. The point must be just so.' He stared at the baton. 'It's been a long time, but I'm not afraid. I'll show them all tonight. And I won't compromise. I'll take it the whole way. Like you say, Ryder. Max Sattler. But what an idiot, that man! That fool! That hospital janitor!'

These last words Brodsky shouted with some relish into the mirror and I saw the surgeon - who had been looking on from the doorway with an expression of astonishment - retreat sheepishly out of view.

With the surgeon finally gone, Brodsky for the first time displayed signs of strain. He closed his eyes and leaned over to one side in his chair, breathing heavily. But then, the next moment, a man burst into the room proffering a pair of scissors.

'Ah, at last,' Brodsky said, taking them. Then, once the man had left, he placed the scissors on the shelf in front of the mirror and began to stand up. He used the back of his chair to hoist himself up, then stretched a hand towards the ironing board leaning against the wall near the mirror. I moved forward to assist him, but with surprising agility he reached the ironing board unaided and tucked it under his arm.

'You see,' he said, gazing down sadly at the empty trouser leg. 'I have to do something here.'

'Would you like me to call back the tailor?'

'No, no. That man, he won't know what to do. I'll do it myself.'

Brodsky went on looking down at the empty trouser leg. As I watched him, I remembered the various other pressing matters awaiting my attention. In particular, I needed to return to Sophie and Boris, and to find out the latest on Gustav's condition. It was even possible some crucial decision concerning Gustav had been deferred pending my return. I gave a cough and said:

‘If you don’t mind, Mr Brodsky, I have to be getting along.’

Brodsky was still gazing down at his trouser leg. ‘It will be magnificent tonight, Ryder,’ he said quietly. ‘She’ll see. She’ll see at last.’

The scene outside Gustav's dressing room had not changed greatly in the time I had been away. The porters had perhaps moved further away from the doorway and were now huddled in murmured conference on the other side of the corridor. Sophie, however, was standing much as I had last seen her, the package folded over her arms, gazing at the slightly open door. Noticing my approach, one of the porters came towards me and said in a low voice:

'He's still holding out well, sir. But Josef's gone to fetch the doctor now. We decided we couldn't leave it any longer.'

I nodded, then asked quietly, glancing towards Sophie: 'Hasn't she gone in at all?'

'Not yet, sir. Though I'm sure Miss Sophie will do so very shortly.'

We both regarded her a moment.

'And Boris?' I asked.

'Oh, he's been in a few times, sir.'

'A few times?'

'Oh yes. He's in there just now.'

I nodded again, then went up to Sophie. She had been unaware of my return and gave a start as I touched her gently on the shoulder. Then she laughed and said:

'He's in there. Papa.'

'Yes.'

She adjusted her position a little, leaning to one side as though trying to improve her view through the doorway.

‘Aren’t you going to give him the coat?’ I asked.

Sophie looked down at it, then said: ‘Oh yes. Yes, yes. I was just going to ...’ She trailed off and again leaned to one side. Then she called out:

‘Boris? Boris! Come out a minute.’

After a few seconds Boris emerged looking very collected and closed the door carefully behind him.

‘Well?’ Sophie asked.

Boris gave me a quick glance. Then, turning to his mother, he said:

‘Grandfather says he’s sorry. He said to say he’s sorry.’

‘Is that all? That’s all he said?’

For an instant, uncertainty crossed the little boy’s face. Then he said reassuringly: ‘I’ll go back in. He’ll say more.’

‘But is that all he said to you just now? That he’s sorry?’

‘Don’t worry. I’ll go back in.’

‘Just a minute.’ Sophie began to tear the wrapping off the overcoat. ‘Take this in to your grandfather. Give it to him. See if it fits him properly. Tell him I can always adjust a few things.’

She let the torn wrapping fall to the floor and held up a dark brown overcoat. Boris took it without fuss and went back into the dressing room. Perhaps on account of the coat – it sat very bulkily in the little boy’s arms – Boris left the door half open behind him and soon a murmur of voices came out into the corridor. Sophie did not move from her spot, but I could see her straining to catch some words. Behind us the porters were still keeping a respectful distance, but I could see they too were now looking anxiously at the door.

Several moments passed, then Boris came out again.

‘Grandfather says thank you,’ he said to Sophie. ‘He’s very happy now. He says he’s very happy.’

‘Is that all he said?’

‘He said he’s happy. He wasn’t comfortable before, but now the coat’s come, he says it means a lot to him.’ Boris glanced behind him, then back at his mother. ‘He says he’s very happy with the coat.’

‘That’s all he said? Nothing about ... nothing about if it fits him? If he likes the colour?’

Because I was watching Sophie at this point, I did not see precisely what it was Boris did next. My impression was that he did nothing remarkable, simply pausing a little while he thought of a response to his mother’s query. But Sophie suddenly shouted:

‘Why are you doing that?’

The little boy stared in bewilderment.

‘Why are you doing that? You know what I mean. Like this! Like this!’ She grabbed Boris by the shoulder and began to shake him violently. ‘Just like his grandfather!’ she said, turning to me. ‘He copies it!’ Then to the porters, who were all looking on in alarm: ‘His grandfather! That’s where he gets it from. You see the way he does that with his shoulder? So smug, so self-satisfied. You see it? Exactly like his grandfather!’ She glared at Boris and continued to shake him. ‘Oh, so you think you’re so grand, do you? Do you?’

Boris pulled himself free and staggered back a few steps.

‘Did you see it?’ Sophie asked me. ‘The way he always does that. It’s just like his grandfather.’

Boris took a few more steps away from us. Then, reaching down, he picked off the floor the black doctor’s bag he had brought with him and held it up defensively in front of his chest. I thought he was about to burst into tears, but at the last moment he managed to control himself.

‘Don’t worry ...’ he began, then stopped. He hoisted the black bag higher in front of his chest. ‘Don’t worry. I’ll ... I’ll ...’ He gave up and looked about him. The door to the neighbouring room was only a short way behind him and the little boy turned quickly and disappeared through it, slamming it shut after him.

‘Are you mad?’ I said to Sophie. ‘He’s upset enough as it is.’

Sophie remained silent for a moment. Then she gave a sigh and walked over to the door through which Boris had disappeared. She knocked, then went in.

I heard Boris say something, but although Sophie had left the door open, I could not make out his words.

‘I’m sorry,’ I heard Sophie say in reply. ‘I didn’t mean to.’

Boris said something else I could not catch.

‘No, no, it’s all right,’ Sophie said gently. ‘You’ve been wonderful.’ Then after a pause, she said: ‘I’ve got to go and speak with your grandfather now. I’ve got to go.’

Boris said something again.

‘Yes, all right,’ Sophie said. ‘I’ll ask him to come in and wait with you.’

The little boy now began to say something quite lengthy.

‘No, he won’t,’ Sophie interrupted after a while. ‘He’ll be nice to you. No, I promise. He will. I’ll ask him to come in. But I’ve got to go and speak to Grandfather now. Before the doctor arrives.’

Sophie came out of the room and closed the door. Then, coming close to me, she said very quietly:

‘Please go in and wait with him. He’s upset. I’ve got to go and speak to Papa.’ Then, before I could move, she had placed a hand on my arm, saying: ‘Please be warm to him again. Like you used to be. He so misses it.’

‘I’m sorry, I don’t know what you’re referring to. If he’s upset, it’s because you ...’

‘Please,’ Sophie said. ‘Perhaps it’s my fault it’s all been happening, but please let it stop now. Please go in and sit with him.’

‘Of course I’ll sit with him,’ I said coldly. ‘Why wouldn’t I? You’d better go in to your father. He probably heard all of that just now.’

I entered the room in which Boris had ensconced himself and was surprised to find it did not resemble any of the other dressing rooms I had seen in the corridor. In fact, it was much more like a classroom, with its neat rows of small desks and chairs and, at the front, a large blackboard. The place was large and dimly lit with heavy shadows everywhere. Boris was sitting at a desk near the back and glanced up briefly as I came in. I said nothing to him and began looking around.

There was an intense scrawl on the blackboard and I wondered vaguely if Boris had done it. Then, as I continued to move around the empty desks, gazing at the charts and maps pinned up on the walls, the little boy gave a heavy sigh. I glanced at him and saw that he had placed his black bag on his lap and was struggling to remove something from it. Eventually he brought out a large book and put it down on the desk in front of him.

I turned away and continued moving around the room. When I next glanced at him, he was leafing through the pages with an admiring expression, and I realised he was once again looking at the handiwork manual. Feeling not a little irritated, I turned to look at a poster warning against the dangers of solvent abuse. Then Boris said behind me:

‘I really like this book. It shows you everything.’

He had tried to say this as though to himself, but I had drifted quite far from where he was sitting and so he had been obliged to raise his voice quite unnaturally. I decided not to respond and continued to wander around the room.

After a while Boris sighed heavily once more.

‘Mother gets so upset sometimes,’ he said.

Again, there was no sense of his having addressed me properly, and so I did not respond. Besides, when I eventually turned to him, he was pretending to be absorbed in his book. I wandered over to the other corner of the room and found pinned on the wall a large sheet marked ‘Lost Property’. There was a long list of entries in every kind of handwriting, a column each for the date, the article lost and the owner’s name. For some reason, I found this sheet diverting and went on studying it for a little while. The entries near the top appeared to have been written in earnest – a lost pen, a lost chess piece, a lost wallet. Then, from about half-way down, the entries grew facetious. Someone was claiming to have lost ‘three million US dollars’. Another entry was that of ‘Genghis Khan’ who had lost ‘the Asian Continent’.

‘I really like this book,’ Boris said behind me. ‘It shows you everything.’

Suddenly my patience snapped and I went quickly over to him and slammed my hand down on the desktop.

‘Look, why do you keep reading this thing?’ I demanded.

‘What did your mother tell you about it? She told you it was a marvellous present, I suppose. Well, it wasn’t. Is that what she told you? That it’s a splendid present? That I chose it for you with great care? Look at it! Look at it!’ – I attempted to tug the book out from under his grasp, but he clung to it, putting his arms down over it - 'it's just a useless old manual someone wanted to throw away. Do you think a book like this, something like this, can teach you about anything?'

I was still trying to pull it out from under him, but Boris, leaning right over the desk, was now protecting the book with his body. All the while he maintained an unnerving silence. I tugged again, determined to take the thing off him once and for all.

'Listen, this is a useless present. Utterly useless. No thought, no affection, nothing went into it. An afterthought, it's got it written over every page. But you think it's something marvellous I gave you! Give it to me, give it to me!'

Perhaps the fear that the manual would be torn apart caused Boris suddenly to raise his arms, and I found myself holding the book up by one cover. He still did not utter a sound, and I felt somewhat foolish about my outburst. I glanced at the book, hanging from my hand, then threw it towards the far corner of the room. It hit a desk and landed somewhere in the shadows. I immediately felt calmer and took a deep breath. When I next looked at him, Boris was sitting up rigidly, staring towards the part of the room where the manual had landed. He then got to his feet and hurried to retrieve it. He had not got half-way, however, when Sophie's voice called urgently from the corridor:

'Boris, come here a moment. Just a moment.'

Boris hesitated, looking once more over to where the manual had landed, then went out of the room.

'Boris,' I could hear Sophie saying outside, 'go and ask Grandfather how he's feeling now. And ask him if he wants any adjustments on the coat. The buttons at the bottom may be wrong. It might flap in the wind, if he stands up on the bridge a lot. Go and ask him, but don't stay and talk for a long time. Just ask him then come straight out.'

By the time I came back into the corridor, the little boy had already disappeared into Gustav's dressing room, and the scene that greeted me was a familiar one: Sophie standing tensely on the spot, her eyes on the door; the porters, a little way behind, looking on with their worried expressions. There was, however, a forlorn look in Sophie's face I had not noticed before and I suddenly felt a rush of tenderness towards her. I went up to her and placed my arm around her shoulders.

'This is a difficult time for us all,' I said gently. 'A very difficult time.'

I began to draw her closer to me, but she suddenly shook me off and went on staring at the doorway. Startled by this rebuttal, I said to her angrily:

'Look, we've all got to support each other at times like this.'

Sophie did not respond, and then Boris came out of the dressing room again.

'Grandfather says the coat's just what he wanted and he likes it even more because Mother gave it to him.'

Sophie made an exasperated noise. 'But does he want me to adjust it? Why doesn't he tell me? The doctor will be here soon.'

'He says ... he says he loves the coat. He loves it very much.'

'Ask him about the lower buttons. If he's going to keep standing up on the bridge in the wind, it will have to do up properly.'

Boris considered this for a second, then nodded and went back into the dressing room.

‘Look,’ I said to Sophie, ‘you don’t seem to realise how much pressure I’m under just now. Do you realise I’m due on stage very shortly? I’ll have to answer complex questions about the future of this community. There’s going to be an electronic scoreboard. Do you realise what this means? It’s all very well you worrying about these buttons and so on. Do you realise the pressure I’m under just now?’

Sophie turned to me with a distressed look and seemed about to say something, but just then Boris appeared again. This time he looked very seriously into his mother’s face but said nothing.

‘Well, what did he say?’ Sophie asked.

‘He says he loves the coat very much. He says it reminds him of a coat Mother had when Mother was little. Something about the colour. He says it used to have a picture of a bear on it. The coat Mother used to have.’

‘Do I need to adjust it?! Why won’t he give me a straight answer? The doctor will be here soon!’

‘You don’t seem to understand,’ I said interrupting.

‘There are people out there depending on me. There’s going to be an electronic scoreboard, everything. They want me to come to the edge of the stage after each answer. That’s a lot of pressure. You don’t seem to ...’

I stopped, becoming aware that Gustav was calling out something. Boris immediately turned and went back into the dressing room, and for what felt a long time Sophie and I stood there together waiting for him to come back. When he finally did so, the little boy looked at neither of us but, striding past, stopped in front of the porters.

‘Gentlemen, please.’ He made an ushering motion.

‘Grandfather would like you all to go in. He wants you all to be with him now.’

Boris began to lead the way and, after a slight hesitation, the porters followed keenly. They filed past us, some of them mumbling an awkward word or two to Sophie.

Once the last of them had gone in, I peered into the room but still could not see Gustav on account of the porters crowded just inside the doorway. There came the sound of three or four voices talking at once, and I was about to move closer when Sophie suddenly brushed past me and entered the room. There was a lot of movement and the voices stopped.

I strode up to the doorway. The porters having formed a gangway to let Sophie through, I now had a clear view of Gustav lying on his mattress. The brown overcoat was draped over the upper part of his body on top of the grey blanket I remembered from earlier. He had no pillow and clearly lacked the strength to raise his head, but he was looking up at his daughter with a gentle smile around his eyes.

Sophie had stopped two or three paces from where Gustav was lying. Her back was turned to me, so I could not see her expression, but she appeared to be staring down at him. Then, after several moments of silence, Sophie said:

‘Do you remember that day you came to school? When you came with my swimming kit? I’d left it at home and I was so upset all through the morning, wondering what I was going to do, and then you came with the blue sportsbag, the one with the string strap, came right into the classroom. Do you remember, Papa?’

‘This coat will keep me warm now,’ Gustav said. ‘It’s what I’ve been needing.’

‘You only had half an hour off, so you’d run all the way from the hotel. You came into the classroom, holding the blue sportsbag.’

‘I was always very proud of you.’

‘I’d been so worried all morning. Wondering what I was going to do.’

‘This is a very good coat. Look at this collar. And it’s real leather all along here.’

‘Excuse me,’ a voice said close to me and I turned to find a young man with spectacles and a doctor’s bag trying to squeeze past. Close behind him was another porter I recognised from the Hungarian Café. The two of them went into the room, and the young doctor, hurrying to Gustav, knelt down beside him and began to look him over.

Sophie silently stared at the doctor. Then, as though acknowledging it was now someone else’s turn to receive her father’s attention, she took a few steps back. Boris walked over to her and for a moment they were standing almost touching, but Sophie seemed not to notice the little boy and went on staring at the doctor’s hunched-over back.

It was just at this point I suddenly remembered again the many things needing to be done before my performance, and it occurred to me that, with the doctor having arrived, this was as good a moment as any for me to slip away. I moved quietly back out into the corridor and was about to set off in search of Hoffman when I heard a movement behind me and felt my arm being grasped roughly.

‘Where do you think you’re going?’ Sophie asked in an angry whisper.

‘I’m sorry, but you clearly don’t understand. I’ve got a lot to do now. There’s going to be an electronic scoreboard, everything. There’s an awful lot depending on me.’ I said this, all the time trying to free my arm from her grip.

‘But Boris. He needs you here. We both need you here.’

‘Look, you obviously have no idea! My parents, don’t you see? My parents will be arriving at any moment! There’s a thousand things I have to do! You’ve no idea, you’ve clearly no idea at all!’ I finally wrenched myself free. ‘Look, I’ll come back,’ I called in a conciliatory tone over my shoulder as I hurried away. ‘I’ll come back as soon as I can.’

I was still making my way rapidly along the corridor when I became aware of several figures standing in a line against the wall. Glancing towards them, I saw they were all wearing kitchen overalls and, as far as I could make out, were each waiting their turn to climb into a small black cupboard. Growing curious, I slowed my pace, then eventually turned and walked towards them.

The cupboard, I could now see, was tall and narrow like a broom closet and fixed to the wall a half-metre or so off the ground. A short series of steps led up to it, and from the demeanour of those in the queue I supposed the cupboard contained a urinal or perhaps a drinking fountain. But as I came closer I saw that the man currently at the top of the steps was bent right forward with his rear protruding, to all appearances rummaging busily through the cupboard's contents. Those in the queue, meanwhile, were gesticulating and calling up impatiently for him to finish his turn. Then, as the man came out of the cupboard and was looking cautiously behind him for the top step, someone in the queue let out an exclamation and pointed in my direction. All heads turned to me and the next moment the queue had dissolved as everyone hurried to make way for me. The man who had been in the cupboard came down the steps as quickly as he could, then, bowing to me, made an ushering motion up to the cupboard.

'Thank you,' I said, 'but I believe there were others already waiting.'

There was a storm of protest and several hands virtually pushed me up the short staircase.

The narrow door of the cupboard had fallen shut, and when I opened it - it pulled towards me, obliging me to balance precariously on the top step - I discovered to my surprise that I was looking down onto the auditorium from a vast height. The entire back of the cupboard was missing and, were I reckless enough, I saw that I could, by leaning out and stretching a little, touch the concert hall ceiling. The view certainly was commanding, but the whole arrangement struck me as idiotically hazardous. The cupboard, if anything, actually leaned forward, encouraging a careless spectator to totter towards the edge. Meanwhile only a thin cord tied at waist height had been provided to resist a plunge down into the audience. I could not see any obvious reason for the cupboard - other than perhaps that it was part of some system which allowed flags and such to be suspended across the hall.

I moved my feet carefully until they were both inside the cupboard, then, gripping the door frame tightly, took a look at the scene below me.

Around three-quarters of the seats were now occupied, but the lights were still up and everywhere people were chatting and greeting one another. Some were waving to those in distant rows, others crowding the aisles, talking and laughing. All the while more people were arriving by the two main doors. The array of gleaming music stands in the orchestra pit was catching the light, while on the stage itself - the curtains had been left open - a solitary grand piano was waiting with its lid raised. As I looked down at this instrument on which I was soon to give this most momentous of performances, the thought struck me that this was as close as I was now likely to come to carrying out an inspection of the conditions, and I again felt frustration about the whole way I had organised my time since arriving in the city.

Then, as I watched, Stephan Hoffman came onto the stage from the wings. There had been no announcement and the lights did not dim even slightly. Stephan's manner, moreover, lacked any sense of ceremony. He walked briskly to the piano with a preoccupied air, not glancing towards the audience. It was hardly surprising then that most people in the hall displayed nothing more than mild curiosity and went on with their talking and greeting. Certainly there was some surprise when he went into the explosive opening of Glass Passions, but even then the large majority seemed to conclude, after a few seconds, that the young man was simply testing out the piano or else the amplification system. Then, only several bars in, something seemed to catch Stephan's eye and his playing lost all intensity, as though someone had suddenly pulled out a plug. His gaze followed something moving through the crowd, until eventually he was playing with his head twisted right away from the piano. I then saw he was watching a couple of figures leaving the auditorium and, leaning forward a little further, made out just in time Hoffman and his wife disappearing below me out of my angle of vision.

Stephan stopped playing altogether and, swivelling right round on his stool, sat staring after his parents. This action appeared to remove any remaining doubts in the crowd that Stephan was engaged in a sound check. Indeed, for a moment he looked for all the world like someone awaiting signals from technicians on the other side of the hall, and no one paid any attention when he eventually rose from the stool and strode off the stage.

Only when he had reached the wings did he allow himself to give in to the feeling of outrage now engulfing him. On the other hand, the notion that he had abandoned the stage after only a few bars had for the moment a sense of utter unreality about it, and he hardly gave it thought as he hurried down the wooden steps and through the series of backstage doors.

When he emerged into the corridor it was busy with rushing stage-hands and catering staff. Stephan set off towards the lobby where he hoped to find his parents, but before he had gone far he spotted his father coming towards him, unaccompanied and wearing a preoccupied air. For his part the hotel manager did not notice Stephan until they were virtually about to collide. He then stopped and stared at his son with astonishment.

‘What? You’re not playing?’

‘Father, why did you and Mother leave like that? And where’s Mother now? Isn’t she feeling well?’

‘Your mother.’ Hoffman sighed gravely. ‘Your mother felt it was correct she should leave at this point. Of course, I escorted her and ... Well, let me be truthful, Stephan. Let me say it. I tended to concur with her view. I didn’t resist the idea. You look at me like that, Stephan. Yes, I realise I’ve let you down. I promised you you could have this chance, this platform to play in front of the whole town, in front of all our friends and colleagues. Yes, yes, I promised you this. Perhaps it was you yourself who asked me, perhaps you caught me when I was distracted, who knows how it came about? It doesn’t matter. The point is I agreed, I promised, I didn’t want to go back on it, there, it was my fault. But you have to try and understand, Stephan, how it is for us, your parents. How difficult it is to have to witness ...’

‘I’m going to talk to Mother,’ Stephan said and began to walk off. For a brief second Hoffman looked aghast, and then he grasped his son’s arm quite roughly, laughing self-consciously as he did so.

‘You can’t do that, Stephan. What I mean is, you see, your mother has gone to the ladies’ room. Ha ha. In any case, I think it best you let her sit things out, so to speak. But Stephan, what have you done? You should be playing. Ah, but perhaps that’s for the best in the end. A few embarrassing questions, but no more than that.’

‘Father, I’m going back to play. Please take your seat. And please persuade Mother to come back.’

‘Stephan, Stephan.’ Hoffman shook his head and placed a hand on his son’s shoulder. ‘I want you to know that we both think very highly of you. We're both immensely proud. But this idea of yours, this idea you've had all your life. I mean about ... about your music. Your mother and I, we've never had the heart to tell you. Naturally, we wanted you to have your dreams. But this. All this' - he gestured in the direction of the auditorium - 'this has all been a terrible mistake. We should never have let things get this far. You see, Stephan, the fact is this. Your playing is very charming. Extremely accomplished in its way. We've always enjoyed listening to you play at home. But music, serious music, music at the sort of level required tonight ... that, you see, is another thing. No, no, don't interrupt, I'm trying to tell you something, something I should have said long ago. You see, this is the civic concert hall. Audiences, concert audiences, they are not like friends and relatives who listen sympathetically in the living room. Real concert audiences, they are used to standards, professional standards. Stephan, how can I put this?'

'Father,' Stephan interrupted, 'you don't realise. I've practised hard. And even though the piece I'm about to play is a very late choice, nevertheless, I've practised very hard and if you'd only come now you'd see ...'

'Stephan, Stephan ...' Hoffman shook his head again. 'If only it were just a matter of hard work. If only it were just that. But some of us, we're just not born with the gift. We haven't got it in us, and that's something we have to come to terms with. It's terrible I have to tell you this at such a moment, and after having led you on for so long. I hope you can forgive us, your mother and me, we were weak for so long. But we could see how much pleasure it brought you and we didn't have the heart. But it's no excuse, I know that. This is awful, my heart bleeds for you at this moment, it really does. I hope you'll be able to forgive us. It was a terrible mistake, to have let you go this far. To have you go on stage in front of the whole town. Your mother and I, we love you too much to be able to watch it. It would simply be too much to ... to see our own dear son being made a laughing stock. There, I've said it, I've put my cards on the table. It's cruel, but I've told you at last. I thought I might be able to do it. That I would be able to sit there amidst the smirks and the sniggers. But when the moment came, your mother found she could not, and neither could I. What is it? Why won't you listen to me? Don't you realise this is bringing me great pain? It's not easy to speak so frankly, even to one's own son ...'

'Father, please, I beg you. Just come and listen, if only for a few minutes, and judge for yourself. And Mother. Please, please, persuade Mother. You'll both see then, I know you will ...'

'Stephan, it's time for you to go back on stage. Your name is printed on the programme. You have appeared once already. You must now at the very least make a go of it. Let everyone see that you at least did your best. There, that's my advice. Never mind them, never mind their sniggers. Even if they openly laugh as though some hilarious pantomime were being performed on the stage rather than a solemn and profound piece of music, even then, you can remember your mother and father are proud you at least had the courage to see it through. Yes, you must go now and see it through, Stephan. But you must forgive us, we simply love you too much to witness it. In fact, Stephan, I believe it would break your mother's heart to do so. Now you must go, there's little time left. Go, go, go.'

Hoffman spun around, a hand to his forehead, as though reeling from a migraine, and in this manner drifted a few steps away from Stephan. Then he abruptly straightened and looked back at his son.

'Stephan,' he said sternly. 'It's time for you to go back on stage.'

Stephan went on staring at his father for a second, then, seeing finally that his cause was a hopeless one, turned and set off down the corridor.

As he made his way again through the succession of backstage doors, Stephan found himself besieged by a variety of thoughts and emotions. Naturally he was frustrated at this failure to persuade his parents to return to their seats. Moreover, he could feel awakening deep within him a nagging fear he had not experienced for some years - namely that what his father had said was true and that he was indeed the victim of some massive delusion. But then as he approached the wings his confidence rapidly returned and with it came an aggressive urge to find out for himself just what he was capable of.

Stephan came back onto the stage to find the lights had dimmed a little. The auditorium was far from dark, however, and many guests were still on their feet. In various parts of the hall waves of people could be seen rising up as someone else crept along a row to their seat. The hubbub lowered only slightly as the young man sat down at the piano and continued steadily while he waited for his emotions to settle. Then his hands came down in the harsh, precise way they had earlier, evoking a territory somewhere between shock and exhilaration essential for the opening of Glass Passions.

By the time he was half-way through the brief prologue, the audience had become significantly quieter. By the time he was completing the first movement, the auditorium had fallen entirely silent. Those who had been standing talking in the aisles were still on their feet, but appeared frozen, their eyes fixed on the stage. All those seated were watching and listening with concentration. A small crowd had formed at one of the entrances where the last of the people drifting in had stopped in their tracks. As Stephan began the second movement, the technicians turned the house lights right down and I could no longer see the audience well. But there was no doubting the general astonishment which continued to envelope the hall. Admittedly a part of this response was down to the audience's surprise at discovering one of their own young men capable of scaling such technical heights as they were now witnessing. But over and beyond his expertise, there was some strangely intense quality to Stephan's playing that virtually refused to be ignored. It was my impression, moreover, that many of those present saw in this unexpected start to the evening a kind of omen. If this was merely the prelude, what did the rest of the proceedings hold in store? Would the evening prove a turning point for the community after all? Such seemed to be the unspoken questions behind many a startled face in the crowd below me.

Stephan rounded off with a wistful, faintly ironic reading of the coda. There was a second or two of silence after he had finished, and then the hall burst into enthusiastic applause, which the young man leapt to his feet to acknowledge. He was clearly delighted, and if he was feeling all the more frustrated that his parents were not present to witness this triumph, he did not allow it to show on his face. He took several bows as the applause continued, and then, perhaps suddenly remembering his contribution was only a modest part of the whole programme, retreated hastily out of view.

The applause continued strongly for some time before subsiding into an excited murmur. Then, before people had had much chance to exchange views, a severe-faced man with silver hair appeared from the wings. As he came slowly and self-importantly towards the lectern at the front, I recognised him as the man who had presided over the banquet in honour of Brodsky on my first night.

The auditorium quickly fell silent, but for a good thirty seconds the severe-faced man said nothing, simply regarding the audience with faint disgust. Then finally he took a weary breath and said:

‘Although it is my wish that you all enjoy this evening, I would remind you that we are not gathered here now to witness a cabaret. Gravely important issues lie behind tonight's occasion. Make no mistake. Issues relating to our future, to the very identity of our community.'

The severe-faced man continued to reiterate pedantically this same point for several more minutes, occasionally taking long pauses during which he surveyed the room with a scowl. I began to lose interest and, remembering the queue of people behind me waiting to use the cupboard, decided to allow someone else his turn. But just as I was negotiating my way out of the confined space, I realised the severe-faced man had moved onto a fresh point - that in fact he was in the process of introducing someone onto the stage.

The personage in question, it seemed, was not only 'the cornerstone of the city's entire library system', but was also possessed of the ability to 'capture the curl of the dewdrop on the tip of an autumn leaf'. The severe-faced man stared contemptuously at the audience for one last time, then mumbled a name and stalked off. The auditorium broke into keen applause, directed evidently at the severe-faced man rather than the person he had introduced. Indeed, the latter did not appear for another minute or so, and when he did was greeted somewhat hesitantly.

The man was small and neat with a bald head and a moustache. He came on carrying a folder which he put down on the lectern. He then unclipped some sheets of paper and began to shuffle them about, never once looking up to acknowledge the audience. A restlessness began to grow in the hall. I became curious again and, deciding that those in the queue would not mind waiting just a little longer, repositioned myself carefully near the edge of the cupboard.

When the bald-headed man finally spoke, he did so much too close to the microphone and his voice boomed shakily.

'I would like tonight to present a selection of my work from each of my three periods. Many of these poems will be familiar to you from my readings at the Café Adèle, but I trust you will not object to hearing them again in this grand context. And I will tell you now, there will be a small surprise at the end. Something I trust will bring you a modest amount of pleasure.'

He then returned to shuffling his papers and a few murmured conversations started up in the crowd. Then the bald-headed man at last made up his mind and coughed loudly into the microphone, restoring the silence.

Many of the poems used rhyme and were relatively short. There were poems about fish in the city park, snow-storms, broken windows remembered from childhood - all delivered in a curiously high-pitched incantatory tone. My attention drifted for a few minutes, and then I became aware that a section of the audience somewhere directly below me had started to talk quite audibly.

For the moment the voices were reasonably discreet, but even as I listened they seemed to grow bolder. Eventually - while the bald-headed man was reciting a long poem about different cats owned by his mother over the years - the noise drifting up to me became that of a sizeable party consorting in more or less normal tones. Overcoming my sense of caution, I moved right to the very edge of the cupboard and, holding on to the wooden frame with both hands, peered down.

The talking was indeed coming from a group seated directly below me, but the number of those involved was smaller than I had supposed. Seven or eight people had apparently decided to pay no further attention to the poet and were now happily conversing with each other, some of them having turned completely in their seats to do so. I was about to study this group more closely, when I caught sight of Miss Collins sitting several rows behind.

She was wearing the elegant black evening dress she had worn at the banquet of the first night, her shawl still around her shoulders. She was watching the bald-headed man sympathetically, her head tilted slightly to one side, a finger raised to her chin. I continued to watch her for a while but there was nothing at all about her appearance to suggest she was anything other than perfectly calm and serene.

My gaze returned to the rowdy group below me and I noticed that playing cards were now being passed around. Only then did I realise that the core of this group comprised the drunken men I had encountered in the cinema on my first night, and then just a little while ago in the corridor.

The game of cards grew ever more boisterous, until the whole lot of them were bursting into cheers or whoops of laughter. Disapproving looks were being cast in their direction, but then gradually more and more people in the hall began also to talk, albeit in more restrained voices.

The bald-headed man showed no sign of noticing and continued to recite earnestly, poem after poem. Then, about twenty minutes after he had first come on stage, he paused and, gathering some sheets together, said:

‘And now we enter my second period. As some of you will already know, my second period was ushered in by one key incident. An incident that made it no longer possible for me to create with the tools I had hitherto employed. That is to say, the discovery that my wife had been unfaithful.’

He hung down his head as if this memory still grieved him. It was then that one of the group below me shouted:

‘So he obviously was using the wrong tools!’

His companions all laughed, then someone else called out:

‘A bad workman always blames his tools.’

‘His wife did too it seems,’ said the first voice.

This exchange, clearly intended to be heard by as many people as possible, provoked a fair amount of tittering. It was not clear how much of it the bald-headed man had heard from the stage, but he paused and, without looking in the direction of his hecklers, shuffled his papers again. If he had intended to say more by way of introducing his second period, he now abandoned the idea and started once more to recite.

The bald-headed man's second period was not obviously different from his first and the restlessness in the audience grew. So much so that when after a few more minutes one of the drunken men shouted something I could not catch, a substantial part of the hall laughed quite openly. For the first time, the bald-headed man seemed to realise he was losing control of the audience and, looking up in mid-sentence, stood blinking into the lights as though in shock. An obvious course open to him was to abandon the stage. A more dignified option would have been to read three or four more poems before departing. The bald-headed man, however, embarked on another solution altogether. He began to read again at a panic-stricken pace with the intention presumably of completing his planned programme as quickly as possible. The effect was not only to render him more or less incoherent, but also to give encouragement to his enemies, who now saw they had him on the run. More and more remarks were shouted out - no longer just by the group below me - to be greeted each time with laughter from all around the hall.

Then at last the bald-headed man made an attempt to regain control. He put aside his folder and, not saying a word, stared pleadingly from the lectern. The crowd, much of which had been laughing, quietened - perhaps as much out of curiosity as from remorse. When the bald-headed man finally spoke, his voice had gained a degree of authority.

'I promised you a small surprise,' he said. 'Now here it is. A new poem. I finished it only a week ago. I composed it especially for this great occasion tonight. It is called, simply, "Brotsky the Conqueror". If you will allow me.'

The man shuffled his sheets again, but this time the audience remained silent. Then he leaned forward and began to recite. After the first few lines, he glanced up quickly and seemed surprised to find the hall still silent. He continued to read, and as he did so grew increasingly confident, so that before long he was waving his hands about loftily to emphasise key phrases.

I had imagined the poem would be a general portrait of Brodsky, but it soon became clear it was concerned solely with Brodsky's battles with alcohol. The earlier stanzas drew comparisons between Brodsky and a variety of mythical heroes. There were images of Brodsky hurling spears from a hilltop at an invading army, Brodsky grappling with a sea-serpent, Brodsky chained to a rock. The audience continued to listen with a respectful, even solemn attitude. I glanced at Miss Collins, but could see no obvious change in her demeanour. She was, just as before, observing the poet with an interested but detached air, a finger on the side of her chin.

After several minutes the poem shifted ground. It abandoned its mythical backdrops, focusing instead on actual incidents involving Brodsky from the recent past - incidents which as far as I could guess had passed into local legend. Most of these references were of course lost on me, but I could see an attempt was being made to re-appraise and dignify Brodsky's role in each episode. From a literary standpoint, this section of the poem struck me as a great improvement on the earlier, but the introduction of such concrete and familiar contexts had the effect of breaking whatever hold the bald-headed man had established over the audience. A reference to 'the bus-shelter tragedy' set off some tittering again, which grew more widespread at the mention of Brodsky 'outnumbered and battle-worn' being 'forced finally to surrender, behind the telephone booth'. But it was when the bald-headed man spoke of 'a glittering show of valour on the school outing' that the entire hall, as one, erupted into laughter.

From this point on, it was clear to me nothing could save the bald-headed man. The final stanzas, devoted to eulogising Brodsky's new-found sobriety, were greeted virtually line by line with gales of laughter. When I glanced again at Miss Collins, I could see the finger on her chin making quick stroking motions, but otherwise she looked as composed as ever. The bald-headed man, barely audible above the laughing and the heckling, finally came to the end and, gathering up his sheets indignantly, stalked off the stage. A portion of the audience, feeling perhaps that things had gone too far, applauded quite generously.

For the next few minutes the stage remained empty and the audience was soon talking at full volume. Surveying the faces below me I saw with interest that, although many people were exchanging mirthful looks, a significant number appeared to be angry and were gesturing sternly towards others in the hall. And then the spotlight fell onto the stage again and Hoffman appeared.

The hotel manager looked furious and came hurrying to the lectern without ceremony.

'Ladies and gentlemen, please!' he cried, even as the crowd began to quieten. 'Please! I ask you to remember the import of this evening. To quote Mr von Winterstein, we are not here to attend a cabaret!'

The ferocity of this reprimand did not go down well with some of the crowd, and an ironic 'ooh' rose up from the group below me. But Hoffman went on:

'In particular, I am shocked to find so many of you persisting in this idiotically out-of-date view of Mr Brodsky. Setting aside the many other great merits of Mr Ziegler's poem, its central premise, namely that Mr Brodsky has conquered once and for all the demons that once plagued him, cannot be doubted. Those of you who chose just now to laugh at Mr Ziegler's eloquent articulation of this point will, I am sure, very shortly - yes, in the next few moments! - come to feel ashamed. Yes, ashamed! As ashamed as I felt on behalf of this whole city just a minute ago! '

He thumped the lectern as he said this and a surprisingly large proportion of the audience erupted into self-righteous applause. Hoffman, visibly relieved, but evidently unsure how to respond to this reception, bowed awkwardly a few times. Then, before the applause had died down entirely, he collected himself and declared loudly into the microphone:

'Mr Brodsky deserves to be nothing less than a towering figure in our community! The spiritual and cultural fountainhead for our young people. A lantern-bearer for those of us more senior in years, perhaps, but who none the less have become lost and forlorn in these dark chapters of our city's history. Mr Brodsky deserves nothing less! Here, look at me! I stake my reputation, my credibility on what I am now telling you! But why need I say this? In a brief moment, you will perceive it with your own eyes and ears. This is hardly the introduction I intended to give and I regret that I was compelled to give it. But let us not delay any more. Let me call onto the stage our highly esteemed guests, the Stuttgart Nagel Foundation Orchestra. Conducted this evening by our very own - Mr Leo Brodsky! '

There was a good round of applause as Hoffman went off into the wings. For the next few minutes nothing happened, and then the orchestra pit became illuminated and the musicians came out. There was another round of applause, followed by a tense hush as the orchestra members shifted around on their seats, tuned their instruments and fiddled with their music stands. Even the rowdy group below me seemed to have accepted the seriousness of what was about to unfold; they had put away their playing cards and were now sitting attentively, their gazes fixed in front of them.

The orchestra finally settled and a spotlight fell on an area of the stage near the wings. For another minute nothing happened, and then there came a thumping sound from off-stage. The noise grew louder until finally Brodsky stepped into the pool of light. He paused there, perhaps to allow the audience time to register his appearance.

Certainly, many of those present would have had difficulty recognising him. With his evening suit, brilliantly white dress shirt and coiffured hair, he was an impressive figure. There was no denying, however, that the shabby ironing board he was still using as his crutch undermined the effect somewhat. Moreover, as he began to make his way towards the conductor's podium - the ironing board thumping with each step - I noticed the handiwork he had carried out on the empty trouser leg. His desire not to have the material flapping about was perfectly understandable. But rather than knotting it at the stump, Brodsky had cut a wavy hemline an inch or two below the knee. An entirely elegant solution, I could see, was not possible, but this hem seemed to me far too ostentatious, likely only to draw extra attention to his injury.

And yet, as he continued to advance across the stage, it appeared I was quite mistaken on this point. For although I kept waiting for the crowd to gasp on discovering Brodsky's condition, the moment never came. Indeed, as far as I could discern, the audience seemed not to notice the missing leg at all, and continued simply to wait in hushed anticipation for Brodsky to reach the podium.

Perhaps it was the exhaustion, or perhaps the tension, but he did not seem able to reproduce the smooth walk with the ironing board I had witnessed earlier in the corridor. He was lurching badly and it occurred to me that, with his injury still unnoticed, such a gait was bound to arouse suspicions of drunkenness. He was several yards from the podium when he stopped and looked down crossly at his ironing board - which I saw had once more started to come open. He shook it, then began to walk again. He managed a few more steps, then something on the ironing board gave way. It began to unfold itself under him just as he was placing his weight on it, and Brodsky and the board went down together in a heap.

The reaction to this occurrence was an odd one. Instead of the cries of alarm one might have expected, the audience, for the initial second or two, maintained a disapproving silence. Then a murmur went across the auditorium, a kind of collective 'hmm', as though conclusions were being reserved in the face of discouraging signs. Similarly, the three stage-hands who approached to give Brodsky assistance did so with a marked lack of urgency, and even a hint of distaste. In any case, before they could reach him, Brodsky, who had been busy wrestling with the ironing board, shouted angrily from the floor for them to go away. The three men stopped in their tracks, then went on watching Brodsky with something not unlike morbid fascination.

Brodsky continued grappling on the floor for some moments. At times he appeared to be attempting to stand up, at others he seemed more intent on extricating some part of his clothing trapped in the mechanisms of the ironing board. At one point he broke into a series of oaths, presumably directed at the board, which the amplification system picked up all too clearly. I glanced again at Miss Collins and saw that she had now sat forward in her seat. But then, as Brodsky's struggles continued, she leaned back again slowly and raised her finger back up to her chin.

Then at last Brodsky made a breakthrough. He succeeded in erecting the ironing board in its unfolded position and pulled himself up. He stood there proudly on his one good leg, gripping the board with both hands, elbows pushed out, as if preparing to mount it. He glared at the three stage-hands and, as they began to retreat back into the wings, turned his gaze on the audience.

‘I know, I know,’ he said and, although he was not speaking loudly, the microphones along the front of the stage seemed to pick him up so that he was quite audible. ‘I know what you’re all thinking. Well, you’re wrong.’

He looked down and became engrossed again with his predicament. Then he straightened himself up a little more, and began to pass his hand along the padded surface of the ironing board as though its original purpose had only now occurred to him. Finally he looked at the audience again and said:

‘Dispel all such notions from your mind. That’ - he thrust his head towards the floor - ‘was simply an unfortunate accident. Nothing more.’

Another murmur went across the auditorium and then there was silence again.

For the next few moments, Brodsky continued to stand crouched over the ironing board, not moving, his gaze fixed on the conductor’s podium. I realised he was measuring the distance to the podium, and indeed, the next instant, he began his journey. He proceeded by lifting the entire frame of the ironing board and banging it down again in the manner of a zimmer, dragging his single leg after it. At first the audience seemed taken aback, but as Brodsky moved steadily forwards, some people, concluding they were witnessing a sort of circus act, began to clap. This cue was quickly taken up all around the hall so that the remainder of Brodsky’s journey to the podium was completed against a background of substantial applause.

On reaching his destination, Brodsky let go of the ironing board and, grasping the semi-circular rail around the podium, eased himself into position. He balanced his body carefully against the rail then picked up the baton.

The applause for the ironing board act had by now died down and there was once again an atmosphere of hushed anticipation. The musicians too were looking at Brodsky slightly nervously. But Brodsky seemed to be savouring the feeling of being back at the helm of an orchestra after so many years, and for a time went on smiling and gazing about him. Then at last he raised his baton in the air. The musicians poised themselves, but Brodsky changed his mind again and, lowering the baton, turned to the audience. He smiled genially and said:

‘You all think I’m a filthy drunk. We’ll see now if that’s all I am.’

The nearest microphone was a certain distance away and only a portion of the audience appeared to hear this remark. In any case, the very next instant, he had raised the baton again and the orchestra was plunged into the harsh opening semibreves of Mullery’s Verticality.

It did not seem to me a particularly outlandish way to open the piece, but clearly it was not what the audience was expecting. Many people started visibly in their seats and, as the elongated discords stretched on into the sixth and seventh bars, I could see on some faces expressions of near-panic. Even some of the musicians were looking anxiously from the conductor to their scores. But Brodsky continued steadily to turn up the intensity, maintaining all the while his exaggeratedly slow tempo. Then he reached the twelfth bar when the notes burst and came fluttering down. A kind of sigh went around the audience, then almost immediately the music began to build again.

Brodsky occasionally steadied himself with his free hand, but he had by this point entered some deeper part of himself, and seemed able to maintain his balance with only nominal support. He swayed his torso. He swung both arms through the air with abandon. During the early passages of the first movement, I noticed some members of the orchestra glancing guiltily at the audience as though to say: ‘Yes, really, this is what he’s told us to do!’ But then steadily the musicians became engrossed in Brodsky's vision. First it was the violins who became quite carried away, and then I could see more and more musicians losing themselves in their performance. By the time Brodsky led them into the melancholy of the second movement, the orchestra appeared to have accepted entirely his authority. The audience too had by this point lost its earlier restlessness and was sitting transfixed.

Brodsky took advantage of the looser form of the second movement to push into ever stranger territories, and I too - accustomed though I was to every sort of angle on Mullery - grew fascinated. He was almost perversely ignoring the outer structure of the music - the composer's nods towards tonality and melody that decorated the surface of the work - to focus instead on the peculiar life-forms hiding just under the shell. There was a slightly sordid quality about it all, something close to exhibitionism, that suggested Brodsky was himself profoundly embarrassed by the nature of what he was uncovering, but could not resist the compulsion to go yet further. The effect was unnerving, but compelling.

I studied again the crowd below me. There was no doubting this provincial audience had become emotionally gripped by Brodsky, and I now saw the possibility that my question-and-answer session would not prove as tricky as I had feared. Obviously, if Brodsky managed to convince the audience with this display, how I answered the questions became far less critical. My task would become one essentially of endorsing something to which the audience had already been won round - in which case, even with my inadequate level of research, there was no reason I should not acquit myself perfectly adequately with a few diplomatic, occasionally humorous remarks. If on the other hand Brodsky were to leave the audience in turmoil and indecision, I would, regardless of my status and experience, have my work very much cut out for me. The atmosphere in the auditorium was still one of unease and, remembering the perturbed anger of the third movement, I wondered what would happen once Brodsky commenced it.

Just at this point it suddenly occurred to me for the first time to search the audience for my parents. Almost simultaneously, the idea flashed through my head that, since I had not noticed them already on the numerous occasions I had studied the crowd, the likelihood of my now discovering their faces below me was not great. I nevertheless leaned forward, almost recklessly, and scanned the auditorium with my gaze. There were certain parts of the hall I could not see no matter how much I craned forward, and I realised I would sooner or later have to go down into the auditorium itself. Then, even if I were still unable to find my parents, I could at least dig out Hoffman or Miss Stratmann and demand to know of my parents' whereabouts. Either way, I saw I could ill afford to spend further time watching proceedings from my present vantage point and, turning carefully, began to make my way out of the cupboard.

When I emerged again at the top of the small staircase, I saw the queue below me had greatly lengthened. There were now at least twenty people waiting, and I felt rather guilty to have taken as long as I had. Everyone in the queue was talking excitedly, but fell silent at the sight of me. I mumbled a vague apology as I came down the steps, then hurried off down the corridor just as the person next in line began eagerly to climb towards the cupboard entrance.

The corridor was much calmer than before, owing largely to a lull in the activities of the catering staff. Every several yards along the corridor I would encounter a stationary trolley, fully laden, sometimes with men in overalls leaning against it, smoking and drinking from styrofoam cups. Eventually, when I stopped and asked one such person the quickest route to the auditorium, he simply pointed to a door behind me. Thanking him, I pulled it open and found myself looking down an ill-lit stairwell.

I descended at least five flights. Then I pushed through a pair of heavy swing doors and found myself wandering through some cavernous backstage area. In the gloomy light, I could make out rectangular slabs of painted backdrop - a castle tenement, a moonlit sky, a forest - propped against the wall. Above my head was a criss-cross of steel cables. The orchestra could now be heard quite clearly and I moved towards the music doing my best not to collide into the many box-like objects in my path. Eventually, after wandering up a set of wooden steps, I realised I was standing in the wings. I was about to turn back - I had hoped to emerge discreetly somewhere near the front stalls - but then something about the music now filling my ears, something problematic that had not been there before, caused me to pause.

I stood there listening for a minute or so, and then took a step forward and peered around the edge of the heavy folded drapes before me. I did this of course with considerable caution - naturally I wished to avoid at all costs the crowd's spotting my face and bursting into applause - only to discover I was looking at Brodsky and the orchestra from a sharp angle and was unlikely to be visible at all to the audience.

I could see much had changed while I had been wandering around the building. Brodsky, I supposed, had taken things too far, for that tentativeness of technique that so often signals a disaffinity between a conductor and his musicians had entered the orchestra's sound. The musicians - I was now able to see them at close quarters - were wearing expressions of incredulity, distress, even disgust. Then, as my eyes grew more accustomed to the glare of the stagelights, I gazed past the orchestra to the audience. Only the first few rows were visible to me, but it was clear people were now exchanging worried looks, coughing uneasily, shaking their heads. Even as I watched, one woman stood up to leave. Brodsky, however, continued to conduct in an impassioned manner, and if anything seemed eager to push things still further. Then I saw two of the cellists exchange looks and shake their heads. It was a clear sign of mutiny and Brodsky undoubtedly noticed it. His conducting now took on a manic quality and the music veered dangerously towards the realms of perversity.

Up to this point I had not been able to see Brodsky's expression very well - I had mainly his back view - but as his twisting and turning grew more pronounced, I began to catch fuller glimpses of his face. Only then did it dawn on me that some other factor altogether was influencing Brodsky's behaviour. I watched him carefully again - the way his body was twisting and clenching to some rhythm of its own dictating - and I realised that Brodsky was in great pain and probably had been for some time. Once I had recognised this, the signs were unmistakable. He was only just managing to keep going at all, and his face was distorted with something more than passion.

I felt an onus to do something, and quickly appraised the situation. Brodsky had still to get through one and a half demanding movements plus the intricate epilogue. The favourable impression he had created earlier was being rapidly eroded. The audience was liable to become unruly again at any moment. The more I thought about it, the more obvious it became that the performance had to be brought to a halt, and I began to wonder if I should not now walk out onto the stage to bring this about. Indeed I was probably the only person in the hall who could do so without the audience sensing a major calamity.

For the next few minutes, however, I made no move, preoccupied with the question of how precisely to execute such an intervention. Would I come on waving about my arms to signal a halt? That might not only appear presumptuous, but suggest a certain disapproval on my part - a disastrous impression. A much better course, perhaps, would be to wait for the andante to commence and then to come on very modestly, smiling courteously to Brodsky and the orchestra, timing my walk to the music as though the whole entrance had been planned long in advance. No doubt the audience would break into applause, at which point I could in turn - all the time smiling - applaud first Brodsky and then the musicians. Hopefully then Brodsky would have the presence of mind to 'fade out' the music and take bows. With my presence on the stage, the chances of the crowd giving Brodsky trouble were remote. In fact with my lead - I would continue to applaud and smile as though for all the world Brodsky had delivered something of indisputable beauty - the memories of the earlier part of his performance might return sufficiently to bring the audience back onto his side. Brodsky could take a respectable number of bows, and then, as he turned to leave, I could be seen genially to assist him from the podium, perhaps folding his ironing board and handing it to him to use again as his crutch. I might then guide him towards the wings, frequently glancing back to the audience to encourage further applause and so on. I could just about see the thing being brought off provided I judged everything absolutely correctly.

But just at that moment something else occurred which perhaps had been on the cards for some time. Brodsky swung his baton in a large arc, almost simultaneously punching the air with his other hand. As he did so, he appeared to become unstuck. He ascended a few inches into the air then crashed down across the front of the stage, taking the podium rail, the ironing board, the score, the music stand, all with him.

I expected people to rush to his aid, but the gasp that greeted his fall faded into an embarrassed silence. And then, as Brodsky continued to lie there face down on the floor, not moving, a low hubbub started up again throughout the auditorium. Finally, one of the violinists put aside his instrument and made towards Brodsky. A number of others - stage-hands, musicians - soon followed his lead, but there remained something hesitant about the way they closed in around the prone figure, as though they expected to disapprove thoroughly of what they discovered.

I came to my senses around this point - I had been hesitating, unsure what impact my revealing myself would have - and hurried onto the stage to join Brodsky's helpers. As I approached, the violinist let out a cry and, dropping down onto his knees, began to examine Brodsky with a new urgency. Then he looked up at us and said in a horrified whisper: 'My God, he's lost a leg! It's a wonder he took this long to pass out!'

There were gasps of surprise and the dozen or so of us who had gathered around exchanged looks. For some reason, there was a distinct feeling that news of the missing leg must not be allowed to get out and we drew closer together to keep out the audience's gaze. Those nearest to Brodsky were conferring in low voices about whether to carry him off the stage. Then someone signalled and the curtain began to close. It quickly became clear that Brodsky was lying directly in the line of the curtain, and several arms reached out and half dragged him away from the front of the stage just as the curtain came across.

The movement had the effect of reviving Brodsky a little, and when the violinist turned him onto his back he opened his eyes and looked searchingly from face to face. Then he said, in a voice that sounded more sleepy than anything else:

'Where is she? Why isn't she holding me?'

There were more looks exchanged. Then someone whispered:

'Miss Collins. He must mean Miss Collins.'

No sooner had these words been uttered than there was a gentle cough behind us and we turned to find Miss Collins standing just inside the curtain. She still seemed very composed and was gazing towards us with a look of polite concern. Only the way her hands were clasped in front of her, slightly higher on her chest than might be expected, indicated any turmoil within.

‘Where is she?’ Brodsky asked again in his sleepy voice. Then suddenly he began softly to sing to himself.

The violinist looked up at us. ‘Is he drunk? He certainly smells of drink.’

Brodsky ceased singing, then said again, his eyes now closing: ‘Where is she? Why doesn’t she come?’

This time Miss Collins answered, not loudly, but very clearly from the curtain: ‘I’m here, Leo.’

She had spoken in a tone approaching tenderness, but when a gangway immediately formed for her she did not move. The sight of the figure on the floor, however, finally brought signs of distress to her face. Brodsky, his eyes still closed, began to hum again.

Then he opened his eyes and looked about himself carefully. His gaze went first to the curtain – perhaps in search of the audience – then, finding it closed, examined again the faces staring down at him. Finally he looked towards Miss Collins.

‘Let’s embrace,’ he said. ‘Let’s show the world. The curtain ...’ With some effort, he raised himself a little and called out: ‘Get ready to open the curtain again!’ Then he said softly to Miss Collins: ‘Come and hold me. Embrace me. Then let them open the curtain. We’ll let the world see.’ He slowly lowered himself again until he was lying flat on his back. ‘Come on,’ he murmured.

Miss Collins seemed on the verge of speaking, but then changed her mind. She glanced towards the curtain, a look of fear coming into her eyes.

‘Let them see it,’ Brodsky said. ‘Let them see we were together at the end. That we loved each other all our lives. Let’s show them. When the curtains open, let them see it.’

Miss Collins went on staring at Brodsky, then finally began to walk towards him. People moved away discreetly, some going so far as to turn their gazes in the other direction. She stopped before she had quite reached him and said in a voice that trembled a little:

‘We can hold hands if you like.’

‘No, no. This is the finish. Let’s embrace properly. Let them see.’

Miss Collins hesitated for a second, then went right up to him and knelt down. Her eyes, I could see, had filled with tears.

‘My love,’ Brodsky said softly. ‘Hold me again. My wound’s so painful now.’

Suddenly Miss Collins withdrew the hand she had started to extend and rose to her feet. She stared down coldly at Brodsky, then walked back briskly towards the curtain.

Brodsky seemed not to notice her retreat. He was now staring up at the ceiling, his arms spread open as though he expected Miss Collins to come descending from above.

‘Where are you?’ he said. ‘Let them see it. When they open the curtain. Let them see we were together at the end. Where are you?’

‘I won’t come, Leo. Wherever you’re going now, you’ll have to go by yourself.’

Brodsky must have registered her new tone, for although he continued to gaze up at the ceiling his arms fell to his sides.

‘Your wound,’ Miss Collins said quietly, ‘Always your wound.’ Then her face contorted into ugliness. ‘Oh, how I hate you! How I hate you for wasting my life! I shall never, never forgive you! Your wound, your silly little wound! That’s your real love, Leo, that wound, the one true love of your life! I know how it will be, even if we tried, even if we managed to build something all over again. The music too, that would be no different. Even if they'd accepted you tonight, even if you became celebrated in this town, you'd destroy it all, you'd destroy everything, pull it all down around you just as you did before. And all because of that wound. Me, the music, we're neither of us anything more to you than mistresses you seek consolation from. You'll always go back to your one real love. To that wound! And you know what makes me so angry? Leo, are you listening to me? Your wound, it's nothing special, nothing special at all. In this town alone, I know there are many people with far worse. And yet they carry on, every one of them, with far greater courage than you ever did. They go on with their lives. They become something worthwhile. But you, Leo, look at you. Always tending your wound. Are you listening? Listen to me, I want you to hear every word of it! That wound's all you have now. I tried to give you everything once, but you weren't interested and you shan't have me a second time. How you wasted my life! How I hate you! Can you hear me, Leo? Look at you! What's to become of you now? Well, I'll tell you. You're going somewhere horrible now. Somewhere dark and lonely, and I won't come with you. Go on your own! Go on your own with that silly little wound! '

Brodsky had been waving a hand slowly in the air. Now, as she paused, he said:

'I might be ... I might be a conductor again. The music just now, before I fell. It was good. You heard it? I might be a conductor again...'

'Leo, are you listening to me? You'll never be a proper conductor. You never were, even back then. You'll never be able to serve the people of this city, even if they wanted you to. Because you care nothing for their lives. That's the truth of it. Your music will only ever be about that silly little wound, it will never be anything more than that, it'll never be anything profound, anything of any value to anyone else. At least I, in my small way, I can say I did what I could. That I did my best to help the unhappy people here. But you, look at you. You've only ever cared about that wound. That's why even back then you were never a real musician. And you'll never become one now. Leo, are you listening to me? I want you to hear this. You'll never be anything more than a charlatan. A cowardly, irresponsible fraud ...'

Suddenly a stout man with a red face burst through the curtain.

'Your ironing board, Mr Brodsky!' he announced cheerfully, holding the object up before him. Then, sensing the atmosphere, he shrank back.

Miss Collins stared at the newcomer, then, casting a last glance towards Brodsky, ran out through the gap in the curtain.

Brodsky's face was still turned up to the ceiling but now his eyes had closed again. Pushing myself forward, I knelt down beside him and listened to his heartbeat.

'Our sailors,' he murmured. 'Our sailors. Our drunken sailors. Where are they now? Where are you? Where are you?'

'It's me,' I said. 'Ryder. Mr Brodsky, we must get you some help very quickly.'

'Ryder.' He opened his eyes and gazed up at me. 'Ryder. Maybe it's true. What she says.'

'Don't worry yourself, Mr Brodsky. Your music was magnificent. Particularly the first two movements ...'

'No, no, Ryder. I didn't mean all that. That hardly matters now. I meant the other thing she said. About me going alone. To some dark, lonely place. Maybe that's true.' Suddenly he raised his head off the floor and stared into my eyes. 'I don't want to go, Ryder,' he said in a whisper. 'I don't want to go.'

‘Mr Brodsky, I’ll try and bring her back. As I say, the first two movements in particular displayed enormous innovation. I’m sure she can be reasoned with. Please excuse me, I won’t be a moment.’

Freeing my arm from his grip, I hurried out through the curtain.

I was surprised to find the auditorium quite transformed. The house lights had come back on and to all practical intents there was no longer an audience. As much as two-thirds of the guests had left, and of those remaining most were standing about talking in the aisles. I did not dwell long on this scene, however, having caught sight of Miss Collins making her way up the central aisle towards the exit. Stepping down off the stage, I hurried after her through the crowds and came within calling distance just as she was reaching the exit.

‘Miss Collins! Just a moment, please!’

She turned and, spotting me, fixed me with a hard stare. Somewhat taken aback, I stopped in my tracks half-way up the aisle. Suddenly I could feel draining away all my resolve to catch up and speak with her, and for some reason found myself looking down awkwardly at my feet. When eventually I raised my head again, I saw that she had gone.

I went on standing there a little while longer, wondering if I had been foolish to let her go so easily. But then gradually I found my attention being drawn by the various conversations taking place around me. In particular there was a group standing to my right - six or seven quite elderly people - and I could hear one of the men saying:

‘According to Mrs Schuster, the fellow hasn’t been sober for one day during this whole business. Now how can we be asked to respect a man like that, however talented? What sort of example is he for our children? No, no, it’s all been allowed to go too far.’

‘At the Countess’s dinner,’ a woman said, ‘almost certainly he was drunk then. It was only by very clever work they managed to hide it. '

'Excuse me,' I said breaking in, 'but you know nothing of this matter. I can assure you you're quite badly informed. '

I fully expected my presence alone to stun them into silence. But they glanced at me pleasantly - as though I had merely asked if they minded my joining them - then returned to their conversation.

'No one wants to start praising Christoff again,' the first man said. 'But that rendition just now. As you say, it did border on the tasteless. '

'It bordered on the immoral. That's it. It bordered on the immoral. '

'Excuse me,' I said, interrupting this time more forcefully. 'But I happened to listen very carefully to what Mr Brodsky managed to do before his collapse and my own assessment differs from yours. In my view, he achieved something challenging, fresh, indeed something very close to the inner heart of the piece. '

I gave them all a frosty stare. They looked at me pleasantly again, some of them laughing politely as if I had made a joke. Then the first man said:

'No one's defending Christoff. We've all seen through him now. But when you listen to something like that just now, it does put things in perspective for you. '

'Apparently,' another man said, 'Brodsky believes Max Sattler had it right. Yes. He's actually been going round saying it for much of the day. No doubt he was talking in a drunken stupor, but since the man's always drunk that's as close as we'll get to his thoughts. Max Sattler. That explains a lot about what we just heard. '

'Christoff at least had a sense of structure. Some system you could get hold of. '

‘Gentlemen,’ I shouted at them, ‘you disgust me!’

They did not even turn to look at me and I moved away from them angrily.

As I made my way back down the aisle, everyone around me seemed to be discussing what they had just witnessed. I noticed many were talking out of the sheer need to talk out an experience, in the way they might have done after a fire or an accident. As I reached the front of the auditorium, I saw two women crying and a third comforting them, saying: ‘It’s all right, it’s all finished now. All finished now.’ An aroma of coffee was pervading this section of the hall and a number of people were clutching cups and saucers, drinking as though to steady themselves.

Just then it occurred to me I should return to the upper level to see how Gustav was getting on, and, pushing my way through the throng, I left the auditorium via an emergency exit.

I found myself in a hushed, empty corridor. Like the one upstairs, it curved gradually, but this corridor was clearly intended to be used by guests. The carpeting was generous, the lights subdued and warm. Along the wall were paintings framed in gold leaf. I had not expected the corridor to be so deserted and for a moment stood hesitating about which way to go. Then, when I started to walk, I heard a voice call behind me:

‘Mr Ryder!’

I turned to see Hoffman further down the corridor waving his arm. He called me again, but for some reason remained glued to his spot, so that in the end I was obliged to retrace my steps.

‘Mr Hoffman,’ I said as I came towards him. ‘It’s most unfortunate what has happened.’

‘A disaster. An unmitigated disaster.’

‘It’s really most unfortunate. But Mr Hoffman, you mustn’t get too down-hearted. You’ve done all you could to make the evening a success. And if I may point out, I have yet to make my appearance. I assure you I’ll do whatever is in my power to bring the evening back under control. In fact, sir, I was wondering if we might not do away with the question-and-answer session in its original format. My suggestion would be that I simply give a speech, something apt, taking into account what has occurred. I might for instance say a few words suggesting we keep in our hearts the meaning of the extraordinary performance Mr Brodsky was in the midst of giving before he was taken ill, and that we should endeavour to be true to the spirit of that performance, something of that sort. Naturally I will keep the whole thing short. I might then perhaps dedicate my own recital to Mr Brodsky or else to his memory, depending on his condition by that point ...’

‘Mr Ryder,’ Hoffman said gravely, and it occurred to me he had not been listening. He was very preoccupied and appeared to have been watching me simply for an opportunity to break in. ‘Mr Ryder, there’s a matter I wanted to bring up with you. A small matter.’

‘Oh, what is that, Mr Hoffman?’

‘A small matter, at least to you. For me, for my wife, a matter of some importance.’ Suddenly his face contorted with fury and he flung back his arm. I thought he was about to strike me, but then realised he was pointing to a spot behind him further down the corridor. In the subdued light I saw the silhouette of a woman, her back to us, leaning into an alcove. The recess was mirrored and her head was virtually touching the glass, so that her reflection slanted away from her. As I gazed towards this figure, Hoffman, perhaps thinking his first gesture had not got through to me, flung his arm back a second time. Then he said:

‘I refer, sir, to my wife’s albums.’

‘Your wife’s albums. Ah yes. Yes, she very kindly ... But surely, Mr Hoffman, now is hardly the time ...’

‘Mr Ryder, you will recall you promised you would look at them. And we agreed, out of consideration for you, sir, so that you would not be inconvenienced at an unsuitable time, we agreed - do you not recall, sir? - we agreed on a signal. A signal you would give me when you felt ready to inspect the albums. You recall it, sir?’

‘Of course, Mr Hoffman. And I had every intention ...’

‘I have watched you very keenly, Mr Ryder. Whenever I caught a glimpse of you strolling around the hotel, walking across the foyer, taking your coffee, I would think to myself: “Ah, he appears to have a moment. Perhaps now is the time.” And I waited for the signal, I watched you very carefully, but did it ever come? Pugh! And now here we are, your visit here all but over, just a few hours to go to your flight and your next engagement in Helsinki! There were times, sir, when I thought I had perhaps missed it, that I had turned away for a second and, turning back, mistaken the finishing moments of your signal for some other gesture. If of course this is the case, that you have given the signal on a number of occasions and it is I who have been too obtuse to receive it, then naturally I will apologise without reservation, without shame, without dignity, I will grovel to you. But it is my contention, sir, that you have given no such signal. In other words, sir, that you have treated ... treated’ - he glanced back towards the figure down the corridor and lowered his voice - ‘you have treated my wife with contempt. Look, here they are!’

Only then did I notice the two large volumes he was carrying in his arms. He held them up to me.

‘Here you are, sir. The fruits of my wife’s devotion to your marvellous career. How she admires you. You can see it. Look at these pages!’ He struggled to open one of the albums while holding the other under his arm. ‘Look, sir. Even small little cuttings from obscure magazines. Things said about you in passing. You see, sir, how devoted she is to you. Look here, sir! And here and here! And you cannot find the time even to glance over these albums. What am I to say to her now?' He gestured again towards the figure down the corridor.

'I'm sorry,' I began. 'I'm terribly sorry. But you see, my time here just seemed to get very confused. I had every intention ...' I then saw that, with all the mounting chaos of the evening, I at least had to keep a cool head. I paused, then said with some command: 'Mr Hoffman, perhaps your wife will find it easier to accept my sincere apologies if she hears them from my own lips. I had the great pleasure of meeting her earlier this evening. Perhaps if you would now lead me to her, we shall be able to sort this matter out quickly. Then of course I really should go on stage, say a few words about Mr Brodsky then give my recital. My parents in particular will be getting impatient.'

Hoffman looked slightly bewildered by these words. Then, trying to re-kindle his earlier anger, he said: 'Look at these pages, sir! Look at them!' But the fire had now died, and he looked at me a little sheepishly. 'Then let us go,' he said in a low voice which had a shocking defeat about it. 'Let us go.'

But he did not move for another moment and I had the impression he was turning over in his head some distant memories. Then with resolve he began to walk towards his wife and I followed a few paces behind.

Mrs Hoffman turned as we approached. I stopped a little way away, but she looked straight past her husband and said to me:

'It's very nice to see you again, Mr Ryder. Unfortunately the evening seems not to be unfolding quite as we all had hoped.'

‘Regrettably,’ I said, ‘it would seem not.’ Then taking a step forward, I added: ‘Furthermore, madam, with one thing and another, I appear to have neglected a number of things I was very much looking forward to doing.’

I expected her to respond to this hint, but she merely gazed at me with interest and waited for me to go on. Then Hoffman cleared his throat and said:

‘My dear. I ... I knew of your wish.’

With a meek smile, he held up the albums, one in each hand.

Mrs Hoffman stared at him in horror. ‘Give me those albums,’ she said sternly. ‘You had no right! Give them to me.’

‘My dear ...’ Hoffman gave a little giggle and his gaze dropped to his feet.

Mrs Hoffman continued to hold out her hand, a furious expression on her face. The hotel manager handed her one album and then the other. His wife gave each a quick glance to verify their identities, and then seemed to become overwhelmed with embarrassment.

‘My dear,’ Hoffman mumbled, ‘I merely thought it would do no harm ...’ Again he trailed off and laughed.

Mrs Hoffman stared coldly at him. Then, turning to me, she said: ‘I’m very sorry, Mr Ryder, my husband felt the need to trouble you with such trivial things. Good evening to you.’

She tucked the albums under her arm and began to walk away. She had gone no more than a few paces, however, when Hoffman suddenly exclaimed:

‘Trivial? No, no! But they are not trivial! And neither is the album on Kosminsky. Nor the album on Stefan Hallier.

Not trivial! If only they were. If only I could believe they were! ’

His wife stopped but did not turn, and Hoffman and I stared at her back view as she stood there quite still in the low light of the corridor. Then Hoffman took a few steps towards her.

‘The evening. It’s a shambles. Why pretend it’s anything else? Why continue to tolerate me? Year after year, blunder after blunder. After the Youth Festival, your patience with me was surely at its end. But no, you put up with me further. Then Exhibition Week. Still you put up with me. Still you give me another chance. Very well, I begged you, I know. Implored you for one further chance. And you didn’t have the heart to refuse me. In a word, you gave me tonight. And what have I to show for it? The evening is a shambles. Our son, our only son, making a laughing stock of himself before the most distinguished citizens of this town. That was my fault, yes, I know it. I encouraged him. Even at the last moment I knew I should have stopped him, but I didn’t have the strength. I let him go through with it right to the end. Believe me, my dear, I never intended it. From the beginning I said to myself, I’ll tell him tomorrow, we’ll have a proper talk about it tomorrow when there’ll be more time. Tomorrow, tomorrow, I kept putting it off. Yes, I was weak, I admit it. Even tonight, I was saying, just a few more minutes and I’ll tell him, but no, no, I couldn’t and he went on. Yes, our Stephan, he went up there in front of the whole world and played the piano! A laughing stock! Ah, but if only that were the half of it! Everyone, the whole city, knows who is responsible for tonight’s proceedings. And the whole city knows who took on the responsibility for Mr Brodsky’s recovery. Very well, very well, I don’t deny it, I failed, I couldn’t bring him round. The man’s a drunk, I should have seen how useless it was from the start. The evening is collapsing all around us while we speak. Even Mr Ryder here, even he can’t save it now. He only adds to our embarrassment.

The finest pianist in the world, I bring him here to what? To take part in this disgrace? Why was I ever allowed to put my clumsy hands anywhere near such divine things as music, art, culture? You, from a talented family, you could have married anyone. What a mistake you made. A tragedy. But it's not too late for you. You are still beautiful. Why wait any longer? What further proof do you need? Leave me. Leave me. Find someone worthy of you. A Kosminsky, a Hallier, a Ryder, a Leonhardt. How did you ever come to make such a mistake? Leave me, I beg you, leave me. Do you see how hateful it is to be your prison warden? No, worse, the very ball and chain on your ankle? Leave me, leave me' - suddenly Hoffman stooped forward and bringing his fist up to his forehead, performed the movement I had watched him rehearsing earlier in the evening. 'My love, my love, leave me. My position is now impossible. After tonight, my pretence, at last, it's over. They'll all know it, down to the smallest child in the town. From tonight, whenever they see me scuttling about my business, they'll know I have nothing. No talent, no sensitivity, no finesse. Leave me, leave me. I'm nothing but an ox, an ox, an ox!'

He performed his action again, his elbow jutting out oddly as he thumped his forehead. Then he sank down onto his knees and began to sob.

'A shambles,' he was mumbling through his sobs. 'Everything a shambles.'

Mrs Hoffman had by now turned and was watching her husband carefully. She did not seem at all astonished by the outburst, and a look of tenderness, almost of longing, had come into her eyes. She took a hesitant step, then another, towards Hoffman's bent-over form. Then slowly she reached out a hand as though to touch gently the top of his head. The hand hovered over Hoffman for a second without making contact and then she withdrew it. The next moment, she had turned on her heel and disappeared down the corridor.

Hoffman went on sobbing, evidently oblivious of any of his wife's movements. I watched him for a while, not quite sure what to do next. Then suddenly I realised I must now be well due on stage. And I remembered in a flood of emotion how I had so far been unable to find a single sign of my parents' presence anywhere in the building. My feelings towards Hoffman, which until this point had been close to pity, suddenly turned and, advancing on him, I shouted into his ear:

'Mr Hoffman, it may well be that you have made a shambles of your evening. But I will not be dragged down with you. I intend to go out there and perform. I shall do my best to bring back some order to these proceedings. But first of all, Mr Hoffman, I demand to know once and for all. What has become of my parents?'

Hoffman looked up and seemed slightly surprised to find his wife gone. Then, regarding me with some irritation, he got to his feet.

'What is it you are wanting, sir?' he asked wearily.

'My parents, Mr Hoffman. Where are they? You assured me they would be well looked after. And yet earlier, when I looked, they were not in the audience. I am now about to go on the stage and I wish my parents to be comfortably installed. So now, sir, I must ask you to answer me. Where are they?'

'Your parents, sir.' Hoffman took a deep breath and ran his hand tiredly through his hair. 'You must ask Miss Stratmann. She's in direct charge of their welfare. I merely supervised the larger structure of events. And since, as you see, I have been an utter failure in that respect, you can hardly expect me to be able to answer your question ...'

'Yes, yes, yes,' I said, growing impatient. 'So where is Miss Stratmann?'

Hoffman sighed and pointed over my shoulder. Turning, I saw there was a door behind me.

‘She’s in there?’ I asked sternly.

Hoffman nodded, then, staggering over to the mirrored alcove where his wife had been standing, gazed at his reflection.

I gave the door a sharp knock. When there was no reply, I glanced accusingly over at Hoffman. He was now bowed over the ledge of the alcove. I was about to vent more of my anger on him when I heard a voice from within calling me to come in. I took a last look at Hoffman’s hunched-over form, then opened the door.

The large modern office I found myself in was quite unlike anything else I had so far encountered within the building. It was a sort of annexe, seemingly constructed entirely out of glass. There were no lights on in the room and I saw that the dawn had finally come. Soft patches of early sunlight were drifting over the tottering piles of paper, the filing cabinets, the directories and folders strewn about on the desks. The office contained three desks in all, but at this moment Miss Stratmann was the only person present.

She appeared to be busy and it struck me as odd she should have switched off the lights, for the pale glow in the room was hardly sufficient to read or write by. I could only suppose she had switched them off just momentarily to enjoy the view of the sun coming up behind the trees in the far distance. Indeed, as I came in, she was sitting at her desk, a telephone receiver in her hand, gazing out emptily through the huge glass panes.

‘Good morning, Mr Ryder,’ she said, turning to me. ‘I’ll be with you in just a moment.’ Then she said into the receiver: ‘Yes, in about five minutes. The sausages too. They should start frying in the next few minutes. And the fruit. That ought to be ready by now.’

‘Miss Stratmann,’ I said, advancing towards her desk, ‘there are matters more pressing than when the sausages should be fried.’

She glanced up at me quickly and said once more: ‘I’ll be with you in a moment, Mr Ryder.’ Then she spoke into the receiver again and began to write something down.

‘Miss Stratmann,’ I said, hardening my voice, ‘I have to ask you to come off that telephone and listen to what I have to say. '

'Hold on,' Miss Stratmann said into the phone. 'I've got someone here I'd better deal with. I won't be a minute.' Then she put down the receiver and glared at me. 'What is it, Mr Ryder?'

'Miss Stratmann,' I said, 'when we first met, you assured me you would keep me fully informed on all aspects of my visit here. That you would advise me fully about my schedule and the nature of my various commitments. I believed you to be someone I could depend on. I'm sorry to say you've fallen considerably short of expectations.'

'Mr Ryder, I don't know to what I owe this tirade. Is there something in particular you're unhappy with?'

'I am unhappy with everything, Miss Stratmann. I have not had important information when I've needed it. I have not been told of last-minute changes to my schedule. I haven't been supported or assisted at crucial points. As a result, I have not been able to prepare myself for my tasks in the way I would have liked. Nevertheless, for all that, I intend shortly to go on stage where I'll endeavour to salvage something from what is turning out to be a disastrous evening for you all. But before I do so, I have one simple thing to ask you. Where are my parents? They arrived some time ago by horse and carriage. But when I looked for them earlier in the auditorium, I could not see them. They had not been seated in any of the boxes nor in any of the VIP seats at the front. So I ask you again, Miss Stratmann, where are they? Why have they not been looked after in the careful way you promised?'

Miss Stratmann studied me carefully in the dawn light, then gave a sigh.

'Mr Ryder, I've been meaning to speak to you about this for some time. We were all of us very pleased when you informed us some months ago of your parents' intention to visit our city. Everyone was truly delighted. But I must remind you, Mr Ryder, it was from you and you alone that we heard of their plans to visit us. Now for the past three days, and today in particular, I have been doing all I can to ascertain their whereabouts. I have repeatedly telephoned the airport, the railway station, the bus companies, every hotel in this city, and I have found no sign of them. No one has heard from them, no one has seen them. Now, Mr Ryder, I have to ask you. Are you certain they are coming to this town?'

As she had been talking, a number of doubts had passed through my mind and suddenly I felt something inside me beginning to collapse. To conceal my discomfort, I turned away and looked out at the dawn.

'Well,' I said eventually, 'I was very sure they would come this time.'

'You were very sure.' Miss Stratmann, whose professional pride I had obviously ruffled quite badly, was now fixing me with an accusing stare. 'Do you realise, Mr Ryder, the great trouble everyone here has gone to in anticipation of your parents' arrival? The medical arrangements, the hospitality, the horse and carriage? One group of local ladies has spent many weeks putting together a programme to entertain your parents during their stay. You were very sure they were coming, you say.'

'Naturally,' I said with a laugh, 'I would never have put people to such trouble had I been anything less than convinced. But the fact was' - another laugh escaped me -

'the fact was, I was sure that this time, at last, they would come. Surely, it wasn't unreasonable of me to assume they would come this time? After all, I'm at the height of my powers now. How much longer am I supposed to go on travelling like this? Of course, I'm sorry if I've put anyone to unnecessary inconvenience, but surely it won't come to that. They must be here somewhere. Besides, I heard them. When I stopped the car in the woods, I could hear them coming, their horse and carriage. I heard them, they must be here, surely, it's not unreasonable ...'

I collapsed into a nearby chair and realised I had started to sob. As I did so, I remembered all at once just how tenuous had been the whole possibility of my parents' coming to the town. I could not understand at all how I had ever been so confident about the matter to the extent of demanding an explanation from Hoffman and then Miss Stratmann in the manner I had just been doing. I continued to sob for several more moments, then became aware that Miss Stratmann was standing over me.

'Mr Ryder, Mr Ryder,' she was repeating gently. Then, as I brought my tears under control, she said in a kindly tone: 'Mr Ryder. Perhaps no one here has mentioned this to you yet. But there was a time once, quite some years ago now, when your parents did come to this city.'

I stopped sobbing and looked up at her. She gave me a smile, then walked away slowly towards the glass and gazed out again at the dawn.

'They must have been taking a holiday together,' she said, her eyes still on the distance. 'They came by train and stayed two or three days looking about the city. As I say, it was some time ago and you weren't quite as eminent as you are today. But all the same, you were hardly unknown and someone, the people at their hotel perhaps, asked if they were related to you. You know, because of the name and their being English. That's how it got out, that this nice, elderly English couple were your parents. There may not have been quite the fuss there'd be today, but they were looked after very well indeed. And then over the years, as your fame spread, people remembered about it, about the time your parents came here. I don't personally have many memories of their visit because I was so small then. Though I can remember people talking about it.'

I looked carefully at her back. 'Miss Stratmann, you're not telling me all this just to comfort me, are you?'

'No, no, it's all true. Anyone will confirm what I'm saying. As I say, I was just a child then, but a lot of people here would be able to tell you all about it. Besides, it's all been pretty well documented.'

'But did they seem happy? Were they laughing together and enjoying their holiday?'

'I'm sure they were, Mr Ryder. By all accounts, they enjoyed themselves very much here. In fact everyone remembers them as a very pleasant couple. Very kind and considerate to one another.'

'But ... but what I'm asking, Miss Stratmann, is were they well looked after? That's what I'm asking you...'

'Of course they were well looked after. And they enjoyed themselves. They were very happy the whole time they were here.'

'How can you remember that? You said yourself you were no more than a child at the time.'

'What I'm reporting is how everyone here remembers it.'

'If any of this you're saying is true, how is it no one has raised the matter with me the whole time I've been here?'

Miss Stratmann hesitated a second and turned again to the trees and the sunrise. 'I don't know,' she said softly, shaking her head. 'I don't know why that should be. But you're right. People don't talk about it as much as you'd think they would. But there's no mistake, I can assure you. I remember it all distinctly from my childhood.'

From outside came the sounds of birds beginning their chorus. Miss Stratmann went on gazing at the trees in the distance, other memories from her childhood perhaps drifting through her mind. I watched her for a while, then said:

‘You say they were treated well here.’

‘Oh yes,’ Miss Stratmann said almost in a whisper, her eyes still far away. ‘I’m sure they were very well treated. It would have been the spring, and the spring is so lovely here. And the Old Town, you’ve seen for yourself how charming it is. People would have pointed things out to them, just ordinary people who happened to be passing. The buildings of special interest, the crafts museum, the bridges. And if they stopped for a coffee and a snack anywhere and weren’t quite sure what to order, perhaps because of the language problem, the waiter or waitress would have been very helpful. Oh yes, they would have enjoyed themselves here.’

‘But you said they came by rail. Did anyone help them with their luggage?’

‘Oh, the railway porters would have immediately gone about helping them. Taken all the luggage out to the taxi, then the taxi driver would have seen to it after that. They’d have been driven to their hotel and that would have been that. I’m sure they didn’t have to even think about their luggage.’

‘Hotel? Which hotel was this?’

‘A very comfortable hotel, Mr Ryder. One of the best there was in those days. They were sure to have loved it there. Loved every minute of it.’

‘It wasn’t too near the main roads, I hope. My mother always hated traffic noise.’

‘In those days, of course, the traffic wasn’t nearly the problem it is now. I remember when I was a child, I used to play with my friends in some of the residential streets with a skipping rope or a ball. No question of children doing that today! Oh yes, we used to play like that, sometimes for hours. But to return to your question, Mr Ryder' - Miss Stratmann turned to me with a wistful smile - 'the hotel your parents stayed in was nowhere near traffic. It was an idyllic hotel. It doesn't exist any more, but if you like I can show you a picture of it. Would you like to see it? The hotel you parents stayed in?'

'I would very much, Miss Stratmann.'

She smiled again and came back across the room towards her desk. I thought she was about to open a drawer, but at the last moment she changed course and went to the rear wall of the office. Reaching up a hand, she tugged at a cord and began pulling down something that looked like a wall chart. I then saw it was not a chart as such, but a gigantic colour photograph. She continued to pull it down almost to the floor, where the roller gave a click and held fast. Then, moving back to her desk, she switched on her reading lamp and turned the beam towards the picture.

For the next few moments we both studied the picture before us in silence. The hotel looked like a smaller version of the sort of fairy-tale castle built by mad kings in the last century. It stood right on the edge of a plunging valley covered with ferns and spring flowers. The photograph had been taken on a sunny day from the opposite side of the valley, providing the kind of comfortable composition suitable for a postcard or calendar.

'I believe your parents stayed in this room here,' I heard Miss Stratmann say. She had produced from somewhere a pointer and was indicating a window in one of the hotel's turrets. 'A nice view they would have had, you see?'

'Yes, indeed.'

Miss Stratmann lowered her pointer, but I continued to stare at the window, trying to imagine the view it would have presented. My mother in particular would have much appreciated such a view. Even if she had had one of her bad days, and had had to spend her whole time in bed, she would still have been greatly comforted by it. She would have watched the breeze blowing through the pit of the valley, disturbing the ferns and the foliage on the twisted trees climbing the valley slope on the far side. She would have liked too the wide expanse of sky visible to her. I then noticed in the very foreground of the picture - cutting across the bottom right-hand corner - a section of the hill road from which presumably the photographer had taken the shot. My mother, almost certainly, would have had a view of this road from her room. She would then have been able to watch the local life going by in the distance. The odd car or grocery van would have passed, perhaps even a horse-drawn cart; now and then a farm tractor or some children hiking. Such sights were bound to have cheered her greatly.

Eventually, as I went on looking at the window, I began to weep again. Not as uncontrollably as before, but the tears filled my eyes very steadily and ran down my face. Miss Stratmann noticed my tears, but this time appeared to feel no need to stop them. She smiled gently at me, then turned back to the picture.

Suddenly I was startled by a knock at the door. Miss Stratmann too gave a start. Then she said: 'Excuse me, Mr Ryder,' and walked over to the door.

I turned in my seat as a man in a white uniform came in, pulling after him a catering trolley. He brought the trolley half-way over the threshold so that it was propping open the door and looked out at the dawn.

'It's going to be a fine day,' he said, smiling at us in turn. 'Here's your breakfast, miss. Would you like it on the desk there?'

'Breakfast?' Miss Stratmann looked confused. 'It's not supposed to be served for another half an hour yet.'

‘Mr von Winterstein ordered breakfast to commence now, miss. And in my view, he’s right. The people are in need of breakfast at this point.’

‘Oh.’ Miss Stratmann continued to look confused and glanced back at me as though for guidance. Then she asked the man: ‘Is everything out there ... all right?’

‘Everything’s fine now, miss. Of course, after Mr Brodsky passed out like that, there was a bit of a panic, but now everyone’s very happy and enjoying themselves. You see, Mr von Winterstein gave a fine speech in the foyer just now all about the splendid heritage of this city, all the things we’ve got to be proud of. He mentioned a lot of our achievements down the years, pointed out all the awful problems other cities are blighted with we here never have to worry about. It’s what we needed, miss. I’m sorry you weren’t there to hear it. It made us all feel good about ourselves and our city and now everyone’s enjoying themselves. Look, there’s some of them now.’ He pointed out through the glass, and sure enough, in the faint light outside, several figures could be made out walking slowly across the grass holding their plates carefully in front of them, looking around for somewhere to sit down.

‘Excuse me,’ I said, getting to my feet. ‘I must go and perform. I’m going to be late. Miss Stratmann, I’m very grateful. For your kindness, for everything. But please excuse me now.’

Without waiting for a reply, I pushed my way past the breakfast trolley out into the corridor.

A pale morning light was now permeating the gloom of the corridor. I glanced towards the mirrored alcove where I had left Hoffman, but he had gone. I hurried on in the direction of the auditorium, past the paintings in their golden frames. At one point I encountered another waiter with a breakfast trolley stooping down to knock on a door, but otherwise the corridor was deserted.

I continued to walk quickly, looking about for the emergency door that had originally brought me into this corridor. I had now become seized by a quite overwhelming urge to get my performance under way. Whatever disappointments I had just suffered did not, I realised, reduce at all my responsibility to all those who had waited many weeks for the moment I sat before them in front of a piano. In other words, it was my duty to perform on this evening at least to my usual standards. To do anything less - I suddenly sensed this strongly - would be to open some strange door through which I would hurtle into a dark, unknown space.

After a time the corridor began to grow unfamiliar. The wallpaper became a deep blue, signed photographs replaced the paintings, and I realised I had missed my door. I saw, however, that I was approaching another altogether more substantial door marked 'Stage' and decided to go through.

For a few seconds I groped through darkness, then found myself once more in the wings. I could see the piano in the middle of the empty stage, dimly lit from above by just one or two lights. I saw too that the curtains were still closed and stepped quietly out onto the stage.

I peered down at the spot where Brodsky had earlier been lying, but could not see even a mark. I then glanced back to the piano, unsure how to proceed. If I sat down at the stool and began simply to play, it was possible the technicians would have the sense to draw back the curtains and to turn up the spotlights. There was always the chance, however - one could not tell what had been going on - that the technicians had all abandoned their posts and the curtains would not even open. Moreover, when I had last seen the audience, people had been standing about talking restlessly. The best course, I decided, would be to step out through the curtains and make an announcement, giving everyone - the audience, the technicians - the chance to prepare themselves. I quickly rehearsed a few lines in my head, then, without further ado, went up to the gap in the drapes and drew back the heavy material.

I had been ready to find the auditorium in some disorder, but the sight that greeted me quite took me aback. Not only was the audience absent in its entirety, all the seating had vanished as well. The idea came to me that the hall perhaps had some sort of device whereby at the tug of a lever all the seats disappeared into the floor - thus enabling the auditorium to double as a dance floor or whatever - but then I remembered the age of the building and decided this was highly unlikely. I could only suppose the seats had been of the stacking kind and had now all been cleared away as a fire precaution. In any case, before me now was a vast, dark, empty space. There were no lights on at all, but instead, here and there, large rectangular sections of the ceiling had been removed, allowing the daylight to come down in pale shafts onto the floor.

Peering into the murky light, I thought I could make out a few figures towards the very back of the hall. They seemed to be standing around in conference - these were perhaps the stagehands completing their tidying up - and then I heard the echo of footsteps as one of them strode off somewhere.

I stood there on the edge of the stage wondering what to do next. I had, I supposed, spent much longer in Miss Stratmann's office than I had thought - possibly as long as an hour - and clearly the audience had given up hope of my ever appearing. Nevertheless, if an announcement were to be made, the guests could be gathered back into the auditorium in a matter of minutes, and even with the seating gone I could see no reason why a perfectly satisfactory recital could not then take place. It was unclear, though, where the people had all got to and I realised I would first have to find Hoffman, or whoever had now taken charge, to discuss the next step.

I climbed down off the stage and set off across the hall. I had not got half-way across before I began to feel disorientated in the darkness and, changing course a little, made towards the nearest shaft of light. Just as I did so, a figure brushed in front of me.

'Oh, excuse me,' the person said. 'I beg your pardon.'

I recognised Stephan's voice and said: 'Hello. So you at least are still here.'

'Oh, Mr Ryder. I'm sorry, I didn't see you.' He sounded tired and dejected.

'You really ought to be feeling more cheerful,' I said to him. 'You gave a splendid performance. The audience was extremely moved.'

'Yes. Yes, I suppose they did give me a good reception.'

'Well, congratulations. After all that hard work, it must be very satisfying for you.'

'Yes, I suppose so.'

We started to walk side by side through the darkness. If anything, the daylight from the ceiling made it all the more difficult to see where one was going, but Stephan appeared to know his way.

‘You know, Mr Ryder,’ he said after a moment, ‘I’m jolly grateful to you. You’ve been marvellously encouraging. But the truth is, I didn’t come up to scratch tonight. Not by my own standards anyway. Of course, the audience gave me a big hand, but that’s because they weren’t expecting anything so special. But really, I know myself I’ve got a long way to go. My parents are right.’

‘Your parents? Good gracious, you shouldn’t worry about them.’

‘No, no, Mr Ryder, you don’t understand. My parents, you see, they have the highest standards. These people who are here tonight, they were very kind but really, they don’t know so much about these things. They saw a local boy playing at a certain level and got very excited. But I want to be measured by real standards. And I know my parents do too. Mr Ryder, I’ve come to a decision. I’m going off. I need to go somewhere bigger, study under someone like Lubetkin or Peruzzi. I realise now I can never reach the levels I want to here, not in this city. Look at the way they clapped what was after all a pretty ordinary performance of Glass Passions. That just about summed it up. I didn’t really see it before, but I suppose you could call me a big fish in a small pond. I ought to go away for a bit. See what I can really do.’

We continued to walk, our footsteps resounding through the auditorium. Then I said:

‘That may well be wise. In fact, I’m sure you’re right. A move to a bigger city, bigger challenges, I’m sure it will do you good. But you must be careful who you study with. If you like, I’ll give the matter some thought and see if I can arrange something.’

‘Mr Ryder, if you’d do that, I’d be eternally grateful. Yes, I need to see how far I can go. Then one day I’ll come back here and show them. Show them how you really play Glass Passions.' He gave a laugh, but still sounded far from cheerful.

'You're a talented young man. You've got everything ahead of you. You really ought to be in better spirits.'

'I suppose so. I suppose I'm just a bit daunted. I didn't realise until tonight just what a huge climb I've still got in front of me. You'll think this is very funny, but do you know, I thought I'd have it all wrapped up tonight. It shows what it does to you, living in a place like this. You start thinking small. Yes, I thought I'd do everything there was to do tonight! You see how ridiculous my thinking has been until now. My parents are quite right. I've a great deal left to learn.'

'Your parents? Listen, my advice is to forget about your parents altogether for now. If I may say so, I really don't understand how they can ...'

'Ah, here we are. It's this way.' We had arrived at some sort of doorway and Stephan was tugging at a curtain hung across it. 'It's through here.'

'Sorry, what's through here?'

'The conservatory. Oh, perhaps you haven't heard of the conservatory. It's very famous. It was built a hundred years after the hall itself, but now it's almost as famous. That's where everyone's gone to eat breakfast.'

We found ourselves in a corridor, all down one side of which was a long row of windows. I could see through the nearer of them the light blue morning sky.

'Incidentally,' I said as we began to walk again, 'I was wondering about Mr Brodsky. About his condition. Is he ... deceased?'

'Mr Brodsky? Oh no, he's going to be fine, I'm sure. They took him off somewhere. Actually, I heard they took him to the St Nicholas Clinic. '

'The St Nicholas Clinic?'

'It's the place that takes in down-and-outs. In the conservatory just now, people were talking about it, saying, well, that's where he belongs, that's where they know how to deal with problems like his. I was a bit shocked, to tell you the truth. In fact - I'll tell you this, Mr Ryder, in confidence - all of that helped me make up my mind. About going away, I mean. That performance Mr Brodsky gave tonight, in my opinion it was the finest thing that's been heard in this concert hall for many many years. Certainly for as long as I've been able to appreciate music. But you saw what happened. They didn't want it, it startled them. It was much more than they'd ever bargained for. They're very relieved he collapsed like that. They realise now they want something else. Something a little less extreme. '

'Something not so different from Mr Christoff perhaps. '

Stephan thought about this. 'A little different. A new name, at least. They realise now Mr Christoff isn't quite the thing. They do want something better. But ... but not that. '

Through the windows I could now see the wide expanse of lawn outside and the sun rising over the row of trees in the distance.

'What do you suppose will become of Mr Brodsky now?' I asked.

'Mr Brodsky? Oh, he'll just go back to being what he's always been here. See out his days as the town drunk, I suppose. They certainly won't let him be much else, not after tonight. As I say, they took him to the St Nicholas Clinic. I've grown up here, Mr Ryder, and in many ways I still love this town. But I'm eager to be leaving now. '

'Perhaps I should try and say something. I mean, address the crowd in the conservatory. Say a few words about Mr

Brodsky. Put them right about him. '

Stephan considered this for a few steps, then shook his head.

'It's not worth it, Mr Ryder. '

'But I must say, I don't like this any more than you do. You never know. A few words from me ... '

'I don't think so, Mr Ryder. They won't listen even to you now. Not after that performance from Mr Brodsky. That reminded them of everything they're afraid of. Besides, there's no microphone or anything in the conservatory, not even a platform you can stand up and speak from. You'd never get yourself heard over all the noise. You see, it's pretty big, almost as big as the auditorium itself. From corner to corner, it must be ... well, even if you kept to a dead straight diagonal, knocking aside any tables and guests seated in your way, you'd still measure out fifty metres at least. It's a jolly big place, as you'll see. If I were you, Mr Ryder, I'd just relax now and enjoy your breakfast. After all, you've got Helsinki to be thinking about. '

The conservatory, right enough, was a vast affair, which at this moment was bathed in morning sunlight. Everywhere people were talking cheerfully, some seated around tables, others standing in little groups. I could see people drinking coffee and fruit juice, others eating from plates or bowls, and as we made our way through the crowd I caught in turn the aromas of fresh rolls, fish cakes, bacon. I could see waiters rushing about with plates and jugs of coffee. All around me voices were greeting one another in delight, and it struck me the whole atmosphere resembled that of a reunion. And yet these were people who saw each other constantly. Clearly the evening's events had made them reassess themselves and their community in some profound way, and the resulting mood, for whatever reason, appeared to be one of mutual celebration.

I could see now that Stephan was right. There was little point in my attempting to address this crowd, let alone in asking them to return to the auditorium for my recital. Feeling suddenly tired and extremely hungry, I decided to sit down and have some breakfast myself. When I looked about, however, I could see no free chairs anywhere. Moreover, I turned to find that Stephan was no longer walking beside me, but had been drawn into conversation by a group at a table we had just passed. I watched him being greeted warmly, half expecting him to introduce me. But he seemed to become engrossed in the conversation, and very soon he too had adopted a cheerful demeanour.

I decided to leave him to it and walked on through the crowd. I thought that sooner or later a waiter would spot me and come rushing up with a plate and a cup of coffee, perhaps show me to a seat. But though on a few occasions a waiter did come hurrying in my direction, each time he pushed past me and I was obliged to watch him serving someone else.

Then after a while I realised I was standing close to the main doors of the conservatory. Someone had thrown them wide open and many guests had spilled out onto the lawn. I stepped out a little way and was surprised by the chill in the air. But here, too, people were standing talking in groups, drinking their coffees or else eating on their feet. Some had turned to face the sunrise, while others were wandering about stretching their legs. One particular group had even sat down on the wet grass, plates and coffee jugs spread around them as for a picnic.

I spotted a catering trolley on the grass not far away with a waiter hunched busily over it. My hunger growing ever greater, I made my way towards it and was just about to tap the waiter on the shoulder when he turned and rushed past me, his arms burdened with three large plates - upon which I glimpsed scrambled eggs, sausages, mushrooms, tomatoes. I watched him go hurrying off, then decided I would not budge from beside the trolley until he returned.

As I waited, I surveyed the scene around me and saw how needless had been my worries concerning my ability to cope with the various demands presented to me in this city. As ever, my experience and my instincts had proved more than sufficient to see me through. Of course I felt a certain disappointment about the evening, but then, as I thought about it further, I could see the inappropriateness of such feelings. After all, if a community could reach some sort of an equilibrium without having to be guided by an outsider, then so much the better.

When after several minutes the waiter had not returned - throughout which time I had been continually teased by the various aromas rising from the hot canisters on the trolley - I decided there was no good reason why I should not serve myself. I had already taken a plate and was bending down searching the lower tiers for some utensils, when I became conscious of a number of figures standing behind me. Turning, I found myself looking at the porters.

As far as I could make out, all of the dozen or so I had last seen gathered together around Gustav's sick-bed were now here before me. As I had turned, some had lowered their eyes, but a few continued to regard me intensely.

'My goodness,' I said, doing my best to hide the fact that I had been about to serve myself breakfast. 'My goodness, what's happened? Naturally, I had meant to come up and see how Gustav was getting on. I was assuming he'd have gone to hospital by now. That's to say, that he was in good hands. I was certainly about to come up as soon as ...' I paused, seeing the expressions of grief on their faces.

The bearded porter stepped forward and coughed awkwardly. 'He passed away half an hour ago, sir. He'd had trouble on and off over the years, but he'd been very fit, and so it was very unexpected for us. Very unexpected.'

'I'm very sorry.' I found that indeed I felt great sorrow at this news. 'Very sorry indeed. I'm very grateful to you, to all of you, for coming out here like this to tell me. As you know, I had only known him for a few days, but he had been very kind to me, assisting me with my bags and so on. '

I could see the bearded porter's colleagues all looking at him, egging him on to say something. The bearded porter took a deep breath.

'Of course, Mr Ryder,' he said, 'we came to find you because we knew you'd want to hear the news quickly. But also' - he suddenly lowered his gaze - 'but also, you see, sir, before he passed away, Gustav, he kept wanting to know. Wanting to know if you'd made your speech yet. That's to say, the little speech you were going to make on our behalf, sir. Right to the end, he was very keen to hear news of it. '

All the porters had now lowered their eyes and were waiting silently for my response.

'Ah,' I said. 'So you're not aware then of what occurred in the auditorium. '

'We've all been with Gustav until just now, sir,' said the bearded porter. 'He's only just now been taken away. You must excuse us, Mr Ryder. It was very rude of us not to be present while you were giving your address, especially if you were so good as to remember your little promise to us and ... '

'Look,' I broke in gently, 'many things didn't go as planned. I'm surprised you haven't heard, but then I suppose, as you say, in these circumstances ...' I paused, then, taking a breath, said in a firmer voice: 'I'm sorry, but the fact is, many things, not just the little speech I had prepared for you, did not go ahead as planned. '

'So you're saying, sir ...' The bearded porter trailed off, then hung his head in disappointment. The other porters, who had all been staring at me, one by one lowered their eyes again. Then one of them near the back of the group burst out in an almost angry tone:

‘Gustav kept asking. Right to the end he kept asking. “Any news of Mr Ryder yet?” He kept asking that.’

A number of his colleagues quickly pacified him, and there then followed a lengthy silence. Finally the bearded porter said, still looking down at the grass:

‘It makes no difference. We’ll all carry on trying, just the same. In fact we’ll now try harder than ever. We won’t let Gustav down. He was always our inspiration and nothing will change now he’s gone. We’ve got an uphill struggle, we always have had, we know that, and it’s not going to get any easier now. But we won’t let standards slip, not one little bit. We’ll remember Gustav and we’ll keep at it. Of course, your little speech, sir, if it had been possible, it would have been ... it would have helped us, no doubt about it. But of course, if at the time it seemed to you inappropriate ...’

‘Look,’ I said, now beginning to lose patience, ‘you’ll all find out soon enough what occurred. Really, I’m surprised you haven’t made it your business to find out more about the larger concerns of your community. What’s more, you seem to have no idea what sort of life I have to lead. Of the vast responsibilities I have to carry. Even now, as I stand here talking to you, I’m having to think about my next engagement in Helsinki. If everything hasn’t quite gone as planned for you, I’m sorry. But you really have no right to come bothering me like this ...’

The words faded in my mouth. In the distance over to my right was a path leading from the concert hall into the surrounding woods. I had for some time been aware of a stream of people emerging from the building and disappearing off behind the trees – on their way home, presumably, for a couple of hours’ rest before the start of the day. I now spotted among them Sophie and Boris, walking purposefully along the path. The little boy had once more placed his arm supportively around his mother, but otherwise there was nothing about them to alert the casual onlooker to their distress. I tried to see the expressions on their faces, but they were too far away, and the next moment they too had vanished behind the trees.

‘I’m sorry,’ I said more gently, turning back to the porters, ‘but you must all excuse me now.’

‘We won’t let standards slip,’ the bearded porter said quietly, still looking at the ground. ‘We’ll do it one day. You’ll see.’

‘Excuse me.’

Just as I was moving away the waiter came rushing back, pushing the old men aside to reach his trolley. Remembering the plate I was still holding behind my back, I thrust it at him.

‘The catering this morning has been appalling,’ I said coldly, before hurrying off.

The path cut a completely straight line through the woods so that I could see clearly to the tall iron gate at the far end. Sophie and Boris had already covered a surprising amount of ground, and although I walked as fast as I could, after a few minutes I had hardly reduced the distance between us. I was continually impeded, furthermore, by a group of young people walking a little in front of me who, whenever I tried to overtake, increased their pace or else spread themselves right across the path. In the end, when I could see that Sophie and Boris were about to reach the street, I broke into a run and burst through the young people, no longer caring what sort of impression I created.

After this I maintained a steady trot, yet was still not even within hailing distance as Sophie and Boris passed through the gate. By the time I reached the gate myself, my breath was coming in gasps and I was obliged to pause.

I had come out onto one of the boulevards near the heart of the city. The morning sun was lighting up the opposite pavement. The shops were still closed, but there was already a fair number of people walking about, going off to their day's work. I then saw, over to my left, a queue in the process of boarding a tram, and Sophie and Boris bringing up its rear. I broke out again into a trot, but the tram must have been further away than I had thought for, although I kept up a good pace, I did not reach it until after the entire queue had boarded and the vehicle was about to pull away. Only by waving frantically did I manage to stall the driver and struggle aboard myself.

The tram lurched forward as I staggered down the central aisle. I was so out of breath I only vaguely registered that the carriage was half full, and only when I collapsed into a seat near the rear did it occur to me I must have walked past Sophie and Boris. Still panting, I leaned to one side and looked back up the aisle.

The carriage was divided into two distinct sections separated by an exit area in the middle. In the front portion, the seating was arranged as two long rows facing one another, and I could see Sophie and Boris sitting together on the sunny side of the tram not far from the driver's cabin. My view of them was obscured by some passengers standing in the exit area hanging onto straps, and I leaned further over into the aisle. As I did so, the man sitting opposite me - in our half of the carriage, the seats were arranged in pairs facing one another - slapped his thigh and said:

‘Another sunny day by the look of things.’

He was dressed neatly, if modestly, in a short zip-up jacket, and I supposed he was some sort of skilled workman - an electrician perhaps. I smiled at him quickly, upon which he began to tell me something about a building he and his colleagues had been working in for the past several days. I listened to him vaguely, occasionally smiling or making an assenting noise. Meanwhile my view of Sophie and Boris became further obscured as more and more people rose to their feet and crowded around the exit doors.

Then the tram stopped, the passengers got out and my view improved. Boris, looking as self-possessed as ever, had one hand on Sophie's shoulder and was regarding the other passengers suspiciously as though they presented a threat to his mother. Sophie's expression was still hidden from me. I could see her though, every few seconds, making an irritated waving motion through the air, perhaps at some insect flying around her.

I was about to adjust my position again when I realised the electrician had somehow got onto the topic of his parents. They were now both in their eighties, he was telling me, and though he did his best to visit them once a day, this was becoming increasingly difficult due to his current job. A thought suddenly came to me and I interrupted him saying:

‘Excuse me, but speaking of parents, it seems mine were here in this city some years ago. Just as tourists, you know. It would have been a good few years ago now. It’s just that the person who told me was only a child at the time and had no clear memory of them. So I was just wondering, since we were talking about parents, and well, I don’t mean to be rude, but I assume you must be well into your fifties, I wondered if you yourself had any memory of their visit.’

‘It’s quite possible,’ the electrician said. ‘But you’ll have to describe them a little.’

‘Well, my mother, she’s quite a tall woman. Dark hair, shoulder length. A rather bird-like nose. That would make her look a little stern, even when she wasn’t intending to be.’

The electrician thought for a moment, looking out at the city going by outside. ‘Yes,’ he said, nodding. ‘Yes, I think I can remember a lady just like that. It was just for a few days. Looking around at the sights, that sort of thing.’

‘That’s it. You remember then?’

‘Yes, she seemed very pleasant. This would have been, oh, at least thirteen, fourteen years ago. Maybe even longer than that.’

I nodded enthusiastically. ‘That would tie in with what Miss Stratmann told me. Yes, that was my mother. Tell me, did she seem to be enjoying herself here?’

The electrician thought hard, then said: ‘From what I recall, she appeared to like it here, yes. In fact’ – he had spotted my look of concern – ‘in fact, I’m certain she did.’ He reached forward and patted my knee in a kindly manner. ‘I’m jolly certain she enjoyed it here. Look, just think about it. She’s bound to have done, isn’t she?’

‘I suppose so,’ I said and turned to the window. The sun was now moving across the interior of the tram. ‘I suppose so. It’s just that ...’ I gave a deep sigh. ‘It’s just that I wish I’d known at the time. I wish someone had thought to inform me. And what about my father? Did he seem to be enjoying himself?’

‘Your father. Hmm.’ The electrician folded his arms, a slight frown on his face.

‘He would have been quite thin by then,’ I said. ‘Greying hair. He had a favourite jacket. A tweed one, pale green, with leather elbow patches.’

The electrician continued to think. Then finally he shook his head. ‘I’m sorry. I can’t say I remember your father.’

‘But that’s impossible. Miss Stratmann assured me they came here together.’

‘I’m sure she’s right. It’s just that I personally can’t remember your father. Your mother, yes. But your father ...’ He shook his head again.

‘But that’s ridiculous! What would my mother have been doing here alone?’

‘I’m not saying he wasn’t with her. It’s just that I don’t remember him. Look, don’t upset yourself so much. I wouldn’t have been so frank if I’d known it was going to upset you like this. I’ve got a terrible memory. Everyone says so. Just yesterday I left my tool-box at my brother-in-law’s house where I had my lunch. I lost forty minutes going back to get it. My tool box!’ He gave a laugh. ‘You see, my memory’s terrible. I’m the last person to trust about something important like this. I’m sure your father would have been here with your mother. Particularly if that’s what other people are saying. Really, I’m the last person to rely on.’

But I had now turned away from him and was once more looking towards the front of the carriage, where Boris had finally given in to his emotions. He was now being embraced by his mother, and I could see his shoulders moving with his sobs. Suddenly there seemed nothing of importance other than to go to him and, muttering a quick apology to the electrician, I rose and began to make my way up the carriage.

I had almost reached them when the tram turned a sharp curve and I was forced to grab a nearby pole to keep my balance. When I looked again, I realised that Sophie and Boris had remained quite unaware of my approach, even though I was now standing very close to them. They were still in a deep embrace, their eyes closed. Patches of sunlight were drifting over their arms and shoulders. There was at that moment something so private about their comforting of each other that it seemed impossible even for me to intrude. And as I went on gazing at them, I began to feel, for all their obvious distress, a strange sense of envy. I moved a little closer until I could almost feel the very texture of their embrace.

Then at last Sophie opened her eyes. She watched me expressionlessly as the little boy continued to sob into her breast.

‘I’m sorry,’ I said to her eventually. ‘I’m very sorry about everything. I only heard about your father just now. Of course, I came after you as soon as I heard ...’

Something about her expression made me stop. For another moment, Sophie went on regarding me coldly. Then she said tiredly:

‘Leave us. You were always on the outside of our love. Now look at you. On the outside of our grief too. Leave us. Go away.’

Boris broke away from her and turned to look at me. Then he said to his mother: ‘No, no. We’ve got to keep together. '

Sophie shook her head. 'No, it's useless. Leave him be, Boris. Let him go around the world, giving out his expertise and wisdom. He needs to do it. Let's just leave him to it now. '

Boris stared at me in confusion, then back at his mother. He might have been about to say something, but at that moment Sophie stood up.

'Come on, Boris. We've got to get off here. Boris, come on. '

Indeed the tram was slowing down and other passengers were getting up from their seats. A few people pushed past me, and then Sophie and Boris squeezed by. Still clutching my pole, I watched Boris moving away down the aisle towards the exit. At one point he glanced back at me, and I heard him say:

'But we've got to stay together. We've got to. '

I then saw Sophie's face behind him, gazing at me with an odd detachment, and I heard her voice say:

'He'll never be one of us. You've got to understand that, Boris. He'll never love you like a real father. '

More people pushed past me. I raised my hand in the air.

'Boris! ' I called.

The little boy, hanging back in the throng, looked towards me once more.

'Boris! That bus ride, you remember it? That bus ride to the artificial lake. Remember, Boris, how good it was? How kind everyone was to us on the bus? The little presents they gave, the singing. You remember, Boris? '

Passengers had now started to disembark. Boris gave me one last glance and then disappeared from my view. More people pushed past and then the tram began to move again.

After a while I turned and made my way back to my seat. The electrician smiled cheerfully as I sat down again in front of him. Then I became aware of him leaning forward, patting my shoulder, and I realised I was sobbing.

‘Listen,’ he was saying, ‘everything always seems very bad at the time. But it all passes, nothing’s ever as bad as it looks. Do cheer up.’ For a while he went on uttering such empty phrases while I continued to sob. Then I heard him say:

‘Look, why don’t you have some breakfast. Just have something to eat, like the rest of us. You’re bound to feel a little better then. Come on. Go and get something to eat.’

I glanced up and saw that the electrician was holding a plate on his lap, on which was a half-finished croissant and a small knob of butter. His knees were covered in crumbs.

‘Ah,’ I said, straightening and recovering my composure. ‘Where did you get that?’

The electrician indicated beyond my shoulder. Turning, I saw a crowd of passengers standing at the very rear of the tram where some sort of buffet had been laid out. I noticed too that the whole back half of the carriage had become quite crowded, and that all around us passengers were eating and drinking. The electrician’s breakfast was modest in comparison to many being consumed; I could now see people working their way through large plates of eggs, bacon, tomatoes, sausages.

‘Come on,’ the electrician said again. ‘Go and get yourself some breakfast. Then we’ll talk about all your troubles. Or if you prefer, we can just forget about it all and talk about whatever you like, whatever’s likely to cheer you up. Football, cinema. Anything you like. But the first thing to do is to get some breakfast. You look like you haven’t eaten for some time.’

‘You’re quite right,’ I said. ‘Now I think of it, I haven’t eaten for a very long time. But please tell me. Where is this tram going? I have to get to my hotel to pack my things. You see, I have a flight this morning to Helsinki. I have to get to my hotel pretty soon. '

'Oh, this tram will get you more or less anywhere you like in the city. This is what we call the morning circuit. Then there's the evening circuit. Twice a day a tram goes right the way round the entire circuit. Oh yes, you can go anywhere on this tram. It's the same again in the evening, but the atmosphere's quite different then. Oh yes, this is a marvellous tram. '

'How splendid. Well then, excuse me. I think I'll take up your suggestion and get some breakfast. In fact, you're quite right. Even the idea of it is making me feel better. '

'That's more the spirit,' the electrician said and raised his croissant in a salute.

I got up and went to the back of the carriage. Various aromas came wafting towards me. A number of people were in the act of serving themselves, but peering over their shoulders I saw a large buffet presented in a semi-circular arrangement directly beneath the rear window of the tram. There was on offer virtually everything one could wish for: scrambled eggs, fried eggs, a choice of cold meats and sausages, sautéed potatoes, mushrooms, cooked tomatoes. There was a large platter with rolled herrings and other fish preparations, two huge baskets filled with croissants and different sorts of rolls, a glass bowl of fresh fruit, numerous jugs of coffee and juices. Everyone around the buffet seemed more than eager to get to the food, and yet the atmosphere was extremely cordial, with people passing things to one another and exchanging cheerful remarks.

I took a plate, glancing up as I did so through the rear window with its receding view of the city streets, and could feel my spirits rising yet further. Things had not, after all, gone so badly. Whatever disappointments this city had brought, there was no doubting that my presence had been greatly appreciated - just as it had been everywhere else I had ever gone. And now here I was, my visit almost at its close, a thoroughly impressive buffet before me offering virtually everything I had ever wished to eat for breakfast. The croissants looked particularly promising. Indeed, from the manner in which passengers all around the carriage were devouring theirs, it was obvious they were extremely fresh and of the highest possible quality. Then again, nothing my gaze fell upon looked anything less than enticing.

I started to serve myself a little of everything. As I did so, I began to picture myself, already back in my seat, exchanging pleasant talk with the electrician, glancing out between mouthfuls at the early-morning streets. The electrician was in many ways the ideal person for me to talk to at this moment. He was clearly kind-hearted, but at the same time careful not to be intrusive. I could see him now, still eating his croissant, obviously in no hurry to get off the tram. In fact, he looked set to go on sitting there for a long time to come. And with the tram running a continuous circuit, if the two of us were enjoying our conversation, he was just the sort to delay getting off until the next time his stop came around. The buffet too was clearly here to stay for some time yet, so that we would be able to break off from our conversation every now and then to replenish our plates. I could even see us repeatedly persuading each other to have more. 'Go on! Just one more sausage! Here, give me your plate, I'll get it for you.' We would go on sitting there together, eating, exchanging views on football and whatever else took our fancy, while outside the sun rose higher and higher in the sky, brightening the streets and our side of the carriage. And only when we were thoroughly done, when we had eaten and talked all we could possibly want, the electrician might glance at his watch, give a sigh and point out that the stop for my hotel was coming round again. I too would sigh, and with some reluctance rise to my feet, brushing the crumbs off my lap. We would shake hands, wish each other a good day - he too would be having to get off before long, he would tell me - and I would go off to join the crowd of cheerful passengers gathering around the exit. Then, as the tram came to a halt, I would perhaps give the electrician one last wave and disembark, secure in the knowledge that I could look forward to Helsinki with pride and confidence.

I filled my coffee cup almost to the brim. Then, holding it carefully in one hand, my generously laden plate in the other, I began making my way back to my seat.

双语版石黑一雄作品

浮世画家

An Artist of the Floating World

二〇一七年诺贝尔文学奖获奖作家

Kazuo Ishiguro

〔英〕石黑一雄

著

马爱农

译

上海译文出版社

版权信息

书名：浮世画家（汉、英双语版）

作者：【英】石黑一雄

译者：马爱农

责任编辑：宋金

关注微博：@数字译文

微信公众号：数字译文

我们的产品：译文的书

联系我们：hi@shtph.com

问题反馈：complain@shtph.com

合作电话：021-53594508

Digital Lab是上海译文出版社数字业务的实验部门，成立于2014年3月。我们致力于将优质的资源送到读者手中。我们会不断努力，做体验更好、设计更好的电子书，加油！

上海译文出版社| Digital Lab

目 录

浮世画家

献词

前言

一九四八年十月

一九四九年四月

一九四九年十一月

一九五〇年六月

An Artist of the Floating World

Dedication

Introduction

OCTOBER, 1948

APRIL, 1949

NOVEMBER, 1949

JUNE, 1950

浮世画家

献给我的父母

前言

我是于一九八一年九月，在伦敦谢菲德公园的一处地下室公寓里开始写《浮世画家》的。那年我二十六岁。我的第一部小说《远山淡影》即将付印，但当时我并没有明确的理由相信自己会成为一名专职作家。

那年夏天，我和洛娜回到伦敦（此前我们一直住在加的夫），在大城市找到了新的工作，但是没有住所。几年之前，我们俩都是一个松散的关系网的成员，这个关系网里的人年轻、左倾、另类，住在拉德布罗克丛林和哈默史密斯附近的临时住房里，从事慈善工作或组织各种活动。那年夏天，我们就这样来到这座城市，无忧无虑，相信在自己找到合适的房子之前，肯定能跟别人暂时合住，现在想来那种自信真是挺奇怪的。还好，并没有什么事情来挑战我们的自信，我们很快就在喧闹繁华的金贩道附近找到了一小间出租的地下室。

公寓旁边是当时尚属尖端科技的维京唱片公司的录音棚，我们经常看见毛发浓密的大汉，搬着器材在那座没有窗户、墙壁五颜六色的楼房里进进出出。但是楼房的隔音效果堪称典范，当我背对小小的后花园，坐在我们的小餐桌旁时，我感到这种写作环境再理想不过了。

洛娜通勤的时间比我长得多。她在刘易舍姆找到一份地方政府的社会服务工作，在城市的另一边上班。我的工作地点就在一箭之遥——我成了伦敦西区古利奈人组织的“移民工作者”，这是一个深受好评的组织，致力于帮助无家可归的人。为了公平起见，我们俩制定了一个协议：每天早晨同时起床，洛娜出门的时候，我准时坐在桌旁，准备完成每天九十分钟的清晨写作，然后再去上班。

许多从事着挑战性工作的作家，都创作出了超凡的杰作。然而我总是无法一心二用，这说来可悲，甚至有点病态，那几个星期，我坐在餐桌旁试图写作，阳光一点点地洒进地下室，那是我对于“业余”写作所做的唯一尝试。这种尝试不能说完全成功。我发现自己盯着空白的稿纸，拼命克制着想去睡个回笼觉的冲动。（白天的工作很快变得紧张起来，经常不得不加班到深夜。）洛娜坚持让我吃一顿古怪的早餐开始新的一天，早餐由可怕的粗纤维构成，再撒上酵母和麦芽粉——这种绝密配方，吃得我有时在椅子上直不起腰来，但她的做法于事无补。尽管如此，在那些早晨的写作中，《浮世画家》的核心——

故事框架和中心前提——在我脑海里差不多完全成型了。我把它写成一个十五页的短篇小说（后由格兰塔出版社出版，书名是《战后之夏》）。我写这个短篇的时候，心里就清楚地知道，我需要一个庞大和复杂得多的结构，来把我已经想象中看见并受其诱惑的想法，融入小说之中。后来因为工作所迫，我的清晨写作计划彻底中断了。

直到一九八二年的冬天，我才认真地重拾《浮世画家》的创作。那时《远山淡影》已经出版，它作为第一部小说，自然引起了各种争议。这本书被美国和好几个非英语国家引进出版，并使我登上了次年春天揭晓的格兰塔出版社“20位最优秀的英国年轻小说家”榜单。我的写作事业似乎仍然不太稳定，但现在我有理由放开手脚了，于是我辞掉了古利奈人组织的工作，成了一名专职作家。

我们搬到了伦敦的东南部，住在一座高高的维多利亚风格房屋的顶层，那里位于上西德汉姆地区，环境幽静。我们的厨房没有水池，因此不得不把脏盘子都堆在一个旧的活动茶几上，推到卫生间里去。不过，这里离洛娜上班的地方很近，我们不必把闹钟设得那么早了。可怕的配方早餐也停止了。这座房子的主人是迈克尔和莉诺·马歇尔，他们六十出头，是一对可爱的老夫妇，住在楼下。很快我们就养成一个习惯：在上了一天班之后聚集在他们的厨房（那里有水池），跟他们一起喝茶，吃美味的花式蛋糕，轻松地闲聊，我们经常聊的有趣话题是图书、政治、板球、广告业，以及英国人的怪癖。（几年之后，莉诺不幸猝死，我把《长日将尽》这本书献给了她。）差不多也是在这个时候，我得到了即将推出的四频道给我的工作机会，说起来，正是我作为一名电视剧编剧的经历（我最终有两部单集电视剧在那个频道播出）对我《浮世画家》的写作产生了巨大的，也可以说是逆向的影响。

我发现自己近乎痴迷地拿我的剧本——特别是对话加舞台提示部分——跟我已经出版的小说中的章节做对比，并且问我自己：“我的小说跟我的剧本有很大不同吗？”厚厚的一部《远山淡影》，在我看来跟一个剧本那么类似——对话，接着是“舞台提示”，接着又是对话。我开始感到沮丧。如果一部小说所提供的体验，跟观众打开电视所获得的没有什么差别，那为什么还要写小说呢？小说作为一种形式，如果不能提供某种独一无二的、其他形式无法替代的东西，那么它在电影和电视的巨大冲击下还有什么生存希望呢？（我必须指出，在上世纪八十年代初期，当代小说的境遇似乎比今天不景气得多。）我在谢菲德公园奋力写作的那些早晨，对自己想写的故事有着清晰的想法。但是如今在西德汉姆，我却进入了一个漫长的实验期，尝试着

用各种不同的方式讲述那个故事。我打定主意，我的新小说绝不是一个“散文体的剧本”。那么它会是什么呢？

就在那个时候，我感染了一种病毒，几天卧床不起。最难受的阶段过去之后，我感觉不再需要接连昏睡几小时了，就找到我带到床上的那本书——它被裹在我的羽绒被里到处乱滚，是新近出版的基尔马丁——蒙克利夫翻译的马塞尔·普鲁斯特《追忆似水年华》的第一卷。也许是因为当时身处病榻，使我更能体会这本书的意境（其实我并不是普鲁斯特的铁杆粉丝，当时不是，现在也不是：我认为他长篇累牍的大段描写实在是过于沉闷），但是我完全被“序曲”和“贡布雷”那些部分吸引住了。我读了一遍又一遍。让我深感激动的，除了这些段落的超凡之美，还有我当时脑海中产生（后来写在笔记上）的普鲁斯特的“移动方法”——也就是他从一个情节引入下一个情节的方法。事件和场景的顺序并没有遵循时间表的要求，也不是线性地展开情节。而是一些看似无关紧要的思绪联想，或者变幻莫测的记忆，把小说从一个章节带入另一个章节。有时，看到目前的事件由前一个事件触发，使人不由得产生疑问：“为什么？”究竟什么原因，这两个貌似毫不相关的瞬间，在叙述者的脑海里被放在了一起？于是，我找到了一种令人兴奋的、更加自由的方式来写我的小说，它可以在纸上制造丰富的意境，提供在屏幕上无法捕捉的内心活动。如果我能根据叙述者的思绪联想和流动记忆，从一个段落走向另一个段落，我就差不多能像一位抽象画家那样，自由地选择把形状和色彩安放在画布上。我可以把两天前的一个场景，直接放在二十年前的一个场景旁边，请读者思索两者之间的关系。通常，叙述者自己并不需要完全清楚某一特定的并置关系的深层原因。我看到了一种写作方式，它能恰到好处地提出多层次的自我欺骗和否认，足以蒙蔽任何人对其自身及过往的看法。对一位小说家来说，突破性的时刻经常就像这样，是一些不起眼的、私密的小事件。现在回想起来，我发现那三天在西德汉姆感染病毒，卧床养病，反复研读普鲁斯特的那二十页文字，是我写作生涯中一个关键的转折点——可以这么说，它远比荣获一项大奖，或者在电影首映式上走红地毯重要得多。我后来写的一切，都是由我在那三天里的顿悟所决定的。

我在此还应该谈一谈《浮世画家》里的日本元素。从严格意义上说，这是我所有小说里最日本的一部，故事场景完全在日本，人物也都是日本人。小说的语言——第一人称叙述和对话——被理解为是日语，虽然小说是以英语呈现的。换句话说，你应该把这本书想象成某种翻译作品：在一句句英语文字的背后是日语。这个策略对我写在纸

上的每一句话都有影响。我希望语言能够流畅自然，却又不能变得过于口语化——过于“英语”。我经常发现我在逐字逐句地翻译日语的句式和客套话。但大多数时候是在寻找一种典雅但略不自然的表达方式，以暗示自始至终英语后面所流淌着的日语的韵律节奏和繁文缛节。

最后，我想在这里补充一点关于创作这部小说的更大的社会背景。《浮世画家》写于一九八一年至一九八五年之间，那些年英国正在经历关键的、痛苦的、经常难以驾驭的转型期。玛格丽特·撒切尔领导的政府终结了战后的政治共识——关于福利国家和“混合”经济（重要资产和行业均为公有和私有）的愿望。当时有一个公开而强硬的计划，要将英国从一个以制造业和重工业为基础、拥有大量有组织劳动力的国家，转变为一个以服务业为主导的经济体，拥有分散、灵活、非工会化的劳动力资源。在那个时代，出现了矿工罢工、沃平争端、核裁军运动游行、福克纳群岛战争、爱尔兰共和军恐怖主义，还出现了一种名为“货币主义”的经济理论，将大幅削减公共服务作为治疗病态经济的唯一良方。我还记得，我与一位交情最深、关系最亲密的朋友共进晚餐，因为两人对矿工罢工持有相反意见，发生了激烈的争吵。这部小说以二战前后的日本为背景，但很大程度上是根据我当时身处的英国而创作的：各行各业的人们都面临选择政治立场的压力；狂热的、往往是年轻的那些派系的刻板 and 笃定，渐渐变为自以为是和恶意的咄咄逼人；在政治变革时期“艺术家角色”的苦闷困惑。对我个人来说，我有一种挥之不去的感觉：想要超越受时代局限的教条主义狂热实在太难了；我还有一种恐惧，生怕时代和历史会证明一个人所支持的是一项错误、可耻，甚至邪恶的事业，尽管他怀有良好的心愿，却为此白白浪费了自己最宝贵的时光和才华。

石黑一雄
二〇一六年一月于伦敦

一九四八年十月

如果在一个阳光灿烂的日子，你走过那座在当地仍被称为“犹疑桥”的小木桥，爬上陡峭的小路，走不了多远，就能在两棵银杏树的树梢间看见我家宅子的屋顶。即使在山上没有占据这样显眼的位置，它在周围的房屋间也显得鹤立鸡群，因此，你顺着小路走上来时，会纳闷这宅子的主人会是怎样的富翁。

其实我不是富翁，而且从来没有富过。宅子之所以看上去这样壮观，是因为它是我的前任房主建造的，而他不是别人，正是杉村明。当然啦，你也许刚来到这个城市，还不熟悉杉村明这个名字。凡是二战前住在这里的人，只要一跟他们提起杉村明，他们就会告诉你，三十多年前，杉村无疑是城里最受尊敬、最德高望重的人之一。

你得知了这点，再来到山顶，站在那里看着精美的雪松大门，围墙里大片的庭园，琉璃瓦的屋顶，还有那些美不胜收的雕梁画栋，你会疑惑我这个人何德何能，竟能拥有这样的房产。事实上，我买这座房宅出价低廉——当时甚至不到房产的真正价值的一半。由于那个时候杉村家人发起了一种十分奇特——有人会说是愚蠢——的程序，才使我得以购得这座豪宅。

说起来约莫是十五年前的事了。当时，我的情况每个月都有起色，妻子开始催促我物色一个新居。她以她惯常的远见，振振有词地阐述拥有一座跟我们地位相称的房屋有多重要——不是出于虚荣，而是考虑到孩子们将来的婚配。我觉得她说得有道理，但是我们的长女节子只有十四五岁，我就没有着急物色。不过，有一年左右，每当我听说有合适的房子出售，都会记得去打听打听。记得是我的一个学生来告诉我，说杉村明去世一年之后，他的宅子准备出售。购买这样一座豪宅对我来说是天方夜谭，我以为这个建议是出于我的学生一向对我的过度敬重。不过我还是去打听了，结果得到了意想不到的答复。

一天下午，两位仪态高傲、白发苍苍的女士来访，她们就是杉村明的女儿。当我表示得到这样一个显赫家庭的关注，感到受宠若惊时，那位姐姐冷冷地告诉我，她们这么做不只是出于礼节。前几个月里，许多人都来打听她们先父的宅子，家人最后决定全部回绝，只留下四个候选人。这四个人是家庭成员根据其品行和成就，严格挑选出来的。

“父亲建造的房产必须传给一个他认可和赞赏的人，”她继续说道，“这对我们来说是第一要紧的。当然啦，情形所迫，我们也不得不从经济上来考虑，但这绝对是第二位的。因此，我们定了一个价钱。”

说到这里，一直没有开口的妹妹递给我一个信封，她们神情凝重地注视着我把它打开。里面只有一张纸，上面用毛笔典雅地写着一个数字。我刚想表达对这么低廉的价格的惊讶，却从她们脸上的表情看出，进一步谈论价钱问题会引起反感。姐姐只是说道：“这不是为了让你们互相竞价。我们并不指望得到超过规定价钱的数额。从现在起，我们打算要做的是进行一场信誉拍卖。”

她解释说，她们亲自前来，是代表杉村家族正式请我接受——当然啦，跟另外三位候选人一起——对我的背景和信誉的细致调查。然后从中挑出一个合适的买主。

这是一个奇怪的程序，但我觉得没理由反对。其实，这跟男婚女嫁要走的程序差不多。而且，能被这个古老而保守的家庭认为是一个有资格的候选人，我感到有点受宠若惊。我表示愿意接受调查，并向她们表达了我的谢意，这时，妹妹第一次跟我说话了，她说：“小野先生，父亲是个文化人。他对艺术家非常尊重。实际上，他知道您的作品。”

在后来的日子里，我自己也做了些调查，发现妹妹的话果然不假。杉村明确确实可算是热衷艺术，曾无数次出资赞助画展。我还听到一些有趣的传言：杉村家族很大一部分人根本不同意出售房宅，曾有过一些激烈的争论。最后，迫于经济压力，不得不变卖房产。交易过程中这些古怪的手续，实际上是那些不愿房产转到外人手中的人所做的一种妥协。这些安排有些专横，这是无需否认的。但在我来说，我愿意体谅一个拥有这样辉煌历史的家族的情感。但妻子对调查一事很不以为然。

“她们以为自己是谁？”她不满地说。“应该告诉她们，我们不想再跟她们发生任何关系。”

“可是有什么害处呢？”我说。“我们没有什么不愿意让她们发现的。不错，我家境不殷实，但这点杉村家的人肯定已经知道了，而她们仍然把我们看作有资格的候选人。就让她们调查去吧，她们只会发现对我们有利的东西。”我还刻意加了一句：“实际上，她们所做

的事，就跟我们要跟她们联姻差不多。我们必须慢慢习惯这类事情。”

而且，“信誉拍卖”——用那位姐姐的话——的想法确实值得赞许。我奇怪为什么我们没有用这种方法解决更多的问题。这样的竞争要值得称道得多，它用以评判的不是某人的钱包大小，而是他的道德操守和成就。我仍然记得，当我得知杉村一家——经过最为周密彻底的调查之后——认为我最有资格买下他们如此珍视的那座房子时，我内心深处曾感到多么满足。毫无疑问，这座房子也值得我们忍受一些麻烦，它外表壮观、盛气凌人，里面却是精心挑选的色彩柔和的天然木料，我们住在里面之后才发现，这座房子特别有助于放松心情，安享宁静。

然而，在交易期间，杉村一家的专横显而易见，有些家庭成员毫不掩饰他们对我们的敌意，换了一个不太善解人意的买主，准会觉得受到冒犯，放弃这笔买卖。即使到了后来，我有时还会碰到杉村家的一些人，他们不是礼貌地跟我寒暄，而是站在大街上盘问我那所宅子的状况，以及我对它做了什么改造。

最近，我很少听到杉村家人的消息了。不过日本投降后不久，曾经来找我商量售房事宜的两姐妹中的妹妹，突然来访。连年的战争把她变成了一个消瘦的、弱不禁风的老太太。她以他们家族一贯的作风，毫不掩饰地表示她只关心宅子在战争中受的损害，而并不关心住在宅子里的人。听了我和健二的遭遇，她只是淡淡地表示了几句同情，然后就对炸弹造成的破坏提出一大堆问题。这使我一开始对她非常反感，可是后来我注意到，她的目光总是不由自主地打量着房子，还有，她斟酌词句的时候会突然停住话头，于是，我理解了她再次回到这座老宅的百感交集的激动心情。后来我推测，出售房宅时还活着的那些家人如今想必都去世了，我开始对她产生恻隐之心，便提出带她四处看看。

宅子在战争中遭到一些破坏。杉村明在房子东边建了厢房，共有三间大屋，有一道长廊跟主宅相连，长廊横贯主宅一侧的庭园。长廊从头至尾精美繁华，有人说杉村建造长廊——以及东厢房——是为了他的父母，他希望跟父母保持距离。不管怎么说，这道长廊是宅子里最引人注目的特色之一。下午，外面的繁枝茂叶把光和影投洒在整个长廊，人走在里面，就像在庭院隧道里穿行一般。炸弹造成的破坏主要是在这一部分，我们在庭院里审视长廊时，我看见杉村小姐难过得两眼垂泪。此时，我先前对这位老太太的不满情绪早已烟消云散，我

一再向她保证，一有机会就把受损的地方修好，让宅子恢复她父亲当初建造的样子。

我信誓旦旦的时候，并不知道物资仍然这么匮乏。日本投降之后很长时间，我们经常要等上好几个星期，才能等来一片木头或一包钉子。在这种情况下，我只能尽量先照顾主宅——它也没有逃过战争的破坏，庭院走廊和东厢房的修理进展缓慢。我想尽办法防止出现严重的衰败，但宅子的那个部分始终没能开放。而且，现在这里只剩下我和仙子，似乎也不需要扩大我们的生活空间。

今天，如果我领你走到宅子后面，拉开厚重的纱门，让你看看杉村庭院里长廊的遗迹，你仍然会感受到它当初的奇妙壮观。但是毫无疑问，你也会注意到我未能阻挡的蛛网和霉斑，以及天花板上大大的裂缝，只用防水帆布盖着，遮挡天空。有时，天刚亮，我拉开纱门，发现一道道绚丽的阳光透过防水帆布照射下来，映出悬在空气中的尘雾，就好像天花板是刚刚塌下来的一般。

除了长廊和东厢房，受损最严重的是阳台。我们家的人，特别是我的两个女儿，以前总是喜欢坐在那里消磨时光，聊天，欣赏园子。因此，日本投降后，节子——我已婚的女儿——第一次来看我们时，阳台的情形让她感到难过极了。那时我已经把破坏最严重的地方修好了，但阳台的一端仍然高低不平，满是裂缝，因为当年的炸弹把地板都掀了起来。阳台顶上也遭到破坏，一到下雨天，我们就不得不在地上摆一排容器，接上面漏下来的雨水。

不过，在过去的这一年，我总算取得了一些进展，到节子上个月又来看我们的时候，阳台已经差不多修复了。因为姐姐回来，仙子专门请假在家，加上天气不错，我的两个女儿许多时间都呆在外面，就像过去一样。我经常跟她们一起凑热闹，有时候，时光又像回到了很久以前，某个阳光灿烂的日子，全家人一起坐在那里，有一搭没一搭地闲聊。上个月的有一天——应该是节子到来后的第二天早晨——我们吃过早饭，一起坐在阳台上，仙子说道：

“节子，你终于来了，我总算松了口气。你可以把爸爸从我手里暂时接过去了。”

“仙子，说实在的……”她的姐姐在垫子上不安地蠕动着。

“爸爸现在退休了，需要人好好照顾呢，”仙子继续说，脸上带着调皮的笑容，“你得让他有点事做，不然他就会感到郁闷。”

“说实在的……”节子紧张地笑笑，然后叹了口气，把目光转向园子。“枫树似乎完全恢复了，看上去多么精神啊。”

“节子大概根本不知道你最近是个什么情况，爸爸。她只记得你当年是个暴君，把我们支使得团团转。你现在温和多了，是不是这样？”

我笑了一声，向节子表明这都是在开玩笑，然而我的长女还是一脸忧心忡忡的样子。仙子又转向姐姐，接着说道，“但是他确实需要人好好照料，整天呆在家里闷闷不乐。”

“她又在胡说八道了，”我插嘴说，“如果我整天郁闷，这些东西是怎么修好的呢？”

“是啊，”节子说着，笑咪咪地转向我。“房子现在看上去棒极了。爸爸一定干得很辛苦。”

“苦活累活都有人来帮他干，”仙子说，“看来你不相信我的话，节子。爸爸现在大不一样了。你不用再害怕他。他脾气温柔随和多了。”

“仙子，说实在的……”

“他偶尔还自己做饭呢。你都不会相信，是不是？最近爸爸的厨艺可是大有长进。”

“仙子，这件事我们已经谈得够多了。”节子轻声说。

“是不是这样，爸爸？你的进步可真不小。”

我又笑了笑，疲惫地摇摇头。我记得就在这时，仙子把脸转向园子，对着阳光闭上双眼，说道：

“我说，等我结了婚，他可不能指望我回来做饭了。我要做的事情已经够多了，哪还有空照顾爸爸。”

仙子说这话的时候，她的姐姐——刚才一直拘谨地望着别处——用询问的目光飞快地看了我一眼。她立刻又转移视线，因为必须回应仙子的笑容。但是节子神态举止中出现了一种新的、更深沉的不安，幸好这时候她的小儿子在阳台上奔跑，飞快地从我们身边蹿过，使她有机会改变话题，她似乎松了口气。

“一郎，安静点！”她冲着儿子的背影喊道。

一郎一直跟父母住在现代化的公寓里，现在见到我们老宅这么宽敞，毫无疑问是被迷住了。他似乎不像我们这样喜欢在阳台上闲坐，而是喜欢以很快的速度从阳台一头跑到另一头，有时还在擦得锃亮的地板上滑行。他不止一次差点儿打翻了我们的茶盘，他母亲一直叫他安稳地坐下来，但收效甚微。这次也是，节子叫他跟我们一起坐在垫子上，他却不肯，只在阳台那头生气。

“过来，一郎，”我喊道，“我一直跟女人聊天，已经聊腻了。你过来坐在我旁边，我们谈谈男子汉的话题。”

这一招很灵，他立刻就过来了。他把垫子放在我身边，端端正正地坐好，小手背在后面，肩膀挺得笔直。

“外公，”他一本正经地对我说，“我有个问题。”

“好的，一郎，什么问题？”

“我想知道怪兽的事。”

“怪兽？”

“它是史前的吗？”

“史前？这样的词你都知道？你准是一个聪明的孩子。”

这时候，一郎的架子端不住了。他放弃了正襟危坐，仰面滚在地上，开始把双脚悬在半空踢蹬。

“一郎！”节子焦急地压低声音喊道。“在外公面前这么没有教养。快坐好了！”

听了这话，一郎只是让双脚懒洋洋地落到地板上。他把双臂交叉放在胸前，闭上了眼睛。

“外公，”他用困意蒙眬的声音说，“怪兽是史前的吗？”

“什么怪兽，一郎？”

“请原谅他，”节子说，脸上带着紧张不安的笑容，“我们昨天来的时候，火车站外面贴着一张电影海报。他纠缠了出租车司机一路，问了人家许多问题。不巧的是我自己没有看见那张海报。”

“外公！怪兽到底是不是史前的？我想听到一个答案！”

“一郎！”他母亲狠狠瞪了他一眼。

“我不能肯定，一郎。我认为我们必须看了电影才知道。”

“那什么时候看电影呢？”

“唔。你最好跟你母亲商量一下。这种事说不好，也许电影太恐怖了，不适合小孩子看。”

我说这话没有惹恼他的意思，但是外孙的反应吓了我一跳。他一骨碌坐了起来，气呼呼地瞪着我，嘴里喊道：“你怎么敢！你说什么呀！”

“一郎！”节子惊愕地叫道。可是一郎继续用那种最吓人的目光看着我，他母亲只好从自己的垫子上起身，走了过来。“一郎！”她摇晃着他的胳膊，轻声地说。“不许那样瞪着外公。”

听了这话，一郎又躺倒在地，悬空踢蹬双脚。他母亲又朝我不安地笑了笑。

“这么没有教养。”她说。她似乎不知道再说点什么，便又笑了笑。

“一郎君，”仙子说着，站了起来，“你为什么不来帮我收拾收拾早饭的东西呢？”

“女人干的活。”一郎说，两只脚仍然乱踢着。

“这么说一郎不肯帮我喽？这就麻烦了。桌子这么重，我力气这么小，一个人可没法把它搬走。不知道有谁能帮我呢？”

话音未落，一郎一跃而起，看也不看我们一眼，大步走进屋去。仙子呵呵笑着，跟了进去。

节子看了一眼他们的背影，然后端起茶壶，给我斟满。“没想到事情这么严重，”她说，声音压得低低的，“我说的是仙子的婚事。”

“没有那么严重，”我说，摇了摇头，“实际上，八字还没一撇呢。这才刚刚开始。”

“请原谅，可是听了仙子刚才的话，我自然以为事情多半已经……”她的话没有说完，接着又补了一句，“请原谅。”然而听她说话的口气，似乎提出了一个悬而未决的问题。

“仙子恐怕不是第一次这样说话了，”我说，“实际上，自从开始议论这档婚事以来，她的表现就一直有些异样。上个星期，毛利先

生来看我们——你还记得他吗？”

“当然记得。他还好吧？”

“挺好的。他只是路过，进来问候一声。问题是，仙子就开始当着他的面谈起了这档婚事。她当时的态度就跟刚才差不多，好像一切都谈妥了似的。真是让人尴尬。毛利先生走的时候还向我表示祝贺，并问我新郎是做什么的。”

“天哪，”节子若有所思地说，“那肯定让人怪难堪的。”

“这可不能怪毛利先生。你自己刚才也听见了。一个陌生人会怎么想呢？”

女儿没有回答，我们在那里默默地坐了一阵。后来，我朝节子看去时，她正出神地看着园子，两只手托着茶杯，似乎已经把它给忘记了。她上个月来看我们的时候，我也有几次——也许是光线照在她身上的样子，或者其他类似的原因——发现自己在仔细端详她的容貌。毫无疑问，随着年岁增长，节子越变越好看了。她小时候，我和她母亲担心她长相平平，以后找不到好婆家。节子小小年纪五官就有点男性化，到了青春期这个特点越发明显。因此，我的两个女儿每次吵架，仙子总是喊姐姐“假小子！假小子！”，使她无言以对。谁知道这样的事情对人格产生了什么样的影响呢？仙子长大后这么任性，节子却这么害羞、腼腆，绝对不是偶然的。可是现在，节子年近三十，容貌却大有改观，看上去自有一种风韵。我还记得她母亲的预言——“我们的节子是夏季开花，”她经常这么说。我以前以为妻子只是在自我安慰，可是上个月有好几次，我吃惊地发现她的预言多么正确。

节子从深思中回过神来，又朝屋子里看了一眼。然后她说：“以我的看法，恐怕去年的事给仙子伤害很大。也许比我们设想的还要严重。”

我叹了口气，点点头。“当时我可能对她不够在意。”

“我相信爸爸已经尽力了。毫无疑问，这样的事对女人来说是个可怕的打击。”

“不得不承认，我当时以为她在演戏，你妹妹有时候就喜欢那样。她一直口口声声说那是‘爱情的结合’，后来黄了，便也只好把戏演下去。唉，也许根本就不是演戏。”

“我们当时还把它当笑话，”节子说，“说不定真的是爱情的结合。”

我们又沉默了。我屋里传出一郎的声音，一迭声地嚷嚷着什么。

“请原谅，”节子换了一种口吻说，“有没有听说去年的婚事究竟为什么会泡汤？太让人感到意外了。”

“不知道。现在已经无所谓了，不是吗？”

“那当然，请原谅。”节子似乎琢磨了一会儿，然后说：“只是池田总是追问我去年的事，追问三宅家为什么要那样突然反悔。”她轻笑了一声，几乎是对自己笑。“他似乎认准我有什么事情瞒着他，我们都瞒着他。我只能一再地向他保证，我什么也不知道。”

“请你相信，”我有点冷淡地说，“我也不明白其中的奥秘。如果我知道，肯定不会瞒着你和池田的。”

“那当然。请原谅，我不是故意暗示……”她又一次尴尬地停住了话头。

那天早晨我对女儿表现得有点急躁，但节子不是第一次用这样的口气追问我去年的事，以及三宅家解除婚约的原因。她为什么认定我有事瞒着她呢？我不知道。即使三宅家有什么特殊的原因突然毁约，按理也不会如实告诉我的。

按我自己的猜测，这件事并没有什么了不得的内幕。诚然，他们最后一刻突然毁婚，确实令人十分意外，但凭什么就断定其中必有隐情呢？我感觉事情很简单，就是家庭地位过于悬殊。从我对三宅一家的观察来看，他们只是又骄傲又厚道的人，想到儿子要攀高枝，就觉得心里不太舒服。其实，他们早在几年前就想解除婚约的，只是小两口儿口口声声说是“爱情的结合”，再加上这些日子大家都在说新事新办，三宅家就搞不清怎么办才好了。是的，事情的来龙去脉不会比这更复杂了。

也有可能，看到我似乎赞成这桩婚事，他们觉得迷惑不解。我把名声地位之类的东西看得很淡，本能地对此不感兴趣。实际上，我这辈子从来没有对自己的社会地位有很清楚的认识，即使现在，某件事，或某人说的什么话，使我想起我所拥有的较高地位时，我还经常感到惊讶。比如那天晚上，我去了老地方“逍遥区”，在川上夫人的酒馆里喝酒，结果我和绅太郎发现里面只有我们两位客人，这种情况最近越来越频繁了。我们像往常一样，坐在吧台我们的高凳子上，

跟川上夫人闲聊，时间一小时一小时地过去，再没有别的顾客进来，我们的话便越说越亲密。后来，川上夫人说起了她的几个亲戚，抱怨那个年轻人怀才不遇，找不到称心如意的工作，这时绅太郎突然喊了起来：

“你得把他领到先生这儿来，欧巴桑！只要先生在适当的时候说一句好话，你亲戚立马就能找到一个好工作。”

“你在说什么呀，绅太郎？”我不满地说。“我已经退休。现在没有什么关系了。”

“像先生这样地位的人推荐一下，不管是谁都会买账的，”绅太郎不肯罢休。“就让那个小伙子来见见先生好了，欧巴桑。”

绅太郎说得这样肯定，我先是感到很吃惊，接着我意识到，他是又想起了许多年前我为他弟弟做的一件小事。

那应该是一九三五年或一九三六年，记得当时我只是例行公事，给国务院的一个熟人写了一封推荐信，大概就是诸如此类的事情吧。我本来根本没当一回事，可是一天下午，我正在家里休息，妻子来报说门口有客人。

“请他们进来。”我说。

“可他们硬是不肯进来打扰你。”

我来到门口，那里站着绅太郎和他的弟弟——还只是个毛头小伙子。他们一看见我，就开始鞠躬、赔笑。

“请上来吧，”我说，可他们只是一味地鞠躬、赔笑。“绅太郎，请上来，到榻榻米上坐。”

“不了，先生，”绅太郎说，一边不停地鞠躬，满脸堆笑，“我们冒昧到您府上来，实在是太失礼了。实在是太叨扰了。但是我们在家里呆不住，一定要来谢谢您才是。”

“快进来吧。好像节子正在沏茶呢。”

“不了，先生，实在是太叨扰了。太叨扰了。”然后绅太郎转向他弟弟，急促地小声说：“良夫！良夫！”

年轻人这才停止鞠躬，局促地抬头看着我。接着他说：“我将一辈子对您感恩不尽。我一定发奋图强，不辜负您的推荐。我向您保

证，绝不让您失望。我要勤勉工作，努力让上司满意。不管我将来有了什么出息，都不会忘记让我事业起步的恩人。”

“其实这不算什么。也是你本来应得的。”

听了这话，两人立刻一迭声地表示反对，然后绅太郎对他弟弟说：“良夫，我们已经占用了先生太多时间。不过在离开之前，你要再好好地看看帮助过你的恩人。我们真是三生有幸，遇到这样德高望重又这样仁慈的恩人。”

“是啊。”年轻人喃喃地说，抬头看着我。

“别这样，绅太郎，弄得怪不好意思的。快请进来，我们喝几杯清酒庆祝一下。”

“不了，先生，我们必须走了。像这样跑来打扰您下午的清静，实在是太叨扰了。可是我们等不及了，必须立刻来向您表示感谢。”

他们的到访——我必须承认——使我体会到某种成就感。在忙碌的事业生涯中，很少有机会停下来观望一下，但偶尔会出现这样的时刻，使你突然看清自己已经走了多远。事实摆在眼前，我几乎浑然不觉地就让一个年轻人的事业有了好的开始。早在几年前，这样的事情是无法想象的，我竟然已经达到了这样高的地位，自己却还没有意识到。

“今非昔比，许多事情都变了，绅太郎，”那天夜里我在川上夫人的酒馆里说道，“我现在退休了，已经没有那么多关系。”

其实我心里也知道，绅太郎的断言也有一定的道理。如果我愿意去试一试，说不定又会为我的影响力之大而感到惊讶。就像我说的，我对自己的地位从来没有清醒的认识。

不管怎样，绅太郎虽说有时候在某些事情上表现得天真幼稚，但决不应该因此就轻视他，现如今，已经很难碰到一个像他这样没有被这个时代的冷漠和怨恨玷污的人了。走进川上夫人的酒馆，看见绅太郎就像过去约十七年的任何一个夜晚一样坐在吧台旁，看见他在那里漫不经心地、以他独特的方式一圈圈地转动他的帽子，实在是一件令人欣慰的事情。似乎对绅太郎来说，什么都没有改变。他会彬彬有礼地跟我打招呼，就好像仍旧是我的学生，然后整个晚上，不管他喝得多醉，都会一如既往地称我“先生”，并始终对我毕恭毕敬。有时，他甚至会带着年轻学徒那种恳切的表情，问我一些关于技巧或风格的问题——事实上，绅太郎早就跟艺术分道扬镳了。这些年来，他把时

间都用来给图书画插图，而且我得知他目前的专长是画消防车。他整天整天呆在自己的阁楼上，画出一辆又一辆消防车的草图。但是我认为到了晚上，几杯酒下肚之后，绅太郎愿意相信自己仍是当初跟我学画的那个满怀理想的年轻画家。

川上夫人有一股促狭劲儿，绅太郎的这股孩子气经常成为她打趣的对象。比如，最近的一天晚上，外面下着暴雨，绅太郎冲进小酒馆，把帽子里的水挤在门垫上。

“哎哟，绅太郎君！”川上夫人冲他嚷道。“太不像话了！”

听了这话，绅太郎非常痛苦地抬起头，似乎真的犯了什么滔天大罪。然后他开始一迭声地道歉，川上夫人更是得理不饶人。

“我从没见过这么粗野的，绅太郎君。你好像压根儿就不尊重我。”

“得了得了，欧巴桑，”过了一会儿，我恳求她道，“够了，快告诉他你只是在开玩笑。”

“开玩笑？才不是呢。实在是太粗野了。”

就这么一路数落，最后绅太郎的样子惨不忍睹。可是有的时候，别人认认真真地跟绅太郎说话，他却认准了对方是在捉弄他。有一次，他高兴地大声谈论一位刚刚作为战争罪犯被处死的将军，弄得川上夫人十分为难。他嚷嚷道：“我从小就一直很崇拜那个人。不知道他现在怎么样了。肯定已经退休了。”

那天夜里，酒馆里来了几个新的客人，他们都不满地看着他。川上夫人为生意考虑，走到他身前，轻声把将军的遭遇告诉了他，绅太郎却放声大笑起来。

“天哪，欧巴桑，”他大声说，“你的有些玩笑开得真过分。”

绅太郎在这些事情上的无知经常令人吃惊，不过就像我说的，不应该因此而轻视他。如今还有这样没被世态炎凉玷污的人，我们应该感到庆幸才是。实际上，大概就是因为绅太郎的这个特点——始终不受世俗损害的天性——我最近这些年越来越愿意跟他在一起。

至于川上夫人，她虽然尽量不让现行的生活方式影响自己，但不可否认，几年的战争使她衰老了不少。战争前，她或许仍可以被称为“年轻女人”，战争后，似乎她内在的什么东西破碎、萎缩了。如果想起她在战争中失去的那些亲人，这就不足为怪了。对她来说，生意

也越来越难做。她肯定很难相信这里就是她十六七年前开小酒馆的那个地方。我们过去的那个“逍遥地”，现在已几乎荡然无存。她昔日的那些竞争对手早就关门离开了，川上夫人肯定也不止一次考虑过这么做。

回想她的酒馆刚开张的时候，挤在众多酒吧和小吃店中间，我还记得当时有人怀疑它能不能开得下去。确实，只要你走在那些小街小巷，总会碰到数不清的布幌，它们挂在小店的门前，从四面八方朝你逼来，每个布幌上都用醒目的字迹写着店里有吸引力的东西。当时，那片地方热闹非凡，店铺再多也不愁没有生意。特别是比较暖和的夜晚，更是人头攒动，人们不急不忙地从一个酒馆逛到另一个酒馆，或者就站在马路中间聊天。汽车早就不敢往那里开了，就连自行车也只能费力地推着，才能穿过那些挤挤挨挨、目中无人的行人。

我所说的我们的“逍遥地”，充其量就是一个喝酒、吃饭和聊天的地方。要找真正寻欢作乐的场所——要找艺伎馆和戏园子，就必须到市中心去。不过对我来说，我更愿意去我们那片地方。那里吸引了一批活跃而有身份的人，其中许多像我们一样——画家和作家，因为这里可以大声交谈直至深夜，所以都被吸引了过来。我们那群人经常光顾的小店叫“左右宫”，位于三条小街的交汇处，那里有一片铺砌的空地。左右宫不像周围的那些店铺，它占地面积很大，还有二楼，许多女招待穿着西式的或传统的服装。左右宫把所有竞争对手都比了下去，这里也有我的一份小小功劳，他们知道这点，便在角落里专留一张桌子给我们使用。实际上，跟我一起在那里喝酒的都是我的得意门生：黑田，村崎，田中——优秀的年轻人，已经声名鹊起。他们都非常喜欢聊天，我记得在那张桌旁进行过许多激情洋溢的辩论。

应该承认，绅太郎从来不属于那个精英团体。我个人倒不反对他加入我们圈子，但是我的学生中有很强烈的等级观念，绅太郎无疑并不属于第一流。实际上，我记得就在绅太郎和他弟弟到访我家后不久的一天晚上，我在酒馆的桌旁谈到此事。我记得黑田之流大肆嘲笑绅太郎兄弟对区区一个白领工作这样感激涕零。后来，学生们神色凝重地听我谈论我的观点：当一个人辛勤工作，并不刻意追名逐利，只是为了充分发挥自己的聪明才智时，名利就会在不知不觉中找上门来。这时，其中一个学生——无疑就是黑田——探身向前说道：

“一段时间以来，我一直怀疑先生没有意识到他在这个城里人们心目中的崇高地位。确实，他刚才说的那个例子充分证明，如今他的名望已经超出了艺术圈，扩展到生活的各个领域。先生对这样的敬重

感到吃惊，这是他一贯的做派。但我们在座的各位却丝毫不觉得意外。实际上可以这么说，虽然芸芸大众都对先生尊重有加，但只有我们这张桌子旁的人才知道，这种尊重还远远不够。我个人毫不怀疑，先生的名望还会与日俱增，在未来的日子里，我们最大的骄傲就是告诉别人，我们曾经是小野增二的弟子。”

这没有什么可吃惊的，每天晚上到了一定的时候，大家喝得有点微醺时，我那些弟子就开始对我百般恭维，大唱赞歌，这似乎已成为一种习惯。特别是黑田，似乎被看做他们的代言人，更是巧舌如簧。当然啦，我一向对他们的话不以为然，但这次不同，当绅太郎和他弟弟站在我门口鞠躬赔笑时，我体验到了一种暖融融的满足感。

不过，如果凭此断定我只跟得意门生交往，也是不准确的。事实上，当我第一次走进川上夫人的酒馆时，我就相信我这么做是希望那天夜里跟绅太郎好好谈谈。今天，当我试图回忆那个夜晚时，却发现我的记忆里，它已经跟所有其他夜晚的声色光影融在一起。门口高挂的灯笼，左右宫外聚集的人群的欢声笑语，烹炒煎炸的香味，还有一位吧台女侍者在规劝某人回到妻子身边——四面八方回荡着无数木屐踩在水泥地上的清脆声音。我记得那是一个温暖的夏日夜晚，我发现绅太郎不在他经常光顾的地方，就在那些小酒馆里漫无目的地找了一阵。酒馆之间虽然存在竞争，却维持着一种和睦友善的关系，因此，那天夜里我在一家这样的酒馆打听绅太郎，那位女侍者自然就不带一丝妒意地建议我到“新开的那家”去找找看。

毫无疑问，川上夫人会指出酒馆这么多年产生的无数变化——她所做的小小“改进”。但是在我的印象里，她的小酒馆今天看上去跟那第一个夜晚并无两样。人一走进去，立刻就会感受到两种不同的对比，温暖、低垂的灯盏把吧台照亮，而房间里的其他地方却一片昏暗。大多数客人喜欢坐在吧台那儿的灯光里，这时小酒馆给人一种温馨、亲密的气氛。我记得那第一个夜晚我赞赏地四处环顾，周围的世界已经发生了那么多变化，川上夫人还是一如既往的令人愉快。

可是其余的一切都改变了。今天从川上夫人的酒馆出来，站在门口，你会相信刚才是在远离文明世界的地方喝酒。周围都是一片荒凉的废墟。只有远处几座楼房的背影，使你在这里离市中心并不遥远。川上夫人称之为“战争的破坏”。但是我记得，日本投降后不久，我走在这片地区时，那些楼房许多都还竖立着。左右宫仍然存在，但窗户都被炸飞了，房顶也塌了一半。我记得当时我穿过那些破

损的房屋时，曾经怀疑它们能不能重新恢复生机。后来有一天早晨我再过来，发现推土机已经把它们统统夷为平地。

所以现在小街的另一边只是一片碎石瓦砾。政府肯定有他们的计划，但这个样子已经有三年了。雨水积在小凹坑里，在破砖碎瓦间变成一汪汪死水。川上夫人只好在窗户上蒙一层驱蚊的纱网——虽然她认为这样会影响生意。

川上夫人酒馆这边的房屋倒没有倒塌，但许多都无人居住。比如酒馆两边的房子已经空了一段时间，使川上夫人感到很不舒服。她经常跟我们说，如果她有一天发了大财，就把那些房子都买下来，扩大营业。现在她只希望有人能搬进去住。她并不在乎别人也像她一样开酒馆，只要她不再感觉像住在墓地里就行。

如果夜幕降临，你走出川上夫人的酒馆，会忍不住伫立片刻，凝望面前的那片废墟。你仍然可以就着暮色分辨出破碎的砖瓦和木头，偶尔还有管子从地上冒出来，如同杂草一样。然后你往前走，一路又经过许多成堆的瓦砾，还有数不清的小水坑在路灯下一闪一闪。

山上就是我们家，你来到山脚，在犹疑桥上停住脚步，回头眺望我们昔日逍遥地的废墟，如果太阳还没有完全落山，你可以看见那排旧的电线杆——上面仍然没有电线——顺着你刚才的来路消失在暮色中。你可以看见黑压压的鸟儿不安地聚集在电线杆顶上，似乎在等待那些曾经横跨天空的电线。

不久前的一天晚上，我站在那座小木桥上，看见远处的碎砖瓦砾间升起两股烟。也许是政府的工人正在进行一项慢得永无止境的工程，或者是孩子们在玩某种越轨的游戏。可是这两股被夜空衬托的烟，使我的心情陷入忧郁。它们就像某个废弃的葬礼上的柴堆。就像川上夫人说的，是一片坟地，如果你没有忘记昔日经常光顾这里的那些人，你就会忍不住这样想。

我把话题扯远了。我刚才是想叙述节子上个月在这里小住的情景。

我也许已经说过，节子来的第一天主要是坐在外面的阳台上，跟她妹妹聊天。我记得下午四五点钟的时候，我的两个女儿就女人的话题聊得很深，我离开她们去找我那外孙，他几分钟前跑进屋里去了。

我在走廊的时候，突然听见砰的一声巨响，震得整个房子都摇晃了。我大吃一惊，赶紧走进餐厅。白天的那个时候，餐厅基本上处于

阴影之中，我刚从明亮的阳台回来，过了好一会儿才弄清一郎根本不在屋里。接着又是一声巨响，紧跟着又是几声，还伴随着外孙的喊叫声：“呀！呀！”声音是从旁边的钢琴房里传出来的。我走到门口，听了一会儿，然后轻轻地打开门。

钢琴房跟餐厅不同，整个白天都能照到阳光。这里光线明亮充足，如果面积再大一点，在这里吃饭倒是一个理想的地方。有一段时间，我用它来存放画作和材料，但现在除了那架立式德国钢琴，屋里空无一物。毫无疑问，空荡荡的屋子吸引了我的外孙，就像先前阳台吸引了他一样。我发现他在地板上前进，一边奇怪地跺着脚，在我看来是在模仿什么人骑马跑过开阔地。他背对着门，所以过了一会儿才发现我在观察他。

“外公！”他说，气愤地转过身，“你没看见我正忙着吗？”

“对不起，一郎，我没有意识到。”

“我现在不能陪你玩！”

“实在太抱歉了。可是在外面听着声音太刺激了，我就想进来看。”

外孙继续气呼呼地瞪着我。过了一会儿，他闷闷不乐地说：“好吧。但是你必须坐下来，不许出声。我忙着呢。”

“很好。”我笑着说。“非常感谢，一郎。”

我走过屋子，在窗口坐了下来，外孙一直用眼睛瞪着我。前一天晚上一郎跟母亲来的时候，我送给他一个素描本和一套彩色蜡笔。现在我注意到素描本放在旁边的榻榻米上，周围散落着三四支蜡笔。我看见素描本的前几页已经画了东西，刚要拿过来细看，一郎突然又开始了刚才被我打断的演出。

“呀！呀！”

我注视了他一会儿，但一点也看不懂他演的是哪一出戏。他忽而重复骑马的动作，忽而又似乎跟无数看不见的敌人搏斗。他嘴里一直不出声地嘟囔着几句口号。我努力想听清，结果发现并没有具体的话语，只是用舌头打出声音。

他尽量不理睬我，但显然我的存在还是对他产生了抑制作用。有几次，似乎灵感突然离开了他，他动作做到一半就停住了，然后才又

行动起来。过不了多久他就泄了气，一屁股坐在地板上。我不知道是不是应该鼓掌，后来决定不鼓了。

“很精彩，一郎。可是你告诉我，你演的是谁呢？”

“你猜，外公。”

“唔。是不是义经大人<sup>(1)</sup>？不是？那就是将校的武士？唔。是不是忍者？风的忍者。”

“外公完全猜错了。”

“那就告诉我吧，到底是谁呢？”

“独行侠！”

“什么？”

“独行侠！银马！”

“独行侠？是个牛仔吗？”

“银马！”一郎又开始骑马奔驰，这次嘴里还发出马嘶声。

我注视了外孙一会儿。“你怎么学会扮演牛仔的，一郎？”我终于问道，但他只顾骑马、嘶鸣。

“一郎，”我加重了语气，“等一等，听我说。扮演义经大人那样的角色才有趣呢，比这有趣得多。我告诉你为什么好吗？一郎，听外公说给你听。一郎，你听外公说呀，一郎！”

也许我不经意地提高了声音，只见他停下来望着我，脸上带着惊异的表情。我继续看了他一会儿，然后叹了口气。

“对不起，一郎，我不应该打断你的。当然你想扮演谁就扮演谁，牛仔也行。你必须原谅你的外公。他刚才有点失态了。”

外孙还是瞪着我，我想他快要哭了，或者想跑出屋子。

“好了，一郎，你还是照你刚才的那样演吧。”

一郎还是继续瞪着我。然后他突然嚷了起来：“独行侠！银马！”又开始骑马狂奔。他脚踩得比刚才更凶，震得整个屋子都在发抖。我注视了他一会儿，然后伸手拿起了他的素描本。

前面四五页，一郎基本上算是浪费了。他的技巧倒不差，但是那些素描——电车和火车——刚画了一点就半途而废。一郎发现我在查

看素描本，赶紧跑了过来。

“外公！谁让你看这些的？”他想把本子从我手里抢过去，但我不让他够到。

“好了，一郎，不要不讲道理。外公想看看你拿他送你的蜡笔做什么了。这是很公平的。”我放下素描本，打开第一张画。“很不错啊，一郎。唔。可是你知道吗，如果你愿意，可以画得更好呢。”

“不许外公看！”

外孙又想把素描本抢走，我不得不用胳膊挡开他的双手。

“外公！把我的本子还给我！”

“好了，一郎，别这样。让外公看看。来，一郎，把那边的那些蜡笔拿给我。把它们拿过来，我们一起画点儿东西。外公教你。”

这话产生了惊人的效果。外孙立刻就不再争夺，跑去把地板上的蜡笔都捡了起来。他回来时，态度完全变了一——带有一种专注。他在我身边坐下，把蜡笔递给我，专心地注视着，不再说话。

我把素描本翻到新的一页，放在他面前的地板上。“让我先看你画，一郎。然后外公看看能不能帮你把它画得更好。你想画什么呢？”

外孙变得非常安静。他低头若有所思地看着空白的画纸，并没有动笔。

“你为什么不试着画画昨天看到的東西呢？”我建议道。“你第一次进城看见的东西？”

一郎继续看着素描本。然后他抬起头问道：“外公以前是个有名的画家吗？”

“有名的画家？”我笑了起来。“我想你可以这么说。这是你妈妈说的吗？”

“爸爸说你曾经是个有名的画家，后来不得不结束了。”

“我退休了，一郎。每个人到了一定的年纪都要退休的。年纪大了，应该休息休息了。”

“爸爸说你不得不结束，因为日本战败了。”

我又笑了起来，伸手拿过素描本。我一页页地往后翻，看我外孙画的电车，并把本子举远了端详。“到了一定的年纪，一郎，你就不想再干，想休息了。你爸爸到了我这个年纪，也会停止工作。有朝一日，你像我这样老了，也会想要休息的。好了”——我又翻到那页白纸，把本子重新放到他面前——“你想给我画什么呢，一郎？”

“餐厅里的那幅画是外公画的吗？”

“不是，那是一位叫浦山的画家画的。怎么，你喜欢吗？”“走廊里的那幅是外公画的吗？”

“那是另一位画家的作品，外公的一位老朋友。”

“那么外公的画在哪里呢？”

“暂时收起来了。好了，一郎，我们还是做要紧的事吧。你给我画什么呢？你记得昨天的什么？你怎么啦，一郎？突然变得这么安静。”

“我想看看外公的画。”

“我相信，像你这样聪明的男孩子，一定能记住各种各样的东西。你看见的那张电影海报怎么样？就是有史前怪兽的那张。我相信你这样的人能把它画得很好。说不定比那张真的海报还要好呢。”

一郎似乎考虑了一会儿。然后他一翻身趴在地上，把脸贴近画纸，开始画了起来。

他拿起一支深棕色的蜡笔，在纸的下部画了一排箱子——很快它们就变成了城市楼房的轮廓。然后，城市上空出现了一个蜥蜴状的大怪物，靠后腿直立着。这时，外孙用一支红蜡笔换掉了深棕色的，开始在蜥蜴周围画出许多鲜红的道道。

“这是什么，一郎？是火吗？”

一郎继续画红道道，没有回答。

“为什么有火，一郎？跟怪兽出现有关吗？”

“电缆。”一郎说着，不耐烦地叹了口气。

“电缆？那倒挺有趣的。我不知道电缆为什么会冒火，你知道吗？”

一郎又叹了口气，继续画着。他又拿起深色蜡笔，开始在纸的底部画一些惊惶失措、四处逃窜的人。

“你画得非常好，一郎，”我评价道，“也许，为了奖励你，外公明天会带你去看电影呢。你愿意吗？”

外孙停住笔，抬起头来。“电影可能太恐怖了，外公不能看。”他说。

“我不相信，”我笑着说，“不过倒可能会吓坏你妈妈和你小姨。”

听了这话，一郎放声大笑。他一翻身，仰面躺着，又笑了几声。“妈妈和仙子小姨肯定会被吓坏的！”他冲着天花板嚷道。

“但是我们男人会喜欢的，对不对，一郎？我们明天就去。你愿意吗？我们把女人也带去，看她们会吓成什么样。”

一郎继续放声大笑。“仙子小姨肯定一下子就吓坏了！”

“可能会的，”我说，又笑了起来，“太好了，我们明天都去。好了，一郎，你还是继续画画吧。”

“仙子小姨会吓坏了的！她会想要离开的！”

“好了，一郎，我们接着画吧。你画得非常好。”

一郎又翻过身，继续画画。可是他刚才的注意力似乎已经消失。他开始在素描底部添加越来越多的逃跑的身影，全都叠在一起，看不清楚了。最后，他索性不再好好画了，开始在画的下部胡乱地涂抹。

“一郎，你在做什么呀？如果你再这么做，我们明天就不去看电影了。一郎，快住手！”

外孙一骨碌爬起来，大声喊道：“银马！”

“一郎，快坐下。你还没有画完呢。”

“仙子小姨在哪儿？”

“她跟你妈妈说话呢。好了，一郎，你的画还没有画完呢。一郎！”

可是我的外孙已经跑出了屋子，一边嘴里喊道：“独行侠！银马！”

我记不清接下来的几分钟我在做什么了。很可能就坐在钢琴屋里，看着一郎的画发呆，脑子里什么也不想，最近我这样的时候越来越多。不过，后来我还是站起来，去找我的家人。

我发现节子独自坐在阳台上，望着外面的园子。太阳还很明亮，但天气凉多了，我走到阳台，节子转过身，把一个垫子放在阳光底下给我坐。

“我们新沏了些茶，”她说，“你想喝吗，爸爸？”

我谢了她，她给我倒茶时，我把目光投向外面的园子。

虽然受到战争的破坏，但我们的园子恢复得不错，仍然能看出是杉村明四十多年前建造的那个园子。在远处靠近后墙的地方，我看见仙子和一郎正在端详一片竹林。那片竹林像园子里的其他花草树木一样，是完全长成之后，杉村先生从城里别的地方移栽过来的。实际上有人传说，杉村先生亲自在城里四处溜达，隔着栅栏往别人的园子里张望，一看到他中意的花草树木，就出大价钱从主人手里买下，移栽过来。如果真是这样，那么他的选择真是巧夺天工。最后的效果非常和谐，直到今天也是如此。整个园子有一种天然的、杂乱无章的感觉，完全没有一点人工的痕迹。

“仙子对孩子总是这么好，”节子看着他们，说道，“一郎非常喜欢她。”

“一郎是个好孩子，”我说，“一点也不像他这个年龄的许多孩子那样腼腆。”

“但愿他刚才没有给你添麻烦。他有时候很任性的。如果他调皮捣蛋，你就尽管骂他。”

“一点儿没有。我们相处得很好。实际上，我们刚才是在一起练习画画来着。”

“真的？他肯定喜欢。”

“他还演戏给我看了，”我说，“动作演得可逼真了。”

“噢，是的。他经常这样自己玩很长时间。”

“那些话是他自己编的吗？我使劲听也听不懂他在说什么。”

女儿用手掩面而笑。“他肯定是在演牛仔呢。他每次演牛仔，就假装在说英语。”

“英语？太神奇了。怪不得呢。”

“有一次，我们带他去看了一部美国牛仔电影。从那以后，他就一直非常喜欢牛仔。我们还不得不给他买了一顶宽边的高呢帽。他相信牛仔能发出他那种滑稽的声音。看上去肯定很奇怪。”

“原来是这样，”我笑着说，“我外孙变成了牛仔。”

园子里，微风轻轻吹拂着树叶。仙子蹲在后墙根的那盏旧石灯旁，指着什么东西给一郎看。

“不过，”我叹了口气说，“就在几年前，还不会允许一郎看牛仔这样的电影呢。”

节子没有回头，仍然望着园子，说：“池田认为，一郎与其崇拜宫本武藏<sup>(2)</sup>那样的人，还不如喜欢牛仔呢。池田认为，现在对孩子们来说，美国英雄是更好的榜样。”

“是吗？原来池田是这么想的。”

一郎似乎对那个石灯不感兴趣，只见他使劲拽着小姨的胳膊。节子在我身边尴尬地笑了一声。

“他太无礼了。把人拽来拽去的。真是没有教养。”

“对了，”我说，“我和一郎决定明天去看电影。”

“真的？”

我立刻看出节子的态度犹豫不决。

“是的，”我说，“他好像对那个史前怪兽特别感兴趣。别担心，我看了报纸。那个电影非常适合他这个年龄的男孩子。”

“是啊，我相信。”

“实际上，我想我们应该都去。也就是说，全家一起出动。”

节子不安地清了清嗓子。“那肯定特别有意思。只是仙子明天可能还有别的计划。”

“哦？什么计划？”

“我记得她想要我们都去鹿苑。但是没关系，可以换个时间再去。”

“我不知道仙子有什么计划。她肯定没有问过我。而且，我已经跟一郎说了明天要去看电影。他现在心思全在这上面呢。”

“是的，”节子说，“我相信他肯定愿意去看电影。”

仙子顺着花园小径朝我们走来，一郎在前面牵着她的手。毫无疑问，我应该马上跟她商量第二天的事，但是她和一郎没有在阳台上停留，而是进屋洗手去了。所以，直到那天晚上吃过晚饭，我才把这事提了出来。

餐厅虽然白天不见阳光，非常昏暗，但天黑之后，灯罩低低地垂在饭桌上，气氛倒显得很温馨。我们在桌旁坐了几分钟，读报纸，看杂志，然后我对外孙说：

“一郎啊，你有没有把明天的事告诉你小姨呀？”

正在看书的一郎抬起头，一脸疑惑。

“我们带不带女人一起去呀？”我说。“还记得我们说的话吗？她们可能会觉得太恐怖的。”

这次外孙明白了我的意思，笑了。“可能对仙子小姨来说是太恐怖了，”他说，“仙子小姨，你想去吗？”

“去哪儿，一郎？”仙子问。

“看怪兽电影。”

“我想明天大家都去看电影，”我解释说，“也就是说，全家一起出动。”

“明天？”仙子看着我，然后转向我的外孙。“噢，明天可去不成，不是吗，一郎？我们要去鹿苑的，记得吗？”

“鹿苑可以先等一等，”我说，“孩子现在盼着看电影呢。”

“说什么呀，”仙子说，“事情都安排好了。我们在回来的路上要去看望渡边夫人。她一直想见见一郎呢。而且，我们很久以前就决定了。是不是，一郎？”

“爸爸是一片好意，”节子插进来说，“但我知道渡边夫人盼着我们去呢。也许我们应该后天再去看电影吧。”

“可是一郎一直盼着呢，”我不同意，“是不是这样，一郎？这些女人真讨厌。”

一郎没有看我，显然又沉浸在他的书里了。

“你跟这些女人说，一郎。”我说。

外孙只是盯着他的书。

“一郎。”

突然，他把书扔在桌上，站起来跑出餐厅，进了钢琴房。

我轻声笑了一下。“瞧，”我对仙子说，“你们让他失望了。不应该改变计划的。”

“别说傻话了，爸爸。渡边夫人的事早就安排好了。而且，带一郎去看那样的电影是不合适的。他不会喜欢那样的电影，是不是，节子？”

我的长女局促不安地笑了笑。“爸爸是一片好意，”她轻声说，“也许后天吧……”

我叹了口气，摇摇头，又接着看报纸了。过了几分钟，显然我的两个女儿都不准备去把一郎找回来了，我便站起身，走进了钢琴房。

一郎够不着灯罩上的开关，就打开了钢琴顶上的台灯。我发现他在琴凳上坐着，侧着脑袋靠在琴盖上。他的五官挤压着深色的木头，表情气呼呼的。

“真对不起，一郎，”我说，“你不要觉得失望，我们后天再去。”

一郎没有反应，于是我说：“好了，一郎，这没有什么，用不着这么失望。”

我走向窗口。外面已经很黑了，我只能看见我和身后屋子映在玻璃里的影像。我听见另一个屋里传来女人们低低的谈话声。

“开心点吧，一郎，”我说，“没什么可难过的。我们后天再去，我向你保证。”

当我再次转过来看着一郎时，他的脑袋还是那样伏在琴盖上，但手指在琴盖上挪动，像在弹琴一样。

我轻声笑了。“好了，一郎，我们就后天去吧。我们可不能受女人的管制，是不是？”我又笑了一声。“恐怕她们觉得那个电影太恐怖了。嗯，一郎？”

外孙还是没有回答，但他的手指继续在琴盖上移动。我想最好让他自己待一段时间，就又笑了一声，返身回到餐厅。

我发现两个女儿默默地坐在那里看杂志。我坐下来，重重地叹了口气，但她们谁也没有反应。我重新戴上阅读眼镜，刚准备看报纸，仙子突然轻声说道：“爸爸，我们沏点茶好吗？”

“太感谢了，仙子。但我暂时不要。”

我们继续默默地阅读了一会儿。然后节子说：“爸爸明天跟我们一起去吗？那样我们就仍然是全家一起出动。”

“我很想去。可是我明天恐怕还有几件事要做呢。”

“你说什么呀？”仙子插嘴说道。“有什么事要做？”然后转向节子，又说：“别听爸爸的。他最近什么事情也没有。他只是闷闷不乐地在家里转悠，现在他总是这样。”

“如果爸爸跟我们一起去，就太让人高兴了。”节子对我说。

“真遗憾，”我说，又低头去看报纸，“但我确实有一两件事要做。”

“那你准备一个人呆在家里吗？”仙子问。

“如果你们都去，我就只好自己呆着了。”

节子礼貌地咳嗽了一声，然后说道：“不如我也在家呆着吧。我和爸爸还没有机会好好聊聊呢。”

仙子从桌子对面望着姐姐。“你用不着不出去玩。大老远来的，可不能整天在屋里呆着。”

“可是我真的很愿意留在家陪陪爸爸。我想我们有许多话要聊呢。”

“爸爸，瞧瞧你做的好事。”仙子说。然后她又转向她姐姐：“那么只有我带一郎去了。”

“一郎肯定喜欢跟你去玩一天的，仙子，”节子笑微微地说，“目前你是他最喜欢的人了。”

我很高兴节子决定留在家，确实，我们很少有机会不受打扰地好好聊聊。一个做父亲的，对于自己已婚女儿的生活，有许多希望了

解的东西，而又不能直接发问。但我那天晚上压根儿也没想到，节子希望留在家里陪我，是有她自己的原因的。

也许是因为上了年岁，我现在总喜欢漫无目的地在一个个屋里闲逛。那天下午——节子到来的第二天——她打开客厅的拉门时，我一定是站在那里出神很久了。

“对不起，”她说，“我待会儿再来。”

我转过身，看见女儿跪在门槛上，手里拿着插满鲜花和剪枝的花瓶，不觉小小地吃了一惊。

“不，请进来吧，”我对她说，“我并没有在做什么。”

退休以后，我有了更多自己的时间。确实，退休的好处就是可以按自己的节奏过日子，知道把辛苦和名利都放下了，心里感到很轻松。然而，我竟然不知不觉地走进了客厅——偏偏是客厅——一定是心不在焉了。多年来，我一直坚持父亲灌输给我的观念，一个家里的客厅是专门留着接待重要客人，或祭拜佛坛的，是神圣不可侵犯的，是不能被日常琐事所玷污的。因此，跟别人家相比，我家的客厅总是有一种庄严肃穆的气氛。我虽然没有像父亲那样定下规矩，但孩子们小的时候，除非特别吩咐，平常是不许她们进入客厅的。

我对客厅的尊重可能显得有点过分了，但你必须知道，在我成长的那个家庭——在鹤冈村，从这里乘火车要半天——我在十二岁前是禁止进入客厅的。那间屋子在许多意义上都是家庭的中心，在好奇心的促使下，我凭着偶尔匆匆瞥见的一两眼，在脑海里构想客厅内部的情形。日后，我仅凭匆匆几瞥的印象，便能在画布上再现一副场景，令我的同事们称奇，这个本领大概也要感谢我的父亲，感谢他在我性格成型的那些年里，无意中对我艺术鉴赏力的训练。在我满了十二岁后，“商务会”就开始了，我发现自己每星期要进客厅一次。

“我和增二今天晚上要商量事情。”父亲总是在晚饭时宣布。他说这话有两个目的，一是让我饭后自己前去报到，二是警告家里其他人，那天晚上不得在客厅附近发出声音。

吃过晚饭，父亲就进了客厅，大约十五分钟后再叫我过去。我进去时，房间里没有灯光，只在地板中央竖着一根高高的蜡烛。在那圈烛光里，父亲盘腿坐在榻榻米上，后面放着他的那个木头“商务箱”。他示意我坐在他对面的烛光里，我坐下时，明亮的烛光使房间

的其他地方都处于阴影之中。越过父亲的肩膀，我隐约可以看见那边墙上的佛坛，或壁龛周围的几件装饰品。

父亲开始说话。他从“商务箱”里取出厚厚的小本子，打开其中的几本，指给我看那一排排密密麻麻的数字。他一直用那种慎重的、严肃的口吻说话，偶尔会停住话头，抬起头来，似乎想求得我的肯定。每到这时，我便赶紧唯唯诺诺：“是的，是的。”

不用说，我根本就听不懂父亲在说什么。他满口行话术语，列举冗长复杂的计算，并不因为对方是个小孩子而有所迁就。但我似乎也不可能请他停下来详细解释。因为我发现，我被允许进入客厅，是因为他认为我已经年岁不小，能够理解这样的谈话了。我感到羞愧，同时提心吊胆，担心他随时会要求我说点什么，而不只是唯唯诺诺，那样就露馅了。一个月过去，我并没有被要求说更多的话，但我还是终日惶惶不安，担心着下一次“商务会”。

我现在当然明白了，父亲从来就没指望我听懂他的话，但我始终不能确定他为什么要让我经受这样的折磨。也许，他是想早早给我留下这样的印象：他希望我日后能接管家族的生意。

或者，他觉得我作为将来的一家之主，应该参与所有的决策，因为那些决策的影响会一直持续到我成年以后。那样，当我继承一个不尽完美的企业时，就没什么理由可抱怨了——父亲大概是这样考虑的吧。

我记得，十五岁的时候，我被叫进客厅参加另一种会议。客厅像往常一样点着高高的蜡烛，父亲坐在烛光中央。可是那天晚上，他面前放的不是商务箱，而是一个沉甸甸的陶制烟灰缸。我觉得迷惑不解，因为这个烟灰缸——家里最大的——平常是专门给客人用的。

“你把它们全都带来了？”他问。

“我照您的吩咐做了。”

我把怀里的那堆绘画和素描放在父亲旁边。纸张大大小小，大部分都被颜料弄得皱皱巴巴，放在一起显得乱糟糟的。

我默默地坐着，父亲查看我的作品。他拿起一幅画，仔细看一会儿，然后放到一边。那堆画看到一半时，他不抬头地问道：

“增二，你确定你所有的画都在这儿了？是不是还有一两张没有拿来？”

我没有立刻回答。他抬起头，问道：“嗯？”

“可能还有一两张没有拿来。”

“那么，毫无疑问，增二，没有拿来的那些画正是你自己最骄傲的，是不是这样？”

他又低下头去看那些画了，我就没有回答。我注视着他查看那堆画作。一次，他把一张画举到烛火前，说：“这是从西山下来的那条小路，是不是？你画得非常逼真，这是不用说的。正是从山上下来的景象。画得很好。”

“谢谢。”

“你知道吗，增二”——父亲的目光仍然盯着那张画——“我听你母亲说过一句奇怪的话。她好像认为，你希望以后专门从事绘画。”

他这话不像是提问，所以我没有回答。但他抬起头，又说了一遍：“增二，你母亲似乎认为你希望以后专门从事绘画。她这么想自然是错了。”

“那是自然。”我轻声说。

“你的意思是，她可能有一些误解？”

“肯定是的。”

“我明白了。”

父亲继续端详那些画作，我坐在那里默默注视他，就这样又过了几分钟。然后，他不抬头地说：“我似乎听见你母亲从外面走过。你听见了吗？”

“我好像并没有听见动静。”

“我猜想那是你母亲。既然她走过，就请她也进来吧。”

我站起来，走到门口。走廊里黑黢黢的，并没有人，我早就知道是这样。我听见父亲在我身后说：“增二，你去叫她时，顺便把你其他的画作也都一起带来。”

也许只是我的错觉，但我几分钟后跟母亲一起回到客厅时，我觉得那个陶制烟灰缸好像被挪动了，比刚才更靠近蜡烛一点。我还隐约

闻到空气里有一股烟味，可是我扫了一眼烟灰缸，并没看出有使用过的痕迹。

我把最后几张画放在先前那堆的旁边，父亲心不在焉地点头。他似乎仍然沉浸在我的作品里，并不理会默默坐在他面前的我和母亲。最后，他叹了口气，抬起头来对我说：“增二，你恐怕没有多少时间去做云游僧，是不是？”

“云游僧？我想是的。”

“他们对这个世界有许多话要说。我大部分时间都不怎么理会他们。我们应该对僧人以礼相待，虽然他们有时候让你觉得跟叫花子没什么两样。”

他停住了，于是我说：“是的，是的。”

父亲转向母亲，说：“你还记得吗，幸子，以前经常到这个村子里来的那些云游僧？我们儿子出生后不久，一个云游僧到我们家来，是个瘦瘦的老头子，只剩一只手，却长得很健壮。你还记得他吗？”

“可是那时候我们的儿子还只是个婴儿。”母亲说。她声音很低，似乎不想让我听见。相反，父亲却不必要地提高了声音，好像在跟观众讲话：

“他留给我们一个警告。他对我们说，增二肢体健康，但天生有个弱点。这弱点会使他耽于懒惰和欺骗。这话你还记得吗，幸子？”

“但我记得那个僧人还说了我们儿子许多好话呢。”

“那倒是的。我们儿子有许多好的品质，僧人确实指出来了。但是你记得他的警告吗，幸子？他说要想让好品质占上风，我们教养他的人就必须时刻提高警惕，不让这个弱点冒头。不然的话，就像那个老僧人说的，增二就会成为一个没有出息的人。”

“也许，”母亲谨慎地说，“我们不应该把那些僧人的话放在心上。”

父亲听了这话似乎有些吃惊。过了一会儿，他若有所思地点点头，好像母亲提出了一个令人迷惑的观点。“当时我也不愿意把他的当真，”他接着说道，“可是在增二成长的每个阶段，我不得不承认那个老头的话是有道理的。我们儿子的性格中确实有个弱点，这是不可否认的。他的秉性倒不顽劣，但我们必须不断对付他的懒惰，他的不求实际，以及他的意志薄弱。”

然后，父亲又沉思着拿起我的三四张画作，用两只手托着，似乎想掂一掂它们的分量。他把目光转向我，说道：“增二，你母亲似乎认为你希望以后专门从事绘画。她是不是产生了某种误解呢？”

我垂下眼睛，一言不发。接着，我听见母亲在我身边几乎耳语般地说：“他年纪还小呢，我相信这只是他孩子气的心血来潮吧。”

静默片刻后，父亲说：“增二，告诉我，你知不知道画家生活在什么样的境遇里？”

我没有做声，望着面前的地板。

“画家的生活肮脏而贫穷，”父亲的声音继续说，“这样的生活境遇，使他们容易变得软弱和堕落。我说得对吗，幸子？”

“那是自然。可是，也许有一两个画家既能追求艺术，同时又能避开这些陷阱。”

“当然，肯定有例外。”父亲说。我仍然低垂着目光，但我从他的声音里听出，他又那样迷惑不解地频频点头了。“那是少数特别有毅力、有个性的人。我担心我们的儿子远远不是这样的人，而是正好相反。我们有责任保护他远离这样的危险。毕竟，我们希望他日后成为一个令我们骄傲的人，是不是？”

“当然。”母亲说。

我迅速抬起头来。蜡烛已经燃到一半，烛光把父亲的半边脸照得轮廓分明。他已经把画作放到了腿上，我注意他正用手指不耐烦地捋着纸边。

“增二，”他说，“你可以离开了。我想跟你母亲谈谈。”

我记得那天晚上过了一段时间后，我在黑暗中遇到了母亲。我很可能是在一个走廊里遇见她的，但我记不清了。我也不记得我当时为什么摸黑在房子里溜达，但肯定不是为了偷听父母说话——因为我记得自己离开客厅后，便打定主意不去理睬客厅里的事。当然，那个时候房子的照明都很差，所以我们站在黑暗里说话也是很经常的事。我能看见母亲的身影站在我面前，但看不清她的脸。

“家里有一股烧东西的味儿。”我说。

“烧东西？”母亲沉默了一会儿，然后说道：“没有，我觉得没有。你肯定是搞错了，增二。”

“我闻到了烟味儿，”我说，“刚才又闻到了。父亲还在客厅里吗？”

“是的，他在工作。”

“他在那里做什么我一点儿也不关心。”我说。

母亲没有做声，于是我又说：“父亲点燃的只是我的雄心抱负。”

“这可真好，增二。”

“您千万别误会我，母亲。我不希望很多年后，我发现自己坐在父亲现在坐的地方，跟我的儿子讲算账和钱财。如果我成为那样的人，你会为我感到骄傲吗？”

“会的，增二。你父亲的生活还有更多内容，你年纪太小，还不可能知道。”

“我绝不会为自己感到骄傲的。我说我有雄心，指的是我希望能超越这样一种生活。”

母亲沉默了片刻。然后她说：“年轻的时候，会觉得许多事情看上去都是无聊、无趣的。但是年长一些，就会发现这些对你来说才是最重要的。”

我没有回答她的话。我记得当时我是这么说的：“我以前害怕父亲的商务会。现在它们只是让我感到厌倦。实际上，让我感到厌恶。我有幸参加的这些会议是什么呢？数小钱，点硬币，一小时接一小时。如果我以后的生活变成这样，我永远也不会原谅自己的。”我顿了顿，看母亲有什么话要说。有那么一刻，我似乎觉得她已经在我说话时悄悄走开，我现在是独自一人站在那里。然而，我接着听见她就站在我面前，于是我又说了一遍：“我压根儿就不关心父亲在客厅里做什么。他只是点燃了我的雄心抱负。”

唉，我发现我又把话扯远了。我本来是想叙述上个月节子到客厅里来换鲜花时，我跟她的对话。

我记得，节子坐在佛坛旁边，开始把装饰佛坛的那些凋谢的花枝换掉。我坐在她后面一点，注视着她小心地把每个花枝抖一抖，再放在自己腿上，我相信当时我们有一搭没一搭地说着些闲话。后来，她眼睛仍然盯在花上，对我说道：

“爸爸，原谅我提到这件事。不用说，您肯定已经想过了。”

“什么事，节子？”

“我之所以又提这件事，因为我估摸着仙子的婚事肯定会有进展。”

节子已经开始把她花瓶里新剪的花枝插到佛坛周围的花瓶里去。这件事她做得非常仔细，每插一枝就停下来看看效果。“我只是想说，”她继续说道，“一旦开始认真商议婚事，爸爸最好采取一些预防措施。”

“预防措施？这个自然，我们会谨慎行事的。可是你到底想说什么呢？”

“请原谅我，实际上我指的是调查。”

“啊，这不用说，我们会尽量彻底调查的。我们还雇用去年的那个侦探。你也记得，他是非常可靠的。”

节子仔细地调整一根花梗。“原谅我，我肯定是没有表达清楚。实际上，我指的是他们的调查。”

“对不起，我好像不太明白你的意思。我不认为我们有什么需要隐瞒的。”

节子不安地笑了一声。“爸爸千万要原谅我。您知道，我一向不擅长说话。池田总是骂我词不达意。他口才那么好。我应该尽力向他学习，这是不用说的。”

“我认为你说话绝对没有问题，但我恐怕没有完全明白你的意思。”

突然，节子沮丧地举起双手。“有风，”她叹着气说，又一次探身端详她的花儿，“我喜欢把它们插成这样，可是风好像不同意呢。”她又变得心事重重。过了一会儿，她说：“您必须原谅我，爸爸。在我家里，池田说话要清楚一些。但是他不在这里。我只是想说，也许爸爸应该采取一些预防措施。以免出现误会。毕竟，仙子已经快二十六岁。我们可再经不起去年那样的打击了。”

“关于什么的误会，节子？”

“关于过去。可是请原谅，我肯定是多虑了。爸爸无疑全都考虑到了，会采取必要的做法的。”

她坐回去，研究她的插花，然后面带微笑转向我。“我对这些东西不太在行。”她指着那些鲜花说。

“它们看上去很漂亮。”

她将信将疑地看了一眼佛坛，不自然地笑了一声。

昨天，我乘电车在静谧的荒川郊外兜风时，脑海里又一次想起客厅里的那段对话，心里一阵烦躁。车子一直往南开，景色不再那么杂乱，我望着窗外，又想起了女儿坐在佛坛前，建议我采取“预防措施”的情形。我又想起她把脸微微转向我，说：“毕竟，我们可再经不起去年那样的打击了。”接着我又想起她来的第二天早晨，坐在阳台上暗示我去年三宅家退婚另有隐情时，脸上那副意味深长的表情。在过去这个月里，我一想起这些心情就受影响。但是直到昨天，独自一人在这个城市僻静的郊外旅游时，我才更仔细地审视我的感受，我意识到，我的恼怒其实并不是针对节子，而是针对她的丈夫。

我想，一个妻子受丈夫观念的影响是无可厚非的——哪怕这些观点像池田的那样荒唐可笑。可是，如果一个人诱导自己的妻子对她的亲生父亲产生怀疑，这就足以引起愤怒了。过去，我考虑到池田在满洲肯定吃过不少苦，便一直对他的某些行为采取隐忍的态度。比如，他经常表现出对我们这代人的怨恨情绪，我从来不以为意。我一直以为这种情绪会随着时间而淡化。没想到，在池田身上，它们反倒变得越来越尖刻和不可理喻了。

这些事情如今都妨碍不到我——毕竟，节子和池田住得很远，我一年也只见到他们一次——然而，自从节子上个月来过之后，这些荒谬可笑的观念似乎也对仙子产生了影响。这使我很恼火，过去几天里，我好几次忍不住想给节子写封信，表达一下愤怒的情绪。夫妻之间互相交流一些毫无根据的想法也就罢了，但那只是他们两人的事情。换了一个更加严厉的父亲，无疑早就采取措施了。

上个月，我不止一次看见我的两个女儿在深谈，注意到她们做贼心虚地突然停住话头，然后又装模作样地说些不痛不痒的闲话。实际上，我记得在节子来访的五天里，这样的事情至少发生了三次。后来，就在几天前，仙子和我快要吃完早饭时，她突然对我说：

“我昨天经过清水百货商店时，你猜我看见谁站在车站？是三宅次郎！”

“三宅？”我吃惊地从碗上抬起头，仙子竟然这样毫不脸红地提到这个名字，“唉，真是不巧。”

“不巧？实际上，爸爸，我很高兴看到他呢。他倒显得有点不好意思，所以我就没有跟他多聊。而且我还得回去上班呢。我正好出来办事。你知道吗，他已经快要结婚了。”

“他告诉你的？真是无耻。”

“当然啦，他没有主动说。是我问他的。我对他说，我正在谈新的婆家，然后问他的婚事有什么着落。我就这么问了他一句。他的脸刷就红了！后来他告诉我，他现在已经订婚。一切都谈妥了。”

“说实在的，仙子，你不应该这么大大咧咧。你干吗非要提结婚的事呢？”

“我很好奇呀。我已经不再为这件事感到难过了。现在婚事进展顺利，那天我就在想，如果三宅次郎还在为去年的事而苦恼，该是多么不值啊。所以，你可以想象当我得知他已经订婚时有多么高兴。”

“明白了。”

“我希望不久能见见他的新娘。我想她肯定很漂亮，你说呢，爸爸？”

“肯定的。”

我们继续吃了一会儿，然后仙子又说：“我还差点儿问了他一件别的事。但我没问。”她探身向前，压低声音说：“我差点儿问他去年的事。问他们为什么要退婚。”

“幸亏你没问。而且，他们当时就把理由说得很清楚了。他们觉得那个小伙子配不上你。”

“但你知道那只是礼节上的说法，爸爸。我们一直没有弄清真正的原因。至少，我从没听说过。”这时，她的语气有些异样，使我再次从碗上抬起头来。仙子把筷子举在半空，似乎在等我说些什么。看到我继续吃早饭，她说：“你说，他们为什么退婚呢？你有没有发现其中的秘密？”

“我什么也没发现。我刚才说了，他们觉得那个年轻人高攀不上。这个理由是很说得通的。”

“爸爸，我在想是不是因为我不符合他们的要求。也许我不够漂亮。你认为是不是这样？”

“跟你没有任何关系，你知道的。退婚有各种各样的理由。”

“那么，爸爸，既然跟我没关系，我就不明白他们为什么会那样突然提出退婚。”

我觉得女儿说这番话时语气有点做作、不自然。也许是我的错觉，可是一个父亲是能够注意到女儿说话时每一点细微的语气变化的。

总之，跟仙子的那段对话，使我又想起了我那次跟三宅次郎邂逅，后来跟他在车站聊了一会儿的情景。大概就是一年以前——跟三宅家联姻的事正在商议中——一天下午五六点钟的时候，城里挤满了下班回家的人。不知为什么，我正在横手区行走，想去木村公司大楼外的电车站。如果你对横手区很熟悉，就会知道店铺楼上那些数不清的简陋破旧的小办公室。那天我遇见三宅次郎时，他正从一间这样的办公室里出来，走下两个店铺门脸之间的狭窄楼梯。

之前我曾见过他两次，但都是在正式的家庭聚会上，他穿着最好的衣服。现在他的样子截然不同，身上是一件看着很旧、有点嫌大的雨衣，胳膊下夹着一个公文包。看他的模样，活像一个被老板吆来喝去的打工者。确实，他的整个姿势都像是随时要鞠躬似的。我问他，他刚才出来的那家办公室是不是他上班的地方，他不自然地笑了，好像他从一个名声不好的场所出来被我抓住了一样。

我倒也想过，仅仅因为跟我邂逅他就这样尴尬，似乎有点过分。但当时我想他之所以窘迫，是因为他的办公楼和周围环境都很破败。约莫一个星期后，我惊讶地得知三宅家决定退婚，才发现自己又想起了那次相遇，并试图从中寻找蛛丝马迹。

“我在想，”我对节子说，当时她正好过来看望我们，“在我跟他说话的时候，他们家是不是就已经决定退婚了。”

“怪不得爸爸发现他那么紧张不安呢，”节子说，“他有没有说什么话，暗示他们的打算？”

那只是街头相遇的一星期之后，但我已经记不清我跟年轻的三宅到底聊了什么。那天下午，我以为他跟仙子的婚事随时都会宣布，就把他当成未来的家庭成员来对待。我只把注意力放在让年轻的三宅在

我面前放松下来，根本没有怎么考虑在走向汽车站的过程中，还有后来站在那里等车的几分钟里，我们究竟说了什么。

不过，当我后来考虑整个事情时，我突然产生了一个新的想法：也许正是那次邂逅导致了后来的退婚。

“这是很有可能的，”我对节子说，“我看到了三宅的工作地点，他觉得很不好意思。大概这使他又一次认识到我们两家的差距实在太。毕竟，这个想法他们经常挂在嘴上，不可能只是礼节上的说法。”

节子似乎不以为然。看来她回家后跟丈夫讨论了妹妹婚约泡汤的事。今年，她似乎带来了她自己的观点——至少是池田的观点。于是，我不得不重新回忆跟三宅的那次偶遇，从另一个角度细细品味。但是正如我前面说的，事情发生的一个星期后我都记不真切，更别提现在时间已经过去了一年。

但我确实想起了一段不同寻常的对话，而以前觉得它没有什么意义。当时，我和三宅已经走到主街上，站在木村公司的大楼前，等待我们各自的电车。我记得三宅说：

“今天我们上班得到噩耗。我们总公司的总裁过世了。”

“我很难过。他年岁已高？”

“才六十出头。我一直没机会当面见他，只在期刊上看过他的照片。他是个了不起的人，我们都觉得好像一下子成了孤儿。”

“这对你们大家肯定是个打击。”

“确实如此，”三宅停顿了一会儿，继续说道：“不过，我们办公室的人实在不知道怎样表达自己的敬意才合适。不瞒您说，总裁是自杀的。”

“是吗？”

“是的。他被人发现煤气中毒。他似乎先试图切腹自杀，肚子上有几道小小的伤痕。”三宅神色凝重地看着地面。“他是代表他管辖的几家公司谢罪呢。”

“谢罪？”

“我们总裁似乎觉得要为我们在战争中所做的一些事情负责。两个元老已经被美国人开除了，但总裁显然觉得这还不够。他的行动是

代表我们大家向战争中遇害的家庭谢罪。”

“唉，其实，”我说，“这种做法有点太极端了。整个世界似乎都走火入魔了。每天都有报道说又有某人谢罪自杀。告诉我，三宅先生，你不认为这是一种极大的浪费吗？说到底，如果你的国家卷入战争，你只能尽你的力量去支持，这是无可厚非的。有什么必要以死谢罪呢？”

“您无疑是对的，先生。可是说句实话，公司上下倒是如释重负。我们现在觉得可以忘记过去的罪行，展望未来了。我们总裁做了一件了不起的事。”

“但也是一种极大的浪费。我们一些最优秀的人就这样放弃了自己的生命。”

“是的，先生，确实可惜。有时候我认为，有许多应该以死谢罪的人却贪生怕死，不敢面对自己的责任。结果反倒是我们总裁那样的人慨然赴死。许多人又恢复了他们在战争中的位置。其中一些比战争罪犯好不了多少。他们才应该出来谢罪。”

“我明白你的意思，”我说，“但是，那些在战争中为国家尽忠效力，战斗和工作过的人们，不能被称作战争罪犯。最近这个词恐怕用得太过随意了。”

“可是，先生，正是这些人把国家引入了歧途。他们完全应该勇于承担责任。这些人不肯承认自己的错误，实在是懦夫的做法。而且那些错误是代表整个国家犯下的，就更是一种最怯懦的做法。”

那天下午三宅真的跟我说了这番话吗？也许我把他的话跟池田可能会说的话搞混了。这是很有可能的。毕竟，我已经把三宅看做未来的女婿，所以，不知怎么一来，就把他跟真正的女婿混为一谈了。

“最怯懦的做法”听上去确实更像池田的话，性情温和的年轻的三宅不太可能这么说。不过，我相信那天在汽车站肯定有过这样的对话，我觉得他突然提起这样一个话题，委实有点奇怪。至于“最怯懦的做法”这样的话，我可以肯定三宅说的。实际上现在想来，我相信是那天晚上安葬健二骨灰的仪式之后，池田说这句话的。

我儿子的骨灰花了一年多时间才从满洲运来。我们不断被告知，那些共产党弄得那里每件事都千难万难。后来他的骨灰终于运来了，跟那次穿越雷区同时阵亡的另外二十三个年轻人一起，所以很难保证那骨灰真的是健二的，是健二一个人的。“即使哥哥的骨灰跟别人的

混在一起，”当时节子写信给我说，“也只是跟他战友的骨灰相混。对此我们没什么可抱怨的。”于是我们权当那些骨灰是健二的，在两年前的上个月为他举行了一个迟到的葬礼。

在墓地的仪式刚举行到一半，我看见池田怒气冲冲地大步走开了。我问节子，她丈夫是怎么回事，节子快速地低语道：“请原谅他吧，他不舒服。营养不良，好几个月都没缓过来。”

可是后来，参加仪式的宾客都聚集在我们家时，节子对我说：“请您理解，爸爸。这样的仪式让池田感到非常难过。”

“真令人感动，”我说，“没想到他跟你哥哥关系这么亲密。”

“他们每次见面都很合得来，”节子说，“而且，池田一向非常欣赏健二这样的人。他说跟健二在一起很轻松自在。”

“那他就更不应该中途离开呀！”

“对不起，爸爸，池田丝毫没有不敬的意思。但我们这一年参加过太多这样的仪式，池田的朋友和战友，每次都使他很生气。”

“生气？他为什么生气呢？”

这时又来了许多客人，我只好中断了我们的谈话。直到那天晚上，我才有机会跟池田单独谈谈。家里还有不少客人没有走，聚集在客厅里。我看见女婿高高的身影独自站在屋子那边。他打开了通向园子的纱门，背对嘁嘁喳喳谈话的客人，望着外面黑暗的夜色。我走到他身边，说道：

“池田，节子告诉我，这些仪式让你感到生气。”

他转过脸，微笑着说。“恐怕是这样的。我一想起这些事情，想起这样的浪费，就很生气。”

“是啊，想到这样的浪费确实令人难过。可是健二像其他许多人一样，死得英勇壮烈。”

女婿凝视着我，五官僵硬，面无表情。他经常会这么做，我总是感到非常别扭。毫无疑问，他的目光并无恶意，但是，也许因为池田是个体格强壮的男子汉，五官生得粗犷，所以很容易感到他是在威胁或谴责别人。

“壮烈牺牲似乎没完没了，”他终于说道，“我们中学同年毕业的半数同学都壮烈牺牲了。都是为了愚蠢的事业，但他们永远不会知

道这点。爸爸，您知道是什么让我感到生气吗？”

“是什么呢，池田？”

“当初派健二他们去英勇赴死的那些人，如今在哪里呢？他们照样活得好好的，跟以前没什么两样。许多人在美国人面前表现乖巧，甚至比以前更得意，但实际上就是他们把我们引入了灾难。到头来，我们还要为健二他们伤心。我就是为此感到生气。勇敢的青年为愚蠢的事业丢掉性命，真正的罪犯却仍然活在我们中间。不敢露出自己的真面目，不敢承担自己的责任。”我相信就在那时，他把身子又转向外面黑暗夜色，说道：“在我看来，这才是最怯懦的做法。”

仪式弄得我心力交瘁，不然我可能会反驳他的一些说法。但我想以后还有机会进行这样的谈话，便把话题岔到别的事情上去了。我记得我跟他一起站在那里，望着外面的黑暗，询问他的工作和一郎的情况。池田从战场回来后，我几乎很少见到他，那是我第一次认识这个变化了的、有点尖刻的女婿，而现在我已经习惯了。那天晚上，看到他那样说话，看到他参战前的那种拘谨已经毫无踪影，我感到很吃惊。但我以为是葬礼影响了他的心情，更主要的，是战争经历使他情绪失控——节子曾经向我暗示，他在战争中的遭遇十分惨痛。

没想到，我那天晚上在他身上发现的情绪，却成了他现在的一种常态。战争前两年跟节子结婚的那个谦逊的、彬彬有礼的青年，如今已经判若两人。当然啦，他那一代的这么多人都死了，可是他为什么要对长辈怀有这样的怨恨呢？我发现池田的观点有些刻薄，甚至恶毒，令我担忧——特别是它们似乎正在影响节子。

有这种变化的绝不仅仅是我女婿一个人。最近周围比比皆是。年轻一代的性格出现了一种我不能完全明白的改变，这种改变在某些方面无疑是令人不安的。例如，那天晚上在川上夫人的酒馆里，我无意间听见坐在柜台旁的一个男人说：

“听说他们把那个傻子送到医院去了。脑震荡，还断了几根肋骨。”

“你是说平山那小子吗？”川上夫人满脸关切地问。

“他叫那个名字吗？就是那个整天到处溜达、大叫大嚷的家伙。应该有人让他别那么做了。他昨天夜里似乎被人打了一顿。真不像话，不管他嘴里嚷嚷什么，也不能那样对待一个傻子呀。”

这时，我转向那个人说：“请原谅，你说平山那小子被人打了？为什么呢？”

“似乎他一直在唱那些老军歌，喊一些退步的口号。”

“可是平山小子总是那么做呀，”我说，“他只会唱两三首歌，是别人教他的。”

那人耸了耸肩。“没错，那样去揍一个傻子有什么意思？真是丧心病狂。傻子当时在茅桥上，你知道那儿夜里总有一些下三滥的人。傻子坐在桥头，又唱又喊的，大约一个小时。他们在马路对面的酒馆里听见了，其中几个人就不耐烦了。”

“这又是什么道理呢？”川上夫人说，“平山小子从来不伤害人。”

“唉，应该有人教他唱几支新歌才好，”那人说着，喝了口酒，“如果他再到处唱那些老歌，肯定还会挨揍的。”

我们仍然叫他“平山小子”，其实他至少有五十岁了。但这名字听上去倒也不是不合适，他的智力只相当于一个小孩子。在我的记忆里，他是由贫民教区的天主教嬷嬷照看的，但据说他是生在一个姓平山的家里。早年间，我们的“逍遥地”繁荣兴旺的时候，平山小子总是坐在左右宫或附近另一家酒馆门口的地上。正像川上夫人说的，他从来不伤害人，在战争前和战争中，他唱战歌、模仿政治演说，成为“逍遥地”著名的街头一景。

是谁教他唱歌的呢？我不知道。他的固定节目只有两三首歌，而且只会唱其中的一句。他总是用浑厚有力的声音唱歌，为了取悦观众，他还会双手叉腰站在那里，笑嘻嘻地望着天空，喊道：“这个村子必须向皇军献礼！你们有些人会献出生命！你们有些人会凯旋，迎接新的黎明！”——以及诸如此类的话。人们总是说：“平山小子也许并不明白这些话的意思，但他的架势摆得很到位。是个十足的日本人。”我经常看见人们停下来给他钱，或买东西给他吃，每逢这时，傻子脸上就会绽开笑容。毫无疑问，平山小子之所以迷恋这些政治歌曲，是因为它们为他赢得了公众的关注。

那些日子没有人照顾傻子。人们到底是怎么回事，竟然想到要去揍他呢？他们大概不喜欢他的唱歌和演说，可是，很可能当初就是他们拍着傻子的脑袋，称赞他鼓励他，直到那些片段在他脑海里扎下根来。

正像我说的，最近国家的情绪都有了变化，池田的态度大概绝不是例外。我若认为年轻的三宅也怀有这样的怨恨情绪，恐怕有失公允，可是就目前的情形来看，如果你仔细研究每个人对你说的每句话，似乎都会发现其中贯穿着同样的怨恨情绪。据我所知，三宅确实说过诸如此类的话。也许三宅和池田那一代人都会这样想、这样说。

我想我已经提到，昨天我乘车前往城市南部的荒川区。荒川是城市往南的公路线的最后一站，许多人看到汽车开到这么远的郊外，都表示意外。确实，荒川的街道清扫得干干净净，人行道上栽种着一排排枫树，互相隔开的房屋显得气派非凡，周围一派田园景色，使人很难把它当成城市的一部分。但是在我看来，当局把公路线延伸到荒川是很正确的。住在城里的人从中受益匪浅，他们很容易就能接触到比较清静、远离尘嚣的环境。我们并不是一直有这么便利的条件，我至今记得住在城里那种逼仄压抑的感觉，特别是漫长而炎热的夏天，在目前的公路线开通之前，这种感觉着实令人难受。

我相信，目前的路线是一九三一年开通的，取代了三十年来那条不完善的、令乘客十分不满的线路。如果你那时不住在这里，便很难想象这些新的路线对城市许多方面产生的巨大影响。所有的地区似乎都在一夜之间变了模样。原本拥挤繁忙的公园无人问津了，老字号店铺的生意严重受损。

当然啦，另外一些地区意外地发现得了好处，其中就有犹疑桥对面的那片地方，它很快就变成了我们的逍遥地。在新的公路线开通之前，你会发现那里只有几条冷清清的小街巷和一排排瓦房。当时谁也没把这地方当回事儿，说起来只是“古川东边”。新的公路线一开通，在终点站古川站下车的乘客，走几步路就能到达市中心，比乘坐第二条曲里拐弯的电车路线还要快捷，结果就是，在那片地区步行的人突然变得熙熙攘攘。在那里开业的十几家酒馆，经过多少年的惨淡经营，一下子生意兴隆，新的酒馆也一家接一家地开张。

后来成为左右宫的那家酒馆，当时只是叫“山形酒馆”——山形就是店老板，一位退伍老兵——这家是那个地区年头最久的一家。当时它显得有点单调，但我从第一次进城之后，许多年里一直是它的常客。在我的记忆中，直到新的公路线开通了几个月之后，山形才明白周围发生了什么事，开始另做打算。那片地方将要发展成为一应俱全的饮酒一条街，他自己的酒吧——历史最为悠久，位于三条路的交叉口——自然在当地的诸多酒吧中成了元老。因此，他觉得自己有责任扩大营业范围。他楼上的商家巴不得把生意转手卖掉，必要的资金也

很容易就能筹措到。无论从他的酒吧，还是从整个这片地区来说，最大的障碍就是城市官方的态度。

在这一点上，山形的想法无疑是正确的。当时正值一九三三年或一九三四年——你恐怕记得，那个时候考虑建立一个新的娱乐区是不合时宜的。当局一直在煞费苦心制定政策，严格控制城市生活中的浮华，确实，在市中心，许多更加颓废的场所正在停业关闭。我听着山形的想法，起初不以为然。后来他跟我描述了他脑海里的蓝图，我才深受触动，答应尽力助他一臂之力。

我相信前面已经提到，左右宫的存在有我一份小小的功劳。当然啦，我不是一个富人，在经济上无能为力。但那个时候，我在这个城里已经有了一定的声望。我记得当时我还没有在国务院的艺术委员会供职，但在那里有许多熟人，他们经常向我咨询政策上的事。因此，我代表山形向当局提出请求还是有一定分量的。

“店主打算，”我解释说，“酒馆的主题就是颂扬当今日本正在涌现的新的爱国精神。酒馆的装潢将会体现这种新精神，如果顾客与这种精神格格不入，就坚决要求他离开。还有，店主打算让他的酒馆成为本城画家和作家的聚集地，让那些其作品最能反映新精神的艺术家聚在这里饮酒。关于这最后一点，我已经得到我的许多同仁的支持，其中有画家原田雅之，剧作家三角，记者尾辻繁雄和夏希英二——你们知道，他们的作品都是坚定地效忠于天皇陛下的。”

我接着指出，这样一个酒馆，考虑到它在这里的权威地位，肯定会给这个地区奠定一种令人称许的基调。

“不然的话，”我警告道，“我担心我们又将面对一个以颓废为特征的地区，而我们一直在尽力对抗这种颓废，知道它一直在削弱我们的文化结构。”

当局的反应可不仅仅是默许，而是非常热情，令我感到意外。我想，这又一次说明，人有时候会突然发现他的地位远比他自以为的要高。我从来不把地位放在心上，所以带给我这么大成就感的并不是左右宫的开业，而是我很骄傲地看到我一段时间以来坚持的观点得到了支持——也就是说，日本的新精神与自我享受并不矛盾；也就是说，没有理由把寻找快乐跟颓废相提并论。

于是，新干线开通之后大约两年半，左右宫开张了。装修很讲究，很全面，每个人天黑后在那条路上溜达，都不可能不注意到那灯火通明的店面，那么多大大小小的灯笼挂在山墙上，挂在屋檐下，整

整齐地排在窗台上和门框上。还有那个悬在横梁上被照得亮亮的巨大旗帜，上面是新酒馆的名字，背景是队伍里的军靴齐步前进。

开张后不久的一天晚上，山形把我请到里面，让我选一张最喜欢的桌子，并说那桌子以后就归我一个人使用。我想，这主要是为了感谢我为他做的一点小事，同时，当然啦，也因为我一直是山形酒吧的一位常客。

确实，在山形酒吧变成左右宫之前，我已经光临它二十多年。我并非刻意挑选——就像我说的，这个酒吧并无出众之处——当我还年轻的时候第一次来到这个城市，就住在古川，而山形酒吧正好就在附近。

也许你很难想象古川那个时候有多丑陋。是的，如果你是刚来这个城市，听我提到古川区，你脑海里浮现的大概是今天的那个公园，以及那些名闻遐迩的桃树。可是，当我第一次来到这个城市时——那是一九一三年——这个地方到处都是小公司的厂房和仓库，许多都已废弃不用或年久失修。房屋老旧破败，住在古川的都是那些只付得起最低房租的人。

我住的是个小阁楼，楼下是一位老太太跟她未婚的儿子一起生活，其实很不适合我的需求。房子里没有电，我不得不点着油灯绘画。房间狭小，几乎连一个画架也放不下，画画时总免不了把颜料溅在墙上和榻榻米上。我夜里工作时，经常会吵醒老太太或她的儿子。最烦人的是，阁楼的天花板太矮，我直不起身子，经常半弓着腰工作几个小时，脑袋还时时撞在房梁上。但是那时候我被竹田公司接受，当画家养活自己，心里非常高兴，也就不太在意这些不如意的条件了。

当然啦，我白天不在阁楼里工作，而是在竹田大师的“工作室”里。工作室也在古川，是一家饭店楼上一间长长的屋子——确实很长，可供我们十五个人把画架放成一排。天花板虽然比我小阁楼的高，但中间严重塌陷，所以我们每次进屋都会开玩笑，说它又比前一天下降了几厘米。屋子从这头到那头都是窗户，本应该使我们有充足的光线作画，可是不知怎的，照进来的一道道阳光总是太刺眼，屋里看上去像一个船舱一样。还有一个问题，楼下的饭店老板不许我们晚上六点之后还留在工作室，因为那时候他的客人开始来了。“你们在上面的声音像一群牛。”他总是这么说。我们没有别的选择，只好回到各自的住所继续工作。

也许我应该解释一下，我们如果晚上不加班，是不可能按时完成工作的。竹田公司以其能在很短时间内提供大量画作而自豪。是的，竹田大师让我们明白，如果我们不能在船开走前的最后期限完成任务，那么要不了多久，客户就会去找同行的那些竞争对手。结果就是，我们每天加班加点，熬到深夜，第二天还是感到惴惴不安，因为没有赶上计划。当截止日期临近时，我们经常每天晚上只睡两三个小时，通宵达旦地绘画。有时候任务一个接一个，我们整天累得筋疲力尽，晕晕乎乎。尽管如此，我不记得我们有哪次没有按时完成任务，从这里也可看出竹田大师对我们的控制。

我跟随竹田大师大约一年之后，公司里来了一个新的画家。他就是中原康成，我相信你对这个名字没有什么印象。实际上，你没有理由接触过它，因为中原康成没有任何名气。他充其量只是在战争爆发的几年前，在汤山区一所中学谋得一个图画教师的职务——听说他现在还在那里就职，当局觉得没有理由像替换他的那么多同行一样替换他。我每次想起他，总记得他叫“乌龟”，这是在竹田公司的那些日子大家给他起的绰号，后来我们交往甚密，我一直亲切地用这个绰号称呼他。

我至今留着一张乌龟的画作——一幅自画像，是他离开竹田公司后不久画的。画面上是一个瘦瘦的、戴着眼镜的年轻人，穿着衬衫坐在一间拥挤而昏暗的屋子里，周围是画架和东倒西歪的家具，窗外的光线照亮了他的一侧脸庞。这张脸上的真诚和腼腆跟我记忆中的那个人完全吻合，在这方面，乌龟是绝对诚实的。看着这幅自画像，你可能会把他当成那种在汽车上你可以果断地用胳膊肘将其挤到一边抢占座位的人。然而，似乎我们每一个人都有各自独特的自负。如果说乌龟的谦逊使他没有隐瞒自己腼腆的性格，那么，这份谦逊可没能阻止他给自己加上一种知识分子的清高神情——我从不记得他有过这种神情。不过说句公道话，我不记得有哪位同行能够绝对诚实地画出一幅自画像。不管他多么精确地对着镜子再现自己的表面细节，画上所展示的人格特性却与其他人看到的真实情况相距甚远。

乌龟之所以得此绰号，是因为他进入公司时，我们正在赶一个特别繁忙的任务，结果，在别人能画出六七幅作品的时间里，他只能完成两三幅。起初，大家以为他动作慢是由于经验不足，便只在背后叫他乌龟。可是一星期又一星期过去，他的速度并没提高，对他的不满便增加了。很快，大家就都当面乌龟长乌龟短地叫他，他完全知道这个绰号并不表示亲热，但我记得他尽量把它当作昵称来接受。例如，如果有人长屋子的那头喊道：“喂，乌龟，你还在画你上星期开始

画的那个花瓣吗？”他就会勉强大笑几声，只当对方是在开玩笑。他显然没有能力保护自己的尊严，我记得同事们都认为这是由于乌龟来自根岸地区，当时人们普遍缺乏公允地相信，来自城市那片地区的人无一例外都是软弱的、没有骨气的。

我记得一天早晨，竹田大师暂时离开了长屋子，我的两个同事走到乌龟的画架前，指责他速度太慢。我的画架离他的不远，我能清楚地看到乌龟脸上不安的表情，只听他回答：

“请你们对我有点耐心吧。我特别希望向你们，我的前辈，学习怎么迅速地、保质保量地完成任务。过去这几个星期，我已经尽了最大的努力让自己画得快一些，可是，唉，有几幅画不得不废弃了，因为抢速度影响了质量，会给我们公司的高标准抹黑的。但我会尽力提高我在你们心目中的可怜地位。请你们原谅我，耐心地再等一段时间。”

乌龟把这番请求重复了两三遍，那两个折磨他的人不依不饶，只管辱骂他懒惰，说他依赖我们大家替他完成工作。这时，我们大多数人都放下画笔，聚拢过来。我记得，当那两个人开始用特别难听的话辱骂乌龟，我看到别的同事只是饶有兴趣地袖手旁观时，我上前一步，说道：

“够了，你们难道看不出来，你们是在跟一个有艺德的人说话吗？如果一位画家不肯为了速度而牺牲质量，那是值得我们大家尊敬的。如果你们看不到这点，那真是瞎了眼睛。”

当然啦，这已经是许多年前的事了，我不敢保证那天上午我真的是这么说的。但我确实站在乌龟一边说了诸如此类的话，这点我可以肯定。因为我至今清楚地记得，乌龟转向我时，脸上那种感激和宽慰的神情，以及在场的其他人惊愕的目光。我在同事们中间颇受尊敬——我的工作无论是质量还是数量都无可挑剔——我相信由于我的干预，结束了乌龟所受的折磨，至少那天上午如此。

你也许认为，我拿这样一件小事大做文章，有点过分。毕竟，我替乌龟辩护时所说的观点，似乎是很浅显的——任何一个尊重严肃艺术的人都会时时刻刻这么想。但是我们必须记住当时竹田大师公司的风气——以及我们大家的情绪，每个人都在跟时间赛跑，为了保住公司来之不易的名声。大家心里很清楚，我们替人画的那些东西——艺伎，樱桃树，游动的鲤鱼，庙宇——主要为了运出去让外国人看着有“日本味儿”，至于具体的风格和细节，基本上没人注意。因此，如

果我说我那天的行为显示了我日后大受尊敬的品质，倒也不是过分夸张。这种品质就是不管周围的人怎么想，都要有自己的思考和判断。有一点不可否认，那天上午只有我一个人站出来为乌龟说话。

乌龟感谢了我的挺身而出以及我后来对他的一些帮助，但那时候工作节奏太快，过了一段时间之后，我才得以跟他亲密地长谈。事实上，我相信是我刚才所述的那件事发生的近两个月后，我们疯狂的工作日程才终于有了点空当。我在多摩川庙宇的场院上溜达，我只要有点空闲经常这么做。突然，我看见乌龟坐在阳光下的一张凳子上，似乎睡着了。

我对多摩川的场院一直情有独钟，我也同意今天的那些篱笆和一排排树木确实有助于营造一种与庙宇相符的气氛。但是，如今我每次去那里，都发现自己很怀念昔日的多摩川场院。当时没有这些篱笆和树木，场院似乎更加开阔，充满生机。在那一大片绿色的草地上，可以看见零零星星的卖糖果和气球的小摊，以及变魔术和玩杂耍的即兴演出。我还记得，如果你想照相，去多摩川场院再合适不过，因为走不了多远就会看见一个摄影师，跟三脚架和黑斗篷一起挤在他的小摊位里。我在那里发现乌龟的那个下午，是初春的一个星期天，到处都是家长领着孩子。我走过去，坐在他身边，他一下子惊醒了。

“哎呀，小野君！”他喊了一声，顿时满脸放光。“今天能看见您真是好运气。哎呀，就在刚才我还跟自己念叨，如果我有一点闲钱，就给小野君买一样东西，感谢他这样善待我。可是，我现在只买得起便宜的东西，那样就太不恭敬了。所以，小野君，请让我暂时发自内心地感谢您为我所做的一切吧。”

“我没做什么，”我说，“我只是有几次说了心里话，仅此而已。”

“可是，说实在的，小野君，像您这样的人太少了。能与这样的人一起共事真是三生有幸。不管我们今后怎样分道扬镳，我都会永远铭记您的好意。”

我记得我听了一会儿他对我勇气和美德的称赞，然后我说：“这段时间我总想跟你谈谈。知道吗，我一直思前想后，我考虑在不久的将来离开竹田大师。”

乌龟惊愕地看着我。然后，他滑稽地看了看周围，似乎担心我的话被人偷听了。

“我很幸运，”我继续说道，“我的作品引起了画家和版画复制师森山诚二的兴趣。你肯定听说过他吧？”

乌龟仍然盯着我，摇了摇头。

“森山先生，”我说，“是一位真正的艺术家。很可能还是一位伟大的艺术家。我真是非常幸运，能够得到他的赏识和忠告。其实，是他认为我留在竹田大师这里会对我的天赋造成无法弥补的伤害，他邀请我去做他的学生。”

“是吗？”乌龟谨慎地说。

“知道吗，刚才我在公园里溜达时，心里这么想：‘不用说，森山先生的想法完全正确。那些做粗活的愿意在竹田大师手下当牛做马，混口饭吃，就随他们去吧。我们这些真正有雄心壮志的人，必须另寻出路。’”

说到这里，我意味深长地看了乌龟一眼。他还是那样瞪着我，脸上出现了一种困惑不解的表情。

“恕我冒昧，我跟森山先生提到了你，”我对他说，“实际上，我说我认为你在我目前的同事中间是个例外。在他们中，只有你是真正有天赋，有艺术追求的。”

“哎呀，小野君”——他笑了起来——“您怎么能这么说呢？我知道您是一片好意，可是这话太过奖了。”

“我已经决定接受森山先生的诚意邀请，”我继续说道，“我劝你也让我把你的作品拿给他看看。如果运气好，说不定你也会被请去做他的学生呢。”

乌龟看着我，一脸痛苦的表情。

“可是，小野君，您在说什么呀？”他压低声音说。“竹田大师是因为我爸爸一位德高望重的熟人推荐才接受我的。说真的，虽然我有这样那样的毛病，但大师对我一直非常宽容。我怎么能只干了几个月就这样背信弃义，一走了之呢？”突然，乌龟似乎悟出自己话里的意思，赶紧找补道：“当然啦，小野君，我绝不是指您背信弃义。您的情况不一样。我绝没有……”他说不下去了，只是尴尬地赔笑。然后，他努力控制住自己，问道：“小野君，您真的要离开竹田大师吗？”

“在我看来，”我说，“竹田大师不配你我这样的人为他效忠。效忠不是白给的。效忠的内容太丰富了。经常有人口口声声说效忠，盲目地跟从别人。而我，不愿意这样度过我的生命。”

当然啦，那天下午我在多摩川庙宇里的原话可能并不是这样。我曾经多次讲述这不同寻常的一幕，说的次数一多，这个故事就开始具有自己的生命。但是，即使我那天没有这样简洁地向乌龟表达我的想法，我也可以断定刚才这番话确实准确表达了我在人生那个阶段的态度和决心。

顺便说一句，我后来不得不在一些地方反复讲述在竹田公司的那段日子，其中一个地方就是左右宫的那张桌旁。我的弟子们似乎都对我早年的经历特别感兴趣——也许因为他们本能地想知道老师在他们那个年纪在做什么吧。总之，在那些夜晚的聚会中，我在竹田大师手下的经历经常被提出来。

“那并不是一段很糟糕的经历，”我记得自己又一次这样对他们说，“它教会了我许多重要的东西。”

“请原谅，先生”——我记得是黑田在桌上探着身子说——“我觉得很难相信，您所描述的那样一个地方，能教给一个艺术家什么有价值的东西呢？”

“是的，先生，”另一个声音说，“跟我说说那样一个地方能教给您什么吧。听上去那就像是一个做硬纸箱的作坊。”

左右宫的谈话总是这样。我跟某人谈话，其他人各自闲聊，一旦我被问到一個有趣的问题，他们便都停住自己的话头，围成一圈，眼巴巴地等着我回答。似乎他们自己闲聊时总是竖着一只耳朵，随时捕捉我可能传授的新知识。这并不是说他们不加辨别、全盘接受，恰恰相反，他们都是一些聪明的年轻人，我若没有经过深思熟虑，是不敢轻易开口的。

“在竹田那里，”我对他们说，“我学到了人生早年的重要一课。尊重老师是没有错的，但是一定要勇于挑战权威。在竹田的经历告诉我，永远不要盲目从众，而要认真考虑自己被推往哪个方向。如果说有一件事是我鼓励你们大家去做的，那就是永远不要随波逐流。要超越我们周围那些低级和颓废的影响，在过去的十年、十五年里，它们大大削弱了我们民族的精魂。”毫无疑问，我喝得有点微醉，在那里夸夸其谈了，但酒馆角落的那张桌旁的谈话经常是这样。

“是的，先生，”有人说，“我们一定都牢记在心。我们一定努力不随波逐流。”

“我认为，我们这张桌旁的人，”我继续说道，“有权利为自己感到骄傲。怪诞和浮华曾在我们周围盛行。如今，日本终于出现了一种更为阳刚的精神，而你们都是其中的一分子。实际上，我希望你们会成为新精神的先锋而得到承认。是的”——这时，我已经不只是对桌旁的人说话，而是对周围的所有听众演讲了——“我们大家聚集的这个酒馆，就是这种新精神的见证，我们在座的各位都有权利感到自豪。”

经常，随着酒越喝越热闹，外面的人也会聚集在我们桌子周围，参加我们的辩论和讲话，或只是在一旁倾听，感受这种氛围。一般来说，我的弟子还是愿意让陌生人旁听的，当然啦，如果受到无聊之徒的骚扰，或者某人的观点实在可憎，他们也会很快把他排挤出去。虽然大家吵吵嚷嚷、演讲发言直到深夜，但左右宫里很少发生真正的争吵。我们经常光顾那里的人，都被同一种基本精神团结在一起。也就是说，这个酒馆正如古川当时所希望的那样，代表了某种美好的东西，酒馆里的人可以因自豪和尊严而沉醉。

这个家里的什么地方有一张黑田的画作。黑田是我的弟子中最有天赋的，作品描绘的是左右宫里的这样一个夜晚。标题是“爱国精神”。看到这样的标题，你大概以为画面上是行进的士兵或诸如此类的东西。其实，黑田的观点是：爱国精神植根于很深的地方，在我们每个人的日常生活中，取决于我们在哪里喝酒、跟什么人交往。这是他对左右宫精神的贡献——因为他当时对此深信不疑。这是一幅油画，画面上有几张桌子，在很大程度上吸收了左右宫的色彩和装潢——最引人注目的是二楼阳台栏杆上悬挂的爱国旗帜和标语。旗帜下面，客人们聚在桌旁谈话，在前面最显著的地方是一个身穿和服的女侍者端着酒水匆匆走来。这是一幅很精彩的画作，惟妙惟肖地刻画了左右宫里那种喧闹同时又值得尊敬和骄傲的氛围。今天，每当我看到这幅画，仍然会感到一种满足感，想到我——凭着我在这个城里的一点威望——为这样一个地方的开张做出了我一点小小的贡献。

这些日子，晚上在川上夫人的酒吧里，我经常发现自己在回想左右宫，回想昔日的时光。因为，有时候川上夫人的酒吧只有我和绅太郎两位客人，我们一起坐在吧台旁那些低垂的灯盏下，免不了会产生怀旧的情绪。我们会开始谈论过去的某个人，谈到他能喝多少酒，或者他的某种滑稽的怪癖。很快，我们就努力让川上夫人回忆那个人，

在启发她的过程中，我们发现又想起了关于那个人的越来越多的有趣事情。那天晚上，这样的回忆让我们开怀大笑一场之后，川上夫人说：“哎呀，我想不起这个名字了，但要看见他的脸我肯定能认出来。”她在这种场合经常这么说。

“说实在的，欧巴桑，”我回忆着说，“他其实从来没有光顾这里。他总是在马路对面喝酒。”

“噢，对了，在那个酒馆。不过，如果看见他，我还是能认出来的。不过谁知道呢？人的变化太大了。我经常在马路上看见一个人，以为自己认识呢，就想上前去打招呼。可是再一看，心里又没把握了。”

“哎呀，欧巴桑，”绅太郎插嘴说，“那天，我在马路上跟一个人打招呼，以为他是我以前认识的人。可是那人好像把我当成了疯子。他没有理我就走开了！”

绅太郎似乎觉得这是一个有趣的故事，说完就大笑起来。川上夫人也面露微笑，但没有跟他一起放声大笑。然后她转向我，说道：

“先生，你必须去劝说你那些朋友再来光顾这个地方。实际上，每次我们看见一张过去认识的熟悉面孔，就应该拦住他，叫他到这个小酒馆来。那样，我们说不定就能重建昔日的繁华了。”

“这可真是个好主意，欧巴桑，”我说，“我会尽量记住这么做的。我会在大马路上拦住别人，说：‘我记得我过去认识你。你曾是我们这个地区的常客。你大概以为过去的一切都消失了，其实你错了。川上夫人还在，跟以前一样，一切都在慢慢地重新恢复。’”

“没错，先生，”川上夫人说，“你就跟他们说，他们会错过机会的。那时候生意就开始兴隆了。而且，先生也有责任把过去那些人再召集起来。在这里，大家总是把先生当成天然的领袖呢。”

“说得好，欧巴桑，”绅太郎说，“古时候，如果一个将军的士兵在一场战役后失散了，他会很快把他们重新召集到一起。先生也差不多是这个地位。”

“胡说什么呀。”我大笑着说。

“是这样的，先生，”川上夫人继续说道，“你重新找到那些老人，把他们叫回来。然后，过一阵子，我就把隔壁的房子也盘下来，开一个像过去那样的大酒馆。跟过去的大酒馆一模一样。”

“是的，先生，”绅太郎还在那里说着，“将军必须把他的人重新召集起来。”

“这个想法很有趣，欧巴桑，”我说，“你知道吗，左右宫曾经也是个很小的地方。比这间酒馆大不了多少。我们逐渐地就把它变成了后来的规模。是啊，也许我们只需如法炮制，让你这个地方也兴隆起来。现在局势稳定一些了，那些顾客会回来的。”

“你可以把你所有的画家朋友都带回来，先生，”川上夫人说，“过不了多久，报社那些人也就都跟来了。”

“多么有趣的想法。我们倒是可能促成这件事。只是我担心，欧巴桑，你恐怕应付不了这样大的一个酒馆。我们可不想让你过分劳累啊。”

“胡说，”川上夫人说，做出一副嗔怒的样子，“只要先生赶紧去做他分内的事，你们就会看到这里的一切都会料理得井井有条。”

最近我们总是一遍遍地重复这样的谈话。谁说过去的逍遥地不会再回来？我和川上夫人这样的人，可能是把这件事当成玩笑来说，但是在说说笑笑的背后，隐隐地有一种严肃的乐观情绪。“将军必须把他的人召集回来。”也许他确实应该这么做。也许，等仙子彻底有了归宿之后，我就会开始认真考虑川上夫人的计划。

我想，我这里应该提一句，战争结束后我只见过我以前的门徒黑田一次。很偶然的，在一个雨天的早晨，在占领后的第一年——左右宫和其他那些建筑物都还没有被摧毁。我步行去某个地方，正好路过昔日逍遥地的废墟，我从雨伞下面注视着那些断壁残垣。我记得那天有许多工人在周围闲逛，所以一开始我并没有留意站在那里看着一座被烧毁的楼房的那个身影。后来快要走过时，我才意识到那个人已经转过身来，正注视着我。我停住脚步，转过头，透过伞上滴滴答答的雨水，赫然看见黑田面无表情地望着我，我内心顿时一种异样的震惊。

黑田打着伞，没戴帽子，穿着一件深色的雨衣。他身后被烧焦的楼房正在滴水，残缺不全的排水管正在把大量的雨水泼溅在离他不远的地方。我记得一辆卡车在我们俩之间驶过，车上全是建筑工人。接着，我注意到他的雨伞断了一根钢条，使更多的雨水溅在他的脚边。

战前，黑田的脸圆乎乎的，现在却颧骨高凸，腮帮子都瘪了进去，下巴上和脖子里出现了深深的纹路。我站在那里就想：“他已经

不再年轻了。”

他轻轻地转了转头。我不知道他是想鞠躬，还是调整一下脑袋，躲开破伞溅下来的雨水。然后，他一转身，朝另一方向走去了。

但是我在这里并不想细说黑田的事。实际上，如果不是上个月在电车上跟佐藤博士偶然相遇，意外地提到他的名字，我根本不会想到他的。

那天下午，我终于带一郎去看他的怪兽电影——前一天因为仙子的固执，我们没有去成。我和外孙是自己去的，仙子不肯看电影，节子又一次主动提出留在家里。当然啦，仙子觉得这电影太幼稚了，但是一郎却对女人的行为有自己的解释。那天我们坐下来吃午饭时，他还在说：

“仙子小姨和妈妈不去了。这电影对女人来说太恐怖了。她们会被吓坏的，是不是这样，外公？”

“是的，我想你说得对，一郎。”

“她们肯定会被吓坏的。仙子小姨，你害怕了，不敢去看电影，是不是？”

“哦，是的。”仙子说着，做出害怕的样子。

“就连外公也害怕了。你看，就连外公也害怕了。他还是个男人呢。”

那天下午，我站在门口准备出发去看电影，目睹了一郎和他母亲之间的奇怪一幕。节子在给一郎系鞋带，我却看见一郎不停地想对她说些什么。每次节子说：“你说什么，一郎，我听不见。”他就气呼呼地瞪着眼睛，然后飞快地扫我一眼，看我有没有听见。最后，鞋带终于系好了，节子弯下腰，让一郎对着她的耳朵说。然后她点点头，回屋里去了。片刻之后拿着一件雨衣出来，叠得好好的交给一郎。

“不太可能下雨。”我望着前门外面，说道。确实，户外阳光灿烂。

“没关系，”节子说，“一郎愿意带着雨衣。”

他这么坚持要带雨衣，使我感到费解。我们来到阳光下，下山朝车站走去，这时我看见一郎走起路来摇摇摆摆的——似乎挂在胳膊上

的那件雨衣把他变成了亨弗莱·鲍嘉<sup>(3)</sup>那样的人。于是我想，他大概是想模仿他的某本漫画书上的英雄吧。

大概快要走到山脚下时，一郎突然大声说道：“外公，你以前是个有名的画家。”

“我想是的，一郎。”

“我叫仙子小姨把外公的画拿给我看看。可是她不肯。”

“唔。它们暂时都收起来了。”

“仙子小姨不听话，是不是，外公？我叫她把外公的画拿给我看，她为什么不拿给我看？”

我笑了起来，说道：“我不知道，一郎。也许她忙着做别的事情吧。”

“她不听话。”

我又笑了一声，说：“我想是的，一郎。”

从我们家走到车站要十分钟。先下山走到河边，再顺着新修的水泥堤坝往前走，往北的新干道就在新的住房小区的那头跟公路汇合。上个月那个阳光灿烂的下午，我和外孙乘车到市中心去，途中我们遇到了佐藤博士。

我意识到我还没有怎么谈到佐藤一家，其长子就是目前正跟仙子商议婚事的年轻人。总的来说，佐藤一家跟去年三宅家的人完全不同。当然，三宅一家是正经体面的人，但说句公道话，他们不能被称为有名望的家族，而佐藤一家，毫不夸张地说，当属名门望族。尽管我和佐藤博士以前并不很熟，但我对他在艺术界的活动一向并不陌生，许多年来，每逢在路上遇见，我们总要彬彬有礼地问候几句，以表示知道对方的名气。然而，当我们上个月相遇时，情况自然就不一样了。

电车一直要过了古平站对面河上的金属桥才会变得拥挤，因此，佐藤博士在我们后一站上车时，在我们旁边找到了一个空座位。不可避免地，我们的谈话一开始有点尴尬，因为婚事刚刚开始商议，正处于微妙的阶段，拿出来公开谈论似乎还不合适，而如果假装没这回事，未免又有点可笑。最后，我们都开始夸赞“我们共同的朋友京先生”的功绩——他是这桩婚事的牵线人——然后佐藤博士微笑着说：“但愿他的努力能使我们很快再次相见。”关于这件事，我们也只能

说到这个份儿上了。我忍不住注意到，佐藤先生面对有些尴尬的局面镇定自若，而三宅一家去年从头到尾处理事情都那么不得体，这其中的差别太明显了。不管最后的结果如何，跟佐藤家这样的人打交道，使人心里感到很踏实。

我们主要谈论一些无关紧要的小事。佐藤先生的态度和蔼可亲，他探过身来问一郎出来高不高兴，又问我们要去看什么电影，我的外孙跟他说话一点也不拘束。

“真是好孩子。”佐藤博士赞赏地对我说。

就在佐藤博士快要到站的时候——他已经把帽子又戴上了——他突然说道：“我们还有一位共同的熟人呢，他叫黑田先生。”

我看着他，感到有点吃惊。“黑田先生，”我说，“啊，肯定是我以前收作门徒的那个年轻人了。”

“没错。我最近见过他，他碰巧提到您的名字。”

“是吗？我已经有一段时间没见到他了。从战争之前就一直没见到。黑田先生最近怎么样？他在做什么？”

“我相信他准备在新的上町学院担任一个职位，教美术课。所以我才碰到了他。学院好意请我去给他们做就业指导。”

“啊，那么您跟黑田先生并不熟悉。”

“是啊，但我估计今后能经常见到他。”

“是吗？”我说。“这么说黑田先生还记得我，真难为他了。”

“是啊，没错。我们在谈论一件事的时候他提到了您的名字。我还没有机会跟他长聊。如果我再看到他，会告诉他我见到了您。”

“啊，那是。”

电车正在驶过金属桥，车轮发出哐啷哐啷的巨大噪音。一郎一直跪在座位上看窗外的风景，这时指着下面水里的什么东西。佐藤先生转脸去看，又跟一郎交谈了几句，看他的车站要到了，便站起身来。他又暗示了一下“京先生的努力”，便鞠一个躬，下车去了。

像往常一样，过了桥的那一站上车的人很多，我们坐在车上就不太舒服了。后来，在电影院门前下车时，我一眼就看见那张海报很醒目地贴在入口处。外孙两天前画的那张草图还是挺像的，只是海报上

没有火。一郎记得的其实是那些撞击的线条——很像一道道的闪电——画家以此来强调蜥蜴巨怪的凶猛。

一郎走到海报前，高声大笑起来。

“一眼就看得出来是人造的怪兽，”他指着说，“谁都看得出来。它是个假的。”说着又笑。

“一郎，不要这么高声地笑。大家都在看你呢。”

“可是我忍不住。这个怪兽太像假的了。谁会害怕这样的东西呢？”

我们在里面坐定，电影开始以后，我才发现了他那件雨衣的真正用途。电影放到十分钟时，我们听见阴森森的音乐，银幕上出现一个黑黢黢的山洞，里面迷雾缭绕。一郎轻声说：“没关系。等有趣的事情发生的时候，你告诉我好吗？”说着，他就把雨衣蒙在了头上。片刻之后，随着一声巨吼，蜥蜴巨怪从山洞里出来了。一郎用手一把抓住了我的胳膊，我看了他一眼，发现他的另一只手抓住雨衣，把脑袋蒙得紧紧的。

在看电影的整个过程中，那件雨衣几乎一直蒙在他头上。偶尔，我的胳膊被摇晃着，一个声音从雨衣下面传出来问道：“开始有意思了吗？”我就不得不小声给他描述银幕上的情景，最后雨衣好歹露出了一道小缝。不出几分钟——只要一有怪兽出现的迹象——那道小缝就会合上，他的声音就会说：“没关系。等有了好玩的东西，别忘了告诉我。”

回到家里，一郎却因看了电影而兴高采烈。“我从来没看过这么棒的电影。”他不住地说，我们坐下来吃晚饭时，他还在那里向我们发表评论。

“仙子小姨，我来告诉你下面是怎么回事好吗？可吓人了。要我告诉你吗？”

“我太害怕了，一郎，连饭都吃不下了。”仙子说。

“我警告你，后面还要更可怕呢。还想听我说吗？”

“哦，我不知道，一郎。你已经把我吓坏了。”

我本来不想在饭桌上提到佐藤博士，使话题变得严肃，可是要讲述这一天的经历，自然就会提到我们的见面。于是，一郎停住话头

时，我就说：“顺便说一句，我们在车上碰到佐藤博士了。他正坐车去看什么人。”

听了我的话，两个女儿都停止吃饭，惊讶地看着我。

“但是我们没有说什么重要的事，”我轻轻笑了一声说，“其实就说了几句玩笑话。仅此而已。”

两个女儿看上去将信将疑，但又开始吃饭了。仙子扫了一眼姐姐，节子便说：“佐藤博士好吗？”

“看上去很好。”

我们默不作声地吃了一会儿。也许一郎又开始谈论电影了。总之，我过了一会儿才说：

“真奇怪，佐藤博士竟然见到了我以前的一個弟子。就是黑田。似乎黑田要在新的学院里任职了。”

我从碗边抬起目光，看见两个女儿又停了筷子。显然，她们刚才交换了目光，我又像上个月有几次那样明确感觉到她们议论过我的什么事。

那天晚上，我和两个女儿又坐在桌旁看报纸和杂志，突然房子里什么地方传来有节奏的重击声。仙子惊慌地抬起头，节子说：

“是一郎。他睡不着觉的时候就会这么做。”

“可怜的一郎，”仙子说，“他肯定会一直梦见怪兽。爸爸好坏，带他去看那样一部电影。”

“胡说，”我说，“他看得很开心。”

“我认为是爸爸自己想看，”仙子调皮地笑着对姐姐说，“可怜的一郎。被硬拽着去看了一部那么可怕的电影。”

节子一脸尴尬地转向我。“爸爸带一郎去看电影也是一片好意。”她喃喃地说。

“可一郎现在睡不着觉了，”仙子说，“带他去看那样的电影真是荒唐。不，节子，你呆着别动，我去。”

节子看着妹妹离开房间，然后说道：

“仙子对孩子真好啊。我们回家后，一郎会想她的。”

“是啊。”

“她总是对孩子这么好。爸爸，你还记得吗？她以前总是陪木下家的小孩子玩那些游戏。”

“是啊。”我笑着说。然后我补充道：“木下家的男孩子现在已经长大，不愿意过来玩了。”

“仙子总是对孩子这么好，”节子又说了一遍，“看到她这把年纪还没有出嫁，真让人难受。”

“是啊。对她来说，战争来得真不是时候。”

我们接着看报纸和杂志。过了一会儿，节子说：

“今天下午真巧啊，在车上遇到佐藤博士。他似乎是个很有风度的绅士。”

“没错。听别人说，他的儿子也没给父亲丢脸。”

“是吗？”节子说，若有所思。

我们继续看报纸和杂志。过了一会儿，女儿又一次打破了沉默。

“佐藤博士跟黑田先生熟悉吗？”

“只是有点认识，”我从报纸上抬起目光，说道，“他们好像在什么地方见过。”

“不知道黑田先生最近怎么样了。我记得他以前经常上这儿来，你们在客厅里一谈就是好几个小时。”

“我也不知道黑田的近况。”

“请原谅，可是我想，爸爸最近是不是应该去拜访一下黑田先生呢？”

“拜访他？”

“黑田先生。也许还有另一些类似的老熟人。”

“我好像不太明白你的意思，节子。”

“请原谅，我只是想建议爸爸，可能应该跟过去的某些熟人谈谈。也就是说，赶在佐藤家请的侦探之前。毕竟，我们不希望出现任何不必要的误解。”

“是的，我想也是。”我说，然后接着看报纸。

我相信我们没有继续谈论这件事。节子上个月住在这里时也没有再提这个话题。

昨天，我乘车去荒川，灿烂夺目的秋阳洒满整个车厢。我有一段时间没去荒川了——实际上，自从战争结束后就没有去过——我望着窗外，发现原本熟悉的景色有了许多变化。经过户阪和荣町时，我看见记忆中的那些小木屋间赫然耸立着一些砖结构的公寓楼。后来，车从南町的那些工厂后面驶过，我看见许多工厂变得十分破败。一个厂院又一个厂院，都乱糟糟地堆着破木头和波纹金属，有时候索性就是一片破砖碎瓦。

可是，当车开过河上的THK公司大桥后，气氛出现了戏剧性的变化。车在田野和丛林间穿行，不久，公路线尽头的延绵陡峭的山岭脚下便可看见荒川郊外的景色了。汽车非常缓慢地往山下开，然后停住，下车一看，脚下是扫得干干净净的人行道，心里顿时产生一种强烈的感觉，似乎自己已经远离尘嚣。

我听说荒川丝毫没有遭到轰炸袭击。确实，我昨天看到那里跟以前完全一样。在樱桃树的浓荫下往山上走了一段，我就来到了松田智众家，这里也几乎毫无变化。

松田家不像我家那么宽敞和有特色，它就是荒川典型的那种牢固、体面的房屋。独自耸立在那里，周围一圈木栅栏，跟邻居保持着恰到好处的距离。门口有一蓬杜鹃花，还有一根粗粗的柱子扎进地里，上面标着家族姓氏。我拉了门铃，一个我不认识的四十岁左右的女人过来应门。她把我领进客厅，拉开通向阳台的滑门，让阳光洒进来，使我瞥见了外面的花园。然后她离开了我，说：“松田先生马上就来。”

我是住在森山诚二家别墅里时第一次见到松田的，我和乌龟离开竹田公司后就去了那里。实际上，当松田那天第一次到别墅来时，我在那里已经生活了大约六年。那天上午一直下雨，我们一群人就聚在一间屋里喝酒、打牌，消磨时间。午饭后不久，我们刚要再打开一大瓶酒，突然听见院子里有个陌生的声音在大叫大嚷。

那声音粗壮、果断，我们都沉默下来，紧张地面面相觑。因为我们脑海里都闪过同样的念头——是警察来找我们麻烦了。这当然是个完全没有根据的想法，我们并没有犯什么罪过。而且，如果在酒吧里

聊天时有人对我们的生活方式提出质疑，我们任何一个人都会振振有词地把他驳回去。可是，此刻意外地听到那个果断的声音喊着“家里有人吗”，我们一下子却暴露了内心的负罪感，想到我们喝酒到深夜，经常一觉睡到中午，在一座衰败的别墅里过着毫无规律的生活。

过了一会儿，一个离纱门最近的同伴才打开了门，跟那个喊叫的人说了几句，然后转过身来说：“小野，一位先生想跟你说话。”

我走到外面的阳台上，看见一个年纪跟我差不多大的面容消瘦的年轻人，站在宽敞的四方院子中央。我一直很清楚地记得跟松田的第一次见面。雨已经停了，太阳出来了。他周围是一个个水洼，还有从别墅上方那些雪松上落下来的湿漉漉的树叶。他的衣着太时髦，不可能是警察。外套裁剪得有型有款，竖着高领子，帽子歪斜在眼睛上，显出一副俏皮的样子。我出来时，他正饶有兴趣地打量着周围，不知怎的，虽然是第一次见到他，但松田那副神态却使我立刻知道他骨头里的那股傲气。他看见了我，便匆匆地朝阳台走来。

“小野先生？”

我问他有何贵干。他转过身，又朝院子里扫了一眼，然后微笑着抬头看我。

“一个有趣的地方。这里以前肯定是一座豪宅，属于一个大地主。”

“不错。”

“小野先生，我叫松田智众。实际上我们有过通信。我在冈田——武田协会工作。”

如今冈田——武田协会已经不存在了——是占领军的众多牺牲品之一——但你很可能听说过它，或至少听说过战前每年一次它举行的画展。那个时候，冈田——武田展览是本城绘画界和版画界涌现的艺术家们想要取得公众认可的主要渠道。这个展览名望很高，后来一些年里，本城的大多数一流画家都拿出自己的最新大作，跟那些新秀的作品放在一起展出。就在松田来访的那个下午的几个星期前，冈田——武田协会曾写信跟我谈到这个展览的事。

“您的回信勾起了我的好奇心，小野先生，”松田说，“所以我想登门拜访，弄清是怎么回事。”

我冷冷地看着他，说：“我相信我在回信里已经把话讲得很清楚了。不过，非常感谢您的来访。”

他眼睛周围隐约浮现出一点笑意。“小野先生，”他说，“在我看来，您正在放弃一个提升自己名望的重要机会。因此请您告诉我，您一再表示不愿跟我们发生关系，这是您本人的想法吗？还是您的老师替您做了这个决定？”

“我当然要征求老师的意见。我最近那封信里表达的决定是正确的，对此我深信不疑。非常感谢您拨冗来访，但是很遗憾，我现在正忙着，不能请您进来。就祝您一切顺利吧。”

“等一等，小野先生，”松田说，笑容里嘲讽的意味更明显了，“不瞒您说，我并不关心展览的事。有资格参展的人多得是。小野先生，我之所以上这儿来，是因为我想见见您。”

“是吗？真不敢当。”

“是的。我是想说，我看了您的作品很受触动。我相信您是很有天分的。”

“您过奖了。我无疑是多亏老师的精心调教。”

“那是那是。好了，小野先生，我们忘掉这个展览吧。请您理解，我并不是只在冈田——武田协会当一个办事员。我也是真正热爱艺术的。我也有我的信念和热情。每当发现某人具有令我兴奋的才华时，我就觉得一定要做点什么才好。我很愿意跟您交换一些想法，小野先生。这些想法您也许从未有过，而我慎重地认为，它们肯定对您作为一个艺术家的发展大有好处。我现在就不多占用您的时间了。请允许我至少留下我的名片吧。”

他从钱包里掏出名片，放在阳台的边缘，然后很快地鞠了一躬，转身离开。在院子里刚走到一半，他又转过身，大声对我说：“请认真考虑一下我的请求，小野先生。我只是希望跟您交换一些想法，仅此而已。”

那已经是近三十年前的事了，我们都还年轻，雄心勃勃。昨天，松田看上去判若两人。他身体欠佳，病病恹恹，原本帅气高傲的面孔如今也变了形，下巴耷拉着，好像跟脸的上半部脱了节。刚才前来应门的那个女人搀他进屋，扶他坐了下来。屋里只剩下了我们两个人时，松田看着我说：

“你倒好像还挺硬朗的。至于我嘛，你看得出来，自从上次见面之后，我是一天不如一天啊。”

我表达了同情，并说他看上去没有那么糟糕。

“别想骗我了，小野，”他笑着说，“我知道我是越来越不中用了。看来也没有什么办法了。我只能等着瞧，看我的身体是逐渐恢复呢，还是越来越糟。好了，别再说这些令人不快的话题了。你又能来看我真是令人惊喜。我们上次分手好像并不愉快。”

“是吗？我可并没有意识到我们吵架了。”

“当然没有。干吗要吵架呢？我很高兴你又来看我。从我们上次见面到现在，肯定有三年了。”

“我想是的。我不是故意躲着你。我一段时间以来一直想过来看你，但总是这个事那个事的……”

“当然当然，”他说，“你的事多。请你千万原谅我没能去参加美智子的葬礼。我本来想写信表达我的歉意的。事实上，我是几天以后才知道这件事的。后来，不用说了，我自己的身体……”

“当然，当然。其实，我相信铺张隆重的葬礼会让她感到不安。而且，她肯定知道你是一直牵挂着她的。”

“我还记得你和美智子当初走到一起的情景，”他笑着说，兀自点着头，“那天我可真为你高兴啊，小野。”

“是的，”我说着也笑了起来，“你实际上就是我们的媒人。你那个叔叔根本就办不了事。”

“没错，”松田笑微微地说，“你一说我都想起来了。他太不好意思了，一说点什么、做点什么，脸就涨得通红。你还记得那次在柳町饭店商量婚事吗？”

我们都大笑起来。然后我说：

“你为我们做了很多。我都怀疑，如果没有你，事情还能不能办成。美智子总是对你心怀感激。”

“真残酷啊，”松田叹着气说，“战争把一切都毁了。我听说是一次疯狂的突袭。”

“是的。别人几乎都没有受伤。就像你说的，真残酷啊。”

“对不起，我又勾起令人痛苦的事情来了。”

“没关系。跟你在一起回忆她也是一种安慰。我又想起了她过去的样子。”

“是的。”

女人端上了茶。她把托盘放下时，松田对她说：“铃木小姐，这是我的一位老同事。我们过去关系很好。”

她转向我，鞠了一躬。

“铃木小姐既是我的管家，又是我的护士，”松田说，“我现在还活着多亏了她。”

铃木小姐笑了一声，又鞠了一躬，离开了。

她走了之后，我和松田默默地坐在那里，都望着铃木小姐刚才打开的纱门外面。从我坐的地方，可以看见一双草鞋放在阳台上晾着。但是花园本身我看不见多少，一时间，我很想站起来，走到外面的阳台去。可是想到松田肯定想陪我出去，而他的身体又不允许，我便坐着没动，心里猜想花园是不是还跟过去一样。在我的记忆里，松田家的花园虽然不大，但布置得很有品位：地上铺着柔软的青苔，种着几棵形状优美的小树，还有一方深深的池塘。跟松田一起坐在那里，我偶尔听见外面传来泼溅的水声，我正要问他是不是养了鲤鱼，他却说话了：

“我刚才说，我现在活着多亏了铃木小姐，这一点也不夸张。她不止一次起了关键的作用。你知道的，小野，虽然时运不济，但我好歹还有一些积蓄和财产，因此还能雇得起她。别的一些人就没有这么幸运了。我算不上富裕，但如果我知道某个老同事有了难处，还是会尽量帮助的。毕竟，我没有孩子，把钱留给谁呢？”

我笑了一声。“你还是过去的那个松田。喜欢直截了当。谢谢你了，可是我来的目的不是这个。我也好歹积攒了一些财产。”

“啊，这使我很高兴。你还记得中根吧？就是南帝国学院的校长？我还经常见到他。这些日子，他过得比乞丐强不了多少。当然啦，他表面上还撑着，实际上全靠借钱过活。”

“真可怕。”

“发生了一些很不公正的事情，”松田说，“不过，我们好歹保住了自己的财产。小野，你就更有理由庆幸了。你看上去还保住了你

的健康呢。”

“是的，”我说，“我确实有很多理由庆幸。”

外面的池塘里又传来了泼溅的水声，我想可能是小鸟在水边戏水。

“你花园的声音跟我那里很不一样，”我说，“只要听声音，我就知道我们是在城外。”

“是吗？我都不记得城市的声音是什么样的了。最近几年，我的世界就只有这么大。这座房子和这座花园。”

“实际上，我确实是来请你帮忙的。但不是你刚才暗示的那件事。”

“看得出来你不高兴了，”他点着头说，“还是过去的老样子。”

我们都笑了起来。然后他说：“那么，我有什么可以效劳的呢？”

“是这样的，”我说，“小女仙子，目前正在谈论婚事。”

“是吗？”

“不瞒你说，我有点替她担心。她已经二十六岁了。战争把她给耽误了。不然，她这会儿肯定早就嫁人了。”

“我还记得仙子小姐。那时候她还是个小姑娘。一眨眼都二十六岁了。正像你说的，战争把事情都耽误了，甚至把大好的前程都耽误了。”

“她去年差点儿就结婚了，”我说，“可是到了最后一刻，婚事没有谈成。既然聊到这个话题，我倒想问一句，去年有没有人为仙子的的事来找你？我没有冒昧的意思，只是……”

“一点也不冒昧，我完全理解。可是，没有，我没跟任何人说过话。去年的这个时候我病得很重。即使有侦探来找，铃木小姐也肯定会把他打发走的。”

我点点头，然后说道：“今年也许会有人来拜访你。”

“哦？那好，我肯定只会说你的好话。毕竟，我们曾经是很好的同事。”

“太感谢了。”

“你来看我让我很高兴，”他说，“不过牵涉到仙子小姐的婚事，这是完全没有必要的。也许我们分手的时候不是很愉快，但那样的事不应该成为我们之间的障碍。不用说，我肯定只会说你的好话。”

“对此我没有怀疑，”我说，“你一向是个宽厚仁慈的人。”

“不过，如果这件事让我们俩又聚到一起，我倒也蛮高兴。”

松田费力地探过身，开始给我们的茶杯里添水。“原谅我，小野，”他最后说道，“我觉得你好像还有什么心事。”

“是吗？”

“请原谅我这样冒昧地追问，但是铃木小姐很快就会进来，警告我应该回去休息了。恐怕我不能陪客人多呆，哪怕是过去的老同事。”

“当然，非常抱歉，我真是太不周到了。”

“别说傻话，小野。你暂时还不用离开。我的意思是，如果你有什么要紧的话想说就赶紧说吧。”突然，他放声大笑起来，说道：“天哪，你好像被我的无礼吓呆了。”

“没有没有。是我太不周到了。不过，事实上我只是来谈论我女儿的婚事的。”

“明白了。”

“不过，”我继续说，“我原本想把一些可能出现的情况都提一下。你知道，目前的婚事调查可能会比较微妙。希望你到时候谨慎地回答那些询问，我将感激不尽。”

“没问题。”他望着我，眼睛里闪过一丝笑意。“极度谨慎。”

“特别是，跟过去有关的事。”

“我已经说过了，”松田说，口气变得有点冷淡，“关于你的过去，我只会说好话的。”

“当然。”

松田继续看了我一会儿，然后叹了口气。

“这三年里，我几乎没有走出这座房子，”他说，“但我们国家发生的事情我还是有所耳闻。我意识到，如今那些人因为你我这样的人过去引以自豪的事情而谴责我们。我猜想你就是为这个而担心，小野。你大概认为，我赞扬你的那些话其实正是最好被人忘记的。”

“不是这样，”我赶紧说道，“你我都有许多值得骄傲的东西。不过牵涉到谈婚论嫁，还是应该谨慎行事。你让我放心了。我知道你会像过去一样公正地做出你的评价。”

“我会尽力的，”松田说，“不过，小野，有些事情我们应该引以自豪。千万别在意如今的人怎么说。过不了多久，也许再过几年，我们这样的人就能因为我们过去的努力而昂首挺胸。我只希望我能活着看到那一天。我希望看到我毕生的努力得到承认。”

“当然，我也是同样感受。至于婚事……”

“不用担心，”松田打断了我的话，“我会尽力谨慎回答的。”

我鞠了一躬。沉默了一会儿，他说道：

“小野，如果你对过去有这份担心，是不是最近一直在拜访以前的其他熟人？”

“实际上，你是我拜访的第一个。我们过去的老朋友，现在许多都不知道在哪里了。”

“黑田呢？我听说他就住在城里。”

“是吗？我一直没有跟他联系，自从……自从战争开始之后。”

“如果担心仙子小姐的终身大事，恐怕最好把黑田找出来，不管有多么费事。”

“是的。只是我不知道他在哪里。”

“明白了。但愿他们的侦探也跟我们一起找不到他。不过，有时候那些侦探是很有办法的。”

“是的。”

“小野，你的脸色真难看。你刚进来的时候看上去那么健康。这就是跟一个病人呆在一间屋里的结果。”

我笑了，说：“才不是呢。只是孩子的事确实让人操心。”

松田又叹了口气，说：“有时候别人对我说，我这辈子过得挺亏，没有结婚，没有孩子。可是我看看周围，似乎生孩子除了操心没有别的。”

“事实差不多就是这样。”

“不过，”他说，“想到可以把财产留给孩子，倒也是一个安慰。”

“是啊。”

几分钟后，正如松田预言的，铃木小姐进来了，对他说了几句话。松田无奈地笑着对我说：

“我的护士来接我了。当然啦，欢迎你留在这里，想呆多久就呆多久。请原谅我失陪了，小野。”

后来，我在终点站等汽车把我送上山、送回城时，想到松田的保证，“关于你的过去，我只会说好话的”，我内心感到一阵宽慰。其实，就算我不去登门拜访，我也有理由相信他会这么做。但是跟老同事重新建立联系总是好的。总之，昨天的荒川一行还是很有收获。

---

\(1\) 日本平安时代末期的武将。

\(2\) 日本战国末期与德川幕府前期的剑术家、兵法家。

\(3\) 好莱坞银幕硬汉。

一九四九年四月

一星期有三四个晚上，我仍然发现自己顺着那条小路，下山走到河边和那座小木桥，战前就住在这里的一些人依旧管那座桥叫“犹疑桥”。我们之所以还这么叫它，是因为就在不久之前，过了桥就进入了我们的逍遥地，你会看见那些所谓良心不安的人在那里犹豫不决地徘徊，不知道是寻欢作乐地度过一晚上呢，还是回家去陪老婆。不过，如果有时候看到我站在那座桥上，若有所思地倚着栏杆，我可不是在那儿犹豫。我只是喜欢在太阳落山时站在那里欣赏景色，观察周围正在发生的变化。

在我刚才过来的山脚下，已经出现了一簇簇新的楼房。顺着河岸往前看，一年前只有杂草和烂泥的地方，如今市政公司正在建设公寓楼，将来给员工们住。但是公寓楼离竣工还早着呢，太阳沉落到河面时，你会把工地当成城里某些地区仍能看见的轰炸后的废墟。

不过这样的废墟每星期都在减少。如今要想见到大片的废墟，大概要往北一直走到若宫区，或者去主街和春日町之间遭受轰炸最严重的地方。而我相信仅在一年以前，轰炸的废墟还是这个城里一种常见的风景，到处都是。比如，犹疑桥过去的那片地方——曾经是我们的逍遥地的所在——就在去年这个时候还是一片残砖碎瓦。现在每天都在施工，日新月异。川上夫人的酒馆外面，以前是寻欢作乐的人们摩肩接踵，现在正在建造一条宽宽的水泥马路，路的两边已经打好了一排排大型办公楼的地基。

不久前的一天晚上，川上夫人告诉我，市政公司提出花大价钱买下她的酒馆，其实我早就想到她早晚有一天会停业搬走的。

“我不知道该怎么办，”她对我说，“在这里呆了这么长时间，冷不丁走了心里真难受。我昨天夜里一直想着这件事没合眼。我对自己说，现在绅太郎也不来了，我只剩下先生这一个靠得住的主顾。我真的不知道该怎么办了。”

这些日子我确实成了她唯一的主顾。自从去年冬天发生了那件小事之后，绅太郎就没有在川上夫人的酒馆露过面——无疑是没有勇气来见我。这对川上夫人来说是够倒霉的，因为她跟这件事一点关系也没有。

那是去年冬天的一个晚上，我们像往常一样一起喝酒，绅太郎第一次向我提到他希望在所新办的中学谋到一份教职。然后他继续向我透露，他实际上已经申请了几个这样的职位。绅太郎这么多年都是我的弟子，这样的事情自然没有理由不来征求我的意见。我完全明白，如今别的人——如他的雇主——在这类事上做他的担保人要合适得多。不过我承认，当我得知他竟然并没有征求我的意见就去申请教职时，还是觉得有点意外。去年冬天，新年过后不久的一天，绅太郎来访，我发现他站在我家门口，局促不安地吃吃发笑：“先生，我这样来叨扰您真是太失礼了。”我当时有一种类似如释重负的感觉，似乎事情正在回到更加熟悉的轨道上来。

在客厅里，我点了一个火盆，我们都坐在旁边烘手。我注意到绅太郎没有脱掉的外衣上有雪花在融化，便问他：

“又下雪了吗？”

“下得不大，先生。不像今天早晨那样。”

“很抱歉这屋里很冷。恐怕是家里最冷的屋子了。”

“没关系，先生。我自己屋里还要冷得多呢。”他愉快地微笑着，在炭火上搓着自己的双手。“能这样款待我已经太感谢了。先生这么多年一直很照顾我。先生对我的帮助，我真是数也数不完的。”

“哪里哪里，绅太郎。实际上，我有时候觉得我过去对你有些怠慢呢。虽然时间过去了那么久，但如果我有什么办法可以弥补我的疏忽的，请尽管告诉我。”

绅太郎笑了几声，继续搓着双手。“哎呀，先生，您这是说到哪里去了。我永远也数不尽先生对我的恩典。”

我注视了他一会儿，然后说道：“那么告诉我，绅太郎，我能为你做些什么呢？”

他神色惊讶地抬起头，又笑了几声。

“请原谅，先生。我在这里太舒服了，把我来这里叨扰您的目的都忘光了。”

他对我说，他很有希望得到他申请的东町中学的教职。据可靠消息，他相信对方很看好他。

“可是，先生，似乎有那么一两点，委员会好像仍然有些不大满意。”

“哦？”

“是的，先生。也许我应该实话实说。我提到的这两点，是跟过去有关。”

“过去？”

“是的，先生。”说到这里，绅太郎不自然地笑了一声。然后，他鼓足勇气继续说道：“您必须知道，先生，我对您高山仰止。我从先生这里学到了这么多东西，我会继续为我跟先生的关系而感到骄傲。”

我点点头，等他往下说。

“是这样的，先生，如果您能亲自给委员会写一封信，证实一下我所说的某些话，我将感激不尽。”

“是什么话呢，绅太郎。”

绅太郎又吃吃笑了几声，然后又把双手拢到火盆上。

“只是为了让委员会满意，先生。没有别的。您可能记得，先生，我们曾经有过意见分歧。关于我在中国危机时候的作品。”

“中国危机？我好像不记得我们有过争吵，绅太郎。”

“请原谅，先生，也许我说得夸张了。绝对没有到争吵那么严重的程度。但我确实鲁莽地表达过自己的不同意见。也就是说，我反对过您对我作品的建议。”

“请原谅，绅太郎，我不记得你说的是什么事了。”

“这样的区区小事，自然不会留在先生的记忆里了。可是，在这个节骨眼儿上，这件事对我很重要呢。也许我提醒一下您就会想起来，我们那天晚上的聚会，庆祝小川先生订婚的聚会。就是那天晚上——我记得是在神原饭店——我大概有点喝高了，就不管不顾地表达了我对您的看法。”

“我对那天晚上的事依稀有点印象，但很难说记得多么清楚。可是，绅太郎，那样一点小小的分歧跟今天的事有什么关系呢？”

“请原谅，先生，是这样的，这件事有点非同小可。委员会必须把一些细节弄清楚。毕竟，还得让美国官方满意……”绅太郎不安地停住话头。然后又说：“我请求您，先生，仔细回想一下那天的小分歧。我当时虽然对于跟您学到那么多东西心怀感激——现在也是—— 但实际上，我并不总是赞同您的观点。是的，我可以并不夸张地说，我对当时我们学校的立场方向是有很强的保留意见的。比如，您也许还记得，虽然我最终听从您的指导画了中国危机的海报，但我心存怀疑，而且向您表明了我想法。”

“中国危机的海报，”我思忖着说，“是的，我想起了你的海报。当时国家处于紧要关头，应该停止犹豫，做出决策了。据我回忆，你画得很好，我们都为你的作品感到骄傲。”

“可是您也该记得，先生，我对您希望我画的作品一直疑虑重重。您仔细想想，那天晚上我在神原饭店公开表达了我的不同意见。请原谅，先生，拿这样一件小事来麻烦您。”

我记得自己沉默了一会儿。在这期间我肯定是站了起来，因为我记得接下来说话时我已经站在了屋子的另一头，在阳台的纱门前。

“你希望我给你的委员会写一封信，”我最后说道，“证明你没有受我影响。这就是你的请求。”

“不是那样的，先生。您误会了。能跟您的大名连在一起，我只有骄傲的份儿。只是关于中国危机海报的那件事，如果能让委员会相信……”

他又没有把话说完。我把纱门拉开一道细细的缝。凉风吹进了屋里，但我似乎并不介意。我从缝隙里越过阳台望着外面的花园。雪花慢慢地飘落。

“绅太郎，”我说，“你为什么不能勇敢地面对过去呢？当时你的海报活动使你名声大噪。赢得许多荣誉和称赞。也许当今世界对你的作品有不同的观点，但你不需要用谎言替自己开脱。”

“是的，先生，”绅太郎说，“我同意您的观点。可是回到手边的这件事上，如果您能就中国危机海报的事给委员会写封信，那我真是感激不尽了。实际上，我已经把委员会主席的姓名地址都拿来了。”

“绅太郎，请听我说。”

“先生，无论从哪方面来说，我对您的教诲和栽培都一直心怀感激。但是目前，我正处于事业的关键阶段。如果退休了，自然可以静思冥想。可是我生活在一个纷扰的世界上，要想得到这个职位，有一

两件事我必须处理好，其实从别的方面来说这个职位已经是我的了。先生，我请求您，考虑考虑我的处境吧。”

我没有回答，只是继续望着雪花静静地在我的花园飘落。身后，我听见绅太郎站了起来。

“这是姓名和地址，先生。如果可以的话，我就把它们留在这儿了。希望您有空的时候考虑考虑这件事，我实在是感激不尽。”

静默了片刻，我猜想他是等在那里，看我是不是回过身，让他不失体面地告辞。我继续凝望着我的花园。雪花虽然不停地飘落，但并没有在花草树枝上堆积。就在我注视的当儿，一股微风吹来，摇动了一根枫树枝，把大部分雪花都抖落下来。只有花园后面那盏石灯的顶上积了一层厚厚的白色。

我听见绅太郎说了声对不起，离开了房间。

也许，我那天对绅太郎有点过于苛刻了。但是，你如果知道了他来访几个星期前发生的事，就肯定能够理解我为什么对他想逃避责任的做法这样缺乏同情了。实际上，绅太郎来访正是在仙子相亲的几天之后。

整个去年秋天，仙子跟佐藤大郎的婚事进展得还算顺利。十月份时交换了照片，我们通过中间人京先生得知，那个年轻人很想跟仙子见面。仙子，当然啦，假装要考虑考虑，但那个时候，显然我女儿——已经芳龄二十六——经不起轻易错过佐藤大郎这样的对象了。

于是我告诉京先生我们同意相亲，最后大家敲定了十一月的一个日子，地点在春日公园饭店。你大概也认为春日公园饭店这些日子变得有些粗俗，因此我对这个选择有点不满意。可是京先生向我保证，到时候会定一个包间，并且说佐藤家的人很喜欢那里的饭菜，最后我也就同意了，虽然并没有什么热情。

京先生还说，未来的新郎一家把这次相亲看得很重——他的父母和弟弟都打算出席。他建议说，如果我们带一个亲戚或朋友去给仙子壮壮胆，那就再好不过。可是，节子离得那么远，我们能请谁来参加这样一个活动呢？也许，就是因为我们觉得在相亲时可能处于下风，再加上我们对地点的不满意，使仙子对这件事变得格外紧张。相亲之前的那几个星期真是度日如年。

经常，仙子下班一回家就说些这样的话：“爸爸，你一整天都做什么了？大概又跟平常一样闷闷不乐地闲逛吧？”其实，我压根儿没有“闷闷不乐地闲逛”，我是在为保证这门亲事有个好结果而忙碌呢。可是，我当时觉得不能把事情进展的细节告诉她，以免让她操心，所以就对我白天的活动含糊其辞，这样一来，她就更加含沙射影地攻击我了。现在回想起来，当时我们不把某些事情摊开来说，反而使仙子更加感到紧张，如果当时我开诚布公，倒可以避免我们那时候的许多令人不快的交流。

比如，我记得有一天下午，仙子回家时我正在花园里修剪灌木。她在阳台上客客气气地跟我打了声招呼，就又进屋去了。几分钟后，我坐在阳台上，望着外面的花园，欣赏我的劳动成果，这时仙子换了和服，端着茶出来了。她把托盘放在我们俩之间，坐了下来。我记得那是去年晚秋一个晴朗宜人的下午，柔和的阳光洒在树叶子上。她循着我的视线望去，说道：

“爸爸，您为什么把竹子剪成那样？现在看上去不协调了。”

“不协调？你这样认为吗？我倒觉得蛮协调的。你看，你应该考虑到嫩枝最茂盛的地方。”

“爸爸总是喜欢没事找事。我看他非把那片竹子也毁了不可。”

“把竹子也毁了不可？”我扭头望着女儿。“这是什么意思？难道我曾经把别的什么东西毁掉了？”

“杜鹃花一直没有恢复原先的模样。这都是爸爸整天没事可做的结果。爸爸只好没事找事，胡乱插手。”

“请原谅，仙子。我不太明白你的意思。你是说杜鹃花也不协调了吗？”

仙子又看着花园，叹了口气。“你应该随它们去的。”

“对不起，仙子，可是在我看来，竹子和杜鹃花都大有改观呢。我好像根本没有看到你所说的‘不协调’之处。”

“那么，爸爸一定是眼睛瞎了。或者，就是品位太差。”

“品位太差？那可真奇怪了。知道吗，仙子，别人可从来不把品位太差跟我的名字联系在一起。”

“唉，在我看来，爸爸，”她疲倦地说，“竹子就是不协调。你还把浓荫密布的感觉给破坏了。”

我坐在那里默默地望着花园。“是的，”过了一会儿，我终于点点头说道，“我想你大概是从那个角度看的，仙子。你从来就没有艺术家的直觉。你和节子都没有。健二就不一样。你们两个女儿都遗传了你妈妈。实际上，我记得你妈妈以前就说过这种不靠谱的评论。”

“难道爸爸在剪枝方面是个权威吗？对不起，我没有意识到。”

“我倒没有自诩为权威。只是我被批评为品位太差，感到有点吃惊。对我来说，这个批评倒很稀罕，仅此而已。”

“很好，爸爸，我相信这只是观点不同。”

“仙子，你母亲跟你很像。她总是毫不犹豫地想到什么就说什么。我想这倒是很坦诚。”

“我相信爸爸在这些事上最有发言权。这是无可争议的。”

“仙子，我记得你母亲有时甚至在我作画时也品头论足。她经常说出一个观点来，逗得我发笑。然后她自己也会笑，然后承认对这些事一窍不通。”

“那么，我想，爸爸在他的绘画上也是一贯正确的喽？”

“仙子，讨论这件事毫无意义。而且，如果你不喜欢我在花园里做的改进，就尽管出去依你的想法把它恢复过来好了。”

“爸爸真是太好了。可是您说我什么时候做这件事呢？我可不像爸爸那样整天闲着。”

“你说什么呀，仙子？我今天很忙的。”我气呼呼地瞪了她一会儿，但她只顾看着花园，脸上显出疲倦的神情。我转过头，叹了口气。“可是讨论这件事毫无意义。至少你妈妈说了这样的话我们还可以一起笑笑。”

那个时候，我真想告诉她，我为了她实际上是怎样在尽心尽力。如果我这么说了，女儿肯定会感到吃惊——而且肯定会为刚才那样对待我而感到羞愧。其实，就在那天，我去了一趟柳川区，因为我发现黑田现在就住在那里。

寻找黑田的下落其实倒并不很难。上町学院的那位艺术教授，当我向他表示我没有不良动机后，他不仅立刻把地址告诉了我，而且跟我讲了我这位昔日的弟子这些年的遭遇。看来，黑田自从战争结束被释放以后，日子过得还不算糟糕。这个世界就是这样，他在监狱里的

那些年倒成了他有力的推荐证明，一些组织明确表示欢迎他，愿意给他排忧解难。因此他不费吹灰之力就找到工作——多半是给人辅导功课——并得到自己开始绘画所需要的材料。后来，去年初夏的时候，他在上町学院谋得了一个艺术教师的职位。

听说黑田的事业进展顺利，我感到很高兴——甚至很骄傲，也许这么说有点不妥。但是，尽管环境使师生关系变得疏远，但我毕竟以前做过他的老师，现在继续为他的事业发展感到骄傲也是情理之中的。

黑田住的地方不很富裕。我在那些房屋破败的小巷子里穿行了一段时间，然后来到一个像是工厂前院的水泥场地。没错，我看见场地那头停着几辆卡车，再往远处，铁丝网栅栏后面，一辆推土机正在挖土。我记得我当时站在那里，注视着那辆推土机，片刻之后才意识到面前这栋新的大楼实际上正是黑田的公寓楼。

我上到二楼，两个小男孩在走廊里来回骑三轮车。我找到了黑田的房门。我按了一遍铃，没有回音，但已经打定主意要见他一面，就继续按铃。

一个二十岁左右、满脸稚嫩的小伙子把门打开了。

“非常抱歉”——他非常真诚地说——“黑田先生现在不在家。我想，先生，您大概是他的一位同事吧？”

“也可以这么说吧。我有几件事想跟黑田先生商量一下。”

“那样的话，就劳驾您进屋等一等吧。我相信黑田先生很快就会回来的，如果没有见到您，他肯定会感到很遗憾。”

“但我实在不愿意给你添麻烦。”

“没关系，先生。请进来吧。”

那个单元房很小，像现在的许多住房一样，基本上没有什么过道，朝门里迈一小步就是榻榻米。屋里显得很整洁，墙上挂着许多绘画和挂件。充足的阳光从宽敞的窗户洒进来。我看出窗户外面是一个狭小的阳台。推土机的声音从外面传来。

“希望您没有什么急事，先生，”年轻人说着，递给我一个垫子，“黑田先生回来如果知道我没让您进屋，肯定不会原谅我的。请允许我给您沏点茶吧。”

“太感谢了，”我说，自己坐了下来，“你是黑田先生的学生吗？”

年轻人轻轻地笑了一声。“黑田先生很宽厚，把我称作他的弟子，实际上我怀疑自己是否配得上这样的称号。我叫恩池。黑田先生过去辅导过我，现在他虽然在学院担当重任，还是非常慷慨地继续关注我的作品。”

“是吗？”

外面传来推土机在工作的声音。一时间，年轻人手足无措地在一旁陪着，然后道了声抱歉，说：“请原谅，我去沏壶茶来。”

几分钟后，他回来了，我指着墙上的一幅画，说道：“黑田先生的风格一目了然。”

听了这话，年轻人笑了一声，尴尬地看着那幅画，双手仍然端着茶盘。然后他说：

“恐怕这幅画离黑田先生的标准还差得很远呢，先生。”

“这不是黑田先生的作品？”

“不好意思，先生，这是我的一件拙作。承蒙老师看得起，挂出来献丑。”

“是吗？不错，不错。”

我继续凝望着那幅画。年轻人把茶盘放在我身边的一张矮几上，自己坐了下来。

“这真的是你的作品吗？啊，我不得不说你很有天分。非常有天分。”

他尴尬地又笑了一声。“我有黑田先生做我的老师，真是三生有幸。恐怕我要学的东西还很多。”

“我还以为这肯定是黑田先生的画作呢。风格笔调有那种特征。”

年轻人笨手笨脚地摆弄着茶壶，似乎不知道怎么倒茶。我注视着他揭开壶盖往里面看。

“黑田先生总是告诉我，”他说，“我应该争取画出自己鲜明的风格。可是我实在太敬慕黑田先生的画风了，总是不由自主地模仿

他。”

“暂时模仿自己的老师倒不是一件坏事。那样能学到很多东西。可是在适当的时候，你会形成自己的观点和技法，因为你毫无疑问是一个很有天分的年轻人。是的，我相信你的前途不可限量。怪不得黑田先生这样关注你。”

“先生，黑田先生对我的恩情是说不完的。是啊，您也看见了，我现在甚至就住在他的公寓里呢。我已经在这里住了将近两个星期了。以前的房主把我赶了出来，多亏黑田先生向我伸出援助之手。他对我恩情，先生，真是说也说不完的。”

“你说你被原来的房主赶出来了？”

“我向您保证，先生，”他轻笑了一声说，“我是付了房租的。可是，不管我怎样小心，还是免不了会把颜料洒在榻榻米上，之后房主就把我赶出来了。”

我们俩都笑了起来。然后我说：

“对不起，我不是不同情你的遭遇。只是我想起了我早年间也有过这样的烦恼。不过只要坚持不懈，你很快就能得到理想的条件的，我向你保证。”

我们俩又都笑了。

“先生，谢谢您的鼓励，”年轻人说着，开始倒茶，“我想黑田先生很快就会回来了。请您不要急着离开。黑田先生肯定非常愿意有机会感谢您所做的一切。”

我惊讶地看着他。“你认为黑田先生想感谢我？”

“请原谅，先生，我以为您是科登协会的。”

“科登协会？对不起，那是什么？”

年轻人看了我一眼，又变得像先前那样尴尬。“对不起，先生，我弄错了。我以为您是科登协会的。”

“很抱歉，我不是。我只是黑田先生的一个老熟人。”

“明白了。是以前的同事吗？”

“是的，我想你可以这么说，”我又抬头看着墙上年轻人的那幅作品，“确实不错，”我说，“很有天分。”我意识到年轻人正在仔

细地端详着我。最后，他说道：

“对不起，先生，我可以请问您的名字吗？”

“很抱歉，你肯定认为我很失礼。我叫小野。”

“明白了。”

年轻人站起来，走到窗口。我望着矮几上的两杯茶袅袅地冒着热气。片刻之后：

“黑田先生还要很久才能回来吗？”我问。

起初，我以为年轻人不会回答。但他眼睛望着窗外，头也不回地说：“如果他没有很快回来，您也许不应该再耽误您的其他事情。”

“如果你不介意的话，我就再等一会儿，既然已经大老远地过来了。”

“我会告诉黑田先生您来拜访过。也许他会给您写信。”

外面的走廊上，那些孩子似乎把三轮车撞在了离我们不远的墙上，互相大声嚷嚷。我突然想到，站在窗口的年轻人多么像一个生气的孩子。

“请原谅我这么说，恩池先生，”我说，“可是你年纪很轻。我和黑田先生刚认识的时候，你实际上还只是个小孩子。关于你不知道具体情况的一些事情，我希望你不要草率地得出结论。”

“具体情况？”他说，转过身来看着我。“请原谅，先生，可是您自己知道具体情况吗？您知道他受了多少苦吗？”

“大多数事情都不像表面上那么简单，恩池先生。你们这一代的年轻人看问题太简单了。不过，我们俩目前辩论这个问题似乎毫无意义。如果你不介意的话，我还是继续等黑田先生吧。”

“我倒建议，先生，您不要再耽误您别的事情了。黑田先生回来我会告诉他的。”此前年轻人一直保持着礼貌的语气，现在似乎再也克制不住自己了。“坦率地说，我很惊讶您有这样的勇气。竟然登门拜访，似乎您只是一位友好的访客。”

“我确实是一位友好的访客。如果让我来说，我觉得应该由黑田先生决定愿不愿意接见我。”

“先生，我对黑田先生非常了解，以我的判断，您最好还是离开吧。他不会愿意见您的。”

我叹了口气，站起身来。年轻人又转眼望着窗外。当我从衣帽架上取下我的帽子时，他又一次转向我。“具体情况，小野先生，”他说，声音有一种异样的镇静，“显然您对具体情况根本一无所知。不然您怎么胆敢上这儿来？举个例子，先生，我敢说您从来不知道黑田先生肩膀上的伤吧？他当时痛得要命，可是那些看守只顾图省事，忘了汇报伤情，他直到战争结束才得到治疗。当然啦，他们倒是没有忘记不时地给他一顿毒打。叛徒。他们是这样叫他的。叛徒。每天，从早到晚。可是我们现在都知道了谁才是真正的叛徒。”

我系好鞋带，朝门口走去。

“你太年轻了，恩池先生，还不了解这个复杂的世界。”

“我们现在都知道了谁才是真正的叛徒。他们许多人仍然逍遥法外。”

“你会告诉黑田先生我来过了，是吗？也许他会好心写信给我。祝你愉快，恩池先生。”

当然，我不会让年轻人的话严重影响我的情绪，可是，考虑到仙子的婚事，如果黑田真的像恩池说的那样对我的过去耿耿于怀，那倒是很令人不安。不管怎么说，我作为一个父亲，有责任把事情向前推进，不管多么令人不快，因此，那天下午回到家里，我给黑田写了封信，表达了跟他再次见面的愿望，并特别指出我有一件棘手而重要的事情要跟他商量。我这封信的语气是友好的、寻求和解的，几天后我收到他的冷淡而简慢的回信时，不免感到很失望。

“我没有理由相信我们的见面会产生什么有价值的结果，”我昔日的学生这样写道，“感谢您那天亲自来访，但我觉得不应该再麻烦您这样受累了。”

必须承认，黑田先生的做法给我的心情笼罩了一丝阴影。它无疑使我对仙子的婚事不再那么乐观了。虽然像我前面说的，我没有告诉女儿我在努力争取跟黑田见面，但她无疑感觉到事情进展不太顺利，这自然使她的心情更加焦虑。

到了相亲的那天，女儿看上去太紧张了，我开始担心她那天晚上会给佐藤一家留下不好的印象——他们肯定会表现得镇定自若、游刃

有余。到了下午四五点钟，我觉得应该想办法让仙子的心情轻松起来，因此，在她走过我坐着看报纸的餐厅时，我对她说：

“真令人吃惊啊，仙子，你竟然整天什么也不做，只顾打扮自己。我还以为你是要去参加婚礼呢。”

“爸爸就喜欢嘲笑别人，自己不好好地做准备。”她反驳道。

“我只需要一点时间就准备好了，”我笑着说，“你一整天都这样，真是很反常呢。”

“是爸爸自己有问题。他太骄傲了，不肯为这样的事情好好做准备。”

我吃惊地抬头看着她。“你这是什么意思？‘太骄傲’？你想说什么呢，仙子？”

“我的终身大事不过是区区小事，如果爸爸不愿意为此小题大做，也是完全可以理解的。毕竟，爸爸的报纸还没有看完呢。”

“可是你在改变话题。你刚才说我‘太骄傲’，为什么不说得详细一点呢？”

“我只希望到时候爸爸表现得体面一点。”她说，然后气冲冲地离开了房间。

在那些艰难的日子里，这样的情况经常出现，我总是不由自主地想起前一年她跟三宅家商量亲事时的态度，跟现在形成多么鲜明的对比。那时候，她非常放松，甚至有点沾沾自喜。当然啦，她对三宅次郎很熟悉。我敢肯定她一直坚信他们俩会结婚，把两家之间的议事只当成是繁琐的程序。所以也难怪她后来遭受的打击那么惨重，但我觉得她没必要像那天下午那样含沙射影。不管怎么说，那小小的口角并没有帮助我们端正对这次相亲的态度，反而导致了那天晚上在春日公园饭店的情形。

许多年来，春日公园饭店一直是城里最令人愉快的西式风格饭店。可是最近，管理部门开始以一种比较粗俗的风格装饰房间——无疑是想让经常光顾这里的美国客人觉得它体现了“日本”魅力。不过，京先生预定的那个房间还是非常令人愉悦的，其特点是通过宽敞的窗户能看到春日山的西山坡，整个城市的万家灯火也尽收眼底。房间里主要是一张大大的圆桌和几把高背椅，一面墙上挂了一幅画，我认出是我战前认识的艺术家的作品。

大概是这种场合气氛有点紧张，我酒喝得快了一点，那天晚上的事情我有点记不太清了。我只记得我对佐藤大郎——我要当成女婿来看的那个年轻人——立刻产生了好感。他不仅看上去有学问、有责任心，而且具有我在他父亲身上看到并欣赏的那种气定神闲的风度。我和仙子刚到时，佐藤大郎镇定自若、但很有礼貌地迎接了我们，使我立刻想到了多年前在同样情形下给我留下深刻印象的年轻人——也就是说，当时在帝国饭店跟节子相亲的池田。当时，我考虑到佐藤大郎的温文尔雅肯定会随着时间消失，就像池田那样。当然啦，我希望佐藤大郎永远不必忍受池田的那种惨痛经历。

至于佐藤博士，他看上去依然是那么指挥若定。虽然在那个晚上之前我们并没有被正式介绍，但我和佐藤先生实际上已经认识多年，出于对彼此名望的尊敬，我们在街上遇到都会打招呼。他妻子是一位五十多岁、相貌不俗的女人，我们碰到也会问候一声，除此之外就没有什么交流了。看得出来，她和她丈夫一样，也是一个很有风度，善于处理任何尴尬局面的人。佐藤一家唯一没有给我留下好感的，是他们的小儿子光男，我估摸他大约是二十出头。

现在再来回忆那个晚上，我相信我打第一眼起就对年轻的光男产生了怀疑。但我不能肯定最初是什么引起了我的警觉——也许他使我想起了我在黑田的公寓房里遇见的年轻的恩池。总之，大家开始吃饭时，我发现自己对这些怀疑越来越确定。虽然这时候光男的一举一动都合乎礼仪，但是偶尔瞥见他看我的眼神，或者他隔着桌子把碗递给我时的神情，都使我感觉到他的敌意和谴责。

我们用餐几分钟后，我突然起了一个念头：实际上光男的态度跟他家里的其他人没什么不同——只是他掩饰的功夫还没有那么高明。从那以后，我经常朝光男看，似乎他才能最清楚地表明佐藤一家的真实想法。可是，光男坐在桌子那头，离我有一段距离，而且坐在他旁边的京先生似乎一直在跟他长谈，因此在那个阶段我跟光男没能正经谈上几句话。

“仙子小姐，我们听说你很喜欢弹钢琴。”我记得佐藤夫人这样说。

仙子轻轻笑了一声，说：“我没有怎么练琴。”

“我年轻的时候也弹钢琴，”佐藤夫人说，“可是现在也不练琴了。我们女人的时间太少，没工夫追求这些事情，你说是不是？”

“是啊。”我女儿局促不安地说。

“我本人对音乐的鉴赏能力很差，”佐藤大郎插进来说，同时目光坚定地盯着仙子，“实际上，我妈妈经常骂我是音盲。所以，我对自己的品位一点信心也没有，只好去问她应该欣赏哪些作曲家。”

“胡说什么呀。”佐藤夫人说。

“你知道吗，仙子小姐，”大郎继续说，“有一次我弄到一套巴赫钢琴协奏曲的唱片，我非常喜欢，可妈妈总是批评它，骂我品位太差。我的观点当然斗不过这位母亲大人喽。结果，我现在几乎不听巴赫了。不过仙子小姐，也许你能救我一把。你喜欢巴赫吗？”

“巴赫？”一时间我女儿显得有些茫然。然后她微微一笑，说：“喜欢啊，非常喜欢。”

“啊，”佐藤一郎得意地说，“现在母亲需要重新考虑考虑了。”

“别听我儿子胡说八道，仙子小姐。我从来没有从整体上批评过巴赫的作品。可是你跟我说说，就钢琴来说，肖邦是不是更有表现力？”

“是的。”仙子说。

在那天晚上早先时候，我女儿的回答都是这么拘谨僵硬。必须承认，这也在我的意料之中。在家人或亲密朋友中间，仙子说起话来口无遮拦，经常滔滔不绝，妙语连珠。可是我知道，在比较正式场合，她常常不知道该说什么好，所以给人的印象是一个腼腆的姑娘。相亲的时候出现这种情况，正是我所担心的。因为我非常清楚——佐藤夫人的姿态似乎也证实了这点——佐藤家不是那种旧式家庭，喜欢家里的女性成员沉默寡言，贤淑稳重。我已经预料到这点，所以在准备这次相亲时，一再强调我的观点，叫仙子尽量展示她活泼、机智的特性。女儿也完全赞成这样的策略，并信誓旦旦地表示要表现得坦率、自然，我甚至担心她会表现得过了头。此时，我注视着仙子努力用简单、顺从的语言回答佐藤家人的问题，目光几乎从不离开她的饭碗，我可以想象到她内心的痛苦。

撇开仙子的话题，饭桌上的谈话似乎倒是很轻松流畅。特别是佐藤博士，非常擅长制造轻松的气氛，如果不是时时意识到年轻的光男在凝视我，我可能就会忘记这个场合有多么重要，从而放松警惕了。我记得饭桌上佐藤博士舒舒服服地靠在椅背上，说道：

“最近市中心的游行好像越来越多了。您知道吗，小野先生，今天下午我乘车，看见一个男人的额头上有一道很大的伤。他坐在我旁边，于是我很自然地问他要不要紧，并建议他去医院看看。结果你知道怎么着，他刚去看过医生，现在决定重新加入游行的队伍。你对这件事怎么看，小野先生？”

佐藤先生的语气很随意，但一时间我产生了一个印象，似乎整个桌上的人——包括仙子——都停下筷子听我的回答。当然啦，很可能是我过于敏感了。但我清楚地记得，我的目光扫向年轻的光男时，他正以一种不同寻常的专注凝视着我。

“有人受伤，确实令人遗憾，”我说。“大家的情绪无疑都很激动。”

“我相信您是对的，小野先生，”佐藤夫人插言道，“情绪确实很激动，但现在人们似乎做得太过分了。这么多人受伤。但我丈夫说他们的出发点是好的。我真不明白他是什么意思。”

我以为佐藤博士会做出回答，但饭桌上又是一片静默，大家似乎再一次把注意力集中到我身上。

“是啊，正如您所说的，”我说，“这么多人受伤确实太遗憾了。”

“我太太总是歪曲我的意思，这次也不例外，小野先生，”佐藤博士说，“我从没有说过这样的争斗是一件好事。但我一直在使我太太相信，这些事除了有人受伤以外，还有另外的意义。当然啦，我们并不希望看到有人受伤。但是其中蕴含的精神——人们觉得需要公开而强烈地表达自己的观点——这精神是一种健康的东西，您不这么认为吗，小野先生？”

也许我稍微迟疑了一下，没等我回答，佐藤大郎说话了。

“可是父亲，现在事情毫无疑问已经失控。民主是一件好事，但并不意味着市民一有不同意见就有权出来搞暴动。在这方面，我们日本人表现得还像小孩子。我们还需要学习怎样把握民主的责任。”

“这里的情况倒很特别，”佐藤博士大笑着说，“看来至少在这个问题上，父亲倒比儿子开明得多。大郎也许是对的。目前，我们国家就像一个刚刚学习走路和跑步的小男孩。但是我说，其内在的精神是健康的。就像看着一个正在成长的孩子蹒跚学步，擦伤了膝盖。我 们不会希望去阻止他，把他锁在屋里的。您不这么认为吗，小野先生？或者，像我太太和儿子指出的那样，是我过于开明了？”

也许我又产生错觉了——正如我说的，我喝酒喝得太快了一点——我总觉得佐藤所说的意见分歧，其实并没有什么不一致的地方。与此同时，我注意到年轻的光男又在注视着我了。

“是啊，”我说，“但愿别再有人受伤了。”

我记得这个时候，佐藤大郎改变了话题，问仙子对城里新开的一家百货商店怎么看，一时间，谈话转向了一些无关紧要的事情。

这样的场合对任何一个准新娘来说都不容易——让一个年轻姑娘在经受审视的同时，还要做出对她未来幸福如此至关重要的判断，实在是有点不公平——但是必须承认，我没有想到仙子承受压力的能力这么差。随着夜晚一点点过去，她的自信心似乎越来越萎缩了，最后除了“是”和“不是”，再也说不出别的话来。我看得出，佐藤大郎正在努力让仙子放松下来，但是在这种场合，他又不能表现得太迫切，结果，他一次次试图打开一个幽默的话题，餐桌上一次次地陷入尴尬的冷场。我注视着女儿的痛苦，又一次想到前一年的相亲过程是多么截然不同。当时节子正好过来探亲，也去参加了，给妹妹一些精神上的支持，但那天晚上仙子似乎并不需要别人。我还记得，我看到仙子和三宅次郎隔着餐桌调皮地眉来眼去，似乎在嘲笑相亲的繁文缛节，我当时还觉得颇为恼火呢。

“您记得吧，小野先生，”佐藤博士说，“上次我们见面时，发现我们有一个共同的熟人，那位黑田先生。”

这时候晚餐已经接近尾声。

“是啊，没错。”我说。

“我的这个儿子”——佐藤博士指着年轻的光男，之前我还没有跟他交谈过一句话——“目前正在上町学院读书，也就是黑田先生任教的那所学校。”

“是吗？”我转向年轻人。“那么你跟黑田先生很熟悉了？”

“不太熟悉，”年轻人说，“非常遗憾，我在艺术方面没有天分，跟艺术教师的接触非常有限。”

“黑田先生的口碑不错，是不是，光男？”佐藤博士插言道。

“是的。”

“小野先生曾经跟黑田先生很熟。你知道吗？”

“知道，我听说过。”光男说。

这时，佐藤太郎又一次改变了话题：

“你知道吗，仙子小姐，对于我没有音乐细胞，我一向有我的一套理论。我小的时候，爸爸妈妈总是不把钢琴的音调准。在我人格形成最关键的那些年里，仙子小姐，我每天被迫听妈妈在一架音色不准的钢琴上练琴。我的问题可能就出在这里，你认为呢？”

“是的。”仙子说，又低头看着食物。

“是呀，我一向咬定这都是妈妈的错，可是这么些年来，她总是因为我没有音乐天分而惩罚我。我一直受到极不公正的待遇，仙子小姐，你说是不是？”

仙子笑了一下，什么也没说。

这时，一直默不作声的京先生似乎开始讲述他的一件有趣的轶事。据仙子回忆，他的故事刚讲到一半，我就打断了他，转向年轻

的佐藤光男，说道：

“黑田先生肯定跟你谈起过我。”

光男满脸困惑地抬起头。

“谈起过您，先生？”他迟疑地说。“我想他肯定经常谈到您，但我跟黑田先生不是很熟，所以……”他没有把话说完，求助地望着他的父母。

“我相信，”佐藤博士说，从容不迫的语气令我惊异，“黑田先生很清楚地记得小野先生。”

“恐怕黑田先生对我的评价不会特别高。”我说，又看着光男。

年轻人又一次尴尬地把目光转向他的父母。这次说话的是佐藤夫人：

“恰恰相反，我相信他对您的评价是非常高的，小野先生。”

“佐藤夫人，”我说，声音可能略高了一点，“有些人认为我的事业产生了负面影响。这种影响现在最好被抹去或遗忘。我对这种观点并不是浑然不知。我想，黑田先生就是持有这种观点的人。”

“是吗？”也许我是弄错了，但我总觉得佐藤博士注视我的目光很像老师在等一个学生背诵一篇课文。

“是的。至于我自己，我还没有做好心理准备，接受这样一种观点。”

“我想您肯定是对自己过于苛刻了，小野先生。”佐藤大郎说，但我立刻接着说道：

“有些人会说，我这样的人应该为我们这个民族遭遇的可怕事件负责。就我个人而言，我毫不讳言我犯过不少错误。我承认我做的许多事情对我们的民族极其有害，我承认在那种最后给我们人民带来数不清的痛苦的影响当中，也有我的一份。这我承认。您看到了吧，佐藤博士，我毫不掩饰地承认。”

佐藤博士探身向前，脸上是一副困惑的表情。

“请原谅，小野先生，”他说，“您是说您对自己的工作不满意？对您的绘画？”

“我的绘画。我的教学。您看到了，佐藤博士，我毫不掩饰地承认这一点。我只能说，当时我是凭着坚定的信念做事的。我满心相信我是在为我的同胞们谋福利。可是您看到了，我现在坦然承认我错了。”

“我相信您对自己太苛刻了，小野先生。”佐藤大郎语气欢快地说。然后他转向仙子，说道：“告诉我，仙子小姐，你爸爸总是对自己这样严厉吗？”

我意识到仙子刚才一直惊愕地看着我。也许就是因为这样，大郎的问题令她猝不及防，那天晚上她第一次表现出了平常口无遮拦的性格。

“爸爸一点儿也不严厉。我不得不对他严厉一点。不然的话，他天天都不肯起床吃早饭。”

“是吗？”佐藤大郎说，看到仙子终于不再那么拘谨地回答问题，他高兴极了。“我爸爸起床也很晚。人们都说，年纪大的人睡觉没有我们多，可是从我们的经验来看，好像并不是这样呢。”

仙子笑了起来，说：“大概只是爸爸这样吧。我相信佐藤夫人起床一点儿也不困难。”

“好事情，”佐藤博士对我说，“我们还没有出门，他们就开始拿我们打趣了。”

我不想声称整个婚事到这时候算是尘埃落定，但是我确实感到，直到这一刻，这场尴尬的、有可能一败涂地的相亲，才变成了一个愉快而成功的夜晚。饭后，我们喝茶聊天，等到叫出租车的时候，大家都觉得彼此相处融洽。最关键的是，佐藤太郎和仙子虽然还保持着必要的距离，但显然已经互相产生了好感。

当然啦，我必须承认那天晚上某些时候令我感到痛苦，同时我也承认，如果不是情势所迫，我不会那样毫不犹豫地做出那种关于过去的申明。说到这里，我不得不说一句，任何一个看重自己尊严的人，却希望长久地回避自己过去所做事物的责任，这是我很难理解的。承认自己人生中所犯的错误，并不总是容易的事，但却能获得一种满足和尊严。不管怎么说，怀着信念所犯的错误，并没有什么可羞愧的。而不愿或不能承认这些错误，才是最丢脸的事。

就拿绅太郎来说吧——看起来他似乎保住了他朝思暮想的那份教职。在我看来，如果绅太郎有勇气坦诚地承认他过去所做的事，他现在会更加快乐。我想，新年后不久的那天下午他在我这里受到冷遇之后，他在中国危机海报的问题上可能会换一种策略去应付他的那个委员会。但我猜想绅太郎还是坚持用虚伪的方式追求他的目标。是的，我现在逐渐相信，绅太郎的天性中始终存在着狡诈的、不可告人的一面，只是我过去没有真正认识到罢了。

“知道吗，欧巴桑，”不久前的一天晚上，我在酒馆里对川上夫人说，“我怀疑绅太郎绝不是他让我们相信的那种超凡脱俗的人。他只是通过那种方式在别人面前获得优越感，让自己为所欲为。像绅太郎这样的人，如果他们不想做什么事，就会装出一副束手无策的样子，得到别人的原谅。”

“哎哟，先生。”川上夫人不满地看了我一眼，可以理解，她不愿把一个这么长时间的老主顾往坏处想。

“举个例子，欧巴桑，”我继续说道，“想想他是怎么狡猾地躲避了战争吧。别人都在流血牺牲的时候，绅太郎只是躲在他那间小工作室里继续画画，似乎什么事儿也没有。”

“可是先生，绅太郎君的一条腿不好……”

“不管腿好不好，每个人都要响应召唤。当然啦，他们最后找到了他，可是战争几天之内就结束了。知道吗，欧巴桑，绅太郎有一次告诉我，因为战争的缘故，他两个星期没有工作。这就是绅太郎为战争付出的代价。相信我吧，欧巴桑，我们的老朋友在他孩子气的外表下面，还隐藏着很多东西呢。”

“唉，不管怎么说，”川上夫人疲惫地说，“看样子他再也不会回到这里来了。”

“是的，欧巴桑。似乎你永远失去他了。”

川上夫人手里燃着一根香烟，身子靠在柜台边，环顾着她小小的酒馆。像往常一样，酒馆里只有我们两个人。夕阳透过窗户上的纱网照进来，使得屋里比天黑后川上夫人打开灯盏时显得更加老旧，灰尘仆仆。外面，那些人还在干活。在过去的半个小时里，什么地方一直回响着锤子的声音，一辆卡车开动，或电钻响起，经常震得整个酒馆都在晃动。那个夏季的夜晚，我循着川上夫人的目光在屋里扫视，突然想到，在市政公司此刻在我们周围建造的水泥大厦中间，她的小酒馆将会显得多么渺小、破旧、格格不入啊。于是，我对川上夫人说：

“知道吗，欧巴桑，你真的必须认真考虑一下接受这份报价，搬到别的地方去了。这是个难得的机会。”

“可是我在这里这么长时间了。”她说，一边挥手掸开她吐出的烟雾。

“你可以开一家新的酒馆呀，欧巴桑。在板桥区，甚至在主街上。你放心，我每次路过肯定都会进去的。”

川上夫人沉默了片刻，似乎在外面工人干活的声音中倾听着什么。然后，她脸上浮现出笑容，说道：“这里曾经是一个那么繁华的地区。您还记得吗，先生？”

我也朝她微笑，但什么也没说。当然，过去这个地方是很好的。我们都过得很开心，说说笑笑中弥漫着那种精神，还有那些争论也总是发自内心，无比真诚。可是，那股精神也许并不总是有益的。那个小世界就像现在的许多事情一样，已经消失，一去不复返了。那天晚上，我很想把这些话都对川上夫人说一说，又觉得这样做不明智。显然，老街在她的心里非常珍贵——她的许多生活和精力都倾注在这里——她不愿承认这里已经永远消失，我自然是可以理解的。

一九四九年十一月

我第一次见到佐藤博士的情景仍然记忆犹新，而且我相信我的记忆没有丝毫偏差。现在说起来准有十六年了，是我搬进那座房子之后的第二天。我记得那是夏季一个阳光灿烂的日子，我正在外面整理栅栏，或者是往门上钉什么东西，一边跟路过的新邻居们打着招呼。我背对小路忙了一会儿，突然意识到有人站在我身后，似乎在注视着我干活。我转过身，看见一个年纪跟我相仿的男人饶有兴趣地打量着新刻在门柱上的我的名牌。

“这么说，您是小野先生，”他说，“哎呀，真是不胜荣幸。像您这样地位的人住到我们这里，真是莫大的荣幸。我个人也跟艺术界沾点儿边。我叫佐藤，是京都大学的。”

“佐藤博士？哎呀，久仰大名，幸会幸会。”

我记得那天我们在我家门外聊了一段时间，还清楚地记得当时佐藤博士几次提及我的作品和事业。我记得他继续往山下走去时，又一次重复类似的话：“像您这样有身份的人住到我们这里，真是莫大的荣幸，小野先生。”

从那以后，我和佐藤博士每次相遇都会恭敬地互致问候。当然，自从第一次交谈之后，我们很少停下来深聊，直到最近的婚事把我们的关系拉得更近。可是我对初次相逢的记忆——佐藤博士认出门牌上我的名字——足以使我相信我的长女节子至少在上个月她试图暗示的几件事上是大错特错了。比如，佐藤博士不可能以前对我一无所知，直到去年开始商议婚事才不得不弄清我的身份。

今年节子来的时间很短，而且住在仙子和大郎在泉町的新家里，所以那天上午我跟她在河边公园里散步，是跟她好好谈谈的唯一机会。事后，我在脑子里反复思量我们的谈话，我觉得她那天对我说过的一些话特别令人恼火，我认为我的感觉不是毫无道理。

不过，我当时不可能细想节子的话，我记得我心情很好，因为又能跟女儿在一起而高兴，而且很长时间没有在河边公园散步了，走在里面感觉心旷神怡。那是一个多月前的事，你也记得，天气还很晴朗，但树叶已经开始凋零。我和节子走在横贯公园中央的林荫大道

上，我们说好要在大正天皇的雕像旁边跟仙子和一郎碰头，现在时间还早，我们放慢脚步，时不时地停下来欣赏秋天的景色。

也许你同意我的观点：河边公园是我们城市公园里最令人满意的。在河边区拥挤的大街小巷里穿行一段时间后，发现自己来到浓荫密布的宽敞的林间大道上，肯定会感到神清气爽。如果你刚来到这座城市，不熟悉河边公园的历史，我也许应该解释一下我为什么一直对这个公园情有独钟。

在公园里，你肯定记得经过一片片孤立的草地，比学校操场大不了多少，你在林荫大道漫步时，能透过树丛看见它们。似乎公园的设计师脑子乱了，让一些计划半途而废。事实差不多就是这样。几年前，杉村明——他死后不久我买下了他的房子——关于河边公园有一些宏伟的计划。我发现杉村明的名字最近很少听见了，但不要忘记就在不久以前，他还是城里无可争议的最有影响的人物之一。我听说他曾经拥有四栋房子，你走在这个城里，隔不了多久就会碰到属于杉村或跟他密切相关的企业。后来，在一九二〇年或一九二一年，处在事业巅峰期的杉村决定拿出他的大量财富和资本，投资一个能让他在城市 and 市民心中永远留下烙印的计划。他打算改造河边公园——当时那是一个毫无生趣、鲜有人光顾的地方——使它成为城市的文化中心。不仅公园面积要扩大，让人们可以在更多的自然环境中放松心情，而且公园里还将有几个闪亮夺目的文化中心——自然科学博物馆，高桥学校的新歌舞伎剧场，他们在白滨路上的那个剧场最近被火烧了，一个欧式风格的演奏大厅，还有，说来奇怪，一个专埋城里死猫死狗的公墓。我不记得还有什么计划了，但那个蓝图无疑是非常宏伟的。杉村希望不仅改变河边区，而且改变整个城市的文化格局，增加北岸的文化分量。正如我前面说的，他试图在城市的风格中永远留下他的印记。

改造公园的计划正在进行，突然遇到了严重的财政困难。我不清楚具体的细节，但结果是杉村的那些“文化中心”始终没有建成。杉村自己损失了一大笔钱，再也没有恢复他先前的影响力。战后，河边公园直接划归市政府管辖，建了这些林荫大道。杉村的宏伟计划剩下的就是那一片片空荡荡的草地，那是他计划中的展览馆和剧场所在的地方。

我前面可能已经说过，在我购买杉村最后一栋房子时我跟他家人的交往，并没有特别地使我想起那个人来。不过，最近我每次在河边公园漫步，都会想起杉村和他的那些规划，我承认我开始对此人产生

了某种敬仰之情。是的，一个人渴望超越平凡，不甘于庸庸碌碌，无疑是值得敬仰的，尽管他最后失败了，并因为雄心壮志而损失了一笔财产。而且我相信，杉村死的时候并非不快乐。因为他的失败完全不同于大多数人的没有尊严的失败，杉村这样的人对此肯定心知肚明。如果一个人是在别人根本没有勇气或意愿去尝试的事情上失败了，那么他从这个角度回顾自己的一生时，肯定会感到一种安慰，一种发自内心的欣慰。

但我并不想把思绪停留在杉村身上。我前面说到，我那天正跟节子在河边公园漫步，心情很好，虽然她的有些话不太入耳——我是一段时间之后回想起来才完全领会这些话的意义的。当时，在前面不远的地方，路中央耸立着大正天皇的雕像，我们约好要在这里跟仙子和一郎碰头的，因此我和节子的谈话只好告一段落。我把目光投向雕像周围的那些板凳，突然听见一个小男孩的声音喊道：“外公来了！”

一郎朝我跑来，双臂张开，似乎想跟我拥抱。可是跑到我跟前，他似乎又克制住了自己，板起面孔，露出一副严肃的神情，伸出手来要跟我握手。

“你好。”他说，一副煞有介事的样子。

“啊，一郎，你真的长成一个男子汉了。你现在多大了？”

“应该是八岁了。请这边走，外公。我有几件事要跟您商量。”

我和他妈妈跟着他来到仙子坐的那个板凳旁。我的小女儿穿着一件我以前从没见过的鲜艳的裙子。

“你看上去很喜庆，仙子，”我对她说，“似乎闺女一过门，就马上变得认不出来了。”

“女人没必要一结婚就穿得灰头土脸。”仙子快言快语地回答，但听了我的话似乎还是蛮开心的。

我记得，我们都在大正天皇的雕像下坐了一会儿，聊着闲话。之所以约好在公园碰面，是因为两个女儿想要一起去买布料，我就答应带一郎到一家百货商店吃午饭，下午再带他到市中心转转。一郎巴不得赶紧离开，我们坐在那里说话时，他一个劲儿地捅我的胳膊，说：

“外公，让女人自己聊天好了。我们还有事情要做呢。”

我和外孙来到百货商店时，已经稍稍过了平常吃午饭的时间，饭店里不那么拥挤了。一郎在橱窗里陈列的各种菜式中慢慢挑选，有一

次还转过脸来对我说：

“外公，你知道我现在最喜欢吃什么吗？”

“嗯，我不知道，一郎。烤热饼？冰激凌？”

“是菠菜！菠菜给你力量！”他挺起胸膛，伸缩着二头肌。

“明白了。那么，这里的儿童套餐有一些菠菜。”

“儿童套餐是给小孩子吃的。”

“也许吧，但是很好吃。外公自己也想要一份呢。”

“好吧，那我也要儿童套餐，陪陪外公。叫那个人多给我盛些菠菜。”

“没问题，一郎。”

“外公，你要尽量多吃菠菜，菠菜给你力量。”

一郎挑选了一张紧挨着大窗户的桌子，等餐的时候，他不停地把脸贴在玻璃上，观察着四层楼下面的繁忙的主街道。自从一年多前节子上我家来过之后，我就没有见过一郎——他因为染病没来参加仙子的婚礼——我很惊讶他这段时间长得这么快。不仅个头高了许多，整个举手投足都变得稳重，不那么孩子气了。尤其是他的眼睛，目光似乎比以前成熟多了。

那天，我注视着一郎把脸贴在玻璃上，观察下面的街道时，看出他跟他父亲长得越来越像了。他身上也有节子的特征，主要是神情和细微的脸部动作。我又一次惊奇地发现，一郎跟我儿子健二当年的模样何其相似。我承认，看到孩子们继承了家里其他人的这些特征，我感到一种莫名的欣慰，我希望我的外孙能把这些特征一直保留到他成年。

当然，我们并不是只在孩童时期才接受这些细微的遗传。我们在成年初期十分敬仰的某位老师或导师留下的印迹，会在我们开始重新评价甚至排斥他的教诲之后，仍然长期存在。某些特征，就像当年那种影响的影子一样，一直陪伴着我们的一生。比如我发现，我的某些举止特征——我解释什么事情时的手势，我想表达讽刺或烦躁时的语气变化，甚至我喜欢使用的、别人以为是我自己发明的整句话语——我发现所有这些特征，我最初都是从我的老师毛利先生那里学来的。也许我可以不夸张地说一句：我自己的许多学生也会从我这里学到这些细微的特征。而且我还希望，尽管他们或许会重新评估跟我学习的

那些年，但大多数人都会永远为自己学到的东西而心怀感激。从我自己来说，我的老师森山诚二，我们总是叫他“毛利君”，尽管有许多显而易见的缺点，但后来每次谈起他来，我都认为，我生活在若叶县山区他家别墅里的那七年，对我的事业起着至关重要的作用。

如今，每当我回忆毛利君的别墅，总是想起从那条通向附近村庄的山路望下去的景象，心里感到特别欣慰。顺着那条山路往上走，别墅就会在下面的山谷里出现，一片深色的长方形木头建筑，掩映在高高的雪松树丛中。别墅的三面是长长的厢房，连起来构成长方形的三边，中间围着一个院子。第四面是一道雪松树篱和大门，把院子整个儿围在中间，可以想象在古时候，那道沉重的大门关上之后，敌人要想进来可不是件容易的事。

现在闯进别墅就没那么困难了。在山路上看不真切，其实毛利君的别墅已经荒败不堪。从山路上怎么也猜不到别墅内部一间间屋子的状况，剥落的墙纸，榻榻米的地板有几处破损严重，如果落脚不当心，就有踩穿地板掉下去的危险。实际上，当我试图回忆近处看到的别墅情景时，脑海中浮现的是破碎的房瓦，腐烂的窗格门框，糟朽碎裂的阳台。那些房顶不断出现新的裂缝，一场夜雨过后，每个屋里都弥漫着湿木头和烂树叶的味儿。在有些月份里，昆虫和蛾子大量地侵入，密密麻麻地沾在木头家具上，钻进每一道缝隙，你忍不住担心它们会使别墅彻底倒塌。

在那么多屋子里，只有两三间的状况能使你想起别墅当年的辉煌。其中一间白天大部分时间都光线明亮，是专门留给特殊场合用的。我记得毛利君每完成一幅新的画作，都会把他的学生——共有十位——召集到那间屋里。我还记得，进屋之前，我们每个人都会在门槛上停下脚步，屏住呼吸欣赏支在屋子中央的那幅画作。这个时候，毛利君也许在侍弄花草，或望着窗外，似乎并没注意我们的到来。不一会儿，我们都坐在画作周围的地板上，互相指指点点，压低声音说：“看先生怎样填补画面的那个角落。真是高明！”但没有一个人会说：“先生，这真是一幅杰作！”我们要表现得仿佛老师不在场似的，这是这种场合的一种惯例。

新的画作经常都会有所创新，于是我们中间就会展开激烈的争论。比如有一次，我记得我们走进屋，迎面看见一幅画：从一个很低的角度看到的一个跪着的女人——角度很低，我们似乎是从地面仰视她。

“显然，”我记得有人评价道，“低角度使女人显得更有尊严。这是一个非常惊人的成就。这个女人从其他方面来说都显得楚楚可怜。正是这种张力赋予了这幅画含蓄的力量。”

“也许是这样，”另一个人说，“女人确实具有某种尊严，但不是来自低视角。显然先生是在告诉我们一些更加深刻的东西。他是在说，这个视角看上去低，是因为我们太习惯于我们眼睛的高度。先生显然是想把我们那样武断和局限性的视角中解放出来。他在对我们说，‘没必要总是从惯常的角度来看事物。’正因为此，这幅画才这样发人深省。”

很快，我们都提高嗓门，互相争论着对毛利君用意的看法。我们一边争论，一边不住地偷偷望望老师，而他并不表示出赞成谁的说法。我记得他只是站在屋子那头，双臂抱在胸前，透过窗户的木格栅望着外面的院子，脸上带着饶有兴味的神情。他听我们争论一段时间，便转过身说道：“也许你们应该走了。我还有事情要做。”听了这话，我们便鱼贯走出屋子，同时嘴里再次喃喃说着对新画作的赞赏。

我讲述这副场景时，意识到毛利君的行为会使你觉得有点傲慢。但是如果你处在一个总是被人仰视和欣赏的地位，或许就更能理解他表现出来的那种高傲了。总是对学生灌输和说教并不可取，在许多情况下，更高明的做法是保持沉默，让学生们有机会思考和争论。正如我说的，任何一个曾经地位显赫的人都会欣赏这种做法。

不管怎么说，关于老师作品的争论可以持续好几个星期。由于毛利君自己始终不作任何解释，我们便把目光投向我们中间的一员——一位名叫佐佐木的画家，当时自诩为毛利君的得意门生。虽然我刚才说了，有些争论可以持续很长时间，但一旦佐佐木对某个问题做出决定，一般就表示争论到此结束。同样，如果佐佐木提出某人的画作有对老师“不忠”的地方，对方几乎总是立刻缴械投降——或者放弃作品，或者，在有些情况下，把作品跟垃圾一起付之一炬。

实际上，据我回忆，我们一起到达别墅后的几个月里，乌龟一次次在这种情形下销毁自己的画作。我虽然很容易就适应了环境，但我这位同伴的作品却经常表现出违背老师观点的元素，我记得我多次替他向我的新同事们求情，分辩说他不是故意对毛利君不忠。那些日子里，乌龟经常神情沮丧地走到我跟前，领我去看他的某幅没有完成的作品，压低声音说：“小野君，请你告诉我，这符合老师的风格吗？”

有时，就连我也恼火地发现他无意中采用了另一种显然大逆不道的元素。其实毛利君的艺术风格不难掌握。那些日子，“现代歌麿<sup>11</sup>”的标签经常用在我们老师身上，虽然当时这个头衔可以轻而易举地授予任何一个专门描绘青楼女子的有为画家，但也确实能够概括毛利君的思想。毛利君有意识地试图把歌麿的传统“现代化”；在他的许多最著名的绘画中——如《系腰鼓》或《出浴》——都是按古典歌麿的方式从背后看女人的。他的作品里还再现了许多类似的古典风格：女人把一条毛巾举到面前，女人梳理长长的秀发。毛利君广泛运用通过女性手拿或身穿的衣物来表达情感的传统技巧，而不是直接描绘女性的面部。但与此同时，他的作品充斥着欧洲风格的影响，歌麿的忠实崇拜者们会认为这是打破传统。例如，他早就不再使用传统的黑线条勾勒物体，而选用西方的色块，以光和影来制造三维效果。毫无疑问，他的核心风格也是借鉴了欧洲画风：对柔和色彩的运用。毛利君希望在他笔下的女性周围形成一种忧郁的、夜晚般的氛围，在我跟他学习的那些年里，他用色彩做了大量实验，试图捕捉灯笼的光的感觉。正因为此，毛利君的画作中总会有一盏灯笼，或虚或实，这简直成了他作品的标记，乌龟来到别墅一年之后，用起颜色来效果完全不对，他心里还挺纳闷，明明记得画上了一盏灯笼，为什么又被指责为不忠实老师的风格呢？这大概足以说明乌龟在领会毛利君的艺术要素时是多么迟钝了。

虽然我多次求情，但佐佐木之流对乌龟的问题没有什么耐心，有时，气氛变得像他在竹田大师的公司一样紧张，充满火药味。后来——我记得那是我们进入别墅第二年的时候——佐佐木发生了变化，这变化使他遭受的敌意比他曾经强加给乌龟的更加厉害和凶险。

一般来说，每群学生当中都会有一个领头人——老师格外欣赏他的才能，挑出来让其他人仿效。这位尖子学生对老师的思想领会得最透彻，一般就会像佐佐木那样，向能力较差或经验不足的学生解释这些思想。同样，正是这位尖子学生最有可能看到老师作品中的缺憾，或形成跟老师观点有分歧的思想。当然啦，从理论上说，一位好老师应该接受这种倾向——是的，作为他把学生培养成熟的一个标记。然而，实际上其中牵扯的情绪非常复杂。有时，当一个人投入许多时间和精力培育一个有天赋的学生时，就很容易把这种艺术上的成熟看成是一种背叛，于是就会出现一些令人遗憾的局面。

是的，在佐佐木跟老师发生争论之后，我们对佐佐木的态度是有失公允的，不过此刻在这里回忆这些事情似乎意义不大。但我清楚地记得佐佐木最终离开我们的那个夜晚。

我们大多数人已经上床睡觉了。我黑着灯躺在一间荒败的屋子里，还没有睡着，就听见佐佐木的声音在阳台上喊叫某人。他似乎没有得到对方的回答，最后我听见纱门关闭的声音，佐佐木的脚步声越来越近。我听见他在另一间屋门口停住脚步，说了些什么，但似乎也无人作答。他的脚步声更近了，接着我听见他拉开了我隔壁那个房间的纱门。

“我和你是这么多年的好朋友，”我听见他说，“你就不能好歹跟我说句话吗？”

对方没有回答。佐佐木又说：

“你能不能告诉我那些画在哪儿？”

仍然没有回答。我躺在黑暗里，听见老鼠在隔壁屋子的地板下面沙沙地跑来跑去，在我看来，这声音就是某种回答了。

“既然你这么讨厌它们，”佐佐木的声音继续说道，“还留着它们做什么？可它们眼下碰巧对我来说很重要。我不管去哪里都想带着它们。我没有别的东西可以带走。”

隔壁又是老鼠沙沙跑动的声音在回答，然后是长久的沉默。是的，沉默的时间太长了，我还以为佐佐木已经出门走进黑暗而我没有听见。可是接着，我听他又说话了：

“过去这几天里，有人对我做了一些可怕的事。但是令我最受伤害的，是你竟然不肯对我说一句安慰的话。”

又是沉默。然后佐佐木说：“你就不肯看我一眼，祝我一切顺利吗？”

最后，我听见纱门关上了，还听见佐佐木走下阳台，穿过院子的声音。

佐佐木走后，别墅里很少提到他，偶尔说起，也总是简单地称他为“叛徒”。是的，当我回忆我们经常沉醉其中的口舌之争时，我就想起，我们一谈起佐佐木就会引起相互间的争论。

在比较暖和的日子，我们屋子的纱门都开着，几个人聚集在一间屋里，就能看见另一群人也聚集在对面的厢房里。很快，这种状况就会导致某人隔着院子大声喊叫，诙谐地挑衅对方，不一会儿，两伙人便聚在各自的阳台上，冲着对方大嚷大骂。现在回忆起来，这种行为听上去或许有些荒唐，但是别墅的结构，以及从一侧厢房朝另一侧厢

房喊叫时产生的回音效果，似乎鼓励我们沉醉在这种孩子气的擂台赛中。那些辱骂的话有时不着边际——比如，奚落某人男子汉的神勇，或取笑某人刚完成的一幅画作——大部分时候都没有恶意，我记得许多对骂非常有趣，逗得两边的人都大笑不已。总的来说，我回忆中的这些对骂，足以说明那些年我们在别墅里相互竞争又亲如一家的关系。然而，对骂中有一两次提到佐佐木的名字，局面就会立刻失控，同事们超越界线，跑到院子里大打出手。我们很快就知道了，拿某人跟“叛徒”相比，即使是开玩笑，对方也不可能心平气和地接受。

从我的这些回忆中，你可能会认为我们对老师以及他的观点忠心耿耿，死心塌地。现在想来——当一种影响的缺点已经昭然若揭——我们很容易批评地看待一位培养这种风气的老师。可是话又说回来，任何一个拥有雄心壮志的人，任何一个能够干成大事业，觉得需要尽量全面地传播他的思想的人，都会多多少少理解毛利君的行为方式。现在我们知道了他的事业做得怎样，会觉得这做法有点愚蠢，但当时毛利君的愿望是彻底改变我们这个城市的绘画风格。正因为心里怀着这样一个目的，他把许多时间和财富都用于培养学生。在评价我以前的这位老师时，或许是有必要记住这点的。

当然，他的影响不只限于绘画领域。那些年里，我们的生活完全与老师的价值观和生活方式相一致，比如我们必须花大量时间探索城里的“浮华世界”——充斥着娱乐、消遣和饮酒的夜晚世界，它们是我们所有绘画的背景。如今我想起当年的市中心来总是感到一丝怀念：街道没有这么拥挤、喧嚣，工厂接受着晚风吹来的各个季节的花香。我们最喜欢去的地方是小岛街运河旁的一家小茶馆，名叫“水中灯笼”——确实，当你朝茶馆走去时，能看见茶馆的灯笼映在运河里的倒影。茶馆老板娘是毛利君的老朋友，这就保证了我们总是受到慷慨的款待，我记得在那里度过的几个难忘的夜晚，跟老板娘一起饮酒、唱歌。还有一个地方我们也经常光顾，是永田街的一个射箭厅，那里的老板娘总是不厌其烦地告诉我们，许多年前，她在秋叶原做艺伎时，毛利君以她为模特创作了一系列木刻画，引起轰动。那家射箭厅里有大约六七个姑娘，过了一阵，我们每人都有了自己心仪的对象，把烟斗递来递去地抽，消磨夜晚的时光。

我们的寻欢作乐也不只限于在城里探险。毛利君在娱乐界的熟人简直数不胜数，一年到头都有流浪演员、舞蹈家和音乐家组成的赤贫大军光临别墅，被当成失散已久的老朋友一样款待。大量的酒被拿了出来，客人们唱歌跳舞直至深夜，很快，就有人被派去叫醒附近村里的酒店老板，再添新酒。那些日子有一位常客叫摩季，是讲故事能

手，一个乐呵呵的胖男人，他艺术地再现那些古老的传说，使我们一会儿乐不可支，一会儿泪流满面。许多年后，我几次在左右宫遇见摩季，共同回忆在别墅里的那些夜晚，啧啧称奇。摩季坚信他记得许多这样的晚会都通宵达旦，再持续一整天，直到第二天夜晚。我对此不敢确定，但我记得毛利君别墅白天的情景，到处是一具具疲惫的身体横躺竖卧，还有人躺在外面的院子里，阳光洒在他们身上。

然而，我十分清楚地记得这样一个夜晚。当时，我独自走在别墅中央的院子里，呼吸着夜晚清新的空气，为暂时逃离了那些寻欢作乐而感到轻松。我记得我朝储藏室的门口走去，进门前，我回头望望院子那边的屋子，我的同事们和客人们都在那里嬉笑玩乐。我看见数不清的身影在纸屏风后面晃动，夜空中飘来一个歌者的声音。

我朝储藏室走去，因为在别墅里，没有几处地方能让人不受打扰地独处一段时间。我想象在很久以前，当别墅里还有卫兵和仆人时，这个储藏室是用来存放武器和盔甲的。可是那天夜里当我走进屋里，点亮挂在门上的灯笼时，却发现地上乱糟糟的堆满了各种东西，必须跳着脚才能走进去。到处都是一堆堆用绳子捆着的旧画布，破烂的画架，还有各种瓶瓶罐罐，里面插着画笔和木棍。我总算挪到一小片空地上坐下来。我注意到，门上的灯笼把我周围的东西照出长长的影子，形成一种诡异的效果，似乎我坐在一处阴森恐怖的小墓地里。

我想，我准是完全陷入了沉思，因为我记得听到储藏室的门被打开的声音时吃了一惊。我一抬头，看见毛利君站在门口，便赶紧说道：“晚上好，先生。”

也许门上的灯笼不足以照亮我呆的地方，或者我的脸处在阴影里。总之，毛利君探头张望，问道：

“是谁呀？是小野吗？”

“是的，先生。”

他继续探头张望了一会。然后，他把灯笼从横梁上摘下来，举在面前，开始小心地绕过地板上的杂物，朝我走来。他这么做的时候，手里的灯笼使我们周围暗影摇曳。我赶紧腾出一点地方给他，但毛利君已经在不远处一只旧木箱上坐了下来。他叹了口气，说道：

“我出来透透新鲜空气，看见这里有灯光。到处都一片漆黑，只有这点灯光。我心里想，如今这间储藏室已经不是情人们幽会的地方了。这里面的人肯定处于孤独中。”

“我准是坐在这里做起梦来了，先生。我没打算在这里呆这么长时间。”

他把灯笼放在脚边的地板上，从我坐的地方只能看见他的剪影。“刚才有个跳舞的姑娘似乎很喜欢你呢，”他说，“夜晚还没结束，你就消失了，她准会感到失望的。”

“我不是故意对我们的客人无礼，先生。我像您一样，只是想出来透透新鲜空气。”

我们沉默了片刻。院子那头，可以听见我们的同伴在拍着巴掌唱歌。

“那么，小野，”毛利君终于开口说道，“你对我的老朋友仪三郎是怎么看的？他可真是个人物呢。”

“没错，先生。他看起来是个很和善的绅士。”

“现在他可能穿得衣衫褴褛，当年可是个名人呢。从他今天晚上的表演来看，他过去的技艺并没有全丢掉。”

“是的。”

“那么，小野，你的烦恼来自哪里呢？”

“烦恼，先生？没有，我没有烦恼。”

“是不是你发现我的老朋友仪三郎有点讨厌？”

“没有没有，先生，”我紧张地笑了笑，“啊，一点也没有。他是个最有魅力的绅士。”

然后，我们聊了一会儿别的，有一搭没一搭，脑子里想起什么就说什么。后来毛利君又把话题转到我的“烦恼”上，我便知道他是准备坐在那里等我一吐为快了，我终于说道：

“仪三郎君确实是个最慈善的绅士。他和他的那些舞者一片好意地让我们开心。但我忍不住在想，先生，过去这几个月里，他们这样的人来访得太频繁了。”

毛利君没有回答，于是我接着说道：

“请原谅，先生，我不是不尊重仪三郎君和他的朋友。但是，我有时候感到困惑。我不明白我们画家是否应该花这么多时间跟仪三郎君那样的人在一起娱乐。”

我记得就是这时，老师站了起来，举着灯笼走向储藏室里面的墙壁。墙壁原先处于黑暗中，老师把灯笼凑近时，挂在墙上的三幅上下排列的木版画便被清楚地照亮了。每幅画上都是一个艺伎在整理发型，她们都坐在地上，视角是从后面看去。毛利君仔细端详了一会儿，把灯笼从一幅画挪向另一幅。然后他摇摇头，自己嘟囔道：“致命的败笔。细节造成的致命的败笔。”几秒钟后，他仍然盯着版画继续说：“可是人总是对自己早期的作品怀有感情。也许你有一天也会对你在这里创作的作品产生同样的感情。”他又摇摇头，说：“可是这些画都有致命的败笔，小野。”

“我不能同意，先生，”我说，“我认为这些木刻画出色地证明了一位画家的才华能够超越某一种风格的局限。我经常认为，先生早期的木刻画被锁在这样的屋子里真是太可惜了。它们完全应该跟先生的绘画一起公开展出。”

毛利君仍然全神贯注地端详他的木刻画。“致命的败笔，”他又说了一遍，“但我那时候还很年轻。”他又挪动灯笼，让一幅画隐入阴影，让另一幅画显现出来。然后他说：“这些都是从主街一家艺伎馆里看到的景象。在我年轻的时候，那是一家口碑很好的艺伎馆。我和仪三郎经常一起光顾这些地方。”过了片刻，他又说道：“这些都有致命的败笔，小野。”

“可是，先生，我认为即使眼光最敏锐的人，在这些木刻画里也挑不出错来。”

他又端详了一会儿木刻画，然后开始朝这边走来。我觉得他花了过多的时间走过地板上的那些杂物。有几次，我听见他喃喃自语，还听见他用脚踢开一个罐子或箱子的声音。是的，有一两次我以为毛利君是在那一片狼藉中寻找什么东西——也许是他早年的其他木刻画，但最后他又坐回到那只旧木箱上，叹了口气。又沉默了一会儿，他说：

“仪三郎是个不幸的人，一辈子过得不顺心。他的才华都被毁掉了。他曾经爱过的那些人，或者早就死了，或者把他给抛弃了。即使在我们年轻的时候，他的性格就是孤独的，落落寡欢的。”毛利君停顿了一会儿，然后继续说道：“可是有时候我们跟青楼女子一起饮酒作乐，仪三郎就会变得开心起来。他想听什么，那些女人就对他说什么，至少在那个晚上他对那些话是相信的。当然啦，天一亮，他这样有智慧的人就不可能继续相信这样的话。但仪三郎并不因此就看轻那些夜晚。他以前总是说，最好的东西总是在夜晚聚集，在早晨消失。

人们所说的浮华世界，小野，就是仪三郎知道如何珍惜的那个世界。”

毛利君又停住了话头。像刚才一样，我只能看见他的剪影，但我感觉他在倾听院子那头寻欢作乐的声音。然后他说：“如今他年纪大了，心情不好，但在许多方面几乎没有什么变化。今晚他是快乐的，就像他以前在那些娱乐场所一样。”他深深吸了口气，好像在抽烟一样。然后他继续说：“画家有希望捕捉的最细微、最脆弱的美，就飘浮在天黑后的那些娱乐场所里。而在这样的夜晚，小野，那种美也会飘到我们这里。可是挂在那里的那几幅画，它们没有表现出一点那种虚幻的、转瞬即逝的特征。严重的败笔，小野。”

“可是，先生，在我看来，这些木刻画非常有力地表现了这些内容。”

“我创作那些木刻画的时候还很年轻。我怀疑，我之所以没能描绘那个浮华世界，是因为我无法让自己相信它的价值。年轻人对于快乐经常会产生犯罪感，估计我也是这样。我想，我当时认为在这样的场所虚度光阴，用自己的技巧去描绘如此短暂、看不见摸不着的东西，实在是一种浪费，是一种颓废。当一个人对一个世界的美产生怀疑时，是很难欣赏它的。”

我想了想，说：“是的，先生，我承认您所说的很适用于我自己的作品。我会尽力好好去做的。”

毛利君似乎没有听见我的话。“可是我很久以前就消除了那些怀疑，小野，”他继续说道，“年老之后，当我回顾自己的一生，看到我用毕生的精力去捕捉那个世界独特的美，我相信我会感到心满意足的。没有人能使我相信我是虚度了光阴。”

当然，毛利君的原话可能并不是这样。是的，仔细想来，这样的话倒更像是我在左右宫里喝了点酒之后，对我的那些学生说的。“作为日本新一代画家，你们对本民族的文化负有重大的责任。有你们这样的人做我的学生，我深感自豪。我自己的画作不值得多少夸赞，可是当我回顾自己的一生，想起我在事业上培养和帮助过你们在座各位，那么没有人能使我相信我是虚度了光阴。”每次我说出这样的话，聚集在周旁的那些年轻人都会提高嗓门，一个盖过一个地说我不该这样贬低我自己的作品——他们吵吵嚷嚷地告诉我，那些作品无疑将会流芳百世。可是，正如我前面说过的，许多成为我鲜明特色的话语和表达方式，实际上都是从毛利君那里继承来的，所以很可能这正

是老师那天夜里的原话，当时给我留下了那么强烈的印象，并在我心里留下烙印。

唉，我的话题又跑远了。我要讲述的是上个月在河边公园跟节子有过那番不快的交谈之后，带外孙在百货商店吃饭的情景。实际上，我记得我正在回忆一郎对菠菜的赞扬。

午饭端上来了，我记得一郎坐在那里，专心研究盘子里的菠菜，有时还用勺子戳一戳。然后他抬起目光，说道：“外公，你看着！”

外孙撮起满满一大勺菠菜，高高举起，开始往嘴里倒。看他的吃相，活像某人在喝瓶里的最后几滴酒。

“一郎，”我说，“这样的吃相可不雅观。”

可是外孙继续把菠菜往嘴里塞，同时使劲嚼着。吃完了一勺他才把勺子放下，两个腮帮子鼓得都快爆炸了。然后，他嘴里仍然嚼着，脸上突然做出一副严肃的表情，挺起胸膛，开始用拳头出击周围的空气。

“你在做什么呀，一郎？告诉外公，你在做什么。”

“你猜，外公！”他嘴里塞着菠菜说道。

“嗯，我不知道，一郎。是一个男人在喝酒、打架？不是？那你告诉我吧，外公猜不着。”

“大力水手！”

“那是什么，一郎？又是你崇拜的一个英雄吗？”

“大力水手吃菠菜。吃了菠菜就有力量。”他又挺起胸膛，对着空气挥拳头。

“我明白了，一郎，”我笑着说，“菠菜确实是一种奇妙的食物。”

“酒也给人力量吗？”

我微笑着摇摇头。“酒使人相信自己有了力量。可是实际上，一郎，你的力量并不比喝酒之前更大。”

“那男人干吗还喝酒呢，外公？”

“我不知道，一郎。也许因为他们可以暂时相信自己有力量吧。其实酒并不能使人变得更强壮。”

“菠菜使人真的有力量。”

“那么菠菜比酒好多了。你继续吃菠菜吧，一郎。可是你看，你盘子里的其他东西怎么办呢？”

“我也喜欢喝酒。还有威士忌。在家的時候，我经常去一家酒馆。”

“是吗，一郎。我认为你最好接着吃菠菜，就像你说的，菠菜真的能给人力量。”

“我最喜欢清酒。我每天晚上都要喝十瓶，然后再喝十瓶威士忌。”

“是吗，一郎。那酒量可不小。肯定会让你妈妈头疼的。”

“女人根本不懂我们男人喝酒的事。”一郎说，把注意力转向了面前的午饭。可是他很快又抬起头来，说：“外公今晚要来吃晚饭。”

“是的，一郎。估计仙子小姨会准备一些好吃的东西。”

“仙子小姨买了一些清酒。她说外公和大郎姨夫会把它们都喝光。”

“呵，我们也许会的。我想女人们也会喝一点。但是她说得对，一郎，酒主要是给男人喝的。”

“外公，如果女人喝了酒会怎么样？”

“嗯，说不好。女人不像我们男人这样强壮，一郎。所以她们可能很快就喝醉了。”

“仙子小姨会喝醉！她只喝一小杯就醉得一塌糊涂！”

我笑了一声。“是的，很有可能。”

“仙子小姨醉得一塌糊涂！她会唱歌，然后趴在桌上睡觉！”

“看来，一郎，”我仍然笑着说，“我们男人最好把酒看牢了，是不是？”

“男人更强壮，所以能喝更多的酒。”

“没错，一郎。我们最好把酒看牢了。”

然后，我思忖了片刻，又说：“我想你现在有八岁了，一郎。你正在长成一个男子汉。谁知道呢？说不定今晚外公会让你喝几口清酒呢。”

外孙以一种有点害怕的表情看着我，什么也没说。我朝他微笑，然后扫了一眼旁边大窗户外面的浅灰色天空。

“你从来没见过你的舅舅健二，一郎。他在你这个年纪，也跟你一样高矮，一样结实。我记得他第一次喝清酒时就跟你现在差不多大。一郎，我保证让你今晚尝尝酒味儿。”

一郎似乎考虑了一会儿，然后说道：

“妈妈那儿会有麻烦。”

“别担心你妈妈，一郎。外公对付得了她。”

一郎厌烦地摇摇头。“女人永远不懂男人喝酒的事。”他说。

“你这样的男人应该尝尝清酒了。别担心，一郎，就把你妈妈交给外公好了。我们可不能让女人牵着鼻子走，是不是？”

外孙继续沉思了一会儿，然后突然大声说：

“仙子小姨会喝醉！”

我笑了。“我们等着瞧吧，一郎。”我说。

“仙子小姨会醉得一塌糊涂！”

大约过了十五分钟，我们正在等冰激凌的时候，一郎用若有所思的语气问道：

“外公，你知道野口佑次郎吗？”

“你肯定是指野口由纪夫吧，一郎。不，我跟他不认识。”

外孙没有回答，似乎在专注地研究旁边窗玻璃上他的影像。

“今天上午，”我继续说，“我跟你妈妈在公园里谈话的时候，她似乎脑子里也想着野口先生。估计大人们昨晚吃饭的时候谈论过他，是不是？”

一郎继续望着自己的影像，过了一会儿，他转过脸来问我：

“野口先生像外公一样吗？”

“野口先生像我一样？啊，至少你妈妈就不是这么认为的。那只是我有一次对你大郎姨夫说的话，没什么大不了的。你妈妈似乎把它看得过于认真了。我不太记得我当时在跟大郎姨夫说什么了，但外公碰巧说他跟野口先生那样的人有一两个共同点。现在你告诉我，一郎，昨晚大人们都说什么了？”

“外公，野口先生为什么要杀死自己？”

“很难说得准，一郎。我并不认识野口先生。”

“那他是个坏人吗？”

“不，他不是坏人。他只是一个非常努力地做着他认为最有益的事情的人。可是你知道吗，一郎，战争结束后，情况变得很不一样。野口先生创作的歌曲曾经非常出名，不仅在这个城市，而且在整个日本。收音机里播，酒馆里也唱。你舅舅健二他们在行军中和作战前也唱这些歌。战后，野口先生认为他的歌——唉——是一种错误。他想起所有那些被杀害的人，所有那些跟你年龄相仿却失去了父母的小男孩，一郎，他想起了所有这些事情，认为自己的那些歌或许是个错误。他觉得他应该谢罪。向每一个离世的人谢罪。向那些失去双亲的小男孩谢罪。向那些失去像你这样的小男孩的父母谢罪。他想对所有这些人说声对不起。我认为这就是他自杀的原因。野口先生绝对不是个坏人，一郎。他有勇气承认他所犯的错误。他很勇敢，很高尚。”

一郎带着若有所思的表情注视着我。我笑了一声，说：“怎么啦，一郎？”

外孙似乎想说话，却又转过去看着他映在窗玻璃上的脸。

“你外公说自己像野口先生，其实没有任何意思，”我说，“他只是在开玩笑，仅此而已。下次你再听见你妈妈讲到野口先生，就把这话告诉她。从她今天上午说的话来看，她把事情完全理解错了。你怎么了，一郎？突然变得这么安静。”

吃过午饭，我们在市中心的店铺里逛了逛，看玩具，看图书。下午四五点钟的时候，我在樱桥街一家时髦的餐厅又请一郎吃了一客冰激凌，然后我们就前往大郎和仙子在泉町的公寓。

你可能知道，泉町如今成为家境良好的年轻夫妇非常热衷的一个地方，那里确实有一种干净体面的氛围。但是吸引年轻夫妇的大多数新建的公寓楼，在我看来缺乏想象力，很压抑。就拿大郎和仙子的公

寓来说吧，是三层楼上一套狭小的两居室，天花板很低，能听见隔壁人家的声音，从窗户看出去，只能看见对面的楼房和窗户。没过一会儿，我就开始觉得这套房子憋屈，我相信这并不是因为我习惯了我那座宽敞的传统老宅。不过，仙子似乎对她的公寓感到很得意，嘴里不停地赞扬它的“现代”特征。房子看上去很容易保持干净，通风也很好，特别是整个公寓楼的厨房和浴室，全是按西方风格设计的，像我女儿说的，比起我那座房子里的设施来，不知道要实用多少倍呢。

厨房虽然方便，毕竟还是太小，那天晚上，我想进去看看两个女儿晚饭准备得怎么样了，却似乎连站的地方都没有。因为这个，还因为两个女儿看上去都很忙，我就没有跟她们多聊。但我还是说了一句：

“你们知道吗，一郎今天告诉我，他很想尝尝清酒呢。”

节子和仙子并排站在那里切菜，都停住手，抬起眼来看着我。

“我想了想，我们不妨就让他喝一点尝尝，”我继续说道，“不过也许应该用水稀释一下。”

“对不起，爸爸，”节子说，“您是说让一郎今天晚上喝酒？”

“就喝一点点。他毕竟一天天在长大。不过我说了，你最好把酒稀释一下。”

两个女儿交换了一下目光。仙子说：“爸爸，他才八岁。”

“只要你用水稀释一下就没关系。你们女人可能不理解，但这些事情对一郎这样的男孩子来说意义非常重大。关系到自尊心。他会一辈子都记得的。”

“爸爸，这真是胡说，”仙子说，“一郎只会感到不舒服。”

“不管胡说不胡说吧，我已经仔细考虑过了。你们女人有时候不能充分理解一个男孩的自尊心。”我指着放在她们头顶格架上的那瓶清酒，“一小滴就够了。”

说完，我就转身离开，却又听见仙子说道：“节子，这是根本不可能的。真不知道爸爸是怎么想的。”

“这么大惊小怪做什么？”我在门口转过身说。我听见从我身后的客厅里传来大郎和我外孙的欢笑声。我压低声音，接着说道：

“反正，我已经答应他了，他一心盼着呢。你们女人有时候根本不理解别人的自尊心。”

我又准备离开，这次是节子说话了：

“爸爸这么体贴地考虑到一郎的感受，真是太难为他了。不过，是不是最好等一郎再长大点呢？”

我轻轻笑了一声。“知道吗，我记得当年健二这么大的时候，我决定让他尝尝清酒，你们的妈妈也是这样反对的。结果，喝一点酒并没有给你们的哥哥带来什么害处。”

话一出口，我就后悔不该在这样琐碎的争论中提到健二。是的，我记得我当时对自己非常恼火，很可能没有注意听节子下面的话。我记得她似乎是这么说的：

“毫无疑问，爸爸在培养哥哥上是很用心思的。不过，从后来的事情看，我们发现至少在一两点上，倒是妈妈的观点更加正确。”

说实在的，也许节子并没有说出这样令人不快的话。也许我把她说的话完全理会错了，因为我清楚地记得仙子对姐姐的话没有任何反应，只是厌倦地转回去继续切菜。而且，我也不会认为大家好好地交谈着，节子会无缘无故地说出这番话来。可是，当我想到那天上午在河边公园节子的那些含沙射影的言词时，便不得不承认她是有可能说出类似的话的。总之，我记得节子最后说道：

“而且，恐怕池田也会希望一郎长大一些再喝酒的。但是爸爸这样体贴一郎的感受，真是太用心了。”

我担心一郎听到我们的谈话，而且不愿意给我们难得的家庭聚会罩上阴影，便没有继续争论，离开了厨房。我记得我后来就跟一郎和一郎坐在客厅里，一边等晚饭，一边愉快地聊天。

过了一小时左右，我们终于坐下来吃饭了。这时，一郎伸出手，用手指敲了敲放在桌上的酒瓶，意味深长地看着我。我朝他微笑，但什么也没说。

女人们准备了一顿丰盛的晚餐，很快大家就轻松自如地聊了起来。一郎给我们讲了他一位同事的故事，把我们全都逗笑了。那位同事愚蠢得可笑，再加上运气不好，总也完不成任务，并因此而出了名。一郎讲这个故事时，说道：

“后来，情况越来越严重，我们的上司也开始叫他‘乌龟’。最近一次开会时，早坂先生没有留神，竟然张口宣布道：‘听完乌龟的报告，我们就休会吃午饭。’”

“是吗？”我有些吃惊地大声说。“真有意思。我以前也有一位同事叫那个外号。原因似乎也大同小异。”

太郎好像对这一巧合并不感到特别意外。他礼貌地点点头，说道：“我记得我上学的时候有一个同学，我们也都叫他‘乌龟’。实际上，就像每个团队都有一个天然的领袖一样，似乎每个团队也有一个‘乌龟’。”

然后，太郎又继续讲他的故事。当然啦，现在想想，女婿的话完全正确。由同类人组成的团队，几乎都有自己的“乌龟”，虽然并不总叫这个名字。比如，在我的学生中间，就是绅太郎担当这一角色。这不是否认绅太郎的基本能力，可是跟黑田之类的一比，他的才华就逊色多了。

我想，总的来说，我并不欣赏这个世界上的“乌龟们”。人们也许赞赏他们的吃苦耐劳和他们的求生能力，却怀疑他们缺乏坦诚，善于欺骗。最后，人们会唾弃他们打着事业的名义而不肯冒险，或为了他们声称自己所信仰的某个理念而退缩不前。乌龟之流永远不会成为某个重大灾难的牺牲品，就像杉村明在改造河边公园的计划上遭受重挫那样。然而同样，虽然他们有时也能混成个老师之类，获得一点地位，但永远也不可能取得任何超凡脱俗的成就。

我承认，在毛利君别墅的那些年里，我是很喜欢乌龟的，但是我从来没有把他当成一个平等的人来尊重。这是由我们关系的性质决定的，我们的友谊，是从乌龟在竹田公司受迫害的时候开始建立，又在初入别墅，乌龟艰难起步的那几个月里逐渐牢固的。过了一段时间，我们的友谊形成了固定模式，他始终对我给予他的一些难以言说的“支持”感激不尽。后来他已经掌握技巧，知道怎样作画才不致引起别墅其他人的敌意，而且他凭自己随和的、乐于助人的性格，赢得了大家的好感，但是他仍然在很长时间里一直对我说：

“我太感谢你了，小野君。多亏了你，这里的人才这样善待我。”

当然，在某种意义上，乌龟确实应该感谢我。如果没有我的激励，显然他永远不会考虑离开竹田大师的公司，投师于毛利君的门下。他对迈出这冒险性的一步犹豫再三，可是一旦不得不这么做了，

他便从没有怀疑过当初的决定。是的，在很长时间里——至少在最初两年——乌龟对毛利君恭敬有加，我记得他无法跟我们的老师对话，只会唯唯诺诺地说“是的，先生”或“不，先生”。

那些年里，乌龟继续像以前那样慢悠悠地作画，但这并没有激起任何人的反感。实际上，很多人的工作速度都很慢，而且这帮家伙还喜欢取笑我们这些作画敏捷的人。我记得他们称我们为“机械师”，把我们有了灵感之后的专注、狂热的工作方式比作一个蒸汽机驾驶员，不断地往火里添煤，生怕机器随时都会熄火。我们反唇相讥，把这帮磨洋工的人称为“后退者”。“后退者”原本是别墅里用来形容这样一个人的：他在一间拥挤的房间里作画，周围都是对着画架工作的人，他却总是每过几分钟就要后退几步，观察他作品的效果——结果，他就总会撞上在他身后工作的同事。当然，这么说是很不公平的，不能因为某个画家愿意从容不迫地作画——用比喻的说法，就是后退几步——就说他行为孤僻，但我们很喜欢这个称呼里的挑衅性。是的，我记得我们经常说说笑笑地拿“机械师”和“后退者”来打趣。

实际上，我们每个人都会为“后退”感到愧疚，因此，我们工作时尽量避免挤在一起。在夏季的几个月中，许多同事把画架支在阳台上，彼此拉开距离，或者就在院子里，另一些人则坚守在许多房间里，因为他们喜欢根据光线的变化从一个房间换到另一个房间。我和乌龟总喜欢在那间废弃的厨房里工作——那是别墅侧翼一座很大的、类似谷仓的附属建筑。

进门时脚下是踩实的泥地，再往里走，是一个垫高的木板平台，很宽，放得下我们的两个画架。房梁很低，有许多挂钩——可以把锅和其他炊具挂上面——墙上有竹架子，正适合我们放置画笔、抹布和颜料什么的。我还记得我和乌龟把一个发黑的大罐子灌满了水，拎到平台上，挂在那个旧滑轮上，我们作画时，它便悬在我们肩膀的高度。

我记得一天下午，我们像平时一样在厨房里作画，乌龟对我说：

“小野君，我对你现在的作品感到很好奇，肯定不同一般。”

我笑了，眼睛没有离开我的画布。“你为什么这么说？我只是在做一个小实验，仅此而已。”

“可是小野君，我已经很长时间没有见你这么专注地工作了。而且你要求保密。你已经至少两年没有要求保密了。自从你开始为第一

次画展准备那幅《狮舞》之后，就再没有过。”

也许我应该解释一下，偶尔，一位画家觉得某件作品在完成前会受某种评论的干扰，便要求对那件作品“保密”，大家便知道，在画家撤回他的要求之前，谁也不能看那幅作品。大家这样密切地在一起生活和工作，这是一种合理的安排，使画家有自己的探索空间，而不用担心出洋相。

“真的这么引人注目？”我说。“我还觉得我把自己的兴奋掩饰得很好呢。”

“小野君，你一定忘记了，我们已经肩并肩地在一起作画快八年了。嗯，没错，我看出这幅画不同一般。”

“八年了，”我说，“我想是的。”

“没错，小野君。跟你这么有才华的人一起工作，是我的荣幸。偶尔让我有点无地自容，但实在是一种很大的荣幸。”

“你过奖了。”我微笑着说，一边继续作画。

“没有过奖，小野君。真的，我觉得，这些年来，如果没有你的作品在我眼前不断激励着我，我绝不可能取得这样的进步。你无疑注意到了，拙作《秋日的姑娘》从你的杰作《日落的姑娘》里获得了多少灵感。小野君，这只是我试图仿效你的才华的许多尝试之一。我知道，只是一种单薄的尝试，但毛利君非常仁慈，夸奖说这是我的一个显著进步。”

“我不知道，”我停住画笔，端详着我的作品，“我不知道这幅画是否也能给你灵感。”

我继续研究我那画了一半的作品，过了一会儿，我隔着我们中间那个古老的罐子朝我的朋友望去。乌龟在愉快地作画，没有感觉到我的目光。跟我在竹田大师的公司初次认识他的那个时候相比，他长了一些肉，以前那种疲倦的、心惊胆战的神情也在很大程度上被一种孩子气的心满意足所取代。实际上，我记得当时有人把乌龟比作一只刚被人宠爱过的哈巴狗，没错，那天下午我在旧厨房里注视他作画时，觉得这个形容并不算离谱。

“告诉我，乌龟，”我对他说，“你对你目前的作品很满意，是吗？”

“非常满意，谢谢你，小野君。”他毫不迟疑地回答。接着抬起头来，咧嘴笑笑又说：“当然啦，要跟你的作品相提并论还早着呢，小野君。”

他的目光又回到他的画作上，我又注视了他一会儿，然后问道：

“你有时候是不是想过尝试一些……一些新的画法？”

“新的画法，小野君？”他说，没有抬头。

“告诉我，乌龟，你有没有想过，有朝一日创作出真正有分量的作品？我不是指我们在这别墅里欣赏和称赞的这些，我是指真正有分量的作品。能够对我国的人民做出巨大贡献的作品。乌龟，正是为了这个目的，我才谈到需要探索新的画法。”

我说话时密切注视着乌龟，但乌龟并没有停止作画。

“说实在的，小野君，”他说，“我这样地位卑微的人一直在尝试新的画法。可是在过去的一年里，我相信自己终于找到了正确的路子。你知道的，小野君，我发现在这一年里，毛利君越来越注意地观察我的作品。我知道他对我感到满意。谁知道呢，也许将来某个时候，我的作品能跟你和毛利君一起展出呢。”他终于抬起头来看着我，不自然地笑了笑。“请原谅，小野君。我是想入非非，好让自己能够坚持下去。”

我决定不再谈这件事。我打算过些日子试着跟我的朋友推心置腹，可是却被别的事情绊住了。

在刚才那段对话几天之后的一个晴朗的早晨，我走进那间旧厨房，发现乌龟站在那个类似谷仓的建筑物后面的平台上，直瞪瞪地看着我。我刚从外面明亮的阳光下进来，眼睛过了几秒钟才适应了屋里的昏暗，但我很快注意到乌龟脸上那副警觉的、几乎是受了惊吓的表情。没错，他那样不自然地把胳膊举到胸前，又让它垂落下去，使得我觉得他以为我要打他。他没有支起他的画架，也没有为一天的工作做其他的准备，我跟他打招呼时，他一声不吭。我走过去问道：

“出什么事了？”

“小野君……”他低声叫了一句，便不说话了。我朝平台走去时，他紧张地把目光投向他的左边。我循着他的视线，看到我那幅没有画完的作品，它被罩了起来，背过去靠墙放着。乌龟不安地指了指它，说道：

“小野君，你是在开玩笑吗？”

“不，乌龟，”我说，一边走上平台，“绝对不是开玩笑。”

我走到作品前，扯掉罩布，把它转过来面朝我们。乌龟立刻挪开了目光。

“我的朋友，”我说，“你曾经勇敢地听了我的话，跟我一起跨出了事业上重要的一步。现在我请你考虑再跟我一起往前跨一步。”

乌龟还是扭着脸，说：

“小野君，老师知道这幅画吗？”

“不，还不知道。但我想我会拿给他看的。从现在起，我打算一直按这个路子画。乌龟，看看我的作品。我来给你解释我想做什么。也许我们可以再次共同跨出重要的一步呢。”

终于，他转过脸来看着我。

“小野君，”他用近乎耳语的声音说，“你是个叛徒。请你原谅。”

说完，他匆匆离开了房间。

那幅令乌龟如此不安的作品名为《得意》，它已经很久不在我手里了，但我创作它时非常投入，所以每个细节都深深地印在我的记忆里。是的，我觉得如果我愿意的话，现在还能十分精确地把那幅画重新再画出来。它的灵感来自我几个星期前目睹的不起眼的一幕，当时我正跟松田一起在外面散步。

我记得我们是去跟松田在冈田——武田协会的几位同事见面，他要把我介绍给他们。那时候正值夏末，最热的天已经过去，但我记得我跟着松田坚定的步伐走在西鹤的桥上，用手擦去脸上的汗，心里希望我的同伴走慢一些。松田那天穿着一件典雅的白色夏装，帽子像往常一样歪戴着，显得很有个性。他虽然走得很快，但脚步轻盈，看不出一丝匆忙。他在桥中央停住脚步，我发现他似乎根本没感到热得难受。

“从这上面看过去很有意思，”他说，“你说呢，小野？”

在我们下面，一左一右耸立着两个工厂。挤在两个工厂之间的，是一片密密麻麻、杂乱无章的屋顶，有的是廉价的木瓦，有的是用波纹金属临时搭建而成。今天，西鹤区仍然被看成一个贫困地区，而当

年情况要糟糕得多。一个陌生人从桥上看去，会以为这里是一片遭到毁灭的荒地，可是仔细观察，却能看见许多小小的人影在那些房子周围忙碌地活动，就像蚂蚁在石头周围奔走一样。

“看看下面，小野，”松田说，“我们城里这样的地方越来越多。仅仅两三年前，这里还没有这么糟糕。现在它成了一个贫民区。穷人越来越多，小野，他们不得不离开农村的老宅，到这里来跟这些人一起受罪。”

“真可怕，”我说，“真想为他们做点什么。”

松田微笑地看着我——那种高高在上的笑容，总是使我感到别扭，感到自己很蠢。“善意的观点，”他说，又转过去看着桥下，“大家都说这种话。在生活的各个层面。可是，这样的地方像毒蘑菇一样到处蔓延。小野，你深吸一口气。即使在这里也能闻到污水的臭味。”

“我注意到气味不好。真的是从下面飘过来的吗？”

松田没有回答，只是继续看着下面的贫民区，脸上带着古怪的笑容。然后他说：

“政客和商人很少看到这样的地方。即使看到，也是像我们这样站得远远的。我怀疑有多少政客和商人在那下面走过。说到这点，我也不相信有多少画家这么做过。”

我听出他语气里带有激将的成分，便说：

“如果约会不会迟到，我倒不反对下去走一走。”

松田说得不错，那股臭气确实是那片社区的污水散发出来的。我们来到铁桥脚下，开始在那些狭窄的小巷里穿行时，气味越来越强烈，最后达到了令人作呕的程度。炎热中没有一丝风，周围的空气中唯一的动静就是嗡嗡不绝的苍蝇。我又一次发现我吃力地想追上松田的步伐，但这次可不希望他放慢速度。

在我们两边，有许多类似集市上已经收摊的小摊，实际上就是家家户户的住房，有时只用一道布帘跟小巷子隔开。有的门前坐着老人，我们经过时，他们饶有兴趣但毫无敌意地盯着我们看；到处都有小孩子跑来跑去，我们脚边似乎一直有猫在逃窜。我们往前走着，躲开晾晒在粗糙绳子上的床单和衣物，经过哭闹的婴儿，吠叫的狗，还有隔着小巷、仿佛是从帘子后面彼此亲热交谈的邻居。过了一会儿，

我越来越强烈地意识到窄巷的两边是挖出来的阴沟。苍蝇在阴沟上方嗡嗡盘旋，我跟着松田往前走，清楚地感觉到阴沟之间的路越来越窄，最后我们好像是走在一根倒地的树干上。

终于，我们来到一个像是院子的地方，一片简陋的茅草屋挡住了前面的路。松田指着两间茅草屋之间的一个豁口，从那里能看见一片开阔的荒地。

“我们从那里穿过去，”他说，“就能绕到小金井街后面。”

快要走到松田指的那条路的入口时，我注意到三个小男孩弯腰在看地上的什么东西，还用棍子捅它。我们走过去，他们猛地转过身，满脸怒容，虽然我什么也没看见，但他们的表现告诉我，他们正在折磨一个动物。松田肯定也得出了同样的结论，我们走过小男孩身边时他说：“唉，这里也没有别的东西让他们娱乐。”

我当时对那些小男孩没有多想。几天之后，他们三个人的形象又清晰地浮现在我脑海里：怒容满面地转向我们，挥着手里的棍子，站在那片肮脏的地方。我把它用作《得意》的核心画面。但我应该指出，当乌龟那天早晨偷看我那幅没有画完的作品时，他看见的那三个男孩在一两个重要方面跟原型有所不同。尽管他们仍然站在简陋肮脏的茅草屋前，身上的衣服也跟那几个男孩一样破烂不堪，但是他们脸上的怒容，不再是小罪犯被当场抓住时的那种心虚和提防，而是像准备作战的武士一样，很阳刚地蹙着眉头。另外，我画里的男孩子用古代剑道的姿势举着棍子，也并不是一种巧合。

在这三个男孩的头顶上，乌龟会看见画面自然过渡到第二组形象——三个衣冠楚楚、脑满肠肥的男人，坐在一家舒适的酒馆里，开怀大笑。他们脸上的表情显得很颓废，也许是在交流关于女人的什么笑话。这两组截然相反的形象，在日本列岛的海岸线上融在一起。右下角的留白处是大大的红色字体：“得意”，左下角用较小的字体写着这句宣言：“可是年轻人准备为尊严而战。”

当我描绘这幅早年的、无疑很不成熟的作品时，你肯定觉得其中一些特点并不陌生。你也许知道我的作品《放眼地平线》，那是三十年代的一幅木刻画，在这个城市赢得了一定的荣誉和影响。《放眼地平线》实际上是《得意》的翻版，由于两幅作品相隔多年，肯定存在一些差异。你大概记得，后一幅画也是两组截然不同的形象互相融合，由日本的海岸线连结在一起。画面上部那组形象仍是三个衣冠楚楚的男人在交谈，但这次他们表情紧张，不知所措地面面相觑。用不

着我提醒，这三张脸酷似那三位显赫一时的政治家。画面下部是一组占主导地位的形象，那三个贫困交加的男孩成了神色坚定的战士。其中两人端着上了刺刀的步枪，中间站着一位军官，举着长剑指向前方——西边的亚洲。他们身后不再是赤贫的背景，而是一片太阳军旗。右下角的“得意”二字换成了“放眼地平线”，左下角写着：“没有时间怯懦地闲聊。日本必须前进。”

当然，如果你是刚来这个城市，可能没有接触到这幅作品。但我认为可以毫不夸张地说，战前生活在这个城里的许多人都对它很熟悉，它因为笔触大胆，色彩运用效果强烈，在当时获得很多好评。当然啦，我很清楚地意识到，《放眼地平线》这部作品，撇开其艺术价值不谈，其表达的情绪现在已经过时。是的，我愿意率先承认，那些情绪或许是应该受到谴责的。我不是那种不敢承认昔日作品中的缺点的人。

但是我不想谈论《放眼地平线》。我在这里提到它，是因为它跟早年那幅作品有明显的关系，而且我想说明跟松田相识对我后来事业的影响。那天早晨乌龟在厨房里发现那件事之前的几个星期，我开始定期去看松田。我想，我不断地去看他，是因为他的思想吸引着我，我记得我一开始对他并没有什么好感。是的，刚开始我们的聚会到了最后，互相总是产生强烈的敌意。比如，我记得就在我跟着他穿过西鹤贫民区之后不久，有一天晚上我跟他一起到市中心的一家酒馆。我记不清酒馆的名字和方位了，只清楚地记得那是一个黑暗、肮脏的地方，顾客看上去都来自城市的底层。我一进去就感到不安，但松田似乎对这里很熟悉，跟几个围在桌旁打牌的男人打了招呼，便领我走向一个放着一张小空桌子的隔间。

我们坐下不久，两个相貌粗鲁、喝得微醉的男人，踉踉跄跄地走进隔间，想跟我们聊天。松田直截了当地叫他们走开，我还以为要有麻烦了，但松田似乎把两个男人震慑住了，他们一言不发就离开了我们。

之后，我们边喝边聊了一会儿，我很快就发现我们的交谈有点令人恼火。我记得我忍不住对他说：

“毫无疑问，我们画家有时候确实值得你们这样的人取笑。但你想当然地认为我们都很天真，不谙世事，恐怕是不对的。”

松田大笑着说：

“你肯定记得，小野，我认识许多画家。总的来说，你们都是极端颓废的一群人。对这个世界的了解经常还不如一个孩子。”

我刚要反驳，松田又接着说道：“就拿你的这个计划来说吧，小野。就是你刚才非常真诚地提出的那个计划。它很令人感动，但是请原谅，却正好反映了你们这些画家特有的天真。”

“我不明白为什么我的想法值得你这样嘲笑。我本以为你很关心这个城里的穷人，看来我是错了。”

“你不用这样孩子气地改变话题。你很清楚我关心他们。可是让我们暂且考虑一下你的那个小小的计划吧。假设你的老师破天荒地动了恻隐之心。然后你们整个别墅的人就会花一个星期，或两个星期创作——什么呢？——二十幅画？最多三十幅。似乎没必要再多画了，反正你们最多也只能卖出十多幅。然后你们会怎么做呢，小野？带着辛辛苦苦挣来的一小袋硬币走进这个城市的贫民区？碰到一个穷人就给一分钱？”

“请原谅，松田，但我必须再说一遍——你把我想得这么幼稚是大错特错了。我从来也没有提议画展仅限于毛利君师生。我很清楚我们想要缓解的贫困规模有多大，所以才来跟你商量这个建议。你们冈田——武田协会正可以推动这样一个计划。全城定期举办大型画展，吸引更多的画家，会给那些人带来很大的救助。”

“对不起，小野，”松田说，笑微微地摇了摇头，“但恐怕我的判断是正确的。作为一个整体，你们画家是极其幼稚的。”他靠在椅背上，叹了口气。桌上满是烟灰，松田若有所思地用前面客人留下的一个空火柴盒的边缘在烟灰里画出图案。“最近有一种画家，”他继续说道，“他们的最大才华就是远离现实世界，躲在象牙塔内。不幸的是，这样的画家目前还占主导地位，而你，小野，正受到其中一位画家的影响。别这么生气，这是事实。你对这个世界的认识还像个孩子。比如，我怀疑你能不能告诉我卡尔·马克思是谁。”

我气呼呼地看了他一眼，没有说话。他笑了一声，说：“明白了吧？你也别太难过。你的大多数同事并不比你懂得多。”

“别胡扯了。我当然知道卡尔·马克思。”

“哎哟，对不起，小野。也许我低估你了。那么，请你跟我谈谈马克思吧。”

我耸了耸肩，说：“我记得他领导了俄国革命。”

“那么列宁是怎么回事呢，小野？他也许是马克思的副指挥官？”

“大概是同事吧。”我看见松田又露出了微笑，便不等他开口，赶紧说道：“反正，你真是荒唐。这些都是某个遥远国家的事情。我们现在谈的是这个城里的穷人。”

“是的，小野，是的。可是你看，你其实什么都不知道。你认为冈田——武田协会一心想唤醒画家，把他们领入现实世界，这点没错。但如果我什么时候说过我们协会想变成一只大的讨饭碗，那我就是误导了你。我们对慈善不感兴趣。”

“我不明白做点善事有什么不对。如果与此同时还能打开我们这些颓废画家的眼睛，那就更好了，我应该想到的。”

“如果你相信一点好心肠的善事能帮助我们国家的穷人，那你的眼睛还远远没有睁开，小野。事实是，日本面临危机。我们落在贪婪的商人和软弱的政客手中。这样的人会让贫困日益加剧。除非，我们新生的一代采取行动。但我不是政治鼓动家，小野。我关心的是艺术，是你这样的画家。有才华的年轻画家，还没有被你那个封闭的小世界永远地蒙蔽双眼。冈田——武田的存在是为了帮助你这样的人睁开双眼，为这个艰难时代创作出真正有价值的作品。”

“请原谅，松田，但我觉得你才是天真幼稚的。一位画家关心的是如何捕捉到美。他在这方面不管技艺多么高超，都不会对你说的那些事情产生什么影响。是的，如果冈田——武田真的像你所说的那样，那么我觉得它是个拙劣的构想，建立在一个错误的想法上，不清楚艺术到底能做什么、不能做什么。”

“你知道得很清楚，小野，我们看问题没有这么简单。事实上，冈田——武田的存在不是孤立的。生活的各个领域都有我们这样的年轻人——在政界、军界——大家的想法都一样。我们是新生的一代。我们团结起来，就有能力做出真正有价值的事业。正好，我们一些人对艺术情有独钟，希望看到艺术能响应当今世界的呼唤。事实上，小野，在这样的时期，当周围的人民越来越贫穷，孩子们越来越饥饿、病弱，一个画家躲在象牙塔里精益求精地画艺伎是远远不够的。看得出来，你生我的气了，正在绞尽脑汁想办法反驳我。其实我是一片好意，小野。我希望你过后仔细考虑一下这些事情。因为你确实是一个才华横溢的人。”

“那么，你告诉我，松田，我们这些颓废愚蠢的画家怎么帮助你们实现政治革命呢？”

令我恼火的是，松田在桌子对面又露出那种轻蔑的笑容。“革命？说实在的，小野，共产主义者想要革命，我们可不要那玩意儿。实际上正好相反。我们要的是光复。我们只是希望天皇陛下恢复他一国之主的正当地位。”

“可是天皇已经在这个位置上了。”

“说实在的，小野，你可真是幼稚糊涂。”他的语气虽然还是一如既往地平静，这时似乎显出了一些严厉。“天皇是我们当然的领袖，然而实际上是怎么回事呢？他的权利都被那些商人和他们的政客夺走了。听我说，小野，日本不再是个落后的农业国家。我们现在是个强大的民族，能跟任何西方国家抗衡。在亚洲半球，日本像一个巨人，屹立在侏儒和残废中间。可是我们却眼睁睁地看着我们的人民越来越水深火热，我们的孩子死于营养不良。与此同时，商人越来越富，政客永远在那里找借口、扯闲话。你能想象任何一个西方国家允许这样的局面存在吗？他们肯定早就采取行动了。”

“行动？你指的是什么样的行动，松田？”

“现在我们应该打造一个像英国和法国那样强大而富有的帝国。我们必须利用我们的力量向外扩张。时机已到，日本应该在世界列强中占领它应得的位置。相信我吧，小野，我们有办法做到这点，但还没有找到决心。而且我们必须摆脱那些商人和政客。然后，军队就会只听从天皇陛下的召唤。”说到这里，他微微一笑，目光又转向他在烟灰里画的图案。“但这只是别人操心的事，”他说，“我们这样的人，小野，关心的只是艺术。”

不过，我相信两三个星期后乌龟在废弃的厨房里的紧张不安，跟我那天晚上跟松田讨论的这些事情并没有多大关系。乌龟没有这样的洞察力，能从我那幅没有完成的作品里看到这么多东西。他所能看出的，只是作品体现了对毛利君风格的明目张胆的忽视，而且我没有像其他同学那样努力去捕捉娱乐世界里转瞬即逝的灯光。作品用大胆的书法来强调视觉冲击，当然，更重要的是，乌龟看到我大量使用硬笔勾勒轮廓——你知道的，这是一种传统画法，而毛利君教学的基础就是反对这种画法——乌龟看到这点，肯定是大惊失色了。

不管他愤怒的原因是什么，从那天早晨之后我就知道，我再也不可能向周围的人隐瞒我的那些快速形成的思想，而且老师早晚也会有

所耳闻。因此，当我跟毛利君在高见花园的亭子里进行那番谈话的时候，我已经在脑海里反复想过怎么对他说，告诉他我已经决定不让自己趋炎附势。

大约是厨房那个上午过去一星期后，我和毛利君下午到城里办事——大概是采买颜料吧，我记不清了。但我记得我们办事的时候，毛利君对我的态度没有任何异样。夜幕降临时，我们发现离火车进站还有一点时间，便顺着横河车站后面陡峭的台阶，走向上面的高见花园。

当时，高见花园有一座非常宜人的亭子，就建在山坡上，俯瞰着下面的地区——实际上离今天的和平纪念碑所在的地方不远。那个亭子最吸引人的特点是古雅的亭檐上挂满了灯笼——但我记得那天晚上我们走近时，那些灯笼都没有点亮。亭子里面像大房间一样宽敞，但四周没有围墙，只有拱柱支撑着顶部，那些柱子挡住了从这里看下去的景致。

那天晚上跟毛利君在一起，很可能是我第一次发现那个亭子。在后来许多年里，它一直是我最喜欢的地方，直到在战争中被摧毁。我和我的学生路过那里时，我经常带他们到亭子里去。是的，我相信在战争刚刚开始后，我和黑田就在那个亭子里进行了最后一次谈话，他是我的学生中最有天分的一个。

总之，我记得我第一次跟毛利君走进亭子时，天空变成了浅红色，下面仍然可见的那片黑乎乎的屋顶正在亮起一盏盏灯。毛利君往前走了几步，然后靠在一根柱子上，仰望着天空，神情里有几分满足，他并不转身地对我说：

“小野，我们的帕子里有一些火柴和蜡烛。劳驾你把这些灯笼点亮。我想效果肯定非常有趣。”

我绕着亭子点亮一盏盏灯笼，周围寂静无声的花园便隐入黑暗之中。我点灯的时候，时不时地扫一眼毛利君被夜空衬托着的身影。他若有所思地望着外面的景色。大概点到一半灯笼的时候，我听见他说：

“那么，小野，是什么让你这么烦恼呢？”

“您说什么，先生？”

“你今天提到，有件事让你很烦恼。”

我轻轻笑了一声，伸手去点一盏灯笼。

“一件小事，先生。我不想拿它烦扰先生，但我实在不知道该怎么办。是这样的，两天前，我发现我的一些画被人拿走了，我一直把它们放在旧厨房里的。”

毛利君沉默了一会儿，然后说：

“别人对这件事怎么说？”

“我问过他们，但好像没有人知道。至少，没有人愿意告诉我。”

“那你得出了什么结论呢，小野？难道有人阴谋暗算你？”

“嗯，实际上，先生，别人似乎都巴不得躲着我。是的，这几天我没能跟他们任何人说上一句话。我刚走进一间屋子，人们就沉默下来，或者干脆一走了之。”

他听了这话未作评论，我朝他看了一眼，他似乎仍然全神贯注地望着日落的天空。我正在点亮另一盏灯笼，又听他说道：

“你的画目前在我手里。对不起，我把它们拿走，让你紧张了。只是那天我碰巧有点时间，就想看看你最近的作品。你当时好像出去了。我想你回来后我应该告诉你的，小野。我向你道歉。”

“哎呀，没关系的，先生。您对拙作这样感兴趣，我真是感激不尽。”

“我当然应该感兴趣。你是我最有成就的学生。这么多年来我一直在培养你。”

“那是那是，先生。我欠您的恩情实在太多了。”

我们俩都沉默了一会儿，我继续点灯笼。然后我停来说道：

“知道我的画完好无损，我心里一块石头落了地。我应该知道事情其实很简单。现在我可以放心了。”

毛利君听了这话什么也没说，从他的侧影看，他仍然在眺望夜景。我想他大概没有听见我的话，就提高点声音说道：

“知道我的画完好无损，我总算可以放心了。”

“是的，小野。”毛利君说，似乎从某种沉思中被惊醒了。“那天我手头正好有点空闲，就叫人去把你最近的作品拿来了。”

“我真蠢，不应该担心的。我很高兴我的画完好无损。”

他良久没有开口，我又以为他没有听见我的话。可是他突然说：“我看见的东西让我感到有点吃惊。你似乎在另辟蹊径。”

当然啦，他也许并没有使用这个词，“另辟蹊径”。因为我想起这个词是我自己后来经常使用的，我很可能是想起了后来我在那个亭子里对黑田说的话。可是，我相信毛利君确实有时提到“另辟蹊径”。也许，这又一次证明我继承了老师的特点。总之，我记得我当时没有回答，只是不自然地笑了一声，便伸手去点另一盏灯笼。这时我听见他说：

“年轻画家做些尝试不是一件坏事。至少，他可以摆脱一些比较肤浅的兴趣。然后胸有成竹地回到更加严肃的作品上来。”他顿了顿，又仿佛是自言自语地说：“是的，做些尝试不是一件坏事。年轻人是难免的。绝对不是一件坏事。”

“先生，”我说，“我强烈地感觉到我最近的作品是我画过的最好的。”

“不是一件坏事，绝对不是一件坏事。可是，不应该把太多的时间花在这样的尝试上。不然就会变成一个耽于旅行的人。最好还是趁早回到严肃的作品上来。”

我等着，看他是否还有话要说。过了片刻，我说：“我还担心那些画的安全，实在是太愚蠢了。可是您看，先生，它们比我的其他作品更让我感到骄傲。其实，我应该猜到事情的原因就这么简单。”

毛利君仍然沉默着。我越过正在点亮的那盏灯笼看了他一眼，看不清他是在考虑我的话，还是在想另外的事。夜幕继续降临，我点亮的灯笼越来越多，亭子里的光影很奇特。但我还是只能看见毛利君的剪影靠在柱子上，背对着我。

“顺便说一句，”他终于说道，“我听说你最近完成了一两幅作品，它们不在我拿到的那些画里。”

“很有可能，有一两幅画我没有跟别的放在一起。”

“啊。这些无疑就是你最喜欢的画了。”

我没有回答。毛利君接着说道：

“我们回去之后，小野，也许你会把另外那几幅画拿给我。我很想看看。”

我考虑了一会儿，说道：“当然，我会非常感谢先生对它们的评论。可是，我记不清我把它们放在哪儿了。”

“我相信你会努力把它们找到的。”

“我会的，先生。现在，我或许应该把其他的画从先生那里拿回来，感谢先生对它们的兴趣。它们无疑给您的屋子添乱了，我一回去就尽快把它们拿走。”

“不用管那些画，小野。你只要找到剩下的那些画，拿来给我就行了。”

“很遗憾，先生，我恐怕找不到剩下来的那些画了。”

“明白了，小野。”他疲惫地叹了口气，我看见他又一次抬头仰望夜空。“那么，你认为你不可能把你的那些画拿给我看了？”

“是的，先生，恐怕不能。”

“明白了。当然，你已经考虑过倘若离开我这里后的前途了。”

“我希望先生能理解我的想法，继续支持我追求事业。”

他继续沉默，于是我接着说：

“先生，离开别墅我会感到非常痛苦。过去这几年是我生命中最快乐、最有价值的一段时光。我把同事们都看作亲兄弟。至于先生，唉，千言万语说不尽先生的恩情。我请求您再看看我的新作品，重新审视一下。也许，我们回去后，先生会允许我解释每幅画的意图。”

他似乎没有听见我的话。我便又说道：

“这些年我学到不少东西。探究娱乐世界，发现它的转瞬即逝的美，这些都使我受益匪浅。但我觉得现在我应该向别的方面发展了。先生，我相信在这个动荡不安的时代，画家必须看重一些比随着晨光消失的欢乐更加实在的东西。画家不必总是缩在一个颓废而闭塞的世界里。先生，我的责任心告诉我，我不能永远做一个浮世绘画家。”

说完，我把注意力又转向灯笼。过了片刻，毛利君说：

“一段时间以来，你一直是最优秀的学生。看到你离开我会很惋惜的。这样吧，给你三天时间把剩下来的那些画拿给我。你把它们拿来给我，然后把心思转入正轨。”

“我已经说过了，先生，我非常遗憾，不能把那些画拿给您。”

毛利君发出一点声音，似乎是对自己笑了笑。然后他说：“正如你刚才指出的，小野，这是一个动荡不安的时代。对于一个默默无闻、没权没势的年轻画家来说更是如此。如果你不是这样有才华，我会为你离开我之后的前途担心。但你是个聪明人。你肯定已经做好了安排。”

“实际上，我没有做任何安排。这么长时间以来，别墅一直是我的家。我从没认真考虑过要离开它。”

“是吗。好吧，就像我说的，小野，如果你不是这么有才华，我倒是有理由替你担心。但你是个聪明的年轻人。”我看见毛利君的剪影转过来对着我。“你肯定能找到给杂志和漫画书画插图的工作。说不定，你还能进入一家来我这里之前受雇的那种公司。当然，这将意味着你作为一名严肃画家的生涯到此结束，但所有这些你无疑已经考虑过了。”

身为老师，明知道一位学生仍然对他心存仰慕，却说出这样报复性的话来，真是大可不必。可是，一位绘画大师投入这么多时间和资源培养一个学生，而且允许学生的名字公开与他自己的名字联系在一起，那么他一时失态，做出令自己后悔的反应，即便不是可以原谅的，也应该是可以理解的。在作品的所有权上要心眼无疑显得有些小气，可是，如果大多数作画材料和颜料都是老师提供的，那么他偶尔忘记学生有权任意处置自己的作品，当然也是可以理解的。

但是，作为一个老师——不管他多么有名——表现出这样的傲慢，这样的占有欲，着实令人遗憾。现在，我的脑海里还时常会浮现出那个寒冷冬日的早晨，那股烟味儿再次扑鼻而来，比以往任何时候都更强烈。那是战争爆发前的冬天，我焦虑地站在黑田住处的门口——是他在中町地区租住的一个简陋住房。我辨别出那股烟味儿是房子里发出来的，里面还传出一个女人的哭泣声。我一个劲儿地拉铃，叫人过来给我开门，可是里面无人应答。最后，我决定自己直接进去，可是我刚把大门拉开，一位穿制服的警察就出现在了门口。

“你想做什么？”他问。

“我来找黑田先生。他在家吗？”

“房主已经被带到警察局接受审问。”

“审问？”

“我建议你回家吧，”警察说，“不然我们也会对你进行调查。我们现在对所有跟房主密切相关的人都感兴趣。”

“可是为什么呢？黑田先生犯了什么事吗？”

“谁也不想跟他这样的人来往。如果你还不走，我们就要把你也弄去审问了。”

房子里，那个女人还在哭泣——我断定那是黑田的母亲。我还听见有人大声对她嚷嚷着什么。

“负责的警官在哪里？”我问。

“快走吧，你想被捕吗？”

“你先别忙，让我解释一下，”我说，“我的名字是小野。”警察毫无反应，于是我不太有把握地继续说：“是我向你们通风报信，你们才过来的。我是小野增二，是画家和内务部文化委员会的委员。实际上，我还是反爱国动向委员会的官方顾问。我认为这里肯定有某些误会，我想跟负责的人谈谈。”

警察将信将疑地看了我一会儿，转身进了房子。很快，他回来了，示意我进去。

我跟着他走进黑田的住所，看见柜子和抽屉里的东西都被倾倒在地板上。我发现有些书捆起来堆在了地上，客厅里的榻榻米被掀开，一个警察举着火把查看下面的地板。从一个关着门的房间里，我更清楚地听见黑田的母亲在哭泣，一个警察在粗声恶气地审问她。

我被领到房子后面的阳台上。在小院子中央，另一位穿制服的警察和一个便衣站在一堆火旁。便衣转过身来，朝我走了几步。

“小野先生么？”他很恭敬地问。

领我进来的那个警察似乎意识到刚才不该对我那么粗鲁，立刻转身进屋去了。

“黑田先生怎么了？”

“去接受审问了，小野先生。别担心，我们会照顾好他的。”

我望着他身后已快要熄灭的火堆。那个穿制服的警察正用一根棍子在里面捅着。

“你们烧掉这些画作得到过官方许可吗？”我问。

“我们的政策是，凡是不需要作为证据的有害物品一律销毁。我们已经挑了足够的样品。剩下来的这些垃圾就烧掉了。”

“我不明白怎么会发生这种事情。我只是建议委员会派人过来跟黑田先生谈谈，这也是为了他好。”我又看着院子中央那堆快要熄灭的火。“完全没必要把这些东西烧掉。里面有许多很不错的作品。”

“小野先生，我们很感谢您的帮助。但现在调查已经开始，您必须让有关部门来处理这件事。我们向您保证，黑田先生会得到公正的待遇的。”

他微笑着，把脸转向火堆，对那个穿制服的警察说了一句什么。警察又往火里捅了几下，压低声音嘟囔了一句，好像是：“反爱国的垃圾。”

我留在阳台上，不敢相信地注视着这一切。最后，那个便衣又转向我说：“小野先生，我建议您还是回家吧。”

“事情发展得太过分了，”我说，“你们为什么要审问黑田夫人？这些事跟她有什么关系？”

“现在这是警方的事情，小野先生，已经跟您没有关系了。”

“事情发展得太过分了。我打算跟冲方先生谈谈。没错，我还要直接去找佐分先生本人。”

便衣大声叫屋里的某个人，刚才出来应门的那个警察便出现在我身边。

“感谢小野先生的帮助，送他出去吧。”便衣说。然后他转向火堆，突然咳嗽了一声。“劣质作品的烟味也难闻。”他笑着说，一边用手扇着面前的空气。

可是我又离题了。我记得我是在回忆上个月节子短暂来访的那天的事情。实际上，我是在叙述太郎在饭桌上讲同事的故事，逗得我们开怀大笑。

我记得晚饭在非常令人满意的气氛中进行着。但是每次仙子斟酒，我都忍不住忐忑不安地看着一郎。前面几次，他隔着桌子，心照不宣地笑着看我一眼，我尽量不动声色地迎接他的目光。时间一点点过去，酒添了一巡又一巡，他不再看我，而是气呼呼地瞪着给我们斟酒的仙子。

太郎又给我们讲了他同事的几个有趣的故事，然后节子对他说：

“你太有意思了，太郎君。但我听仙子说，你们公司现在士气很高。不用说，在这样的气氛里工作一定很受鼓舞吧？”

听了这话，太郎的态度突然变得非常真诚。“确实如此，节子小姐，”他点点头说，“战后我们做的一些改进，现在公司上下已经看到了成效。如果我们发奋努力，再有不到十年，KNC应该不仅闻名日本，还会蜚声全球呢。”

“太妙了。仙子还告诉我，你们分部的主任是个非常仁慈的人。那肯定对提高士气很有帮助。”

“你说得太对了。早坂先生不仅为人慈善，还是个很有能力和眼光的人。节子小姐，我可以向你保证，在一个没有能力的庸人手下工作，不管他心眼有多好，都是一种令人沮丧的经历。我们真是三生有幸，能有早坂先生这样的人做我们的领导。”

“是啊，池田也很幸运，也有一位非常能干的上司。”

“是吗，节子小姐？我就知道日本电气这样的公司应该是这样的。只有最优秀的人才能在这样的公司里担任一官半职。”

“确实如此，我们太幸运了。但我相信KNC公司也是一样，太郎君。池田一向对KNC评价很高。”

“请原谅，太郎，”我这时插嘴道，“当然，我相信你有足够的理由以乐观的态度看待KNC。但是我一直想问问你，你真的认为战后所做的那么多彻底改变是有益的吗？我听说旧的管理模式几乎都不存在了。”

女婿若有所思地微笑着，然后说道：“非常感谢岳父大人的关心。年轻和活力并不总能产生最好的结果。可是坦白地说，岳父大人，我们需要彻底改头换面。当今的世界需要新的领导、新的举措。”

“当然，当然。你们的新领导都是最有能力的人，对此我毫不怀疑。可是，太郎，请你告诉我，你有时候是否担心我们跟随美国人的步子有点太仓促了？我举双手赞成许多旧的方式必须彻底废除，可是，你难道没有想过，一些好东西也跟糟粕一起被丢弃了吗？是的，有时候日本看上去就像一个小孩子在跟一个不认识的大人学习。”

“父亲说得很对。我确实认为我们有时候太仓促了点。但是总的来说，美国人是大量东西值得我们学习的。就拿最近几年来说吧，我们日本在理解民主和个人权益等问题上已经前进了一大步。说实在的，岳父大人，我感到日本终于打好地基，要创建一个美好的未来了。所以，我们这样的公司才能够信心百倍地展望未来。”

“是的，大郎君，”节子说，“池田也有这样的感觉。他最近许多次发表他的观点，说经过四年的混乱，我们国家终于确定了今后的蓝图。”

虽然我女儿是在对大郎说话，但我明显感觉到她这番话是说给我听的。大郎似乎也这么认为，他没有回答节子，而是继续对我说：

“实际上，岳父大人，上个星期我参加了毕业生的聚餐，自日本投降后，生活在各个阶层的代表第一次表达了对未来的乐观情绪。大家感到绝不只是在KNC事情步入正轨。我完全理解岳父大人的担忧，但我相信，这些年的教训总的来说是有益的，会领导我们开创一个美好的未来。但我也许说得不对，岳父大人。”

“没有，没有，”我笑着对他说，“正如你说的，你们这代人有一个美好的未来。而且你们都这样信心十足。我只能深深地祝福你们。”

女婿似乎想回答，但就在这时，一郎就像先前那样，隔着桌子用手指敲敲酒瓶。大郎转向他，说：“啊，一郎君，我们的谈话正缺你呢。告诉我，你长大以后想做什么？”

外孙继续端详了一会儿酒瓶，然后气呼呼地看了我一眼。他母亲碰了碰他的胳膊，轻声对他说：“一郎，大郎姨夫问你呢。你告诉他你将来想做什么。”

“日本电气公司总裁！”一郎大声宣布。

我们都笑了。

“你可以肯定吗，一郎君？”大郎问，“你不想当我们KNC的老板？”

“日本电气是最好的公司！”

我们又都笑了。

“真是太遗憾了，”大郎说，“几年以后我们KNC正需要一郎君这样的人呢。”

这段对话似乎让一郎暂时忘记了清酒，从这时起，他一直显得很开心，大人为什么事发笑的时候，他也跟着大声起哄。只是晚饭快要结束时，他用漫不经心的口吻问道：

“酒都喝完了？”

“都喝完了，”仙子说，“一郎君还想喝橘子汁吗？”

一郎彬彬有礼地拒绝了，又转向正在对他解释什么事情的大郎。然而，我还是能想象到他的失望，心里对节子有点恼火，她为什么不能多体谅体谅儿子的感受呢？

大约一个小时候，我走进公寓的那间小客房跟一郎道晚安，才有机会单独跟他说话。灯还亮着，但一郎已经钻进被窝，他趴着，面颊贴着枕头。我关掉灯，发现对面公寓楼的灯光透过百叶窗照进来，把一道道横格栅的影子投在天花板和墙上。隔壁屋子传来两个女儿的笑声，我跪在一郎的床边，他轻声说：

“外公，仙子小姨喝醉了吗？”

“好像没有，一郎。她只是在笑什么事情。”

“她可能有点醉了，你说呢，外公？”

“嗯，也许吧。有一点点醉，没什么关系的。”

“女人对付不了清酒，是不是，外公？”他说，对着枕头咯咯笑出了声。

我笑了一声，对他说：“知道吗，一郎，没必要为今晚喝酒的事难过。其实没什么大不了的。你很快就长大了，到时候想喝多少酒就喝多少酒。”

我起身走到窗户前，看看能不能把百叶窗关严一点。我开关了几次，但窗条之间的缝隙还是很大，我总能看见对面公寓里亮灯的窗户。

“是的，一郎，真的没什么可难过的。”

外孙一时没有说话。然后我听见身后传来他的声音：“外公不要担心。”

“哦？这话是什么意思呢，一郎？”

“外公不要担心。如果外公担心，就睡不着觉。年纪大的人睡不着觉，就会生病。”

“明白了。很好，一郎。外公保证不担心。你也不许难过。实际上，真的没有什么可难过的。”

一郎没有说话。我又把百叶窗开合了一次。

“当然啦，”我说，“如果一郎今晚真的坚持要喝酒，外公肯定会站出来让他喝到的。可是，我想我们这次让着女人是对的。没必要为这样的小事惹她们生气。”

“有时候在家里，”一郎说，“爸爸想做一件事，妈妈不许他做。有时候，就连爸爸也斗不过妈妈。”

“是吗。”我笑着说。

“所以外公不要担心。”

“我们俩都没有什么可担心的，一郎。”我从窗口转过身，又跪在一郎的被子旁边。“好了，你睡吧。”

“外公晚上还走吗？”

“是啊，外公很快就回自己家里去。”

“为什么外公不能也住在这里？”

“这里没有地方了，一郎。外公自己有一座大房子，记得吗？”

“外公明天去车站送我们吗？”

“当然，一郎，我会去的。而且，你肯定很快又会来看我们的。”

“外公不要难过没让妈妈给我喝酒。”

“你看起来长得很快，一郎，”我笑着说，“你长大后会成为个体面的男子汉。也许你真的会做日本电气的老板，或者类似了不起的人物。好了，我们安静一会儿，看你能不能睡着。”

我在他身边又坐了一会儿，他说话时我轻声回答。我想就在这个时候，我坐在黑暗房间里等外孙睡着，听着隔壁偶尔传来的笑声时，我脑海里又想起了那天上午跟节子在河边公园的对话。这大概是我第一次有机会这么做，在此之前，我并没有觉得节子的话这么令人

恼火。可是我记得，当我离开睡熟的外孙，到客厅里去跟他们一起闲坐时，我已经很生大女儿的气，所以我坐下后不久就对太郎说道：

“你知道吗，有时候想想真奇怪。我和你父亲认识肯定超过十六年了，可是直到去年才成为这样好的朋友。”

“是啊，”女婿说，“但我想事情经常是这样。许多邻居都只是见面打个招呼。想起来挺遗憾的。”

“当然啦，”我说，“拿我和佐藤博士来说，我们不仅仅是邻居。我们俩都跟艺术界有关系，知道对方的名望。我和你父亲没有从一开始就建立友谊，就更令人遗憾了。你认为呢，太郎？”

我说话的时候，迅速扫了一眼节子，看她是否在听。

“确实令人遗憾，”太郎说，“但至少你们最后有机会成为朋友。”

“我的意思是，太郎，正因为我们一直知道对方在艺术界的名望，这件事就更令人遗憾。”

“是啊，确实太遗憾了。按理说，知道邻居也是一个名声显赫的同行，应该使两人关系更加亲密才是。可是我想，大家都忙忙碌碌，经常也就顾不上了。”

我有些得意地朝节子看了一眼，但是看女儿的神情，似乎没有理解太郎这番话的意思。当然啦，她可能并没在听，但我猜想节子实际上是听懂了，只是为了自尊没有朝我看，因为这番话足以证明她那天上午在河边公园的含沙射影是完全错误的。

我们迈着悠闲的步子，走在宽阔的中央林荫大道上，欣赏着两边秋天的树木。我们在交流仙子对新生活的感觉，一致认为从各个方面来看，仙子非常幸福。

“真是谢天谢地，”我说，“她的终身大事成了我的一块心病，现在一切都显得这么美满。太郎是个很不错的人。”

“想起来真奇怪，”节子微笑着说，“就在一年前，我们还那么为她操心。”

“多么令人欣慰啊。你知道吗，节子，我很感谢你在这件事上的帮助。事情进展不顺利的时候，你给了你妹妹很大的支持。”

“恰恰相反，我做得很少，还差得远呢。”

“当然啦，”我笑着说，“去年是你提醒了我。‘预防措施’——还记得吗，节子？你看，我没有把你的建议当耳旁风。”

“对不起，爸爸，什么建议？”

“好了，节子，没必要这样遮遮掩掩。现在我非常愿意承认我事业中有些方面是不值得我感到自豪的。是的，就像你建议的那样，我在商量婚事的时候这样承认了。”

“对不起，我真不明白爸爸指的是什么。”

“仙子没有跟你说过相亲的事？那天晚上，我确保她的幸福不会因为我的事业而受到阻碍。我相信我不管怎样都会那么去做的，但我还是感谢你去年的建议。”

“请原谅，爸爸，我不记得去年提过什么建议呀。至于相亲的事，仙子确实跟我提过许多次。实际上相亲后不久她就给我写了封信，表示对爸爸……爸爸说的关于自己的话感到意外。”

“我知道她肯定感到意外。仙子总是低估她的老爸。但我可不是那种人，太要面子，不敢面对现实，就让自己的女儿受苦。”

“仙子对我说，她对爸爸那天晚上的行为感到非常困惑。似乎佐藤一家也很困惑。谁都不明白爸爸那么做是什么意思。是的，我把仙子的信念给池田听的时候，他也表示迷惑不解。”

“这可真奇怪，”我笑着说，“哎呀，节子，去年不是你督促我这么做的吗。是你建议我采取‘预防措施’，免得我们像错过三宅一样，错过跟佐藤家的联姻。你不记得了吗？”

“我一定是太健忘了，真的想不起来爸爸指的是什么。”

“噢，节子，这可真奇怪。”

节子突然停住脚步，大声说道：“这个时候的枫叶真好看！”

“是啊，”我说，“到了深秋肯定还会更好看。”

“太美了。”女儿笑着说，我们继续往前走。然后她说：“实际上，爸爸，昨天晚上我们谈到一两件事，谈话中大郎君碰巧提到他上星期跟你在一起。你们谈到一位作曲家最近自杀了。”

“野口由纪夫？啊，对了，我记起那段对话了。让我想想，我记得大郎说那个人的自杀是毫无疑义的。”

“大郎君有点担心爸爸对野口先生的死太感兴趣。是的，爸爸似乎在拿野口先生的事业跟自己相比。我们听到这个消息都很担心。实际上，我们最近都有点担心，是不是爸爸退休以后变得有点情绪消沉了。”

我笑了，说：“你尽可以放宽心，节子。我从来没有考虑采取野口先生那样的行动。”

“据我理解，”她继续说，“野口先生的歌曲在战争的每个阶段都流传得很广。所以他才希望跟政治家和军官们一起承担责任。而爸爸这么想自己就错了。爸爸毕竟只是一个画家。”

“我向你保证，节子，我绝对不会考虑采取野口那样的行为。我可以毫不自夸地说，我当年也是个很有影响的人，并把这种影响用于灾难性的目的。”

女儿似乎思索了一会儿，然后说道：

“请原谅，也许我们应该以正确的角度看问题。爸爸画了许多优秀的杰作，毫无疑问在其他画家中是最有影响的。但是爸爸的作品跟我们正在谈论的这些大事没什么关系。爸爸只是一位画家。他千万别再以为自己做了多大的错事。”

“哎哟，节子，这个建议可跟去年的完全不同。当时我的事业似乎是个很大的罪过呢。”

“请原谅，爸爸，但我只能再说一遍，我不明白你为什么提到去年的婚事。是的，我不明白爸爸的事业会跟婚事扯上什么关系。似乎佐藤一家压根儿就不关心，就像我们说的，他们对爸爸在相亲时的表现很不理解。”

“这倒很奇怪了，节子。事实上，我和佐藤博士已经认识多年。他是本城最著名的艺术评论家之一，多年来肯定一直关注我的事业，完全知道其中一些令人遗憾的方面。所以，我完全应该在商议婚事的过程中表明我的态度。是的，我坚信佐藤博士很赞赏我的做法。”

“请原谅，但是从大郎君的话里，似乎佐藤博士对爸爸的事业并没有这么熟悉。当然啦，他一直知道爸爸是他的邻居。但是似乎在去年开始谈论婚事之前，他并不知道爸爸跟艺术界有什么关系。”

“你完全错了，节子，”我笑着说，“我和佐藤博士很多年前就知道对方。我们经常站在街上，互相交流艺术界的新鲜事。”

“那我肯定是弄错了。请原谅。但是我需要强调一下，并没有人认为爸爸的过去是需要受到谴责的。所以我们希望爸爸别再把自己想成那位不幸的作曲家那样的人。”

我没有继续跟节子争论，我记得我们很快就开始讨论一些无关紧要的话题。但是，我女儿那天上午的许多断言肯定是错的。首先，佐藤博士不可能这么多年对我作为画家的名望一无所知。那天吃完晚饭后，我想办法让大郎证实这点，只是为了让节子明白，我自己是从未怀疑过的。比如，我十分清楚地记得约十六年前那个晴朗的日子，我站在新家外面修理栅栏时，佐藤博士第一次跟我打招呼。“一位像您这样地位的画家住在我们这里，真是不胜荣幸。”他认出了名牌上我的名字，这么说道。我十分清楚地记得那次见面，节子毫无疑问是弄错了。

---

\(1\) 歌麿，全名喜多川歌麿（1753—1806），日本浮世绘画家，以绘制仕女像著称。

一九五〇年六月

昨天快要中午的时候，接到松田先生去世的消息，我给自己简单做了点午饭，然后出去活动活动。

我往山下走去，天气温暖宜人。到了河边，我走上犹疑桥，环顾周围的景色。天空一片蔚蓝，在河岸往前一点的地方，在新公寓楼开始的地方，我看见两个小男孩在水边玩鱼竿。我注视着他们，心里想着松田先生的噩耗。

自从商议仙子婚事的时候跟松田重新建立联系之后，我一直打算多来看看他，然而实际上，直到约莫一个月前，我才再度前往荒川。我完全是心血来潮，并不知道他已经去日无多。也许，松田那天下午向我倾吐心声之后，去世时会感到欣慰一些。

到了他家，铃木小姐一眼就认出了我，兴奋地把让我进去了。看她的样子，似乎自从我十八个月前来过之后，松田先生没有多少拜访者。

“他比你上次来的时候硬朗多了。”铃木小姐高兴地说。

我被让进了客厅，片刻之后，松田不用搀扶走了进来，穿一件宽松的和服。他再次看见我显得很开心，我们谈着无关紧要的小事，谈着认识的熟人。我记得，是铃木小姐端茶进来又离开之后，我才想起来感谢松田在我最近卧病期间写信来鼓励我。

“你似乎恢复得很不错嘛，小野，”他说，“看你的样子，怎么也猜不到你最近刚生过病。”

“现在好多了，”我说，“我要当心，别让自己太累着了。我到哪儿都不得不拄着这根拐棍。在其他方面，我感觉跟以前没有两样。”

“你让我失望了，小野。我还以为我们会是两个同病相怜的老头子呢。可是看你的气色，还跟你上次来的时候一样。我只好坐在这里，嫉妒你的健康。”

“胡说什么呀，松田，你看上去很精神。”

“你别想骗我了，小野，”他笑着说，“不过这一年里我确实增加了一点体重。好了，告诉我，仙子幸福吗？我听说她的婚事进展顺

利。你上次来这里的时候，似乎很为她的将来担心呢。”

“结果非常圆满。今年秋天她就要生孩子了。经过那么多担忧之后，仙子的事情解决得再理想也不过了。”

“秋天就要生孩子了。那肯定是值得期待的。”

“实际上，”我说，“我的大女儿下个月要生她的第二个孩子了。她一直想再要一个孩子，所以这是个特别好的消息。”

“是啊，是啊。很快又有两个外孙了。”他坐在那里，兀自点头微笑。然后他说：“你肯定还记得吧，小野，我一直忙着改造整个世界，无暇考虑自己的终身大事。你还记得你和美智子结婚前，我们俩的那些争论吗？”

我们俩都笑了起来。

“两个外孙，”松田又说，“嗯，那是很值得期待的。”

“是啊，想到我的女儿，我觉得自己非常幸运。”

“告诉我，小野，你最近还作画吗？”

“作几幅水彩画消磨时间。花花草草一类，自娱自乐而已。”

“听到你又在作画我很高兴，画什么都行。你上次来看我的时候，似乎已经彻底放弃作画了。你当时情绪非常消沉。”

“肯定是的。我当时很长时间没拿画笔了。”

“是的，小野，你当时显得非常消沉。”他笑咪咪地抬头看着我，说：“当年，你那么渴望做出伟大的贡献。”

我也微笑地看着他，说：“你也一样，松田。你的抱负不比我小。说到底，我们的中国危机运动的那份宣言还是你写的呢。那样的雄心壮志可不一般啊。”

我们俩又笑了起来。然后他说：

“你肯定还记得，小野，我过去经常说你幼稚，经常取笑你狭窄的艺术家的视野。你总是那么生我的气。唉，最后看来，我们俩的视野都不够开阔啊。”

“我想是的。如果我们看问题更清楚一点，那么松田，像你和我这样的人——谁知道呢？——应该能做出真正有价值的事情。我们曾

经多么有精力、有勇气啊。我们肯定有足够的精力和勇气，才能做出新日本运动这样的壮举，你还记得吗？”

“是啊。当时有一些强大的势力跟我们作对。我们很容易就会失去勇气。我想我们当时的意志肯定非常坚决，小野。”

“可是，至少我一直没有把问题看得很清楚。用你的话说，是艺术家的狭窄视野。唉，即使现在，我也觉得很难想象世界的范围远不止这个城市。”

“最近，”松田说，“我觉得很难想象世界的范围远不止我的花园。所以，现在视野更开阔的也许是你了，小野。”

我们又一起哈哈大笑，然后松田端起茶杯喝了一口。

“我们没必要过分责怪自己，”他说，“我们至少为自己的信念而尽力了。只是到了最后，我们发现自己只是芸芸众生。是没有特殊洞察力的芸芸众生。在这样的时代做芸芸众生，算是我们的不幸吧。”

松田刚才提到他的花园，把我的注意力引到了那边。这是一个温和的春日午后，铃木小姐让纱门半开着，所以从我坐的地方能看到明亮的阳光照在阳台干干净净的木板上。一阵微风吹进屋里，里面有一股淡淡的烟味儿。我站起来，朝纱门走去。

“烧东西的气味仍然让我感到不安，”我说，“就在不久前，它还意味着大火和爆炸。”我继续凝望着外面的花园，过了一会儿继续说：“到下个月，美智子就去世五年了。”

松田继续沉默了一阵，然后我听见他在我身后说：

“这些日子，烟味儿一般意味着某个邻居在清理他的花园。”

房间里的什么地方，钟开始敲响了。

“该去喂鲤鱼了，”松田说，“知道吗，我跟铃木小姐争论了很长时间，她才让我重新开始喂鱼。我以前每天都喂，可是几个月前，我在那些踏脚石上滑了一跤。后来我不得不跟她争论了很长时间。”

松田站起身，穿上放在阳台上的一双草鞋，跟我一起走进了花园。花园那头的池塘沐浴在阳光下，我们小心翼翼地踩着那些踏脚石，走过布满青苔的滑腻腻的小土墩。

我们站在池塘边，看着幽深的池水，突然一个响声，惊得我们都抬头看去。在离我们不远的地方，一个约莫四五岁的小男孩从花园栅栏顶上朝我们看，两只胳膊都吊在树枝上。松田笑了，大声喊道：

“啊，下午好，小少爷！”

小男孩继续盯着我们看了一会儿，然后就消失了。松田笑着开始往水里扔鱼食。“邻居家的孩子，”他说，“每天这个时候都要爬到那棵树上看我出来喂鱼。但他很害羞，我一跟他说话，他就跑了。”他对自己笑了一声。“我经常纳闷他为什么每天不厌其烦地这么做。有什么可看的呢？一个拄拐棍的老头子，站在池塘边喂鱼。我不知道这副情景有什么让他这么着迷的。”

我又看看栅栏上刚才那张小脸出现的地方，说：“啊，今天他有了意外发现。今天他看见两个拄拐杖的老头子站在池塘边。”

松田开心地笑了起来，继续往水里扔鱼食。两三条漂亮的鲤鱼跃出水面，鳞片在阳光下闪闪发亮。

“军官，政治家，商人，”松田说，“他们都因为国家的遭遇而受到谴责。至于我们这样的人，小野，我们的贡献一向微乎其微。现在没有人在意你我这样的人曾经做过什么。他们看着我们，只看见两个拄拐棍的老头子。”他笑微微地看着我，然后继续喂鱼。“如今在意的只有我们，只有你我这样的人，小野，我们回顾自己的一生，看到它们的瑕疵，如今在意的只有我们。”

那天下午，松田虽然嘴里这么说，但举止神态却显示他压根不是一个感到幻灭的人。他当然更没有理由在幻灭中死去。也许，他回顾自己的一生时确实看到某些瑕疵，但他肯定也认识到，他能够引以自豪的正是这些方面。正如他自己指出的，他和我这样的人，我们欣慰地知道，当年我们不管做了什么，都是凭着一腔热血去做的。当然啦，我们有一些大胆的举动，做事情经常过于投入。但这比起因为缺乏勇气或意志力，而从来不敢尝试自己相信的东西来，肯定更值得称道。当一个人从内心深处产生信念时，再犹豫不决便是卑鄙的了。我相信，松田回顾自己的一生时，一定也会这样想的。

我经常想起一个特定的时刻——是一九三八年的五月，就在我获得重田基金奖后不久。事业发展到那个时候，我已经获得过各种奖项和荣誉，但重田基金奖在大部分人心目中是一个重要的里程碑。而且我记得，我们就在那个星期完成了我们的新日本运动，并取得巨大成功。颁奖后的那天晚上举办了盛大的庆祝活动。我记得我坐在左右宫

里，被学生和新老同事们围在中间，不断接受敬酒，耳边全是溢美之词。那天晚上，各种各样的熟人都到左右宫来向我表示祝贺。我甚至记得，一位我以前从没见过的警长也赶来祝贺。奇怪的是，那天晚上我虽然很高兴，心里却并没有获奖理应带来的深深的成就感和满足感。实际上，直到几天之后，我出门来到若叶省的山区时，才体会到了这样的感受。

我已经有大约十六年没有再去若叶了——自从离开毛利君的别墅后就没有去过。当时我走得那么坚决，其实心里很惶恐，担心我的未来一无所成。这么多年来，我虽然跟毛利君断绝了一切正式联系，但我对任何跟我以前的老师有关的消息都很好奇，所以完全清楚他在城里的名望不断下降。他努力在歌麿传统中加入欧洲画风，却被认为其基调是反爱国的，我不时听说他挣扎着举办画展，地点越来越名不见经传。实际上，我从不止一个渠道得知，他为了维持生计，已经开始给流行杂志画插图了。与此同时，我相信毛利君一直在关注我事业的发展，肯定也已听说我获得重田基金奖。那天，我在乡村车站下火车时，内心强烈地感受到时光飞逝，物是人非。

那是一个阳光灿烂的春日午后，我顺着那些林间山路朝毛利君的别墅走去。我走得很慢，回忆着我当年走在这条路上的熟悉的感觉。我一边走，一边想象着我跟毛利君再次面对面会怎么样。也许他会把我当成贵宾，也许他会像我在别墅最后那段日子一样冷淡、漠然，也许，他对我的态度，会像当年我是他的得意门生时那样——似乎我们各自的地位并没有发生这样大的变化。我觉得最后一种可能性最大，我记得我脑子里盘算着我如何作答。我决定不按过去的老习惯称他为“先生”，而只是把他当成一个同行那样来称呼。如果他死活不肯承认我现在的地位，我会友好地笑一声，说一句这样的话：“你看，毛利君，我并没有像你曾经担心的那样，不得不去给漫画书画插图。”

后来我发现，我在高高的山路上已经走到那个制高点，从这里可以清楚地看到下面洼地里绿树丛中的别墅。我停下脚步欣赏这片景致，就像多年前经常做的那样。一阵风吹来，沁人心脾，我看见下面山洼里的树轻轻摇摆。我不知道别墅有没有重新装修过，从这么远的距离是看不出来的。

过了一会儿，我坐在山上的杂草丛中，继续凝望着毛利君的别墅。我在乡村车站的一个小摊上买了些橘子，我把它们从帕子里拿出来，开始一个接一个地吃着。我坐在那里，俯瞰着别墅，津津有味地品尝着新鲜的橘子，这时候，那种深深的成就感和满足感才开始在内

心升起。那种感觉很难描述，它与较小的成就所带来的得意截然不同——而且，正如我说的，也不同于我在左右宫的庆祝会上的任何感受。那是一种内心深处的喜悦，坚信自己的努力得到了公正的承认。我付出的艰辛，我战胜的疑虑，所有的一切都是值得的。我取得了真正有价值的卓越成就。那天，我没有再往别墅走——那似乎已经毫无意义。我只是在那里坐了一小时左右，吃着那些橘子，内心无比满足。

我想，不是许多人都能体会到那种感觉的。乌龟那样的人——绅太郎那样的人——他们也许很勤勉，有能力，没恶意，但他们永远不会知道我那天感受到的那种幸福。因为他们不知道勇于冒险、超越平庸是什么滋味。

不过，松田完全不同。我和他虽然经常争吵，但我们的生活方式是完全一致的，我相信他也能回忆起一两个这样的时刻。上次我们交谈时，他脸上带着温和的笑容，对我说：“我们至少是凭信念做事，而且不遗余力。”也许人到后来会重新评价自己的成就，但知道一生中有一两次像我那天在高高的山路上体会到的那种真正的满足，也是令人欣慰的。

昨天早晨，我在犹疑桥上站了片刻，心里想着松田，然后我朝昔日我们的逍遥地所在的地方走去。这里已经重建，变得几乎认不出来了。昔日横贯中心的那条窄巷，当年总是熙熙攘攘，挂满了各种酒馆饭店的旗帜，如今变成了一条宽阔的水泥大道，沉重的大卡车整天在上面来来往往。川上夫人酒馆的旧址，现在是一座四层的玻璃墙办公大楼。周围还有几座这样的大楼，白天可以看见办事员、邮差、送货者忙碌地进进出出。现在要一直走到古川才能看见酒馆，但偶尔会认出一片栅栏或一棵树是昔日留下来的，在这新的背景下显得格格不入。

左右宫曾经所在的地方，如今是一组缩在道路里面的办公室的前院。有些高级职员把车停在这个院里，除此之外，这里主要是铺着沥青的空地，间或种着几棵小树。院子前面对着马路的地方，有一条公园里的那种长凳。我不知道它放在那里给谁坐的，也从没看见那些忙碌的人有谁停下来坐在上面休息。但是我想象这条长凳所占据的位置，非常接近我们昔日在左右宫的那张桌子，所以我有时就喜欢在上面坐坐。这条板凳可能不是对公众开放的，但是它离人行道很近，所以从没有人反对我坐在上面。昨天上午，阳光那么和煦地照耀着，我又在板凳上坐下，休息了一会儿，观察着周围的动静。

时间一定是接近中午了，因为我看见马路对面，三五成群的职员们穿着耀眼的白衬衫，从玻璃墙面的大楼里涌出来，那正是川上夫人的酒馆曾经所在的地方。我注视着，突然发现这些年轻人都那么朝气蓬勃，充满乐观精神。一次，两个离开大楼的年轻人停下来跟另一个正好进楼的青年说话。他们站在那座玻璃墙面的大楼的台阶上，在阳光下开怀大笑。其中一个年轻人的脸我看得最清楚，笑起来的样子特别开心，像个孩子那样天真无邪。接着，那三位同事迅速打了个招呼，便各走各的路了。

我坐在长凳上注视着这些年轻的职员，兀自微笑。当然啦，有的时候，我回忆起早年那些灯火通明的酒馆，那些人聚集在灯笼下，笑得或许比昨天那些年轻人更加喧闹一点，却是同样的热情洋溢，这时候我不免有些怀旧，怀念过去，怀念昔日的这片地区。可是看到我们的城市得到重建，看到这些年一切迅速得到恢复，又让我由衷感到喜悦。看来，我们国家不管曾经犯过什么错误，现在又有机会重振旗鼓了。我们只能深深地祝福这些年轻人。

KAZUO ISHIGURO

An Artist of the Floating World

For my parents

Introduction

I began An Artist of the Floating World in September 1981, in a basement flat in Shepherd's Bush, London. I was twenty-six years old. My first novel, A Pale View of Hills, was being prepared for publication, but at that point I had no sensible reason to believe I had before me a life as a full-time novelist.

Lorna and I had returned to London that summer (we'd been living in Cardiff), having secured new jobs in the capital, but no accommodation. A few years earlier, we'd both been part of a loose network of young, left-leaning, alternative types who lived in short-life housing around Ladbroke Grove and Hammersmith, and worked for charitable projects or campaign groups. It seems odd now to recall the carefree way we just turned up in the city that summer confident we'd be able to stay in one shared house or another until we found a suitable place of our own. As it turned out, nothing came along to challenge our complacency, and before long we'd found a small basement to rent just off the bustling Goldhawk Road.

The flat adjoined the recording studios of the then cutting-edge Virgin Records, and we often glimpsed large hairy men heaving equipment in and out of the windowless, colourfully muralled building. But the sound-proofing was exemplary, and when I sat at our dining table, my back to our tiny rear garden, I had a more than adequate environment for writing.

Lorna had by far the longer commute to work. She'd got a job as a local authority social worker in Lewisham on the other side of the city. My job was only a stone's throw away - I'd become the 'resettlement worker' for West London Cyrenians, a well-regarded organisation working with the homeless. To make things fairer, we came to an agreement:

we'd get up at the same time each morning, and by the point Lorna was going out the door, I'd be installed at the table ready for my ninety minutes of early morning writing before I set off for my own job.

Many superb works have been produced by writers holding down demanding jobs. But I have always been pathetically, almost pathologically, unable to divide my attention, and those several weeks I attempted to write at the dining table as the sun rose steadily to fill the basement have been to date my only attempt to write 'part-time'. It wasn't an unqualified success. I found myself staring at blank sheets, battling the urge to go back to bed. (My day job soon grew intense, often obliging me to work late into the night.) Nor were things helped by Lorna's insistence that I start each day with a bizarre breakfast made up of hideously coarse fibres sprinkled over with yeast and wheatgerm - a recipe that would sometimes have me doubled up in my chair. All the same, it was during these sessions that the kernel - the story and central premise - of An Artist came to me more or less fully formed. I managed to write it up as a fifteen-page story (later published in Granta as 'The Summer after the War'), but even as I did so, I knew I'd need a much larger, more complex architecture to build the idea into the novel I could already see, tantalisingly, in my imagination. Then the demands of my job put an end to my morning sessions altogether.

I didn't return to An Artist in earnest until the winter of 1982. By then, A Pale View of Hills had been published to what was, for a first novel, very reasonable noise. The book had found publishers in the US and in several foreign languages, and had got me on the inaugural Granta list of the Twenty Best of Young British Novelists due to be unveiled the following spring. My writing career still looked precarious, but I now had reasons to be bold, and I quit my job at the Cyrenians to become a full-time writer.

We moved to south-east London, to occupy the top floor of a tall Victorian house in a quiet neighbourhood of Upper Sydenham. Our kitchen lacked a sink, obliging us to load dirty dishes onto an old tea trolley and wheel it into the bathroom. But we were now closer to Lorna's work, and we could set the alarm for much later. The hideous breakfasts ceased. The house was owned by Michael and Lenore Marshall, a wonderful couple in their early sixties who lived downstairs, and we soon got into the routine of gathering in their kitchen (which had a sink) at the end of each working day to share tea, Mr Kipling cakes and rambling, often hilarious conversation about books, politics, cricket, the advertising industry, the eccentricities of the English. (A few years later, following Lenore's sudden death, I dedicated The Remains of the Day to her memory.) Also around this time I was offered work by the soon-to-be-launched Channel 4, and it was my experience of working as a television screenwriter (I eventually had two single dramas broadcast on that channel) that was to have a significant, if contrary impact on the writing of An Artist.

I found myself rather obsessively comparing pages from my screenplays - essentially dialogue plus directions - with pages from my published novel, and asking myself, 'Is my fiction sufficiently different from a screenplay?' Whole hunks of A Pale View looked to me awfully similar to a screenplay - dialogue followed by 'direction' followed by more dialogue. I began to feel deflated. Why bother to write a novel if it was going to offer more or less the same experience someone could have by turning on a television? How could the novel, as a form, hope to survive against the might of cinema and television if it couldn't offer something unique, something the other forms couldn't properly do? (In the early 1980s, I should point out, the contemporary novel seemed in much more fragile health than it does today.) I had a clear idea, from those morning efforts in Shepherd's Bush, of the story I wanted to write. But in Sydenham I now entered an extended period of experimenting with different ways to tell it. I was determined that my new novel wouldn't be a 'prose screenplay'. But what then could it be?

It was at this time I came down with a virus and spent a few days in bed. Once I came out of the worst of it, and no longer felt like sleeping for hours on end, I discovered that the book I'd brought to bed, the object now rolling about inside my duvet, was the first volume of the recently published Kilmartin-Moncrieff translation of Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. It's possible my sick-bed circumstances provided a heightened context for this work (I was not then, nor am I now, an unqualified Proust fan: I find swathes of his writing crushingly boring), but I became completely riveted by the 'Overture' and 'Combray' sections. I went over them again and again. Quite aside from the sublime beauty of these passages, I was thrilled by what I then called in my mind (and later in my notes) Proust's 'methods of movement' - the means by which he got one episode to lead into the next. The ordering of events and scenes didn't follow the demands of chronology, nor those of an unfolding linear plot. Instead, tangential thought associations, or the vagaries of memory seemed to move the novel from one section to the next. Sometimes the very fact that the present episode had been triggered by the previous one raised the question 'Why?' For what reason had these two seemingly unrelated moments been placed side by side in the narrator's mind? I could now see an exciting, freer way of composing my novel; one that could produce richness on the page and offer inner movements impossible to capture on a screen. If I could go from one passage to the next according to the narrator's thought associations and drifting memories, I could compose almost in the way an abstract painter might choose to place shapes and colours around a canvas. I could put down a scene from two days ago right beside one from twenty years earlier, and ask the reader to ponder the relationship between the two. Often the narrator himself would not need to know fully the deeper reasons for a particular juxtaposition. I could see a way of writing that could properly suggest the many layers of self-deception and denial that shrouded any person's view of their own self and past. Breakthrough moments for a novelist are often like this: scruffy, private little events. Looking back now, I can see that those three days recovering from a virus in a bedroom in Sydenham, going over the same twenty pages of Proust, were a key turning point in my writing life - one much more significant than, say, the receiving of a major award or walking down red carpets at film premiers. Everything I have subsequently written has been determined by the revelations that came to me during those days.

I should say something here about the Japanese aspect of An Artist. It is, in a literal sense, the most Japanese of my novels, being set entirely in Japan with only Japanese characters. The language in the novel - the first-person narration and the dialogue - is understood to be in Japanese, even though the novel is presented in English. In other words, you are supposed to imagine this book is some kind of translation: that behind the English sentences are Japanese ones. This strategy had implications for every word I wrote on the page. I wanted the language to flow and to feel natural, and yet it couldn't become too colloquial - too 'English'. At times I found myself translating Japanese phrases and pleasantries quite literally. But most of the time it was a case of finding an elegant yet slightly stilted register that would suggest the rhythms and stylised formality of the Japanese language running all the time behind the English.

Lastly, let me add a note here concerning the larger social context in which the novel was created. An Artist was written between 1981 and 1985, years of crucial, often fractious and bitter transition in Britain. The governments of Margaret Thatcher had brought an end to the post-war political consensus about the welfare state and the desirability of a 'mixed' economy (in which key assets and industries are owned publicly as well as privately). There was an overt and strident programme to transform the country from one based on manufacturing and heavy industries, with large organised workforces, into a predominantly service-based economy with a fragmented, flexible, non-unionised labour pool. It was the era of the miners' strike, the Wapping dispute, CND marches, the Falklands War, IRA terrorism, an economic theory - 'monetarism' - that characterised deep cuts to public services as the necessary medicine to heal a sick economy. I remember falling out badly with one of my oldest and closest friends over dinner as we took opposing views on the miners' strike. This novel is set in Japan before and after the Second World War, but it was very much shaped by the Britain in which I was then living: the pressures on people in every walk of life to take political sides; the rigid certainties, shading into self-righteousness and sinister aggression, of ardent, often youthful factions; the agonising about the 'role of the artist' in a time of political change. And for me personally: the nagging sense of how difficult it is to see clearly above the dogmatic fervours of one's day; and the fear that time and history would show that for all one's good intentions, one had backed a wrong, shameful, even evil cause, and wasted one's best years and talents to it.

Kazuo Ishiguro
London, January 2016

OCTOBER, 1948

If on a sunny day you climb the steep path leading up from the little wooden bridge still referred to around here as 'the Bridge of Hesitation', you will not have to walk far before the roof of my house becomes visible between the tops of two gingko trees. Even if it did not occupy such a commanding position on the hill, the house would still stand out from all others nearby, so that as you come up the path, you may find yourself wondering what sort of wealthy man owns it.

But then I am not, nor have I ever been, a wealthy man. The imposing air of the house will be accounted for, perhaps, if I inform you that it was built by my predecessor, and that he was none other than Akira Sugimura. Of course, you may be new to this city, in which case the name of Akira Sugimura may not be familiar to you. But mention it to anyone who lived here before the war and you will learn that for thirty years or so, Sugimura was unquestionably amongst the city's most respected and influential men.

If I tell you this, and when arriving at the top of the hill you stand and look at the fine cedar gateway, the large area bound by the garden wall, the roof with its elegant tiles and its stylishly carved ridgepole pointing out over the view, you may well wonder how I came to acquire such a property, being as I claim a man of only moderate means. The truth is, I bought the house for a nominal sum - a figure probably not even half the property's true value at that time. This was made possible owing to a most curious - some may say foolish - procedure instigated by the Sugimura family during the sale.

It is now already a thing of some fifteen years ago. In those days, when my circumstances seemed to improve with each month, my wife had begun to press me to find a new house.

With her usual foresight, she had argued the importance of our having a house in keeping with our status - not out of vanity, but for the sake of our children's marriage prospects. I saw the sense in this, but since Setsuko, our eldest, was still only fourteen or fifteen, I did not go about the matter with any urgency. Nevertheless, for a year or so, whenever I heard of a suitable house for sale, I would remember to make enquiries. It was one of my pupils who first brought it to my attention that Akira Sugimura's house, a year after his death, was to be sold off. That I should buy such a house seemed absurd, and I put the suggestion down to the exaggerated respect my pupils always had for me. But I made enquiries all the same, and gained an unexpected response.

I received a visit one afternoon from two haughty, grey-haired ladies, who turned out to be the daughters of Akira Sugimura. When I expressed my surprise at receiving such personal attention from a family of such distinction, the elder of the sisters told me coldly that they had not come simply out of courtesy. Over the previous months, a fair number of enquiries had been received for their late father's house, but the family had in the end decided to refuse all but four of the applications. These four applicants had been selected carefully by family members on grounds purely of good character and achievement.

'It is of the first importance to us', she went on, 'that the house our father built should pass to one he would have approved of and deemed worthy of it. Of course, circumstances oblige us to consider the financial aspect, but this is strictly secondary. We have therefore set a price.'

At this point, the younger sister, who had barely spoken, presented me with an envelope, and they watched me sternly as I opened it. Inside was a single sheet of paper, blank but for a figure written elegantly with an ink brush. I was about to express my astonishment at the low price, but then saw from the faces before me that further discussion of finances would be considered distasteful. The elder sister said simply: 'It will not be in the interests of any of you to try to outbid one another. We are not interested in receiving anything beyond the quoted price. What we mean to do from here on is to conduct an auction of prestige.'

They had come in person, she explained, to ask formally on behalf of the Sugimura family that I submit myself - along, of course, with the other three applicants - to a closer investigation of my background and credentials. A suitable buyer could thus be chosen.

It was an eccentric procedure, but I saw nothing objectionable about it; it was, after all, much the same as being involved in a marriage negotiation. Indeed, I felt somewhat flattered to be considered by this old and hidebound family as a worthy candidate. When I gave my consent to the investigation, and expressed my gratitude to them, the younger sister addressed me for the first time, saying: 'Our father was a cultured man, Mr Ono. He had much respect for artists. Indeed, he knew of your work.'

In the days which followed, I made enquiries of my own, and discovered the truth of the younger sister's words; Akira Sugimura had indeed been something of an art enthusiast who on numerous occasions had supported exhibitions with his money. I also came across certain interesting rumours: a significant section of the Sugimura family, it seemed, had been against selling the house at all, and there had been some bitter arguments. In the end, financial pressures meant a sale was inevitable, and the odd procedures around the transaction represented the compromise reached with those who had not wished the house to pass out of the family. That there was something high-handed about these arrangements there was no denying; but for my part, I was prepared to sympathize with the sentiments of a family with such a distinguished history. My wife, however, did not take kindly to the idea of an investigation.

‘Who do they think they are?’ she protested. ‘We should tell them we want nothing further to do with them.’

‘But where’s the harm?’ I pointed out. ‘We have nothing we wouldn’t want them to discover. True, I don’t have a wealthy background, but no doubt the Sugimuras know that already, and they still think us worthy candidates. Let them investigate, they can only find things that will be to our advantage.’ And I made a point of adding: ‘In any case, they’re doing no more than they would if we were negotiating a marriage with them. We’ll have to get used to this sort of thing.’

Besides, there was surely much to admire in the idea of ‘an auction of prestige’, as the elder daughter called it. One wonders why things are not settled more often by such means. How so much more honourable is such a contest, in which one’s moral conduct and achievement are brought as witnesses rather than the size of one’s purse. I can still recall the deep satisfaction I felt when I learnt the Sugimuras – after the most thorough investigation – had deemed me the most worthy of the house they so prized. And certainly, the house is one worth having suffered a few inconveniences for; despite its impressive and imposing exterior, it is inside a place of soft, natural woods selected for the beauty of their grains, and all of us who lived in it came to find it most conducive to relaxation and calm.

For all that, the Sugimuras’ high-handedness was apparent everywhere during the transactions, some family members making no attempts to hide their hostility towards us, and a less understanding buyer might well have taken offence and abandoned the whole matter. Even in later years I would sometimes encounter by chance some member of the family who, instead of exchanging the usual kind of polite talk, would stand there in the street interrogating me as to the state of the house and any alterations I had made.

These days, I hardly ever hear of the Sugimuras. I did, though, receive a visit shortly after the surrender from the younger of the two sisters who had approached me at the time of the sale. The war years had turned her into a thin, ailing old woman. In the way characteristic of the family, she made scant effort to hide the fact that her concern lay with how the house - rather than its inhabitants - had fared during the war; she gave only the briefest of commiserations on hearing about my wife and about Kenji, before embarking on questions concerning the bomb damage. This made me bitter towards her at first; but then I began to notice how her eyes would roam involuntarily around the room, and how she would occasionally pause abruptly in the midst of one of her measured and formal sentences, and I realized she was experiencing waves of emotion at finding herself back in this house once more. Then, when I surmised that most of her family members from the time of the sale were now dead, I began to feel pity for her and offered to show her around.

The house had received its share of the war damage. Akira Sugimura had built an eastern wing to the house, comprising three large rooms, connected to the main body of the house by a long corridor running down one side of the garden. This corridor was so extravagant in its length that some people have suggested Sugimura built it - together with the east wing - for his parents, whom he wished to keep at a distance. The corridor was, in any case, one of the most appealing features of the house; in the afternoon, its entire length would be crossed by the lights and shades of the foliage outside, so that one felt one was walking through a garden tunnel. The bulk of the bomb damage had been to this section of the house, and as we surveyed it from the garden I could see Miss Sugimura was close to tears. By this point, I had lost all my earlier sense of irritation with the old woman and I reassured her as best I could that the damage would be repaired at the first opportunity, and the house would be once more as her father had built it.

I had no idea when I promised her this that supplies would remain so scarce. For a long time after the surrender one could wait weeks just for a particular piece of wood or a supply of nails. What work I could do under such circumstances had to be done to the main body of the house - which had by no means entirely escaped damage - and progress on the garden corridor and the east wing has been slow. I have done what I can to prevent any serious deterioration, but we are still far from being able to open that part of the house again. Besides, now with only Noriko and myself left here, there seems less urgency to be extending our living space.

Today, if I took you to the back of the house, and moved aside the heavy screen to let you gaze down the remains of Sugimura's garden corridor, you may still gain an impression of how picturesque it once was. But no doubt you will notice too the cobwebs and mould that I have not been able to keep out; and the large gaps in the ceiling, shielded from the sky only by sheets of tarpaulin. Sometimes, in the early morning, I have moved back that screen to find the sunlight pouring through the tarpaulin in tinted shafts, revealing clouds of dust hanging in the air as though the ceiling had only that moment crashed down.

Aside from the corridor and the east wing, the most serious damage was to the veranda. Members of my family, and particularly my two daughters, had always been fond of passing the time sitting there, chatting and viewing the garden; and so, when Setsuko - my married daughter - first came to visit us after the surrender, I was not surprised to see how saddened she was by its condition. I had by then repaired the worst of the damage, but at one end it was still billowed and cracked where the impact of the blast had pushed up the boards from underneath. The veranda roof, too, had suffered, and on rainy days we were still having to line the floorboards with receptacles to catch the water that came dripping through.

Over this past year, however, I was able to make a certain amount of progress, and by the time Setsuko came down to visit us again last month, the veranda was more or less entirely restored. Noriko had taken time off work for her sister's visit, and so, with the good weather continuing, my two daughters spent a lot of their time out there as of old. I often joined them, and at times it was almost as it had been years ago, when on a sunny day the family would sit there together exchanging relaxed, often vacuous talk. At one point last month - it must have been the first morning after Setsuko's arrival - we were sitting there on the veranda after breakfast, when Noriko said:

'I'm relieved you've come at last, Setsuko. You'll take Father off my hands a little.'

'Noriko, really ...' Her elder sister shifted uncomfortably on her cushion.

'Father takes a lot of looking after now he's retired,' Noriko went on, with a mischievous grin. 'You've got to keep him occupied or he starts to mope.'

'Really ...' Setsuko smiled nervously, then turned to the garden with a sigh. 'The maple tree seems to have recovered completely. It's looking splendid.'

'Setsuko probably has no idea of what you're like these days, Father. She only remembers you from when you were a tyrant and ordered us all around. You're much more gentle these days, isn't that so?'

I gave a laugh to show Setsuko this was all in good humour, but my elder daughter continued to look uncomfortable. Noriko turned back to her sister and added: 'But he does take a lot more looking after, moping around the house all day.'

'She's talking nonsense as usual,' I put in. 'If I spend the whole day moping, how did all these repairs get done?'

‘Indeed,’ Setsuko said, turning to me and smiling. ‘The house is looking marvellous now. Father must have worked very hard.’

‘He had men in to help with all the difficult parts,’ Noriko said. ‘You don’t seem to believe me, Setsuko. Father’s very different now. There’s no need to be afraid of him any more. He’s much more gentle and domesticated.’

‘Noriko, really ...’

‘He even cooks meals from time to time. You wouldn’t have believed it, would you? But Father’s becoming a much better cook these days.’

‘Noriko, I think we’ve discussed this enough,’ Setsuko said, quietly.

‘Isn’t that so, Father? You’re making a lot of progress.’

I gave another smile and shook my head wearily. It was at that point, as I remember, that Noriko turned towards the garden, and closing her eyes to the sunshine, said:

‘Well, he can’t rely on me to come back and cook when I’m married. I’ll have enough to do without Father to look after as well.’

As Noriko said this, her elder sister – whose gaze until then had been demurely turned away – gave me a swift, enquiring look. Her eyes left me again immediately, for she was obliged to return Noriko’s smile. But a new, more profound uneasiness had entered Setsuko’s manner and she seemed grateful when her little boy, speeding past us down the veranda, gave her an opportunity to change the subject.

‘Ichiro, please settle!’ she called after him.

No doubt, after the modern apartment of his parents, Ichiro was fascinated by the large amount of space in our house. In any case, he seemed not to share our fondness for sitting on the veranda, preferring instead to run at great speed up and down its length, sometimes sliding along the polished boards. More than once, he had come close to upsetting our tea tray, but his mother's requests that he sit down had so far been to little avail. This time too, when Setsuko called to him to take a cushion with us, he remained sulking at the end of the veranda.

'Come on, Ichiro,' I called out, 'I'm tired of talking to women all the time. You come and sit beside me and we'll talk about men's things.'

This brought him straight away. He placed his cushion next to me, then seated himself in a most noble posture, hands on hips, his shoulders flung well back.

'Oji,' he said to me sternly, 'I have a question.'

'Yes, Ichiro, what is it?'

'I want to know about the monster.'

'The monster?'

'Is it prehistoric?'

'Prehistoric? You know words like that already? You must be a clever boy.'

At this point, Ichiro's dignity seemed to give way. Abandoning his pose, he rolled on to his back and began waving his feet in the air.

'Ichiro!' Setsuko called in an urgent whisper. 'Such bad manners in front of your grandfather. Sit up!'

Ichiro's only response was to allow his feet to slump lifelessly on to the floorboards. He then folded his arms over his chest and closed his eyes.

'Oji,' he said, in a sleepy voice, 'is the monster prehistoric?'

'Which monster is this, Ichiro?'

‘Please excuse him,’ Setsuko said, with a nervous smile. ‘There was a film poster outside the railway station when we arrived yesterday. He inconvenienced the taxi driver with numerous questions. It’s so unfortunate I didn’t see the poster myself.’

‘Oji! Is the monster prehistoric or isn’t it? I want an answer!’

‘Ichiro!’ His mother gave him a horrified look.

‘I’m not sure, Ichiro. I should think we have to see the film to find out.’

‘When do we see the film then?’

‘Hmm. You’d best discuss it with your mother. You never know, it may be too frightening for young children.’

I had not meant this remark to be provocative, but its effect on my grandson was startling. He rolled back into a sitting position and glared at me, shouting: ‘How dare you! What are you saying!’

‘Ichiro!’ Setsuko exclaimed in dismay. But Ichiro continued to regard me with the most fearsome look, and his mother was obliged to leave her cushion to come over to us.

‘Ichiro!’ she whispered to him, shaking his arm. ‘Don’t stare at your grandfather like that.’

Ichiro responded by falling on to his back again and waving his feet in the air. His mother gave me another nervous smile.

‘So bad-mannered,’ she said. Then seemingly at a loss for further words, she smiled again.

‘Ichiro-san,’ Noriko said, getting to her feet, ‘why don’t you come and help me put away the breakfast things?’

‘Women’s work,’ Ichiro said, his feet still waving.

‘So Ichiro won’t help me? Now that’s a problem. The table’s so heavy I’m not strong enough to put that away on my own. I wonder who could help then?'

This brought Ichiro abruptly to his feet, and he went striding indoors without glancing back at us. Noriko laughed and followed him in.

Setsuko glanced after them, then lifting the teapot, began refilling my cup. 'I had no idea things had come so far,' she said, her voice lowered. 'I mean as regards Noriko's marriage negotiations.'

'Things haven't come far at all,' I said, shaking my head. 'In fact, nothing's settled at all. We're still at an early stage.'

'Forgive me, but from what Noriko said just a moment ago, I naturally supposed things were more or less ...' She trailed off, then said again: 'Forgive me.' But she said it in such a way that a question was left hanging in the air.

'I'm afraid this isn't the first time Noriko's spoken like that,' I said. 'In fact, she's been behaving oddly ever since these present negotiations began. Last week, we had a visit from Mr Mori - you remember him?'

'Of course. He's well?'

'Well enough. He was just passing and called to pay his respects. The point is, Noriko began to talk about the marriage negotiations in front of him. She took much the same attitude as just now, that everything was settled. It was most embarrassing. Mr Mori even congratulated me as he was leaving, and asked me the groom's occupation.'

'Indeed,' Setsuko said, thoughtfully. 'It must have been embarrassing.'

'But it was hardly Mr Mori's fault. You heard her yourself just now. What was a stranger supposed to think?'

My daughter did not reply, and we sat there in silence for a few moments. Once, when I glanced over at her, Setsuko was gazing out at the garden, holding her teacup in both hands as though she had forgotten it was there. It was one of several occasions during her visit last month when - perhaps because of the way the light caught her, or some such thing - I found myself contemplating her appearance. For there can be no doubt, Setsuko is becoming better looking as she gets older. In her youth, her mother and I had worried that she was too plain to make a good marriage. Even as a child, Setsuko had rather masculine features, which seemed only to grow more pronounced with adolescence; so much so that whenever my daughters quarrelled, Noriko was always able to get the better of her elder sister by calling her 'Boy! Boy!' Who knows what effect such things have on personalities? It is no coincidence, surely, that Noriko should have grown up so headstrong, and Setsuko so shy and retiring. But now, it seems, as she approaches her thirties, Setsuko's looks are taking on a new and not inconsiderable dignity. I can recall her mother predicting this - 'Our Setsuko will flower in the summer,' she had often said. I had thought this merely my wife's way of consoling herself, but then several times last month, I was struck by how correct she in fact had been.

Setsuko came out of her reverie, and cast another glance inside the house. Then she said: 'I would suppose what happened last year greatly upset Noriko. Much more perhaps than we supposed.'

I gave a sigh and nodded. 'It's possible I didn't pay enough attention to her at the time.'

'I'm sure Father did all he could. But of course, such things are a terrible blow to a woman.'

'I have to admit, I thought she was play-acting a little, the way your sister does sometimes. She'd been insisting it was a "love match", so when it fell through, she'd be obliged to behave accordingly. But perhaps it wasn't all play-acting.'

‘We laughed at the time,’ Setsuko said, ‘but perhaps it really was a love match.’

We fell silent again. From inside the house, we could hear Ichiro’s voice shouting something repeatedly.

‘Forgive me,’ Setsuko said, in a new voice. ‘But did we ever hear any further as to why the proposal fell through last year? It was so unexpected.’

‘I have no idea. It hardly matters now, does it?’

‘Of course not, forgive me.’ Setsuko seemed to consider something for a moment, then she spoke again: ‘It’s just that Suichi persists in asking me from time to time about last year, about why the Miyakes should have pulled out like that.’ She gave a little laugh, almost to herself. ‘He seems convinced I know some secret and that we’re all keeping it from him. I have to continually reassure him that I have no idea myself.’

‘I assure you,’ I said a little coldly, ‘it remains equally a mystery to me. If I knew, I wouldn’t keep it from you and Suichi.’

‘Of course. Please excuse me, I didn’t mean to imply ...’ Again, she trailed off awkwardly.

I may have appeared a little short with my daughter that morning, but then that was not the first time Setsuko had questioned me in such a way concerning last year and the Miyakes’ withdrawal. Why she should believe I am keeping something from her, I do not know. If the Miyakes had some special reason for withdrawing like that, it would stand to reason they would not confide in me about it.

My own guess is that there was nothing so remarkable about the matter. True, their withdrawal at the last moment was most unexpected, but why should one suppose from this that there was anything peculiar in it? My feeling is that it was simply a matter of family status. The Miyakes, from what I saw of them, were just the proud, honest sort who would feel uncomfortable at the thought of their son marrying above his station. Indeed, a few years ago, they would probably have withdrawn more promptly, but what with the couple claiming it was a 'love match', and with all the talk these days of the new ways, the Miyakes are the kind of people who would become confused as to their correct course. No doubt the explanation is no more complicated than that.

It is possible, too, that they were confused by my apparent approval of the match. For I was very lax in considering the matter of status, it simply not being my instinct to concern myself with such things. Indeed, I have never at any point in my life been very aware of my own social standing, and even now, I am often surprised afresh when some event, or something someone may say, reminds me of the rather high esteem in which I am held. Just the other evening, for instance, I was down in our old pleasure district, drinking at Mrs Kawakami's place, where - as happens increasingly these days - Shintaro and I had found ourselves the only customers. We were as usual sitting up at the bar on our high-stools, exchanging remarks with Mrs Kawakami, and as the hours had gone by, and no one else had come in, our exchanges had grown more intimate. At one point, Mrs Kawakami was talking about some relative of hers, complaining that the young man had been unable to find a job worthy of his abilities, when Shintaro suddenly exclaimed:

'You must send him to Sensei here, Obasan! A good word from Sensei in the right place, your relative will soon find a good post.'

'What are you saying, Shintaro?' I protested. 'I'm retired now. I have no connections these days.'

'A recommendation from a man of Sensei's standing will command respect from anyone,' Shintaro had persisted. 'Send the young man to Sensei, Obasan.'

I was at first a little taken aback by the conviction of Shintaro's assertions. But then I realized he was remembering yet again that small deed I had performed for his younger brother all those years ago.

It must have been in 1935 or 1936, a very routine matter as I recall - a letter of recommendation to an acquaintance in the State Department, some such thing. I would have given the matter little further thought, but then one afternoon while I was relaxing at home, my wife announced there were visitors for me at the entryway.

'Please show them in,' I had said.

'But they insist they won't bother you by coming in.'

I went out to the entryway, and standing there were Shintaro and his younger brother - then no more than a youth. As soon as they saw me, they began bowing and giggling.

'Please step up,' I said, but they continued simply to bow and giggle. 'Shintaro, please. Step up to the tatami.'

'No, Sensei,' Shintaro said, all the time smiling and bowing. 'It is the height of impertinence for us to come to your house like this. The height of impertinence. But we could not remain at home any longer without thanking you.'

'Come on inside. I believe Setsuko was just making some tea.'

'No, Sensei, it is the height of impertinence. Really.' Then turning to his brother, Shintaro whispered quickly: 'Yoshio! Yoshio!'

For the first time, the young man stopped bowing and looked up at me nervously. Then he said: 'I will be grateful to you for the remainder of my life. I will exert every particle of my being to be worthy of your recommendation. I assure you, I will not let you down. I will work hard, and strive to satisfy my superiors. And however much I may be promoted in the future, I will never forget the man who enabled me to start on my career. '

'Really, it was nothing. It's no more than you deserve. '

This brought frantic protests from both of them, then Shintaro said to his brother: 'Yoshio, we have imposed enough on Sensei as it is. But before we leave, take a good look again at the man who has helped you. We are greatly privileged to have a benefactor of such influence and generosity. '

'Indeed,' the youth muttered, and gazed up at me.

'Please, Shintaro, this is embarrassing. Please come in and we'll celebrate with some sake. '

'No, Sensei, we must leave you now. It was the greatest impertinence to come here like this and disturb your afternoon. But we could not delay thanking you for one moment longer. '

This visit - I must admit it - left me with a certain feeling of achievement. It was one of those moments, in the midst of a busy career allowing little chance for stopping and taking stock, which illuminate suddenly just how far one has come. For true enough, I had almost unthinkingly started a young man on a good career. A few years earlier, such a thing would have been inconceivable and yet I had brought myself to such a position almost without realizing it.

'Many things have changed since the old days, Shintaro,' I pointed out the other night down at Mrs Kawakami's. 'I'm retired now, I don't have so many connections. '

But then for all I know, Shintaro may not be so wrong in his assumptions. It may be that if I chose to put it to the test, I would again be surprised by the extent of my influence. As I say, I have never had a keen awareness of my own standing.

In any case, even if Shintaro may at times display naïveté about certain things, this is nothing to be disparaged, it being no easy thing now to come across someone so untainted by the cynicism and bitterness of our day. There is something reassuring about going into Mrs Kawakami's and finding Shintaro sitting up there at the bar, just as one may have found him on any evening for the past seventeen or so years, absent-mindedly turning his cap round and round on the counter in that old way of his. It really is as though nothing has changed for Shintaro. He will greet me very politely, as though he were still my pupil, and throughout the evening, however drunk he may get, he will continue to address me as 'Sensei' and maintain his most respectful manner towards me. Sometimes he will even ask me questions relating to technique or style with all the eagerness of a young apprentice - though the truth is, of course, Shintaro has long ceased to be concerned with any real art. For some years now, he has devoted his time to his book illustrations, and his present speciality, I gather, is fire engines. He will work day after day up in that attic room of his, sketching out fire engine after fire engine. But I suppose in the evenings, after a few drinks, Shintaro likes to believe he is still the idealistic young artist I first took under my supervision.

This childlike aspect of Shintaro has frequently been a source of entertainment for Mrs Kawakami, who has a somewhat wicked side to her. One night recently, for instance, during a rainstorm, Shintaro had come running into the little bar and begun squeezing his cap out over the doormat.

'Really, Shintaro-san!' Mrs Kawakami had shouted at him. 'What terrible manners!'

At this, Shintaro had looked up in great distress, as though indeed he had committed an outrageous offence. He had then begun to apologize profusely, thus leading Mrs Kawakami on further.

‘I’ve never seen such manners, Shintaro-san. You seem to have no respect for me at all.’

‘Now stop this, Obasan,’ I had appealed to her after a while. ‘That’s enough, tell him you’re just joking.’

‘Joking? I’m hardly joking. The height of bad manners.’

And so it had gone on, until Shintaro had become quite pitiful to watch. But then again, on other occasions, Shintaro will be convinced he is being teased when in fact he is being spoken to quite earnestly. There was the time he had put Mrs Kawakami in difficulties by declaring cheerfully of a general who had just been executed as a war criminal: ‘I’ve always admired that man since I was a boy. I wonder what he’s up to now. Retired, no doubt.’

Some new customers had been present that night and had looked at him disapprovingly. When Mrs Kawakami, concerned for her trade, had gone to him and told him quietly of the general’s fate, Shintaro had burst out laughing.

‘Really, Obasan,’ he had said loudly. ‘Some of your jokes are quite extreme.’

Shintaro’s ignorance of such matters is often remarkable, but as I say, it is not something to disparage. One should be thankful there are still those uncontaminated by the current cynicism. In fact, it is probably this very quality of Shintaro’s – this sense that he has remained somehow unscathed by things – which has led me to enjoy his company more and more over these recent years.

As for Mrs Kawakami, although she will do her best not to allow the current mood to affect her, there is no denying she has been greatly aged by the war years. Before the war, she may still have passed for a ‘young woman’, but since then something inside her seems to have broken and sagged. And when one remembers those she has lost in the war, it is hardly any wonder. Business too has become increasingly difficult for her; certainly, it must be hard for her to believe this is the same district where she first opened her little place those sixteen or seventeen years ago. For nothing really remains of our old pleasure district now; almost all her old competitors have closed up and left, and Mrs Kawakami must more than once have considered doing likewise.

But when her place first appeared, it was squeezed in amidst so many other bars and eating houses, I remember some people doubting if it could survive long. Indeed, you could hardly walk down those little streets without brushing against the numerous cloth banners pressing at you from all sides, leaning out at you from their shop fronts, each declaring the attractions of their establishment in boisterous lettering. But in those days, there was enough custom in the district to keep any number of such establishments thriving. On the warmer evenings particularly, the area would fill with people strolling unhurriedly from bar to bar, or just standing talking in the middle of the street. Cars had long ceased to venture through, and even a bicycle could only be pushed with difficulty past those throngs of uncaring pedestrians.

I say 'our pleasure district', but I suppose it was really nothing more than somewhere to drink, eat and talk. You would have had to go into the city centre for the real pleasure quarters - for the geisha houses and theatres. For myself though, our own district was always preferable. It drew a lively but respectable crowd, many of them people like us - artists and writers lured by the promise of noisy conversations continuing into the night. The establishment my own group frequented was called 'Migi-Hidari', and stood at a point where three side streets intersected to form a paved precinct. The Migi-Hidari, unlike any of its neighbours, was a large sprawling place with an upper floor and plenty of hostesses both in Western and traditional dress. I had played my own small part in the Migi-Hidari's coming to so dwarf its competitors, and in recognition of this, our group had been provided with a table in one corner for our sole use. Those who drank with me there were, in effect, the élite of my school: Kuroda, Murasaki, Tanaka - brilliant young men, already with growing reputations. They all of them relished conversation, and I remember many passionate arguments taking place around that table.

Shintaro, I should say, was never one of that select group. I would not myself have objected to his joining us, but there existed a strong sense of hierarchy amongst my pupils, and Shintaro was certainly not regarded as of the first rank. In fact, I can recall one night, shortly after Shintaro and his brother had paid that visit to my house, my discussing that episode around our table. I remember the likes of Kuroda laughing at how grateful the brothers had been over 'a mere white-collar appointment'; but then they all listened solemnly as I recounted my view on how influence and status can creep up on someone who works busily, not pursuing these ends in themselves, but for the satisfaction of performing his tasks to the best of his ability. At this point, one of them - no doubt it was Kuroda - leaned forward and said:

'I have suspected for some time that Sensei was unaware of the high regard in which he is held by people in this city. Indeed, as the instance he has just related amply illustrates, his reputation has now spread beyond the world of art, to all walks of life. But how typical of Sensei's modest nature that he is unaware of this. How typical that he himself should be the most surprised by the esteem accorded to him. But to all of us here it comes as no surprise. In fact, it may be said that respected enormously as he is by the public at large, it is we here at this table who alone know the extent to which that respect still falls short. But I personally have no doubt. His reputation will become all the greater, and in years to come, our proudest honour will be to tell others that we were once the pupils of Masuji Ono. '

Now there was nothing remarkable in all this; it had become something of a habit that at some point in the evening, when we had all drunk a little, my protégés would take to making speeches of a loyal nature to me. And Kuroda in particular, being looked on as a sort of spokesman for them, gave a fair proportion of these. Of course, I usually ignored them, but on this particular occasion, as when Shintaro and his brother had stood bowing and giggling in my entryway, I experienced a warm glow of satisfaction.

But then it would not be accurate to suggest I only socialized with the best of my pupils. Indeed, the first time I ever stepped into Mrs Kawakami's, I believe I did so because I wished to spend the evening talking something over with Shintaro. Today, when I try to recall that evening, I find my memory of it merging with the sounds and images from all those other evenings; the lanterns hung above doorways, the laughter of people congregated outside the Migi-Hidari, the smell of deep-fried food, a bar hostess persuading someone to return to his wife - and echoing from every direction, the clicking of numerous wooden sandals on the concrete. I remember it being a warm summer's night, and not finding Shintaro in his usual haunts, I wandered around those tiny bars for some time. For all the competition there must have existed between those establishments, a neighbourly spirit reigned, and it was quite natural that on asking after Shintaro at one such bar that night, I should be advised by the hostess, without a trace of resentment, to try for him at the 'new place'.

No doubt, Mrs Kawakami could point out numerous changes - her little 'improvements' - that she has made over the years. But my impression is that her little place looked much the same that first night as it does today. On entering, one tends to be struck by the contrast between the bar counter, lit up by warm, low-hung lights, and the rest of the room, which is in shadow. Most of her customers prefer to sit up at the bar within that pool of light, and this gives a cosy, intimate feel to the place. I remember looking around me with approval that first night, and today, for all the changes which have transformed the world around it, Mrs Kawakami's remains as pleasing as ever.

But little else has remained unchanged. Coming out of Mrs Kawakami's now, you could stand at her doorway and believe you have just been drinking at some outpost of civilization. All around, there is nothing but a desert of demolished rubble. Only the backs of several buildings far in the distance will remind you that you are not so far from the city centre. 'War damage,' Mrs Kawakami calls it. But I remember walking around the district shortly after the surrender and many of those buildings were still standing. The Migi-Hidari was still there, the windows all blown out, part of the roof fallen in. And I remember wondering to myself as I walked past those shattered buildings, if they would ever again come back to life. Then I came by one morning and the bulldozers had pulled down everything.

So now that side of the street is nothing but rubble. No doubt the authorities have their plans, but it has been that way for three years. The rain collects in small puddles and grows stagnant amidst the broken brick. As a consequence, Mrs Kawakami has been obliged to put up mosquito wiring on her windows - not an effect she thinks will attract customers.

The buildings on Mrs Kawakami's own side of the street have remained standing, but many are unoccupied; the properties on either side of her, for instance, have been vacant for some time, a situation which makes her uncomfortable. If she became suddenly rich, she often tells us, she would buy up those properties and expand. In the meantime, she waits for someone to move into them; she would not mind if they became bars just like hers, anything provided she no longer had to live in the midst of a graveyard.

If you were to come out of Mrs Kawakami's as the darkness was setting in, you might feel compelled to pause a moment and gaze at that wasted expanse before you. You might still be able to make out through the gloom those heaps of broken brick and timber, and perhaps here and there, pieces of piping protruding from the ground like weeds. Then as you walked on past more heaps of rubble, numerous small puddles would gleam a moment as they caught in the lamplight.

And if on reaching the foot of the hill which climbs up to my house, you pause at the Bridge of Hesitation and look back towards the remains of our old pleasure district, if the sun has not yet set completely, you may see the line of old telegraph poles - still without wires to connect them - disappearing into the gloom down the route you have just come. And you may be able to make out the dark clusters of birds perched uncomfortably on the tops of the poles, as though awaiting the wires along which they once lined the sky.

One evening not so long ago, I was standing on that little wooden bridge and saw away in the distance two columns of smoke rising from the rubble. Perhaps it was government workers continuing some interminably slow programme; or perhaps children indulging in some delinquent game. But the sight of those columns against the sky put me in a melancholy mood. They were like pyres at some abandoned funeral. A graveyard, Mrs Kawakami says, and when one remembers all those people who once frequented the area, one cannot help seeing it that way.

But I am digressing. I was trying to recall here details of Setsuko's stay with us last month.

As I may have said, Setsuko spent much of the first day of her visit sitting out on the veranda, talking with her sister. At one point towards the latter part of the afternoon when my daughters were particularly deep in women's talk, I recall I left them to go in search of my grandson, who a few minutes earlier had gone running off into the house.

It was as I was coming down the corridor that a heavy thump made the whole house shake. Alarmed, I hurried on into the dining room. At that time of day, our dining room is largely in shadow, and after the brightness of the veranda, it took my eyes a moment or two to ascertain that Ichiro was not in the room at all. Then came another thump, followed by several more, together with my grandson's voice shouting: 'Yah! Yah!' The noise was coming from the adjoining piano room. I went to the doorway, listened for a moment, then quietly slid back the partition.

In contrast to the dining room, the piano room catches the sun throughout the day. It fills with a sharp, clear light, and had it been any larger, would have been an ideal place in which to take our meals. At one time, I had used it to store paintings and materials, but nowadays, apart from the upright German piano, the room is practically bare. No doubt this lack of clutter had inspired my grandson in much the same way as the veranda had earlier; for I found him progressing across the floor with a curious stamping movement, which I took to be an impersonation of someone galloping on horseback across open land. Because his back was turned to the doorway, it was some moments before he realized he was being observed.

'Oji!' he said, turning angrily. 'Can't you see I'm busy?'

'I'm sorry, Ichiro, I didn't realize.'

'I can't play with you just now!'

‘I’m very sorry. But it sounded so exciting from out here I wondered if I could come in and watch.’

For a moment, my grandson went on staring at me crossly. Then he said moodily: ‘All right. But you have to sit and be quiet. I’m busy.’

‘Very well,’ I said, with a laugh. ‘Thank you very much, Ichiro.’

My grandson continued to glare at me as I crossed the room and seated myself by the window. When Ichiro had arrived with his mother the previous evening, I had made him a gift of a sketchpad and a set of coloured crayons. I now noticed the sketchpad lying on the tatami nearby, three or four of the crayons scattered around it. I could see the first few leaves of the pad had been drawn on and was about to reach over to investigate, when Ichiro suddenly recommenced the drama I had interrupted.

‘Yah! Yah!’

I watched him for a while, but could make little sense of the scenes he was enacting. At intervals, he would repeat his horse movement; at other times, he appeared to be in combat with numerous invisible enemies. All the while, he continued to mutter lines of dialogue under his breath. I tried hard to make these out, but as far as I could tell he was not using actual words, simply making sounds with his tongue.

Clearly, though he did his best to ignore me, my presence was having an inhibiting effect. Several times he froze in mid-movement as though inspiration had suddenly deserted him, before throwing himself into action again. Then before long he gave up and slumped on to the floor. I wondered if I should applaud, but thought better of it.

‘Very impressive, Ichiro. But tell me, who were you pretending to be?’

‘You guess, Oji.’

‘Hmm. Lord Yoshitsune perhaps? No? A samurai warrior, then? Hmm. Or a ninja perhaps? The Ninja of the Wind.’

‘Oji’s completely on the wrong scent.’

‘Then tell me. Who were you?’

‘Lone Ranger!’

‘What?’

‘Lone Ranger! Hi yo Silver!’

‘Lone Ranger? Is that a cowboy?’

‘Hi yo Silver!’ Ichiro began to gallop again, and this time made a neighing noise.

I watched my grandson for a moment. ‘How did you learn to play cowboys, Ichiro?’ I asked eventually, but he just continued to gallop and neigh.

‘Ichiro,’ I said, more firmly, ‘wait a moment and listen. It’s more interesting, more interesting by far, to pretend to be someone like Lord Yoshitsune. Shall I tell you why? Ichiro, listen, Oji will explain it to you. Ichiro, listen to your Oji-san. Ichiro!’

Possibly I raised my voice more than I had intended, for he stopped and looked at me with a startled expression. I continued to look at him for a moment, then gave a sigh.

‘I’m sorry, Ichiro, I shouldn’t have interrupted. Of course you can be anyone you like. Even a cowboy. You must forgive your Oji-san. He was forgetting for a moment.’

My grandson continued to stare at me, and it occurred to me he was about to burst into tears or else run out of the room.

‘Please, Ichiro, you just carry on with what you were doing.’

For a moment longer, Ichiro went on staring at me. Then he suddenly yelled out: ‘Lone Ranger! Hi yo Silver!’ and began to gallop again. He stamped more violently than ever, causing the whole room to shake around us. I went on watching him for a moment, then reached over and picked up his sketchpad.

Ichiro had used up the first four or five sheets somewhat wastefully. His technique was not at all bad, but the sketches - of trams and trains - had each been abandoned at a very early stage. Ichiro noticed me examining the sketchpad and came hurrying over.

‘Oji! Who said you could look at those?’ He tried to snatch the pad away from me, but I held it out of his reach.

‘Now, Ichiro, don’t be unkind. Oji wants to see what you’ve been doing with the crayons he gave you. That’s only fair.’ I lowered the sketchpad and opened it at the first drawing. ‘Very impressive, Ichiro. Hmm. But you know, you could be even better if you wanted.’

‘Oji can’t see those!’

My grandson made another attempt to snatch away the pad, obliging me to hold off his hands with my arm.

‘Oji! Give me back my book!’

‘Now, Ichiro, stop that. Let your Oji see. Look, Ichiro, bring me those crayons over there. Bring them over and we’ll draw something together. Oji will show you.’

These words had a surprising effect. My grandson immediately stopped struggling, then went to gather up the crayons scattered on the floor. When he came back, something new - a kind of fascination - had entered his manner. He seated himself beside me and held out the crayons, watching carefully, but saying nothing.

I turned the sketchpad to a new sheet and placed it on the floor in front of him. ‘Let me see you do something first, Ichiro. Then Oji will see if he can help to make it better at all. What do you want to draw?’

My grandson had become very quiet. He looked down at the blank sheet thoughtfully, but made no move to start drawing.

‘Why don’t you try and draw something you saw yesterday?’ I suggested. ‘Something you saw when you first arrived in the city.’

Ichiro went on looking at the sketchpad. Then he looked up and asked: ‘Was Oji a famous artist once?’

‘A famous artist?’ I gave a laugh. ‘I suppose you might say that. Is that what your mother says?’

‘Father says you used to be a famous artist. But you had to finish.’

‘I’ve retired, Ichiro. Everyone retires when they get to a certain age. It’s only right, they deserve a rest.’

‘Father says you had to finish. Because Japan lost the war.’

I gave another laugh, then reached forward and took the sketchpad. I turned back the leaves, looking through my grandson’s sketches of trams, and held one up at arm’s length for a better view. ‘You reach a certain age, Ichiro, and you want a rest from things. Your father too will stop working when he gets to my age. And one day, you’ll be my age and you’ll want a rest too. Now’ - I returned to the blank sheet and placed the pad before him again - ‘what will you draw for me, Ichiro?’

‘Did Oji do the picture in the dining room?’

‘No, that’s by an artist called Urayama. Why, do you like it?’

‘Did Oji paint the one in the corridor?’

‘That’s by another fine artist, an old friend of Oji’s.’

‘Where are Oji’s pictures then?’

‘They’re tidied away for the moment. Now, Ichiro, let’s get back to important things. What will you draw for me? What do you remember from yesterday? What’s the matter, Ichiro? Suddenly so quiet.’

‘I want to see Oji’s pictures.’

‘I’m sure a bright boy like you can remember all sorts of things. What about the film poster you saw? The one with the prehistoric monster. I’m sure someone like you could do it very well. Even better than the real poster perhaps.’

Ichiro seemed to consider this for a moment. Then he rolled over on to his front, and with his face close to the paper, began to draw.

Using a dark brown crayon, he drew on the lower part of the sheet a row of boxes – which soon became a skyline of city buildings. And then there emerged, looming above the city, a huge lizard-like creature up on its hind legs. At this point my grandson exchanged his brown crayon for a red one and began to make bright streaks all around the lizard.

‘What is this, Ichiro? Fire?’

Ichiro continued with his red streaks, not answering.

‘Why is there fire, Ichiro? Is it to do with the monster appearing?’

‘Electric cables,’ Ichiro said, with an impatient sigh.

‘Electric cables? Now that’s interesting. I wonder why electric cables cause fire. Do you know?’

Ichiro gave another sigh and continued to draw. He picked up his dark crayon again and began to draw at the foot of the sheet panic-stricken people fleeing in all directions.

‘You’re doing this very well, Ichiro,’ I remarked.

‘Perhaps as a reward, Oji might take you to see the movie tomorrow. Would you like that?’

My grandson paused and looked up. 'It might be too scary for Oji,' he said.

'I doubt that,' I said, with a laugh. 'But it may well frighten your mother and your aunt.'

At this, Ichiro burst into loud laughter. He rolled over on to his back and laughed some more. 'Mother and Aunt Noriko will be really scared!' he shouted at the ceiling.

'But we men will enjoy it, won't we, Ichiro? We'll go tomorrow. Would you like that? We'll take the women with us and watch them get frightened.'

Ichiro continued to laugh loudly. 'Aunt Noriko will get scared straightaway!'

'She probably will,' I said, laughing again myself. 'Very well, we'll all go tomorrow. Now, Ichiro, you'd better go on with your picture.'

'Aunt Noriko will get scared! She'll want to leave!'

'Now, Ichiro, let's carry on. You were doing very well.'

Ichiro rolled back over and returned to his picture. His earlier concentration, though, seemed to have deserted him; he began to add more and more fleeing figures at the bottom of his sketch until the shapes merged and became meaningless. Eventually abandoning any sense of care, he started to scribble wildly all over the lower section of the sheet.

'Ichiro, what are you doing? We won't go to the movie if you're going to do that. Ichiro, stop that!'

My grandson sprang to his feet and yelled out: 'Hi yo Silver!'

'Ichiro, sit down. You haven't finished yet.'

'Where's Aunt Noriko?'

‘She’s talking with your mother. Now, Ichiro, you haven’t finished your picture yet. Ichiro!’

But my grandson went running out of the room, shouting: ‘Lone Ranger! Hi yo Silver!’

I cannot recall precisely what I did with myself for the next several minutes. Quite possibly I remained sitting there in the piano room, gazing at Ichiro’s drawings, thinking about nothing in particular as I am increasingly prone to do these days. Eventually, though, I rose to my feet and went in search of my family.

I found Setsuko sitting alone on the veranda, looking out at the garden. The sun was still bright, but the day had grown much cooler, and as I appeared Setsuko turned and moved a cushion into a patch of sunlight for me.

‘We made fresh tea,’ she said. ‘Would you care for some, Father?’

I thanked her, and as she poured for me, I cast my gaze out to the garden.

For all it suffered during the war, our garden has recovered well, and is still recognizably the one Akira Sugimura built some forty years ago. Down at the far end, near the back wall, I could see Noriko and Ichiro examining a bamboo bush. That bush, like almost all the other shrubs and trees in the garden, had been transplanted fully grown by Sugimura from elsewhere in the city. In fact, one rumour has it that Sugimura personally walked around the city, peering over garden fences, offering large sums of money to the owner of any shrub or tree he wished to uproot for himself. If this is true, then he made his choice with admirable skill; the result was – and remains today – splendidly harmonious. There is a natural, rambling feeling about the garden, with barely a hint of artificial design.

‘Noriko was always so good with children,’ Setsuko remarked, her eyes on them. ‘Ichiro’s taken a great liking to her. '

'Ichiro's a fine boy,' I said. 'Not at all shy like a lot of children that age.'

'I hope he wasn't giving you trouble just now. He can be quite headstrong at times. Please don't hesitate to scold him if he becomes a nuisance.'

'Not at all. We're getting on fine. We were just practising some drawing together, in fact.'

'Really? I'm sure he enjoyed that.'

'He was play-acting some scenario for me too,' I said. 'He mimes his actions very well.'

'Oh yes. He occupies himself for long periods that way.'

'Does he make up his own words? I was trying to listen, but I couldn't make out what he was saying.'

My daughter raised a hand to cover her laugh. 'He must have been playing cowboys. When he plays cowboys, he tries to speak English.'

'English? Extraordinary. So that's what it was.'

'We took him once to the cinema to see an American cowboy film. He's been very fond of cowboys ever since. We even had to buy him a ten-gallon hat. He's convinced cowboys make that funny sound he does. It must have seemed very strange.'

'So that's what it was,' I said with a laugh. 'My grandson's become a cowboy.'

Down in the garden, a breeze was making the foliage sway.

Noriko was crouching down by the old stone lantern near the back wall, pointing something out to Ichiro.

'Still,' I said, with a sigh, 'only a few years ago, Ichiro wouldn't have been allowed to see such a thing as a cowboy film. '

Setsuko, without turning from the garden, said: 'Suichi believes it's better he likes cowboys than that he idolize people like Miyamoto Musashi. Suichi thinks the American heroes are the better models for children now. '

'Is that so? So that's Suichi's view. '

Ichiro seemed unimpressed by the stone lantern, for we could see him tugging violently at his aunt's arm. Beside me, Setsuko gave an embarrassed laugh.

'He's so arrogant. Pulling people back and forth. Such bad manners. '

'Incidentally,' I said, 'Ichiro and I decided we'd go to the cinema tomorrow. '

'Really? '

I could see at once the uncertainty in Setsuko's manner.

'Yes,' I said, 'he seems very keen on this prehistoric monster. Don't worry, I looked it up in the newspaper. The movie's perfectly suitable for a boy of his age. '

'Yes, I'm sure. '

'In fact, I thought we should all go. A family outing, so to speak. '

Setsuko cleared her throat nervously. 'That would be most enjoyable. Except perhaps Noriko may also have some plans for tomorrow. '

'Oh? What plans are those? '

'I believe she was wanting us all to go to the deer park. But I'm sure that can be done another time. '

'I had no idea Noriko had any plans. She certainly never asked me about them. Besides, I've already told Ichiro we'd go to the movie tomorrow. His heart will be set on it now. '

‘Indeed,’ said Setsuko. ‘I’m sure he’d like to go to the cinema.’

Noriko was coming up the garden path towards us, Ichiro leading her by the hand. No doubt I might have taken up with her straightaway the matter of the following day, but she and Ichiro did not stay on the veranda, going inside to wash their hands. As it was, I was not able to raise the matter until after supper that evening.

Although during the day the dining room is a rather gloomy place on account of the sun rarely reaching it, after dark, with the lightshade low over the table, it has a cosy atmosphere. We had been sitting around the table for several minutes, reading newspapers and magazines, when I said to my grandson:

‘Well, Ichiro, have you told your aunt about tomorrow?’

Ichiro looked up from his book with a puzzled expression.

‘Shall we take the women with us or not?’ I said. ‘Remember what we said. They might find it too scary.’

This time my grandson understood me and grinned. ‘It might be too scary for Aunt Noriko,’ he said. ‘Do you want to come, Aunt Noriko?’

‘Come to what, Ichiro-san?’ Noriko asked.

‘Monster film.’

‘I thought we would all go tomorrow to the cinema,’ I explained. ‘A family outing, so to speak.’

‘Tomorrow?’ Noriko looked at me, then turned to my grandson. ‘Well, we can’t go tomorrow, can we, Ichiro? We’re going to the deer park, remember?’

‘The deer park can wait,’ I said. ‘The boy’s looking forward to his film now.’

‘Nonsense,’ Noriko said. ‘Everything’s arranged. We’re going to call in on Mrs Watanabe on the way back. She’s been wanting to meet Ichiro. Anyway, we decided a long time ago. Didn’t we, Ichiro?’

‘It’s very kind of Father,’ Setsuko put in. ‘But I understand Mrs Watanabe is expecting us. Perhaps we should leave the cinema until the day after.’

‘But Ichiro’s been looking forward to it,’ I protested. ‘Isn’t that so, Ichiro? What a nuisance these women are.’

Ichiro did not look at me, apparently absorbed again in his book.

‘You tell these women, Ichiro,’ I said.

My grandson continued to stare at his book.

‘Ichiro.’

Suddenly, dropping his book on the table, he got to his feet and went running out of the room, through into the piano room.

I gave a small laugh. ‘There,’ I said to Noriko. ‘You’ve disappointed him now. You should have left things as they were.’

‘Don’t be ridiculous, Father. We’d arranged Mrs Watanabe’s long ago. Besides, it’s ridiculous to take Ichiro to see a film like that. He won’t enjoy a film like that, will he, Setsuko?’

My elder daughter smiled uncomfortably. ‘It’s very kind of Father,’ she said, quietly. ‘Perhaps the day after ...’

I gave a sigh, shaking my head, and returned to my newspaper. But when after a few minutes it became clear that neither of my daughters was going to bring Ichiro back, I got up myself and went into the piano room.

Ichiro, unable to reach the cord on the lightshade, had switched on the lamp on top of the piano. I found him sitting on the piano stool, one side of his head resting on the piano lid. His features, squashed against the dark wood, bore a disgruntled look.

‘I’m sorry about this, Ichiro,’ I said. ‘But don’t be disappointed. We’ll go the day after.’

Ichiro gave no reaction, so I said: ‘Now, Ichiro, this is nothing to be so disappointed about.’

I walked over to the window. It had become quite dark outside, and all I could see was my reflection and that of the room behind me. From the other room, I could hear the women talking in lowered voices.

‘Cheer up, Ichiro,’ I said. ‘This is nothing to get upset about. We’ll go the day after, I promise you.’

When I turned again to Ichiro, his head was resting on the piano lid as before; but now, he was walking his fingers along the lid, as though playing the keys.

I gave a light laugh. ‘Well, Ichiro, we’ll just go the day after. We can’t have the women ruling over us, can we?’ I gave another laugh. ‘I expect they thought it would be too scary. Eh, Ichiro?’

My grandson still gave no response, though he continued his finger movements on the piano lid. I decided it would be best to leave him alone for a few moments, and giving another laugh, went back through into the dining room.

I found my daughters sitting in silence, reading their magazines. As I sat down, I gave a heavy sigh, but neither of them responded to this. I had replaced my reading glasses on my face and was about to start on my newspaper, when Noriko said in a quiet voice: ‘Father, shall we make some tea?’

‘That’s kind of you, Noriko. But not for me just now.’

‘What about you, Setsuko?’

‘Thank you, Noriko. But I don’t think I will either.’

We continued to read in silence for a few more moments. Then Setsuko said: 'Will Father be coming with us tomorrow? We could still have our family outing then.'

'I'd like to. But I'm afraid there're a few things I have to be getting on with tomorrow.'

'What do you mean?' Noriko broke in. 'What things are those?' Then turning to Setsuko, she said: 'Don't listen to Father. He's got nothing to do these days. He'll just mope about the house like he always does now.'

'It would be very pleasant if Father would accompany us,' Setsuko said to me.

'It's regrettable,' I said, looking down at my newspaper again. 'But I have one or two things to attend to.'

'So you're going to stay at home all on your own?' Noriko asked.

'If you're all going away, it seems I'll have to.'

Setsuko gave a polite cough. Then she said: 'Perhaps then I'll remain at home also. Father and I have had little chance to exchange news.'

Noriko stared across the table at her sister. 'There's no need for you to miss out. You've come all this way, you don't want to spend all your time indoors.'

'But I would very much enjoy staying and keeping Father company. I expect we have a lot more news to exchange.'

'Father, look what you've done,' Noriko said. Then to her sister, she said: 'So it's only me and Ichiro now.'

'Ichiro will enjoy spending the day with you, Noriko,' Setsuko said with a smile. 'You're very much his favourite at the moment.'

I was glad about Setsuko's decision to remain at home, for indeed, we had had little opportunity to talk without interruption; and there are, of course, many things a father wishes to know about a married daughter's life which he cannot ask outright. But what never occurred to me that evening was that Setsuko would have her own reasons for wishing to remain in the house with me.

It is perhaps a sign of my advancing years that I have taken to wandering into rooms for no purpose. When Setsuko slid open the door of the reception room that afternoon - on the second day of her visit - I must have been standing there lost in thought for some considerable time.

'I'm sorry,' she said. 'I'll come back later.'

I turned, a little startled, to find my daughter kneeling at the threshold, holding a vase filled with flowers and cuttings.

'No, please come in,' I said to her. 'I was doing nothing in particular.'

Retirement places more time on your hands. Indeed, it is one of the enjoyments of retirement that you are able to drift through the day at your own pace, easy in the knowledge that you have put hard work and achievement behind you. Nevertheless, I must be getting absent-minded indeed to be wandering aimlessly into - of all places - the reception room. For throughout my years I have preserved the sense, instilled in me by my father, that the reception room of a house is a place to be revered, a place to be kept unsoiled by everyday trivialities, reserved for the receiving of important guests, or else the paying of respects at the Buddhist altar. Accordingly, the reception room of my house has always had a more solemn atmosphere than that to be found in most households; and although I never made a rule of it as my own father did, I discouraged my children while they were young from entering the room unless specifically bidden to do so.

My respect for reception rooms may well appear exaggerated, but then you must realize that in the house I grew up in - in Tsuruoka Village, a half-day's train journey from here - I was forbidden even to enter the reception room until the age of twelve. That room being in many senses the centre of the house, curiosity compelled me to construct an image of its interior from the occasional glimpses I managed to catch of it. Later in my life I was often to surprise colleagues with my ability to realize a scene on canvas based only on the briefest of passing glances; it is possible I have my father to thank for this skill, and the inadvertent training he gave my artist's eye during those formative years. In any case, when I reached the age of twelve, the 'business meetings' began, and then I found myself inside that room once every week.

'Masuji and I will be discussing business tonight,' my father would announce during supper. And that would serve both as my summons to present myself after the meal, and as a warning to the rest of the family to make no noise in the vicinity of the reception room that evening.

My father would disappear into the room after supper, and call me some fifteen minutes later. The room I entered would be lit by a single tall candle standing in the centre of the floor. Within the circle of light it cast, my father would be sitting cross-legged on the tatami before his wooden 'business box'. He would gesture for me to sit opposite him in the light, and as I did so, the brightness of the candle would put the rest of the room into shadow. Only vaguely would I be able to discern past my father's shoulder the Buddhist altar by the far wall, or the few hangings adorning the alcoves.

My father would then begin his talking. From out of his 'business box' he would produce small, fat notebooks, some of which he would open so that he could point out to me columns of densely packed figures. All the while, his talking would continue in a measured, grave tone, to pause only occasionally when he would look up at me as though for confirmation. At these points, I would hurriedly utter: 'Yes, indeed.'

Of course, it was quite impossible for me to follow what my father was saying. Employing jargon, recounting his way through lengthy calculations, he made no concessions to the fact that he was addressing a young boy. But it seemed equally impossible for me to ask him to stop and explain. For as I saw it, I had been allowed into the reception room only because I had been deemed old enough to understand such talk. My sense of shame was matched only by a terrible fear that at any moment I would be called upon to say more than 'Yes, indeed' and my game would be up. And although month after month went by and I was never required to say anything more, I nevertheless lived in dread of the next 'business meeting'.

Of course, it is clear to me now that my father never expected me for a moment to follow his talk, but I have never ascertained just why he put me through these ordeals. Perhaps he wished to impress upon me from that early age his expectation that I would eventually take over the family business. Or perhaps he felt that as future head of the family, it was only right I should be consulted on all decisions whose repercussions were likely to extend into my adulthood; that way, so my father may have figured it, I would have less cause for complaint were I to inherit an unsound business.

Then when I was fifteen, I remember being called into the reception room for a different kind of meeting. As ever, the room was lit by the tall candle, my father sat at the centre of its light. But that evening, instead of his business box, he had before him a heavy earthenware ashpot. This puzzled me, for this ashpot - the largest in the house - was normally produced only for guests.

'You've brought all of them?' he asked.

‘I’ve done as you instructed.’

I laid beside my father the pile of paintings and sketches I had been holding in my arms. They made an untidy pile, sheets of varying sizes and quality, most of which had warped or wrinkled with the paint.

I sat in silence while my father looked through my work. He would regard each painting for a moment, then lay it to one side. When he was almost half-way through my collection, he said without looking up:

‘Masuji, are you sure all your work is here? Aren’t there one or two paintings you haven’t brought me?’

I did not answer immediately. He looked up and asked: ‘Well?’

‘It’s possible there may be one or two I have not brought.’

‘Indeed. And no doubt, Masuji, the missing paintings are the very ones you’re most proud of. Isn’t that so?’

He had turned his eyes down to the paintings again, so I did not answer. For several more moments, I watched him going through the pile. Once, he held one painting close to the candle flame, saying: ‘This is the path leading down from Nishiyama hill, is it not? Certainly you’ve caught the likeness very well. That’s just how it looks coming down the hill. Very skilful.’

‘Thank you.’

‘You know, Masuji’ - my father’s eyes were still fixed on the painting - ‘I’ve heard a curious thing from your mother. She seems to be under the impression you wish to take up painting as a profession.’

He did not phrase this as a question, so I did not at first reply. But then he looked up and repeated: ‘Your mother, Masuji, seems to be under the impression that you wish to take up painting as a profession. Naturally, she is mistaken in supposing this. '

'Naturally,' I said, quietly.

'You mean, there has been some misunderstanding on her part. '

'No doubt. '

'I see. '

For a few more minutes, my father continued to study the paintings, and I sat there watching him in silence. Then he said without looking up: 'In fact, I think that was your mother going by outside. Did you hear her? '

'I'm afraid I didn't hear anyone. '

'I think it was your mother. Ask her to step in here since she's passing. '

I rose to my feet and went to the doorway. The corridor was dark and empty, as I had known it would be. Behind me, I heard my father's voice say: 'While you're fetching her, Masuji, gather together the rest of your paintings and bring them to me. '

Perhaps it was simply my imagination, but when I returned to the room a few minutes later, accompanied by my mother, I received the impression the earthenware ashpot had been moved slightly nearer the candle. I also thought there was a smell of burning in the air, but when I glanced into the ashpot, there were no signs of its having been used.

My father acknowledged me distractedly when I placed the last examples of my work beside the original pile. He appeared still to be preoccupied with my paintings, and for some time, he ignored both my mother and me, seated before him in silence. Then finally, he gave a sigh, looked up and said to me: 'I don't expect, Masuji, you have much time for wandering priests, do you? '

‘Wandering priests? I suppose not.’

‘They have a lot to say about this world. I don’t pay much attention to them most of the time. But it’s only decent to be courteous to holy men, even if they strike you sometimes as nothing more than beggars.’

He paused, so I said: ‘Yes, indeed.’

Then my father turned to my mother and said: ‘Do you remember, Sachiko, the wandering priests who used to come through this village? There was one who came to this house just after our son here was born. A thin old man, with only one hand. But a very sturdy fellow for all that. You remember him?’

‘Yes, of course,’ my mother said. ‘But perhaps one should not take to heart what some of these priests have to say.’

‘But you remember,’ my father said, ‘this priest gained a deep insight into Masuji’s heart. He left us with a warning, you remember, Sachiko?’

‘But our son was no more than a baby then,’ my mother said. Her voice was lowered, as though she somehow hoped I would not hear. In contrast, my father’s voice was needlessly loud, as if addressing an audience:

‘He left us with a warning. Masuji’s limbs were healthy, he told us, but he had been born with a flaw in his nature. A weak streak that would give him a tendency towards slothfulness and deceit. You remember this, Sachiko?’

‘But I believe the priest also had many positive things to say about our son.’

‘This is true. Our son had a lot of good qualities, the priest did point that out. But you recall his warning, Sachiko? He said if the good points were to dominate, we who brought him up would have to be vigilant and check this weak streak whenever it tried to manifest itself. Otherwise, so the old priest told us, Masuji here would grow up to be a good-for-nothing. '

'But perhaps,' my mother said cautiously, 'it is unwise to take to heart what these priests have to say.'

My father appeared a little surprised by this remark. Then, after a moment, he nodded thoughtfully, as though my mother had made a perplexing point. 'I was myself reluctant to take him seriously at the time,' he continued. 'But then at every stage of Masuji's growing up, I've been obliged to acknowledge that old man's words. It can't be denied, there is a weakness running through our son's character. There's little in the way of malice in him. But unceasingly, we've had to combat his laziness, his dislike of useful work, his weak will.'

Then, with some deliberation, my father picked up three or four of my paintings and held them in both hands as though to test their weight. He turned his gaze towards me and said: 'Masuji, your mother here was under the impression that you wished to pursue painting as a profession. Has there perhaps been some misunderstanding on her part?'

I lowered my eyes and remained silent. Then I heard my mother's voice beside me, almost whispering, say: 'He's still very young. I'm sure It's just a childish whim of his.'

There was a pause, then my father said: 'Tell me, Masuji, have you any idea what kind of a world artists inhabit?'

I remained silent, looking at the floor before me.

'Artists', my father's voice continued, 'live in squalor and poverty. They inhabit a world which gives them every temptation to become weak-willed and depraved. Am I not right, Sachiko?'

‘Naturally. Yet perhaps there are one or two who are able to pursue an artistic career and yet avoid such pitfalls.’

‘Of course, there are exceptions,’ my father said. My eyes were still lowered, but I could tell from his voice that he was again nodding in his perplexed manner. ‘The handful with extraordinary resolve and character. But I’m afraid our son here is far from being such a person. Indeed, quite the contrary. It is our duty to protect him from such dangers. We do, after all, wish him to become someone we can be proud of, don’t we?’

‘Of course,’ my mother said.

I looked up quickly. The candle had burned half-way down its length and the flame was sharply illuminating one side of my father’s face. He had now placed the paintings on his lap, and I noticed how his fingers were moving impatiently along their edges.

‘Masuji,’ he said, ‘you may leave us now. I wish to speak with your mother.’

I can remember a little later that night, coming across my mother in the darkness. In all likelihood, it was in one of the corridors that I encountered her, though I do not remember this. Neither do I remember why I was wandering around the house in the dark, but it was certainly not in order to eavesdrop on my parents – for I do recall being resolved to pay no heed to what occurred in the reception room after my departure. In those days, of course, houses were all badly lit, so it was not at all unusual that we should stand in the dark and converse. I could make out my mother’s figure in front of me, but could not see her face.

‘There’s a smell of burning around the house,’ I remarked.

‘Burning?’ My mother was silent for a while, then she said: ‘No. I don’t think so. It must be your imagination,

Masuji. '

'I smelt burning,' I said. 'There, I just caught it again. Is Father still in the reception room?'

'Yes. He's working on something.'

'Whatever he's doing in there,' I said, 'it doesn't bother me in the least.'

My mother made no sound, so I added: 'The only thing Father's succeeded in kindling is my ambition.'

'That is good to hear, Masuji.'

'You mustn't misunderstand me, Mother. I have no wish to find myself in years to come, sitting where Father is now sitting, telling my own son about accounts and money. Would you be proud of me if I grew to be like that?'

'I would indeed, Masuji. There is much more to a life like your father's than you can possibly know at your age.'

'I would never be proud of myself. When I said I was ambitious, I meant I wished to rise above such a life.'

My mother fell silent for some moments. Then she said: 'When you are young, there are many things which appear dull and lifeless. But as you get older, you will find these are the very things that are most important to you.'

I did not reply to this. Instead, I believe I said: 'Once, I was terrified of Father's business meetings. But for some time now, they've simply bored me. In fact, they disgust me. What are these meetings I'm so privileged to attend? The counting of loose change. The fingering of coins, hour after hour. I would never forgive myself if my life came to be like that.' I paused and waited to see if my mother would say anything. For a moment, I had a peculiar feeling she had walked silently away while I had been speaking and I was now standing there alone. But then I heard her move just in front of me, so I repeated: 'It doesn't bother me in the least what Father's doing in the reception room. All he's kindled is my ambition.'

However, I see I am drifting. My intention had been to record here that conversation I had with Setsuko last month when she came into the reception room to change the flowers.

As I recall it, Setsuko had seated herself before the Buddhist altar and had begun to remove the more tired of the flowers decorating it. I had seated myself a little behind her, watching the way she carefully shook each stem before placing it on her lap, and I believe we were talking about something quite light-hearted at that stage. But then she said, without turning from her flowers:

'Excuse me for mentioning this, Father. No doubt, it would have already occurred to you.'

'What is that, Setsuko?'

'I merely mention it because I gather it is very likely Noriko's marriage negotiations will progress.'

Setsuko had begun to transfer, one by one, the fresh cuttings from out of her vase into those surrounding the altar. She was performing this task with great care, pausing after each flower to consider the effect. 'I merely wished to say,' she went on, 'once the negotiations begin in earnest, it may be as well if Father were to take certain precautionary steps.'

'Precautionary steps? Naturally, we'll go carefully. But what precisely did you have in mind?'

'Forgive me, I was referring particularly to the investigations.'

'Well, of course, we'll be as thorough as necessary. We'll hire the same detective as last year. He was very reliable, you may remember.'

Setsuko carefully repositioned a stem. 'Forgive me, I am no doubt expressing myself unclearly. I was, in fact, referring to their investigations.'

'I'm sorry, I'm not sure I follow you. I was not aware we had anything to hide.'

Setsuko gave a nervous laugh. 'Father must forgive me. As you know, I've never had a gift for conversation. Suichi is forever scolding me for expressing myself badly. He expresses himself so eloquently. No doubt, I should endeavour to learn from him.'

'I'm sure your conversation is fine, but I'm afraid I don't quite follow what you are saying.'

Suddenly, Setsuko raised her hands in despair. 'The breeze,' she said with a sigh, and reached forward to her flowers once more. 'I like them like this, but the breeze doesn't seem to agree.' For a moment, she became preoccupied again. Then she said: 'You must forgive me, Father. In my place, Suichi would express things better. But of course, he isn't here. I merely wished to say that it is perhaps wise if Father would take certain precautionary steps. To ensure misunderstandings do not arise. After all, Noriko is almost twenty-six now. We cannot afford many more disappointments such as last year's.'

'Misunderstandings about what, Setsuko?'

'About the past. But please, I'm sure I'm speaking quite needlessly. Father has no doubt thought already of all these things and will do whatever is necessary.'

She sat back, pondering her work, then turned to me with a smile. 'I have little skill in these things,' she said, indicating the flowers.

'They look splendid.'

She gave a doubtful glance towards the altar and laughed self-consciously.

Yesterday, as I was enjoying the tram ride down to the quiet suburb of Arakawa, the recollection of that exchange in the reception room came into my mind, causing me to experience a wave of irritation. As I looked out of the window at the scenery, growing ever less cluttered as we continued south, the image returned to my mind of my daughter seated in front of the altar, advising me to take 'precautionary steps'. I remembered again the way she had turned her face towards me slightly to say: 'After all, we cannot afford many more disappointments such as last year's.' And I remembered again her knowing manner on the veranda that first morning of her visit, when she had hinted I had some peculiar secret about the Miyakes' withdrawal last year. Such recollections had already marred my mood over this past month; but it was yesterday, in the tranquillity of travelling alone to the quieter reaches of the city, that I was able to consider my feelings more clearly, and I came to realize my sense of irritation was not essentially directed against Setsuko, but against her husband.

It is, I suppose, natural enough that a wife is influenced by her husband's ideas - even, as in the case of Suichi's, when they are quite irrational. But when a man induces his wife to turn suspicious thoughts against her own father, then that is surely cause enough for resentment. On account of what he must have suffered out in Manchuria, I have in the past tried to adopt a tolerant attitude towards certain aspects of his behaviour; I have not taken personally, for instance, the frequent signs of bitterness he has displayed towards my generation. But then I always assumed such feelings fade with time. However, so far as Suichi is concerned, they seem to be actually growing more trenchant and unreasonable.

All this would not be bothering me now - after all, Setsuko and Suichi live far away, and I never see them more than once a year - if it were not that latterly, ever since Setsuko's visit last month, these same irrational ideas seem to be infecting Noriko's mind. This is what has irritated me and tempted me several times these past few days to write an angry letter to Setsuko. It is all very well a husband and wife occupying each other with ridiculous speculations, but they should keep such things to themselves. A stricter father, no doubt, would have done something long ago.

More than once last month, I had come upon my daughters deep in discussion and noticed how they broke off guiltily before starting some fresh, rather unconvincing conversation. In fact, I can recall this happening at least three times during the course of the five days Setsuko spent here. And then just a few days ago, Noriko and I were finishing breakfast when she said to me:

'I was walking past the Shimizu department store yesterday and guess who I saw standing at the tram stop? It was Jiro Miyake!'

'Miyake?' I looked up from my bowl, surprised to hear Noriko mentioning the name so brazenly. 'Why, that was unfortunate.'

'Unfortunate? Well actually, Father, I was rather pleased to see him. He seemed embarrassed though, so I didn't talk to him for long. In any case, I had to get back to the office. I was just out on an errand, you see. But did you know he's engaged to be married now?'

'He told you that? What a nerve.'

'He didn't volunteer it, of course. I asked him. I told him I was in the middle of new negotiations now and asked him how his own marriage prospects were. I asked him just like that. His face was going scarlet! But then he came out with it and said he was all but engaged now. It's all practically settled.'

'Really, Noriko, you shouldn't be so indiscreet. Why did you have to mention marriage at all?'

‘I was curious. I’m not upset about it any more. And with the present negotiations going so well, I was just thinking the other day, what a pity it would be if Jiro Miyake was still brooding over last year. So you can imagine how pleased I was to find him practically engaged.’

‘I see.’

‘I hope I get to meet his bride soon. I’m sure she’s very nice, aren’t you, Father?’

‘I’m sure.’

We continued eating for a moment. Then Noriko said: ‘There was something else I almost asked him. But I didn’t.’ She leaned forward and whispered: ‘I almost asked about last year. About why they pulled out.’

‘It’s just as well you didn’t. Besides, they gave their reason clearly enough at the time. They felt the young man was inadequately placed to be worthy of you.’

‘But you know that was just formality, Father. We never found out the real reason. At least, I never got to hear about it.’ It was at this point that something in her voice made me look up again from my bowl. Noriko was holding her chopsticks poised in the air, as though waiting for me to say something. Then, as I continued eating, she said: ‘Why do you suppose they pulled out? Did you ever discover about that?’

‘I discovered nothing. As I say, they said they felt the young man was inadequately placed. It’s a perfectly good answer.’

‘I wonder, Father, if it was simply that I didn’t come up to their requirements. Perhaps I wasn’t pretty enough. Do you think that’s what it was?’

‘It wasn’t anything to do with you, you know that. There are all sorts of reasons why a family pulls out of a negotiation.’

‘Well, Father, if it wasn’t to do with me, then I wonder what it could have been to make them pull out like that.’

It seemed to me there was something unnaturally deliberate in the way my daughter uttered those words. Perhaps I imagined it, but then a father comes to notice any small inflexions in his daughter’s speech.

In any case, that exchange with Noriko put me in mind again of the occasion I myself had encountered Jiro Miyake and had ended up talking with him at a tram stop. It was just over a year ago - the negotiations with the Miyake family were still going on at that point - towards the late afternoon when the city was full of people returning home after the day’s work. For some reason, I had been walking through the Yokote district and was making towards the tram stop outside the Kimura Company Building. If you are familiar with the Yokote district, you will know of the numerous small, rather seedy offices that line the upper storeys of the shops there. When I encountered Jiro Miyake that day, he was emerging from one such office, having come down a narrow staircase between two shop fronts.

I had met him twice prior to that day, but only at formal family meetings when he had turned out in his best clothes. Now he looked quite different, dressed in a tired-looking raincoat a little too large for him, clutching a briefcase under his arm. He had the appearance of a young man much accustomed to being bossed around; indeed, his whole posture seemed to be fixed on the verge of bowing. When I asked him if the office he had just left was his workplace, he began laughing nervously, as though I had caught him coming out of some disreputable house.

It did occur to me his awkwardness was perhaps too extreme to be accounted for merely by our chance meeting; but at the time I put it down to his embarrassment at the shabby appearance of his office building and its surroundings. It was only a week or so afterwards, when learning with surprise that the Miyakes had pulled out, that I found myself casting my mind back to that encounter, searching it for significance.

‘I wonder,’ I said to Setsuko, for she was down on one of her visits at the time, ‘if all the while I was talking with him, they’d already decided on a withdrawal.’

‘That would certainly account for the nervousness Father observed,’ Setsuko had said. ‘Did he not say anything to hint at their intentions?’

But even then, only a week after the actual encounter, I could hardly recall the conversation I had had with young Miyake. That afternoon, of course, I was still going on the assumption that his engagement to Noriko would be announced any day, and that I was dealing with a future member of my family. My attentions, then, were focused on getting young Miyake to relax in my presence, and I did not give as much thought as I might to what was actually said during our short walk to the tram stop and the few minutes we spent standing there together.

Nevertheless, as I pondered over the whole business during the days which followed, a new idea struck me: that perhaps the encounter itself had helped bring about the withdrawal.

‘It’s just possible,’ I put it to Setsuko. ‘Miyake was very self-conscious about my having seen his workplace. Possibly it struck him afresh that there was too much of a gulf between our families. After all, it’s a point they’ve made too often for it to be just formality.’

But Setsuko, it would seem, was unconvinced by that theory. And it seems she must have gone home to her husband to speculate over the failure of her sister’s proposal. For this year, she appears to have returned with her own theories – or at least, those of Suichi. So then I am obliged to think back yet again to that encounter with Miyake, to turn it over from yet another perspective. But as I have said, I could barely recall what had taken place just one week afterwards, and now more than a year has passed.

But then one particular exchange has come back to me which I gave little significance to before. Miyake and I had reached the main street and were standing in front of the Kimura Company Building awaiting our respective trams. And I remember Miyake saying:

‘We had some sad news at work today. The President of our parent company is now deceased.’

‘I’m very sorry to hear that. Was he advanced in years?’

‘He was only in his early sixties. I never had the chance to see him in the flesh, though of course I saw photographs of him in our periodicals. He was a great man, and we all feel as though we’ve been orphaned.’

‘It must be a blow to you all.’

‘Indeed it is,’ Miyake said, and paused for a moment. Then he continued: ‘However, we at our office are at something of a loss as to the most appropriate way of showing our respect. You see, to be quite frank, the President committed suicide.’

‘Really?’

‘Indeed. He was found gassed. But it seems he tried hara-kiri first, for there were minor scratches around his stomach.’ Miyake looked down at the ground solemnly. ‘It was his apology on behalf of the companies under his charge.’

‘His apology?’

‘Our President clearly felt responsible for certain undertakings we were involved in during the war. Two senior men were already dismissed by the Americans, but our President obviously felt it was not enough. His act was an apology on behalf of us all to the families of those killed in the war. '

'Why, really,' I said, 'that seems rather extreme. The world seems to have gone mad. Every day there seems to be a report of someone else killing himself in apology. Tell me, Mr Miyake, don't you find it all a great waste? After all, if your country is at war, you do all you can in support, there's no shame in that. What need is there to apologize by death? '

'No doubt you're right, sir. But to be frank, there's much relief around the company. We feel now we can forget our past transgressions and look to the future. It was a great thing our President did. '

'But a great waste, too. Some of our best men are giving up their lives in this way. '

'Indeed, sir, it is a pity. Sometimes I think there are many who should be giving their lives in apology who are too cowardly to face up to their responsibilities. It is then left to the likes of our President to carry out the noble gestures. There are plenty of men already back in positions they held during the war. Some of them are no better than war criminals. They should be the ones apologizing. '

'I see your point,' I said. 'But those who fought and worked loyally for our country during the war cannot be called war criminals. I fear that's an expression used too freely these days. '

'But these are the men who led the country astray, sir. Surely, it's only right they should acknowledge their responsibility. It's a cowardice that these men refuse to admit to their mistakes. And when those mistakes were made on behalf of the whole country, why then it must be the greatest cowardice of all. '

Did Miyake really say all this to me that afternoon? Perhaps I am getting his words confused with the sort of thing Suichi will come out and say. This is quite possible; I had after all come to regard Miyake as my prospective son-in-law, and I may indeed have somehow associated him with my actual son-in-law. Certainly, phrases like 'the greatest cowardice of all' sound much more like Suichi than the mild-mannered young Miyake. I am certain enough, though, that some such conversation did take place at the tram stop that day, and I suppose it is somewhat curious he should have brought up such a topic as he did. But as for the phrase 'the greatest cowardice of all', I am sure that is Suichi's. In fact, now I think of it, I am sure Suichi used it that evening after the ceremony for the burying of Kenji's ashes.

It had taken more than a year for my son's ashes to arrive from Manchuria. The communists, we were constantly told, had made everything difficult there. Then when his ashes finally came, along with those of the twenty-three other young men who had died attempting that hopeless charge across the minefield, there were no assurances the ashes were in fact Kenji's and Kenji's alone. 'But if my brother's ashes are mingled,' Setsuko had written to me at the time, 'they would only be mingled with those of his comrades. We cannot complain about that.' And so we accepted the ashes as Kenji's and carried out the belated ceremony for him two years ago last month.

It was in the midst of the ceremony at the cemetery that I saw Suichi striding away angrily. When I asked Setsuko what the matter was with her husband, she whispered quickly: 'Please forgive him, he isn't well. A touch of malnutrition, he hasn't shaken it off for months.'

But later, as the guests from the ceremony were gathering in my house, Setsuko said to me: 'Please understand, Father. Such ceremonies upset Suichi deeply.'

‘How touching,’ I said. ‘I had no idea he was so close to your brother.’

‘They got on well whenever they met,’ Setsuko said. ‘Besides, Suichi identifies very much with the likes of Kenji. He says it could so easily have been him.’

‘But isn’t that all the more reason not to desert the ceremony?’

‘I’m sorry, Father, Suichi never intended to appear disrespectful. But we have attended so many such ceremonies this past year, for Suichi’s friends and comrades, and they always make him so angry.’

‘Angry? What is it he’s angry about?’

But more guests were arriving at that point and I was obliged to break off our conversation. It was not until later that evening I got a chance to talk to Suichi himself. Many of the guests were still with us, gathered in the reception room. I spotted my son-in-law’s tall figure across the room, standing alone; he had parted the screens which opened on to the garden, and with his back turned to the hum of conversation, was gazing out into the darkness. I went up to him and said:

‘Setsuko tells me, Suichi, these ceremonies make you angry.’

He turned and smiled. ‘I suppose they do. I get angry thinking about things. About the waste.’

‘Yes. It’s terrible to think of the waste. But Kenji, like many others, died very bravely.’

For a moment, my son-in-law gazed at me with a still, expressionless face; it is something he does from time to time which I have never quite got used to. The gaze, no doubt, is quite innocent, but perhaps because Suichi is a physically powerful man and his features rather fearsome, it is easy to read something threatening or accusing there.

‘There seems to be no end of courageous deaths,’ he said, eventually. ‘Half of my high school graduation year have died courageous deaths. They were all for stupid causes, though they were never to know that. Do you know, Father, what really makes me angry?’

‘What is that, Suichi?’

‘Those who sent the likes of Kenji out there to die these brave deaths, where are they today? They’re carrying on with their lives, much the same as ever. Many are more successful than before, behaving so well in front of the Americans, the very ones who led us to disaster. And yet it’s the likes of Kenji we have to mourn. This is what makes me angry. Brave young men die for stupid causes, and the real culprits are still with us. Afraid to show themselves for what they are, to admit their responsibility.’ And it was then, I am sure, as he turned back to the darkness outside, that he said: ‘To my mind, that’s the greatest cowardice of all.’

I had been drained by the ceremony, otherwise I might have challenged some of his assumptions. But I judged there would be other opportunities for such talk and moved the conversation to other matters. I recall standing there with him, looking out into the night, enquiring about his work and about Ichiro. At that point, I had hardly seen Suichi since his return from the war, and that was my first experience of the changed, somewhat bitter son-in-law I have now come to get used to. I was surprised that evening to find him talking in that way, with no trace of the rigid manners he had had before going to war; but I put it down to the emotional effect of the burial ceremony, and more generally, to the enormous impact of his war experience – which, so Setsuko had hinted, had been of a terrible nature.

But in fact the mood I found him in that evening proved to be typical of his general mood these days; the transformation from the polite, self-effacing young man who married Setsuko two years before the war is quite remarkable. Of course, it is tragic that so many of his generation died as they did, but why must he harbour such bitterness for his elders? There is a hardness, almost a maliciousness to Suichi's views now which I find worrying - even more so since they appear to be influencing Setsuko.

But such a transformation is by no means unique to my son-in-law. These days I see it all around me; something has changed in the character of the younger generation in a way I do not fully understand, and certain aspects of this change are undeniably disturbing. For instance, just the other night down at Mrs Kawakami's, I overheard a man sitting further along the counter saying:

'I hear they took that idiot to hospital. A few broken ribs and concussion.'

'You mean the Hirayama boy?' Mrs Kawakami asked, with a look of concern.

'Is that his name? The one's who's always wandering around shouting things out. Someone really ought to get him to stop. It seems he got beaten up again last night. It's a shame, taking on an idiot like that, whatever he's shouting out.'

At this point, I turned to the man and said: 'Excuse me, you say the Hirayama boy's been attacked? For what reason?'

'It seems he kept singing one of those old military songs and chanting regressive slogans.'

'But the Hirayama boy's always done that,' I pointed out. 'He's only able to sing two or three songs. It's what he was taught.'

The man shrugged. 'I agree, what's the sense in beating up an idiot like that? It's just callousness. But he was over by the Kayabashi bridge, and you know how sleazy things get there after dark. He'd been sitting up on the bridge post, singing and chanting for about an hour. They could hear him in the bar across the way, and it seems a few of them got tired of it. '

'What sense is there in that?' Mrs Kawakami said. 'The Hirayama boy means no harm. '

'Well, someone should teach him to sing new songs,' the man said, drinking from his glass. 'He'll only get beaten up again if he goes around singing those old ones. '

We still call him 'the Hirayama boy' though he must now be at least fifty. But then the name does not seem inappropriate, for he has the mental age of a child. As far back as I can remember, he has been looked after by the Catholic nuns at the mission, but presumably he was born into a family called Hirayama. In the old days, when our pleasure district was flourishing, the Hirayama boy could always be found sitting on the ground near the entrance to the Migi-Hidari or one of its neighbouring establishments. He was, as Mrs Kawakami had said, quite harmless, and indeed, in the years before and during the war he became a popular figure in the pleasure district with his war songs and mimicking of patriotic speeches.

Who had taught him his songs, I do not know. There were no more than two or three in his repertoire, and he knew only a verse of each. But he would deliver these in a voice of considerable carrying power, and between the singing, he would amuse spectators by standing there grinning at the sky, his hands on his hips, shouting: 'This village must provide its share of sacrifices for the Emperor! Some of you will lay down your lives! Some of you will return triumphant to a new dawn!' - or some such words. And people would say, 'The Hirayama boy may not have it all there, but he's got the right attitude. He's Japanese.' I often saw people stop to give him money, or else buy him something to eat, and on those occasions the idiot's face would light up into a smile. No doubt, the Hirayama boy became fixated on those patriotic songs because of the attention and popularity they earned him.

Nobody minded idiots in those days. What has come over people that they feel inclined to beat the man up? They may not like his songs and speeches, but in all likelihood they are the same people who once patted his head and encouraged him until those few snatches embedded themselves in his brain.

But as I say, there is a different mood in the country these days, and Suichi's attitudes are probably by no means exceptional. Perhaps I am being unfair if I credit young Miyake, too, with such bitterness, but then the way things are at present, if you examine anything anyone says to you, it seems you will find a thread of this same bitter feeling running through it. For all I know, Miyake did speak those words; perhaps all men of Miyake's and Suichi's generation have come to think and speak like that.

I believe I have already mentioned that yesterday I took a trip down to the south of the city, to the Arakawa district. Arakawa is the last stop on the city tramline going south, and many people express surprise that the line should extend so far down into the suburbs. Indeed, it is hard to think of Arakawa, with its cleanly swept residential streets, its rows of maple trees on the pavements, its dignified houses each set apart from the next, and its general air of being surrounded by countryside, as being part of the city. But to my mind, the authorities were correct to take the tramline as far as Arakawa; it can only be of benefit to city-dwellers that they have easy access to calmer, less crowded surroundings. We were not always so well served, and I can recall how the hemmed-in feeling one gets in a city, especially during the hot summer weeks, was significantly greater in the days before the present tramlines were laid down.

I believe it was 1931 when the present lines began to operate, superseding the inadequate lines which had so irritated passengers for the previous thirty years. If you were not living here then, it is perhaps hard to imagine the impact these new lines had on many aspects of life in the city. Whole districts seemed to change character overnight; parks that had always been busy with people became deserted; long-established businesses suffered severe losses.

There were, of course, those districts which found themselves unexpectedly benefited, and among these was that area on the other side of the Bridge of Hesitation soon to become our pleasure district. Prior to the new tramlines, you would have found there only a few dull back streets with rows of shingled-roof houses. No one at that time considered it a district in its own right and one could only locate it by saying 'east of Furukawa'. The new tram circuit, however, meant that passengers disembarking at the terminus in Furukawa could reach the city centre more quickly on foot than by making a second, highly circuitous tram journey, and the result was a sudden influx of people walking through that area. The handful of bars that were there already began, after years of mediocre trade, to flourish dramatically, while new ones opened one after the other.

The establishment that was to become the Migi-Hidari was known at that time simply as 'Yamagata's' - after its proprietor, an old veteran soldier - and was the longest-established bar in the district. It was a somewhat colourless place in those days, but I had used it regularly over the years since first coming to the city. As far as I recall, it was not until a few months after the arrival of the new tramlines that Yamagata saw what was happening around him, and began to formulate his ideas. With the area set to become a fully fledged drinking quarter, his own establishment - being the oldest, and situated as it was at the intersection of three streets - stood naturally to become a sort of patriarch among local establishments. In view of this, so he saw it, it was his responsibility to expand and re-open in grand style. The tradesman above him was ready to be bought out, and the necessary capital could be raised without difficulty. The main stumbling block, both as regards his own establishment and the district as a whole, was the attitude of the city authorities.

In this, Yamagata was undoubtedly correct. For this was 1933 or 1934 - an unlikely time, you may recall, to be contemplating the birth of a new pleasure district. The authorities had been applying arduous policies to keep the more frivolous side of the city's life in check, and indeed, in the city centre, many of the more decadent establishments were in the process of being closed down. At first, then, I did not listen to Yamagata's ideas with much sympathy. It was only when he told me just what sort of place he had in mind that I became sufficiently impressed and promised I would do what I could to help him.

I believe I have already mentioned the fact that I played a small part in the Migi-Hidari's coming into existence. Of course, not being a man of wealth, there was little I could do financially. But by that time my reputation in this city had grown to a certain extent; as I recall, I was not yet serving on the arts committee of the State Department, but I had many personal links there and was already being consulted frequently on matters of policy. So then, my petition to the authorities on Yamagata's behalf was not without weight.

'It is the owner's intention', I explained, 'that the proposed establishment be a celebration of the new patriotic spirit emerging in Japan today. The décor would reflect the new spirit, and any patron incompatible with that spirit would be firmly encouraged to leave. Furthermore, it is the owner's intention that the establishment be a place where this city's artists and writers whose works most reflect the new spirit can gather and drink together. With respect to this last point, I have myself secured the support of various of my colleagues, among them the painter, Masayuki Harada; the playwright, Misumi; the journalists, Shigeo Otsuji and Eiji Nastuki - all of them, as you will know, producers of work unflinchingly loyal to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor. '

I went on to point out how such an establishment, given its dominance in the neighbourhood, would be an ideal means by which to ensure that a desirable tone prevailed in the district.

'Otherwise,' I warned, 'I fear we are faced with the growth of another quarter characterized by the very sort of decadence we have been doing our best to combat and which we know so weakens the fibre of our culture. '

The authorities responded not simply with acquiescence, but with an enthusiasm that surprised me. It was, I suppose, another of those instances when one is struck by the realization that one is held in rather higher esteem than one supposed. But then I was never one to concern myself with matters of esteem, and this was not why the advent of the Migi-Hidari brought me so much personal satisfaction; rather, I was proud to see borne out something I had maintained for some time - namely that the new spirit of Japan was not incompatible with enjoying oneself; that is to say, there was no reason why pleasure-seeking had to go hand in hand with decadence.

So then, some two-and-a-half years after the coming of the new tramlines, the Migi-Hidari was opened. The renovations had been skilful and extensive, so that anyone strolling that way after dark could hardly fail to notice that brightly-lit front with its numerous lanterns, large and small, hung along the gables, under the eaves, in neat rows along the window ledges and above the main entryway; then, too, there was that enormous illuminated banner suspended from the ridgepole bearing the new name of the premises against a background of army boots marching in formation.

One evening, shortly after its opening, Yamagata took me inside, told me to choose my favourite table, and declared that thereafter it was reserved for my sole use. Primarily, I suppose, this was in recognition of the small service I had done him. But then, of course, I had always been one of Yamagata's best customers.

Indeed, I had been going into Yamagata's for over twenty years prior to its transformation into the Migi-Hidari. This was not really through any deliberate choice on my part - as I say, it was an undistinguished sort of place - but when I first came to this city as a young man, I was living in Furukawa and Yamagata's place happened to be at hand.

It is perhaps hard for you to picture how ugly Furukawa was in those days. Indeed, if you are new to the city, my talking of the Furukawa district probably conjures up the park that stands there today and the peach trees for which it is renowned. But when I first came to this city - in 1913 - the area was full of factories and warehouses belonging to the smaller companies, many of them abandoned or in disrepair. The houses were old and shabby and the only people who lived in Furukawa were those who could afford only the lowest rents.

Mine was a small attic room above an old woman living with her unmarried son, and was quite unsuitable for my needs. There being no electricity in the house, I was obliged to paint by oil-light; there was barely enough space to set up an easel, and I could not avoid splashing the walls and tatami with paint; I would often wake the old woman or her son while working through the night; and most vexing of all, the attic ceiling was too low to allow me to stand up fully, so I would often work for hours in a half-crouched position, hitting my head continually on the rafters. But then in those days I was so delighted at having been accepted by the Takeda firm, and to be earning my living as an artist, that I gave little thought to these unhappy conditions.

During the day, of course, I did not work in my room, but at Master Takeda's 'studio'. This, too, was in Furukawa, a long room above a restaurant - long enough, in fact, for all fifteen of us to set up easels all in a row. The ceiling, though higher than that in my attic room, sagged considerably at the centre, so that whenever we entered the room we always joked that it had descended a few more centimetres since the previous day. There were windows along the length of the room, and these should have given us a good light to work by; but somehow the shafts of sunlight that came in were always too sharp, giving the room something of the look of a ship's cabin. The other problem with the place was the fact that the restaurateur downstairs would not allow us to remain after six o'clock in the evening when his customers would begin to come in. 'You sound like a herd of cattle up there,' he would say. We would thus have no choice but to continue our work back at our respective lodgings.

I should perhaps explain that there was no chance of our completing our schedule without working in the evenings. The Takeda firm prided itself on its ability to provide a high number of paintings at very short notice; indeed, Master Takeda gave us to understand that if we failed to fulfil our deadline in time for the ship leaving harbour, we would quickly lose future commissions to rival firms. The result was that we would work the most arduous hours, late into the night, and still feel guilty the next day because we were behind schedule. Often, as the deadline date approached, it would not be unusual for us all to be living on just two or three hours of sleep each night, and painting around the clock. At times, if several commissions came in one after the next, we would be going from day to day dizzy with exhaustion. But for all that, I cannot recall our ever failing to complete a commission on time, and, I suppose, that gives some indication of the hold Master Takeda had over us.

After I had been with Master Takeda for a year or so, a new artist joined the firm. This was Yasunari Nakahara, a name which I doubt will mean much to you. In fact, there is no reason why you should have come across it, since he never achieved any kind of reputation. The most he did was eventually to gain a post as art teacher at a high school in the Yuyama district a few years before the war - a post, I am told, he still holds today, the authorities seeing no reason to replace him as they did so many of his fellow teachers. Myself, I always remember him as 'the Tortoise', the name given to him during those days at the Takeda firm, and one which I came to use affectionately throughout our friendship.

I have still in my possession a painting by the Tortoise - a self-portrait he painted not long after the Takeda days. It shows a thin young man with spectacles, sitting in his shirtsleeves in a cramped, shadowy room, surrounded by easels and rickety furniture, his face caught on one side by the light coming from the window. The earnestness and timidity written on the face are certainly true to the man I remember, and in this respect, the Tortoise has been remarkably honest; looking at the portrait, you would probably take him to be the sort you could confidently elbow aside for an empty tram seat. But then each of us, it seems, has his own special conceits. If the Tortoise's modesty forbade him to disguise his timid nature, it did not prevent him attributing to himself a kind of lofty intellectual air - which I for one have no recollection of. But then to be fair, I cannot recall any colleague who could paint a self-portrait with absolute honesty; however accurately one may fill in the surface details of one's mirror reflection, the personality represented rarely comes near the truth as others would see it.

The Tortoise earned his nickname because, joining the firm in the midst of a particularly busy commission, he proceeded to produce only two or three canvasses in the time it took the rest of us to complete six or seven. At first, his slowness was put down to inexperience and the nickname was used only behind his back. But as the weeks went by and his rate had not improved, the bitterness against him grew. It soon became commonplace for people to call him 'Tortoise' to his face, and although he fully realized the name was anything but affectionate, I remember him trying his best to take it as though it were. For instance, if someone called across the long room: 'Hey, Tortoise, are you still painting that petal you began last week?' he would make an effort to laugh as though to share in the joke. I recall my colleagues often attributing this apparent inability to defend his dignity to the fact that the Tortoise was from the Negishi district; for in those days, as today, there prevailed the rather unfair myth that those from that part of the city invariably grew up weak and spineless.

I remember one morning, when Master Takeda had left the long room for a moment, two of my colleagues going up to the Tortoise's easel and challenging him about his lack of speed. My easel stood not far from his, so I could see clearly the nervous expression on his face as he replied:

'I beg you to be patient with me. It is my greatest wish to learn from you, my superior colleagues, how to produce work of such quality so quickly. I have done my utmost in these past weeks to paint faster, but sadly I was forced to abandon several pictures, because the loss of quality on account of my hurrying was such that I would have disgraced the high standards of our firm. But I will do all I can to improve my poor standing in your eyes. I beg you to forgive me and to be patient a while longer.'

The Tortoise repeated this plea two or three times over, while his tormentors persisted with their abuse, accusing him of laziness and of relying on the rest of us to do his share of the work. By this time, most of us had ceased to paint and had gathered round. I believe it was after his accusers had begun to abuse the Tortoise in particularly harsh terms, and when I saw that the rest of my colleagues would do nothing but watch with a kind of fascination, that I stepped forward and said:

‘That’s enough, can’t you see you’re talking to someone with artistic integrity? If an artist refuses to sacrifice quality for the sake of speed, then that’s something we should all respect. You’ve become fools if you can’t see that.’

Of course, this is all a matter of many years ago now and I cannot vouch that those were my exact words that morning. But I spoke in some such way on the Tortoise’s behalf, of that I am quite certain; for I can distinctly recall the gratitude and relief on the Tortoise’s face as he turned to me, and the astonished stares of all the others present. I myself commanded considerable respect amongst my colleagues – my own output being unchallengeable in terms either of quality or quantity – and I believe my intervention put an end to the Tortoise’s ordeal at least for the rest of that morning.

You may perhaps think I am taking too much credit in relating this small episode; after all, the point I was making in the Tortoise’s defence seems a very obvious one – one you may think would occur instantly to anyone with any respect for serious art. But it is necessary to remember the climate of those days at Master Takeda’s – the feeling amongst us that we were all battling together against time to preserve the hard-earned reputation of the firm. We were also quite aware that the essential point about the sort of things we were commissioned to paint – geishas, cherry trees, swimming carps, temples – was that they look ‘Japanese’ to the foreigners to whom they were shipped out, and all finer points of style were quite likely to go unnoticed. So I do not think I am claiming undue credit for my younger self if I suggest my actions that day were a manifestation of a quality I came to be much respected for in later years – the ability to think and judge for myself, even if it meant going against the sway of those around me. The fact remains, certainly, that I was the only one to come to the Tortoise's defence that morning.

Although the Tortoise managed to thank me for that small intervention, and for subsequent acts of support, the pace of those days was such that it was some time before I was able to talk to him at length in any intimacy. Indeed, I believe almost two months had elapsed since the incident I have just related, when there came at last something of a lull in our frantic schedule. I was strolling around the grounds of Tamagawa temple, as I often did when I found some spare time, and spotted the Tortoise sitting on a bench in the sunshine, apparently asleep.

I remain an enthusiast of the Tamagawa grounds, and would agree that the hedges and rows of trees to be found there today may indeed help provide an atmosphere more in keeping with a place of worship. But whenever I go there now, I find myself becoming nostalgic for the Tamagawa grounds as they used to be. In those days, before the hedges and trees, the grounds seemed far more extensive and full of life; scattered all over the open expanse of green, you would see stalls selling candy and balloons, sideshows with jugglers or conjurers; the Tamagawa grounds were also the place to go, I remember, if you wanted a photograph made, for you could not stroll far without coming across a photographer camped in his stall with his tripod and dark cloak. The afternoon I found the Tortoise there was on a Sunday at the start of spring, and everywhere was busy with parents and children. He woke with a start as I walked over and sat next to him.

‘Why, Ono-san!’ he exclaimed, his face lighting up. ‘What good fortune to see you today. Why, just a moment ago, I was saying to myself, if only I had a little spare money, I would buy something for Ono-san, some token of gratitude for his kindness to me. But for the moment I can only afford something cheap and that would be an insult. So in the meantime, Ono-san, let me just thank you from my heart for all you've done for me.'

'I've not done very much,' I said. 'I just spoke my mind a few times, that's all.'

'But truly, Ono-san, men like you are all too rare. It is an honour to be a colleague of such a man. However much our paths may part in years to come, I'll always remember your kindness.'

I recall having to listen for several more moments to his praise of my courage and integrity. Then I said: 'I'd been meaning to talk to you for some time. You see, I've been thinking things over and I'm considering leaving Master Takeda in the near future.'

The Tortoise stared at me with astonishment. Then, comically, he looked about him as though in fear I had been overheard.

'I've been very fortunate,' I went on. 'My work has caught the interest of the painter and printmaker, Seiji Moriyama. You've heard of him, no doubt?'

The Tortoise, still staring at me, shook his head.

'Mr Moriyama,' I said, 'is a true artist. In all likelihood, a great one. I've been exceptionally fortunate to receive his attention and advice. 'Indeed, it's his opinion that my remaining with Master Takeda will do irreparable harm to my gifts, and he has invited me to become his pupil.'

'Is that so?' my companion remarked warily.

'And you know, as I was strolling through the park just now, I was thinking to myself: "Of course, Mr Moriyama is absolutely correct. It's all very well for the rest of those workhorses to toil under Master Takeda to earn their living. But those of us with serious ambitions must look elsewhere." '

At this point, I gave the Tortoise a meaningful glance. He continued to stare at me, a puzzled look entering his expression.

‘I’m afraid I took the liberty of mentioning you to Mr Moriyama,’ I told him. ‘In fact, I expressed the opinion that you were the exception amongst my present colleagues. You alone among them had real talent and serious aspirations.’

‘Really, Ono-san,’ - he burst into laughter - ‘how can you say such a thing? I know you mean to be kind to me, but this is going too far.’

‘I’ve made up my mind to accept Mr Moriyama’s kind offer,’ I continued. ‘And I urge you to let me show your work to him. With luck, you too may be invited to become his pupil.’

The Tortoise looked at me with distress on his face.

‘But Ono-san, what are you saying?’ he said in a lowered voice. ‘Master Takeda took me on through the recommendation of a most respected acquaintance of my father. And really, he has shown me great tolerance, despite all my problems. How can I be so disloyal as to leave after only a few months?’ Then suddenly, the Tortoise seemed to see the import of his words, and added hurriedly: ‘But of course, Ono-san, I don’t imply you are in any way disloyal. Circumstances are different in your case. I wouldn’t presume ...’ He faded off into embarrassed giggling. Then with an effort, he pulled himself together to ask: ‘Are you serious about leaving Master Takeda, Ono-san?’

‘In my opinion,’ I said, ‘Master Takeda doesn’t deserve the loyalty of the likes of you and me. Loyalty has to be earned. There’s too much made of loyalty. All too often men talk of loyalty and follow blindly. I for one have no wish to lead my life like that.’

These, of course, may not have been the precise words I used that afternoon at the Tamagawa temple; for I have had cause to recount this particular scene many times before, and it is inevitable that with repeated telling, such accounts begin to take on a life of their own. But even if I did not express myself to the Tortoise quite so succinctly that day, I think it can be assumed those words I have just attributed to myself do represent accurately enough my attitude and resolve at that point in my life.

One place, incidentally, where I was obliged to tell and retell stories of those days at the Takeda firm was around that table in the Migi-Hidari; my pupils seemed to share a fascination for hearing about this early part of my career - perhaps because they were naturally interested to learn what their teacher was doing at their age. In any case, the topic of my days with Master Takeda would come up frequently during the course of those evenings.

‘It wasn’t such a bad experience,’ I remember telling them once. ‘It taught me some important things.’

‘Forgive me, Sensei,’ - I believe it was Kuroda who leaned across the table to say this - ‘but I find it hard to believe a place like the one you describe could teach an artist anything useful whatsoever.’

‘Yes, Sensei,’ said another voice, ‘do tell us what a place like that could have possibly taught you. It sounds more like a firm producing cardboard boxes.’

This was the way things would go at the Migi-Hidari. I could be having a conversation with someone, the rest of them talking amongst themselves, and as soon as an interesting question had been asked of me, they would all break off their own conversations and I would have a circle of faces awaiting my reply. It was as though they never talked amongst themselves without having an ear open for another piece of knowledge I might impart. This is not to say that they were uncritical; quite the contrary, they were a brilliant set of young men and one would never dare say anything without first having thought about it.

‘Being at Takeda’s’, I told them, ‘taught me an important lesson early in my life. That while it was right to look up to teachers, it was always important to question their authority. The Takeda experience taught me never to follow the crowd blindly, but to consider carefully the direction in which I was being pushed. And if there’s one thing I’ve tried to encourage you all to do, it’s been to rise above the sway of things. To rise above the undesirable and decadent influences that have swamped us and have done so much to weaken the fibre of our nation these past ten, fifteen years.’ No doubt I was a little drunk and sounded rather grandiose, but that was the way those sessions around that corner table went.

‘Indeed, Sensei,’ someone said, ‘we must all remember that. We must all endeavour to rise above the sway of things.’

‘And I think we here around this table,’ I went on, ‘have a right to be proud of ourselves. The grotesque and the frivolous have been prevalent all around us. But now at last a finer, more manly spirit is emerging in Japan and you here are part of it. In fact, it’s my wish that you should go on to become recognized as nothing less than the spearhead of the new spirit. Indeed’ – and by this point, I would be addressing not just those around the table, but all those listening nearby – ‘this establishment of ours where we all gather is a testimony to the new emerging spirit and all of us here have a right to be proud.’

Frequently, as the drinking got merrier, outsiders would come crowding round our table to join in our arguments and speeches, or simply to listen and soak in the atmosphere. On the whole, my pupils were ready enough to give strangers a hearing, though of course, if we were imposed on by a bore, or by someone with disagreeable views, they would be quick to squeeze him out. But for all the shouting and speechmaking that went on into the night, real quarrels were rare at the Migi-Hidari, all of us who frequented that place being united by the same essential spirit; that is to say, the establishment proved to be everything Yamagata had wished; it represented something fine and one could get drunk there with pride and dignity.

I have somewhere in this house a painting by Kuroda, that most gifted of my pupils, depicting one such evening at the Migi-Hidari. It is entitled: 'The Patriotic Spirit', a title that may lead you to expect a work depicting soldiers on the march or some such thing. Of course, it was Kuroda's very point that a patriotic spirit began somewhere further back, in the routine of our daily lives, in such things as where we drank and who we mixed with. It was his tribute - for he believed in such things then - to the spirit of the Migi-Hidari. The picture, painted in oils, shows several tables and takes in much of the colour and décor of the place - most noticeably, the patriotic banners and slogans suspended from the rails of the upper balcony. Beneath the banners, guests are gathered around tables in conversation, while in the foreground a waitress in a kimono hurries with a tray of drinks. It is a fine painting, capturing very accurately the boisterous, yet somehow proud and respectable atmosphere of the Migi-Hidari. And whenever I happen to look at it today, it still brings me a certain satisfaction to recall that I - with whatever influence my reputation had gained in this city - was able to do my small part in bringing such a place into being.

Quite often these days, in the evenings down at Mrs Kawakami's, I find myself reminiscing about the Migi-Hidari and the old days. For there is something about Mrs Kawakami's place when Shintaro and I are the only customers there, something about sitting together up at the bar under those low-hung lights, that puts us in a nostalgic mood. We may start discussing someone from the past, about how much he could drink perhaps, or some funny mannerism he had. Then before long we will be trying to get Mrs Kawakami to recall the man, and in our attempts to jog her memory, we will find ourselves remembering more and more amusing things about him. The other night, after we had been laughing over just such a set of reminiscences, Mrs Kawakami said, as she often will do on these occasions: 'Well, I don't recall the name, but I'm sure I'd recognize his face.'

'Well in truth, Obasan,' I said, remembering, 'he was never a real customer here. He used to always drink across the street.'

'Oh yes, at the big place. Still, if I saw him, I may recognize him. But then again, who knows? People change so much. Every now and then, I see someone in the street, and I think I know them and I should greet them. But then I look at them again and I'm not so sure.'

'Why, Obasan,' Shintaro put in, 'just the other day, I greeted someone in the street, thinking it was someone I knew. But the man obviously thought I was a madman. He walked away without replying!'

Shintaro seemed to regard this as an amusing story and laughed loudly. Mrs Kawakami smiled, but did not join in his laughter. Then she turned to me and said:

'Sensei, you must try and persuade your friends to start coming back to these parts. In fact, perhaps each time we see an old face from those days, we should be stopping him and telling him to come here to this little place. That way we could start rebuilding the old days.'

'Now that's a splendid idea, Obasan,' I said. 'I'll try and remember to do that. I'll stop people in the street and say: "I remember you from the old days. You used to be a regular around our district. Well, you may think it's all gone, but you're wrong. Mrs Kawakami's is still there, the same as ever, and things are slowly building back up again. ” ’

‘That’s it, Sensei,’ Mrs Kawakami said. ‘You tell them they’ll be missing out. Business will start to improve then. After all, it’s Sensei’s duty to bring back the old crowd. Everyone always looked up to Sensei as the natural leader around here.’

‘A good point, Obasan,’ Shintaro said. ‘In olden times, if a lord had his troops scattered after a battle, he’d soon go about gathering them together again. Sensei is in a similar position.’

‘What nonsense,’ I said, laughing.

‘That’s right, Sensei,’ Mrs Kawakami went on, ‘you find all the old people again and tell them to come back. Then after a while, I’ll buy the place next door and we’ll open up a grand old place. Just like that big place used to be.’

‘Indeed, Sensei,’ Shintaro was still saying. ‘A lord must gather his men again.’

‘An interesting idea, Obasan,’ I said, nodding. ‘And you know, the Migi-Hidari was just a small place once. No bigger than this place here. But then in time we managed to turn it into what it was. Well, perhaps we’ll just have to do the same thing again with this place of yours. Now things are settling a little, the custom ought to be coming back.’

‘You could bring in all your artist friends again, Sensei,’ Mrs Kawakami said. ‘Then before long, all the newspaper men will follow.’

‘An interesting idea. We could probably pull it off. Except I wonder, Obasan. You may not be able to handle such a big place. We wouldn’t want you getting out of your depth.’

‘Nonsense,’ Mrs Kawakami said, putting on an offended look. ‘If Sensei will hurry up and do his part, you’ll see how well things will be managed around here. '

Recently we have had such conversations over and over. And who is to say the old district will not return again? The likes of Mrs Kawakami and I, we may tend to make a joke about it, but behind our bantering there is a thread of serious optimism. 'A lord must gather his men.' And so perhaps he should. Perhaps, when Noriko's future is once and for all settled, I will give some serious consideration to Mrs Kawakami's schemes.

I suppose I might mention here that I have seen my former protégé, Kuroda, just once since the end of the war. It was quite by chance on a rainy morning during the first year of the occupation - before the Migi-Hidari and all those other buildings had been demolished. I was walking somewhere, making my way through what was left of our old pleasure district, looking from under my umbrella at those skeletal remains. I remember there were workmen wandering around that day, and so at first I paid no attention to the figure standing looking at one of the burnt-out buildings. It was only as I walked by that I became aware the figure had turned and was watching me. I paused, then looked around, and through the rain dripping off my umbrella, saw with a strange shock Kuroda looking expressionlessly towards me.

Beneath his umbrella, he was hatless and dressed in a dark raincoat. The charred buildings behind him were dripping and the remnant of some gutter was making a large amount of rainwater splash down not far from him. I remember a truck going by between us, full of building workers. And I noticed how one of the spokes of his umbrella was broken, causing some more splashing just beside his foot.

Kuroda's face, which had been quite round before the war, had hollowed out around the cheekbones, and what looked like heavy lines had appeared towards the chin and the throat. And I thought to myself as I stood there: 'He's not young any more.'

He moved his head very slightly. I was not sure if it was the beginning of a bow, or if he was just adjusting his head to get out of the splash of rainwater from his broken umbrella. Then he turned and began to walk off in the other direction.

But it was not my intention to dwell on Kuroda here. Indeed, he would not be on my mind at all had his name not turned up so unexpectedly last month, during the chance meeting on the tram with Dr Saito.

It was the afternoon I eventually took Ichiro to see his monster film - a trip he had been denied the previous day by Noriko's stubbornness. In fact, my grandson and I went by ourselves, Noriko refusing to come and Setsuko again volunteering to remain at home. It was, of course, simple childishness on Noriko's part, but Ichiro had his own interpretation of the women's behaviour. As we sat down to lunch that day, he continued to say:

'Aunt Noriko and Mother aren't coming. It's much too scaring for women. They'd be much too scared, isn't that right, Oji?'

'Yes, I expect that's right, Ichiro.'

'They'd be much too scared. Aunt Noriko, you'd be far too scared to see the film, wouldn't you?'

'Oh yes,' Noriko said, pulling a frightened face.

'Even Oji's scared. Look, you can see even Oji's scared. And he's a man.'

That afternoon, as I was standing at the end of the entryway waiting to leave for the cinema, I witnessed a curious scene between Ichiro and his mother. While Setsuko was strapping up his sandals, I could see my grandson continually trying to say something to her. But whenever Setsuko said: 'What is it, Ichiro, I can't hear,' he would glare angrily, then cast a quick glance towards me to see if I had heard. Finally, once the sandals had been put on, Setsuko bent down so that Ichiro could whisper into her ear. She then nodded and disappeared into the house, returning a moment later with a raincoat, which she folded and handed to him.

'It's unlikely to rain,' I remarked, looking out beyond the front entrance. Indeed, it was a fine day outside.

'All the same,' Setsuko said, 'Ichiro would like to take it with him.'

I was puzzled by this insistence on the raincoat. Then once we were out in the sunshine, and making our way down the hill towards the tram stop, I noticed the swagger with which Ichiro walked - as though the coat slung through his arm had transformed him into someone like Humphrey Bogart - and concluded it was all in imitation of some comic-book hero of his.

I suppose we were almost at the bottom of the hill when Ichiro declared loudly: 'Oji, you used to be a famous artist.'

'I expect that's right, Ichiro.'

'I told Aunt Noriko to show me Oji's pictures. But she won't show me.'

'Hmm. They're all tidied away just for the moment.'

'Aunt Noriko's disobedient, isn't she, Oji? I told her to show me Oji's pictures. Why won't she show me?'

I laughed and said: 'I don't know, Ichiro. Perhaps she was busy with something.'

'She's disobedient.'

I gave another laugh, saying: 'I suppose so, Ichiro.'

The tram stop is ten minutes' walk from our house; down the hill to the river, then a little way along the new concrete embankment, and the northbound circuit joins the road just beyond the site of the new housing schemes. That sunny afternoon last month, my grandson and I boarded there for the city centre, and it was on that journey we encountered Dr Saito.

I realize I have said very little so far about the Saito family, the eldest son of which is presently involved in marriage talks with Noriko. The Saitos are, all in all, a very different sort of prospect from the Miyakes of last year. The Miyakes were, of course, decent enough people, but they could not, in all fairness, be called a family of any prestige, whereas the Saito family, without exaggeration, is just that. In fact, although Dr Saito and I were not properly acquainted before, I had always known of his activities in the world of the arts, and for years, whenever we had passed in the street, we had exchanged greetings politely to acknowledge our familiarity with each other's reputations. But of course, on the occasion on which we met last month, things had become very different.

The tram does not become crowded until it has crossed the river at the steel bridge opposite Tanibashi Station, and so, when Dr Saito boarded one stop after us, he was able to take a vacant seat beside me. Inevitably, our conversation began a little uncomfortably; for the negotiations were at an early, delicate stage, and it did not seem proper to discuss them openly; but then it would have been absurd to pretend they were not going on. In the end, we both praised the merits of 'our mutual friend, Mr Kyo' - the go-between in the proposal - and Dr Saito remarked with a smile: 'Let us hope his efforts bring us together again shortly.' And that was as close as we came to discussing the matter. I could not help noticing the marked contrast between the assured way Dr Saito had responded to the slightly awkward situation, and the nervous, clumsy way the Miyake family had handled things from start to finish last year. Whatever the eventual outcome, one does feel reassured to be dealing with the likes of the Saito family.

Otherwise, we talked mainly of small things. Dr Saito has a warm, genial manner, and when he leaned forward to ask Ichiro how he was enjoying his visit, and about the movie we were about to see, my grandson showed no inhibitions about conversing with him.

‘A fine boy,’ Dr Saito said to me, approvingly.

It was shortly before his stop - he had already put his hat back on - that Dr Saito remarked: ‘We have another mutual acquaintance. A certain Mr Kuroda.’

I looked at him, a little startled. ‘Mr Kuroda,’ I repeated. ‘Ah, no doubt that would be the same gentleman I once supervised.’

‘That’s right. I came across him recently and he happened to mention your name.’

‘Is that so? I haven’t come across him for some time. Not since before the war, certainly. How is Mr Kuroda these days? What is he up to?’

‘I believe he is about to take up an appointment at the new Uemachi College, where he will teach art. This was how I came across him. I was kindly asked by the college to advise on the appointments board.’

‘Ah, so you don’t know Mr Kuroda well.’

‘Indeed not. But I hope to see more of him in future.’

‘Is that so?’ I said. ‘So Mr Kuroda still remembers me. How good of him.’

‘Yes, indeed. He mentioned your name when we happened to be discussing something. I’ve not had the opportunity to talk to him at any length. But should I see him again, I’ll mention that I saw you.’

‘Ah, indeed.’

The tram was crossing the steel bridge and the wheels made a loud clanging noise. Ichiro, who had been kneeling on his seat to see out of the window, pointed out something down in the water. Dr Saito turned to look, exchanged a few more words with Ichiro, then got to his feet as his stop approached. He made a last allusion to ‘the efforts of Mr Kyo’ before bowing and making his way to the exit.

As usual, many people crowded on at the stop after the bridge, and the rest of our journey was rather uncomfortable. When we got off just in front of the cinema, I could see the poster prominently displayed at the entrance. My grandson had achieved a close likeness in his sketch of two days earlier, though there was no fire in the picture; what Ichiro had remembered were the impact lines - resembling streaks of lightning - which the artist had painted in to emphasize the ferocity of the giant lizard.

Ichiro went up to the poster and burst into loud laughter.

‘It’s easy to see that’s a made-up monster,’ he said, pointing. ‘Anyone can see that. It’s just made up.’ And he laughed again.

‘Ichiro, please don’t laugh so loudly. Everyone’s looking at you.’

‘But I can’t help it. The monster looks so made up. Who’d be scared of a thing like that?’

It was only once we were seated inside, and the film had begun, that I discovered the true purpose of his raincoat. Ten minutes into the film, we heard ominous music and on the screen appeared a dark cave with mist swirling about it. Ichiro whispered: ‘This is boring. Will you tell me when something interesting starts to happen?’ And with that, he threw the raincoat over his head. A moment later, there was a roar and the giant lizard emerged from the cave. Ichiro’s hand was clutching at my arm, and when I glanced at him his other hand was holding the raincoat in place as tightly as possible.

The coat continued to cover his head for more or less the whole duration of the film. Occasionally, my arm would be shaken and a voice would ask from underneath: 'Is it getting interesting yet?' I would then be obliged to describe in whispers what was on the screen until a small gap appeared in the raincoat. But within minutes - at the slightest hint that the monster would reappear - the gap would close and his voice would say: 'This is boring. Don't forget to tell me when it gets interesting.'

When we got home, though, Ichiro was full of enthusiasm for the film. 'The best movie I've ever seen,' he continued to say, and he was still giving us his version of it when we sat down to supper.

'Aunt Noriko, shall I tell you what happened next? It gets very scary. Shall I tell you?'

'I'm getting so frightened, Ichiro, I can hardly eat,' Noriko said.

'I'm warning you, it gets even more frightening. Shall I tell you more?'

'Oh, I'm not sure, Ichiro. You've got me so frightened already.'

It had not been my intention to make heavy talk at the supper table by bringing up Dr Saito, but then it would have been unnatural not to mention our meeting when recounting the day's events. So, when Ichiro paused a moment, I said: 'Incidentally, we met Dr Saito on the tram. He was travelling up to see someone.'

When I said this, my two daughters both stopped eating and looked at me with surprise.

‘But we didn’t talk about anything significant,’ I said, with a small laugh. ‘Really. We just exchanged pleasantries, that’s all.’

My daughters seemed unconvinced, but they began to eat again. Noriko glanced over to her elder sister, then Setsuko said: ‘Dr Saito was well?’

‘He appeared to be.’

We ate on quietly for a while. Perhaps Ichiro began to talk about the movie again. In any case, it was a little later in the meal that I said:

‘An odd thing. It turns out Dr Saito met a former pupil of mine. Kuroda, in fact. It seems Kuroda’s taking up a post at the new college.’

I looked up from my bowl and saw my daughters had again stopped eating. It was clear they had just exchanged glances, and it was one of those instances last month when I got a distinct impression they had at some point been discussing certain things about me.

That night, my two daughters and I were sitting around the table again, reading our newspapers and magazines, when we were disturbed by a dull thudding noise coming rhythmically from somewhere within the house. Noriko looked up in alarm, but Setsuko said:

‘It’s just Ichiro. He does that when he can’t fall asleep.’

‘Poor Ichiro,’ Noriko said. ‘I expect he keeps dreaming of the monster. It was so wicked of Father to take him to see a film like that.’

‘Nonsense,’ I said. ‘He enjoyed it.’

‘I think Father just wanted to see it himself,’ Noriko said to her sister with a grin. ‘Poor Ichiro. Being dragged along to a nasty film like that.’

Setsuko turned towards me with an embarrassed look. 'It was so kind of Father to take Ichiro,' she murmured.

'But now he can't sleep,' Noriko said. 'Ridiculous to take him to a film like that. No, you stay, Setsuko. I'll go.'

Setsuko watched her sister leave the room, then said:

'Noriko is so good with children. Ichiro will miss her when we go home.'

'Yes, indeed.'

'She was always good with children. Do you remember, Father, how she used to play those games with the Kinoshitas' little children?'

'Yes, indeed,' I said, with a laugh. Then I added: 'The Kinoshita boys are far too big these days to want to come around here.'

'She's always been so good with children,' Setsuko repeated. 'How sad to see her reach this age and still unmarried.'

'Indeed. The war came at a bad time for her.'

For a few moments we continued with our reading. Then Setsuko said:

'It was fortuitous to have met Dr Saito on the tram this afternoon. He sounds an admirable gentleman.'

'He is indeed. And from all accounts, the son is well worthy of his father.'

'Is that so?' Setsuko said, thoughtfully.

We returned to our reading for a few more moments. Then my daughter again broke the silence.

'And Dr Saito is acquainted with Mr Kuroda?'

‘Only slightly,’ I said, not looking up from my paper.
‘It seems they met somewhere.’

‘I wonder how Mr Kuroda is these days. I can remember how he used to come here, and you would talk together for hours in the reception room.’

‘I’ve no idea about Kuroda these days.’

‘Forgive me, but I wonder if it may not be wise if Father were to visit Mr Kuroda soon.’

‘Visit him?’

‘Mr Kuroda. And perhaps certain other such acquaintances from the past.’

‘I’m not sure I follow what you’re saying, Setsuko.’

‘Forgive me, I simply meant to suggest that Father may wish to speak to certain acquaintances from his past. That is to say, before the Saitos’ detective does. After all, we do not wish any unnecessary misunderstandings to arise.’

‘No, I suppose we don’t,’ I said, returning to my paper.

I believe we did not discuss the matter further after that. Neither did Setsuko raise it again for the remainder of her stay last month.

Yesterday, as I took the tram down to Arakawa, the carriage was filled with bright autumn sunshine. I had not made the journey to Arakawa for a little while – in fact, not since the end of the war – and as I gazed out of my window, I noticed many changes in what had once been familiar scenery. Passing through Tozaka-cho and Sakaemachi, I could see brick apartment blocks looming above the small wooden houses I remembered from before. Then, as we passed the backs of the factories in Minamimachi, I saw how abandoned many of them had become; one factory yard went by after another, untidily stacked with broken timber, old sheets of corrugated metal, and often what looked to be plain rubble.

But then, after the tramline crosses the river at the THK Corporation Bridge, the atmosphere changes dramatically. You are travelling amidst fields and trees, and before long, the suburb of Arakawa will become visible at the bottom of the long steep hill where the tramline ends. The tram will move very slowly down the hill, then brake to a halt, and as you step out on to those cleanly swept pavements, you will be overcome by the distinct feeling you have left the city behind.

Arakawa, I have heard, completely escaped the bombings; and indeed, yesterday the place looked just as it had always done. A short walk up a hill, pleasantly shaded by cherry trees, brought me to Chishu Matsuda's house and that too was quite unchanged.

Matsuda's house, not as large or full of eccentricity as my own, is typical of the sort of solid, respectable house to be found in Arakawa. It stands on its own grounds, circled by a board fence, at a reasonable distance from the neighbouring properties: at the gateway, there is a bush of azaleas and a thick post sunk in the ground giving the family inscriptions. I pulled the bell and was answered by a woman of around forty whom I did not recognize. She showed me into the reception room, where she slid back the screen to the veranda, allowing the sun to enter and giving me a glimpse of the garden outside. Then she left me, saying: 'Mr Matsuda will not be a moment.'

I had first met Matsuda while living at Seiji Moriyama's villa, where the Tortoise and I had gone after leaving the Takeda firm. In fact, when Matsuda first came to the villa that day, I must already have been living there for some six years. It had been raining throughout the morning, and a group of us had been passing the time drinking and playing cards in one of the rooms. Then shortly after lunch, just as we had opened another large bottle, we heard a stranger's voice calling out in the yard.

The voice was strong and assured, and we all of us fell silent and looked at each other in panic. For the fact was we had all leapt to the same thought - that the police had come to reprimand us. This was of course an utterly irrational idea, for we had not committed any sort of crime. And had, say, someone challenged our lifestyle during a conversation in a bar, any one of us would have been able to put up a spirited defence on its behalf. But that firm voice calling 'Anyone home?' had caught us unawares, causing us to betray our sense of guilt concerning our late nights of drinking, the way we slept through many of our mornings, the way we lived a life without routine in a decaying villa.

It was some moments then before one of my companions nearest the screen opened it, exchanged a few words with the caller, then turned and said: 'Ono, a gentleman wishes to speak with you.'

I went out on to the veranda to find a lean-featured young man of around my own age standing in the middle of the large square yard. I have retained a vivid picture of that first time I saw Matsuda. The rain had stopped and the sun was out. All around him were puddles of water and wet leaves fallen from the cedar trees overlooking the villa. He was dressed too dandyishly to be a policeman; his overcoat was sharply tailored with a high upturned collar, and he wore his hat slanted down over his eyes in a somewhat mocking manner. As I emerged, he was glancing around with interest at his surroundings, and something in the way he did this immediately suggested to me, that first time I saw him, Matsuda's arrogant nature. He saw me and came unhurriedly towards the veranda.

'Mr Ono?'

I asked what I could do for him. He turned, cast his eyes around the grounds again, then smiled up at me.

‘An interesting place. This must have been a grand building once. Owned by a lord of some sort.’

‘Indeed,’

‘Mr Ono, my name is Chishu Matsuda. We have, in fact, been in correspondence. I work for the Okada-Shingen Society.’

The Okada-Shingen Society no longer exists today - one of many such victims of the occupying forces - but quite possibly you will have heard of it, or at least of the exhibition it held each year until the war. The Okada-Shingen exhibition was for a time the principal means in this city by which artists emerging in painting and printmaking came to win public acclaim. Indeed, such was its reputation that in its latter years, most of the city’s leading artists were displaying their latest works there alongside those of the newer talents. It was in connection with this same exhibition that the Okada-Shingen Society had written to me a few weeks prior to the afternoon of Matsuda’s visit.

‘I was made a little curious by your reply, Mr Ono,’ Matsuda said. ‘So I thought I’d call by and discover what it was all about.’

I looked at him coldly and said: ‘I believe I made all the necessary points in my letter of reply. It was, however, most kind of you to have approached me.’

A slight smile appeared around his eyes. ‘Mr Ono,’ he said, ‘it seems to me you are forgoing an important opportunity to enhance your reputation. So please tell me, when you insist you wish to have nothing to do with us, is that your own personal opinion? Or is it what your teacher happened to decree?’

‘Naturally, I sought my teacher’s advice. I am perfectly confident that the decision conveyed in my recent letter is the correct one. It was very good of you to come out here, but unfortunately I am occupied at this moment and cannot ask you to step up. I'll therefore bid you a good day. '

'One moment please, Mr Ono,' Matsuda said, his smile looking ever more mocking. He took a few more steps, coming right up to the veranda, and looked up at me. 'To be frank, I am not bothered about the exhibition. There are many others worthy of it. I came here, Mr Ono, because I wished to meet you. '

'Really? How good of you. '

'Indeed. I wished to say I am very struck by what I have seen of your work. I believe you have much talent. '

'You're most kind. No doubt I owe much to the excellence of my teacher's guidance. '

'No doubt. Now, Mr Ono, let us forget this exhibition. You must appreciate I do not merely work for the Okada-Shingen as a kind of clerk. I am a true lover of art. I have my beliefs and passions. And when every once in a while I come across a talent that truly excites me, then I feel I must do something about it. I would very much like to discuss certain ideas with you, Mr Ono. Ideas which may never have occurred to you before, but which I modestly suggest will be of benefit to your development as an artist. But I'll keep you no longer for the moment. Let me at least leave my calling card. '

He took his card from his wallet, placed it on the edge of the veranda, then with a quick bow, took his leave. But before he was half-way across the yard, he turned and called to me: 'Please consider my request carefully, Mr Ono. I merely wish to discuss certain ideas with you, that's all. '

That was almost thirty years ago, when we were both young and ambitious. Yesterday, Matsuda looked a very different man. His body has become broken down by ill-health, and his once handsome, arrogant face has become distorted by a lower jaw that seems no longer able to align itself with the upper.

The woman who had answered the door to me helped him into the room and assisted him to sit down. When we were alone, Matsuda looked at me and said:

‘You seem to have preserved your health well. As for myself, you can see I’ve deteriorated even further since our last meeting.’

I expressed sympathy, but stated he did not look as bad as all that.

‘Don’t try and fool me, Ono,’ he said with a smile. ‘I know exactly how feeble I’m growing. There’s little to be done, apparently. I have to just wait and see if my body recovers or else goes on getting worse. Still, enough about such cheerless matters. This is something of a surprise, to have you visit me again. I suppose we didn’t part on the easiest of terms.’

‘Really? But I wasn’t aware we’d quarrelled.’

‘Of course not. Why would we quarrel? I’m glad you’ve come to see me again. It must be three years since we last saw each other.’

‘I believe so. It wasn’t my intention to avoid you. I’d been meaning for some time to come out and pay a visit. But what with one thing and another ...’

‘Naturally,’ he said. ‘You had a lot to attend to. You must forgive me, of course, for failing to attend Michiko-san’s funeral. I’d meant to write and express my apologies. The fact of the matter is, I didn’t hear what had occurred until several days later. And then, of course, my own health ...’

‘Naturally, naturally. Indeed, I’m sure she would have been embarrassed by a large ostentatious ceremony. In any case, she would have known your thoughts would have been with her.’

‘I can remember when you and Michiko-san were brought together.’ He gave a laugh, nodding to himself. ‘I was very happy for you that day, Ono.’

‘Indeed,’ I said, also laughing. ‘You were to all intents our go-between. That uncle of yours just couldn’t cope with the job.’

‘That’s right,’ Matsuda said, smiling, ‘you’re bringing it all back to me. He’d get so embarrassed, he couldn’t say or do anything without flushing scarlet. You remember that marriage meeting at the Yanagimachi Hotel?’

We both laughed. Then I said:

‘You did a lot on our behalf. I doubt if it would have been brought off without you. Michiko always thought of you with gratitude.’

‘A cruel thing,’ Matsuda said, sighing. ‘And with the war all but over. I heard it was something of a freak raid.’

‘Indeed. Hardly anyone else was hurt. It was as you say, a cruel thing.’

‘But I’m bringing back terrible thoughts, I’m sorry.’

‘Not at all. It’s something of a comfort to remember her with you. I remember her back in the old days then.’

‘Indeed,’

The woman brought in the tea. As she was laying down the tray, Matsuda said to her: ‘Miss Suzuki, this is an old colleague of mine. We were very close once.’

She turned to me and bowed.

‘Miss Suzuki doubles as my housekeeper and nurse,’ Matsuda said. ‘She’s responsible for the fact that I’m still breathing.’

Miss Suzuki gave a laugh, bowed again and took her leave.

For a few moments after she had gone, Matsuda and I sat quietly, both gazing out between the screens Miss Suzuki had opened earlier. From where I sat, a pair of straw sandals were visible, left out on the veranda in the sun. But I could not see much of the garden itself, and for a moment felt tempted to rise to my feet and go out on the veranda. But realizing Matsuda would wish to accompany me and find difficulty doing so, I remained seated, wondering to myself if the garden was as it had been. As I remembered it, Matsuda's garden, though small, was arranged with much taste: a floor of smooth moss, a few small shapely trees and a deep pond. While sitting with Matsuda, I had caught an occasional splashing sound coming from outside and I was about to ask him if he still kept carp, when he said:

'I wasn't exaggerating when I told you Miss Suzuki was responsible for my life. She's been quite crucial on more than one occasion. You see, Ono, despite everything, I managed to hold on to some savings and assets. As a result, I'm able to employ her. Not so lucky for some others. I'm not exactly wealthy, but then, if I knew an old colleague was in difficulties, I'd do what I could to assist. After all, I have no children to leave money to.'

I gave a laugh. 'Same old Matsuda. Very forthright. It's kind of you, but that's not what brought me here. I too managed to hold on to my assets.'

'Ah, I'm pleased to hear that. You remember Nakane, the principal at Minami Imperial College? I see him from time to time. These days he's little better than a beggar. Of course, he tries to keep up appearances, but he lives entirely off borrowed money.'

'How terrible.'

'Some very unjust things have occurred,' Matsuda said. 'Still, we both managed to hold on to our assets. And you have more reason to be thankful, Ono. You appear to have held on to your health.'

‘Indeed,’ I said. ‘I have much to be thankful for.’

Again, a splashing sound came from the pond outside, and it occurred to me it could be birds bathing at the water’s edge.

‘Your garden sounds distinctly different to mine,’ I remarked. ‘I can tell just listening to it that we’re out of the city.’

‘Is that so? I hardly remember what the city sounds like. This has been the extent of my world for the past few years. This house and this garden.’

‘As a matter of fact, I did come to ask your help. But not in the way you implied earlier.’

‘I see you’ve taken offence,’ he said, nodding. ‘Much the same as ever.’

We both laughed. Then he said: ‘So what can I do for you?’

‘The fact is,’ I said, ‘Noriko, my younger daughter, is at this moment involved in marriage talks.’

‘Is that so?’

‘To be frank, I’m a little concerned for her. She’s already twenty-six. The war made things difficult for her. Otherwise, there’s no doubting she’d have been married by now.’

‘I believe I recall Miss Noriko. But she was just a little girl. Twenty-six already. As you say, the war has made things difficult, even for the best prospects.’

‘She was almost married last year,’ I said, ‘but the talks fell through at the last moment. I wonder, while we’re on the subject, did anyone approach you last year concerning Noriko? I don’t mean to be impertinent, but ...’

‘Not impertinent in the least, I quite understand. But no, I never spoke to anyone. But then I was very ill this time last year. If some detective had appeared, Miss Suzuki would no doubt have sent him away.'

I nodded, then said: 'It's just possible someone may call on you this year.'

'Oh? Well, I'll only have the best things to say about you. After all, we were good colleagues once.'

'I'm very grateful.'

'It's good of you to have called like this,' he said.

'But so far as Miss Noriko's marriage is concerned, it was quite unnecessary. We may not have parted on the easiest of terms, but things like that shouldn't come between us. Naturally, I'd say only the best things about you.'

'I didn't doubt it,' I said. 'You were always a generous man.'

'Still, if it's brought us together again, I'm glad.'

With some effort, Matsuda reached forward and began to refill our teacups. 'Forgive me, Ono,' he said, eventually, 'but you still seem uneasy about something.'

'I do?'

'Forgive me for putting it so bluntly, but the fact is very soon Miss Suzuki will be coming in to warn me I should retire again. I'm afraid I'm not able to entertain guests for prolonged periods, not even old colleagues.'

'Of course, I'm very sorry. It's most inconsiderate of me.'

'Don't be ridiculous, Ono. You can't go for a while yet. I was saying this because if you came here with a particular point to raise, it would be best if you'd do so soon.' Suddenly, he burst into laughter, saying: 'Really, you look aghast at my bad manners.'

'Not at all. It's most inconsiderate of me. But the truth is, I came simply to talk about my daughter's marriage prospects. '

'I see. '

'But I suppose,' I continued, 'it was my intention to mention certain eventualities. You see, the present negotiations may be quite delicate in nature. I'd be extremely beholden to you if you'd answer any queries which may come your way with delicacy. '

'Of course. ' His gaze was on me, and there was a touch of amusement in his eyes. 'With utmost delicacy. '

'Particularly, that is, with regards to the past. '

'But I've said already,' Matsuda said, and his voice had become a little colder, 'I have only the best of things to report of you from the past. '

'Of course, '

Matsuda continued to look at me for a while, then he sighed.

'I've hardly moved from this house for the last three years,' he said. 'But I still keep my ears open for what's happening in this country of ours. I realize there are now those who would condemn the likes of you and me for the very things we were once proud to have achieved. And I suppose this is why you're worried, Ono. You think perhaps I will praise you for things perhaps best forgotten. '

'No such thing,' I said hastily. 'You and I both have a lot to be proud of. It's merely that where marriage talks are concerned, one has to appreciate the delicacy of the situation. But you've put my mind at rest. I know you'll exercise your judgement as well as ever. '

'I will do my best,' Matsuda said. 'But, Ono, there are things we should both be proud of. Never mind what people today are all saying. Before long, a few more years, and the likes of us will be able to hold our heads high about what we tried to do. I simply hope I live as long as that. It's my wish to see my life's efforts vindicated.'

'Of course. I feel quite the same. But in respect to marriage negotiations ...'

'Naturally', Matsuda broke in, 'I'll do my best to exercise delicacy.'

I bowed, and we fell silent for a moment. Then he said:

'But tell me, Ono, if it's the case that you're worried about the past, I assume you've been visiting a few of the others from those days?'

'In fact, you're the first I've come to. I've no idea where many of our old friends are these days.'

'What about Kuroda? I hear he's living in the city somewhere.'

'Is that so? I haven't been in touch with him since ... since the war.'

'If we're worrying about Miss Noriko's future, perhaps you'd best seek him out, painful as it may be.'

'Indeed. It's simply that I have no idea where he is.'

'I see. Hopefully their detective will be equally lost as to where to find him. But then sometimes those detectives can be very resourceful.'

'Indeed,'

'Ono, you look deathly pale. And you looked so healthy when you first arrived. That's what comes of sharing a room with a sickly man.'

I laughed and said: 'Not at all. It's just that one's children can be a great worry.'

Matsuda sighed again and said: 'People sometimes tell me I've missed out on life because I never married and had children. But when I look around me, children seem to be nothing but worry. '

'That's not far from the truth. '

'Still,' he said, 'it would be a comfort to think one had children to leave one's assets to. '

'Indeed, '

A few minutes later, as Matsuda had predicted, Miss Suzuki came in and said something to him. Matsuda smiled and said with resignation:

'My nurse has come to fetch me. Of course, you're welcome to remain here as long as you wish. But you must excuse me, Ono. '

Later, as I waited at the terminus for a tram to take me up the steep hill and back into the city, I felt a certain comfort in recalling Matsuda's assurance that he would have 'only the best of things to report from the past'. Of course, I could have been reasonably confident of this without my having gone to visit him. But then again, it is always good to re-establish contact with old colleagues. All in all, yesterday's trip to Arakawa was surely well worthwhile.

APRIL, 1949

On three or four evenings a week I still find myself taking that path down to the river and the little wooden bridge still known to some who lived here before the war as 'the Bridge of Hesitation'. We called it that because until not so long ago, crossing it would have taken you into our pleasure district, and conscience-troubled men - so it was said - were to be seen hovering there, caught between seeking an evening's entertainment and returning home to their wives. But if sometimes I am to be seen up on that bridge, leaning thoughtfully against the rail, it is not that I am hesitating. It is simply that I enjoy standing there as the sun sets, surveying my surroundings and the changes taking place around me.

Clusters of new houses have appeared towards the foot of the hill down which I have just come. And further along the riverbank, where a year ago there was only grass and mud, a city corporation is building apartment blocks for future employees. But these are still far from completion, and when the sun is low over the river, one might even mistake them for the bombed ruins still to be found in certain parts of this city.

But then such ruins become more and more scarce each week; indeed, one would probably have to go as far north as the Wakamiya district, or else to that badly struck area between Honcho and Kasugamachi to encounter them now in any number. But only a year ago, I am sure bombed ruins were still a commonplace sight all over this city. For instance, that area across from the Bridge of Hesitation - that area where our pleasure district had been - was this time last year still a desert of rubble. But now, work progresses there steadily every day. Outside Mrs Kawakami's, where once throngs of pleasure-seekers had squeezed past one another, a wide concrete road is being built, and along both sides of it, the foundations for rows of large office buildings.

I suppose by the time Mrs Kawakami informed me one evening not so long ago of the corporation's offer to buy her out for a generous sum, I had long since accepted she would sooner or later have to close up and move.

'I don't know what I should do,' she had said to me.

'It would be terrible to leave here after all this time. I was awake thinking about it all last night. But then again, Sensei, when I thought about it, I said to myself, well, now with Shintaro-san gone, Sensei's the only dependable customer I have left. I really don't know what I should do.'

I am indeed her only real customer these days; Shintaro has not shown his face at Mrs Kawakami's since that small episode last winter - lacking the courage, no doubt, to face me. This was, I suppose, unfortunate for Mrs Kawakami, who had had nothing to do with the affair.

It had been one evening last winter, while we were drinking together as was usual then, that Shintaro first mentioned to me his ambition to gain a teaching post at one of the new high schools. He then went on to reveal that in fact he had already made several applications for such posts. Now it is, of course, many years since Shintaro was my pupil, and there is no reason why he should not have gone about such matters without consulting me; I was fully aware there were others now - his employer, for instance - far more suitably placed to act as guarantor in such matters. Nevertheless, I confess I was somewhat surprised he should not have confided in me at all about these applications. And so, when Shintaro presented himself at my house that winter's day shortly after New Year, when I found him standing giggling nervously in my entryway, saying: 'Sensei, it is a great impertinence of me to come here like this,' I felt something akin to relief, as though things were returning to a more familiar footing.

In the reception room I lit a brazier, and we both sat over it warming our hands. I noticed some snowflakes melting on the overcoat Shintaro was continuing to wear, and asked him:

‘The snow has started again?’

‘Just a little, Sensei. Nothing like this morning.’

‘I’m sorry it’s so cold in here. The coldest room in the house, I fear.’

‘Not at all, Sensei. My own rooms are far colder.’ He smiled happily and rubbed his hands together over the charcoal. ‘It’s good of you to receive me like this. Sensei has been very good to me over the years, I cannot begin to calculate what you have done for me.’

‘Not at all, Shintaro. In fact, I sometimes think I rather neglected you in the old days. So if there’s some way I can redeem my negligence, even at this late stage, I’d be pleased to hear of it.’

Shintaro laughed and went on rubbing his hands. ‘Really, Sensei, you say the most absurd things. I can never begin to calculate what you have done for me.’

I watched him for a moment, then said: ‘So tell me, Shintaro, what is it I can do for you?’

He looked up with a surprised expression, then laughed again.

‘Excuse me, Sensei. I was getting so comfortable here, I’d quite forgotten my purpose in coming to trouble you like this.’

He was, he told me, most optimistic about his application to Higashimachi High School; reliable sources gave him to believe it was being viewed with much favour.

‘However, Sensei, there appear to be just one or two small points on which the committee seem still a little unsatisfied. '

'Oh? '

'Indeed, Sensei. Perhaps I should be frank. The small points I refer to concern the past. '

'The past? '

'Indeed, Sensei. ' At this point, Shintaro gave a nervous laugh. Then with an effort, he continued: 'You must know, Sensei, that my respect for you is of the very highest. I have learnt so much from Sensei, and I will continue to be proud of our association. '

I nodded and waited for him to go on.

'The fact is, Sensei, I would be most grateful if you would yourself write to the committee, just to confirm certain statements I have made. '

'And what sort of statements are these, Shintaro? '

Shintaro gave another giggle, then reached his hands out over the brazier again.

'It is simply to satisfy the committee, Sensei. Nothing more. You may recall, Sensei, how we once had cause to disagree. Over the matter of my work during the China crisis. '

'The China crisis? I'm afraid I don't recall our quarrelling, Shintaro. '

'Forgive me, Sensei, perhaps I exaggerate. It was never as pronounced a thing as a quarrel. But I did indeed have the indiscretion to express my disagreement. That is to say, I resisted your suggestions concerning my work. '

'Forgive me, Shintaro, I don't recall what it is you're referring to. '

'No doubt such a trivial matter would not remain in Sensei's mind. But as it happens, it is of some importance to me at this juncture. You may remember better if I remind you of the party we had that night, the party to celebrate Mr Ogawa's engagement. It was that same night - I believe we were at the Hamabara Hotel - I perhaps drank a little too much and had the rudeness to express my views to you.'

'I have a vague recollection of that night, but I cannot say I remember it clearly. Still, Shintaro, what has a small disagreement like that to do with anything now?'

'Forgive me, Sensei, but as it happens, the matter has come to have some significance. The committee is obliged to be reassured of certain things. After all, there are the American authorities to satisfy ...' Shintaro trailed off nervously. Then he said: 'I beg you, Sensei, to try and recall that little disagreement. Grateful as I was - and still remain - for the wealth of things I learnt under your supervision, I did not always, in fact, concur with your view. Indeed, I may not be exaggerating to say that I had strong reservations about the direction our school was taking at that time. You may recall, for instance, that despite my eventually following your instructions over the China crisis posters, I had misgivings and indeed went so far as to make my views known to you.'

'The China crisis posters,' I said, thinking to myself.

'Yes, I remember your posters now. It was a crucial time for the nation. A time to stop dithering and decide what we wanted. As I recall, you did well and we were all proud of your work.'

'But you will recall, Sensei, I had serious misgivings about the work you wished me to do. If you will recall, I openly expressed my disagreement that evening at the Hamabara Hotel. Forgive me, Sensei, for worrying you with such a trivial matter.'

I suppose I remained silent for some moments. I must have stood up at around this point, for when I next spoke, I recall I was standing across the room from him, over by the veranda screens.

‘You wish me to write a letter to your committee,’ I said eventually, ‘disassociating you from my influence. This is what your request amounts to.’

‘Nothing of the sort, Sensei. You misunderstand. I am as proud as ever to be associated with your name. It’s simply that over the matter of the China poster campaign, if the committee could just be reassured ...’

He trailed off again. I slid open a screen just far enough to form a tiny gap. Cold air came blowing into the room, but for some reason this did not concern me. I gazed through the gap, across the veranda and out into the garden. The snow was falling in slow drifting flakes.

‘Shintaro,’ I said, ‘why don’t you simply face up to the past? You gained much credit at the time for your poster campaign. Much credit and much praise. The world may now have a different opinion of your work, but there’s no need to lie about yourself.’

‘Indeed, Sensei,’ Shintaro said. ‘I take your point. But getting back to the matter in hand, I would be most grateful if you would write to the committee concerning the China crisis posters. In fact, I have here with me the name and address of the committee chairman.’

‘Shintaro, please listen to me.’

‘Sensei, with every respect, I am always very grateful for your advice and learning. But at this moment, I am a man in the midst of my career. It is all very well to reflect and ponder when one is in retirement. But as it happens, I live in a busy world and there are one or two things I must see to if I am to secure this post, which by all other counts is mine already. Sensei, I beg you, please consider my position.’

I did not reply, but continued to look out at the snow falling on my garden. Behind me, I could hear Shintaro getting to his feet.

‘Here is the name and address, Sensei. If I may, I will leave them here. I would be most grateful if you would give the matter due consideration when you have a little time.’

There was a pause while, I suppose, he waited to see if I would turn and allow him to take his leave with some dignity. I went on gazing at my garden. For all its steady fall, the snow had settled only very lightly on the shrubs and branches. Indeed, as I watched, a breeze shook a branch of the maple tree, shaking off most of the snow. Only the stone lantern at the back of the garden had a substantial cap of white on it.

I heard Shintaro excuse himself and leave the room.

It may perhaps appear as if I was unnecessarily hard on Shintaro that day. But then if one bears in mind what had been taking place in the weeks immediately prior to that visit of his, it is surely understandable why I should have felt so unsympathetic towards his efforts to shirk his responsibilities. For in fact, Shintaro’s visit had come only a few days after Noriko’s miai.

The negotiations around Noriko’s proposed marriage to Taro Saito had progressed successfully enough throughout last autumn; an exchange of photographs had taken place in October and we had subsequently received word via Mr Kyo, our go-between, that the young man was keen to meet Noriko. Noriko, of course, made a show of thinking this over, but by that point, it had become obvious that my daughter – already twenty-six – could hardly pass over lightly a prospect like Taro Saito.

I thus informed Mr Kyo that we were agreeable to a miai, and eventually a date in November and the Kasuga Park Hotel were agreed upon. The Kasuga Park Hotel, you may agree, has these days a certain vulgar air about it, and I was somewhat unhappy with the choice. But then Mr Kyo had assured me a private room would be booked, and had gone on to suggest that the Saitos were much fond of the food there, and I finally gave my consent, albeit without enthusiasm.

Mr Kyo had also made the point that the miai looked to be heavily weighted towards the prospective groom's family - his younger brother, as well as his parents, intended to be present. It would be perfectly acceptable, he gave me to understand, if we were to bring a relative or close friend to give Noriko additional support. But of course, with Setsuko so far away, there was no one we could properly ask to attend such an occasion. And it may well have been this feeling that we would somehow be at a disadvantage at the miai, together with our unhappiness with the venue, that caused Noriko to be more tense about the matter than she might otherwise have been. In any case, the weeks leading up to the miai were difficult ones.

Often, she would come home from her office and immediately make some remark like: 'What have you been doing all day, Father? Just moping around as usual, I expect.' Far from 'moping around', as it happened, I would have been busy in my efforts to secure a good outcome to the marriage negotiations. But because at that time I believed it important not to worry her with details of how matters were proceeding, I would talk only vaguely concerning my day, thus allowing her to continue with her insinuations. In retrospect, I see that our not openly discussing certain matters may well have made Noriko all the more tense, and a franker approach on my part may well have prevented many of the unpleasant exchanges that took place between us around that time.

I recall one afternoon, for instance, Noriko arriving home as I was pruning some shrubs out in the garden. She had greeted me from the veranda in a perfectly civil way, before disappearing again into the house. Then a few minutes later I was sitting on the veranda, looking out at the garden to assess the effect of my work, when Noriko, now changed into a kimono, appeared again with some tea. She put the tray down between us and seated herself. It was, as I recall, one of the last of those splendid autumn afternoons we had last year, and a tender light was falling across the foliage. Following my gaze, she said:

‘Father, why have you cut the bamboo like that? It looks unbalanced now.’

‘Unbalanced? Do you think so? I think it looks balanced enough. You see, you have to take into account where the younger shoots are dominant.’

‘Father tends to meddle too much. I think he’s going to ruin that bush too.’

‘Ruin that bush too?’ I turned towards my daughter. ‘Whatever do you mean? You’re saying I’ve ruined others?’

‘The azaleas have never regained their looks. That’s what comes of Father having so much time on his hands. He ends up meddling where it’s not required.’

‘Excuse me, Noriko, I don’t quite see your point. You’re saying the azaleas are unbalanced too?’

Noriko looked at the garden again and gave a sigh. ‘You should have left things as they were.’

‘I’m sorry, Noriko, but to my eyes, both the bamboo and the azaleas are much improved. I’m afraid I don’t see your “unbalanced” aspect at all.’

‘Well then, Father must be going blind. Or perhaps it’s just poor taste.’

‘Poor taste? Now that’s curious. You know, Noriko, people have not on the whole associated poor taste with my name.’

‘Well, to my eyes, Father,’ she said tiredly, ‘the bamboo is unbalanced. And you’ve spoiled the way the tree hangs over it too.’

For a moment, I sat gazing at the garden in silence. ‘Yes,’ I said, eventually, and gave a nod. ‘I suppose you might see it that way, Noriko. You never did have an artistic instinct. Neither you nor Setsuko. Kenji was another matter, but you girls took after your mother. In fact, I remember your mother used to make just such misguided comments.’

‘Is Father such an authority on how to cut shrubs? I didn’t realize that. I’m sorry.’

‘I didn’t claim to be an authority. It’s simply that I’m a little surprised to be accused of poor taste. It’s an unusual accusation in my own case, that’s all.’

‘Very well, Father, I’m sure it’s all a matter of opinion.’

‘Your mother was rather like you, Noriko. She had no bones about saying whatever came into her head. It’s quite honest, I suppose.’

‘I’m sure Father knows best about such things. That’s beyond dispute, no doubt.’

‘I remember, Noriko, your mother would sometimes even make her comments while I was painting. She would try to make some point and make me laugh. Then she’d laugh, too, and concede she knew little about such things.’

‘So Father was always right about his paintings too, I suppose.’

‘Noriko, this is a pointless discussion. Besides, if you don’t like what I’ve done in the garden, you’re welcome to go out there and do what you like to set things right.’

‘That’s very kind of Father. But when do you suggest I do it? I don’t have all day long as Father does.’

‘What do you mean, Noriko? I’ve had a busy day.’ I glared at her for a moment, but she went on looking at the garden, a weary expression on her face. I turned away and gave a sigh. ‘But this is a pointless discussion. Your mother at least could say such things and we would laugh together.’

At such moments, it was indeed tempting to point out to her the extent to which I was in fact exerting myself on her behalf. Had I done so, my daughter would no doubt have been surprised - and, I dare say, ashamed at her behaviour towards me. That very day, for instance, I had actually been to the Yanagawa district, where I had discovered Kuroda was now living.

It had not, in the end, been a difficult task to discover Kuroda’s whereabouts. The art professor at Uemachi College, once I had assured him of my good intentions, had given me not only the address, but an account of what had been happening to my former pupil over these past years. Kuroda, it seemed, had not fared at all badly since his release at the end of the war. Such are the ways of this world that his years in prison gave him strong credentials, and certain groups had made a point of welcoming him and seeing to his needs. He had thus experienced little difficulty finding work - mainly small tutoring jobs - or the materials to recommence his own painting. Then, towards the early part of last summer, he had been given the post of art teacher at Uemachi College.

Now, it may seem somewhat perverse of me to say so, but I was pleased - and indeed rather proud - to hear Kuroda’s career was progressing well. But then it is only natural after all that his former teacher should continue to take pride in such things, even if circumstances have caused teacher and pupil to become estranged.

Kuroda did not live in a good quarter. I walked for some time through little alleys filled with dilapidated lodging houses before coming to a concrete square resembling the forecourt of a factory. Indeed, across the square, I could see some trucks had been parked, and farther on, behind a mesh fence, a bulldozer was churning up the ground. I recall I was standing watching the bulldozer for some moments before realizing the large new building above me was in fact Kuroda's apartment block.

I climbed to the second floor, where two small boys were riding a tricycle up and down the corridor, and searched out Kuroda's door. My first ring was not answered, but I was by then firmly resolved to go ahead with the encounter and rang again.

A fresh-faced young man of around twenty opened the door.

'I'm very sorry' - he spoke very earnestly - 'but Mr Kuroda isn't home at present. I wonder, sir, are you perhaps a work associate?'

'In a manner of speaking. There were a few matters I wished to discuss with Mr Kuroda.'

'In that case, perhaps you'd be so good as to come in and wait. I'm sure Mr Kuroda will not be gone long, and he would very much regret it if he were to miss you.'

'But I don't wish to put you to any bother.'

'Not at all, sir. Please, please come in.'

The apartment was small, and like many of these modern affairs, had no entryway as such, the tatami starting a little way inside the front door with only a shallow step up. There was a tidy look to the place, and a number of paintings and hangings adorned the walls. Plenty of sunlight came into the apartment through the large windows, which I could see opened on to a narrow balcony. The noise of the bulldozer could be heard coming from outside.

‘I hope you were not in a hurry, sir,’ the young man said, placing a cushion for me. ‘But Mr Kuroda would never forgive me if he returned to learn I had let you go. Please allow me to make you some tea.’

‘How very kind,’ I said, seating myself. ‘You are a student of Mr Kuroda’s?’

The young man gave a small laugh. ‘Mr Kuroda is kind enough to refer to me as his protégé, although I am myself doubtful if I am worthy of such a title. My name is Enchi. Mr Kuroda used to tutor me, and now, despite his heavy commitments at his college, he most generously continues to take an interest in my work.’

‘Is that so?’

From outside came the noise of the bulldozer at work. For a moment or two, the young man hovered awkwardly, then excused himself, saying: ‘Please, I will prepare some tea.’

A few minutes later, when he reappeared, I pointed to a painting on the wall, saying: ‘Mr Kuroda’s style is quite unmistakable.’

At this, the young man gave a laugh and looked awkwardly towards the painting, the tea tray still in his hands. Then he said:

‘I’m afraid that painting is far from Mr Kuroda’s standards, sir.’

‘It isn’t Mr Kuroda’s work?’

‘I’m afraid, sir, that is one of my own efforts. My teacher has been so good as to deem it worthy of display.’

‘Really? Well, well.’

I went on gazing up at the painting. The young man put the tray down on a low table near me, and seated himself.

‘Really, that is your own work? Well, I must say you have much talent. Much talent indeed.’

He gave another embarrassed laugh. 'I'm very fortunate in having Mr Kuroda for a teacher. But I fear I still have much to learn.'

'And I was so sure it was an example of Mr Kuroda's own work. The brush strokes have that quality to them.'

The young man was fussing rather clumsily with the teapot, as though unsure how to proceed. I watched him lift up the lid to peer inside.

'Mr Kuroda is always telling me,' he said, 'I should try and paint in a style more distinctly my own. But I find so much to admire in Mr Kuroda's ways, I can hardly help mimicking him.'

'It's no bad thing to mimic one's teacher for a while. One learns a lot that way. But all in good time, you'll develop your own ideas and techniques, for you're undoubtedly a young man of much talent. Yes, I'm sure you have a most promising future. It's no wonder Mr Kuroda takes an interest in you.'

'I cannot begin to tell you, sir, what I owe to Mr Kuroda. Why, as you can see, I am now even lodging here in his apartment. I have been here for almost two weeks. I was thrown out of my previous lodgings, and Mr Kuroda came to my rescue. It is impossible to tell you, sir, all he has done for me.'

'You say you were thrown out of your lodgings?'

'I assure you, sir,' he said, with a small laugh, 'I paid my rent. But you see, as much as I tried, I could not avoid getting paint on the tatami, and eventually the landlord threw me out.'

We both laughed at this. Then I said:

'I'm sorry, I don't mean to be unsympathetic. It's just that I remember just such problems myself when I was starting out. But you'll soon acquire the right conditions to work if you persevere, I assure you.'

We both laughed again.

'You're very encouraging, sir,' the young man said, and began to pour the tea. 'I don't suppose Mr Kuroda will be long now. I beg you not to hurry away. Mr Kuroda will be most glad for the opportunity to thank you for all you have done.'

I looked at him in surprise. 'You think Mr Kuroda wishes to thank me?'

'Excuse me, sir, but I was assuming you are from the Cordon Society.'

'The Cordon Society? I'm sorry, what is that?'

The young man glanced towards me, some of his earlier awkwardness returning. 'I'm sorry, sir, it's my mistake. I assumed you were from the Cordon Society.'

'I'm afraid I'm not. I'm simply an old acquaintance of Mr Kuroda's.'

'I see. An old colleague?'

'Indeed. I suppose you could say that.' I gazed up again at the young man's painting on the wall. 'Yes, indeed,' I said. 'Very talented. Very talented indeed.' I had become aware that the young man was now looking at me carefully. Eventually, he said:

'I'm sorry, sir, but may I ask your name?'

'I'm sorry, you must think me most rude. My name is Ono.'

'I see.'

The young man rose to his feet and went over to the window. For a moment or two, I watched the steam rising from the two cups on the table.

‘Will Mr Kuroda be long now?’ I asked, eventually.

At first, I did not think the young man was going to reply. But then he said, without turning from the window:

‘Perhaps if he has not returned soon, you should not detain yourself further from your other business.’

‘If you don’t mind, I’ll wait a little longer, now that I’ve made the journey out here.’

‘I will inform Mr Kuroda of your visit. Perhaps he will write to you.’

Out in the corridor, the children seemed to be banging their tricycle against the wall not far from us and shouting at each other. It struck me then how much like a sulking child the young man at the window looked.

‘Forgive me for saying this, Mr Enchi,’ I said. ‘But you are very young. Indeed, you could only have been a boy when Mr Kuroda and I first knew each other. I would ask you not to jump to conclusions about matters of which you do not know the full details.’

‘The full details?’ he said, turning to me. ‘Excuse me, sir, but are you yourself aware of the full details? Do you know what he suffered?’

‘Most things are more complicated than they appear, Mr Enchi. Young men of your generation tend to see things far too simply. In any case, there seems little point in the two of us debating such matters at this moment. I will, if you don’t mind, wait for Mr Kuroda.’

‘I would suggest, sir, you delay yourself no further from your other business. I will inform Mr Kuroda when he returns.’ Until this point, the young man had managed to maintain a polite tone in his voice, but now he seemed to lose his self-control. ‘Frankly, sir, I am amazed at your nerve. To come here as though you were simply a friendly visitor.’

‘But I am a friendly visitor. And if I may say so, I think it is for Mr Kuroda to decide whether or not he wishes to receive me as such.’

‘Sir, I have come to know Mr Kuroda well, and in my judgement it is best you leave. He will not wish to see you.’

I gave a sigh and rose to my feet. The young man was again looking out of the window. But as I was removing my hat from the coat stand, he turned to me once more. ‘The full details, Mr Ono,’ he said, and his voice had a strange kind of composure. ‘It is clearly you who are ignorant of the full details. Or else how would you dare come here like this? For instance, sir, I take it you never knew about Mr Kuroda’s shoulder? He was in great pain, but the warders conveniently forgot to report the injury and it was not attended to until the end of the war. But of course, they remembered it well enough whenever they decided to give him another beating. Traitor. That’s what they called him. Traitor. Every minute of every day. But now we all know who the real traitors were.’

I finished lacing my shoes and started for the door.

‘You’re too young, Mr Enchi, to know about this world and its complications.’

‘We all know now who the real traitors were. And many of them are still walking free.’

‘You will tell Mr Kuroda I was here? Perhaps he will be so good as to write to me. Good day, Mr Enchi.’

Naturally, I did not allow the young man’s words to upset me unduly, but in the light of Noriko’s marriage negotiations, the possibility that Kuroda was as hostile to my memory as Enchi had suggested was indeed a disturbing one. It was, in any case, my duty as a father to press on with the matter, unpleasant though it was, and on returning home that afternoon, I composed a letter to Kuroda, expressing my desire that we should meet again, particularly since I had a matter of some delicacy and importance to discuss with him. The tone of my letter had been friendly and conciliatory, and so I was disappointed by the cold and offensively brief reply I received a few days later.

‘I have no reason to believe a meeting between us would produce anything of value,’ my former pupil had written. ‘I thank you for your courtesy in calling the other day, but I feel I should not trouble you further to fulfil such obligations.’

This matter with Kuroda did, I confess, cast something of a shadow over my mood; it certainly marred my optimism concerning Noriko’s negotiations. And though, as I have said, I kept from her the details of my attempts to meet with Kuroda, my daughter undoubtedly sensed the matter had not been resolved satisfactorily, and this no doubt contributed to her anxiety.

On the actual day of the miai itself, my daughter seemed so tense, I became concerned as to the impression she would make that evening in front of the Saitos - who were themselves bound to display a smooth and relaxed assurance. Towards the latter part of the afternoon, I felt it would be prudent to try and lighten Noriko’s mood somewhat, and this was the impulse behind my remarking to her as she passed through the dining room where I was sat reading:

‘It’s astonishing, Noriko, how you can spend the whole day doing nothing but preparing your appearance. You’d think this was the marriage ceremony itself.’

‘It’s just like Father to mock then not be properly ready himself,’ she snapped back.

‘I’ll only need a little time to be ready,’ I said, with a laugh. ‘Quite extraordinary, your taking the whole day like this.’

‘That’s Father’s trouble. He’s too proud to prepare properly for these things.’

I looked up at her in astonishment. ‘What do you mean, “too proud”? What are you suggesting, Noriko?’

My daughter turned away, adjusting her hairclasp.

‘Noriko, what do you mean, “too proud”? What are you suggesting?’

‘If Father doesn’t want to make a fuss over something as trivial as my future, then that’s quite understandable. After all, Father hasn’t even finished his newspaper yet.’

‘But you’re changing your tack now. You were saying something about my being “too proud”. Why don’t you say more about it?’

‘I just hope Father’s presentable when the time comes,’ she said, and went purposefully out of the room.

On that occasion, as often during those difficult days, I was obliged to reflect on the marked contrast of Noriko’s attitude with that she had displayed the previous year, during the negotiations with the Miyake family. Then, she had been relaxed almost to the point of complacency; but of course, she had known Jiro Miyake well; I dare say she had been confident the two of them would marry, and had regarded the discussions between families as nothing more than cumbersome formalities. No doubt the shock she subsequently received was a bitter one, but it seems to me unnecessary for her to have made insinuations such as she did that afternoon. In any case, that little altercation hardly helped to put us in the right frame of mind for a miai, and in all likelihood contributed to what took place that evening at the Kasuga Park Hotel.

For many years, the Kasuga Park Hotel had been amongst the most pleasant of the Western-style hotels in the city; these days, though, the management has taken to decorating the rooms in a somewhat vulgar manner - intended, no doubt, to strike the American clientele with whom the place is popular as being charmingly 'Japanese'. For all that, the room Mr Kyo had booked was pleasing enough, its main feature being the view from the wide bay windows down the west slope of Kasuga Hill, the lights of the city visible far below us. Otherwise, the room was dominated by a large circular table and high-backed chairs, and a painting on one wall which I recognized to be by Matsumoto, an artist I had known slightly before the war.

It may well be that the tension of the occasion made me drink a little more quickly than I intended, for my memories of the evening are not as clear as they might be. I do remember forming immediately a favourable impression of Taro Saito, the young man I was being asked to consider for a son-in-law. Not only did he seem an intelligent, responsible sort, he possessed all the assured grace and manners I admired in his father. Indeed, observing the unworried, yet highly courteous way Taro Saito received myself and Noriko as we first arrived, I was reminded of another young man who had impressed me in a parallel situation some years earlier - that is to say, Suichi at Setsuko's miai at what was in those days the Imperial Inn. And for a moment, I considered the possibility that Taro Saito's courtesy and good-naturedness would fade with time as surely as Suichi's has done. But then, of course, it is to be hoped that Taro Saito will never have to endure the embittering experiences Suichi is said to have done.

As for Dr Saito himself, he seemed as commanding a presence as ever. Despite our never having been properly introduced prior to that evening, Dr Saito and I had in fact been acquainted for some years, having taken to greeting one another in the street out of mutual recognition of our respective reputations. His wife, a handsome woman in her fifties, I had likewise exchanged greetings with, but little else; I could see she was, like her husband, someone of considerable poise, confident of handling any awkward situation that might arise. The only member of the Saito family who did not impress me was the younger son - Mitsuo - whom I guessed to be in his early twenties.

Now that I think back to that evening, I am sure my suspicions about young Mitsuo were aroused as soon as I saw him. I am still uncertain as to what first set off a warning - perhaps it was that he reminded me of young Enchi whom I had encountered in Kuroda's apartment. In any case, as we began to eat, I found myself becoming increasingly confirmed in these suspicions. Although at this point Mitsuo was behaving with all due decorum, there was something in the way I would catch him looking at me, or about the way he would pass a bowl to me across the table, that made me sense his hostility and accusation.

And then, after we had been eating for several minutes, I was struck by a sudden thought; that Mitsuo's attitude was not in fact any different from that of the rest of his family - it was simply that he was not as skilled in disguising it. From then on, I took to glancing over at Mitsuo, as though he were the clearest indicator of what the Saitos were really thinking. However, because he was sitting at some distance across the table, and because Mr Kyo, next to him, appeared to be engaging him in prolonged conversation, I did not have any significant exchanges with Mitsuo at that stage of the proceedings.

'We hear you're fond of playing the piano, Miss Noriko,' I remember Mrs Saito remarking at one point.

Noriko gave a small laugh and said: 'I don't practise nearly enough.'

'I used to play when I was younger,' said Mrs Saito. 'But now I too am out of practice. We women are given so little time for such pursuits, don't you think?'

‘Indeed,’ my daughter said, rather nervously.

‘I have very poor appreciation of music myself,’ Taro Saito put in, gazing unflinchingly at Noriko. ‘In fact, my mother always accuses me of being tone-deaf. As a result, I have no confidence in my own taste, and I’m obliged to consult her about which composers to admire.’

‘What nonsense,’ said Mrs Saito.

‘You know, Miss Noriko,’ Taro went on, ‘I once acquired a set of recordings of a Bach piano concerto. I was very fond of it, but my mother was forever criticizing it and chastising my poor taste. Naturally my opinions stood little chance against the likes of Mother here. Consequently I now hardly listen to Bach. But perhaps you could come to my rescue, Miss Noriko. Aren’t you fond of Bach?’

‘Bach?’ For a second, my daughter looked at a loss. Then she smiled and said: ‘Yes, indeed. Very much so.’

‘Ah,’ Taro Saito said triumphantly, ‘now Mother will need to reconsider things.’

‘My son is talking nonsense, Miss Noriko. I’ve never criticized Bach’s work as a whole. But tell me, don’t you agree Chopin is more eloquent so far as the piano is concerned?’

‘Indeed,’ said Noriko.

Such stiff responses typified my daughter’s performance for much of the earlier part of the evening. This was not, I might say, altogether unexpected. When amongst family, or in the company of close friends, Noriko is in the habit of adopting her somewhat flippant manner of address, and often achieves a wit and eloquence of sorts; but in more formal settings, I have often known her to have difficulty finding an appropriate tone, thus giving the impression she is a timid young woman. That this was precisely what was occurring on this of all occasions was reason for concern; for it seemed to me clear - and Mrs Saito's own high profile appeared to confirm this - the Saitos were not the old-fashioned sort of family who preferred their female members to be silent and demure. I had in fact anticipated this, and in our preparations for the miai, had stressed my opinion that Noriko should as far as appropriate emphasize her lively, intelligent qualities. My daughter had been in full agreement with such a strategy, and indeed, had declared so determinedly her intention to behave in a frank and natural way, I had even feared she would go too far and outrage the proceedings. So, as I watched her struggling to produce simple, compliant replies to the Saitos' promptings, her gaze rarely leaving her bowl, I could imagine the frustration Noriko was experiencing.

Noriko's problems aside, however, talk seemed to flow easily around the table. Dr Saito in particular proved so expert at generating a relaxed atmosphere, that, had it not been for my awareness of young Mitsuo's gaze on me, I might well have forgotten the gravity of the occasion and lowered my guard. At one point during the meal, I can recall Dr Saito leaning back comfortably in his chair, saying:

'It seems there were more demonstrations in the city centre today. You know, Mr Ono, I was on the tram this afternoon and a man got in with a large bruise over his forehead. He sat next to me, so naturally I asked him if he was all right and advised him to visit the clinic. But you know, it turned out he had just been to a doctor, and he was now determined to rejoin his companions in the demonstrations. What do you make of that, Mr Ono?'

Dr Saito had spoken casually enough, but I got for a moment the impression that the whole table - Noriko included - had stopped eating to hear my reply. It is quite possible, of course, that I imagined this; but then I do recall quite distinctly that when I threw a glance towards young Mitsuo, he was watching me with a peculiar intensity.

‘It’s regrettable indeed,’ I said, ‘that people are getting hurt. No doubt feelings are running high.’

‘I’m sure you’re right, Mr Ono,’ Mrs Saito put in. ‘Feelings may well be running high, but people seem to be going too far now. So many getting injured. But my husband here claims it’s all for the good. I really don’t understand what he means.’

I expected Dr Saito to react to this, but instead there was another pause during which attention seemed once more to focus in my direction.

‘It is, as you say,’ I remarked, ‘a great pity so many have been injured.’

‘My wife is misrepresenting me as usual, Mr Ono,’ Dr Saito said. ‘I never claimed all this fighting was a good thing. But I’ve been trying to convince my wife there’s more to these things than simply people getting injured. Of course, one doesn’t want to see people hurt. But the underlying spirit – that people feel the need to express their views openly and strongly – now that’s a healthy thing, don’t you think so, Mr Ono?’

Perhaps I hesitated for a moment; in any case, Taro Saito spoke before I could reply.

‘But surely, Father, things are getting out of hand now. Democracy is a fine thing, but it doesn’t mean citizens have a right to run riot whenever they disagree with something. In this respect, we Japanese have been shown to be like children. We’ve yet to learn how to handle the responsibility of democracy.’

‘Here’s an unusual case,’ Dr Saito said, laughing. ‘It seems on this question at least, it’s the father who’s far more liberal than the son. Taro may be right. At this moment, our country is like a young boy learning to walk and run. But I say the underlying spirit is healthy. It’s like watching a growing boy running and grazing his knee. One doesn’t wish to prevent him and keep him locked indoors. Don't you think so, Mr Ono? Or am I being too liberal, as my wife and my son insist?'

Perhaps again I was mistaken - for as I say, I was drinking a little faster than I had intended - but there seemed to me a curious lack of disharmony about the Saito's supposed difference of views. Meanwhile, young Mitsuo, I noticed, was once more watching me.

'Indeed,' I said. 'I hope no more people are injured.'

I believe at this point Taro Saito changed the subject by asking Noriko her opinion on one of the city's recently opened department stores, and for a while the conversation reverted to smaller topics.

These occasions are not, of course, easy for any prospective bride - it seems unfair to ask a young woman to make judgements so crucial to her future happiness while under such scrutiny herself - but I must admit I had not expected Noriko to take the tension quite so badly. As the evening progressed, her confidence seemed to wane further and further, until she seemed unable to say little more than 'yes' or 'no'. Taro Saito, I could see, was doing his best to get Noriko to relax, but the occasion demanded he should not appear overly persistent, and time and again, his attempts to start a humorous exchange would end in awkward silences. As I watched my daughter's distress, I was struck again by the contrast of the proceedings with the miai the previous year. Setsuko, down on one of her visits then, had been present to give her sister support, but Noriko had seemed in little need of it that night. Indeed, I could recall my irritation at the way Noriko and Jiro Miyake had continued to exchange mischievous glances across the table, as though to mock the formality of the occasion.

'You remember, Mr Ono,' Dr Saito said, 'the last time we met, we discovered we had a mutual acquaintance. A Mr

Kuroda. '

We were by this time nearing the end of the meal.

'Ah yes, indeed,' I said.

'My son here' - Dr Saito indicated young Mitsuo with whom I had so far exchanged barely a word - 'is presently studying at Uemachi College, where, of course, Mr Kuroda is now teaching.'

'Is that so?' I turned to the young man. 'So you know Mr Kuroda well?'

'Not well,' the young man said. 'Regrettably, I have no ability in the arts, and my contact with the art professors is limited.'

'But Mr Kuroda is well spoken of, isn't he, Mitsuo?' Dr Saito put in.

'He is indeed.'

'Mr Ono here was a close acquaintance of Mr Kuroda once. Did you know that?'

'Yes, I'd heard,' Mitsuo said.

At this point, Taro Saito changed the subject again by saying:

'You know, Miss Noriko, I've always had a theory about my poor ear for music. When I was a child, my parents never kept the piano tuned. Every day, throughout my most formative years, Miss Noriko, I was obliged to listen to Mother here practising on an out-of-tune piano. It's quite possible, don't you think, this is behind all my troubles?'

'Yes,' Noriko said, and looked back down at her food.

'There. I always maintained it was Mother's fault. And she's constantly chastised me all these years for having a bad ear. I've been most unfairly treated, wouldn't you say, Miss Noriko?'

Noriko smiled, but said nothing.

Around this point, evidently, Mr Kyo, who had thus far kept in the background, began to tell one of his comic anecdotes. According at least to Noriko's account of things, he was still in the midst of his story when I interrupted by turning to young Mitsuo Saito and saying:

'Mr Kuroda has no doubt spoken to you about me.'

Mitsuo looked up with a puzzled expression.

'Spoken about you, sir?' he said, hesitantly. 'I'm sure he often mentions you, but I'm afraid I'm not well acquainted with Mr Kuroda and consequently ...' He trailed off, and looked towards his parents for help.

'I'm sure,' Dr Saito said, in what struck me as a rather deliberate voice, 'Mr Kuroda remembers Mr Ono well enough.'

'I do not think,' I said, looking at Mitsuo again, 'that Mr Kuroda would have a particularly high opinion of me.'

The young man turned awkwardly once more towards his parents. This time, it was Mrs Saito who said:

'On the contrary, I'm sure he would have the highest opinion of you, Mr Ono.'

'There are some, Mrs Saito,' I said, perhaps a little loudly, 'who believe my career to have been a negative influence. An influence now best erased and forgotten. I am not unaware of this viewpoint. Mr Kuroda, I would think, is one who would hold it.'

'Is that so?' Perhaps I was mistaken about this, but I thought Dr Saito was watching me rather like a teacher waiting for a pupil to go on with a lesson he has learnt by heart.

‘Indeed. And as for myself, I am now quite prepared to accept the validity of such an opinion.’

‘I’m sure you’re being unfair on yourself, Mr Ono,’ Taro Saito began to say, but I quickly went on:

‘There are some who would say it is people like myself who are responsible for the terrible things that happened to this nation of ours. As far as I am concerned, I freely admit I made many mistakes. I accept that much of what I did was ultimately harmful to our nation, that mine was part of an influence that resulted in untold suffering for our own people. I admit this. You see, Dr Saito, I admit this quite readily.’

Dr Saito leaned forward, a puzzled expression on his face.

‘Forgive me, Mr Ono,’ he said. ‘You’re saying you are unhappy about the work you did? With your paintings?’

‘My paintings. My teachings. As you see, Dr Saito, I admit this quite readily. All I can say is that at the time I acted in good faith. I believed in all sincerity I was achieving good for my fellow countrymen. But as you see, I am not now afraid to admit I was mistaken.’

‘I’m sure you’re too harsh on yourself, Mr Ono,’ Taro Saito said cheerfully. Then turning to Noriko, he said: ‘Tell me, Miss Noriko, is your father always so strict with himself?’

Noriko, I realized, had been staring at me in astonishment. Perhaps as a result of this, she was taken off guard by Taro, and her customary flippancy came to her lips for the first time that evening.

‘Father’s not strict at all. It’s me that has to be strict with him. Otherwise he’d never be up for breakfast.’

‘Is that so?’ Taro Saito said, delighted to have drawn a less formal response from Noriko. ‘My father is also a late riser. They say older people sleep less than we do, but from our experience this seems quite incorrect. '

Noriko laughed and said: 'I think it's just fathers. I'm sure Mrs Saito has no trouble getting up. '

'A fine thing,' Dr Saito remarked to me. 'They're making fun of us and we're not even out of the room. '

I would not wish to claim that the whole engagement had hung in the balance until that point, but it is certainly my feeling that that was when the miai turned from being an awkward, potentially disastrous one into a successful evening. We went on talking and drinking sake for a good while after the meal, and by the time taxis were called, there was a clear feeling that we had all got on well. Most crucially, although they had kept an appropriate distance, it was obvious Taro Saito and Noriko had taken to one another.

Of course, I do not pretend certain moments of that evening were not painful for me; nor do I claim I would so easily have made the sort of declaration I did concerning the past had circumstances not impressed upon me the prudence of doing so. Having said this, I must say I find it hard to understand how any man who values his self-respect would wish for long to avoid responsibility for his past deeds; it may not always be an easy thing, but there is certainly a satisfaction and dignity to be gained in coming to terms with the mistakes one has made in the course of one's life. In any case, there is surely no great shame in mistakes made in the best of faith. It is surely a thing far more shameful to be unable or unwilling to acknowledge them.

Consider Shintaro, for instance - who appears, incidentally, to have secured the teaching post he was so coveting. Shintaro would in my view be a happier man today if he had the courage and honesty to accept what he did in the past. It is, I suppose, possible that the cold reaction he received from me that afternoon just after New Year may have persuaded him to change tack in dealing with his committee over the matter of his China crisis posters. But my guess is that Shintaro persisted with his small hypocrisies in pursuit of his goal. Indeed, I have come to believe now that there has always been a cunning, underhand side to Shintaro's nature, which I had not really noticed in the past.

'You know, Obasan,' I said to Mrs Kawakami when I was down there one evening not so long ago, 'I rather suspect Shintaro was never quite the unworldly sort he would have us believe. That's just his way of gaining an advantage over people and getting things to go his way. People like Shintaro, if they don't want to do something, they pretend they're helplessly lost about it and they're forgiven everything.'

'Really, Sensei.' Mrs Kawakami gave me a disapproving look, understandably reluctant to think ill of someone who had for so long been her best customer.

'For instance, Obasan,' I went on, 'think how cleverly he avoided the war. While others were losing so much, Shintaro just went on working in that little studio of his as though nothing was happening.'

'But Sensei, Shintaro-san has a bad leg ...'

'Bad leg or not, everyone was being called up. Of course, they found him in the end, but then the war was over within days. You know, Obasan, Shintaro told me once he lost two working weeks on account of the war. That's what the war cost Shintaro. Believe me, Obasan, there's far more to our old friend beneath his childish exterior.'

'Well, in any case,' Mrs Kawakami said tiredly, 'it looks as though he won't be returning here any more now.'

'Indeed, Obasan. It seems you've lost him for good.'

Mrs Kawakami, a cigarette burning in her hand, leaned on her edge of the counter and cast an eye around her little bar. We were as usual alone in the place. The early evening sun was coming in through the mosquito nets on the windows, making the room look more dusty and older than it does once darkness has set in and Mrs Kawakami's lamps are illuminating it. Outside, the men were still working. For the past hour, the sound of hammering had been echoing in from somewhere, and a truck starting or a burst of drilling would frequently cause the whole place to shake. And as I followed Mrs Kawakami's glance around the room that summer's evening, I was struck by the thought of how small, shabby and out of place her little bar would seem amidst the large concrete buildings the city corporation was even at that moment erecting around us. And I said to Mrs Kawakami:

'You know, Obasan, you really must think seriously about accepting this offer and moving elsewhere now. It's a great opportunity.'

'But I've been here so long,' she said, and waved a hand to clear the smoke from her cigarette.

'You could open a fine new place, Obasan. In the Kitabashi district, or even in Honcho. You can be sure I'll drop in whenever I'm passing by.'

Mrs Kawakami was quiet for a moment, as though listening for something amidst the sounds the workmen were making outside. Then a smile spread over her face and she said: 'This was such a splendid district once. You remember, Sensei?'

I returned her smile, but did not say anything. Of course, the old district had been fine. We had all enjoyed ourselves and the spirit that had pervaded the bantering and those arguments had never been less than sincere. But then perhaps that same spirit had not always been for the best. Like many things now, it is perhaps as well that that little world has passed away and will not be returning. I was tempted to say as much to Mrs Kawakami that evening, but decided it would be tactless to do so. For clearly, the old district was dear to her heart - much of her life and energy had been invested in it - and one can surely understand her reluctance to accept it has gone for ever.

NOVEMBER, 1949

My recollection of the first time I ever met Dr Saito remains quite vivid, and I am thus confident enough of its accuracy. It must have been all of sixteen years ago now, on the day after I moved into my house. I recall it being a bright summer's day, and I was outside adjusting the fence, or perhaps fixing something to the gateway, and exchanging greetings with those of my new neighbours who passed by. Then at one point, after my back had been turned to the path for some time, I became aware that someone was standing behind me, apparently to watch me work. I turned to find a man of around my own age studying with interest my newly inscribed name on the gatepost.

‘So you are Mr Ono,’ he remarked. ‘Well now, this is a real honour. A real honour to have someone of your stature here in our neighbourhood. I am myself, you see, involved in the world of fine art. My name is Saito, from the Imperial City University.’

‘Dr Saito? Why, this is a great privilege. I have heard much about you, sir.’

I believe we went on talking for several moments there outside my gateway, and I am sure I am not mistaken in recalling that Dr Saito, on that same occasion, made several more references to my work and career. And before he went on his way down the hill, I remember his repeating words to the effect of: ‘A great honour to have an artist of your stature in our neighbourhood, Mr Ono.’

Thereafter, Dr Saito and I always greeted each other respectfully whenever we chanced to meet. It is true, I suppose, that after that initial encounter - until recent events gave us cause for greater intimacy - we rarely stopped for prolonged conversations. But my memory of that first meeting, and of Dr Saito recognizing my name on the gatepost, is sufficiently clear for me to assert with some confidence that my elder daughter, Setsuko, was quite mistaken in at least some of the things she tried to imply last month. It is hardly possible, for instance, that Dr Saito had no idea who I was until the marriage negotiations last year obliged him to find out.

Because her visit this year was so brief, and because she spent it staying at Noriko and Taro's new home in the Izumimachi district, my walk with Setsuko that morning through Kawabe Park was really my only chance to speak properly with her. It is not surprising then that I should be turning that conversation over in my mind for some time afterwards, and I do not think it unreasonable that I now find myself becoming increasingly irritated by certain things she said to me that day.

At the time, however, I could not have been dwelling too deeply on Setsuko's words, for I recall being in a good enough mood, happy to be in my daughter's company again, and enjoying walking through Kawabe Park, which I had not done for a while. This was just over a month ago, when as you will recall, the days were still sunny, though the leaves were already falling. Setsuko and I were making our way down the wide avenue of trees that runs through the middle of the park, and because we were well ahead of the time we had agreed to meet Noriko and Ichiro beside the statue of the Emperor Taisho, we were walking at an easy pace, stopping every now and then to admire the autumn scenery.

Perhaps you will agree with me that Kawabe Park is the most rewarding of the city parks; certainly after one has been walking around those crowded little streets of the Kawabe district for a time, it is most refreshing to find oneself in one of those spacious long avenues hung over with trees. But if you are new to this city, and unfamiliar with the history of Kawabe Park, I should perhaps explain here why the park has always held a special interest for me.

Here and there around the park, you will no doubt recall passing certain isolated patches of grass, none larger than a school yard, visible through the trees as you walk down any of those avenues. It is as though those who planned the park had become confused and abandoned some scheme or other half-completed. This, in fact, was more or less the case. Some years ago, Akira Sugimura - he whose house I had bought shortly after his death - had the most ambitious of plans concerning Kawabe Park. I realize Akira Sugimura's name is rarely heard these days, but let me point out that not so long ago he was unquestionably one of the most influential men in the city. At one stage, so I heard, he possessed four houses, and it was hardly possible to walk around this city for long before stumbling across some enterprise or other owned by or connected heavily with Sugimura. Then, around 1920 or 1921, at the peak of his success, Sugimura decided to gamble much of his wealth and capital on a project that would allow him to leave his mark for ever on this city and its people. He planned to convert Kawabe Park - which was then a rather drab neglected place - into the focus of the city's culture. Not only would the grounds be enlarged to contain more natural areas for people to relax, the park was to become the site for several glittering cultural centres - a museum of natural science; a new kabuki theatre for the Takahashi school, who had recently lost their venue in Shirahama Street through fire; a European-style concert hall; and also, somewhat eccentrically, a cemetery for the city's cats and dogs. I cannot remember what else he planned, but there was no mistaking the sweeping ambition of the scheme. Sugimura hoped not only to transform the Kawabe district, but the whole cultural balance of the city, bringing a new emphasis to the northern side of the river. It was, as I have said, nothing less than the attempt of one man to stamp his mark for ever on the character of the city.

Work on the park was well underway, it seems, when the scheme ran into terrible financial difficulties. I am not clear on the details of the affair, but the result was that Sugimura's 'cultural centres' were never built. Sugimura himself lost a great deal of money and never again regained his old influence. After the war, Kawabe Park came under the direct control of the city authorities who built the avenues of trees. All that remain today of Sugimura's schemes are those oddly empty patches of grass where his museums and theatres would have stood.

I may have said before that my dealings with Sugimura's family after his death - on the occasion of my buying the last of his houses - were not of the kind to make me particularly well disposed to the man's memory. Nevertheless, whenever I find myself wandering around Kawabe Park these days, I start to think of Sugimura and his schemes, and I confess I am beginning to feel a certain admiration for the man. For indeed, a man who aspires to rise above the mediocre, to be something more than ordinary, surely deserves admiration, even if in the end he fails and loses a fortune on account of his ambitions. It is my belief, furthermore, that Sugimura did not die an unhappy man. For his failure was quite unlike the undignified failures of most ordinary lives, and a man like Sugimura would have known this. If one has failed only where others have not had the courage or will to try, there is a consolation - indeed, a deep satisfaction - to be gained from this observation when looking back over one's life.

But it was not my intention to dwell on Sugimura. As I say, I was by and large enjoying my walk through Kawabe Park with Setsuko that day, notwithstanding certain of her remarks - whose significance I did not fully grasp until I reflected on them some time later. In any case, our conversation was brought to an end by the fact that in the middle of our path only a short distance ahead loomed the statue of the Emperor Taisho where we had arranged to meet Noriko and Ichiro. I was casting my gaze towards the benches that circled the statue when I heard a boy's voice shout: 'There's Oji!'

Ichiro came running towards me, his arms outstretched as though to anticipate an embrace. But then as he reached me, he appeared to check himself, and fixing a solemn expression on his face, held out his hand to be shaken.

‘Good day,’ he said, in a businesslike manner.

‘Well, Ichiro, you’re indeed growing into a man. How old are you now?’

‘I believe I’m eight. Please come this way, Oji. I have a few things to discuss with you.’

His mother and I followed him to the bench where Noriko was waiting. My younger daughter was wearing a bright dress I had never seen before.

‘You’re looking very cheerful, Noriko,’ I said to her.

‘It seems when a daughter leaves home, she immediately begins to get unrecognizable.’

‘There’s no need for a woman to dress drably simply because she marries,’ Noriko said quickly, but she seemed pleased by my compliment none the less.

As I recall, we all sat down for a while beneath the Emperor Taisho and conversed for a while. The reason for our meeting in the park was that my two daughters had wished to spend some time together shopping for fabrics, and I had thus agreed to take Ichiro to lunch at a department store, then spend the afternoon showing him the city centre. Ichiro was impatient to leave, and continued to nudge my arm as we sat talking, saying:

‘Oji, let the women chatter between themselves. We have things to attend to.’

My grandson and I found ourselves at the department store slightly after the usual time for lunch, and the restaurant floor was no longer crowded. Ichiro took his time choosing between the various dishes displayed in the cabinets, at one point, turning to me and saying:

‘Oji, you guess what my favourite food is now.’

‘Hmm. I don’t know, Ichiro. Hot-cake? Ice-cream?’

‘Spinach! Spinach gives you strength!’ He puffed out his chest and flexed his biceps.

‘I see. Well now, the Junior Lunch here has some spinach.’

‘Junior Lunch is for small children.’

‘That may be so, but it’s very nice. Oji may order one for himself.’

‘All right. I’ll have Junior Lunch too. To keep Oji company. But tell the man to give me lots of spinach.’

‘Very well, Ichiro.’

‘Oji, you’re to eat spinach as often as possible. It gives you strength.’

Ichiro chose for us one of the tables beside the row of wide windows, and while waiting for our lunch, continued to place his face against the glass to observe the busy main street four storeys below. I had not seen Ichiro since Setsuko’s visit to my home over a year ago – he had not been present at Noriko’s wedding on account of a virus – and I was struck by how much he had grown in that time. Not only was he significantly taller, his whole manner had become calmer and less childlike. His eyes in particular seemed to have a much older gaze.

In fact, as I watched Ichiro that day, pressing his face against the glass to see the street below, I could see how much he was coming to resemble his father. There were traces of Setsuko too, but these were to be found mainly in his mannerisms and little facial habits. And of course, I was struck yet again by the similarity Ichiro bore to how my own son, Kenji, had been at that age. I confess I take a strange comfort from observing children inherit these resemblances from other members of the family, and it is my hope that my grandson will retain them into his adult years.

Of course, it is not only when we are children that we are open to these small inheritances; a teacher or mentor whom one admires greatly in early adulthood will leave his mark, and indeed, long after one has come to re-evaluate, perhaps even reject, the bulk of that man's teachings, certain traits will tend to survive, like some shadow of that influence, to remain with one throughout one's life. I am aware, for instance, that certain of my mannerisms - the way I poise my hand when I am explaining something, certain inflexions in my voice when I am trying to convey irony or impatience, even whole phrases I am fond of using that people have come to think of as my own - I am aware these are all traits I originally acquired from Mori-san, my former teacher. And perhaps I will not be flattering myself unduly were I to suppose many of my own pupils will in turn have gained such small inheritances from me. I would hope, furthermore, that in spite of any reassessments they may have come to make concerning those years under my supervision, most of them will have remained grateful for much of what they learnt. Certainly, for my own part, whatever the obvious shortcomings of my former teacher, Seiji Moriyama, or 'Mori-san' as we always called him, whatever occurred between us in the end, I would always acknowledge that those seven years I spent living at his family villa out in the hilly countryside of the Wakaba prefecture were some of the most crucial to my career.

When I try today to summon a picture of Mori-san's villa, I tend to recall one particularly satisfying view of it from up on the mountain path leading to the nearest village. As one climbed that path, the villa would appear down in the hollow below, a dark wooden rectangle set amidst the tall cedar trees. The three long sections of the villa linked to form three sides of the rectangle around a central yard; the fourth side was completed by a cedar fence and gateway, so that the yard was entirely enclosed, and one could imagine how in olden times, it would have been no easy task for hostile visitors to gain entry once that heavy gate had swung shut.

A modern intruder, however, would have found little such difficulty. For though one would have been unable to see this from up on that path, Mori-san's villa was in a state of considerable dilapidation. From up on that path, one would not have guessed how the interiors of the building comprised room after room of torn papering, of tatami floors so worn that in several places there was a danger of falling right through if one trod carelessly. In fact, when I try to recall a picture of the villa seen at closer quarters, what comes to me is an impression of broken roof tiles, decaying latticework, chipped and rotting verandas. Those roofs were forever developing new leaks and after a night of rain, the smell of damp wood and mouldering leaves would pervade every room. And there were those months when insects and moths would invade in such numbers, clinging everywhere to the woodwork, burrowing into every crevice, so that one feared they would cause the place to collapse once and for all.

Of all those rooms, only two or three were in a condition to suggest the splendour the villa must once have possessed. One such room, which filled with a clear light through much of the day, was reserved for special occasions, and I remember how from time to time Mori-san would summon all his pupils - there were ten of us - into that room whenever he had completed a new painting. I recall how before we stepped inside, each of us would pause at the threshold and gasp in admiration at the picture mounted at the centre of the floor. Mori-san, meanwhile, would be attending to a plant perhaps, or looking out of the window, seemingly oblivious to our arrival. Before long, we would all be seated on the floor around the painting, pointing things out to each other in hushed tones: 'And look at the way Sensei has filled in that corner there. Remarkable!' But no one would actually say:

‘Sensei, what a marvellous painting,’ for it was somehow the convention of these occasions that we behave as though our teacher were not present.

Often a new painting would feature some striking innovation, and a debate of some passion would develop among us. Once, for example, I remember we came into the room to be confronted by a picture of a kneeling woman seen from a peculiarly low point of view – so low that we appeared to be looking up at her from floor level.

‘Clearly,’ I remember someone asserting, ‘the low perspective lends the woman a dignity she would otherwise not have. It is a most astonishing achievement. For in all other respects, she looks a self-pitying sort. It is this tension that gives the painting its subtle power.’

‘This may be so,’ someone else said. ‘The woman may well have a sort of dignity, but that hardly derives from the low viewpoint. It seems clear that Sensei is telling us something much more pertinent. He is saying that the perspective appears low only because we have become so attuned to a particular eye level. It is clearly Sensei’s desire to liberate us from such arbitrary and confining habits. He’s saying to us, “there’s no need to always see things from the usual tired angles”. This is why this painting is so inspiring.’

Soon we were all shouting and contradicting each other with our theories about Mori-san’s intentions. And although as we argued, we continually stole glances towards our teacher, he gave no indication as to which of our theories he approved of. I recall him simply standing there at the far end of the room, his arms folded, gazing out across the yard through the wood-lattice bars of the window, an amused look on his face. Then, after he had listened to us argue for some time, he turned and said: ‘Perhaps you’d all leave me now. There are certain matters I wish to attend to.’ At which we all filed out of the room, once more muttering our admiration for the new painting.

As I recount this I am aware that Mori-san's behaviour may strike you as somewhat arrogant. But it is perhaps easier to understand the aloofness he displayed on such occasions if one has oneself been in a position in which one is constantly looked up to and admired. For it is by no means desirable that one be always instructing and pronouncing to one's pupils; there are many situations when it is preferable to remain silent so as to allow them the chance to debate and ponder. As I say, anyone who has been in a position of large influence will appreciate this.

The effect was, in any case, that arguments about our teacher's work could go on for weeks on end. In the continued absence of any explication from Mori-san himself, the tendency was for us to look to one of our number, an artist called Sasaki, who at that point enjoyed the status of being Mori-san's leading pupil. Although as I have said, some arguments could go on a long time, once Sasaki finally made up his mind on a matter, that would usually mark the end of the dispute. Similarly, if Sasaki were to suggest a person's painting was in any way 'disloyal' to our teacher, this would almost always lead to immediate capitulation on the part of the offender - who would then abandon the painting, or in some cases, burn it along with the refuse.

In fact, as I recall, the Tortoise, for several months after our arrival together at the villa, was repeatedly destroying his work under such circumstances. For while I was able to settle easily enough into the way of things there, my companion would again and again produce work displaying elements clearly contrary to our teacher's principles, and I remember many times pleading to my new colleagues on his behalf, explaining that he was not intentionally being disloyal to Mori-san. Often during those early days, the Tortoise would approach me with a distressed air and lead me off to see some half-completed work of his, saying in a low voice: 'Ono-san, please tell me, is this as our teacher would do it?'

And at times, even I became exasperated to discover he had unwittingly employed yet some other obviously offensive element. For it was not as though Mori-san's priorities were at all hard to grasp. The label, 'the modern Utamaro', was often applied to our teacher in those days, and although this was a title conferred all too readily then on any competent artist who specialized in portraying pleasure district women, it tends to sum up Mori-san's concerns rather well. For Mori-san was consciously trying to 'modernize' the Utamaro tradition; in many of his most notable paintings - 'Tying a Dance Drum', say, or 'After a Bath' - the woman is seen from the back in classic Utamaro fashion. Various other such classic features recur in his work: the woman holding a towel to her face, the woman combing out her long hair. And Mori-san made extensive use of the traditional device of expressing emotion through the textiles which the woman holds or wears rather than through the look on her face. But at the same time, his work was full of European influences, which the more staunch admirers of Utamaro would have regarded as iconoclastic; he had, for instance, long abandoned the use of the traditional dark outline to define his shapes, preferring instead the Western use of blocks of colour, with light and shade to create a three-dimensional appearance. And no doubt, he had taken his cue from the Europeans in what was his most central concern: the use of subdued colours. Mori-san's wish was to evoke a certain melancholy, nocturnal atmosphere around his women, and throughout the years I studied under him, he experimented extensively with colours in an attempt to capture the feel of lantern light. Because of this, it was something of a hallmark of Mori-san's work that a lantern would always figure somewhere in the picture, by implication if not in actuality. It was perhaps typical of the Tortoise's slowness in grasping the essentials of Mori-san's art that even after a year at the villa, he was using colours that created quite the wrong effect, then wondering why he was again being accused of disloyalty when he had remembered to include a lantern in his composition.

For all my pleadings, the likes of Sasaki had little patience for the Tortoise's difficulties and at times the atmosphere threatened to become as hostile for my companion as any he had experienced at Master Takeda's firm. And then - I believe it was some time during our second year at the villa - a change came over Sasaki, a change that was to lead to his suffering hostility of an altogether harsher and darker nature than anything he had ever orchestrated against the Tortoise.

One supposes all groups of pupils tend to have a leader figure - someone whose abilities the teacher has singled out as an example for the others to follow. And it is this leading pupil, by virtue of his having the strongest grasp of his teacher's ideas, who will tend to function, as did Sasaki, as the main interpreter of those ideas to the less able or less experienced pupils. But by the same token, it is this same leading pupil who is most likely to see shortcomings in the teacher's work, or else develop views of his own divergent from those of his teacher. In theory, of course, a good teacher should accept this tendency - indeed, welcome it as a sign that he has brought his pupil to a point of maturity. In practice, however, the emotions involved can be quite complicated. Sometimes, when one has nurtured a gifted pupil long and hard, it is difficult to see any such maturing of talent as anything other than treachery, and some regrettable situations are apt to arise.

Certainly, what we did to Sasaki following his dispute with our teacher was quite unwarranted, and there seems little to be gained in my recalling such things here. I do, however, have some vivid recollections of that night when Sasaki finally left us.

Most of us had already turned in. I was myself lying awake in the darkness in one of those dilapidated rooms, when I heard Sasaki's voice calling to someone a little way down the veranda. He seemed to receive no answer from whoever it was he was addressing, and eventually there came the sounds of a screen sliding shut and Sasaki's footsteps coming nearer. I heard him stop at another room and say something, but again he seemed to be met only with silence. His footsteps came still closer, then I heard him slide open the screen of the room next to mine.

'You and I have been good friends for many years,' I heard him say. 'Won't you at least speak to me?'

There was no response from the person he had addressed. Then Sasaki said:

'Won't you just tell me where the paintings are?'

There was still no response. But as I lay there in the darkness, I could hear the sound of rats scuttling under the floorboards of that neighbouring room, and it seemed to me this noise was some sort of reply.

'If you find them so offensive,' Sasaki's voice continued, 'there's no sense in your keeping them. But they happen to mean a great deal to me at this moment. I wish to take them with me, wherever it is I'm going. I've nothing else to take with me.'

Again, there came the scuttling noise of rats in reply, then a long silence. Indeed, the silence went on for so long, I thought perhaps Sasaki had walked off into the darkness and I had failed to hear him. But then I heard him say again:

'These past few days, the others have done some terrible things to me. But what has hurt me the most has been your refusal to give me even one word of comfort.'

There was another silence. Then Sasaki said: 'Won't you even look at me now and wish me well?'

Eventually, I heard the screen slide shut, and the sounds of Sasaki stepping down from the veranda and walking away across the yard.

After his departure, Sasaki was hardly mentioned at the villa and on the few occasions he was, he tended to be referred to simply as 'the traitor'. Indeed, I am reminded of just how much Sasaki's memory was prone to cause offence amongst us when I recall what occurred once or twice during those slanging contests we often indulged in.

On warmer days, because we tended to leave the screens of our rooms wide open, several of us congregating in a room might catch sight of another group similarly gathered on the opposite wing. This situation would soon lead to someone calling out across the yard a witty provocation, and before long, both groups would be assembled out on their respective verandas, shouting insults across at each other. This behaviour may sound absurd when I recount it, but there was something about the architecture of the villa and the echoing acoustics it produced when one shouted from one wing to another, that somehow encouraged us to indulge in these childish contests. The insults could be far-ranging - making fun of someone's manly prowess, say, or of a painting someone had just completed - but for the most part were devoid of any intent to wound, and I recall many highly amusing exchanges which had both sides red with laughter. Indeed, by and large, my memories of these exchanges sum up well enough the competitive yet family-like intimacy we enjoyed during those years at the villa. And yet, when once or twice Sasaki's name was invoked during the course of these insults, things suddenly got out of hand, with colleagues abandoning boundaries and actually scrapping in the yard. It did not take us long to learn that to compare someone to 'the traitor', even in fun, was never likely to be received in good humour.

You may gather from such recollections that our devotion to our teacher and to his principles was fierce and total.

And it is easy with hindsight - once the shortcomings of an influence have become obvious - to be critical of a teacher who fosters such a climate. But then again, anyone who has held ambitions on a grand scale, anyone who has been in a position to achieve something large and has felt the need to impart his ideas as thoroughly as possible, will have some sympathy for the way Mori-san conducted things. For though it may seem a little foolish now in the light of what became of his career, it was Mori-san's wish at that time to do nothing less than change fundamentally the identity of painting as practised in our city. It was with no less a goal in mind that he devoted so much of his time and wealth to the nurturing of pupils, and it is perhaps important to remember this when making judgements concerning my former teacher.

His influence over us was not, of course, confined merely to the realms of painting. We lived throughout those years almost entirely in accordance with his values and lifestyle, and this entailed spending much time exploring the city's 'floating world' - the night-time world of pleasure, entertainment and drink which formed the backdrop for all our paintings. I always feel a certain nostalgia now in recalling the city centre as it was in those days; the streets were not so filled with the noise of traffic, and the factories had yet to take the fragrance of seasonal blossoms from the night air. A favourite haunt of ours was a small teahouse beside the canal in Kojima Street called 'Water Lanterns' - for indeed, the lanterns of the establishment could be seen reflected in the canal as one approached. The proprietress was an old friend of Mori-san's, which ensured we always received generous treatment, and I recall some memorable nights there, singing and drinking with our hostesses. Our other regular haunt was an archery parlour in Nagata Street, where the proprietress never tired of reminding us how years before, when she had been working as a geisha in Akihara, Mori-san had used her as a model for a series of wood-block prints which had proved immensely popular. Some six or seven young women hosted that archery parlour and after a while we each had our own favourites with whom to exchange pipes and pass away the night.

Neither was our merrymaking limited to these expeditions into the city. Mori-san seemed to have a never-ending line of acquaintances from the world of entertaining, and impoverished troupes of wandering actors, dancers and musicians were forever arriving at the villa to be greeted as long-lost friends. Large quantities of liquor would then be produced, our visitors would sing and dance through the night, and before long someone would have to be sent out to awaken the wine seller at the nearest village for replenishments. One regular visitor of those days was a story-teller called Maki, a fat jolly man who could reduce us all to helpless laughter one moment and tears of sadness the next with his renderings of the old tales. Years later, I came across Maki a few times at the Migi-Hidari, and we would reminisce with some amazement about those nights at the villa. Maki was convinced he remembered many of those parties continuing straight through one night, through the following day and into a second night. Although I could not be so certain of this, I had to admit to recollections of Mori-san's villa in the daytime, littered everywhere with sleeping or exhausted bodies, some of them collapsed out in the yard with the sun beating down on them.

I have, however, a more vivid memory concerning one such night. I can recall walking alone across the central yard, grateful for the fresh night air, having for a moment escaped the revellings. I remember I walked over to the entrance of the storeroom, and before going in, glanced back across the yard towards the room where my companions and our visitors were entertaining each other. I could see numerous silhouettes dancing behind the paper screens, and a singer's voice came drifting out through the night to me.

I had made my way to the storeroom because it was one of the few places in the villa where there was a chance of remaining undisturbed for any length of time. I imagine in days gone by, when the villa had housed guards and retainers, the room had been used for storing weapons and armour. But when I stepped inside that night and lit the lantern hanging above the door, I found the floor so cluttered with every sort of object it was impossible to cross it without hopping from space to space; everywhere were stacks of old canvasses tied together with rope, broken easels, all manner of pots and jars with brushes or sticks protruding. I negotiated my way to a clearing on the floor and sat down. The lantern above the door, I noticed, was causing the objects around me to throw exaggerated shadows; it was an eerie effect, as though I were sitting in some grotesque miniature cemetery.

I suppose I must have become quite lost in my broodings, for I recall being startled by the sound of the storeroom door sliding open. I looked up to see Mori-san in the doorway and said hurriedly: 'Good evening, Sensei.'

Possibly the lantern above the door did not give sufficient light to illuminate my part of the room, or perhaps it was simply that my face was in shadow. In any case, Mori-san peered forward and asked:

'Who is that? Ono?'

'Indeed, Sensei.'

He continued to peer forward for a moment. Then, taking the lantern down from the beam and holding it out before him, he began to make his way towards me, stepping carefully through the objects on the floor. As he did so, the lantern in his hand caused shadows to move all around us. I hastened to clear a space for him, but before I could do so, Mori-san had seated himself a little way away on an old wooden chest. He gave a sigh and said:

'I stepped out for a little fresh air, and I saw this light on in here. Darkness everywhere, except this one light. And I thought to myself, now that storeroom's hardly a place for lovers to be hiding away. Whoever's in there must be in a lonely mood. '

'I suppose I must have been sitting here in a dream, Sensei. I had no intention of remaining here so long. '

He had placed the lantern on the floor beside him, so that from where I sat, I could see only his silhouette. 'One of those dancing girls appeared very taken with you earlier,' he said. 'She'll be disappointed to find you've vanished now the night's here. '

'I didn't mean to appear rude to our guests, Sensei. Like yourself, I simply came out for some fresh air. '

We were silent for a moment. Across the yard, our companions could be heard singing and clapping their hands in time.

'Well, Ono,' Mori-san said eventually, 'what do you make of my old friend Gisaburo? Quite a character. '

'Indeed, Sensei. He seems a most affable gentleman. '

'He may be dressed in rags these days, but he was once quite a celebrity. And as he showed us tonight, he still has much of his old skill left. '

'Indeed. '

'So then, Ono. What is it that worries you? '

'Worries me, Sensei? Why, nothing at all. '

'Can it be that you find something a little offensive about old Gisaburo? '

'Not at all, Sensei.' I laughed self-consciously. 'Why, not at all. A most charming gentleman. '

For a little time after that, we talked of other matters, of anything which came to mind. But when Mori-san had turned the conversation back once more to my 'worries', when it became clear he was prepared to sit there waiting until I unburdened myself, I finally said:

‘Gisaburo-san does indeed appear to be the most good-hearted gentleman. He and his dancers have been most kind to entertain us. But then I cannot help thinking, Sensei, we have been visited by their like so often these past few months.’

Mori-san gave no reply, so I continued:

‘Forgive me, Sensei, I mean no disrespect to Gisaburo-san and his friends. But at times I am a little puzzled. I am puzzled that we artists should be devoting so much of our time enjoying the company of those like Gisaburo-san.’

I believe it was around this point that my teacher rose to his feet and, lantern in hand, made his way across the floor towards the back wall of the storeroom. The wall had previously been in darkness, but as he held the lantern up to it, three wood-block prints, hung one below the other, became sharply illuminated. Each of these portrayed a geisha adjusting her coiffure, each seated on the floor and viewed from the back. Mori-san studied the pictures for a few moments, moving the lantern from one to the next. Then he shook his head and muttered to himself: ‘Fatally flawed. Fatally flawed by trivial concerns.’ A few seconds later, he added without turning from the pictures: ‘But one always feels affection for one’s early works. Perhaps you’ll feel the same one day for the work you’ve done here.’ Then he shook his head again, saying: ‘But these are all fatally flawed, Ono.’

‘I cannot agree, Sensei,’ I said. ‘I think those prints are marvellous examples of how an artist’s talent can transcend the limitations of a particular style. I’ve often thought it a great shame Sensei’s early prints should be confined to such rooms as these. Surely they should be open to display along with his paintings.’

Mori-san remained absorbed by his pictures. 'Fatally flawed,' he repeated. 'But I suppose I was very young.' He moved his lantern again, causing one picture to fade into shadow and another to appear. Then he said: 'These are all scenes from a certain geisha house in Honcho. A very well-regarded one in my younger days. Gisaburo and I often used to visit such places together.' Then after a moment or two, he said again: 'These are fatally flawed, Ono.'

'But Sensei, I cannot see what faults even the most discerning eye would see in these prints.'

He continued to study the pictures for a few moments more, then began to come back across the room. It seemed to me that he took an inordinate amount of time negotiating his way through the objects on the floor; at times, I would hear him mumbling to himself and the sound of his feet pushing away a jar or box. Indeed, I once or twice thought Mori-san was actually searching for something - perhaps more of his early prints - amidst the chaotic piles, but eventually he seated himself back on the old wooden chest and drew a sigh. After a few further moments of silence, he said:

'Gisaburo is an unhappy man. He's had a sad life. His talent has gone to ruin. Those he once loved have long since died or deserted him. Even in our younger days, he was already a lonely, sad character.' Mori-san paused a moment. Then he went on: 'But then sometimes we used to drink and enjoy ourselves with the women of the pleasure quarters, and Gisaburo would become happy. Those women would tell him all the things he wanted to hear, and for the night anyway, he'd be able to believe them. Once the morning came, of course, he was too intelligent a man to go on believing such things. But Gisaburo didn't value those nights any the less for that. The best things, he always used to say, are put together of a night and vanish with the morning. What people call the floating world, Ono, was a world Gisaburo knew how to value.'

Mori-san paused again. As before, I could see his form only in silhouette, but it was my impression he was listening to the sounds of the merrymaking from across the yard. Then he said: 'He's older and sadder now, but he's changed little in many respects. Tonight he's happy, just as he used to be in those pleasure houses.' He drew a long breath, as though he were smoking tobacco. Then he went on: 'The finest, most fragile beauty an artist can hope to capture drifts within those pleasure houses after dark. And on nights like these, Ono, some of that beauty drifts into our own quarters here. But as for those pictures up there, they don't even hint at these transitory, illusory qualities. They're deeply flawed, Ono.'

'But Sensei, to my eyes, those prints suggest most impressively these very things.'

'I was very young when I prepared those prints. I suspect the reason I couldn't celebrate the floating world was that I couldn't bring myself to believe in its worth. Young men are often guilt-ridden about pleasure, and I suppose I was no different. I suppose I thought that to pass away one's time in such places, to spend one's skills celebrating things so intangible and transient, I suppose I thought it all rather wasteful, all rather decadent. It's hard to appreciate the beauty of a world when one doubts its very validity.'

I thought about this, then said: 'Indeed, Sensei, I admit what you say may well apply in respect to my own work. I will do all I can to put matters right.'

Mori-san appeared not to hear me. 'But I've long since lost all such doubts, Ono,' he continued. 'When I am an old man, when I look back over my life and see I have devoted it to the task of capturing the unique beauty of that world, I believe I will be well satisfied. And no man will make me believe I've wasted my time.'

It is possible, of course, that Mori-san did not use those exact words. Indeed, on reflection, such phrases sound rather more like the sort of thing I myself would declare to my own pupils after we had been drinking a little at the Migi-Hidari. 'As the new generation of Japanese artists, you have a great responsibility towards the culture of this nation. I am proud to have the likes of you as my pupils. And while I may deserve only the smallest praise for my own paintings, when I come to look back over my life and remember I have nurtured and assisted the careers of all of you here, why then no man will make me believe I have wasted my time.' And whenever I made some such statement, all those young men congregated around the table would drown each other out in protest at the way I had dismissed my own paintings - which, they clamoured to inform me, were without doubt great works assured of their place in posterity. But then again, as I have said, many phrases and expressions which came to be most characteristic of me I actually inherited from Mori-san, and so it is quite possible that those were my teacher's exact words that night, instilled in me by the powerful impression they made on me at the time.

But again I have drifted. I was trying to recall the lunch I had at the department store with my grandson last month following that annoying conversation with Setsuko in Kawabe Park. In fact, I believe I was remembering in particular Ichiro's extolling of spinach.

Once our lunch had arrived, I recall, Ichiro sat there preoccupied with the spinach on his plate, sometimes prodding at it with his spoon. Then he looked up and said: 'Oji, you watch!'

My grandson proceeded to pile as much spinach as possible on to the spoon, then raised it high into the air and began pouring it into his mouth. His method resembled someone drinking the last dregs from a bottle.

‘Ichiro,’ I said, ‘I’m not sure that’s such good manners.’

But my grandson continued putting more spinach into his mouth, all the time chewing vigorously. He put down his spoon only when it was empty and his cheeks were full to bursting. Then, still chewing, he fixed a stern expression on his face, thrust out his chest and began punching at the air around him.

‘What are you doing, Ichiro? You tell me now what you’re up to.’

‘You guess, Oji!’ he said, through the spinach.

‘Hmm. I don’t know, Ichiro. A man drinking sake and fighting. No? Then you tell me. Oji can’t guess.’

‘Popeye Sailor!’

‘What’s that, Ichiro? Another of your heroes?’

‘Popeye Sailor eats spinach. Spinach makes him strong.’ He thrust out his chest again and threw more punches at the air.

‘I see, Ichiro,’ I said, laughing. ‘Spinach is a wonderful food indeed.’

‘Does sake make you strong?’

I smiled and shook my head. ‘Sake can make you believe you’re strong. But in reality, Ichiro, you’re no stronger than before you drank it.’

‘Why do men drink sake then, Oji?’

‘I don’t know, Ichiro. Perhaps because for a little while, they can believe they’re stronger. But sake doesn’t really make a man stronger.’

‘Spinach makes you really strong.’

‘Then spinach is much better than sake. You go on eating spinach, Ichiro. But look, what about all these other things on your plate?'

'I like drinking sake too. And whisky. At home, there's a bar I always go to.'

'Is that so, Ichiro. I think it's better you go on eating spinach. As you say, that makes you really strong.'

'I like sake best. I drink ten bottles every night. Then I drink ten bottles of whisky.'

'Is that so, Ichiro. Now that's real drinking indeed. This must be a real headache for Mother.'

'Women never understand about us men drinking,' Ichiro said, and turned his attention to the lunch in front of him. But soon he looked up again and said: 'Oji's coming for supper tonight.'

'That's right, Ichiro. I expect Aunt Noriko will prepare something very nice.'

'Aunt Noriko's bought some sake. She said Oji and Uncle Taro will drink it all up.'

'Well, we may do indeed. I'm sure the women will like a little too. But she's right, Ichiro. Sake's mainly for the men.'

'Oji, what happens if women drink sake?'

'Hmm. There's no telling. Women aren't as strong as we men are, Ichiro. So perhaps they'll get drunk very quickly.'

'Aunt Noriko might get drunk! She might have a tiny cupful and get completely drunk!'

I gave a laugh. 'Yes, that's quite possible.'

'Aunt Noriko might get completely drunk! She'll sing songs then fall asleep at the table!'

'Well, Ichiro,' I said, still laughing, 'we men had better keep the sake to ourselves then, hadn't we?'

‘Men are stronger, so we can drink more.’

‘That’s right, Ichiro. We’d best keep the sake to ourselves.’

Then, after I had thought for a moment, I added: ‘I suppose you’re eight years old now, Ichiro. You’re growing to be a big man. Who knows? Perhaps Oji will see to it you get some sake tonight.’

My grandson looked at me with a slightly threatened expression, and said nothing. I smiled at him, then glanced out at the pale grey sky through the large windows beside us.

‘You never met your Uncle Kenji, Ichiro. When he was your age, he was as big and strong as you are now. I remember he had his first taste of sake at around your age. I’ll see to it, Ichiro, you get a small taste tonight.’

Ichiro seemed to consider this for a moment. Then he said:

‘Mother might be trouble.’

‘Don’t worry about your mother, Ichiro. Your Oji will be able to handle her.’

Ichiro shook his head wearily. ‘Women never understand men drinking,’ he remarked.

‘Well, it’s time a man like you tasted a little sake. Don’t you worry, Ichiro, you leave your mother to Oji. We can’t have the women bossing us around now, can we?’

My grandson remained absorbed in his thoughts for a moment. Then suddenly he said very loudly:

‘Aunt Noriko might get drunk!’

I laughed. ‘We’ll see, Ichiro,’ I said.

‘Aunt Noriko might get completely drunk!’

It was perhaps fifteen minutes or so later, as we were waiting for ice-cream, that Ichiro asked in a thoughtful voice.

‘Oji, did you know Yujiro Naguchi?’

‘You must mean Yukio Naguchi, Ichiro. No, I never knew him personally.’

My grandson did not respond, apparently absorbed by his reflection in the glass pane beside him.

‘Your mother,’ I went on, ‘also seemed to have Mr Naguchi on her mind when I was speaking with her in the park this morning. I take it the adults were discussing him at supper last night, were they?’

For a moment, Ichiro went on gazing at his reflection. Then he turned to me and asked:

‘Was Mr Naguchi like Oji?’

‘Was Mr Naguchi like me? Well, your mother for one doesn’t seem to think so. It was just something I said to your Uncle Taro once, Ichiro, it was nothing very serious. Your mother seems to have picked it up far too earnestly. I hardly remember what I was talking to Uncle Taro about at the time, but Oji just happened to suggest he had one or two things in common with people like Mr Naguchi. Now you tell me, Ichiro, what were the adults all saying last night?’

‘Oji, why did Mr Naguchi kill himself?’

‘That’s hard to say for sure, Ichiro. I never knew Mr Naguchi personally.’

‘But was he a bad man?’

‘No. He wasn’t a bad man. He was just someone who worked very hard doing what he thought was for the best. But you see, Ichiro, when the war ended, things were very different. The songs Mr Naguchi composed had become very famous, not just in this city, but all over Japan. They were sung on the radio and in bars. And the likes of your Uncle Kenji sang them when they were marching or before a battle. And after the war, Mr Naguchi thought his songs had been - well - a sort of mistake. He thought of all the people who had been killed, all the little boys your age, Ichiro, who no longer had parents, he thought of all these things and he thought perhaps his songs were a mistake. And he felt he should apologize. To everyone who was left. To little boys who no longer had parents. And to parents who had lost little boys like you. To all these people, he wanted to say sorry. I think that's why he killed himself. Mr Naguchi wasn't a bad man at all, Ichiro. He was brave to admit the mistakes he'd made. He was very brave and honourable.'

Ichiro was watching me with a thoughtful expression. I gave a laugh and said: 'What's the matter, Ichiro?'

My grandson seemed about to speak, but then turned again to look at his face reflected in the glass.

'Your Oji never meant anything by saying he was like Mr Naguchi,' I said. 'It was a sort of joke he was making, that's all. You tell your mother that, the next time you hear her talking about Mr Naguchi. Because from what she was saying this morning, she's picked the whole thing up quite wrongly. What's the matter, Ichiro? Suddenly so quiet.'

After lunch we spent some time wandering around shops in the city centre, looking at toys and books. Then, towards the latter part of the afternoon, I treated Ichiro to another ice-cream at one of those smart refectories along Sakurabashi Street, before making our way to Taro and Noriko's new apartment in Izumimachi.

The Izumimachi area, as you may be aware, has now become very popular with young couples from the better backgrounds, and there is certainly a clean, respectable atmosphere there. But most of the newly-built apartment blocks that have drawn these young couples seem to me unimaginative and constrictive. Taro and Noriko's apartment, for instance, is a small two-room affair on the third floor: the ceilings are low, sounds come in from neighbouring apartments and the view from the window is principally of the opposite block and its windows. I am sure it is not simply because I am accustomed to my more spacious, traditional house that even after a short time I begin to find the place claustrophobic. Noriko, however, seems very proud of her apartment, and is forever extolling its 'modern' qualities. It is, apparently, very easy to keep clean, and the ventilation most effective; in particular, the kitchens and bathrooms throughout the block are of Western design and are, so my daughter assures me, infinitely more practical than, say, the arrangements in my own house.

However convenient the kitchen, it is very small, and when I stepped inside it that evening to see how my daughters were progressing with the meal, there seemed no space for me to stand. Because of this, and because my daughters both seemed busy, I did not remain chatting with them long. But I did remark at one point:

'You know, Ichiro was telling me earlier he's keen to taste a little sake.'

Setsuko and Noriko, who had been standing side by side slicing vegetables, both stopped and glanced up at me.

'I gave it some thought and decided we could let him have a small taste,' I went on. 'But perhaps you should dilute it with some water.'

'I'm sorry, Father,' Setsuko said, 'but you're suggesting Ichiro drink sake tonight?'

'Just a little. He's a growing boy after all. But as I say, you'd best dilute it.'

My daughters exchanged glances. Then Noriko said: 'Father, he's only eight years old.'

‘There’s no harm so long as you mix it with water. You women may not understand, but these things mean a great deal to a young boy like Ichiro. It’s a question of pride. He’ll remember it for the rest of his life.’

‘Father, this is nonsense,’ said Noriko. ‘Ichiro would just be sick.’

‘Nonsense or not I’ve thought this over carefully. You women sometimes don’t have enough sympathy for a boy’s pride.’ I pointed to the sake bottle standing on a shelf above their heads. ‘Just a small drop will do.’

With that, I began to leave. But then I heard Noriko say: ‘Setsuko, it’s out of the question. I don’t know what Father can be thinking.’

‘Why all this fuss?’ I said, turning at the doorway. Behind me, from the main room, I could hear Taro and my grandson laughing over something. I lowered my voice and continued:

‘Anyway, I’ve promised him now, he’s looking forward to it. You women sometimes just don’t understand about pride.’

I was making to leave again, when this time it was Setsuko who spoke.

‘It is very kind of Father to consider Ichiro’s feelings so carefully. However, I wonder if it wouldn’t perhaps be best to wait till Ichiro is a little older.’

I gave a small laugh. ‘You know, I remember your mother protesting in just the same way when I decided to let Kenji have a taste of sake at this age. Well, it certainly did your brother no harm.’

I regretted immediately introducing Kenji into such a trivial disagreement. Indeed, I believe I was momentarily quite annoyed with myself, and it is possible I did not pay much attention to what Setsuko said next. In any case, it seems to me she said something like:

‘There is no doubt Father devoted the most careful thought to my brother’s upbringing. Nevertheless, in the light of what came to pass, we can perhaps see that on one or two points at least, Mother may in fact have had the more correct ideas.’

To be fair, it is possible she did not say anything quite so unpleasant. Indeed, it is possible I misinterpreted entirely what she actually said, for I distinctly recall Noriko not reacting at all to her sister’s words other than to turn wearily back to her vegetables. Besides, I would not have thought Setsuko capable of introducing so gratuitously such a note to the conversation. Then again, when I consider the sort of insinuations Setsuko had been making in Kawabe Park earlier that same day, I suppose I have to admit the possibility that she did say something along such lines. In any case, I recall Setsuko concluding by saying:

‘Besides, I fear Suichi would not wish Ichiro to drink sake until he is a little older. But it is most kind of Father to have given such consideration to Ichiro’s feelings.’

Conscious that Ichiro might overhear our conversation, and not wishing to put a cloud over what was a rare family reunion, I let the argument rest there and left the kitchen. For a while after that, as I recall, I sat in the main room with Taro and Ichiro, exchanging enjoyable talk as we awaited supper.

We eventually sat down to eat an hour or so later. As we were doing so, Ichiro reached over to the sake flask on the table, tapped it with his fingers and looked over at me knowingly. I smiled at him, but said nothing.

The women had prepared a splendid meal and the conversation was soon flowing effortlessly. At one point, Taro had us all laughing with the story of a colleague of his at work, who through a mixture of misfortune and his own comical stupidity, had gained a reputation for never meeting deadlines. Once, while relating this story, Taro said:

‘Indeed, things have got to such a state it seems our superiors have taken to calling him “the Tortoise”. During a meeting recently, Mr Hayasaka forgot himself and actually announced: “We’ll hear the Tortoise’s report, then break for lunch.”’

‘Is that so?’ I exclaimed with some surprise. ‘That’s very curious. I myself once had a colleague who had that nickname. For much the same reasons, it would seem.’

But Taro did not seem particularly struck by this coincidence. He nodded politely, and said: ‘I remember at school, too, there was a pupil we all called “the Tortoise”. In fact, just as every group has a natural leader, I suspect every group has its “Tortoise”.’

With that, Taro returned to the relating of his anecdote. Of course, now I come to think of it, I suppose my son-in-law was quite correct; most groups of peers would have their ‘Tortoise’, even if the name itself is not always used. Amongst my own pupils, for instance, it was Shintaro who fulfilled such a role. This is not to deny Shintaro’s basic competence; but when placed alongside the likes of Kuroda, it was as though his talent lacked an entire dimension.

I suppose I do not on the whole greatly admire the Tortoises of this world. While one may appreciate their plodding steadiness and ability to survive, one suspects their lack of frankness, their capacity for treachery. And I suppose, in the end, one despises their unwillingness to take chances in the name of ambition or for the sake of a principle they claim to believe in. Their like will never fall victim to the sort of grand catastrophe that, say, Akira Sugimura suffered over Kawabe Park; but by the same token, notwithstanding the small sorts of respectability they may sometimes achieve as school-teachers or whatever, they will never accomplish anything above the mediocre.

It is true, I grew quite fond of the Tortoise during those years we spent together at Mori-san's villa, but then I do not believe I ever respected him as an equal. This had to do with the very nature of our friendship, which had been forged during the days of the Tortoise's persecution at Master Takeda's firm and then through his difficulties in our early months at the villa; somehow, after a time, it had cemented itself into one in which he was perpetually indebted to me for some undefined 'support' I gave him. Long after he had grasped how to paint without arousing the hostility of the others at the villa, long after he had come to be generally well liked for his pleasant, obliging nature, he was still saying to me things like:

'I'm so grateful to you, Ono-san. It's due to you I'm treated so well here.'

In one sense, of course, the Tortoise was indebted to me; for clearly, without my initiative, he would never have considered leaving Master Takeda's to become Mori-san's pupil. He had been extremely reluctant to take such an adventurous step, but once having been compelled to do so, he had never doubted the decision. Indeed, the Tortoise held Mori-san in such reverence that for a long time - for the first two years at least - I cannot recall his being able to hold a conversation with our teacher, other than to mumble: 'Yes, Sensei' or 'No, Sensei.'

Throughout those years, the Tortoise continued to paint as slowly as he ever did, but it did not occur to anyone to hold this against him. In fact, there were a number of others who worked just as slowly, and this faction actually had a tendency to mock those of us with faster working habits. I remember they labelled us 'the engineers', comparing the intense and frantic way we worked once an idea had struck with an engine driver shovelling on coal for fear the steam would at any moment run out. We in turn named the slow faction 'the backwarders'. A 'backwarder' was originally a term used at the villa for someone who, in a room crowded with people working at easels, insisted on stepping backwards every few minutes to view his canvas - with the result that he continually collided with colleagues working behind him. It was of course quite unfair to suggest that because an artist liked to take time with a painting - stepping back, as it were, metaphorically - he was any more likely to be guilty of this antisocial habit, but then we enjoyed the very provocativeness of the label. Indeed, I recall a lot of good-humoured bantering concerning 'engineers' and 'backwarders' .

In truth, though, just about all of us were prone to be guilty of 'backwarding' , and because of this, we would as far as possible avoid crowding together when working. In the summer months, many of my colleagues would set up easels spaced out at points along the verandas, or else out in the yard itself, while others insisted on reserving large numbers of rooms because they liked to circulate from room to room according to the light. The Tortoise and I always tended to work in the disused kitchen - a large, barn-like annex behind one of the wings.

The floor as one entered was of trodden earth, but towards the back was a raised boarded platform, wide enough for our two easels. The low crossbeams with their hooks - from which once hung pots and other kitchen utensils - and the bamboo racks on the walls, proved most useful for our brushes, rags, paints and so on. And I can recall how the Tortoise and I would fill a large old blackened pot full of water, carry it on to the platform and suspend it on the old pulleys so that it hung at shoulder height between us as we painted.

I remember one afternoon, we were painting in the old kitchen as usual, when the Tortoise said to me:

'I'm very curious, Ono-san, about your present painting. It must be something very special.'

I smiled without taking my eyes from my work. 'Why do you say that? It's just a little experiment of mine, that's all.'

'But Ono-san, it's a long time since I've seen you working with such intensity. And you've requested privacy. You haven't requested privacy now for at least two years. Not since you were preparing "Lion-dance" for your first exhibition.'

I should perhaps explain here that occasionally, whenever an artist felt a particular work would be hampered by comments of any sort before its completion, he would 'request privacy' for that work, and it was then understood that no one would attempt to look at it until such time as the artist withdrew his request. This was a sensible arrangement, living and working as we did so closely, and gave one room to take risks without fear of making a fool of oneself.

'Is it really so noticeable?' I said. 'I thought I was hiding my excitement rather well.'

'You must be forgetting, Ono-san. We've been painting side by side for almost eight years now. Oh yes, I can tell this is something quite special for you.'

'Eight years,' I remarked. 'I suppose that's right.'

'Indeed, Ono-san. And it's been a privilege to work so close to one of your talent. More than a little humbling at times, but a great privilege nonetheless.'

'You exaggerate,' I said, smiling and continuing to paint.

'Not at all, Ono-san. Indeed, I feel I would never have progressed as I have over these years without the constant inspiration of seeing your works appearing before my eyes. No doubt you've noted the extent to which my modest "Autumn Girl" owes itself to your magnificent "Girl at Sunset".

One of many attempts on my part, Ono-san, to emulate your brilliance. A feeble attempt, I realize, but then Mori-san was good enough to praise it as a significant step forward for me.'

'I wonder now.' I ceased my brush strokes for a moment and looked at my work. 'I wonder if this painting here will also inspire you.'

I continued to regard my half-finished painting for a moment, then glanced across to my friend over the ancient pot suspended between us. The Tortoise was painting happily, unaware of my gaze. He had put on a little more flesh since the days I had first known him at Master Takeda's, and the harassed, fearful look of those days had been largely replaced by an air of childlike contentment. In fact, I recall someone around that time comparing the Tortoise to a puppy who had just been petted, and indeed, this description was not inappropriate to the impression I received as I watched him paint that afternoon in the old kitchen.

'Tell me, Tortoise,' I said to him. 'You're quite happy with your work at present, are you?'

'Most happy, thank you, Ono-san,' he replied immediately. Then glancing up, he added hastily with a grin: 'Of course, it has a long way to go before it can stand alongside your work, Ono-san.'

His eyes returned to his painting and I watched him working for a few more moments. Then I asked:

'You don't consider sometimes trying some ... some new approaches?'

'New approaches, Ono-san?' he said, not looking up.

'Tell me, Tortoise, don't you have ambitions to one day produce paintings of genuine importance? I don't mean simply work that we may admire and praise amongst ourselves here at the villa. I refer to work of real importance. Work that will be a significant contribution to the people of our nation. It's to this end, Tortoise, I talk of the need for a new approach. '

I had watched him carefully as I said all this, but the Tortoise did not pause in his painting.

'To tell you the truth, Ono-san,' he said, 'someone in my humble position is always trying new approaches. But over this past year, I believe I'm beginning to find the right path at last. You see, Ono-san, I've noticed Mori-san looking at my work more and more closely this past year. I know he's pleased with me. Who knows, sometime in the future, I may even be permitted to exhibit alongside yourself and Mori-san.' Then at last he looked across to me and laughed self-consciously. 'Forgive me, Ono-san. Just a fantasy to keep me persevering. '

I decided to let the matter drop. I had intended to try again at some later date to draw my friend into my confidence, but as it turned out, I was pre-empted by events.

It was a sunny morning a few days after the conversation I have just recounted, when I stepped into the old kitchen to discover the Tortoise standing up on the platform at the back of that barn-like building, staring towards me. It took my eyes a few seconds to adjust to the shade after the brightness of the morning outside, but I soon noticed the guarded, almost alarmed expression he was wearing; indeed, there was something in the way he raised an arm awkwardly towards his chest before letting it fall again that suggested he expected me to attack him. He had made no attempt to set up his easel or otherwise prepare for the day's work, and when I greeted him he remained silent. I came nearer and asked:

'Is something wrong? '

'Ono-san ...' he muttered, but said no more. Then as I came up to the platform, he looked nervously to his left. I followed his gaze to my unfinished painting, covered over and stacked faced against the wall. The Tortoise gestured nervously towards it and said:

‘Ono-san, is this a joke of yours?’

‘No, Tortoise,’ I said, climbing up on to the platform. ‘It’s no joke at all.’

I walked over to the painting, pulled off the drapes and turned it around to face us. The Tortoise immediately averted his eyes.

‘My friend,’ I said, ‘you were once brave enough to listen to me and we took together an important step in our careers. I’d ask you now to consider taking another step forward with me.’

The Tortoise continued to hold his face away. He said:

‘Ono-san, is our teacher aware of this painting?’

‘No, not yet. But I suppose I may as well show it to him. From now on, I intend to always paint along these lines. Tortoise, look at my painting. Let me explain to you what I’m trying to do. Then perhaps we can again take an important step forward together.’

At last he turned to look at me.

‘Ono-san,’ he said, in a near whisper, ‘you are a traitor. Now please excuse me.’

With that, he hurried out of the building.

The painting which had so upset the Tortoise was one entitled ‘Complacency’, and although it did not remain in my possession for long, such was my investment in it at that time that its details have stayed imprinted on my memory; indeed, had I the desire to do so, I feel I could quite accurately recreate that painting today. The inspiration behind it had been a small scene I had witnessed some weeks previously, something I had seen while out walking with Matsuda.

We were, I recall, on our way to meet some of Matsuda's colleagues from the Okada-Shingen Society to whom he wished to introduce me. It was towards the end of summer; the hottest days were past, but I can recall following Matsuda's steady stride along the steel bridge at Nishizuru, mopping the sweat from my face and wishing my companion would walk more slowly. Matsuda was dressed that day in an elegant white summer jacket and, as ever, wore his hat slanted down stylishly. For all his pace, his strides had an effortless quality with no suggestion of hurry. And when he paused, half-way across the bridge, I saw he did not seem even to be suffering from the heat.

'You get an interesting view from up here,' he remarked. 'You agree, Ono?'

The view below us was framed by two factory plants looming one to our right, the other to our left. Wedged in between was a dense muddle of roofs, some of the cheap shingled variety, others improvised out of corrugated metals. The Nishizuru district still has today a certain reputation as a deprived area, but in those days, things were infinitely worse. Viewed from the bridge, a stranger may well have assumed that community to be some derelict site half-way to demolition were it not for the many small figures, visible on closer inspection, moving busily around the houses like ants swarming around stones.

'Look down there, Ono,' Matsuda said. 'There are more and more places in our city like this. Only two or three years ago, this was not such a bad place. But now it's growing into a shanty district. More and more people become poor, Ono, and they are obliged to leave their houses in the countryside to join their fellow sufferers in places like this.'

‘How terrible,’ I said. ‘It makes one want to do something for them.’

Matsuda smiled at me – one of his superior smiles which always made me feel uncomfortable and foolish. ‘Well-meaning sentiments,’ he said, turning back to the view. ‘We all utter them. In every walk of life. Meanwhile, places like these grow everywhere like a bad fungus. Take a deep breath, Ono. Even from here, you can smell the sewage.’

‘I’d noticed an odour. Is it really coming from down there?’

Matsuda did not reply, but continued to look down at that shanty community with a strange smile on his face. Then he said:

‘Politicians and businessmen rarely see places like this. At least if they do, they stand at a safe distance, as we are now. I doubt if many politicians or businessmen have taken a walk down there. Come to that, I doubt if many artists have either.’

Noticing the challenge in his voice, I said:

‘I wouldn’t object if it won’t make us late for our appointment.’

‘On the contrary, we will save ourselves a kilometre or two by cutting through down there.’

Matsuda had been correct in supposing the odour derived from the sewers of that community. As we climbed down to the foot of the steel bridge and began making our way through a series of narrow alleys, the smell grew ever stronger until it became quite nauseous. There was no longer a trace of wind to combat the heat, the only movement in the air around us being the perpetual buzzing of flies. Again, I found myself struggling to keep up with Matsuda’s strides, but this time felt no desire for him to slow down.

On either side of us were what might have been stalls at some marketplace, closed down for the day, but which in fact constituted individual households, partitioned from the alleyway sometimes only by a cloth curtain. Old people sat in some of the doorways, and as we went past gave interested, though never hostile, stares; small children appeared to be coming and going in all directions, while cats too seemed forever to be scurrying away from around our feet. We walked on, dodging blankets and washing hung out along coarse pieces of string; past crying babies, barking dogs and neighbours chatting amiably across the alleyway to each other, seemingly from behind closed curtains. After a while, I grew increasingly aware of the open-sewer ditches dug on either side of the narrow path we were walking. There were flies hovering all along their length and as I continued to follow Matsuda, I had the distinct feeling the space between the ditches was growing more and more narrow, until it was as though we were balancing along a fallen tree trunk.

Eventually we came to a kind of yard where a crowd of shanty huts closed off the way ahead. But Matsuda pointed to a gap between two of the huts through which was visible an open piece of wasteground.

‘If we cut across there,’ he said, ‘we’ll come up behind Kogane Street.’

Near the entrance of the passage Matsuda had indicated, I noticed three small boys bowed over something on the ground, prodding at it with sticks. As we approached, they spun round with scowls on their faces and although I saw nothing, something in their manner told me they were torturing some animal. Matsuda must have drawn the same conclusion, for he said to me as we walked past: ‘Well, they have little else to amuse themselves with around here.’

I gave those boys little further thought at the time. Then some days later, that image of the three of them, turning towards us with scowls on their faces, brandishing their sticks, standing there amidst all that squalor, returned to me with some vividness, and I used it as the central image of 'Complacency'. But I might point out that when the Tortoise stole a look at my unfinished painting that morning, the three boys he saw would have differed from their models in one or two important respects. For although they still stood in front of a squalid shanty hut, and their clothes were the same rags the original boys wore, the scowls on their faces would not have been guilty, defensive scowls of little criminals caught in the act; rather, they would have worn the manly scowls of samurai warriors ready to fight. It is no coincidence, furthermore, that the boys in my picture held their sticks in classic kendo stances.

Above the heads of these three boys, the Tortoise would have seen the painting fading into a second image - that of three fat, well-dressed men, sitting in a comfortable bar laughing together. The looks on their faces seem decadent; perhaps they are exchanging jokes about their mistresses or some such matter. These two contrasting images are moulded together within the coastline of the Japanese islands. Down the right-hand margin, in bold red characters, is the word 'Complacency'; down the left-hand side, in smaller characters, is the declaration: 'But the young are ready to fight for their dignity.'

When I describe this early and no doubt unsophisticated work, certain of its features may perhaps strike you as familiar. For it is possible you are acquainted with my painting, 'Eyes to the Horizon' which, as a print in the thirties, achieved a certain fame and influence throughout this city. 'Eyes to the Horizon' was indeed a reworking of 'Complacency', though with such differences as might be expected given the passage of years between the two. The later painting, you may recall, also employed two contrasting images merging into one another, bound by the coastline of Japan; the upper image was again that of three well-dressed men conferring, but this time they wore nervous expressions, looking to each other for initiative. And these faces, I need not remind you, resembled those of three prominent politicians. For the lower, more dominant image, the three poverty-stricken boys had become stern-faced soldiers; two of them held bayoneted rifles, flanking an officer who held out his sword, pointing the way forward, west towards Asia. Behind them, there was no longer a backdrop of poverty; simply the military flag of the rising sun. The word 'Complacency' down the right-hand margin had been replaced by 'Eyes to the Horizon!' and on the left-hand side, the message, 'No time for cowardly talking. Japan must go forward.'

Of course, if you are new to this city, it is possible you will not have come across this work. But I do not think it an exaggeration to say that a great many of those living here before the war would be familiar with it, for it did receive much praise at the time for its vigorous brush technique and, particularly, its powerful use of colour. But I am fully aware, of course, that 'Eyes to the Horizon', whatever its artistic merits, is a painting whose sentiments are now outdated. Indeed, I would be the first to admit that those same sentiments are perhaps worthy of condemnation. I am not one of those who are afraid to admit to the shortcomings of past achievements.

But I did not wish to discuss 'Eyes to the Horizon'. I mention it here only because of its obvious relationship to that earlier painting, and I suppose, to acknowledge the impact my meeting Matsuda had on my subsequent career. I had begun to see Matsuda regularly some weeks prior to that morning in the kitchen when the Tortoise had made his discovery. It is, I suppose, a measure of the appeal his ideas had for me that I continued to meet him, for as I recall, I did not at first take much of a liking to him. Indeed, most of our earlier meetings would end with our becoming extremely antagonistic towards one another. I remember one evening, for instance, not long after that day I followed him through the poverty of Nishizuru, going with him to a bar somewhere in the city centre. I do not recall the name or the whereabouts of the bar, but I remember it vividly as a dark, dirty place, frequented by what looked to be the city's low life. I felt apprehensive as soon as I walked in, but Matsuda seemed to be familiar with the place, saluting to some men playing cards around a table, before leading me to an alcove containing a small, unoccupied table.

My apprehension was not eased when shortly after we had sat down, two rough-looking men, both fairly drunk, came staggering into the alcove, wishing to engage us in conversation. Matsuda told them quite flatly to go away, and I fully expected trouble, but something about my companion seemed to unnerve the men, and they left us without comment.

After that, we sat drinking and conversing for some time, and before long, I recall, our exchanges had become abrasive. At one point I remember saying to him:

'No doubt, we artists may at times deserve mockery from the likes of you. But I'm afraid you're mistaken in assuming we're all so naive about the world.'

Matsuda laughed and said:

'But you must remember, Ono, I come across many artists. You are on the whole an astonishingly decadent crowd. Often with no more than a child's knowledge of the affairs of this world.'

I was about to protest, but Matsuda continued: 'Take for instance, Ono, this scheme of yours. The one you were proposing so earnestly just now. It's very touching, but if I may say so, displays all the naïveté typical of you artists.'

'I fail to see why my idea is so worthy of your mockery. But then I obviously made a mistake in assuming you felt concern for the poor of this city.'

‘No need for such childish jibes. You know very well my concern. But let’s consider your little scheme for a moment. Let’s suppose the unlikely occurs and your teacher is sympathetic. So then all of you at your villa will spend a week, perhaps two, producing - what? - twenty paintings? Thirty at the most. There seems little point in producing more, you won’t sell more than ten or eleven in any case. What will you do then, Ono? Wander the poor areas of this city with a little purse of coins you’ve raised from all this hard work? Give a sen to each poor person you meet?’

‘Forgive me, Matsuda, but I must repeat - you’re quite wrong to assume me so naïve. I wasn’t for a moment suggesting the exhibition be confined simply to Mori-san’s group. I’m fully aware of the scale of the poverty we’re seeking to alleviate, and this is why I’m coming to you with this suggestion. Your Okada-Shingen Society is ably placed to develop such a scheme. Large exhibitions held regularly throughout the city, attracting ever more artists, would bring significant relief to these people.’

‘I’m sorry, Ono,’ Matsuda said, smiling and shaking his head, ‘but I fear I was correct in my assumption after all. As a breed, you artists are desperately naïve.’ He leaned back in his seat and gave a sigh. The surface of our table was covered in cigarette ash and Matsuda was thoughtfully sweeping patterns in it with the edge of an empty matchbox left by previous occupants. ‘There’s a certain kind of artist these days,’ he went on, ‘whose greatest talent lies in hiding away from the real world. Unfortunately, such artists appear to be in dominance at present, and you, Ono, have come under the sway of one of them. Don’t look so angry, it’s true. Your knowledge of the world is like a child’s. I doubt, for instance, if you could even tell me who Karl Marx was.’

I gave him what must have been a sulky look, but said nothing. He gave a laugh and said: ‘You see? But don’t be too upset. Most of your colleagues know no better.’

‘Don’t be ridiculous. Of course I know of Karl Marx.’

‘Why, I’m sorry, Ono. Perhaps I did underestimate you. Please, tell me about Marx.’

I shrugged and said: ‘I believe he led the Russian revolution.’

‘Then what about Lenin, Ono? Was he perhaps Marx’s second-in-command?’

‘A colleague of some kind.’ I saw Matsuda was grinning again, and so said quickly, before he could speak: ‘In any case, you’re being preposterous. These are the concerns of some far-away country. I’m talking about the poor here in our own city.’

‘Indeed, Ono, indeed. But there again, you see, you know very little about anything. You were quite correct in assuming the Okada-Shingen Society was concerned to wake up artists and introduce them to the real world. But I have misled you if I ever suggested our society wished to be turned into a large begging bowl. We’re not interested in charity.’

‘I fail to see what there is to object to in a little charity. And if at the same time it opens the eyes of us decadent artists, then so much the better, I would have thought.’

‘Your eyes are indeed far from open, Ono, if you believe a little good-hearted charity can help the poor of our country. The truth is, Japan is headed for crisis. We are in the hands of greedy businessmen and weak politicians. Such people will see to it poverty grows every day. Unless, that is, we, the emerging generation, take action. But I’m no political agitator, Ono. My concern is with art. And with artists like you. Talented young artists, not yet irreversibly blinkered by that enclosed little world you all inhabit. The Okada-Shingen exists to help the likes of you open your eyes and produce work of genuine value for these difficult times.'

'Forgive me, Matsuda, but it strikes me it's you who are in fact the naive one. An artist's concern is to capture beauty wherever he finds it. But however skilfully he may come to do this, he will have little influence on the sort of matters you talk of. Indeed, if the Okada-Shingen is as you claim it is, then it seems to me ill-conceived indeed. It seems to be founded on a naive mistake about what art can and cannot do.'

'You know full well, Ono, we do not see things so simply. The fact is, the Okada-Shingen does not exist in isolation. There are young men like us in all walks of life - in politics, in the military - who think the same way. We are the emerging generation. Together, it is within our capability to achieve something of real value. It just so happens that some of us care deeply about art and wish to see it responding to the world of today. The truth is, Ono, in times like these, when people are getting poorer, and children are growing more hungry and sick all around you, it is simply not enough for an artist to hide away somewhere, perfecting pictures of courtesans. I can see you're angry with me, and even now you're searching for some way to come back at me. But I mean well, Ono. I hope later on you'll think carefully about these things. For you, above all, are someone of immense talent.'

'Well, do tell me then, Matsuda. How can we decadent foolish artists help bring about your political revolution?'

To my annoyance, Matsuda was once more smiling disparagingly across the table. 'Revolution? Really, Ono! The communists want a revolution. We want nothing of the sort. Quite the opposite, in fact. We wish for a restoration. We simply ask that his Imperial Majesty the Emperor be restored to his rightful place as head of our state.'

'But our Emperor is precisely that already.'

‘Really, Ono. So naive and confused.’ His voice, though it remained, as ever, perfectly calm, seemed at this point to grow harder. ‘Our Emperor is our rightful leader, and yet what in reality has become of things? Power has been grasped from him by these businessmen and their politicians. Listen, Ono, Japan is no longer a backward country of peasant farmers. We are now a mighty nation, capable of matching any of the Western nations. In the Asian hemisphere, Japan stands like a giant amidst cripples and dwarfs. And yet we allow our people to grow more and more desperate, our little children to die of malnutrition. Meanwhile, the businessmen get richer and the politicians forever make excuses and chatter. Can you imagine any of the Western powers allowing such a situation? They would surely have taken action long ago.’

‘Action? What sort of action do you refer to, Matsuda?’

‘It’s time for us to forge an empire as powerful and wealthy as those of the British and the French. We must use our strength to expand abroad. The time is now well due for Japan to take her rightful place amongst the world powers. Believe me, Ono, we have the means to do so, but have yet to discover the will. And we must rid ourselves of these businessmen and politicians. Then the military will be answerable only to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor.’ Then he gave a small laugh and turned his gaze back down to the patterns he was weaving in the cigarette ash. ‘But this is largely for others to worry over,’ he said. ‘The likes of us, Ono, we must concern ourselves with art.’

It is my belief, though, that the reason for the Tortoise’s upset in the disused kitchen two or three weeks later had not so much to do with these issues I discussed with Matsuda that night; the Tortoise would not have had the perception to have seen so far into that unfinished painting of mine. All he would have recognized was that it represented a blatant disregard for Mori-san’s priorities; abandoned had been the school’s collective endeavour to capture the fragile lantern light of the pleasure world; bold calligraphy had been introduced to complement the visual impact; and above all, no doubt, the Tortoise would have been shocked to observe that my technique made extensive use of the hard outline - a traditional enough method, as you will know, but one whose rejection was fundamental to Mori-san's teaching.

Whatever the reasons for his outrage, I knew after that morning I could no longer hide my rapidly developing ideas from those around me, and that it was only a matter of time before our teacher himself came to hear of it all. Thus, by the time I had that conversation with Mori-san inside the pavilion at Takami Gardens, I had turned over in my mind many times what I might say to him, and was firmly resolved not to let myself down.

It was a week or so after that morning in the kitchen. Mori-san and I had spent the afternoon in the city on some errand - perhaps to select and order our materials, I do not remember. What I do recall is that as we went about our business, Mori-san did not behave in any way oddly towards me. Then, with the evening drawing in, finding ourselves with a little time before our train, we climbed the steep steps behind Yotsugawa Station up to the Takami Gardens.

In those days there stood up on Takami Gardens a most pleasing pavilion, just on the rim of the hill overlooking the area - not far, in fact, from where the peace memorial stands today. The most noticeably attractive feature of the pavilion was the way the eaves of its elegant roof were hung all the way round with lanterns - although on that particular night, as I recall, the lanterns were all unlit as we approached. Stepping in under the roof, the pavilion was as spacious as a large room, but since it was not enclosed on any side, only the arched posts supporting the roof broke one's view out over the district below.

Quite possibly, that evening with Mori-san was the occasion I first discovered that pavilion. It was to remain a favourite spot for me over the years, until it was eventually destroyed during the war, and I often took my own pupils there whenever we happened to be passing that way. Indeed, I believe it was in that same pavilion, just before the start of the war, that I was to have my last conversation with Kuroda, the most gifted of my pupils.

In any case, that first evening I followed Mori-san inside it, I recall the sky had become a pale crimson colour and lights were coming on amidst the muddle of roofs still visible down below in the gloom. Mori-san took a few further steps towards the view, then leaning a shoulder against a post, looked up at the sky with some satisfaction and said without turning to me:

‘Ono, there are some matches and tapers in our kerchief. Kindly light these lanterns. The effect, I imagine, will be most interesting.’

As I made my way around the pavilion, lighting lantern after lantern, the gardens around us, which had become still and silent, steadily faded into darkness. All the while, I continued to glance towards the silhouette of Mori-san outlined against the sky, gazing out thoughtfully at the view. I had lit perhaps half of the lanterns when I heard him say:

‘So then, Ono, what is this matter troubling you so much?’

‘I’m sorry, Sensei?’

‘You mentioned earlier today, there was something troubling you.’

I gave a small laugh as I reached up towards a lantern.

‘Just a small thing, Sensei. I wouldn’t bother Sensei with it, but then I am not sure what to make of it. The fact is, two days ago, I discovered that certain of my paintings had been removed from where I always store them in the old kitchen.’

Mori-san remained silent for a moment. Then he said:

‘And what did the others have to say about this?’

‘I asked them, but no one seemed to know anything. Or at least, no one seemed willing to tell me.’

‘So what did you conclude, Ono? Is there some conspiracy against you?’

‘Well, as a matter of fact, Sensei, the others do appear anxious to avoid my company. Indeed, I have been unable to have a single conversation with any of them over these past few days. When I enter a room, people go silent or else leave altogether.’

He made no comment on this, and when I glanced towards him, he appeared to be still absorbed by the setting sky. I was in the process of lighting another lantern when I heard him say:

‘Your paintings are presently in my possession. I’m sorry if I caused you alarm by taking them. It just so happened I had a little spare time the other day and thought it a good opportunity to catch up on your recent work. You appeared to be out somewhere at the time. I suppose I should have told you when you returned, Ono. My apologies.’

‘Why, not at all, Sensei. I’m most grateful you should take such an interest in my work.’

‘But it’s only natural I should take interest. You are my most accomplished pupil. I have invested years nurturing your talent.’

‘Of course, Sensei. I cannot begin to estimate what I owe you.’

Neither of us spoke for a few moments, while I continued to light lanterns. Then I paused and said:

‘I am very relieved no harm has come to my paintings. I should have known there was some simple explanation of this kind. I can now put my mind at rest. '

Mori-san said nothing to this, and from what I could make of his silhouette, he did not take his eyes from the view. It occurred to me he had not heard me, so I said a little more loudly:

'I am glad I can put my mind at rest regarding the safety of my paintings. '

'Yes, Ono,' Mori-san said, as though startled out of some far-away thoughts. 'I had a little spare time on my hands, So I had someone go and fetch me your recent work. '

'It was foolish of me to have worried. I'm glad the paintings are safe. '

He did not speak for some time so that I again thought he had not heard me. But then he said: 'I was a little surprised by what I saw. You seem to be exploring curious avenues. '

Of course, he may well not have used that precise phrase, 'exploring curious avenues'. For it occurs to me that expression was one I myself tended to use frequently in later years and it may well be that I am remembering my own words to Kuroda on that later occasion in that same pavilion. But then again, I believe Mori-san did at times refer to 'exploring avenues'; in fact, this is probably another example of my inheriting a characteristic from my former teacher. In any case, I recall I did not respond other than to give a self-conscious laugh and reach for another lantern. Then I heard him saying:

'It's no bad thing that a young artist experiment a little. Amongst other things, he is able to get some of his more superficial interests out of his system that way. Then he can return to more serious work with more commitment than ever.' Then, after a pause, he muttered as though to himself: 'No, it's no bad thing to experiment. It's all part of being young. It's no bad thing at all. '

‘Sensei,’ I said, ‘I feel strongly that my recent work is the finest I have yet done.’

‘It’s no bad thing, no bad thing at all. But then again, one shouldn’t spend too much time with such experiments. One can become like someone who travels too much. Best return to serious work before too long.’

I waited to see if he would say anything more. After a few moments, I said: ‘I was no doubt foolish to worry so much for the safety of those paintings. But you see, Sensei, I am more proud of them than anything else I have done. All the same, I should have guessed there would be some such simple explanation.’

Mori-san remained silent. When I glanced at him past the lantern I was lighting, it was difficult to tell whether he was pondering my words or thinking about something else altogether. There was a strange mixture of light in the pavilion as the sky continued to set and I lit more and more lanterns. But Mori-san’s figure remained in silhouette, leaning against a post, his back to me.

‘Incidentally, Ono,’ he said, eventually, ‘I was told there were one or two other paintings you’ve completed recently that were not with those I have now.’

‘Quite possibly, there are one or two I did not store with the others.’

‘Ah. And no doubt these are the very paintings you are most fond of.’

I did not reply to this. Then Mori-san went on:

‘Perhaps when we return, Ono, you will bring me these other paintings. I would be most interested to see them.’

I thought for a moment, then said: ‘I would, of course, be most grateful for Sensei’s opinions of them. However, I am not at all certain as to where I left them.’

‘But you will endeavour to find them, I trust.’

‘I will, Sensei. In the meantime, I will perhaps relieve Sensei of the other paintings to which he was so kind as to give his attention. No doubt they are cluttering up his quarters, so I shall remove them as soon as we return.’

‘No need to bother with those paintings, Ono. It will be sufficient if you find the remaining ones and bring them to me.’

‘I regret, Sensei, that I will not be able to find the remaining paintings.’

‘I see, Ono.’ He gave a tired sigh, and I could see him once again gazing up at the sky. ‘So you do not think you will be able to bring me those paintings of yours.’

‘No, Sensei. I fear not.’

‘I see. Of course, you have considered your future in the event of your leaving my patronage.’

‘It had been my hope that Sensei would understand my position and continue to support me in pursuing my career.’

He remained silent, so eventually I went on:

‘Sensei, it would cause me the greatest pain to leave the villa. These past several years have been the happiest and most valuable of my life. My colleagues I look upon as brothers. And as for Sensei himself, why, I can hardly begin to estimate what I owe him. I would beg you to look once more at my new paintings and reconsider them. Perhaps, in fact, Sensei will allow me when we return to explain my intentions in each picture.’

He still gave no sign of having heard me. So I continued:

‘I have learnt many things over these past years. I have learnt much in contemplating the world of pleasure, and recognizing its fragile beauty. But I now feel it is time for me to progress to other things. Sensei, it is my belief that in such troubled times as these, artists must learn to value something more tangible than those pleasurable things that disappear with the morning light. It is not necessary that artists always occupy a decadent and enclosed world. My conscience, Sensei, tells me I cannot remain forever an artist of the floating world.'

With that, I turned my attention back to the lanterns. After a few moments, Mori-san said:

'You have been for some time now my most accomplished pupil. It will be a matter of some pain to me to see you leave. Let us say, then, that you have three days to bring me those remaining paintings. You will bring those to me, then turn your mind back to more proper concerns.'

'As I have already said, Sensei, it is to my deep regret that I will be unable to bring you those paintings.'

Mori-san made a sound as though he were laughing to himself. Then he said: 'As you point out yourself, Ono, these are troubled times. All the more so for a young artist, practically unknown and without resources. If you were less talented, I would fear for your future after leaving me. But you are a clever fellow. No doubt you have made arrangements.'

'As a matter of fact, I have made no arrangements whatsoever. The villa has been my home for so long, I never seriously contemplated it ceasing to be so.'

'Is that so. Well, as I say, Ono, were you less talented, there would be cause for worry. But you are a clever young man.' I saw Mori-san's silhouette turn to face me. 'You will no doubt succeed in finding work illustrating magazines and comic books. Perhaps you will even manage to join a firm like the one you were employed by when you first came to me. Of course, it will mean the end of your development as a serious artist, but then no doubt you've taken all this into account.'

These may sound unnecessarily vindictive words for a teacher to use to a pupil whose admiration he knows he still commands. But then again, when a master painter has given so much in time and resources to a certain pupil, when furthermore he has allowed that pupil's name to be associated in public with his own, it is perhaps understandable, if not entirely excusable, that the teacher lose for a moment his sense of proportion and react in ways he may later regret. And though the manoeuvrings over the possession of the paintings will no doubt appear petty, it is surely understandable if a teacher who has actually supplied most of the paints and materials should forget in such a moment that his pupil has any right whatever over his own work.

For all that, it is clear that such arrogance and possessiveness on the part of a teacher - however renowned he may be - is to be regretted. From time to time, I still turn over in my mind that cold winter's morning and the smell of burning growing ever stronger in my nostrils. It was the winter before the outbreak of war and I was standing anxiously at the door of Kuroda's house - a shabby little affair he used to rent in the Nakamachi area. The burning smell, I could tell, originated from somewhere within the house, from where also came the sound of a woman sobbing. I pulled the bell rope repeatedly and shouted for someone to come and receive me, but there was no response. Eventually I decided to let myself in, but as I pulled back the outer door, a uniformed policeman appeared in the entryway.

‘What do you want?’ he demanded.

‘I came looking for Mr Kuroda. He is home?’

‘The occupant has been taken to police headquarters for questioning.’

‘Questioning?’

‘I advise you to go home,’ the officer said. ‘Or else we’ll be wanting to start checking on you too. We’re interested now in all close associates of the occupant. '

'But why? Has Mr Kuroda committed any crime? '

'No one wants his sort around. If you don't go on your way, we'll have you in for questioning too. '

Inside the house, the woman - Kuroda's mother, I assumed - continued to sob. I could hear someone shouting something at her.

'Where is the officer in charge? ' I asked.

'On your way. You want to be arrested? '

'Before we go any further,' I said, 'let me explain that my name is Ono.' The officer showed no recognition, so I continued a little uncertainly: 'I am the man on whose information you have been brought here. I am Masuji Ono, the artist and member of the Cultural Committee of the Interior Department. Indeed, I am an official adviser to the Committee of Unpatriotic Activities. I believe there's been some sort of mistake here and I would like to speak with whoever is in charge. '

The officer looked at me suspiciously for a moment, then turned and disappeared into the house. Before long, he came back and gestured for me to step up.

As I followed him through Kuroda's house, I saw everywhere the contents of cupboards and drawers emptied out over the floor. Some books, I noticed, had been piled up and tied into bundles, while in the main room, the tatami had been lifted and an officer was investigating the floorboards beneath with a torch. From behind a closed partition, I could hear more clearly Kuroda's mother sobbing and an officer shouting questions at her.

I was led out to the veranda at the back of the house. In the middle of the small yard another uniformed officer and a man in plain clothes were standing around a bonfire. The plain-clothes man turned and came a few steps towards me.

‘Mr Ono?’ he asked, quite respectfully.

The officer who had led me in seemed to sense his earlier rudeness had been inappropriate and quickly turned back into the house.

‘What has happened to Mr Kuroda?’

‘Taken for questioning, Mr Ono. We’ll take care of him, don’t you worry.’

I stared past him at the fire, now almost burnt out. The uniformed officer was poking the pile with a stick.

‘Did you have authorization to burn those paintings?’ I asked.

‘It’s our policy to destroy any offensive material which won’t be needed as evidence. We’ve selected a good enough sample. The rest of this trash we’re just burning.’

‘I had no idea’, I said, ‘something like this would happen. I merely suggested to the committee someone come round and give Mr Kuroda a talking-to for his own good.’ I stared again at the smouldering pile in the middle of the yard. ‘It was quite unnecessary to burn those. There were many fine works amongst them.’

‘Mr Ono, we’re grateful for your help. But now the investigations have been started, you must leave them in the hands of the appropriate authorities. We’ll see to it your Mr Kuroda is treated fairly.’

He smiled, and turning back to the fire, said something to the uniformed officer. The latter poked the fire again and said something under his breath which sounded like: ‘Unpatriotic trash.’

I remained on the veranda, watching with unbelieving eyes. Eventually, the plain-clothes officer turned to me again and said: ‘Mr Ono, I suggest you return home now.’

‘Things have gone much too far,’ I said. ‘And why are you interrogating Mrs Kuroda? What has she to do with anything?’

‘This is a police matter now, Mr Ono. It doesn’t concern you any longer.’

‘Things have gone much too far. I intend to discuss this with Mr Ubukata. Indeed, I may well take it straight up to Mr Saburi himself.’

The plain-clothes man called to someone in the house and the officer who had answered the door to me appeared at my side.

‘Thank Mr Ono for his help and show him out,’ the plain-clothes man said. Then as he turned back to the fire, he gave a sudden cough. ‘Bad paintings make bad smoke,’ he said with a grin, beating at the air about his face.

But this is all of limited relevance here. I believe I was recalling the events of that day last month when Setsuko was down on her short visit; in fact, I was recounting how Taro had got us all laughing around the supper table with his anecdotes about his work colleagues.

As I remember, supper continued to proceed in a most satisfactory manner. I could not, however, avoid some discomfort in observing Ichiro whenever Noriko poured out sake. For the first few times, he would glance across the table at me with a conspiratorial smile, which I did my best to return in as neutral a way as possible. But then as the meal progressed, and sake continued to be poured, he ceased to look at me, but would stare crossly at his aunt as she refilled our cups.

Taro had told us several more amusing stories about his colleagues, when Setsuko said to him:

‘You make such fun, Taro-san. But I learn from Noriko that morale is very high at your company just now. Surely, it must be most stimulating to work in such an atmosphere.’

At this, Taro’s manner became suddenly very earnest. ‘It is indeed, Setsuko-san,’ he said, nodding. ‘The changes we made after the war are now beginning to bear fruit at all levels of the company. We feel very optimistic about the future. Within the next ten years, provided we all do our best, KNC should be a name recognized not just all over Japan but all over the world.’

‘How splendid. And Noriko was telling me your branch director is a very kindly man. That too must make a big difference to morale.’

‘You’re indeed right. But then Mr Hayasaka is not only a kindly man, he is someone of the greatest ability and vision. I can assure you, Setsuko-san, to work for an incompetent superior, however kindly, can be a demoralizing experience. We are very fortunate to have someone like Mr Hayasaka to lead us.’

‘Indeed, Suichi too is very fortunate in that he has a very capable superior.’

‘Is that so, Setsuko-san? But then I would expect as much of a company like Nippon Electrics. Only the best sort of people would hold responsibility in such a firm.’

‘We are so fortunate that seems to be the case. But I am sure it is equally true at KNC, Taro-san. Suichi always speaks highly of KNC.’

‘Excuse me, Taro,’ I put in at this point. ‘Of course, I’m sure you have every reason to be optimistic at KNC. But I’ve been meaning to ask you, is it in your opinion entirely for the good that so many sweeping changes were made at your firm after the war? I hear there is hardly any of the old management left.’

My son-in-law smiled thoughtfully, then said: 'I appreciate very much Father's concern. Youth and vigour alone will not always produce the best results. But in all frankness, Father, a complete overhaul was called for. We needed new leaders with a new approach appropriate to the world of today.'

'Of course, of course. And I've no doubt your new leaders are the most capable of men. But tell me, Taro, don't you worry at times we might be a little too hasty in following the Americans? I would be the first to agree many of the old ways must now be erased for ever, but don't you think sometimes some good things are being thrown out with the bad?' Indeed, sometimes Japan has come to look like a small child learning from a strange adult.'

'Father is very right. At times, I'm sure, we have been a little hasty. But by and large, the Americans have an immense amount to teach us. Just in these few years, for instance, we Japanese have already come a long way in understanding such things as democracy and individual rights. Indeed, Father, I have a feeling Japan has finally established a foundation on which to build a brilliant future. This is why firms like ours can look forward with the greatest confidence.'

'Indeed, Taro-san,' Setsuko said. 'Suichi has just that same feeling. He has expressed on a number of occasions recently his opinion that after four years of confusion, our country has finally set its sights on the future.'

Although my daughter had addressed this remark to Taro, I had the distinct impression it had been made for my benefit. Taro too seemed to take it that way, for rather than reply to Setsuko, he continued:

'In fact, Father, just the other week I attended a reunion dinner of my school graduation year and for the first time since the surrender, all those present from every walk of life were expressing optimism for the future. It is then by no means just at KNC there is a feeling things are coming right. And while I fully understand Father's worries, I'm confident that by and large the lessons of these past years have been good ones and will lead us all on to a splendid future. But perhaps I am to be corrected, Father.'

'Not at all, not at all,' I said, and gave him a smile.

'As you say, no doubt your generation has a splendid future. And you are all so confident. I can only wish you the best.'

My son-in-law seemed about to respond to this, but just then, Ichiro reached across the table and tapped the sake flask with his finger, as he had done once before. Taro turned to him, saying: 'Ah, Ichiro-san. Just who we needed for our discussions. Tell us, what do you think you'll be when you grow up?'

My grandson continued to regard the sake flask for a moment, then glanced over towards me with a sullen look. His mother touched his arm, whispering to him: 'Ichiro, Uncle Taro's asking you. You tell him what you want to be.'

'President of Nippon Electrics!' Ichiro declared loudly.

We all laughed.

'Now are you sure of that, Ichiro-san?' Taro asked. 'You don't instead wish to lead us at KNC?'

'Nippon Electrics is the best company!'

We all laughed again.

'A great shame for us,' Taro remarked. 'Ichiro-san is just who we'll need at KNC in a few years.'

This exchange seemed to take Ichiro's mind off the sake, and from then on, he seemed to enjoy himself, joining in loudly whenever the adults laughed at something. Only towards the very end of our meal did he ask in a quite disinterested voice:

‘Is the sake all finished now?’

‘All gone,’ Noriko said. ‘Would Ichiro-san like more orange juice?’

Ichiro refused this offer in a well-mannered way, and turned back to Taro, who had been explaining something to him. For all that, I could imagine his disappointment and felt a wave of irritation at Setsuko for not being a little more understanding of her little boy’s feelings.

I got my chance to talk alone with Ichiro an hour or so later when I went into the small spare room of the apartment to say good-night to him. The light was still on, but Ichiro was under the quilt, on his front, a cheek pressed against his pillow. When I turned off the light, I discovered the blinds did not prevent light from the opposite apartment block coming into the room to throw shadowy bars across the walls and ceiling. From the next room came the sounds of my daughters laughing over something, and as I knelt down beside Ichiro’s quilt he whispered:

‘Oji, is Aunt Noriko drunk?’

‘I don’t think so, Ichiro. She’s just laughing at something, that’s all.’

‘She might be a little bit drunk. Don’t you think, Oji?’

‘Well, perhaps. Just a little. There’s no harm in that.’

‘Women can’t handle sake, can they, Oji?’ he said, and giggled into his pillow.

I gave a laugh, then said to him: ‘You know, Ichiro, there’s no need to be upset about the sake tonight. It really doesn’t matter. Soon you’ll be older, and then you’ll be able to drink sake as much as you like.’

